The most famous twentieth-century example of kissing in art is Constantin Brancusi's The Kiss (1907), a stone sculpture in Montparnasse Cemetery in Paris, which commemorates the tomb of the Russian girl Tatiana Rachevskaja. The two embracing and kissing figures are represented in a primitivistic way, both part of the same block of stone, possibly indicating love as the finding of one's other half as part of a whole relationship or the unity of a pair of lovers. In Sculpture Inside and Out, Malvina Hoffman describes a visit to Brancusi's studio in which she offers her interpretation of his Kiss:

I see the forms of two cells that meet and create life . . . like the revelation I once saw through a microscope when I studied embryology. The beginning of life . . . through love. Am I right? "Yes you are," he answered, ". . . first came this group of two interlaced, seated figures in stone . . . then the symbol of the egg, then the thought grew into this gateway to a beyond." (p. 53)

Brancusi also used the design in Gate of the Kiss, a memorial to Romanian soldiers killed in World War I for the park of Tirgu-Jiu in his homeland, Romania. The columns of the gate employ the motif of touching half-circles, representing the kiss, incorporated into a larger circular form. The frieze across the top of the gate is made up of the repeated kiss motifs.

Brancusi's work contrasts greatly with Auguste Rodin's The Kiss (circa 1890), which inspired Brancusi. Rodin's Kiss, based on Dante, grew out of a study for Paolo and Francesca to be included in the artist's massive Gates of Hell. It presents a more romantic nineteenth-century view, with two naturalistic figures of a man and woman embracing, outlined in space, with none of the organic melding of Brancusi's pair.

Klimt's famous oil painting The Kiss is life-size and shows the merging of a man and woman in a passionate embrace. Geometric verticals decorate the man's robe, and circles and spirals adorn the woman's robe, obvious symbols of masculinity and femininity. The painting was aptly described by art historian Alessandra Comini as "ornate intercourse of circular and vertical forms" (p. 24).

This idea of the melding or uniting of two people through a kiss, although a pervasive idea in most cultures, is depicted most vividly in Indian sculpture. Enlaced and ardent couples in the sculptures of the temples at Eluru, Khajuraho, and Konarak symbolize the fusion of the male and female principles and the sharing of sacred breath through the kiss.

See also Betrayal; Love and Death; Reading

Selected Works of Art

Ancient Themes

The Kiss, Greek marble relief, first century B.C., Venice, Italy, Museo Archeologico

The Kiss, Iberian stone relief, fourth–second century B.C., from Osuna, Spain, now in Madrid, National Archaeological Museum

Etruscan Sarcophagus, fourth century B.C., from Vulci, now in Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
Canova, Antonio, Psyche Re-animated by the Kiss of Amor, 1792, Paris, Louvre

Asian

Kissing Couple, hewn rock, A.D. 600–850, Elura, India, Kailasa Temple

The Adi-Buddha Vajradhara in Union with his Sakti, Nepalese bronze, seventeenth century, London, British Museum

Biblical: Leave-Taking

Rembrandt van Rijn, David's Leave-taking of Jonathan, oil, 1642, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Biblical: Meeting, Greeting

Giotto, The Meeting of Anna and Joachim at the Golden Gate, fresco, 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
Dürer, Albrecht, Life of the Virgin, woodcut, 1511–1515

Biblical: Betrayal

Giotto, The Kiss of Judas, fresco, 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Biblical: Adoration

Gentile da Fabriano, The Adoration of the Kings, oil, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Veronese, Paolo, The Adoration of the Kings, 1578, London, National Gallery
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, The Adoration of the Magi, panel from The Seed of David altarpiece, Llandaff, Wales, Cathedral

Secular: Conjunction and Sympathy

Justice and Peace Have Kissed, detail of miniature from manuscript Golden Legend, fifteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. franc. 244, fol. 187)
Overbeck, Johann Friedrich, Italia and Germania, 1829, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemälde Sammlungen

Sluyters, Jan, Embracing Women, 1906, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Van Gogh Museum

Secular: Love, Desire

The First Kiss of Lancelot and Guinevere, illuminated manuscript, Lancelot du Lac, circa 1310, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M. 805)
Utamaro, Kitagawa, Lovers, woodblock print, 1788, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, The Stolen Kiss, oil, before 1788, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
Flaxman, John, Paolo and Francesca, line engraving, 1793, London, British Museum
Blake, William, Paolo and Francesca, with the Whirlwind of Lovers, engraving, 1826
West, Benjamin, The Stolen Kiss, oil on canvas, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Study for the Rose Garden, pen and ink drawing, 1861, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Hayez, Francisco, The Kiss, before 1882, Milan, Italy, Brera
Klimt, Gustav, The Kiss, oil, 1907–1908, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie

Rodin, Auguste, The Kiss, marble, circa 1890, Paris, Musée
Rodin

Munch, Edvard, The Kiss, oil on cardboard, 1892, Oslo, Norway, Munch-Museet

Behrens, Peter, The Kiss, colored woodcut, 1896–1897

Munch, Edvard, The Kiss, woodcut, 1897–1898

Brancusi, Constantin, The Kiss, stone, 1907, Paris, Montparnasse Cemetery

Schmidt-Rottluff, Karl, The Kiss, woodcut, 1918

Warhol, Andy, The Kiss (Bela Lugosi), silk screen, ink on paper, 1963

Warhol, Andy, The Kiss, film strips, silk screen print of Plexiglas, 1965, Darmstadt, Germany, Collection Ströher

The Kiss of Death

Baldung Grien, Hans, Death and the Young Woman, 1517, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, St. Cecilia, woodblock print, illustration for Moxon Tennyson, 1857, New York,
Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Dante's Dream of the Death of Beatrice, oil, 1871, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery

Munch, Edvard, Death and the Maiden, 1894, Oslo, Norway, Munch-Museet

The Kiss of Peace

The Kiss of Peace Exchanged Between Saints Peter and Paul, mosaic, Palermo, Italy, Palatine Chapel

Cameron, Julia Margaret, The Kiss of Peace, albumen print, 1869, Bath, England, Royal Photographic Society

Further Reading

Bartram, Michael, The Pre-Raphaelite Camera, Boston: Little, Brown, 1985

Blue, Adrienna, On Kissing: From the Metaphysical to the Erotic, London: Gollancz, 1996

Comini, Alessandra, Gustav Klimt, New York: G. Braziller, 1975

De Vries, A., Dictionary of Symbols and Imagery, London:
North Holland, 1974; New York: Macmillan, 1975

Doughty, Oswald, and John Robert Wahl, The Letters of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1965

Geist, Sidney, Brancusi/The Kiss, New York: Harper, 1978

Goldwater, Robert, Symbolism, New York: Harper, 1979

Hamburg Kennedy, Maria, and Susan Marin, editors, *Kissing:
Photographs of the Wonderful Act of Kissing*, Marina Del
Rey, California: Greystone, 1995

Lang, Cecil V., editor, The Swinburne Letters, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1959

Nyrop, Christopher, The Kiss, and Its History, London:
Stands, 1901

Perella, Nicolas James, The Kiss, Sacred and Profane: An Interpretative History of Kiss Symbolism and Related Religio-Erotic Themes, Berkeley, California: University of California Press, 1969

Rossetti, William M., editor, The Works of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Boston: Roberts Brothers, 1894; London: Ellis and Elvey, 1903

LABOR/TRADES/ OCCUPATIONS

Stephen Lamia

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Labor/Trades/Occupations:

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN
GREEK AND ROMAN
ROMANESQUE

GOTHIC
RENAISSANCE
BAROQUE

NINETEENTH CENTURY
TWENTIETH CENTURY

Jacopo della Quercia, The Labors of Adam and Eve, circa 1428, marble relief, Bologna, Italy, San Petronio. (Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

This article broadly surveys the immense subject of labor, trades, and occupations and, by necessity, classifies them into four genres: tasks that are depicted in a mundane milieu, the metaphoric aspects of labor, biblical references to toiling, and mythological themes of work.

Tasks Depicted in a Mundane Milieu

The study of realist iconography begins in ancient Egypt. Numerous tombs have walls adorned with images of people and animals occupied with one of mankind's oldest forms of work—farming the land. We marvel at the bustle of activity set in the typical “spaceless” environment that characterizes Egyptian art. Whether it be scenes of plowing the land, as in the Chapel of Atet in Medum; unloading grain, as in the Chapel of Djehutyhetep in Bersheh; or harvesting crops, as in the Chapel of Khnum-hotep in Beni Hasan and the Tomb of Menena in Thebes, artists have immortalized the liveliness and industrious spirit of the field laborers. That same vitality has been captured by a late Romanesque manuscript illuminator in a harvest scene from a Speculum virginum wherein we observe, in three horizontal registers, men and women cutting and bundling wheat, raking the ground, and sowing seeds. Artists who flourished in the wake of the Industrial Revolution continued the tradition of representing agricultural tasks in an effort to visually preserve this method of livelihood, or to give it a heroic aura, as they perceived it to be supplanted by the Machine Age. George Robert Lewis meticulously recorded farmhands performing their chores in his early nineteenth-century canvas Hereford, Dynedor, and the Malver Hills from the Haywood Lodge, Harvest Scene, Afternoon. In keeping with this aspect of visual reportage, mid-nineteenth-century realists such as William Sidney Mount, Rosa Bonheur, Eastman Johnson, and Winslow Homer objectively rendered familiar activities such as making cider, plowing, husking corn, and picking cotton, cranberries, and other fruits of the Earth. Jean-François Millet and Vincent van Gogh endowed their farm laborers with a more exalted aura, as can be seen in their treatment of the same subject, The Sower. However, both artists also evoke stirring compassion for the backbreaking efforts of the peasants in such works as Millet's The Gleaners or van Gogh's Peasant Women Digging Potatoes. Although he, too, often represented the theme of agricultural labor, Émile Bernard seemed centered more on the formalist issue of the cloisonist style.

Domestic occupations, likewise, form a nucleus of images under the broader category of realism. As with agriculture, we discover a range of activities centered on hearth and home. These include works such as an ancient Egyptian fragment depicting a baker tending his oven and the same chore performed by a peasant woman in a striking chalk drawing by Honoré Daumier. This subcategory of domestic chores also includes “active” scenes by Millet, Edgar Degas, and Pablo Picasso that represent laundering and ironing clothes as well as “passive” figures of cooks, servants, governesses, and seamstresses by Pieter Aertsen, Jan Vermeer, Jean-Baptiste-Siméon Chardin, and Édouard Vuillard. Images of spinning, weaving, and sewing sometimes depict solitary efforts, as in Millet's The Spinner; coordinated group activity that actually extends beyond the boundaries of the domestic environment, as in the Amasis Painter's Women Working Wool, Diego Velázquez's Las Hilanderas, and Max Liebermann's Dutch Sewing School; or exhaustion through ennui, as in Gustave Courbet's The Sleeping Spinner.

A rich and fascinating trove of imagery dealing with labor, trades, and occupations originated from artists' needs and desires to depict their own creative efforts. The chronology harkens back to antiquity, but a great many examples date from the medieval era. A southern Italian red-figured vase shows an artist polychroming a statue of a god or perhaps Hercules, while in two important Gothic manuscripts, the Cantigas de Alfonso el Sabio and the Lambeth Apocalypse, the statue in the process of being painted is that of the Virgin and Child. Other Gothic manuscripts represent artists grinding pigments, as in Jacobus de Voragine's Omne bonum, and decorating walls with frescoes, as in a French historiated Bible. The Art of Painting—one of several reliefs depicting various arts adorning the exterior of the Campanile of Florence Cathedral in Italy—has been attributed variously to both Giotto and Andrea Pisano. In a late fifteenth-century colored pen drawing, the Housebook Master also unites several of the arts—painting, sculpture, and even musical instrument making—under the aegis of the planet Mercury. Auguste Renoir carries the theme forward in a portrait of Claude Monet standing at his easel and painting in his garden. In the twentieth century, Diego Rivera, the Mexican muralist, celebrates his preferred medium in a work entitled The Making of a Fresco.

Images of scribes hunched over their desks or pausing from their transcriptions also appear in medieval manuscripts. The looming figure of Eadwine the Scribe in the Psalter that bears his name and the humorous depiction of the scribe Hildebert, hurling an object at a mouse who nibbles at his lunch in an edition of St. Augustine's De civitate Dei, are two vivid examples from the Romanesque period. The metalsmith, too, has been represented at his trade in another relief on the Campanile in Florence. This craft has also been bestowed a place of honor among royalty and clergy in a miniature found in Jacobus de Cessolis's Le Jeu des échecs moralisée, a French Gothic manuscript of the fourteenth century.

The stonecutter—sculptor as well as mason—has likewise received the attention of his contemporaries in late medieval art. Stained-glass windows of the thirteenth century in the French towns Chartres, Bourges, and Beauvais, to cite just a few examples, represent masons cutting stones and hauling them up ramps, dropping plumb lines, and laying bricks to form walls. Matthew Paris's Life of St. Alban contains a pair of tinted line drawings showing King Offa of Mercia visiting the building site of St. Alban's church. The miniatures are alive with action. Standing beside the king at left is the architect holding his square and compass. Both men observe laborers transporting bricks in wheelbarrows or lifting them by ropes, drilling into walls, or laying bricks. Francisco Goya's Injured Mason, a late eighteenth-century tapestry cartoon, indicates the hazards of this occupation, while Fernand Leger's The Builders shows figures interwoven with scaffolds and ladders to form a compositional design that reinforces the strength of this specialized trade.

A small, late Archaic, terra-cotta statue from the Greek republic of Boeotia representing a barber with his customer is particularly charming for its whimsical nature. A fantastic interpretation of the same trade appears in the work of the early twentieth-century Russian painter David Burliuk, whose Headless Barber exhibits a stylistic amalgamation of cubism, futurism, and rayonism. Quentin Matsys's The Money Changer and His Wife presents the sixteenth-century Netherlandish variety of realism in connection with those who trade in coins. The couple intently weighs and counts money in the cozy confines of their shop.

The image of the doctor appears frequently in the visual arts, and in the course of its history one is able to trace the development of this profession from its folkloristic roots to its scientific orientation. One medieval example, an Italian manuscript of the late twelfth century, represents King William II of Sicily being treated by an Arab physician and an astrologer. By the time of the Baroque period, the less scientific aspects of this practice have been purged from the canvas. Rembrandt van Rijn's Anatomy Lesson of Dr. Tulp is decidedly more factually based. This trend continues in Goya's image of a doctor in a tapestry cartoon and even more so in two riveting canvases by Thomas Eakins, The Gross Clinic and The Agnew Clinic. Diego Rivera's frescoes The History of Cardiology and The History of Medicine in Mexico are mid-twentieth-century comprehensive treatments of this respected profession.

Woodsmen and knife-grinders are just two of the many genres of unskilled workers represented in the visual arts. Cistercian monks felling trees and splitting logs in historiated letters of an early twelfth-century manuscript, St. Gregory's Moralia in Job, seem to embody the opera manum prescribed by the Rule of St. Benedict. Woodcutters at their task woven into the bucolic landscape of a Flemish tapestry dated to the early sixteenth century connote a harmonic relationship between man and nature. In his early twentieth-century painting The Woodcutter, Ferdinand Hodler displays the image of a solitary man wielding an ax with enormous gestural power. From a century earlier, Goya's Knife Grinder visually affirms the concentrated effort involved in this tedious task. Kazimir Malevich's identical subject, executed nearly a century later, seems a pictorial exercise in motion that exemplifies the cubo-futurist aesthetic of his early career.

The exaltation of labor reaches its dramatic height in images of miners and smiths. As early as the mid-sixteenth century

Herri met de Bles's painting The Copper Mine exploits the inherently robust nature of the theme, which is continued in such nineteenth-century works as Claude Monet's Unloading Coal, Argenteuil and Vincent van Gogh's Miners, Borinage. The image of a sinewy smith striking the red-hot iron that sends sparks aglow in an otherwise dusky interior infuses blacksmiths' shops and forges with a quasi-romantic atmosphere. This is seen in works such as Joseph Wright of Derby's The Iron Forge, Théodore Géricault's The Blacksmith's Signboard, Bass Otis's Interior of a Smithy, Goya's The Forge, and J. F. Weir's Forging the Shaft.

The dignity of work was nowhere as elevated as in the nineteenth century. The apostle of realism, Gustave Courbet, through his outspoken efforts and political inclinations, firmly established this pictorial tradition in France. His Stonebreakers became a veritable icon of the suffering, downtrodden, common laborer. Similarly, Gustave Caillebotte's The Floorscrapers, completed almost 30 years later, may be seen as the urban equivalent of Courbet's rural image. In the former painting, the faceless old man and his youthful apprentice pulverize stones into gravel for the country roadways; in the latter, three kneeling, bare-chested laborers plane the surface of the wooden floor of a new city building.

The pictorial response to the Industrial Revolution is extremely significant, for it documents novel work environments and machinery. J. C. Ibbetson's The Parys Mine on Anglesea is one early manifestation of the impact. Other images set workers in monotonous rows in factories or show them taking a break from their routine. William Bell Scott's Iron and Coal contains a group of workers lifting their mallets in unison in a crowded shop, while Thomas Anshutz's Iron Workers: Noontime depicts men washing themselves before their lunch against the backdrop of a factory. Charles Ginner's The Shell Filling Factory, painted for the Canadian War Commission after World War I, sets a number of uniformed women performing identical tasks in a cavernous but rigidly linear space that visually underscores their robotic jobs.

The twentieth-century movement known as social realism invigorates the themes of labor, trades, and occupations with its sheer quantity of examples and, often, its visual polemics. Thomas Hart Benton's America Today, originally designed for the New School in New York, is made up of 10 separate panels that represent a variety of subjects, including drilling, construction, shipping, finance, aviation, engineering, and cattle-raising. Works Progress Administration artists such as Edgar Britton, George Biddle, Ben Shahn, Philip Guston, and Seymour Fogel executed a number of murals in Washington, D.C., during the 1930s and 1940s celebrating manual labor as well as professional occupations. Diego Rivera gained renown in his own country and in the United States for his numerous images dealing with the theme. His murals, such as the comprehensive set of frescoes in the Court of Labor in Mexico City, idealize the worker, whom he sees as the single most vital force of modern life. The British artist Stanley Spencer methodically documented in eight panels the process of building ships in the Clyde shipyard in Scotland. Jack Beal's murals The History of Labor in the United States chart a chronological course of the theme from colonization and settlement through the modern period of industry and technology.

Metaphoric Aspects of Labor

Images of labor used metaphorically make up an extensive subcategory, in particular, tasks associated with the months of the year. The earliest extant work that contains these representations, dating to the Hellenistic period, is a partially destroyed frieze now embedded in the facade of the church of Hagios Eleutherios in Athens, Greece. It displays personifications of the months holding sheaves of wheat, stomping grapes, and plowing. A relief in the central vault of a Roman triumphal arch at Reims, France, likewise shows a cyclical series of labors. The full flowering of this specialized iconography occurs in the Middle Ages, and the earliest surviving examples appear in two Carolingian manuscripts from the School of Salzburg in Austria. Both contain astronomical texts and St. Bede's De rerum natura. The scenes are exactly the same in both works and were probably copied from a common model. All 12 illustrations are arranged in four registers on one folio, and each miniature contains an isolated figure and a motif, such as a blossoming tree or a plow, to indicate the agricultural task associated with that particular month. In another ninth-century example, The Martyrology of Wandalbert, the corresponding symbols of the zodiac are also included.

The major change from the early medieval period to the Romanesque is the manner in which the figures are depicted: the inert standing entities of the earlier eras are replaced by figures actively engaged in a distinct chore. In addition, regional variations abound. For instance, in a circular mosaic on the floor of Aosta Cathedral in Italy, the month of March shows a peasant pruning a tree. For the same month, the relief on the porch of Cremona Cathedral, also in Italy, has a man blowing a horn. France and Italy especially show a predilection for imagery of the labors of the month, while England, Germany, and Spain do so less frequently.

The iconography, now programmatic and orderly, continues into the Gothic period. Archivolts on the west facade of Chartres Cathedral once again pair the labor of the month with the appropriate sign of the zodiac. Bas-de-page images from Jean Pucelle's Hours of Queen Jeanne d'Evreux show in grisaille peasants performing tasks for the various months. Certainly the most celebrated example closes the medieval tradition with great panache—the calendar illustrations by the Limbourg Brothers found in the early fifteenth-century Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry wherein, it must be added, not all the months exhibit scenes of toiling. Some months show aristocrats involved in leisurely pastimes. Pieter Bruegel the Elder carries the iconography into the sixteenth century in full-scale painting, but he conflates the commissioned series into six scenes (one of them, the April-May picture, is presumably lost).

Medieval manuscript illuminators also capitalized on the literalness of biblical texts wherein the idea of labor is mentioned. The tradition reaches back to that seminal, ingenious ninth-century manuscript the Utrecht Psalter, which so often singles out a word or phrase for vivid representation. A Gothic example is the historiated initial to Psalm 19 of the Cuerden Psalter, in which a serf who cuts down overgrown vegetation illustrates the passage: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork" (Psalm 19:1). A bas-de-page image to Psalm 92 in the Luttrell Psalter showing a plowman, driver, and team of oxen symbolizes mankind's guide to salvation, as corroborated in other biblical citations (Isaiah 28:24–29 and I Corinthians 9:10). The illuminated letter "N" that opens Psalm 127 in the sumptuous early fifteenth-century Visconti Hours depicts workmen of the building trade in the process of construction and illustrates the text: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it" (Psalm 127:1).

In a particularly inventive carved capital on the south side of the nave of La Madeleine at Vézelay, France, two millers, representing Moses and St. Paul, dump and collect grain as a symbol of the old law blending into the new. A capital from the apse hemicycle of the now destroyed abbey church of Cluny III ostensibly depicts the labor of beekeeping; however, the relief may also be interpreted as an allusion to the miraculous virgin birth of Christ. A commonly held medieval belief ascribed the reproduction of bees to parthenogenesis, hence the parallel with the Immaculate Conception. Beekeeping is treated differently by Bruegel in a pen and ink drawing of 1567. Here it is employed to illustrate the proverb inscribed at the lower left of the sheet: "He who knows the nest, knows it; he who robs the nest, has it."

Other symbolic uses of labor, trades, and occupations occur in images of good and bad government, under whose auspices rural and urban occupations either flourish or degenerate. Ambrogio Lorenzetti's grand fresco in the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy, is the prime example of this iconography. A more recent work, from in the Victorian era, epitomizes the goodness, wholesomeness, and robustness of the work ethic. This is Ford Madox Brown's heroic canvas simply entitled Work. A study by Gerard Curtis convincingly demonstrated that this painting, despite its contemporary setting and wealth of detail, transcends nineteenth-century realism with its many references to both biblical and literary sources. The French academic/symbolic artist Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, on the other hand, places his laborers in idealized pastoral landscapes in two murals, Work and Ave Picardia Nutrix. Both representations make a visual argument for a utopian, harmonious world with, astonishingly, no reference to the Industrial Revolution that, incidentally, was occurring all around Puvis de Chavannes. Later in the century, Jules Dalou and Auguste Rodin embarked on projects dedicated to the theme of labor, but neither was completed. The plaster maquettes of these symbolic acknowledgments to the worker, however, still exist.

Biblical References to Toiling

In the sphere of religious narrative, the theme of labor is common to both Old and New Testament imagery. Adam and Eve are forced into it as a consequence of disobeying God: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" (Genesis 3:19). The conventional representation shows Adam working the land with a hoe and Eve either spinning wool or suckling one of her offspring. The right jamb of the west portal at the Church of St. Zeno in Verona, Italy, carved by Niccolò, displays this version. A variation sets both parents at work tilling the field. Wiligelmo's Genesis cycle on the west facade of Modena Cathedral in Italy offers this variation. Both types prevail into the Renaissance. Jacopo della Quercia's marble relief at San Petronio in Bologna, Italy, may be cited as an example of the first type and folio 64r of the Visconti Hours as an example of the second. Images of labor born of punishment include Cain and his descendants shown performing a variety of agricultural and domestic tasks. The Holkham Bible Picture Book displays in two registers their chaotic and fruitless attempts as described in the text of Genesis 4:11–12: “And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother’s blood from thy hand; When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength.”

Building the Tower of Babel, another Old Testament episode, is also favored in medieval and Renaissance iconography. A nave vault fresco from the Romanesque period at St.-Savin-sur-Gartempe in France shows the scene with sparse setting and figures, while Pieter Bruegel the Elder’s version is decidedly more panoramic and populous in treatment. The Old Testament image of Samson at the mill is rare. In the illumination for Prime in the Hours of the Cross from the Visconti Hours, Samson appears in the mill cranking the gigantic stone, a task forced upon him by the Philistines.

For New Testament material dealing with labor and trades we look first to the figure of Joseph the carpenter. In the right wing of the Merode Altar by Robert Campin he sits at his workbench fabricating mousetraps to snare Satan. In the Pre-Raphaelite canvas by John Everett Millais, Joseph stands at his worktable in a cluttered and unkempt room in the company of Mary and the injured Christ Child. Spice merchants weighing their products and filling ointment jars behind a shop counter while the three holy women await their purchase is an anecdotal subject that emerges from the liturgical drama Visitatio sepulchri. It appears in some twelfth-century sculptural reliefs from the Provence region of France and northern Italy.

One of the most frequently represented saints at work—indeed he is the patron saint of artists—is St. Luke. When not depicted in conventional evangelist portraiture, that is, seated at his desk composing his Gospel, he is often shown in the process of painting the Virgin and Child from life. Rogier van der Weyden and Maerten van Heemskerck are only two of the many artists whose oeuvre includes this subject. The theme was especially popular in northern Europe during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. St. Eligius the goldsmith is less often depicted, although Petrus Christus’s version was later transferred by Matsys into the composition for The Money Changer and His Wife.

Mythological Themes of Work

In the category of mythology, the most celebrated visual motif is certainly the 12 labors of Hercules. These energetic undertakings often appear on Attic black-figure vases from ancient Greece. The Temple of Zeus at Olympia, Greece, gathers all 12 in a series of metope reliefs. Usually, however, they appear as isolated events, some more frequently than others. In addition, there are variations in the iconography of many of the individual tasks: sometimes subsidiary figures are omitted or a fabulous beast is captured, not slain. Vulcan at his forge is less popular than the drama of Hercules’ labors, although of all the gods, he is the one who is most readily identified with a specific chore—forging the thunderbolts for his brother Zeus. Diego Velázquez freely mixes mythological and realistic figures in his seventeenth-century version.

See also Artists/Art; Automata; Harvesting; Months; Peasantry; Zodiac

Selected Works of Art

Ancient Egyptian

Servants Plowing, Dynasty IV, Medum, Egypt, Chapel of Atet

Fig Picking, Dynasty XII, Beni Hasan, Egypt, Chapel of Khnum-hotep

Baker Tending an Oven, Ostrakon, Dynasty XIX, Leipzig, Germany, Leipzig University, Egyptian Museum

Greek and Roman

Amasis Painter, Women Working Wool, black-figured lekythos, circa 540 B.C., New York, The Metropolitan Museum of Art

Psiax, Herakles Wrestling the Nemean Lion, black-figured amphora, circa 520 B.C., Brescia, Italy, Museo Civico

Euphronius, Herakles and the Cattle of Geryon, red-figured vase, late sixth century B.C., Munich, Germany

The Twelve Labors of Hercules, metope reliefs, 475 B.C., Olympia, Greece, Temple of Zeus

Labors of Herakles, mosaic floor, circa A.D. 310–330, Piazza Armerina, Italy

Romanesque

Wiligelmo of Modena, Toiling of Adam and Eve, reliefs, 1106–1110, Modena, Italy, Cathedral

Labors of the Month, tympanum archivolt, 1125–1135, Vézelay, France, La Madeleine

Niccolò, Toiling of Adam and Eve, portal jambs, circa 1138, Verona, Sicily, St. Zeno

Spice Merchants and the Holy Women, south portal lintel, west facade, circa 1150–1155, St. Gilles-du-Gard, France, Church

Labors of the Month, cloister capitals, late twelfth century, Monreale, Sicily, Cathedral

Eboli, Pietro di, Liber Ad Honorem Augusti, King William II Treated by an Arab Doctor and an Astrologer, circa 1200, Bern, Switzerland, Burger Bibliothek

Gothic

Labors of the Month, Royal Portal, archivolt, 1145–1150, Chartres, France, Cathedral

Labors of the Month, reliefs on main portal, 1150–1160, Senlis, France, Cathedral

Benedictine Monk Painting a Statuette of the Virgin and Child, from the Lambeth Apocalypse, third quarter of the thirteenth century, London, Lambeth Palace Library (MS. 209, fol. 2v)

Opera Manum, Cuerden Psalter, late thirteenth century, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (MS. 96, fol. 31)

The Goldsmith, the Scribe, and the Falconer in the Presence of Royalty and Clergy, in Jacobus de Cessolis Le Jeu des échecs moralisées, third quarter of the fourteenth century, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (MS. G.52, fol. 1)

The Artist Thamar and Her Assistant, 1402, Paris, Bibliothèque National (MS. fr. 12420, fol. 86)

Renaissance

Samson at the Mill, Visconti Hours, early fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Nazionale (fol. 158v)
Jacopo della Quercia, Labors of Adam and Eve, marble relief, circa 1428, Bologna, Italy, San Petronio
Christus, Petrus, St. Eligius the Goldsmith, 1449, New York,
Metropolitan Museum of Art
Housebook Master, Mercury and the Arts, circa 1475, Schloss Wolfegg, Germany, Graf von Waldburg-Wolfegg Collection
Matsys, Quentin, The Money Changer and His Wife, 1514,
Paris, Louvre
Woodcutters Tapestry, first quarter of the sixteenth century,
New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
Dürer, Albrecht, Herakles Killing the Stymphalian Birds, early sixteenth century, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches
National Museum
Heemskerck, Maerten van, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, 1532, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum
Bles, Henri met de, The Copper Mine, circa 1550, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Aertsen, Pieter, The Cook, 1559, Brussels, Belgium, Musée
Royaux des Beaux-Arts
Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Tower of Babel, 1563, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Baroque

Brueghel, Jan the Elder, Venus, Vulcan and Cupid at the Forge, early seventeenth century, Berlin, Staatliche
Museen
Velázquez, Diego, The Forge of Vulcan, 1630, Madrid, Spain, Prado
Vermeer, Jan, Servant Girl Pouring Milk, circa 1663,
Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Wright, Joseph of Derby, The Blacksmith's Shop, 1770–1771, London, Royal College of Surgeons

Nineteenth Century

Géricault, Théodore, The Blacksmith's Signboard, 1814,
Zurich, Switzerland, Kunsthau
Goya, Francisco, The Forge, 1818–1819, New York, Frick
Collection
Redgrave, Richard, The Poor Teacher, 1844, London,
Victoria and Albert Museum
Redgrave, Richard, The Seamstress, 1846, Forbes Magazine
Collection
Millet, Jean-François, The Winnower, 1848, London,
National Gallery
Bonheur, Rosa, Plowing in the Nivernais: The Dressing of the Vines, 1849, Musée National de Chateau de Fontainebleau
Courbet, Gustave, The Stonebreakers, 1849, destroyed
Millet, Jean-François, The Sower, painting, 1850, Boston,
Museum of Fine Arts
Brown, Ford Maddox, Work, 1852–1863, Manchester,
England, City Art Gallery

Millet, Jean-François, The Gleaners, painting, 1857, Paris, Louvre
Wallis, Henry, The Stonebreaker, 1857, Birmingham,
England, City Art Gallery
Scott, William Bell, Iron and Coal, circa 1860, Wallington, England, National Trust
Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, Work, circa 1863, Washington,
D.C., National Gallery of Art
Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, Ave Picardia Nutrix, 1865, Amiens, France, Musée de Picardie
Crowe, Eyre, Dinner Hour, Wigan, 1874, Manchester, England, City Art Museum
Eakins, Thomas, The Gross Clinic, 1875, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Jefferson Medical Clinic
Caillebotte, Gustave, The Floorscrapers, 1875, Paris,
Louvre
Liebermann, Max, Dutch Sewing School, 1876, Wuppertal, Germany, Von der Heydt Museum
Johnson, Eastman, Corn Husking Bee, 1876, Chicago, Art Institute
Anschutz, Thomas, Iron Workers: Noontime, 1881, San Francisco, California, Fine Arts Museum
Degas, Edgar, Woman Ironing, 1882, Paris, Collection
Durand-Ruel
Vela, Vincenzo, *Victims of Labour: Monument in Honour of the Workers Who Died During the Building of the St.
Gotthard Tunnel*, bronze, circa 1882, Rome, Galleria
Nazionale d'Arte Moderne
Charles, James, The Knife-grinder, 1887, Manchester,
England, City Art Gallery
Gogh, Vincent van, The Sower, 1888, Otterloo, The Netherlands, Kröller-Müller Museum
Bernard, Émile, Buckwheat Harvesters Pont-Aven, 1888, Switzerland, Collection Josefowitz
Dalou, Aimé-Jules, Sketch for the Monument to Labour, plaster, 1889–1891, Paris, Petit Palais
Vuillard, Jean-Édouard, The Workroom, 1893, Northampton, Massachusetts, Smith College Museum of Art
Rodin, Auguste, Tower of Labor, 1898, Paris, France, Musée Rodin

Twentieth Century

Picasso, Pablo, Woman Ironing, 1904, New York, Guggenheim Museum
Malevich, Kazimir, The Knife Grinder, 1912, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery
Ginner, Charles, The Shell Filling Factory, 1918–1919, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
Wood, Grant, Construction, 1925, Kansas City, Missouri, Bank of Kansas City
Rivera, Diego, The Making of a Fresco, 1931, San Francisco, California, Art Institute
Biddle, George, Sweatshop, 1936, Washington, D.C., Department of Justice
Shahn, Ben, Labor and Working, 1940–1941, Washington, D.C., Social Security Building
Léger, Fernand, The Builders, 1950, Biot, France, Musée
Fernand Léger
Rivera, Diego, The History of Medicine in Mexico, 1953, Mexico City, Mexico, Hospital de la Raga

Further Reading

- Boissonnade, Prosper, Life and Work in Medieval Europe, London: Kegan and Paul, 1927; New York: Knopf, 1927
- Boris, Eileen, Art and Labor: Ruskin, Morris, and the Craftsman Ideal in America, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Temple University Press, 1986
- Brommer, Frank, Heracles: The Twelve Labors of the Hero in Ancient Art and Literature, New Rochelle, New York: Caratzas, 1986
- Camille, Michael, "Labouring for the Lord: The Ploughman and the Social Order in the Luttrell Psalter," Art History 19 (1987)
- Curtis, Gerard, "Ford Maddox Brown's Work: An Iconographic Analysis," Art Bulletin 74 (1992)
- Detroit Institute of Art, Diego Rivera: A Retrospective, Detroit, Michigan: Founders Society, Detroit Institute of Art, 1986
- Egbert, V. W., The Medieval Artist at Work, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982
- Hedges, Nick, Born to Work: Images of Factory Life, London: Pluto Press, 1982
- Hunisak, John, "Rodin, Dalou and the Monument to Labor," in Art, the Ape of Nature, edited by M. Barasch and L. F. Sandler, New York: Abrams, 1981
- Imperial War Museum of London, Spencer in the Shipyard, London: Arts Council of Great Britain, 1981
- Klingender, Francis Donald, Art and the Industrial Revolution, London: N. Carrington, 1947; New York: Schocken, 1970
- Nicklies, Charles E., "Cosmology and the Labors of the Month at Piacenza: The Crypt Mosaic at San Savino," Gesta 34:2 (1995)
- Panadero, Marjorie, The Labors of the Month and the Signs of the Zodiac in Twelfth-Century French Facades (Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1984)
- Pollock, Griselda, "Van Gogh and the Poor Slaves: Images of Rural Labor as Modern Art," Art History 11 (1988)
- Schlapeit-Beck, Dagmar, "Frauenarbeit und Stand der Technologie als Thema der Malerei: Das Motive der Spinnenden Frau," Kritische Berichte 15 (1987)
- Veldman, Ilja, "Images of Labor and Diligence in Sixteenth-Century Netherlandish Prints: The Work Ethic Rooted in Civic Morality or Protestantism?" Simiolus 21:4 (1992)
- Vishny, Michele, "On the Walls: Murals by Ben Shahn, Philip Guston, and Seymour Fogel for the Social Security Building, Washington, D. C.," Arts Magazine (1987)
- Welch Williams, Jane, Bread, Wine and Money: The Windows of the Trades at Chartres Cathedral, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993

LABYRINTH/MAZE

Priscilla Baumann

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Labyrinth/Maze:

PREHISTORIC AND ANCIENT

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

MEDIEVAL

NINETEENTH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Labyrinth in the Horticulture Society's Garden, England, from the Encyclopaedia Britannica, eleventh edition, 1910–1911, vol. XVI, p. 35. (Courtesy of the Editor)

The terms labyrinth and maze are used interchangeably and refer to the same general concept; namely, an intricately composed structure or path intended to confuse, frustrate, disorient, or challenge. Labyrinths, noted for their baffling complexity, may exist in the visual, physical sense as architectural puzzles, as two-dimensional graphic designs, or as horticultural delights; and on the metaphoric level, they may be found in certain narrative literary structures or in any ambiguous or convoluted discourse. Some philosophers and writers, like Plato and Dante, have considered the journey through life itself the ultimate labyrinth. Labyrinths and mazes present a circuitous and often exhausting path, an arduous voyage into the unknown. At their most carefree, they offer entertainment; at their most threatening, they may conceal fatal danger. From ancient times to the present, labyrinths have fascinated artists, writers, architects, and gardeners.

One of the oldest known labyrinths was built at Fayum, in Egypt, in about 1800 B.C. Herodotus described it as a vast three-dimensional edifice with many rooms and doors and a series of interconnected subterranean spaces. Destroyed in Roman times, it was rediscovered and its existence verified by nineteenth-century archaeologists, although its purpose remains a mystery.

The most famous labyrinth in ancient times, however, and the one that most influenced the Western European imagination, was that described by Plutarch in his version of the myth of Theseus, a legendary king of Athens, and the Minotaur. The legend recounts the efforts of King Minos of Crete to hide his wife's offspring, a monster with the body of a man and the head of a bull, in a labyrinth designed for this purpose by the master builder Daedalus. Theseus, with the help of Minos's daughter Ariadne, eventually kills the Minotaur and safely escapes from the labyrinthine prison. Echoes of this labyrinth, drawn as concentric circles, are found on ancient Egyptian and Greek coins and gems and in occasional stone engravings, with one such example at Rocky Valley, near Tintagel, in Cornwall, England (circa 1800–1400 B.C.). According to some archaeologists, the Cretan labyrinth was in fact the Palace of Knossos (circa 1600 B.C.), a three-dimensional puzzle with multiple stories and signs of the double-ax (from which the Greek word labyrinth may be derived) and the cult of the bull.

From the second century B.C. until the fifth century A.D., labyrinthine designs provided a popular decoration for Roman mosaic floors. Most of these are square-shaped, with elaborate diagrammatic pathways, and sometimes, as on the mosaic at the Via Cadolini in Cremona, Italy, the battle of Theseus and the Minotaur is shown at the center of the design. Occasionally part of the labyrinth is formed by a grid of letters, such as the fourth-century pavement in San Repartus in Orléansville, Algeria, where the words sancta ecclesia can be read from the center in any direction. At least 50 mosaic pavements have been unearthed throughout areas of former Roman occupation, including examples at Cormerod, Switzerland; Aix, France; Salzburg, Austria; and Caerlon-on-Usk, Wales.

Throughout the period of antiquity, the labyrinth, always admired for its artistic complexity, served as a popular secular decorative device. During the Middle Ages, the labyrinth continued to exert a profound influence on the imagination and was incorporated in many ecclesiastical monuments. From the tenth to the twelfth centuries, mazes appeared on the walls and floors of churches in Italy, with examples at Lucca, Pavia, Piacenza, and Ravenna. Labyrinthine designs, circular or octagonal in shape, were incised on the stone pavements of many churches of northern France during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, including those in Auxerre, Sens, Reims, and Amiens, with the largest, 40 feet in diameter, in the nave of the cathedral at Chartres. Maze designs were also carved on roof bosses of several fourteenth-century churches in England. It is generally agreed that these labyrinths bear witness to the skill of the architect and builder; but they also reflect the medieval conviction in the artistry of God, symbolizing the complexity and subtlety of His cosmic design. Moreover, the circular unicursal maze, such as the example at Chartres, reinforces the medieval Christian belief in a single path to salvation.

Illustrations of labyrinths accompany medieval texts as well, with more than 70 extant examples in about 60 different manuscripts. Occasionally these were intended as literal representations of the mythic Cretan maze; but often they were meant to illustrate the complexity of a text, to emphasize its labyrinthine quality. Still other examples have religious significance, with Christ as a guide through the dark maze of life. For the medieval mind, even the text itself could be understood as a labyrinth, and the unraveling of its interwoven narrative a circuitous and difficult process much like the progress through a maze. The very idea of the labyrinth—with its complexity, its possibility of leading one into error, and its consummate artistry—permeated medieval literature and philosophy.

Even the peasantry had its own experience of the labyrinth: the turf maze. These circuitous designs in fields with shallow gullies cut between the grassy paths are primarily an English phenomenon, although some examples also exist in Germany and Scandinavia. Linked to springtime festivals and often named after the ancient city of Troy, only eight survive in England, including examples at Hilton in Cambridgeshire, Wing in Leicestershire, and Saffron Walden in Essex. Although almost 60 sites bear vestigial traces of turf mazes, most have been lost owing to overgrowth or destruction from farmers' plows. William Shakespeare refers to their gradual disappearance “for lack of tread” (Midsummer Night’s Dream, 2.1.99–100). Throughout the Scandinavian coast, hundreds of circular Cretan mazes made of small stones decorate the landscape. These were used by fishermen and their families in a similar fashion. One example of these stone mazes can be seen at Visby, on the island of Gotland, off the southeastern coast of Sweden.

Although the labyrinth traditionally embodied religious or ritual symbolism, it gradually assumed a distinctly secular role. Hedge mazes became popular during the twelfth century, as evidenced by the legendary bower at Woodstock in England, designed for Henry II to court the fair Rosamund away from the eyes of his queen, Eleanor. At Hampton Court near London the famous trapezoidal yew maze, constructed in 1690, provides another well-known example. From the sixteenth century, ornamental mazes, intended to delight the eye and entertain the stroller, grew more popular and were designed for gardens of the palatial homes of the aristocracy in France, Belgium, Holland, and England. During the Victorian era in England, mazes were designed not only for the gardens of wealthy patrons but for public parks as well, where they provided a delightful recreational challenge for the masses. One example, recently restored, is the Hedge maze in Saltwell Park in Gateshead. Garden mazes were also favored in other countries, with a rare example in New England, derived from the Hampton Court model and designed by Cornelia Warren for her Cedar Hill property in Waltham, Massachusetts. Begun in 1895, 1,000 trees of arborvitae, maintained at a height of 5 feet 4 inches, framed a path one-third of a mile long. Her plan serves as the logo for the New England Garden History Society of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society.

Throughout the centuries, from the Renaissance to the present, artists, poets, mathematicians, and musicians have continued to find inspiration in the ambiguous turnings of the labyrinth. Johann Sebastian Bach entitled one composition the Kleines Harmonisches Labyrinth. Writers—from fifteenth-century Spanish poet Juan de Mena, whose allegorical poem El Laberinto (1444) was inspired by Dante, to the twentieth-century Argentine author Jorge Luis Borges, who published a collection of essays and stories entitled Labyrinths (1962)—continue to be fascinated by the multiple layers of potential meaning in the labyrinth’s meandering structure. Painters and sculptors have created their visual representations of the myth and its symbol as well. One example from the mid-sixteenth century, formerly attributed to Tintoretto and now at Hampton Court, illustrates the lively entertainment of wandering through a hedge maze with friends. A more symbolic interpretation of the labyrinthine motif is found in a portrait believed painted by Dosso Dossi of an elegantly attired gentleman who points to the intricacies of a maze, carefully painted on a table in the foreground of the canvas (circa 1520). Giambattista Piranesi’s engravings Prisons project a prisoner’s fears in a hallucinatory maze of vaults and mysterious shadowy passages. Masonic societies, especially in pre-Revolutionary France, were notorious for the labyrinthine “route of initiation” incorporated in their induction ceremonies. Architectural books of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries often included complex labyrinth diagrams, sometimes simply to provide details for a garden plan, but frequently to symbolize moral or religious dilemmas, such as Hieronymus Sperling’s engraving Tenet error amantem (late eighteenth century). Antonio Canova’s marble sculpture of Theseus and the Minotaur (1783) depicts the moment of victory when Theseus has vanquished the Cretan monster at the center of the labyrinth.

In the twentieth century, the theme reappears as sculptural design and as popular entertainment. The Hall of Mirrors was originally constructed for the Swiss National Exhibition of 1896 in Geneva and is now in the Glacier Garden at Lucerne. Arranged in a connected series of equilateral triangles and decorated with elaborate Moorish furnishings, this maze completely disorients any visitor. Without the help of a map, only astute mathematicians can unravel the complexity of its plan. Numerous amusement park mazes were designed in the late twentieth century, such as the Beatles’ Maze built for the International Garden Festival in Liverpool, England (1984). A colorful yellow submarine, after one of the Beatles’ most popular songs, decorates the center of an aquatic maze. Labyrinths have been designed for the gardens of Elizabethan manor houses, such as the Tudor Rose Maze at Kentwell Hall in Long Melford, Suffolk (1985). Constructed of 27,000 pounds of red and white paving bricks, this unicursal maze, reminiscent of Cretan and medieval designs, also includes a three-dimensional puzzle and, in the center, a giant chessboard. Another favorite tourist attraction is the Bicton Maze in Bicton Park in East Budleigh, Devon. Opened in 1986, this maze is in the shape of a giant footprint, and the paths are framed with upright wooden posts.

From the mythical story of the Cretan labyrinth to the care-free delights of the amusement park maze, the labyrinth, a puzzle that reflects the complexities of life itself, continues to fascinate the human imagination.

See also Path/Road/Crossroads

Selected Works of Art

Prehistoric and Ancient

Stone engraving, Rocky Valley, near Tintagel, Cornwall, circa 1800–1400 B.C.

Mosaic, floor labyrinth, Roman period, Cremona, Italy, the Via Cadolini

Medieval

Manuscript, ninth–eleventh century, from Auxerre, France, now in Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (MS. Lat. 1745, fol. 30v)

Pavement Engraving, circa 1200, Chartres, France, Cathedral Roof Boss, fourteenth century, Bristol, England, St. Mary Redcliffe

Renaissance

Finiguerra, Maso, Copperplate Engraving, circa 1460, London, British Library Department of Prints and Drawings

Toeput, Lodewijk, Painting of a Garden Maze, circa 1550, London, Hampton Court

Dossi, Dosso, Portrait of a Gentleman, circa 1520, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art, John G. Johnson Collection
Gassel, Lucas, David and Bathsheba, before 1568, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum

Eighteenth Century

Sperling, Hieronymus, Tenet error amantem, engraving, late eighteenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museum Preussischer Canova, Antonio, Theseus and the Minotaur, 1783, London,
Victoria and Albert Museum

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Mirror Labyrinth, 1896, built for Swiss National Exhibition in Geneva, now located in Glacier Garden, Lucerne, Switzerland
Inoue, Bukichi, Garden Maze, 1969, Hakone, Japan, Hakone
Open-Air Museum
Fleishner, Richard, Chain Link Maze, 1978, Amherst,
Massachusetts, University of Massachusetts
Bristol Water Maze, sculpture, 1984, Victoria Park, South
Bristol, England
Bicton Maze, sculpture of upright wooden posts, 1986, Bicton
Park, East Budleigh, Devon

Further Reading

Coate, Randall, and A. Fisher, G. Burgess, A Celebration of Mazes, Jersey City, New Jersey: Minotaur, 1986
Doob, Penelope Reed, The Idea of the Labyrinth from Classical Antiquity Through the Middle Ages, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1990
Fisher, Adrian, and Diana Kingham, Mazes, London: Shire, 1992
Kerényi, Károly, In the Labyrinth, London and New York:
Thames and Hudson, 1987
Kern, Hermann, Labirinti: Forme e interpretazioni, Milan, Italy: Feltrinelli, 1981
Koreayna, Swietla, Labyrinth, Livorno, Italy: Belforte, 1978
Matthews, W. H., Mazes and Labyrinths, London: Longmans, Green, 1922; New York: Dover, 1970
Pieper, Jan, Das Labyrinthische, Braunschweig and Wiesbaden, Germany: Friedr. Vieweg and Sohn, 1987
Santarcangeli, Paolo, Il Libro de Labirinti, Milan, Italy:
Frassinelli, 1984
Vidler, Anthony, The Writing of the Walls: Architectural Theory in the Late Enlightenment, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton Architectural Press, 1987

LAUGHTER

Andrew Stephen Arbury

The following periods, iconographic narratives, and genres are covered in the discussion of the theme Laughter:

ANCIENT AND NON-WESTERN

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

DEMOCRITUS (THE LAUGHING PHILOSOPHER)

APHRODITE AND ARES

TRAPPED BY HEPHAESTUS (RIDICULE)

ILLUSTRATIONS OF LAUGHTER IN FOLKTALES
AND FAIRY TALES

William Hogarth, The Laughing Audience, 1733, engraving, from Engravings by Hogarth, edited by Sean Shesgreen, New York: Dover, 1973. (Courtesy of Dover Publications, Inc.)

Laughter is such a familiar human response to certain stimuli that we rarely think about it, yet clearly laughter is something we value; possessing a sense of humor is a desirable asset. Despite its universality, however, there is no single explanation of laughter's causes. In general terms, laughter is the physical response to something ludicrous or incongruous or to bodily stimuli such as tickling. Psychological and physiological studies indicate that laughter is rooted in our genetic makeup and is thus a fundamental aspect of human behavior. It is hardly surprising, then, that the theme of laughter can be found in literature and the arts from ancient times to the present.

There are several basic theories of laughter: the superiority theory, the relief theory, and the incongruity theory. A fourth theory, the psychological shift theory, has recently been proposed. The superiority theory, that laughter is an expression of one's feelings of superiority over others, arose in ancient Greece with Plato and Aristotle and was more formally developed by Thomas Hobbes. The relief and the incongruity theories were also proposed by Aristotle. The incongruity theory, that laughter is caused by unexpected situations or experiences, was advanced in the writings of Emmanuel Kant and Arthur Schopenhauer. The relief theory, that laughter relieves nervous tension, evolved with Herbert Spencer and was further developed by Sigmund Freud. Since none of these theories is fully adequate, a psychological shift theory, proposing that laughter results from a pleasant psychological shift, has been developed by John Morreall in an attempt to explain all types and causes of laughter. Other noted authors on laughter include Cicero, Francis Bacon, René Descartes, Søren Kierkegaard, and Henri Bergson.

Laughter is a more common element in literature than in the visual arts. This is perhaps due partly to the difficulty of portraying the facial distortions of laughter and partly to the fact that laughter has carried a certain stigma despite its divine associations. In the pagan world of Homer's epics, laughter is an expression of the gods as well as humans. Aphrodite, the goddess of love, was even called the "lover of laughter." In the Iliad, the gods laugh heartily upon seeing Hephaestus (Vulcan), the god of fire and metalworking, limping around the palace to pour them wine; in the Odyssey, they laugh when Aphrodite (Venus) and Ares (Mars), the god of war, are caught in the trap set for them by Hephaestus. According to Plutarch, Lyscurgus, the King of Sparta, dedicated a statue to laughter to acknowledge the relevance of mirth. Yet even with these divine precedents, Plato thought laughter was suspect and discouraged sanction of it in the ideal society. Aristotle and Cicero followed suit, believing that laughter was related to ugliness, debasement, and ridicule. Consequently, the more serious, heroic scenes from ancient literature are commonly found in art; occurrences of laughter tend to remain in words and anecdotes.

The comic poet Philemon died of an uncontrollable fit of laughter upon seeing an ass eat figs. The painter Zeuxis died laughing at the comic image of an old woman he had painted. Finding amusement in the folly of human affairs, Democritus earned the title "the laughing philosopher." Zeuxis and Democritus are often represented in art, especially of the Renaissance and Baroque periods. One of Rembrandt van Rijn's self-portraits shows him as Zeuxis in his final moments. Painted during the last year of Rembrandt's life, it has a certain beauty, as the artist seems to acknowledge acceptance of himself as a flawed human being. Democritus is often depicted with Heraclitus (the weeping philosopher) to support the view that a cheerful demeanor was proper to a philosopher. As a result of the Counter-Reformation, Democritus came to be considered a pagan precursor who embodied the Christian virtue of laughing at human folly. This idea of humor was expressed by the preacher Pierre de Besse in his Démocratie chrétien (1615) and can be seen in Jusepe de Ribera's paintings of Democritus.

In the Judeo-Christian Bible there are several kinds of laughter. Abraham laughs in disbelief when the Lord tells him that he will have a son by Sarah. Because she is so advanced in years, Sarah likewise laughs when she overhears the three angels foretell the birth of Isaac (Genesis 17:15–17; 18:1–19). This laughter illustrates the type that results from apparently absurd discrepancies—in this case between human capability and divine promise. It also illustrates the negative aspect of laughter, in that it potentially mocks another. For this reason, Sarah became afraid, denied she had laughed, and was reprimanded by God. After Isaac's birth, Sarah said that God had brought laughter for her (Genesis 21:6), and in fact, the name Isaac derives from the Hebrew yishaq, meaning "he laughed." The visit of the three angels, with the laughing Sarah peering out from the tent behind Abraham, is a recurring scene in medieval art; one example is an illuminated page from the Psalter of St. Louis.

Divine laughter is illustrated in the Psalms when David voices his trust in God: "But thou, O Lord, shalt laugh at them; thou shalt have all the heathen in derision" (Psalm 59:8). Natural laughter is seen in Bildad's speech to Job when he says, "He will fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing" (Job 8:21). Scornful, mocking laughter is the reaction to the couriers sent by Hezekiah to invite all Israel and Judah to keep the Passover at Jerusalem (II Chronicles 30:10). Mocking laughter is an expression of God as well as people. Wisdom's statement that she will laugh at your calamity is essentially saying that those who laugh at and mock God will find that He will laugh at and mock them for their insolence (Proverbs 1:26). Fake laughter is part of the description of wicked people: "Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful; and the end of that mirth is heaviness" (Proverbs 14:13). Laughter can also result from seeing through a deception, as in the Apocrypha when Daniel laughs at King Astyages for thinking that Bel is a living god (Bel and the Dragon 1:7), but laughter from one that instigates a deception for the purposes of a joke is condemned (Proverbs 26:19). Confident laughter is a benefit of one's faith in God, as Eliphaz tells Job: "At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh . . ." (Job 5:22). Joyful laughter occurs when thanking the Lord for deliverance: "Then our mouth filled with laughter . . ." (Psalm 126:2). Finally, laughter can express one's character: "A person's attire and hearty laughter, and the way he walks, show what he is" (Sirach 19:30).

Christian writers treat laughter suspiciously, beginning with St. Augustine, who wrote that laughter is a human faculty belonging to the lowest part of man. St. Basil thought that laughter was never appropriate for a Christian, and Desiderius Erasmus banned all excessive laughing. The fact that laughter's infrequent occurrences in the Bible are often associated with irreverence undoubtedly contributes to this negative Christian attitude toward laughter. Many felt that wise people laugh less than others, perhaps because they are seldom surprised. "A fool raises his voice when he laughs, but the wise smile quietly" (Sirach 21:20). Catholic theologians debate whether Christ laughed. Although the author of Ecclesiastes states that there is a time to laugh, he soon after pronounces laughter foolish and vain (Ecclesiastes 3:4; 7:6). There is also a Christian association of laughter with Satan. In the New Testament laughter is scarce and usually nonhumorous. Even in the Old Testament, when God laughs he laughs to scorn; in the New Testament he does not laugh at all, nor does Christ. To the contrary, Christ refers to the impermanence of material satisfactions near the end of his Sermon on the Mount when he says, "Woe unto you that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep" (Luke 6:25).

Ancient writings on laughter gave rise in the Renaissance and Baroque periods to the tradition of the joke book (e.g., Poggio Bracciolini's Facetiae, 1438–1452) and to full treatises on laughter. The most famous was Laurent Joubert's Traité du Ris (1579). It is surprising that the authors writing about laughter, both ancient and modern, totally neglect the humorous literature of their times. Aristotle does not discuss Aristophanes, and Joubert does not mention Rabelais. Almost all justify laughter as a worthy topic because it is a property exclusive to humans (or so it was thought).

Laughter begins to form part of complex iconographies in the Renaissance. The joke and its attendant laughter took on new meaning with the idea that a work of art can be amusing and meaningful at the same time. In Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, laughter is personified by a laughing young man in a fanciful, multicolored costume who holds a black mask away from him in disdain. He wears a flower garland across his chest and a plumed hat on his head. The gay colors, flowers, and fancy dress are all associated with hilarity and amusement; the black mask stands for the ugly, indecent things that are without decorum and that honest laughter avoids. Another example is Giuseppe Arcimboldo's humorous paintings of the seasons and elements in which plants, animals, objects, bits of landscape, etc., are arranged to form fantastic human heads. The art historian Thomas DaCosta Kaufmann has shown that these allegorical works were influenced by the tract on laughter De Risu, by G. B. Fonteo (1570), which contains a lengthy discussion of the serious joke. A sense of humor was also important for the court ethos of a Renaissance prince. The ideal prince should possess the quality of urbanity, and that entailed the ruler's ability to take, as well as tell, a joke. In essence, an appreciation of humor had royal sanction.

A good deal of literature and art is meant to elicit laughter, even if it doesn't necessarily contain laughter per se. Since the Renaissance, caricatures have induced many a laugh. Many of the ancient comedies, such as Aristophanes' Lysistrata (411 B.C.), still evoke a hearty laugh today. A Roman collection of jokes, Philogelos, is perhaps the first joke book. Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (circa 1387; first published 1478) have many laughable moments, as do numerous situations in Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote (1605–1615) and Richard Sheridan's plays. One can find comic scenes from literature portrayed in art, and like their literary counterparts, they may not actually depict laughter even though they inspire it. Aubrey Beardsley's ribald illustrations to Lysistrata are a case in point.

Many cultures' mythologies feature figures closely associated with laughter. In Greek mythology, Thalia was the muse of comedy, and Momus was the god of satire, mockery, and ridicule. Iambe, the daughter of the nature god Pan and the nymph Echo, cheered the grief-stricken goddess of agriculture and fertility, Demeter, with her jokes. Baubo also made Demeter laugh by lifting her clothes and exposing her buttocks. In Roman mythology, Anna Perenna, an old crone in a bridal dress, revealed her face and laughed at Mars, the god of war, who thought she was Minerva, the goddess of wisdom. Comus was the god of mirth and revelry.

In ancient Egypt, the deformed Bes, who warded off evil spirits and protected childbirth, was fond of laughing. Xolotl was the Aztec guide of the dead who often appeared as a jester. Droll was an ancient northern European jester. In Shinto tradition, Ame-no-Uzume lured Amaterasu, the sun goddess, from the cave of darkness by means of the Kagura, an obscene dance that caused much laughter. Hotei is the fat Japanese god of laughter and contentment and is one of the Shichi Fukujin, the seven divinities of luck. His Chinese counterpart is the Laughing Buddha, Pu-tai Ho-shang (hemp bag master).

Tricksters are typically associated with laughter-producing situations and occur in most cultures. Their tales mediate the meaningful and the absurd; they are meant to edify as well as amuse. Reynard the Fox, of medieval European lore, used his wit to defeat all enemies. In Norse mythology, Loki, the creator of discord and mischief, made the grieving giantess Skadi laugh by acting out the story of how he tethered a goat to his testicles. Maui (Mowee), the Polynesian trickster-hero, tried to achieve immortality by entering the sleeping body of Hina-nui-te-po (goddess of the night who ruled the dead), but when the birds saw his feet protruding from her vagina one of them laughed. This woke the goddess and she crushed Maui inside herself. There are numerous humorous tales of the Mulla Nasruddin, a mythical trickster in Islamic culture. In Africa, Spider (Anansi in West Africa) and Rabbit are perhaps the best known pranksters. The Uncle Remus stories of Brer Rabbit, which derive from the African trickster, are riddled with laughter that belies their depiction of racism.

The trickster and the laughter he causes are also popular in the lore of Native American cultures. The most widely known is Raven, but Coyote, Rabbit, Mink, Blue Jay, and others also exist. Bodily functions and genitalia frequently figure in Native American trickster humor. The Winnebago trickster Wakdjunkaga scattered all creation across the Earth through his flatulence. A central motif in many of the most hilarious stories is the trickster's penis, which is usually huge. Coyote's penis is so large that he needs a pack in which to carry it. In Crow tribal lore, Coyote's penis is eaten by a woman who mistakes it for a strawberry. The Kawaiisu Coyote disguised himself as a mother holding her baby, which was actually his penis. Tuvwots, the Ute rabbit trickster, throws his penis at the sun and shatters it. The animated cartoon characters Bugs Bunny and Daffy Duck could be considered modern-day American tricksters.

Laughter is particularly valued by Native Americans, and jokes are common in Native American lore and ceremony. A child's first laugh may be ritually celebrated. In the Apache creation stories, laughter scares away illness. The female creator Iatiku (or Iyatiku, and also known as Uretsete and Utshtsiti) created the clown Koshare to make her laugh and help the people forget their troubles. In fact, clowning societies are common among the native peoples of the southwest. Clowning usually consists of teasing onlookers, joking, satirizing, gluttonizing, mimicking sexual practices, and the like. Native American clowns not only make people laugh, but they also invoke the power of creation and demonstrate the value of their social mores and conduct by illustrating the ludicrousness of alternate behavior.

Fairy tales and folktales are another source of laughter, and the illustrations that accompany them are common examples of laughter in the visual arts. In many cases the laughter has a moral meaning or attempts to explain a natural occurrence. In the tale of the bubble, straw, and shoe that go on a journey, the straw breaks and the shoe falls into the river. This causes the bubble to laugh so hard that it bursts. In another tale, a bean laughs so hard that it splits, thus causing its black stripe. The German stories of Tyll Eulenspiegel tell the actions of a medieval clown who causes much laughter. The Laughing Fit, a mid-eleventh-century tale from Japan, tells of a magician who made a group of ladies laugh so hard they almost died, thus illustrating that too much of a good thing is bad.

In art, the first known depictions of laughter come from the ancient Minoan culture. The Harvester Vase (circa 1500 B.C.) is a small vase with a carved relief that shows men returning from the harvest. They are boisterous and singing, and hilarity is evident in some of the facial expressions. Masks and small figures, such as a Phoenician terra-cotta mask from Carthage or a Smiling Head (late nineteenth–early twentieth century) from Papua New Guinea, have laughing expressions, but they are probably intended as talismans to ward off evil. In Greek and Roman art, comic scenes, but not actual laughter, are depicted. In medieval art, scenes of laughter are generally biblical, such as Sarah laughing at the news she will bear a child. One of the earliest portraits of a person laughing is Dosso Dossi's Laughing Youth (before 1541).

Images of laughing figures do not become commonplace until the Baroque period. Some of these have a moral or literary value, such as portraits of Democritus or paintings of Aphrodite and Ares trapped by Hephaestus; some show the artist poking fun at himself, such as the self-portraits by Rembrandt and Jan Steen. Most, however, are peasant scenes involving drinking. In other words, laughing people are usually depicted in scenes in which the decorum is deliberately low. Laughter still had the stigma attached to it from ancient times, which is summed up by Seneca's statement, "A poor man laughs more often and more heartily." Laughter was still considered improper in aristocratic circles. Erasmus advised covering the mouth when laughing, and Lord Chesterfield warned his son that a gentleman never laughs because it makes a disagreeable noise and distorts the face. William Pitt, in a letter to his nephew, said it was rare to see anyone laugh gracefully. Since children can be excepted from adult conduct, the image of a laughing child was perhaps more acceptable; such images, for example, Bartoloméo Esteban Murillo's Laughing Child Leaning out a Window (circa 1675), are not infrequent in art. Murillo's painting, however, raises the question of laughing versus smiling. Many paintings with the word laughing in their titles portray characters who are not laughing, but smiling. Some do not even do that. Frans Hals's famous The Laughing Cavalier (1624) shows a man who neither laughs nor smiles—it is said that he laughs with his eyes. Typical Baroque representations of laughter include Frans Hals's Malle Babbe (circa 1650), Adriaen van Ostade's Head of a Laughing Peasant (1646), Abraham Diepraem's Interior of a Tavern: Boors Smoking and Drinking (1665), Jusepe de Ribera's The Drinker (1637), and Hendrick Terbrugghen's Democritus (1628).

The works of Ribera and Terbrugghen illustrate that some images of laughing go far beyond their peasant context. Ribera's Drinker is also an allegory on the sense of taste, and although Terbrugghen's Democritus is clearly a peasant type, he is resting on a celestial globe (as opposed to the terrestrial globe in the companion painting of Heraclitus). This effectively puts Democritus in a Christian context. It places laughter at human folly in the realm of heaven and thus on a higher plane than weeping at human misery. This positive Christian attitude toward laughing is exactly opposite what one would expect, as the art historian Edgar Wind has pointed out. The Christian allusion is made explicit in Cornelis van Haarlem's Democritus and Heraclitus (before 1638), in which Democritus paradoxically appears Christlike as he holds an orb surmounted by a cross.

It is not until the eighteenth century that one sees the regular middle class depicted in uproarious laughter, as in William Hogarth's The Laughing Audience (1733) or Francisco Goya's Until Death (1799), which shows an ugly old woman primping herself before a mirror while her young attendants laugh at her behind her back. Both of these works are strongly satirical. In the twentieth century many laughing figures take on a more purely humorous and innocent role with little or no emphasis on social class or satire, such as Robert Henri's Laughing Child (1907) or Rufino Tamayo's Laughing Woman (1950).

Laughter has been written about since at least the fifth century B.C., but until the nineteenth century the literature on laughter avoided discussing laughter in literature. Although references to laughter have been common in literature since the time of Homer, they have been less frequently portrayed in the visual arts. This is probably because of the indecorum that has been attached to laughter, which has, since ancient times, been coupled with the difficulty of depicting the distortions of the human face caused by laughing. Images of laughing can rise above the stigma, however, when they allude to higher ideas or illustrate a classic story.

See also Caricature/Cartoon; Comic; Fools/Folly; Peasantry

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Non-Western

Harvester Vase, steatite, Minoan, circa 1500 B.C.

Phoenician Mask, terra-cotta, 700–500 B.C., from Carthage, now in Cagliari, Italy, Museo Archeologico

Balladeer, ceramic, Han Dynasty period, Xindu, Szechwan, China, Administrative Office for Cultural Relics

Smiling Figure, ceramic, Late Classical period, from Veracruz, Mexico, now in New York, Nelson Rockefeller Collection

Tiger-Taming Lohan, carved bamboo, Ch'ing Dynasty, Taipei, Taiwan

Smiling Head, ceramic, late nineteenth–early twentieth century, from Kwoma people, Papua New Guinea, now in New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Medieval

Abraham and the Three Angels, illuminated manuscript, Psalter of St. Louis, thirteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Renaissance

Dossi, Dosso, Laughing Youth, before 1541, Florence, Italy, Longhi Collection

Seventeenth Century

Hals, Frans, Merrymakers at Shrovetide, circa 1615, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Hals, Frans, “Jonker Ramp,” 1623, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Hals, Frans, The Laughing Cavalier, 1624, London, Wallace Collection

Bonzi, Pietro, Laughing Young Man with Melon and Snail, circa 1625, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles County Museum

Vouet, Simon, Time Vanquished by Home, Love, and Beauty, 1627, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Terbrugghen, Hendrick, Laughing Boy with a Glass, before 1629, London, Hampton Court Palace, Royal Collection

Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait with Saskia, circa 1635–1636, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Ribera, Jusepe de, The Drinker, 1637, private collection

Brouwer, Adriaen, Laughing Peasant, before 1638, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Prince of Liechtenstein Collection

Ostade, Adriaen van, Head of a Laughing Peasant, panel, 1646, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Hals, Frans, Malle Babbe, circa 1650, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie

Honthorst, Gerrit van, Merry Violist, before 1656, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection

Vermeer, Jan, Officer and Laughing Girl, circa 1658, New York, Frick Collection

Leyster, Judith, Laughing Figure and a Wine Glass, before 1660, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle

Steen, Jan, Self-Portrait Playing the Lute, circa 1661–1663, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection

Diepraem, Abraham, Interior of a Tavern: Boors Smoking and Drinking, 1665, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Hals, Frans, Laughing Boys with a Beer Jug, before 1666, Leerdam, The Netherlands, Hofje van Aarden Collection

Hals, Frans, Laughing Boy with a Flute, before 1666, Berlin, Germany, Staatlich Museen

Hals, Frans, Laughing Child with a Flute, before 1666, Schwerin, Germany, Museum

Molenaer, Jan, A Laughing Man, before 1668, Antwerp, Belgium, Mayer van den Bergh Museum

Rembrandt van Rijn, Laughing Self-Portrait, circa 1669, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz Museum

Rembrandt van Rijn, Man Laughing, before 1669, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Murillo, Bartolomé, Laughing Child Leaning out a Window, circa 1675, London, National Gallery

Steen, Jan, The Rhetoricians, before 1679, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts

Gelder, Arent de, The Artist as Zeuxis, 1685, Frankfurt, Germany, Städelches Kunstinstitut

Teniers, David the Younger, A Laughing Peasant, before 1690, Warsaw, Poland, National Museum

Eighteenth Century

Hogarth, William, The Laughing Audience, etching, 1733

Goya, Francisco, Until Death, aquatint, 1799

Goya, Francisco, The Straw Manikin, circa 1791–1792, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Nineteenth Century

Goya, Francisco, Old Man on a Swing, etching, 1825

Goya, Francisco, Old Woman on a Swing, etching, 1826

Meissonier, Jean-Louis-Ernest, The Laughing Figure, oil on panel, 1865, Compiègne, France, Château

Twentieth Century

Stella, Joseph, Laughing Man, 1900, collection of the estate of Joseph Stella

Henri, Robert, Laughing Child, 1907, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art

Bellows, George, Laughing Boy, oil on canvas, 1907, New York, Hirschel and Adler Galleries

Duveneck, Frank, Laughing Boy, before 1919, Lincoln, University of Nebraska

Boccioni, Umberto, The Laugh, oil on canvas, 1919, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Peplow, Samuel John, Man Laughing (Portrait of Tom Morris), before 1935, Edinburgh, Scotland, National Gallery of Modern Art

Evergood, Philip, Laughing Worker, before 1948

Tamayo, Rufino, Laughing Woman, 1950, Sacramento, California, E. B. Crocker Art Gallery

Sutherland, Graham, Laughing Woman, before 1980, Leicester, England, Museum and Art Gallery

- Bertucci, Jacopo, Laughing Man
 Bohrod, Ashrod, The Laugh
 Chagall, Marc, The Laughing Man and the Fishes, before 1985
- Democritus (The Laughing Philosopher)*
 Bramante, Donato, Democritus and Heraclitus, before 1514, Milan, Italy, Brera Terbrugghen, Hendrick, Democritus, oil on canvas, 1628, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Velázquez, Diego, Democritus, circa 1628, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Ribera, Jusepe de, Democritus, 1630, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Ribera, Jusepe de, Democritus, circa 1635–1637, Salisbury, Wiltshire, collection of the Earl of Pembroke at Wilton House
 Cornelis van Haarlem, Democritus and Heraclitus, before 1638, Brunswick, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museum
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Democritus, before 1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Rosa, Salvator, Democritus and Heraclitus, circa 1645, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Jordaens, Jacob, Democritus and Heraclitus, before 1678, Brunswick, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museum
 Coypel, Antoine, Democritus, circa 1692, Paris, Louvre
 Giordano, Luca, Democritus, before 1705, Venice, Italy, Pinacoteca Querini Stampalia
 Lücke, Johann Christoph Ludwig, Democritus, the Laughing Philosopher, terra-cotta on gray marble plinth, circa 1750–1757, Los Angeles, California, Los Angeles Museum of Art
 Corot, Jean-Baptiste-Camille, Democritus, before 1875, Nantes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Aphrodite and Ares Trapped by Hephaestus (Ridicule)*
 Sodoma, Mars and Venus in the Net of Vulcan, circa 1511, New York, Greitzer Collection
 Heemskerck, Maerten van, Vulcan Showing the Gods Mars and Venus in the Net, 1536, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Goltzius, Hendrick, Phoebus Exposing Mars and Venus to the Ridicule of the Olympians, engraving, circa 1615
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Mars and Venus Caught in Vulcan's Net, drawing, circa 1643, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksprentenkabinet
 Chéron, Louis, Vulcan Catching Mars and Venus in His Net, circa 1695, London, Tate Gallery
 Daumier, Honoré, Vulcan's Net, lithograph, 1842
 Corinth, Lovis, Homeric Laughter, 1909, Munich, Germany, Neue Pinakothek
- Illustrations of Laughter in Folktales and Fairy Tales*
 Ford, H. J., The King Laughs at the Billygoat, illustrations to The Billygoat and the King, circa 1906, India
 Ford, H. J., The Witches Laughing, illustrations to The Frog, circa 1900, Italy

Further Reading

- Folk Tales*
Brer Rabbit Tales (Uncle Remus) (nineteenth-century African American)
The Laugh Maker (Sioux)
The Laughing Bean
The Laughing Fit (mid–eleventh century Japanese)
The Laughing Dumpling (Japanese)
Poppies: The Girl Who Made Fate Laugh (Greek)
Tale of the Bubble, the Straw, and the Shoe (Yiddish)
Tales of Tyll Eulenspiegel (medieval German clown)
- Philosophical, Psychological, Anthropological Writings on Laughter*
 Apte, Mahadev, Humor and Laughter: An Anthropological Approach, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1985
 Bergson, Henri, Laughter, in Comedy, edited by W. Sypher, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956
 Berrelarius, Elpidius, Tractatus de Risu, Florence, Italy, 1603
 Franco, Jorge, Dissertatio de risu sardonico, Heidelberg, Germany, 1683
 Gutwirth, Marcel, Laughing Matter: An Essay on the Comic, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1982
 Holland, Norman, Laughing: A Psychology of Humor, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1982
 Hutcheson, Francis, Reflections upon Laughter, Glasgow, Scotland, 1750
 Lippitt, John, “Nietzsche, Zarathustra and the Stratus of Laughter,” British Journal of Aesthetics 32:1 (1992)
 Mancino, Celso, De Risu ac Ridiculis, Ferrara, Italy, 1591
 Morreall, John, editor, The Philosophy of Laughter and Humor, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987
 ———, Taking Laughter Seriously, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987
 Philibert, Louis, Le Rire: Essai Littéraire, Moral et Psychologique, Paris, 1883
 Schaeffer, Neil, The Art of Laughter, New York: Columbia University Press, 1981
 Spencer, Herbert, “The Physiology of Laughter,” in Essays on Education, London: Dent, 1911; New York: Dutton, 1911
- General*
 Baudelaire, Charles, “On the Essence of Laughter and, in General, On the Comic in the Plastic Arts,” in The Painter of Modern Life and Other Essays, translated and edited by Jonathan Mayne, London: Phaidon Press, 1964
 Boston, Richard, An Anatomy of Laughter, London: Collins, 1974
 Bouché, Thérèse, and Hélène Charpentier, editors, Le Rire au Moyen Age dans la Littérature et dans les Arts, Bordeaux, France: Presses Universitaires de Bordeaux, 1990
 Bowen, Barbara, “Roman Jokes and the Renaissance Prince,” Illinois Classical Studies 9 (1984)
 Chapman, Antony J., and Hugh C. Foot, editors, It's a Funny Thing, Humour, Oxford and New York: Pergamon, 1977

- Eastman, Max, Enjoyment of Laughter, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1936
- Gregory, J. C., The Nature of Laughter, New York: Harcourt, 1924; London: K. Paul, 1924
- Gruner, Charles R., Understanding Laughter, the Workings of Wit and Humor, Chicago: Nelson-Hall, 1978
- Joubert, Laurent, Treatise on Laughter (1579), translated by Gregory de Rocher, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1980
- Kaufmann, Thomas DaCosta, "Archimboldo's Serious Jokes: 'Mysterious but Long Meaning'," in The Verbal and the Visual, edited by Karl-Ludwig Selig, New York: Italica Press, 1990
- Kuschel, Ian Zachary, Laughter: A Theological Essay, London: Scot Press, 1994
- Malcolm, Ian Zachary, "Laughter in Art," in The Pursuits of Leisure and Other Essays, London: Benn, 1929; Freeport, New York: Books for Libraries Press, 1968
- Menard, Philippe, Le rire et la sourire dans le roman courtois en France au Moyen Age, Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1969
- Paz, Octavio, "Laughter and Penitence," in Essays on Mexican Art, translated by Helen Lane, New York: Harcourt, 1993
- de Rocher, Gregory, Rabelais' Laughters and Joubert's Traité de Ris, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1979
- Sanders, Barry, Sudden Glory: Laughter as Subversive History, Boston: Beacon Press, 1995
- Screech, M. A., and Ruth Calder, "Some Renaissance Attitudes to Laughter," in Humanism in France at the End of the Middle Ages and in the Early Renaissance, edited by Anthony Herbert Tigar Levi, Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 1970; New York: Barnes and Noble, 1971
- Tarabukin, Nikolaj, "Smeh v iskusstve," Tvor estvo 9 (1990)
- Wind, Edgar, "The Christian Democritus," in The Eloquence of Symbols, Oxford: Clarendon, 1983

LIGHT I: THE LAMP IN THE NICHE

Erica Cruikshank-Dodd

The following cultures are included in the discussion of the theme Light I: The Lamp in the Niche:

CLASSICAL

CHRISTIAN

JEWISH

ISLAMIC

The Feyal (Faisal) Mosque, completed 1988, interior of the prayer hall, showing the mihrab, the minbar, the dikka, and the great chandelier, Islamabad, Pakistan. (Courtesy of the author)

God is the Light of the heavens and the earth; the likeness of His Light is as a niche wherein is a lamp
 (the lamp in a glass, the glass as it were a glittering star) kindled from a Blessed Tree, an olive that is neither of the East nor of the West whose oil welling would shine, even if no fire touched it; Light upon Light;
 (God guides to His Light whom He will.)
 (And God strikes similitudes for men, and God has knowledge of everything.)
 in temples God has allowed to be raised up,
 and His Name to be commemorated therein;
 therein glorifying Him, in the mornings and the evenings,
 are men whom neither commerce nor trafficking diverts from the remembrance of God and to perform the prayer, and to pay the alms . . .
 (The Holy Koran 24:36–37)

These verses from the Surat an-Nur, the Surah of Light, in the Holy Koran, are carved into the doorway of the Mosque of Sultan Hassan, in Cairo, Egypt (1356–1362). They are also frequently written on the graceful glass enameled lamps that hang in the prayer hall of the mosque. Said to be among the last revelations received by the Prophet Muhammad, these verses refer to God's likeness as a light, to the light in the lamp, and to the lamp in the niche. God sent this revelation to the Prophet in terms understood by Jews, pagans, and Christians, as well as by early Muslims, and this image of the light hanging in a niche is still resonant today.

In the ancient world, the symbolic connotations of light were depicted through the use of several different images: the candle, the lamp, the sun, the mandorla, the halo, and fire. These different aspects of light developed powerful connotations throughout the medieval period and even more so during the Renaissance, spreading to include a variety of art forms and styles from the early experiments in chiaroscuro to impressionism. The iconographic history of these developments has been extensively documented in separate studies devoted to specific cultures or periods of time. A comprehensive article by Oskar Holl in the Lexicon der christlichen Ikonographie collected a rich bibliography.

Here we will consider parallel developments in the iconographic representation of light through Jewish, Christian, and Islamic sources. At the heart of the different representations of light is a mystical symbol born in the late classical Mediterranean and still relevant today: a lamp hanging in a niche. From its early beginnings, the niche represented the temple, the synagogue, the church, or the mosque. It is the light shining in the niche that is said to point the way to a meaningful and credible truth.

God as Light

The identification of light with pleasure, goodness, and eternal life is as old as the sun of the Egyptian pharaoh Akhenaton. This signification of light was opposed to that of darkness, which signified death and destruction and clung to the dim, gray, lightless underworld of the Babylonian hero Gilgamesh. The opposing images occur in the first verses of Genesis (1:3–4), where God creates light and divides the light from the darkness and thus establishes the rule of divine law, order over chaos. The symbolism is frequently repeated throughout the Old Testament, especially by Isaiah: "The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory" (Isaiah 60:19).

The world of Homer inherited the images of Gilgamesh, and for the early Greeks light versus darkness described a life of victory and glory above ground as opposed to the dark underworld of death. Odysseus was told to enjoy his life in this world, because it was ". . . better to be a slave in this world, than a king in the next." To this relatively primitive concept of light, the pre-Socratic philosophers added connotations of knowledge and reason. Apollo was not only god of the sun but also god of music, poetry, and science. For Plato, in the fifth century B.C., to "see the light" meant to understand truth. The man in Plato's Allegory of the Cave saw truth only in reflected light. When he emerged from the cave and saw actual truth, he was blinded. Sophocles' Oedipus was mentally "blind" so long as he had eyes but did not see the truth; when the "light" of truth struck him, he became physically blinded. Alexander made the similar mistake of stepping into the "light" of Diogenes.

By the first century A.D., this vision of light had filtered into the cave of Aeneas, hero of Virgil's Aeneid, where, among the shades, Aeneas found Orpheus with his lyre, bathed in light. The possibility of a bright life after death was latent in the story of Orpheus, who not only descended into the underworld and emerged from it, but who was also supposed to have visited Egypt and become acquainted with the sun worship of Akhenaton. Orpheus became the principal priest in Dionysian rites, in which notions of renewal and rebirth were illustrated by an extensive vocabulary of symbols. The idea that death introduced light was an astounding contradiction, and this revolutionary image introduced a mystical concept of light that became central to the three Mediterranean religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

For late-Hellenistic Jews, the hint of an afterlife was portrayed by David with his lyre, a transformation of Orpheus, as in the synagogue at Dura-Europos (third century A.D.), or the synagogue in Gaza (A.D. 508–509). Christians associated Orpheus with Christ or with the Good Shepherd, as in the mosaics of Galla Placidia in Ravenna, Italy (A.D. 450), or the floor mosaic of the Church in Jerusalem, now preserved in the Istanbul Museum (sixth century A.D.). In a Virgilian sense, these personifications pointed the way to a bright eternal life for the deceased who had followed the law.

The mystical message of Christ as “the light” incorporated both a Neoplatonic vision of light as truth, as well as a notion of eternal life. This image became central to the writings of the church fathers over the following centuries. The Gospel according to John frequently refers to Christ as the light: “Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life” (John 8:12). Or again: “I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness” (John 12:46). This mystic vision was conveyed in early Christian art by the formula “Life and Light,” written in the form of a cross. Because the cross signified victory, this formula merged the idea of light with the idea of victory over death. Among numerous examples of this device is a cross inscribed on a sixth-century silver plate from the Phela Treasure, presently in the Abegg-Stiftung in Bern, Switzerland. The cross is depicted standing on the hill of Golgotha, from which flow the four rivers of paradise. In this case, Christ, life, light, victory, and paradise are combined in a single expressive image.

The Lamp, as the Vehicle of Light

A simpler representation of Christ as light, lighting the path to eternal life, was conveyed by means of a decorated lamp. The lamp, or candlestick, has symbolic origins in the very light it produces and has developed its own distinct iconographic history. The Psalm calls the word of God “a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path” (Psalm 119:105). To this day, Jews celebrate a dedication of light at the festival of Hanukkah. In Isaiah, the seven-branched candlestick, or the menorah, came to represent the divine revelation of “the law.” As it represented “the law,” so the menorah was associated with the Ark of the Covenant. According to Erwin Ramsdell Goodenough, the menorah became even more: it became “a symbol of God, of his streaming Light and Law; it was the Tree of Life, the astral path to God, and the mediating female principle, the Mother” (Goodenough, p. 113).

On a Greek stela, the rendering of a lamp in the hands of a mourner represented the eternal flame of the spirit, an image that frequently appeared on Roman funerary monuments as well. In the classical Mediterranean, lamps were buried with the deceased person to light the soul’s way into the darkness of the underworld. Since the lamp accompanied the soul into the afterlife, its decoration reflected the development of ideas about death and life after death. By the second and third centuries A.D., the mythological figures common to earlier classical lamps had often been replaced by images from the same myths, but with new moral implications. Leda and the swan, for example, might represent the descent of God’s spirit to the receptive mortal; Venus with an apple might indicate the promise of pleasure and future happiness in the next world for the mortal who made the right choice. Symbols of the hunt indicated struggle, reward, and victory, especially victory over death for the owner of the lamp. Frequently, new symbolic themes were explained by means of inscriptions. For example, on a second- or third-century lamp from Syria, now at the Museum of the American University of Beirut in Lebanon, the ubiquitous figure of Venus, reclining on a couch, is accompanied by a lover and a Greek inscription: Heidonos (happiness, or pleasure). Lamps like these, many of which were found in Mediterranean burial sites along the shores from Turkey to Africa and Italy, were inscribed in either Greek or Latin.

By the second and third centuries, flowers, vines, and fruit—symbols of renewal and rebirth associated with the cult of Dionysus—also were portrayed on lamps. These symbols were readily adopted by Jews and Christians. Lamps for Jews, for example, were decorated with Dionysiac motifs and adorned with specifically Jewish insignia: the menorah, the ethrog, and the lulab. Fish and crosses were added to the vines and garlands adorning Christian lamps to guide the faithful along the right path. Indeed, early Christian lamps soon became a vehicle for a vast repertoire of subjects suitable to illustrate the truth in the next life. In addition to specifically Christian insignia, all the beasts of the heavenly kingdom—lions, lambs, panthers, leopards, deer, bear, horses, rabbits, and peacocks—adorn the lamps that light the soul into eternal life and happiness. In place of classical mythological figures, saints and prophets stood by the vines and vases of eternal life, acting as intercessors for entry into the next world. In other words, the lamp, as vehicle of light or truth, offered a field for a variety of decorative motifs, all of which received their meaning through the eternal flame that burned in the vessel.

While the pottery lamps of East and West remained fairly simple in their shapes and decorations, lamps made of more valuable material not only were decorated, but assumed complicated symbolic shapes. Frequently these lamps were in the shape of animals, either pigeons or griffins, creatures long associated with the ascent of the spirit. Some lamps were of more original shape, such as the more popular bronze lamps from the fifth or sixth century in the form of a boat. (There is a well-known example in Florence, Italy, and another one in the Virginia Museum of Art.) The boat originally represented the ship of souls guided by Charon across the river Styx, but in Christian examples the pilot became Peter, Paul, or Odysseus, who, in his Christian incarnation, stood for the indomitable traveler in the troubled seas of life. Because the beam on the mast of the ship formed a cross, these lamps are usually interpreted as Christian, but Jews also understood the image, for it occurs in the mosaics of the House of Leontis in Beit She’an (fifth or sixth century). Another unusual shape of lamp, now preserved in the Hermitage, in St. Petersburg, Russia, is in the form of a basilica.

By the fifth century, iconoclasm was creating problems for the image of the lamp, and in lands where iconoclasm was rampant, the figurative decoration on lamps was often explained or even replaced by selected written formulas. John’s notion of Christ as light, or the written word for light as the eternal life on the cross, was also described. Writing was especially suitable for the depiction of an abstract idea, and the lamp, as the vehicle holding the flame of truth, gave form or meaning to the writing. For example, early pagan lamps were traditionally decorated with conventional subjects of delight, dolphins, and tritons, but by the third and fourth centuries, mythological subjects selected for their moral implications had to be reinterpreted, and inscriptions were needed to explain them. A Christian lamp decorated with the ubiquitous vines, flowers, rabbits, and doves was then explained by a simple inscription: "Blessing," "Jesus help me," "Lord help me," or with the name of a saint who might intercede in the next world on behalf of the bearer of the lamp. From the third to the seventh century, apart from such obviously sectarian symbols as the cross or the menorah, there does not seem to have been much difference in the decorations on pagan, Jewish, or Christian lamps. By the sixth or seventh century, inscriptions sometimes replaced the image altogether. A familiar expression on Christian lamps, with and without other decoration, was "The light of Christ shines for all," written in Greek. The same sentiments adorn lamps from the West at this time, with the inscriptions written in Latin.

All these forms of decoration appeared on lamps in lands conquered by the Arabs, and while many continued to be inscribed in Greek, some were also inscribed in Arabic. In some cases, whether the lamp was intended for a pagan, Muslim, Jewish, or Christian owner is not indicated. A lamp for either an Arab Christian or an Arab Muslim might be decorated by a single word, "Blessing" written in Arabic. By the sixth and seventh centuries A.D., in areas subject to iconoclastic ideas, the Dionysiac formula of vines and flowers was sometimes replaced by geometric designs, or by suitable inscriptions in Greek or Arabic conveying hope for the deceased or blessings for the bearer of the lamp. Several lamps are known to be inscribed with the following message in Greek: "Shine, oh Light! Do not go out. Light with your flame and do not spill." On two sixth- or seventh-century lamps from Syria, now preserved in the Museum of the American University of Beirut, the same potter apparently turned out one lamp for a Greek-speaking customer, with the Greek inscription cited above, and another one, identical in all other respects, with an inscription in Arabic: "Blessings in the name of God to the owner of the light." Whether the lamp was destined for an Arab Christian or an Arab Muslim is not indicated.

This custom of inscribing a lamp with suitable written verses instead of figural decoration lingered for many centuries in Islamic art, especially where inscriptions replaced figurative images. It is important to point out that inscriptions from the Koran were not used on the smaller, domestic lamps, because it is said that words from the holy book should not be touched by unwashed hands. On the other hand, the great enameled glass mosque lamps from Mamluke, Syria (twelfth–fourteenth century), which hung high in the mihrab (a niche, cut into the qibla wall of a mosque, and hung with a lamp to indicate the direction for prayer) or in the prayer halls or doorways of a mosque, were frequently inscribed with all or part of the Surat an-Nur quoted at the head of this article.

The Light in the Niche

If the lamp lit the way for the deceased into the next world, then the path traveled by the soul on this journey was signified by an arch, or a niche holding a lamp. In this way, the niche, like the lamp, became an inseparable part of the imagery of light. As the means by which the spirit ascended to the next world, the niche represented a temple, synagogue, or church. In early Greek architecture, sculpture on a temple pediment explained the temple as the way of the logos—the path of divine law and order in the universe, as opposed to apparent chaos. The sculpture on the opposing tympana of the Temple of Olympia (sixth century B.C.) and the Parthenon (fifth century B.C.) in Greece illustrate the triumph of law over chaos. Thus, a temple facade represented in the background of a mythological scene on a Greek vase not only framed the figures portrayed but also explained the relevance of the story. The columns framing the diners on a krater in Würzburg, Germany (fourth century B.C.), for example, indicate that the meal takes place in the next world. The aedicula on an amphora in Naples, Italy (fourth century B.C.) conveys the same idea regarding the woman standing beneath the arch.

The Roman victory arch, like the gates of the city, not only connoted a military victory, it symbolized the victory of the Pax Romana, the divine rule of law over chaos. Virgil portrayed Aeneas entering the underworld through gates of ivory (Aeneid, 6:552–554). In the time of Virgil, the shape of a sarcophagus frequently represented a temple facade with a door through which the spirit could pass into the next world. On the end of a well-known sarcophagus in the Melfi Cathedral in Italy (second century A.D.), the mythological figures carved on either side of the door indicate the way and give comfort to the soul along its path.

By the third and fourth centuries A.D., in hypogea throughout the Mediterranean world, the temple facade—as a simple pediment on two columns or as an arched niche—represented the passage from this world to the next. Carved into or painted on the walls of the second- and third-century tomb complexes at Palmyra, Syria, arches and columns indicate the passage through which the spirit might escape after burial. Temple facades, columns, and tympana in pale pink and gray, out of which little souls escape in the shape of small, flying, white birds, were painted on a third-century tomb fresco from Roman Syria, preserved before the Persian Gulf War in the National Museum of Beirut. Pagan and Christian sarcophagi and funeral stele often displayed the bust of the deceased in a niche to suggest the passage of that soul into eternity.

This image of the door was so familiar that it was used by Jesus Christ to explain his position as intercessor: "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved . . ." (John, 10:9). Thus, where deities, or personifications of divine qualities, had stood in front of niches on pagan sarcophagi, so Christ and the saints stood in front of niches on early Christian sarcophagi: for example, on the fourth-century sarcophagus in S. Ambrogio, in Milan, Italy, and the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (A.D. 359) in the Vatican.

The iconographic implications of the niche flourished in areas favoring iconoclasm. In northern Syria during the fifth and sixth centuries, a basket-of-plenty was placed in a niche to ensure a life of plenty for the soul in the afterworld or, quite frequently, a veil through which the deceased's spirit must pass was hung across an arch. Five lamps from the second or third century A.D., each hanging in a niche, appear on a pagan sarcophagus in the National Museum in Damascus, Syria. These lighted niches on the Damascan sarcophagus expressed bright hope for the deceased in the next world. The symbolic representation of a niche as an indication of passage to the next world spread westward from the Mediterranean and as far east as the sculptures on the stupas of Gandhara, in what is now Afghanistan and Pakistan.

The images of light and the door thus were firmly established in the iconographic vocabulary of the fifth and sixth centuries. A light within a niche or a light standing above an altar became so popular in early Christian church mosaics that it is difficult to select one example over another. The Archaeological Museum in Istanbul, Turkey, preserves a Christian lead sarcophagus (fifth century) on the lid of which the sole decoration is a lamp hanging in a niche. A fifth-century mosaic covers the floor of the memorial to Moses on Mount Nebo (Pisgah), Jordan. The mosaic portrays an arch from which hangs a lamp in front of a chapel altar. Another mosaic, also on Mount Pisgah, is in the Church of the Priest John and portrays candlesticks flanking a center inscription under a temple tympanum. This type of composite image culminated in the great church of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (now Istanbul), built in the sixth century by Emperor Justinian, ruler of the eastern Roman Empire. Over the imperial door in the narthex of Hagia Sophia, an enthroned Christ holds an open book on which is written "Peace be upon you; I am the Light of the world." Every aspect of the architecture and decoration in Hagia Sophia, as described by Paul the Silentiary in the sixth century, further supports the notion of the church as a light to the world.

Jews also used the image of a light in a niche to express their own understanding of the law or the "way." The lintel of a doorway in a third-century synagogue in Capernaum (ancient Palestine) is decorated with a Torah ark in the form of a temple facade, closed with a curtain. In the synagogue of Dura-Europos, an ancient Mesopotamian town now in Syria, a third-century Torah shrine is decorated with a temple facade for the ark, and beside it is a menorah, along with the sacrifice of Isaac, the lulab, and the ethrog. A lead sarcophagus from Beth She'arim portrays an arch over a menorah. The ark, closed with a curtain and flanked by two menorah, appears three centuries later on the pavement mosaics of the synagogue in Beit She'an (fifth–sixth century) and without the curtain at Beit Alpha (sixth century).

The representation of temple, church, or synagogue and light—the temple showing the transition, or the way, and the light showing the direction to eternal life—is thus rooted in biblical and classical tradition. It is not clear which of these traditions established the use of these images first. They seem to have borrowed from each other and to have developed simultaneously during the first five centuries of the Christian era. These images persisted in the medieval art of both East and West, rapidly gathering strength on both sides of the Mediterranean, developing a vocabulary of related motifs that spread in their diversity and implications.

Along with a menorah on either side of the ark, a menorah in a niche became a familiar image in later Jewish iconography. A splendid example is a hanging Torah from Turkey (eighteenth century) that is decorated with a niche on columns, filled with flowers. The Torah contains seven hanging lamps and is inscribed with the words from Psalm 118:20: "This gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter."

Fully developed Byzantine art relied on light as its most significant symbolic image. Symbols of light were plentiful: the lamp, the sun, the moon, the stars, the nimbus, the mandorla, the city, and Jerusalem, to name but a few. The icon was a primary symbol of light. Standing between humans and God, it received the grace of God through His light and transmitted this light to the faithful. The image of the enthroned Christ holding the Gospel as a light to the world, first created in the Church of Hagia Sophia, became even more elaborate with time. In the Cathedral of Céfalu in Italy (twelfth century), a huge apse mosaic under a triumphal arch holds the central "figure" of light in the shape of the Pantocrator. In his hand he holds the open Gospel inscribed with the words from John 8:12: "I am the Light of the world." These developments are fully explained in Byzantine texts.

Similarly, the elaborate ornamentation of cathedral lanterns and candelabra conveyed the image of divine light in the medieval West. Like the early Christian church, and like the synagogue and the temple, the portals of the great cathedrals represented the passage out of this world into the next. These portals were decorated with depictions of the Last Judgment, showing Mary and John acting as intercessors. As the worshippers entered a cathedral, their eyes were directed to the candles, the lantern, the allegory of the cross, the enthroned Virgin, the life of Jesus, the Eucharist, and the Holy Grail, all of which were portrayed in terms of light. Medieval manuscript illumination offers a vast repertoire of light imagery, while the significance of light in Renaissance art and architecture in later periods is well documented in modern sources.

It is less recognized that this artistic vocabulary was also understood by early Muslims and interpreted according to the Revelation of the Koran. The verses of light in the Koran associate it with truth and also, when hung in a niche, as indication of a temple's divine blessing. The light in the niche became, in more specific Islamic terms, the mihrab in the prayer hall of a mosque. (A mihrab is a niche cut into the qibla wall of a mosque, hung with a lamp to indicate the direction for prayer.) The mihrab in every mosque is the most essential architectural element of the hall for prayer, because it indicates the direction of the qibla, the direction toward Mecca, Saudi Arabia, toward which every Muslim should pray. In other words, the central image of every mosque is the light in the mihrab, or the niche hung with a light to indicate the direction of truth.

The verses of light in the Koran describe a lamp like a "glittering star" hanging in a niche. One of the earliest surviving mihrabs is in the mosque of Ibn Tulun in Cairo, Egypt (ninth century). Here a star is portrayed in the niche, although the lamp became the usual symbol and is most commonly used today. Modern prayer rugs, too numerous to mention, feature representations of lamps and are a familiar example of such symbolism. In Cairo, however, this image adopted an even wider interpretation and significance by the fourteenth century. In the mosque of Sultan Hassan, the massive principal doorway leading to the interior sanctuary is inscribed with the verses of light. A light actually hangs in the doorway, which is shaped like a niche, or mihrab. The presence of the verses of light in the doorway of Sultan Hassan indicate that the function of this doorway is as a worldly mihrab, a kind of compass pointing to truth. According to the Koran, the light in the niche will only be found in temples that God has allowed to be raised, in which His name is glorified, and toward which men do not forget to pray as they perform their religious obligations in the world outside throughout the day.

As the image of the light in the niche persisted in Jewish and Christian art in succeeding centuries, it also was retained by the world of Islam. For example, in the huge King Feyal (Faisal) mosque in Islamabad, Pakistan, completed in 1988, the usual mihrab in the form of a niche in the qibla wall is replaced by an enormous representation of the Koran, open at the page of the Surat ar-Rahman, the Beneficent, surrounded by the 99 names for God. The Surat ar-Rahman describes the bounteous reward awaiting the faithful. Above this startling and deliberate deviation from tradition, however, the symbolism of light dominates the entire building complex. A brilliant gold chandelier, illuminated by 4,000 lanterns, hangs from the center of the dome so that the dome appears suspended in light, very much like the dome of Hagia Sophia. (Actually, the King Faisal Mosque is indirectly associated with Hagia Sophia; its Turkish architect, Vedat Dalokay, was inspired by the Blue Mosque of Istanbul, itself modeled on Hagia Sophia.) The lantern is the most powerful image in the hall. It represents the Light of the Revelation, and like a portal it transforms the interior of the mosque into a mihrab for the world. The large open book representing the Koran in the qibla wall then performs the function of the mihrab, indicating the direction for prayer and the promise of reward in the next world.

The central connotations of light could be said to have been conceived before the written word, when God divided light from darkness. Such symbols illuminated the medieval, mystical language of the three Mediterranean religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—and became a powerful part of the artistic vocabulary of the Renaissance. Much later, among the most beloved images deeply embedded in nineteenth-century conscience is William Holman Hunt's Light of the World (1854). In this painting, flowers, apples, and trees of paradise; the crown of thorns; and the wood of the cross are added to the familiar images of the door, the niche, and the lamp. Indeed, the development of this imagery has become so diverse that it can better be illustrated through the study of single motifs, such as the lantern, illumination, mandorla, or nimbus. All these motifs reflect the differing and brilliant facets of a common theme: amid the chaos and confusion of this world, light shines eternal at the end, as it was in the beginning.

See also Dawn/Dawning; Light II: Divine, Natural, and Neon; Logos/Word

Selected Works of Art

Classical

Greek Krater, detail showing a funeral meal under an architectural framework, fourth century B.C., Würzburg, Germany, Museum

Greek Amphora, detail showing a mourning figure in an aedicula, fourth century B.C., Naples, Italy, Naples Museum

Sarcophagus, second century, Melfi, Italy, Cathedral

Painted Hypogeum of the Three Brothers, second century, Palmyra, Syria

Painted Tomb, fresco, third century, Beirut, Lebanon, National Museum

Clay Lamp, inscribed "Heidonos," third century, Beirut, Lebanon, American University

Sarcophagus, with detail of Christ and the Apostles on the back of a "city gate," fourth century, Milan, Italy, St. Ambrogio

Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359, Vatican, St. Peter Sarcophagus, detail with a series of lamps hanging in niches, fourth or fifth century, Damascus, Syria, National Museum

Jewish

Torah Ark, temple facade, third century, Capernaum, Palestine, Synagogue

Torah Shrine, third century, Dura-Europos, Syria, Synagogue

David with His Lyre, fresco, third century, Dura-Europos, Syria, Synagogue

Lead Sarcophagus, with detail of arch over a menorah, fifth century, Beth She'arim, Israel

Lead Sarcophagus, with detail of arch over a menorah, fifth century, Beth She'arim

David with His Lyre, mosaic, sixth century, Gaza, Israel, Synagogue

The Ark and the Menorah, fifth–sixth century, Beit She'an, House of Leontis, Palestine, Synagogue

The Ark of the Menorah, mosaic, sixth century, Beit Alpha, Israel, Synagogue

Carpet with Seven Lamps Hanging in a Niche, with quotation from Psalm 118:20, eighteenth century, Prague, Czech Republic, Jewish Museum

Christian

Silver Plate, from the Phela Treasure, sixth century, Bern, Switzerland, Abegg-Stiftung

Bronze Lamp, in the shape of a boat, fourth or fifth century, Florence, Italy, National Museum

Bronze Lamp, in the shape of a boat, fourth century, Richmond, Virginia Museum of Art

Clay Lamp, with Greek inscription "the Light of Christ shines for all," sixth or seventh century, found on Mount Sion, Jerusalem

Clay Lamp, with Greek inscription "the Light of Christ shines for all," sixth or seventh century, Beirut, Lebanon, American University of Beirut

Christ Represented as Orpheus, mosaic, sixth century, Istanbul, Turkey, National Museum

Lead Sarcophagus, with lamp hanging in a niche on the cover, fifth or sixth century, Istanbul, Turkey, National Museum

Lamp in a Niche, mosaic, sixth century, Mount Pisgah, Jordan, Memorial to Moses

A Lamp in the Niche, mosaic from chapel altar, sixth century, Mount Nebo (Pisgah), Jordan, Church of the Priest John Church of Hagia Sophia, sixth century, Istanbul, Turkey
Hunt, William Holman, Light of the World, painting, 1854, Oxford, Keble College

Islamic

Clay Lamp, with Arabic inscription, "Blessings in the name of God to the owner of the light," sixth or seventh century, Beirut, Lebanon, American University

Clay Lamp, with Arabic inscription, "Shine, oh Light! Do not go out. Light with your flame and do not spill," eighth century, Paris, Cabinet des Médailles

Mihrab, from Ibn Tulun, ninth century, Cairo, Egypt
 Mosque of Sultan Hassan, 1356–1362, Cairo, Egypt
 Feyal (Faisal) Mosque, twentieth century, Islamabad, Pakistan

Further Reading

- de Boer, Tjitze J., The Encyclopedia of Islam, London: Luzac, 1936
- Cumont, Franz, Lux Perpetua, Paris: P. Geuthner, 1949
- al-Ghazali, Mishkat al-Anwar, translated by W. H. T. Gairdner, London: Royal Asiatic Society, 1924
- Goldman, Bernard Marvin, The Sacred Portal: A Primary Symbol of Ancient Judaic Art, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1966
- Goodenough, Erwin Ramsdell, "Menorah," in Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Grabar, André, "Recherches sur les sources juives de l'art paléochrétien," Cahiers Archéologiques XI (1960)
- Gutmann, Joseph, "Early Synagogue and Jewish Catacomb Art and Its Relation to Christian Art," in Sacred Images: Studies in Jewish Art from Antiquity to the Middle Ages, Northampton, Northamptonshire: Variorum, 1989
- , Jüdische zeremonial Kunst, Frankfurt, Germany: Ner-Tamid-Verlag, 1963
- Heinz-Mohr, Gerd, "Licht," and "Lampe," Lexikon der Symbole, Düsseldorf, Germany: Diederichs, 1971
- Holl, Oskar, "Licht, Lichterscheinungen," in Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie, Rom: Herder, 1971
- Jantzen, Hans, Die Hagia Sophia, Köln, Germany: DuMont Schauberg, 1967
- Leclercq, Ferdinand Henri, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, Paris, 1928
- Morey, Charles Rufus, Sardis. V. Roman and Christian Sculpture, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1924
- Peters, Francis E., Judaism, Christianity, and Islam: The Classical Texts in Their Interpretation, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Seibert, Jutta, Lexikon christlichen Kunst, Freiburg, Germany: Herder, 1980
- de Tervarent, Guy, Attributs et symboles dans l'art profane, Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1958

LIGHT II: DIVINE, NATURAL, AND NEON

Helene E. Roberts

The following periods, art forms, and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Light II: Divine, Natural, and Neon:

LIGHT AS MANIFESTATION OF THE HOLY: THE ANCIENT WORLD

LIGHT AS MANIFESTATION OF
THE HOLY: MOSAIC AND STAINED GLASS

LIGHT AS MANIFESTATION OF
THE HOLY: PAINTINGS

NATURAL LIGHT WITH SYMBOLIC MEANING

THE RAINBOW

LUMINISM

THE SCIENCE OF LIGHT

LIGHT AS MEDIUM

Bruce Nauman, Window or Wall Sign: The True Artist Helps the World by Revealing Mystic Truths, 1967, blue and peach neon tubing, Otterloo, The Netherlands, Kröller-Müller Museum. (Courtesy of Kröller-Müller Museum, Otterloo, The Netherlands)

The first symbolic manifestations of light related to the sun, the main source of light known to ancient peoples, and to a corresponding worship of that light source, as embodied in the sun gods of the Egyptians. The Greeks and Romans made light itself sacred, especially in the philosophy of Plotinus. Christianity, too, associated light with divinity. Jesus Christ was thought of as “the light of the world” (John 8:12), and the symbolism of light was used extensively in the construction and ornamentation of churches to represent the kingdom of heaven. During the Renaissance, artists considered light more as a natural phenomenon, but one still freighted with symbolic connections. Painters appreciated the dramatic effects a single source of light could produce and took advantage of its qualities to convey various meanings. By the nineteenth century, painters began to observe the effect of light on objects. Often following various scientific theories about light, the focus of some paintings shifted from the objects themselves to the effect of light upon those objects. In the twentieth century, light itself has even been used by artists as a primary medium.

The concentric circles of stone megaliths that form Stonehenge (circa 1800–1400 B.C.) on the Salisbury Plain in Wiltshire, England, have long intrigued all who have seen them. Stonehenge consists of an altarlike stone in the center of a ring of bluestones, outside of which stands a horseshoe of five lintel-topped pairs of sarsen stones. Beyond that, an outer circle of large, evenly spaced sarsen stones supports lintels. The sheer size of these stones is impressive; the megaliths of the horseshoe weigh 45–50 tons each. Even in its present damaged state, the structure manages to inspire awe and mystery. The fact that a heelstone beyond the outer circle is in line with the sun on Midsummer Day (the summer solstice, the longest day of the year) and forms a direct axis with the avenue of approach and the altar has led many to believe that this structure was an ancient temple for sun worshipers. Although this possible explanation for the structure has not been proved, belief in it proliferated in popular thought and romantic literature. To this day, latter-day Druids still gather to perform sun rituals at Stonehenge.

According to the ancient Egyptian cosmology, Atum, the sun god, rose out of Nu, the primitive darkness, to create the world. Heliopolis, or the City of the Sun, became the center of Atum’s worship in the Fifth Dynasty. Various other sun gods—Aten, Ptah of Memphis, Amun-Re—shared the name and/or cosmology, but it was not until the Eighteenth Dynasty that the pharaoh Akhenaton declared the sun disk the single god. This monotheistic aberration lasted only from 1372 until 1358 B.C., but it produced perhaps the most memorable artwork of the Amarna period. On a bas-relief in the Cairo Museum, Akhenaton, his wife, and his daughter are portrayed presenting offerings in worship to the sun disk. The three figures stand in a similar posture, with uplifted arms holding vases. Akhenaton, the tallest, wears the traditional white conical crown of Upper Egypt. Nefertiti, his queen, is about half his height, and their daughter is about half again as small as her mother. At the top of the relief, the circular sun disk emits long rays of light, represented by incisions in the stone, that end in hands, which provide a background for the silhouetted figure of Akhenaton. A similar sun disk and rays were rendered on the back of the throne of Tutankhamen, Akhenaton’s son-in-law.

There are few Greek or Roman works of art that depict light, but the writings of two philosophers, Plato and Plotinus, express a belief in the divine function of light that indirectly influenced Christian art for centuries. Plato compared the good to sunlight and its ability to generate and nourish (Republic, book 6). His followers extended this comment to see light as “the transcendental reality that engenders the universe and illuminates our intellect for the perception of truth” (Simson, p. 51). Neoplatonists, such as Plotinus, a philosopher living in third-century A.D. Rome, believed that the union of the soul with the “supreme one” would take place through the medium of light, which he identified with the sun. “The vision floods the eyes with light and sees, but it is not a light showing some other object,” he wrote. “The light is itself the vision” (Enneads, VI, 7.36). To Plotinus, “light and brightness act as a bridge between the terrestrial and the celestial” (James, p. 70). Through the writing of St. Augustine, St. Basil the Great, Pseudo-Dionysius, and others, the views of Plato and Plotinus were integrated into early Christian theology, which wholeheartedly embraced the importance of light.

Byzantine churches were conceived as great, dim, mysterious caverns of worship with flickering candles that reflect in the iconic mosaics that decorate the vaults of the church. The luminous interiors, rendered in emulation of the starry firmament, were often compared to heaven itself. Colored bits of glass in the mosaics were angled to catch the light, and the golden halos that outline the features of sacred personages add further radiance to the images. Many Byzantine churches, in their domes, have a huge mosaic of the Pantocrator (Christ as ruler and judge) who holds the Gospel of St. John, often open to reveal the text “I am the light of the world.”

When Abbot Suger built the Carolingian abbey of St. Denis outside of Paris in the twelfth century, he exchanged the mystical Byzantine gloom of flickering reflections from glass mosaics to a church that, in his own words, “would shine with wonderful and uninterrupted light.” The construction methods used by Gothic builders made possible the tall windows filled with the glorious colors of stained glass. The nearly 100 luminous windows in St. Denis not only suffuse the interior with colored light, but by incorporating scenes mainly from the Old Testament they also provide a narrative that underlines the effect of the light itself. Influenced by the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius, as presented in the writings of John Scotus Erigena, Suger designed the windows to contrast the obscurity of the Old Testament with the revelations of the Gospels. While the reading of the Gospels could illuminate the divine truth, the translucent windows acted like “veils, at once shrouding and revealing the ineffable” (Simson, p. 121). Plenty of blue glass, the most expensive color, and precious and semiprecious stones augmented the luminous effect of the windows. Suger promoted his belief that piety could be stimulated and enlightenment could be gained through the harmony, beauty, and imagery of his church, and especially through the effect of light. His friend Hugh of St. Victor compared stained-glass windows to the holy scriptures, letting the splendor of true light pass through them to enlighten those inside.

The innovative use of windows in St. Denis was repeated and embellished in many Gothic cathedrals. Elaborate iconographic programs, supplementing those of the sculptured portals, paintings, and carved capitals, turned churches into storybooks of religious doctrine, with the mysterious properties of light adding immeasurably to the spiritual experience. Chartres Cathedral in France, dedicated to the Virgin Mary as her residence on Earth and containing the relic of her sacred tunic, became a center of the cult of the Virgin. Not only is she the central figure in the famous rose window over the portal, but the crowned Virgin in Triumph as the queen of heaven is a theme repeated throughout Chartres. Mary’s perpetual virginity came to be compared to glass: for as light penetrates glass without violating it, so Christ was conceived and born without violating Mary’s virginity.

By the middle of the thirteenth century, the aesthetics and theology of light underlying the practical decisions of church building changed. The mysterious and potent divinity of light in the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius and Erigena gave way to St. Augustine’s theory of illumination, giving a greater role to reason and intelligence in knowing God. The windows of French churches and cathedrals began to contain more grisaille (clear glass) and less colored glass. This new rayonnant (radiant style) was associated with Louis IX and particularly with Sainte-Chapelle in Paris (1243–1248). In the upper chapel of Sainte-Chapelle, structural elements were reduced to a minimum, allowing more than three-fourths of the walls to be glass. Instead of giving one the sense of being inside a monumental luminous enclosure, as is the case with St. Denis, Sainte-Chapelle gives one the sense of floating elegantly through shimmering strips of radiance.

The glory of light shining through medieval stained glass and its association with the divine has never been equaled, but neither has this association been completely abandoned. The effective merging of light and stained glass has been exploited more recently by Edward Coley Burne-Jones in the Cathedral Church of St. Philip in Birmingham, England; John La Farge in Trinity Church in Boston; Antonio Gaudí in the Chapel of the Colonia Güell near Barcelona, Spain; and Le Corbusier in the windows of Notre-Dame-du-Haut at Ronchamp, France, among others.

The association of light with the divine, especially with the body of Jesus Christ, appeared in painting as well as architecture. Many early Renaissance paintings were particularly influenced by two written descriptions of the birth of Christ. The apocryphal Book of James describes the setting of the birth of Christ as a cave beneath a bright cloud. According to James, the light in the cave was so intense it could not be endured and withdrew only when the Christ Child was born. In another influential account of Christ’s birth, St. Bridget of Sweden told of a vision she had of Mary praying as the Christ Child was suddenly born amid a bright light.

In his predella Nativity (1413) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, Lorenzo Monaco painted the birth of Christ as a night scene. He placed a shed with an adoring ox and ass in front of the cave and angels in the background waking sleeping shepherds with the news. In the foreground, Mary kneels in prayer with Joseph on the right. In the center, the naked Christ Child lies on the ground with a gesture of blessing. His divinity is represented by his halo and by the golden rays of light that emanate from his body. Monaco used a similar composition for his identically titled Nativity, a predella that is part of The Coronation of the Virgin (1414) altarpiece now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy.

Nine years later, Gentile da Fabriano painted the Nativity predella for his Strozzi Altarpiece (1423), also in the Uffizi. In da Fabriano’s rendering, the shed has been moved to the side, and the ox and ass in front of the cave are kneeling by the manger. The Virgin is praying, while Joseph sleeps on the right side. The background here includes a star-studded sky as well as the angels and shepherds. On the left are the two midwives of St. Bridget of Sweden’s vision, one sleeping, the other watching the central scene in which the Christ Child lies naked on the ground in a pool of light composed of gold leaf and incised rays. What differentiates da Fabriano’s predella from Monaco’s is that the light from the Christ Child not only is indicative of his divinity, but it also serves to illuminate the surrounding figures, even casting a shadow on the shed. This same effect of the Christ Child providing the illumination for a night scene was used dramatically by later artists such as Geertgen tot Sint Jans in the Nativity (circa 1490) in the National Gallery in London; Gerard David in Birth of Christ (circa 1495) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; and Correggio in La Notte (1529–1530) in the Gemäldegalerie in Dresden, Germany.

Light and darkness evoke the holy dramatically in Matthias Grünewald’s Isenheim Altarpiece (circa 1510–1515) in the Unterlinden Museum in Colmar, France. The dark blue-black sky and darker mood of the Crucifixion vividly contrast with the explosion of light in the Annunciation, the Nativity, and especially in the Resurrection. In the luminescent Nativity, it is not the Christ Child who illuminates the scene, but a choir of angel musicians and a vision of the Trinity in the sky. The light is so bright, so jubilant, so uplifting in spirit, especially in the wake of the austere gloom of the Crucifixion, that it sweeps the viewer into the celebratory mood of the Resurrection. Here, the risen Christ is propelled upward in a globe of brilliant light, circumscribed by rainbow hues, the outline of his figure nearly obscured.

Near the end of the sixteenth century, light was used in a new way in religious painting. By placing biblical scenes in everyday settings, and by clothing biblical characters in the dress of the people, painters began to lend an intimacy and immediacy to their religious paintings that suggested Christian miracles were still possible. Light was still used to signify divinity, but that light often came from an identifiable source. In Jacopo Tintoretto’s Last Supper (1592–1594), in S. Giorgio

Maggiore in Venice, Italy, the 12 apostles are sitting at what could be an ordinary table in an Italian inn, served by servants the viewer might see on the street or during their own evening repast. To add to the domestic ordinariness of the scene, a cat and dog scavenge for scraps. The apostles are outlined by halos, but such naturalistic ones that they could almost be reflections from the overhead lamp. Only Christ's halo has the radiance to penetrate the generally dim interior scene. The lamp at the upper left of the painting sheds light onto the scene, its rays merging with those of Christ's halo, while its wisps of smoke metamorphose into ephemeral flying angels. Whereas light illuminates a seemingly ordinary scene in a natural way, its eerie glow also turns the scene into a spiritual event.

This technique, used so dramatically by Tintoretto, was raised to new heights by Caravaggio. Through his use of light and shade and through the naturalism of his figures, Caravaggio brought a new look to religious painting. In his Calling of St. Matthew (1597–1598), in S. Luigi dei Francesi in Rome, the setting is the bare, undecorated corner of a custom house where Matthew collects taxes. On the left, a group of five realistically painted figures sits around a table on which rest coins, a money bag, an ink pot, and an account book. Two figures enter on the left; one, barely distinguished by a thin circle of light around his head, points commandingly at Matthew, who in turn points at himself as if to ask, “Who, me?” The scene is illuminated by a diagonal bank of light that falls from just above the figures on the right to the faces of the group on the left. This light, not in itself blinding or dazzling, lends the necessary impact to Christ's commanding gesture and carries his call across the canvas to his chosen apostle. Caravaggio's naturalistic religious paintings—usually lit from the side or front against a dark undifferentiated background—deny the decorative beauty of former religious art, yet still highlight the drama of the extraordinary event rendered.

Georges de La Tour adopted a similar strategy of illuminating religious scenes with an identified source of light. Examples of his use of this lighting technique include the woman holding a torch in The Lamentation over St. Sebastian (1630s), in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin, as well as the young Jesus holding a candle to illuminate his father's work in Joseph the Carpenter (circa 1645), in the Louvre in Paris. Although La Tour's use of light is similar to Caravaggio's, the effect is different. Instead of the naturalistic energy of Caravaggio's figures, La Tour's figures emanate a serene, still, almost classical or abstract simplicity. In his Penitent Magdalen (circa 1638–1643), in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, a square mirror reflects a candle, doubly illuminating the quietly thoughtful Magdalen as she contemplates the skull in her lap and the reflected flame. Many other painters, Rembrandt van Rijn being perhaps the most notable, used light not only to illuminate scenes but to highlight the psychological depth of their compositions.

Throughout the history of art, painters have used one instance of natural light, the rainbow, as a phenomenon worthy of recording and as a sign of supernatural import. It was mentioned in the Bible in Ezekiel (1:28) and in the Revelation of St. John (4:3), and as a portent of hope and divine power the rainbow was associated with the story of Noah by manuscript illuminators as early as the sixth century (the Vienna Genesis), and as late as the fifteenth century (in the Norman Book of Hours, circa 1420–1450). In the sixteenth century, Grünewald, in the Stuppach Madonna (1517–1519), repeated the association of the rainbow with the Virgin made by St. Bonaventura (Laus Virginus, 6) and later by St. Bridget of Sweden in her visions (Revelations). In the seventeenth century, Peter Paul Rubens, in his Rainbow Landscape (1636–1638), seems to have been primarily interested in the rainbow as a natural phenomenon, while Jacob van Ruisdael in The Jewish Cemetery (1670s) used it for its association with transience. In the eighteenth century Angelica Kauffman, in her Self-Portrait as “Painting” placed the rainbow close to her raised arm so as to look as if she were actually painting the rainbow or perhaps dipping her brush into its vivid colors.

In the eighteenth century, Joseph Wright of Derby also made a specialty of scenes illuminated by natural light. He, however, painted not as an artist revealing the miracles of faith but as a man of the Enlightenment showing the discoveries of science. In A Philosopher Giving That Lecture on the Orrery, in Which a Lamp Is Put in Place of the Sun (before 1766), in the Derby Art Gallery, Wright depicts a lecturer—perhaps inspired by the traveling lecturer James Ferguson, who gave a series of lectures in Derby in 1762—pointing out the positions of the planets as they revolve around the sun. The audience around the orrery, some brightly illuminated and silhouetted by the lamp substituting for the sun, are intent (one even taking notes) on following the explanation. In An Experiment on a Bird in the Air Pump (1768), now in the National Gallery in London, Wright again painted the scene of a scientific demonstration with an audience around a table illuminated by a lamp. This time the demonstration, through the use of an air pump, shows the necessity of air, or oxygen, for life. A cockatoo in a glass globe, deprived of oxygen, flutters close to death. The faces surrounding the experiment hold a variety of expressions, including a young girl who hides her face in order not to see the struggling bird. The lecturer rests his hand on the stopcock of the pump, perhaps to revive the bird at the last possible moment.

In the nineteenth century, artists increasingly turned to science to help them understand the composition of light and its effects. Joseph Mallord William Turner read widely about theories of light and color, both for his own curiosity and for his lectures on perspective to the students at the Royal Academy in London. He also kept extensive observations in sketchbooks. The brilliant effects of these studies can be seen in all of his paintings, particularly in Fall of the Clyde (circa 1835), in the Lady Lever Art Gallery in Port Sunlight, England. Perhaps not so well known are the contemporary theories he studied. He was especially interested in the Theory of Colours (1810), a book by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, and painted two illustrations of the contrasting theories about shade and darkness, light and color. Like many of his other paintings, Turner turned to science and observation to understand the effects of light, but ultimately he used this knowledge to depict stories from mythology and the Bible. Turner's pair of paintings, Light and Colour (Goethe's Theory): The Morning After the Deluge—Moses Writing the Book of Genesis (1843) and Shade and Darkness: The Evening of the Deluge (1843), both in the Tate Gallery in London, reflect Goethe's table of polarities as well as Turner's own iconography of light and dark. However, as art historian John Gage argues, careful study of the paintings reveals Turner's growing disenchantment with theories and his increasing reliance upon his own observation.

Not all nineteenth-century painters were intrigued with science. A small number of American landscape painters, largely through the use of light, created unique paintings of such quiet perfection and equipoise that they evoked an atmosphere of sublime transcendence. Called luminists, Fitz Hugh Lane and Martin Johnson Heade reduced the size of their paintings, eradicated all brush strokes in a mirrorlike smoothness (especially in renderings of water), and permeated their paintings' atmospheres with a sense of uninterrupted, and unintermittable, silence. "Such paintings, in eliminating any reminders of the artist's intermediary presence, remove him even from his role of interpreter," art historian Barbara Novak has noted. "In their quiet tranquillity, they reach to a mystical oneness above time and outside of space. . . . Oneness with Godhead is complete" (Novak, p. 44). The transparent quality of their paintings could be said to allow a "higher light" to shine through to the viewer. In their silence and transcendence they have been associated with the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson, who believed, not unlike Plotinus and the makers of medieval stained glass, that "from within or from behind, a light shines through us upon things and makes us aware that we are nothing, but the light is all" (Emerson, as quoted in Novak, p. 43).

In the late nineteenth century, the impressionists used a combination of scientific light theory and observation in their revolutionary paintings, but they eschewed the mythological and literary allusions that Turner had so often appended to his paintings. Painting out of doors, the impressionists studied light as the source of their experience of color and often juxtaposed brush strokes of color to bathe forms in light and atmosphere, diffusing them in brush strokes and the vibrating light. Perhaps this effect is best demonstrated by the 30 views of Rouen Cathedral that Claude Monet painted at different times of the day, from different angles, between 1892 and 1894. The complicated iconographic program of the cathedral's sculptured facade is completely obscured by Monet's tones of reflected light. Instead of mimicking the cathedral's portal saints and Gothic tracery, Monet painted the enveloppe, "an invisible amalgamation of air, light, moisture and temperature that alters our perception of what we see" (Pissarro, p. 21).

In the twentieth century, artists saw that they could—quite literally—paint with light. Thomas Wilfred developed a "Clavilus" in 1921 with which he could project forms of colored light onto a screen. His compositions of light originally gained much sympathetic attention, but they often ran for days, exhausting even his ardent enthusiasts. Later in the century, artists such as Bruce Nauman, Dan Flavin, and Vardea Chryssa used laser beams and fluorescent and neon tubing; Nam June Paik experimented with holography; and the Pulsa Group used underwater strobe lamps. Even though they used light instead of paint as their primary media and focused on more abstract forms, these modern artists still used narrative themes to some extent. In Hanged Man (1985), a construction of neon tubes, Bruce Nauman shows a man change from a living figure, with an upright head and hanging penis, to a dead figure, with dropping head and erect penis, in three flashing sequences of neon light. In a simple and unadorned—not to mention ironic and confrontational—use of light as an icon, Nauman's Window or

Wall Sign (1967) places the blue neon words "the true artist helps the world by revealing mystic truths" in a spiral underlined by orange tubing. Its message in light is one of postmodern commentary still resonant with the medieval blue glass windows of Abbot Suger's St. Denis.

See also Dawn/Dawning; Light I: The Lamp in the Niche; Night

Selected Works of Art

Light as Manifestation of the Holy: The Ancient World
Stonehenge, stone circles, circa 1800–1400 B.C., Wiltshire, England, Salisbury Plain

Offering to the Sun Disk (Akhenaton and His Family Worshipping the Sun Disk), bas-relief, end of XVIII Dynasty, circa 1370 B.C., Cairo, Egyptian Museum
Tutankhamen and His Queen in Front of the Sun Disk, throne backrest of wood, covered with gold leaf and glass and stone inlays, from Throne of Tutankhamen, XVIII Dynasty, circa 1355–1342 B.C., Cairo, Egyptian Museum

Light as Manifestation of the Holy: Mosaic and Stained Glass

The Good Shepherd, mosaic, fifth century, Ravenna, Italy, Mausoleum of Galla Placidia

The Virgin and Child, mosaic, sixth or seventh century, Kiti, Cyprus, Panagia Angelokristos

Christ Pantocrator, narthex mosaic, ninth century, Istanbul, Turkey, Hagia Sophia

Christ Pantocrator, mosaic panel, circa 1080–1100, Daphni, Greece, Church of the Dormition, central dome

Christ Pantocrator, mosaic in dome of apse, circa 1148, Cefalù, Sicily, Cathedral

Abbey Church of St. Denis, stained-glass windows, 1140–1144, near Paris

Rose Windows, stained-glass windows, twelfth century, Chartres, France, Cathedral

Upper Chapel, stained-glass windows, 1243–1248, Paris, Sainte-Chapelle

La Farge, John, stained-glass windows, 1877–1878, Boston, Trinity Church

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, stained-glass windows, 1896, Birmingham, England, St. Philip

Gaudí, Antonio, stained-glass windows, 1898–1914, near Barcelona, Spain, Colonia Güell Chapel

Le Corbusier, stained-glass windows, 1950–1955, Ronchamp, France, Notre-Dame-du-Haut

Light as Manifestation of the Holy: Paintings

Lorenzo Monaco, Nativity, predella panel, 1413, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Lorenzo Monaco, Nativity, predella panel, from Coronation of the Virgin, 1414, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Gentile da Fabriano, Flight into Egypt, predella panel, from Strozzi Altarpiece, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Martino di Bartolommeo, St. Bridget's Vision of the Birth of Christ, before 1434, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Geertgen tot Sint Jans, Nativity, circa 1490, London, National Gallery
 David, Gerard, Birth of Christ, circa 1495, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Gemäldegalerie
 Correggio, La Notte, 1529–1530, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Grünewald, Matthias, Isenheim Altarpiece, circa 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden
 Raphael, Liberation of St. Peter from Prison, 1513, Vatican, Stanza d'Eliodoro

Natural Light with Symbolic Meaning

Tintoretto, Jacopo, Last Supper, 1592–1594, Venice, Italy, San Giorgio Maggiore
 Caravaggio, Calling of St. Matthew, 1597–1598, Rome, San Luigi dei Francesi, Contarelli Chapel
 Caravaggio, Conversion of St. Paul, 1602, Rome, Santa Maria del Popolo
 Rembrandt van Rijn, A Man in a Room, 1624–1632, London, National Gallery
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Supper at Emmaus, circa 1628–1630, Paris, Musée Jacquemart-André
 La Tour, Georges de, The Lamentation over St. Sebastian, 1630s, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
 La Tour, Georges de, The Penitent Magdalen, circa 1638–1643, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 La Tour, Georges de, Magdalene with the Smoking Flame, circa 1640, Los Angeles, California, County Art Museum
 La Tour, Georges de, Joseph the Carpenter, circa 1645, Paris, Louvre
 Wright, Joseph, of Derby, A Philosopher Giving That Lecture on the Orrery, in Which a Lamp Is Put in Place of the Sun, before 1766, Derby, England, Derby Art Gallery
 Wright, Joseph, of Derby, An Experiment on a Bird in an Air Pump, 1768, London, National Gallery
 Hopper, Edward, Lighthouse at Two Lights, 1929, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

The Rainbow

God's Covenant with Noah, illuminated manuscript, Vienna Genesis, sixth century, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Nationalbibliothek (Cod. Theol. Graec. 31, fol. 5)
The Story of Noah, illuminated manuscript, eleventh century, from Paraphrase of the Pentateuch and Joshua, by Aelfric, London, British Library (Ms. Cotton Claudius B.IV, fol. 16v)
Noah's Ark, illuminated manuscript, circa 1430–1450, from the Book of Hours, Oxford, England, Bodleian Library (MS Auct D, Inf. 2.11, fol. 59v)
 Grünewald, Matthias, Stuppach Madonna, 1517–1519, Stuppach, Germany, St. Maria
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Rainbow Landscape, 1636–1638, London, Wallace Collection
 Ruysdael, Jacob van, The Jewish Cemetery, 1670s, Detroit, Michigan, Institute of Art
 Turner, J. M. W., Landscape with Windmill and Rainbow, circa 1795–1800, London, Tate Gallery
 Schinkel, Friedrich Karl, Medieval Town on a River, 1815, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Nationalgalerie

Constable, John, Stonehenge, watercolor, 1836, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
 Church, Frederick Edwin, Landscape with Rainbow, 1866, San Francisco, California, Palace of the Legion of Honour
 Marc, Franz, Blue Horses with Rainbow, watercolor, 1913, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Luminism

Bingham, George Caleb, Fur Traders Descending the Missouri, 1845, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Lane, Fritz Hugh, Western Shore with Norman's Woe, 1862, Gloucester, Massachusetts, Cape Anne Historical Association
 Heade, Martin Johnson, Twilight Spouting Rock Beach, 1863, John D. Rockefeller Collection
 Lane, Fritz Hugh, Brace's Rock, Eastern Point, Gloucester, 1863, private collection

The Science of Light

Turner, J. M. W., Fall of the Cylde, circa 1835, Port Sunlight, England, Lady Lever Art Gallery
 Turner, J. M. W., Light and Colour (Goethe's Theory): The Morning After the Deluge—Moses Writing the Book of Genesis, 1843, London, Tate Gallery
 Turner, J. M. W., Shade and Darkness: The Evening of the Deluge, 1843, London, Tate Gallery
 Seurat, Georges, Afternoon on the Island of La Grande Jatte, 1884–1886, Chicago, Art Institute
 Monet, Claude, Rouen Cathedral, 30 paintings, 1892–1894, in various museums and private collections

Light as Medium

Wilfred, Thomas, Aspiration, Op. 145, projected light, 1955, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Wilfred, Thomas, Lunia Suite, Op. 158, projected light, 1963–1964, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Chryssa, Vardea, The Gates to Times Square, neon sculptures, circa 1966–1967, New York, Pace Gallery
 Nauman, Bruce, Window or Wall Sign: The True Artist Helps the World by Revealing Mystic Truths, 1967, blue and peach neon tubing, Otterloo, The Netherlands, Kröller-Müller Museum
 Antonakos, Stephen, Walk-On Neon, neon panels under Plexiglas, 1968, New York, Fishbach Gallery
 Pula Group, Installation, strobe lights, 1968, Boston, Boston Garden
 Flavin, Dan, Pink and Gold, fluorescent tubes, 1969, Chicago, Museum of Contemporary Art
 Paik, Nam June, Holography-Horrorgraphy, Plus-Minus Silence, before 1970, New York, Bonino Gallery
 Chryssa, Vardea, That's All, neon, Plexiglas, 1970–1973, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Nauman, Bruce, Hanged Man, neon tubing, 1985, Düsseldorf, Germany, Konrad Fischer Gallery

Further Reading

Adams, Henry, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1959

- Boyer, Carl Benjamin, The Rainbow: From Myth or Mathematics, London and New York: Thames and Hudson 1989
- Gage, John, Colour and Culture: Practice and Meaning from Antiquity to Abstraction, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1993
- _____, Color in Turner: Poetry in Truth, New York: Praeger, 1969
- Gottlieb, Carlo, The Window in Art: From the Window of God to the Vanity of Man: A Survey of Window Symbolism in Western Painting, New York: Abaris, 1981
- Grabar, Andre, "The Virgin in a Mandorla of Light," in Late Classical and Medieval Studies in Honor of A.M. Friend Jr., K. Weitzmann, ed.
- Greenler, R., Rainbows, Halos, and Glories, Reading, Massachusetts: Blue Sky, 1980
- Hess, Thomas B., and John Ashbery, editors, Light, from Aten to Laser, in Art News Annual XXXV (1969)
- Hills, Paul, The Light of Early Italian Painting, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1987
- James, Liz, Light and Colour in Byzantine Art, Oxford: Clarendon, 1996
- Johnson, James Rosser, The Radiance of Chartres, New York: Random House, 1965
- Novak, Barbara, Nature and Culture: American Landscape and Painting, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1980
- Pissarro, Joachim, Monet's Cathedral, New York: Knopf, 1990
- Schweizer, P. D., "John Constable, Rainbow Science, and English Color Theory," Art Bulletin LXIV (1982)
- Simon, Otto von, The Gothic Cathedral: Origins of Gothic Architecture and the Medieval Concept of Order, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1933
- Sowers, Richard, "On the Blues of Chartres," Art Bulletin XLVIII (1966)
- Spate, Virginia, Orphism: The Evolution of Non-figurative Painting in Paris, Oxford: Clarendon, 1979
- Tarrant, D., "Greek Metaphors of Light," Classical Quarterly, N.S. 19 (1960)
- Whitechapel Art Gallery and Kunsthalle, Basel, Bruce Nauman, London: Whitechapel, 1986

LOGOS/WORD

Erika Cruikshank-Dodd

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Logos/Word:

CLASSICAL

CHRISTIAN

MUSLIM

The Word in the Sacred Koran, Islamabad, Pakistan, Faisal Mosque. (Courtesy of the author)

“In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God” (John 1:1). In this passage from the New Testament Gospel According to John, the English word “word” is a translation from the Greek logos, and this translation conveys a specifically Christian interpretation. In Greek, logos meant “word,” but it also meant “order” or “reason,” and it was used to indicate the divine order of the universe more often than the written word. In the early centuries of Christianity, the representation of this Logos created problems that were sharply focused in the quarrels of iconoclasm. The problems of the image were then inherited by the Muslims, who discovered a solution that was particularly appropriate for Islam.

The Logos had a long history. As early as the sixth century B.C. the philosopher Xenophanes complained about anthropomorphism in the Greek religion, for to give God the form of man was to give Him limits: “. . . if oxen, horses, and lions had hands, or could paint with their hands and fashion works as men do, horses would paint horselike images of gods and oxen oxlike ones and each would fashion bodies like their own. . . . The Ethiopians consider the gods flat-nosed and black; the Thracians blue-eyed and red-haired.” Later classical philosophers, among them Plato, pursued this line of thought to the conception of a single God who became equated with the mind, rather than with the physical human shape, or with the classical Logos, meaning reason and order. For these writers, it was the intellectual capacity of humans, reason—the Logos—that resembled the divine, not the body. Then the identification of God with reason, or the word, called into question how to represent artistically and symbolically the presence of God, or the Logos, without drawing Him in human shape. Later classical philosophers, in particular the Stoics, associated the Logos with the natural order of the universe and represented it by means of pastoral landscapes, ideally peaceful and minutely detailed, as in the “Alexandrian” sculptures or the landscapes of Pompeii.

A more conventional way to represent the classical Logos was with a human shape with superhuman, Godlike proportions through the physical person of the Emperor-God, like the colossal statue of the Emperor Constantine. Indeed, the representation of God in human form was never entirely abandoned. Pagan writers developed a polemic in defense of human images, and these arguments were reused extensively by the iconophiles during the later quarrels of iconoclasm. Meanwhile, however, the problem acquired new direction at the hands of early Christians living in lands dominated by Judeo-classical thought.

The first Christians, in particular St. John the Apostle, extended the classical term Logos, meaning “reason,” to include its more literal Greek meaning: “word.” This wider interpretation, which was rapidly adopted by the first church fathers, enabled John and his followers to include in the classical meaning of the term the Jewish tradition of divine revelation contained in “the book,” which was certainly the word of God. The problem was then how to represent this word.

The polemic over images was thus given new direction and, by the eighth century A.D., it erupted in the iconoclast controversy. At the center of the quarrel was the representation of God, or how to represent Him without confining Him to the shape of man. The most interesting aspect of this struggle is the vocabulary used to describe His image: in their description of the image of God, the words of the church fathers were virtually interchangeable with the image. For example: “We enjoy the presence of the saints in their writings, in which we have images, not of their bodies, but of their souls, since their words are images of their souls . . .” (St. John Chrysostom, fifth century); or, “The representations of the Saints are not our Gods, but books which lie open and are venerated in churches in order to remind us of God and to lead us to worship Him” (Leo, Bishop of Neapolis, seventh century). Such writing, indeed, suggested the literal portrayal of the word as an alternative to the human figure to represent the presence of the divine.

For centuries, ancient classical tradition had used words to interpret pictures, and in late antiquity when pictures became more complicated and difficult to understand, more words were necessary to explain their meaning. There were two common traditions in classical representation of divine law that became well established by the fifth and sixth centuries A.D. In late antique art, pictures or scenes taken from pagan myths were not in themselves sufficient to provide moral guidance; consequently, inscriptions were increasingly necessary to point out the moral value or meaning of one of the traditional myths. A typical example is provided by the very common depiction of the marriage of Aphrodite and Ares in the domain of Hephaestus (Odyssey, VIII: 266–270). As it is shown on a pavement in Chahba-Philippopolis in Syria, the marriage of the goddess of love and the god of war had an obvious moral message that was made more explicit by the inclusion of personifications of Charity, Well-Being, and Wisdom, each of which is explained by a title.

More interesting was the development of a practice in classical architecture whereby inscriptions were used to indicate the function of a particular space in a building or the purpose of a room and thus give directions to the person inhabiting that space. For example, at Anemurium, in Asia Minor, people entering a third-century bath were greeted with the inscription, “Have a good bath!” On leaving this room, they stepped over the inscription, “You have had a good bath!” These belong to a long tradition in the Greek East and have many counterparts in the Latin West.

By the fourth and fifth centuries, inscriptions could even replace figural representation altogether. Some pavements were decorated with personifications of a joyful or bountiful world, and inscriptions were added to indicate what figure was represented, as in the fourth-century triclinos at Apamea, Syria, where a figure of Ge, goddess of the earth, dominates the center of the room with a bountiful cornucopia. In a small building adjacent to the cathedral at Apamea, however, the representation of the personification is left out altogether to be replaced by the inscription "EUXRW," meaning "well-being." The same thing happens in a late antique mosaic in Damascus, Syria, depicting a hunt, where the inscription "LEO" indicates a lion in the hunt but the lion itself is not represented.

In spite of the prohibition of images in Jewish tradition, and apart from the use of certain specifically Jewish symbols, like the menorah and the ethrog, the decoration of ancient Jewish synagogues more or less conformed to the prevailing artistic trends of the Hellenistic environment and there was no specifically Jewish interpretation of "word." Jewish pavements in the second and third centuries A.D. were decorated, like the early Christian church pavements, with the representation of paradise.

The peaceable kingdom represented on the walls and on the floors of churches was a reward awaiting the faithful for their life in the way of the church. Occasionally this paradise was accompanied with explanatory verses from Isaiah. For example, again at Anemurium, a fifth-century mosaic depicts the peaceful kingdom of Isaiah, along with a leopard and a kid, and this is accompanied with a quotation from Isaiah about the kingdom (Isaiah 11:6–9). Among the symbols of this divine universe were specifically Christian symbols, like the cross or the fish and the letters A and W. Other mosaics among the church pavements illustrate other verses from the scriptures, and these, like the earlier Roman examples, indicate the function of the different parts of the building. Particularly effective in this respect are inscriptions in the atrium of a church or on the doorsill. For example, a mosaic inscription from a church on the Mount of Olives reads: "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in . . ." (Psalm 121:8).

A water cistern in the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem is inscribed: "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters" (Psalm 29:3). The water, in this case, probably served for baptism in the church. Again, a mosaic pavement in the diaconia (deacon's room) in Jerash, Jordan, is inscribed:

Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me: for I am poor and needy. Preserve my soul; for I am holy: O thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee. Be merciful unto me, O Lord: for I cry unto thee daily. (Psalm 86: 1–3)

In the center of this panel are words from the evening prayer, the Vulgate: "Of thy holy temple, Thou shalt shew us wonderful things in thy righteousness."

Used in this way, the inscriptions gave meaning to the spaces in ways that no pictorial illustration could achieve. They underlined and explained or gave direction to the generally vague and repetitive themes of paradise displayed in the mosaics. The choice of the inscription, and its placement in the church, supported the purpose of the room and also responded to the liturgy. In other words, phrases were taken from the liturgy and written in the appropriate place in the church so that the participants in the service read their part of the service, as it were, in the location of the script.

It comes as no surprise that when the Muslims conquered the great centers of Damascus, Jerusalem, and Hama, they built their own religious centers patterned on older models and used local Byzantine craftsmen to decorate them. So the Dome of the Rock, in Jerusalem, and the Omayyad Mosque, in Damascus, were decorated like the Christian churches, with visions of the paradise that waited as a reward for the followers of Islam. This paradise was portrayed like a Christian paradise, with flowers, vines, fruity delights, water, and fruit-bearing trees. The only major difference between the decoration of Christian churches and the decoration of the first mosques lay in that, from the beginning, Islam was firmly iconoclastic and no figural representations were permitted within the religious precinct. In the early years of Islam, figures were commonplace outside the mosque, as, for example, in the Omayyad palaces. In the mosque itself, the only indication that this was a Muslim building, rather than a Christian or Jewish one, was the absence of specifically Christian or Jewish symbols like the menorah or the cross and the presence of words from the Koran. In place of figures, and to give specific meaning to the decoration, inscriptions from the Koran underlined the architectural parts and explained the decoration in much the same way as in contemporary Christian churches described above. Inscribed in the Dome of the Rock are the verses that proclaimed the new faith as the true path for all the peoples of the book living in the holy city:

The Messiah, Jesus, son of Mary, was only the Messenger of God, and his Word that He committed to Mary, and a spirit from Him So believe in God and his Messengers, and say not, "Three." Refrain; better is it for you.
God is only one God. Glory be to Him—that He should have a son!
(Koran 4:170–172)

The use of the holy word to decorate the mosque was particularly appropriate for Islam because, unlike the Christian tradition, the text of the Koran was the only revelation. For Jews, God revealed himself to Moses in the form of the law; for Christians, God was revealed in the person of Christ; but for Muslims the revelation was the book, a tradition to which all the peoples of the book—Jews, Christians, and Muslims—belonged.

The patterns thus laid for the decoration in the first mosques established a precedent and a direction for the future of Islamic art. In time, over the following centuries and throughout the whole Islamic world, the word was no longer an explanation for a picture, nor just the description of a space, but achieved absolute predominance so that it became the focal point of direction in a building, or, in the case of a small object, it explained the purpose and defined the form of that object. In the Mosque of Sultan Hassan in Cairo, Egypt (A.D. 1356–1362), for example, inscriptions are used boldly over most of the transitional elements of the architecture, in the arches, niches, doorways, and domes, as well as around the main halls. At the entrance to this mosque, over the doorway, is an invitation for all to enter for prayer, an indication of direction for prayer, a description of the obligations for a good Muslim, the purpose of the building and the use of inscriptions in it, and even an explanation for the inscriptions:

The likeness of His Light is as the lamp in a niche,
in temples God has allowed to be raised up,
and His Name to be commemorated therein;
therein glorifying Him, in the mornings and the evenings,
are men whom neither commerce nor trafficking
diverts from the remembrance of God
and to perform the prayer, and to pay the alms.
(Koran 34:36–37)

Other inscriptions in this mosque are chosen with great care for their meaning and placement in the building, so that the architectural structure becomes a support for the word. When believers enter, they are reminded of their obligations and rewards and warned of the punishments in the world to come. Centuries earlier, early Christians decorated their churches with Holy Scripture in a similar but more primitive fashion. In both cases, the architecture becomes the house into which believers enter to receive the explanation and their instructions along the path for the next world.

An essential tenet of Islam is the unity of God, so that the distinction between secular and sacred is never precise and the difference in decoration between secular and sacred buildings is not distinguished except by content. Recently, for example, the emir of Kuwait decorated his private sailing ship with an emblem containing words from the Koran: “And He subjected to you the ships to run upon the sea at His commandment . . .” (Koran 14:32). Against the background of the greatest earth-filled dam in the world, completed in 1970, curbing the mighty Indus River at Tarbela, Pakistan, white stone dramatically spells the words: “And He subjected to you the rivers” (Koran 14:32). Used in this way, the words recall the verses from the Bible in the Holy Sepulchre (the transition from Christian to Muslim inscriptions is examined in more detail in Light I: The Lamp in the Niche). At some periods of Islam, rich floral or patterned decoration underlined the inscriptions, and at other times, when puritan impulses dominated the community, the inscriptions were relatively few and unadorned.

Many centuries have passed since Greek inscriptions were used in the baths at Anemurium to describe the function of space and to direct or involve the inhabitant in that space. Over the following centuries, in areas dominated by iconoclastic thinking, pictorial representations gradually gave way to biblical phrases in the church that spelled out a specifically Christian view of the universe. When, in Islam, the inscriptions acquired the full implications of divine order and the word of god underlined every curve of the decoration, then, indeed, the word became image.

See also Judaism; Light I: The Lamp in the Niche; Offering; Order/Chaos; Sanctuary

Selected Works of Art

Classical

The Marriage of Aphrodite and Ares in the Domain of Hephaestus, pavement, third century A.D., Chahba-Philippopolis, Syria

Inscriptions, third century A.D., Anemurium, Asia Minor

Inscription, fourth century B.C., Apamea, Mesopotamia, Triclinos

EUXRW, inscription, fourth century A.D., Apamea, Mesopotamia, Cathedral

Christian

The Peaceable Kingdom, mosaic, fifth century A.D., Anemurium, Asia Minor

Inscription, fifth or early sixth century A.D., Mount of Olives, Jerusalem, Church

Inscription from a Cistern, fifth or sixth century A.D., Jerusalem, Holy Sepulchre Inscription, mosaic, sixth century A.D., Jerash, Jordan, Diaconia

Muslim

Inscriptions, seventh century A.D., Jerusalem, Dome of the Rock

Inscription, eighth century A.D., Damascus, Syria, Omayyad Mosque

Inscriptions, fourteenth century, Cairo, Egypt, Mosque of Sultan Hassan

Emblem, twentieth century, sailing vessel belonging to the Emir of Kuwait

Inscription, 1970, Tarbela Dam, Pakistan

Further Reading

Bagatti, B., “Espressioni bibliche nelle antiche iscrizioni Cristiane della Palestina,” Studii biblici franciscani III (1952–1953)

Balty, Janine, Mosaïques antiques de Syrie, Brussels, Belgium, 1977

Cruikshank-Dodd, Erika, “The Image of the Word,” Berytus XVIII (1969)

Jalabert, P., “Citations bibliques,” Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne 1:2 (1914)

Piccirillo, Michele, I mosaici de Giordania, Rome: Feltrinelli, 1986

Russell, James, The Mosaic Inscriptions of Anemurium, Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaften, 13, Vienna, Austria: Verlag de Österreichischen, 1987

LOVE AND DEATH

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Love and Death:

ADMETUS AND ALCESTIS

ORPHEUS AND EURYDICE

PYRAMUS AND THISBE

DIDO AND AENEAS

PROCRIS AND CEPHALUS

VENUS AND ADONIS

DIANA AND ENDYMION

BACCHUS AND ARIADNE

MARS AND RHEA SILVIA

CUPID AND PSYCHE

STRUGGLE OF OPPOSITES

George Frederic Watts, Orpheus and Eurydice, circa 1869–1872, oil on canvas, bequest of Grenville L. Winthrop, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum. (Courtesy of the Harvard University Art Museums, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

A great love goes beyond the shores of death.
(Propertius, Cynthia monobiblos, 7:11)

During the Renaissance, Neoplatonic philosophers such as Marsilio Ficino and Pico della Mirandola expressed concepts of love by means of classical myths. For Pico della Mirandola in particular, myths were a storehouse of secret wisdom veiled in allegory that, if deciphered, would reveal the meaning of the universe. In paintings such as Titian's Venus and Adonis (1540) at the Prado in Madrid, Spain, and Piero di Cosimo's Procris and Cephalus (1510) at the National Gallery in London, myths served a very similar function.

Several important aspects of love and death representations are discussed below: the relevant Greek myths, the ancient visual sources (Roman sarcophagi) employed by Renaissance artists, the links between Renaissance paintings and Roman sarcophagi, and the philosophical issues involved with this theme. A few comments will also be made on later paintings using these same classical sources.

The theme of Eros-Thanatos, or love and death, was a significant one in antiquity (Flaceliere, p. 54; de Rougemont, p. 94–108; Hyde, p. 13–86; Wolters, p. 189–99). For the classical lyric poets, Eros was the personification of physical desire. Although cruel and unpredictable, he embodied qualities such as beauty and youth that inspired love. By contrast, Thanatos was the personification of eternal sleep or death (Flaceliere, p. 54; de Rougemont, pp. 94–108; Hyde, pp. 13–86; Wolters, pp. 189–199). Four Greek myths told of the mysterious relation between love and death: Admetus and Alcestis, Protesilaus and Laodamia, Orpheus and Eurydice, and Pyramus and Thisbe. These myths all illustrate an ideal concept of love, the concept of love as stronger than death. These myths are also all love stories that emphasize the sacrificial aspect of love. In each the lover attempts to rescue a beloved, but with a tragic outcome. With the exception of Orpheus and Eurydice and Pyramus and Thisbe, visual representations of these sorts of love-death themes in Italian Renaissance art are rare.

A brief review of these Greek myths will be helpful in this discussion of love and death. The ancient love story of Admetus and Alcestis (Alceste) was recounted in Euripides' play Alceste (438 B.C.). Alcestis was a beautiful woman, daughter of Pelias and wife of Admetus, king of Pherae in Thessaly. According to Robert Graves in The Greek Myths (1960), it is not clear why Admetus omitted the customary sacrifice to Artemis, goddess of the moon and twin sister of Apollo, before marrying Alcestis, but the goddess was quick to punish him. Upon entering the bridal chamber, Admetus found snakes in the bed instead of his beloved Alcestis. After imploring Apollo to help him, Admetus was permitted to offer the neglected sacrifice, and Artemis promised that, when the day of Admetus's death came, he would be spared on condition that a member of his family died voluntarily for love of him. This fatal day came sooner than the pair expected, and for love of Admetus, Alcestis took poison and went to Hades.

A second important love story from antiquity is based on Protesilaus, a Thessalian prince. According to Homer, Protesilaus was the first Greek to be killed upon landing at Troy, and his death left his wife Laodamia mourning and their house unfinished. The Latin poets Catullus and Virgil later romanticized the tale by placing Laodamia among unhappy lovers in the underworld. In Ovid's The Heroides (circa 20 B.C.), Laodamia is granted a prayer after Protesilaus dies that allows the shade of her husband be restored to her for three hours. After her brief respite from mourning is over, however, she kills herself rather than be parted from Protesilaus again.

Popular in ancient times, the drama of Orpheus and Eurydice regained favor during the Renaissance and has remained popular. Orpheus was a Thracian poet whose wife, Eurydice, was bitten in the ankle by a viper on their wedding day and died. Inconsolable, Orpheus sought his bride in the underworld, where the beauty of his song and lyre playing so moved Pluto and Persephone, the king and queen of Hades, that they granted him the right to lead Eurydice back to Earth with him. But they set one condition: he must not look back at her until the pair had reached the surface of the Earth, or else his bride would again be taken from him. As the pair neared the end of their ascent from the underworld, Ovid wrote in the Metamorphoses (early first century A.D.):

And, fearing lest she faint, longing to look,
He turned his eyes—and straight she slipped away.
He stretched his arms to hold her—to be held—
And clasped, poor soul, naught but the yielding air.
And she, dying again, made no complaint
(For what complaint had she save she was loved?)
And breathed a faint farewell, and turned again
Back to the land of spirits whence she came.
(Metamorphoses, X, 56–63)

Marcantonio Raimondi, the Bolognese engraver of the Italian Renaissance whose prints disseminated a knowledge of Raphael's and Giulio Romano's works across Europe, illustrated the love story of Orpheus and Eurydice in an inventively composed engraving of 1509 (Shoemaker, pp. 86–87). The lovers stand next to the mouth of the underworld while Orpheus concentrates upon his music. He has not yet broken his promise to Pluto and Persephone, and Eurydice looks away pensively, perhaps with some premonition that she will die a second time.

The popularity of this theme extended to the decoration of Italian majolica plates. Orpheus and Eurydice (1530) at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, a plate originating from Castel Deruta, shows Raimondi's composition in reverse. On the rim of the plate, a symmetrical composition of grotesqueries incorporates sphinxes, cherubs, dolphins, scrolled stems, flowers, and putti riding on monsters.

The love story of Pyramus and Thisbe was almost unknown in classical literature except through Ovid's Metamorphoses (IV, 55ff). The two lovers, next-door neighbors in Babylon, were forbidden by their parents to marry but still frequently spoke to one another in secret through a crack in the wall. Eventually they arranged to meet at the tomb of Nisus outside the city walls, under a white mulberry tree. Thisbe arrived first but was frightened by a lion returning from its kill. As she quickly fled into a cave, Thisbe dropped her cloak, which the lion mauled. Upon his arrival, Pyramus found the tattered and blood-stained cloak marked with the animal's prints, concluded that his beloved was dead, and stabbed himself with his own sword. Thisbe emerged from the cave, became distraught at the sight of the dying Pyramus, and likewise fell upon his sword. Their blood then merged and flowed to the roots of the mulberry tree, which thereafter bore dark red fruit.

Pyramus and Thisbe (1505), presently at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, is Raimondi's first dated engraving. The engraving tenderly depicts the tragic moment when Thisbe discovers the suicide of her beloved Pyramus and prepares to take her own life. Baldassare Manara of Faenza illustrates the same theme in a broth bowl (1532–1535), presently at the Petit Musée in Paris. The cover to the bowl features a rocky landscape of a sarcophagus, a tree, a town, and mountains in the distance. Pyramus, dead on the ground, lies with blood streaming from his side. Thisbe, her left arm raised, stands over him, about to fall upon his sword. Around the double-profiled yellow rim, interspaces are filled with foliage and an inscription in blue: "Quel che volsse expugnare il Paradiso; Quel che cacho amazzo de furia acesse; Quel che qual salamandra la via presse in megio al focho col figlio et anchiso" (Rasmussen, pp. 45–47).

There are two types of ancient love stories that emphasize the gods' involvement in the passions of love and death, both commonly represented in Italian Renaissance art. The first concerns the interference of the gods or goddesses in the love between mortals, as in the legends of Dido and Aeneas and Procris and Cephalus. The second concerns the love of a god or goddess for a mortal, as in the tales of Diana, the goddess of the hunt, and Endymion, the handsome shepherd; Venus, the goddess of love, and Adonis; Mars, the god of war, and Rhea Silvia, the vestal virgin; and Bacchus, the god of wine, and Ariadne, King Minos's daughter.

Myths of love and death involving gods or goddesses interfering with mortal lovers occur in the writings of Virgil and Hesiod. Virgil tells of Venus and Juno, wife of the king of the gods, collaborating to bring about the turbulent love affair between Dido, the queen of Carthage, in North Africa, and Aeneas, the Trojan exile (Aeneid, IV). Juno wanted to divert the Trojans from Italy, while Venus wanted Dido to treat Aeneas and the Trojans with kindness. According to the goddesses' plan, Aeneas and Dido hunted together early one dawn, when loud thunder was heard and a downpour began. In search of shelter, the pair took refuge in a cave. From that moment on Aeneas forgot his destiny and devoted himself to Dido and her political aims in Carthage, until an angered Jupiter sent Mercury, his messenger, to prod Aeneas for his self-indulgent passion. Reminded of his destiny, Aeneas quickly departed from Africa. Dido, devastated by his departure, had a high funeral pyre built in the courtyard of her palace, on which she put the bed they had shared and the clothes and sword that Aeneas had left behind, claiming she wanted to burn all reminders of him. But when the pyre was set ablaze, Dido "raging and pale with her approaching death climbed the high funeral pyre." There she drew Aeneas's dagger and threw herself upon it. As Aeneas sailed away, "he looked back to see the walls of the city resplendent with ill-fated Dido's flames."

This myth was engraved by Raimondi in Dido (1510). The print portrays Dido on the funeral pyre in the midst of her suicidal act. Raimondi placed the fire to the right of Dido who is plunging a dagger into her breast. A Greek quotation from Xanto, "A famous death lives on," elucidates the moral of the suicide. There is an Italian majolica coppa by Castel Durante (1520), now at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, that is an adaptation of Raimondi's engraving and the quotation. In this case the Greek inscription reads: "The beautiful Dido receives Aeneas at Carthage." Durante (also known as Deruta) enriches the architecture in his rendition, sets the scene in the open air, and adds the figure of Ascanius, Aeneas's son.

The story of Procris and Cephalus is told as early as the writings of Hesiod but in much greater detail by Ovid. Cephalus, an Attic hero and the husband of Procris, was one of the lovers of Aurora, goddess of the dawn. Although Aurora released him as a lover, she rendered his wife extremely jealous of the time he spent hunting. Procris eventually followed her husband to the woods, where she heard him pray for a breeze, and imagined that he was addressing his mistress (Aurora, the personification of the breeze). As Procris drew closer, Cephalus mistook the rustling underbrush for an animal concealed in the forest and hurled his javelin, which never missed owing to its divine power. Procris was slain.

It is difficult to find a Roman sarcophagus of this narrative, but in Italian Renaissance paintings it is well represented. Piero di Cosimo illustrates the tragic death of Procris in the Mythological Scene (1510), at the National Gallery of London. The artist selected the passage from Ovid when Procris is pierced though the breast by her husband's javelin. In the painting, the mortally wounded woman is mourned not only by her husband, but also by his hunting dog. By contrast, Paolo Veronese, in his Procris and Cephalus (1540s), at the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Strasbourg, France, depicts the moment just before Procris dies, the despairing Cephalus consoling her in her suffering. Both Piero di Cosimo and Veronese successfully fuse the two concepts of love and agony into one tragedy.

In her book The Greek Spirit in Renaissance Art (1953), art historian Lucie Simpson explains that Italian Renaissance artists employed Greek myths primarily to express their new ideas about art. The extent to which Renaissance artists understood the subjects of mythological sarcophagus reliefs is not known. Art historians Phyllis Bober and Ruth Rubenstein, in Renaissance Artists and Antique Sculpture (1986), theorize that it may well have been Manuel Chrysoloras, a learned and greatly admired Byzantine scholar who taught classical Greek in Florence, Italy, who opened the eyes of Renaissance humanists and artists to the interest and beauty of ancient reliefs.

When artists of the mid-quattrocento illustrated the Greek myths, they looked to classical literature as a source, yet did not seem to relate the themes they saw on the sarcophagi to those they knew from Homer or Ovid. Leone Battista Alberti, humanist and writer of treatises on painting, sculpture, and architecture, advised his contemporaries in 1435 to study the istorie (sarcophagus reliefs) in order to learn how to express the movements of the mind by the movements of the body. Alberti specifically drew attention to a Meleager sarcophagus, famous in Rome, for its weighty portrayal of the dead body of Meleager, a portrayal that is similar in composition to representations of the bodies of Endymion and Adonis.

If the mythological scenes on Roman sarcophagi were not studied by early Renaissance masters in terms of their original subject matter, their drawings still suggest that the reliefs offered formal principles that were applied to new works of art and to motifs and emotive gestures that were used in a different context. Bober eloquently discusses artists' interest in the publication of Ovid's Metamorphoses and other classical texts in the latter half of the quattrocento, and in the mythological handbooks that appeared around the middle of the sixteenth century by Andreas Alciati, Vincenzo Cartari, and Piero Valeriano. Increasingly, artists tended to draw entire reliefs from them rather than motifs. Some of the reliefs were drawn and engraved by artists in Raphael's circle in the early part of the sixteenth century, as already noted in the engravings of Raimondi. Other artists took pleasure in virtuoso drawing, mixing elements from a variety of reliefs, so that exact sources were consciously transformed into new adaptations, as was noted by mannerist artists in the circle of Giorgio Vasari.

Edgar Wind explains in Pagan Mysteries of the Renaissance (1980) that Renaissance humanists encountered pagan myths on Roman sarcophagi, and as "the myths appeared to them in a sepulchral setting, it was only natural to inquire into their secret meaning, and to read them not as simple tales but as allusions to the mysteries of death and afterlife, conceived in neoplatonic terms." According to Wind, to ensure correctness in copying these ancient images or in reconstructing the missing parts, the Renaissance artist needed the advice of an antiquarian whose mind was formed by the study of ancient authors. A literary atmosphere thus enveloped the draftsman who copied from the antique. Literary knowledge, which the artist required to guide the eyes, ended by dominating the mind, particularly as the literary records were much better preserved than the visual.

The unearthing of ancient ruins and recovery of monument fragments provided a visual dictionary for Renaissance artists. For the humanist or philosopher, however, the ancient monuments, as well as corresponding literary sources, gave insight into the meaning of the ancient myths. For example, in seeing the theme of love and death portrayed in Roman sarcophagi, the Renaissance artist might have been simply interested in copying the visual design. The humanists, in contrast, would have inquired into the meaning of love and the reasons for its persistent appearance in sarcophagi.

Ovid also narrated the tempestuous love of Venus and Adonis. Venus fell in love with Adonis when he had grown into a handsome young man and became his constant companion. Because he was a hunter, she became a huntress, roaming the ridges and woods, pursuing harmless animals. Tiring of this tame type of hunting, Adonis went after wild boars and was eventually killed by one. Driving through the air in a chariot drawn by winged swans, Venus heard the groans of the dying Adonis. She leaped from her chariot to attend to her lover "and tore her bosom and her hair, striking her breasts with wretched hands, and bitterly complained to the Fates" (Ovid, X, 724–726). As an everlasting token of her grief, she transformed Adonis's blood into an anemone, a blood red flower that comes up for a brief period every spring.

The Roman sarcophagus Venus and Adonis (second century A.D.), now in the Palazzo Ducale at Mantua, Italy, was in Rome during the sixteenth century and in the collection of Andrea Bregno. After the mid-sixteenth century, the sarcophagus went to the Gonzaga Collection in Sabbionetta, and then in 1771 went to Mantua. The first scene on the left of the sarcophagus follows the formula for the departure for the hunt, but the artist turned it into the death of Adonis. Venus, now faceless, kisses Adonis, both seated before a curtain on the left. Adonis's companions stand behind him, two putti bind his thigh with drapery, and his dog sits at his feet. A pilaster separates this scene from the forest setting to the right. At the center and right of the sarcophagus, Venus is shown "flying through the long glades shrieking amain" (Ovid). She is guided by putti to the dying Adonis, who is mortally wounded by the boar, which the hunters and dogs are attacking.

Another Roman sarcophagus relief of the late second century A.D. (once in the Villa Giulia in Rome, and then moved to the Palazzo Rospigliosi, also in Rome, in the seventeenth century) portrays Venus seated with Adonis in the relief's right section. In the center the boar battles Adonis and his hunting dogs. Adonis's death is mourned by Venus, who supports his head while Cupid, the god of love, applies a sponge to his wound. Adonis has expired, appearing almost as if he is expiring his soul into the mouth of Venus, who bends over him to receive it.

Italian Renaissance artists, fascinated with the love story of Venus and Adonis, drew and painted it often. Amico Aspertini made drawings after the Roman sarcophagus, presently in the Wolfegg Codex, and Venetian painters such as Paolo Veronese and Titian selected segments from the Adonis sarcophagi for their paintings. Veronese's Venus and Adonis (1588), at the Prado, renders the moment of the lovers' bliss before the hunt. In a deep sleep, Adonis has been conquered by the love of Venus and the power of Bacchus's libations. Veronese's The Dying Adonis (1588), in the Stockholm Museum of Art in Sweden, portrays the dying body of Adonis. Compositionally, the pose is similar to that of other dying Adonises featured on Roman sarcophagi.

There are many versions of Titian's Venus and Adonis (1540); two are in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., and one in the Prado. In Titian's representation of the tale, Venus tries to dissuade Adonis from engaging in the hunt, yet he appears very much ready to depart with his jaculum venatorum (hunter's lance). Titian's composition is based on another Roman sarcophagus, Amor and Psyche or The Bed of Policleitus. The story is based on The Golden Ass (circa A.D. 180) by Lucius Apuleius. The visual composition of his sarcophagus was so pleasing to Renaissance artists that in the sixteenth century a copy was made in marble (now located in the Palazzo Mattei in Rome). Raphael and Giulio Romano also employed this motif in their frescoed cycles of Cupid and Psyche (1524–1527) in the Palazzo del Te in Mantua.

According to Pausanias, Endymion was either a legendary king of Elis and founder of the festival at Olympia or a shepherd from Caria. In either case, he was a beautiful young man with whom the moon goddess Diana fell in love while he lay sleeping. Diana, the chaste goddess who did not like to be seen naked, made his sleep everlasting so that she could gaze on his beauty forever and kiss him as much as she liked without been observed.

The Roman sarcophagus of Endymion and Diana (A.D. 150) is now in the Palazzo Rospigliosi in Rome, but in the early fifteenth century it was located in the church of San Giovanni in Laterano in Rome. According to the art historian John Pope-Hennessy, there were Florentine drawings after this relief, and in 1530 Fabricius recorded it with the title The Triumph of Venus. A rocky country is rendered in this relief, a place where trees grow like exotic flowers. Somnus, the winged god of sleep, is supporting the sleeping Endymion, who lies with one knee bent and his arm crooked behind his head. A distant fountain nymph looks down on them from the ledge on which she lies. Endymion's dog has awakened as the moon goddess, Diana—her veil billowing and a crescent moon in her hair—has stepped down from her chariot guided by three putti to see the sleeping Endymion. Two other putti are left to manage the abandoned horses as best they can. A female figure dressed like Diana, but with wings, carries a torch and guides the horses. She is thought to be Aura, personification of the breeze. On the right, a sleeping shepherd sits on a ledge, his head resting on his hand supported by a raised knee. The relief is flanked by a pair of large amoretti, out of scale with the other figures, and not part of the narrative. In this love story, death is replaced by Somnus, or eternal sleep; passion controls love; and love surrenders to sleep.

Cima da Conegliano painted a tondo with the depiction of a Sleepy Endymion (1500), now at the National Gallery of Parma, Italy. In a pastoral landscape, Endymion has fallen asleep under the spell of Diana while surrounded by numerous animals. The Venetian artist paralleled the quarter-luna shape of Diana with the dormant position of her lover, Endymion. This composition is Cima da Conegliano's interpretation of the Ovidian theme, rather than a stylistic assimilation from a Roman sarcophagus.

Numerous Roman sarcophagi illustrate the mythic story of love between Bacchus and Ariadne. Of particular interest is the one entitled Bacchic Revels, or Pannychis (mid-second century), now in the Museo Nazionale in Naples, Italy. (At the end of the quattrocento, these sarcophagi were recorded as being located in the garden of San Marco in the Palazzo Venezia in Rome.) The scene here is of a Bacchic festival. To the left, a reclining figure, overcome by wine and an orgy, a pose usually associated with Ariadne, lies before the temple of Pan, the pastoral god. Other reclining compositions of a dozing Ariadne were based on Roman copies of a Hellenistic Pergamum original of 200 B.C., now in the Galleria delle Statue in the Vatican. Ariadne lies in uneasy slumber on a rocky support. The sculptor has been able to capture both the pathos of her situation, exhausted and abandoned by Theseus on the island of Naxos, and the salvation that awaits her, awakening to the epiphany of Bacchus, who will take her as his bride. A snake bracelet is coiled about Ariadne's left upper arm, a detail that led to the Renaissance identification of her as the dying Cleopatra, an interpretation that persisted until the writings of Johann Joachim Winckelmann in the mid-eighteenth century. Representations of the sleeping Ariadne were pleasing to the Renaissance eye, even appearing on a print of fountain settings designed for a sculpture at the Vatican (sixteenth century). Raimondi's engraving Ariadne (circa 1510); Perino del Vaga's drawing Triumph of Bacchus (circa 1510), in the Cabinet des Dessins in Paris; and Giovanni Bellini's Feast of the Gods (1520) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., all portray this image, and Titian also found inspiration in the Roman sarcophagi for his Bacchanal (1518) at the National Gallery of Art in London. Needless to say, numerous drawings were also executed after this beautiful Roman sarcophagus, such as Raphael's drawing of Calliope, the muse of eloquence and epic poetry, for the Parnassus (1510), in the Stanza della Segnatura of the Vatican. The drawing is now in the Albertina Museum in Vienna, Austria.

Another popular Roman love story for Italian Renaissance artists was the tale of Mars and Rhea Silvia. The daughter of King Numitor of Alba Longa, Rhea Silvia was forced to be a vestal virgin by the usurper of the throne, Numitor's brother Amulius, in order to prevent her from producing offspring who could contest the crown. According to Horace (Odes 1, 2), Amulius's plan was foiled when the war god, Mars, seduced Rhea Silvia while she slept. Their offspring were Romulus and Remus. Amulius had Rhea Silvia imprisoned and the twins exposed. They were suckled by a she-wolf then later found and reared by the royal shepherd, Faustulus. They grew up to restore Numitor to his throne and to found the city of Rome, of which Romulus was the first king. Although the story is primarily associated with the founding of Rome, the seduction of Rhea Silvia was depicted in terms of Greek mythology and is visually akin to the Endymion sarcophagus.

A Roman sarcophagus relief dated A.D. 190, in the Palazzo Mattei in Rome, was found in the fifteenth century in the Lateran Palace. The relief portrays Somnus, in the center, pouring a sleeping draught over the breast of the slumbering Rhea Silvia as Mars approaches from the left, stepping over the reclining river god, Oceanus, a sea dragon, and various putti. On the extreme left, Vulcan, Venus, and Lucifer are presiding over the seasons of autumn and summer. Gentile Bellini enjoyed studying this sarcophagus, and his drawing (circa 1490s) of the reclining figure of Rhea Silvia can be seen at the Biblioteca Ambrosiana in Milan, Italy.

These various sarcophagi all illustrate tales of a god's love for a mortal. To be loved by a god, it was said, was to die and partake of eternal bliss. Franciscus Patricius, a Renaissance humanist, explained in his book Chaldean Oracles (1591) that to die for the love of a god was the most highly approved and commended way of dying because "those yearning for God and desiring to be conjoined with him are carried away to heaven and freed from the body by a death which is the profoundest sleep." This type of death was called the "kiss of death" by the symbolic theologians of the mors osculi (cabalists). Giovanni Pico della Mirandola claimed to have found a parallel for it among the ancient Chaldeans and Solomon, in osculetur me osculo oris sui (Song of Songs). Edgar Wind successfully demonstrates that this concept of death was treated by Cicero in De finibus bonorum et malorum (book V, xx, 55), as foreshadowed in the figure of Endymion, whom Diana kissed when he had fallen into the profound sleep endymionis sommun mortis instar putemus (the sleep of love).

Pico della Mirandola elaborated on the kiss of death (morte del bacio) in the Commento:

Through the first death, which is only a detachment of the soul from the body, the lover may see the beloved celestial Venus and by reflecting on her divine image, nourish his purified eyes with joy; but if he would possess her more closely he must die the second death by which he is completely severed from the body. However the most perfect and intimate union the lover can have with the celestial beloved is called the union of the kiss. (book III, vii)

Della Mirandola said the story of Alcestis was one of achieving a spiritual perfection. Alcestis achieved the perfection of love because she longed to go to her beloved through death. In dying through love, she was by the grace of the gods revived.

In a discussion of the predicament of Orpheus and Eurydice in The Symposium (fourth century B.C.) Plato views Orpheus as unable to attain complete unity with the beloved Eurydice because he sought her alive with his music in Hades. For this reason, Plato states, Orpheus could only reach the shadow of Eurydice.

Using platonic love as a key to a philosophy of death, it is possible to unlock the secrets of some of the funerary images on some Roman sarcophagi. Wind argues that the Renaissance humanists viewed Thanatos and the funerary Eros as one, and that the image of love was the Platonic communion of death with a god. The Renaissance identified Eros with death itself, in its painful, no less than its joyous aspect, as exemplified in the Roman sarcophagi that represent the agonies inflicted on Psyche, the fair maiden, by Cupid (Eros) as a prelude to their ultimate embrace. Examples of this theme are the Hellenistic sculpture of Eros and Psyche (second century A.D.) at the Capitoline Museum in Rome, and the fresco cycle of Psyche painted by Giulio Romano (1524–1527) at the Palazzo del Te in Mantua.

Renaissance philosopher Marsilio Ficino, in De amore, introduced the Platonic-Orphic term dulce-amarum and defined it as “love which is called by Plato bitter (res amara) and not unjustly because death is inseparable from love” (book II, viii). Orpheus’s love for Eurydice is also referred to as dulce-amarum because the cause of their bitter death was sweet love. Edgar Wind notes that the term dulce-amarum (bittersweet) originated with the Greek love poet Sappho (early sixth century B.C.), and during the Renaissance, Politian, unlike Ficino, was aware of its meaning.

Renaissance artists, enamored with classical mythology and Neoplatonic philosophy, illustrated these two types of love-death themes and expanded on the psychomachia (the struggle between two opposites): bitter and sweet, agony and love, rescue and sacrifice. Later on, the psychomachian dilemma shifted from the individual human aspect of love and death to a grander struggle of opposite types. An example of this would be the battle between virtues and vices, as portrayed in Andrea Riccio’s relief Humanism over Death or Wisdom over Ignorance (circa 1500) at the Louvre in Paris. This relief illustrates the idea that opposing forces can create unity, and that harmony reconciles discord—therefore, love or knowledge conquers even after death.

Jane Davidson Reid, in her book The Oxford Guide to Classical Mythology in the Arts, 1300–1990s (1993), notes that the classical themes of love and death have continued to be painted and sculpted into the twentieth century. Often, however, the focus changed. At the end of the eighteenth century, François-Pascal Gérard, in his Cupid and Psyche (1798) in the Louvre, looks back not to Roman sarcophagi but to a statue by Antonio Canova, completed only a few years before his own painting. Gérard, however, has turned the ideal forms of Canova’s statue into an erotic, even homoerotic, vision of prettified adolescence. Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson, in his Sleep of Endymion (1792), brings a sensational brilliance to the eroticism of the nude figure that defies any notion of classicism.

In the nineteenth century, less attention was paid to the poses that could be derived from classical sources and more to the emotional dynamics of the narratives. George Frederic Watts, for example, in his Orpheus and Eurydice (circa 1869–1872), in the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, focuses on the heads of the protagonists. Orpheus, unable to restrain himself, turns to embrace Eurydice while she already begins to collapse and fade away. The intensity and concern of Orpheus contrasts with Eurydice, her neck no longer able to hold her head upright, her eyes glazing over. A full-length version (1881), in the Watts Gallery in Compton, England, shows her body, limp and white, and a lily falling from her lifeless hand.

In the twentieth century, artists continued to use the classical narrative, but modernist concerns with form have diminished such attention to narrative content. Pablo Picasso, for example, in his etching Cephalus and Procris, His Wife, Whom He Has Killed by Accident (1930) evokes the classical but does so through the style of the clean, clear outline of his figures. Cephalus, holding his bow, leans over Procris; her eyes are still open, but neither shows any emotion. The substance of the figures and the passion of their story have been diffused in the energy of the simple linear pattern.

See also Abandonment; Death; Ecstasy; Kiss/Kissing; Sleep/Sleeping; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Admetus and Alcestis

Giordano, Luca, Hercules Entering the Underworld in Search of Alcestis; Hercules Restoring Alcestis to Her Husband Admetus, originally frescoes for Buen Retiro, Madrid, Spain, circa 1697, subsequently engraved by Giuseppe Castillo and Juan Barcelona, 1779

Coypel, Noël, Hercules Leading Alcestis from the Underworld to Admetus, before 1707, Grenoble, France, Musée
 Masreliez, Louis Adrien, The Death of Alcestis, 1784, Stockholm, Sweden, Nationalmuseum Peyron, Pierre, The Death of Alcestis (The Heroism of Conjugal Love), 1785, Louvre, Paris Delacroix, Eugène, Hercules Bringing Alcestis Back from the Underworld, 1862, Washington, D.C., Phillips Gallery
 Leighton, Frederic, first Baron, Hercules Wrestling with Death for the Body of Alcestis, 1869–1871, Hartford,
 Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Rodin, Auguste, The Death of Alcestis, marble sculpture, 1899, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection
 Allar, André Joseph, The Death of Alcestis, marble sculpture, before 1926, Liseux, France, Musées Nationaux

Orpheus and Eurydice

Mantegna, Andrea, Orpheus in the Underworld, 1468–1474, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo Ducale, Camera Picta
 Raimondi, Marcantonio, Orpheus and Eurydice, engraving, 1509
 Deruta, Castel, Orpheus and Eurydice, majolica plate, 1530,
 New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Orpheus Leads Eurydice from Hades, painting for Torre de la Prada, before 1640, Madrid,
 Spain, Prado
 Padovanino, Orpheus Leading Eurydice from the Underworld, before 1648, Venice, Italy, Accademia
 Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, *Orpheus Leading Eurydice Past
 Cerberus*, ceiling fresco, circa 1725, Venice, Italy, Palazzo
 Sandi
 Restout, Jean, Orpheus Leading Eurydice from the Underworld, 1763, Rennes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts Lacour, Pierre, Orpheus Losing Eurydice, 1802, Bordeaux,
 France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Zix, Benjamin, Orpheus Losing Eurydice for the Second Time, drawing, 1804, Strasbourg, France, Cabinet des Estampes et des Dessins
 Scheffer, Ary, The Death of Eurydice, 1814, Blois, France, Château de Blois, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Leighton, Frederic, Eurydice Embracing Orpheus, circa 1864,
 London, Leighton House
 Watts, George Frederic, Orpheus and Eurydice, circa 1869–1872, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
 Dagnan-Bouveret, Pascal-Adolphe, The Grief of Orpheus, 1876, Mulhouse, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Watts, George Frederic, Orpheus and Eurydice, 1881, Compton, England, Watts Gallery
 Séon, Alexandre, The Lamentation of Orpheus, 1896, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Cox, Jan, The Second Loss of Eurydice, before 1980, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Pyramus and Thisbe

Filarete, Antonio, Pyramus and Thisbe, relief on bronze door, 1433–1445, Vatican, Saint Peter Apollonio di Giovanni di Tomaso, Pyramus and Thisbe, before 1465, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Apollonio di Giovanni di Tomaso, and Marco del Buono Biamberti, Pyramus and Thisbe, before 1465, New York,
 Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Raimondi, Marcantonio, Pyramus and Thisbe, engraving,
 1505, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Altdorfer, Albrecht, Pyramus and Thisbe, engraving, 1513
 Cranach, Lucas, Pyramus and Thisbe, 1520–1525, Bamberg,
 Germany, Staatsgalerie
 Manara, Baldassare (of Faenza), Pyramus and Thisbe, broth bowl, 1532–1535, Paris, Petit Musée
 Grien, Hans Baldung, Pyramus and Thisbe, 1530–1531,
 Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
 Tintoretto, Jacopo, Pyramus and Thisbe, circa 1541,
 Modena, Italy, Galleria Estense
 Goltzius, Hendrik, Pyramus and Thisbe, engraving, 1580 Breenbergh, Bartholomeus, Landscape with Pyramus and Thisbe, 1645, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Giordano, Luca, Pyramus and Thisbe, 1692–1702, El Escorial, Spain, Casita del Principe
 Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Pyramus and Thisbe, triptych, 1872–1876, Birkenhead, Merseyside, Williamston Art Gallery and Museum

Dido and Aeneas

Mantegna, Andrea, Dido, before 1506, Montreal, Quebec,
 Museum of Fine Arts
 Raimondi, Marcantonio, Dido, engraving, 1510, after a design by Raphael
 Durante, Castel, Dido, majolica coppa, 1520, New York,
 Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Maulbertsch, Franz Anton, The Death of Dido, circa 1785–1786, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie Stallaert, Joseph, Death of Dido, 1872, Brussels, Belgium, Musées des Beaux-Arts

Procris and Cephalus

Piero di Cosimo, Mythological Scene, painting, 1510,
 London, National Gallery
 Luini, Bernardino, Story of Procris and Cephalus, nine frescoes transferred to canvas, 1522–1523, Washington,
 D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Giulio Romano, Death of Procris, drawing for engraving, circa 1530, Frankfurt, Germany, Städelisches Kunstinstitut
 Giulio Romano, Death of Procris, engraving, executed by Giorgio Ghisi, circa 1530
 Veronese, Paolo, Procris and Cephalus, 1540s, Strasbourg,
 France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Wtewael, Joachim, Death of Procris, circa 1595–1600, St.
 Louis, Missouri, City Art Museum
 Elsheimer, Adam, Death of Procris, before 1610, England, Corsham Court
 Gelton, Toussaint, The Dying Procris, before 1680, Copenhagen, Denmark, Statens Museum for Kunst
 West, Benjamin, The Death of Procris, 1770, Chicago, Art Institute
 MacDowell, Patrick, Cephalus and Procris, marble sculpture group, 1834, Markree Castle, County Sligo, Ireland, Cooper Collection

Escoula, Jean, Death of Procris, marble sculpture group, before 1911, Rambouillet, France, Musée
 Picasso, Pablo, Cephalus and Procris, His Wife, Whom He Has Killed by Accident, etching, 1930

Venus and Adonis

Venus and Adonis, sarcophagus relief, Roman, late second century, Rome, Palazzo Rospigliosi
Venus and Adonis, sarcophagus relief, Roman, Rome, Vatican, Museo Gregorio
Venus and Adonis, sarcophagus relief, Roman, second century, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo Ducale
Venus and Adonis, wall painting, Roman, Pompeii, Italy, Casa d'Adonide Ferito Sebastiano del Piombo, Venus and Adonis, 1511–1512, Florence, Italy, Uffizi
 Rosso Fiorentino, Death of Adonis, fresco, 1535–1540, Château de Fontainebleau, France, Galerie François I Titian, Venus and Adonis, 1540, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Veronese, Paolo, Venus and Adonis, 1588, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Veronese, Paolo, The Dying Adonis, 1588, Stockholm, Sweden, Stockholm Museum of Art
 Barry, James, The Death of Adonis, circa 1775, Dublin, National Gallery of Ireland
 Rodin, Auguste, The Death of Adonis, marble sculpture, 1891, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Staley, Earl, Venus and Adonis, painting cycle, 1982, New York, Downe Collection

Diana and Endymion

Endymion and Diana, sarcophagus relief, Roman, A.D. 150, Rome, Palazzo Rospigliosi Endymion and Diana, sarcophagus relief, Roman, Rome, Capitoline Museum
Endymion and Diana, sarcophagus relief, Roman, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
Endymion, sarcophagus relief, Roman, Rome, Palazzo Braschi
Endymion, sarcophagus relief, Roman, London, British Museum
 Cima da Conegliano, Sleeping Endymion, 1500, Parma, Italy, National Gallery of Parma
 Guercino, Endymion Sleeping, 1640–1650, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 West, Benjamin, Diana and Endymion, 1766, private collection
 Canova, Antonio, Sleeping Endymion, marble sculpture, 1819–1822, Chatsworth, Derbyshire, Duke of Devonshire Collection

Bacchus and Ariadne

Bacchus and Ariadne, sarcophagus relief, Roman, mid-second century, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale
Ariadne, sarcophagus relief, Roman, second century, Vatican, Galleria delle Statue
Ariadne, sarcophagus relief, Roman, Copenhagen, Denmark, Ny Carlsberg
 Raimondi, Marcantonio, Ariadne, engraving, circa 1510

Perino del Vaga, Triumph of Bacchus, drawing, circa 1510, Paris, Cabinet des Dessins
 Bellini, Giovanni, Feast of the Gods, 1520, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Titian, Bacchanal, 1518, London, National Gallery
 Raphael, Calliope, drawing, 1510, Vienna, Austria, Albertina Museum

Mars and Rhea Silvia

Rhea Silvia and Mars, sarcophagus relief, Roman, A.D. 190, Rome, Palazzo Mattei
Rhea Silvia and Mars, sarcophagus relief, Roman, Vatican, Lateran Museum Bellini, Gentile, Rhea Silvia, drawing, circa 1490s, Milan, Italy, Biblioteca Ambrosiana

Cupid and Psyche

Eros and Psyche, sculpture, Hellenistic, second century B.C., Rome, Capitoline Museum
Amor and Psyche or The Bed of Policleitus, sarcophagus relief, Roman, second century A.D., Vatican, Vatican Museums
 Giulio Romano, Cupid and Psyche, 1524–1527, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo del Te Canova, Antonio, Cupid and Psyche, marble sculpture, 1787–1793, Paris, Louvre
 Gérard, François-Pascal, Cupid and Psyche, 1798, Paris, Louvre

Struggle of Opposites

Riccio, Andrea, Humanism over Death or Wisdom over Ignorance, relief, circa 1500, Paris, Louvre

Further Reading

Alberti, Leon Battista, On Painting and On Sculpture, edited and translated by Cecil Grayson, London: Phaidon, 1972
 Bacci, Mina, Piero di Cosimo, Milan, Italy: Bramanti Editrico, 1966
 Biadene, Susan, editor, Titian, Prince of Painters, Venice, Italy: Masilio, 1990
 Bober, Phyllis Pray, and Ruth Rubenstein, Renaissance Artists and Antique Sculpture, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986
 Devereau, James A., "The Textual History of Ficino's De Amore," Renaissance Quarterly 28 (1975)
 Flaceliere, Robert, L'Armour en Grece, Paris, 1960
 Friedlander, Paul, Plato, New York: Harper, 1958
 Gadol, Joan, Leon Battista Alberti: Universal Man of the Early Renaissance, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969
 Garin, Eugenio, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola, Florence, Italy: G. C. Sansoni, 1966
 Gombrich, Ernst Hans, Giulio Romano, Milan, Italy: Electra, 1989
 ———, "The Style all'antica: Imitation and Assimilation," in Norm and Form, London: Phaidon, 1966; New York: Phaidon, 1978

- Howatson, M. C., The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Hyde, Thomas, The Poetic Theology of Love: Cupid in Renaissance Literature, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1986
- Jayne, Sears, Marsilio Ficino: Commentary on Plato's Symposium, Dallas, Texas: Spring, 1985
- Koortbojian, Michael, Myth, Meaning and Memory on Roman Sarcophagi, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995
- Martineau, Jane, editor, The Genius of Venice, New York: Abrams, 1984
- Nelson, John, Renaissance Theory of Love, New York: Scribner's, 1976
- Rasmussen, Jorg, Italian Majolica in the Robert Lehman Collection, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1987
- Rearick, William R., The Art of Paolo Veronese, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1989; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989
- de Rougemont, Denis, "Love," in Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1962
- Schianch, Lucia Fornari, La Galleria Nazionale di Parma, Parma, Italy: Artegrafico Silva, 1988
- Shoemaker, Innis, The Engravings of Marcantonio Raimondi, Lawrence, Kansas: Allen, 1962
- Simpson, Lucie, The Greek Spirit in Renaissance Art, London: Ettrick, 1953
- Wind, Edgar, Pagan Mysteries of the Renaissance, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1980
- Wolter, Al, "Ficino and Plotinus' Treatise On Eros," in Ficino and Renaissance Neoplatonism, edited by Konrad Eisenbichler and Olga Zorzi Pugliese, Toronto, Ontario: Dovehouse, 1986

LUXURY

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods and iconographic topoi are covered in the discussion of the theme Luxury:

ANCIENT

ASIAN

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

FOOD

ANIMALS AND PLANTS

DRESS AND ADORNMENT

DWELLING HOUSES (CITY AND COUNTRY)

FURNITURE AND UTENSILS

FUNERALS AND TOMBS

SLAVES AND SERVANTS

Ephebe lychnophoras, first century A.D., gilt bronze statue from Pompeii, Naples, Italy, Archaeological Museum. (Courtesy of Deutscher Archäologisches Institut, Rome)

The concept of luxury (Latin, luxus; French, luxe) signifies a mode of living that is characterized by material abundance and excess. It stands in opposition to the concept of life according to necessity. In a positive sense, luxury may represent the decorum of kingship or divinity and the reward of the blessed (i.e., in the eschatological sense). In a more common, negative sense, luxury is a kind of excess, or excessive emulation, that must be condemned, particularly in egalitarian societies or in societies rigidly divided by class. John Sekora has described luxury as a Foucaultian discourse, that is, an ideological system designed to regulate behavior. Although usually established in religious and philosophical realms, luxury has often been enforced in the political sphere by means of sumptuary laws. Soft furniture (especially beds), mirrors, polished marble, aromatic wooden ceilings, warm baths, food that is abundant and varied, and all such things that give pleasure rather than pain may in various contexts be considered as luxuries (i.e., apparatus luxuriae). Thus, luxury is bound to a sense of pleasure, while necessity is bound to that of pain or the lack of pleasure.

Typical of the luxury said to be enjoyed by the gods of ancient Greece and Rome was the palace given to Psyche by her lover, Cupid, in Apuleius's Metamorphosis:

The lofty ceilings, delicately fretted out of citronwood and ivory, were upheld by pillars of gold. The walls were completely crusted with silver modelling, while shapes of wild beasts and of other animals flanked the entrance. . . . The pavement itself was a mosaic of gems splintered and fitted together so as to weld their colors and to represent various objects. O madly happy, more than happy, must be that man who can trample on jewels and carcanets! (vol. 1, translated by Jack Lindsay)

It is not difficult to see how developing a taste for such things might lead to disaster. The writers of the Hebrew Bible saw luxury as the human usurpation of divine privilege and a disobedience to God. Given the tension that existed between priestly authors and the kings of Israel, the latter were often portrayed in scripture as slaves of sexual and material luxury. Enemies of the Hebrews were also commonly represented as luxurious, their cities (e.g., Babylon, Nineveh) as inherently corrupt.

From the time of Hesiod (Works and Days), the Greeks represented poverty as a virtue and wealth as a source of enervation and trouble. The good was attainable only with difficulty; the bad was too easily obtainable. Barbarians, the Persians in particular, were portrayed by the Greeks as both wealthy and enervated. Their wealth inclined them to hubris by encouraging them to transgress natural limits, excessive wealth itself being a transgression of natural limit. The character Xerxes in Aeschylus's Persae brings on his own ruin and the ruin of his army by bridging the Hellespont and canalizing the land of Greece. Inadvertently, and ironically, the ancient Greeks' own tales of oriental wealth (i.e., of Midas, Sardanapalus, Gyges, Cyrus, et al.) eventually induced them to conquer the East. Working from sources of the T'ang dynasty, Edward H. Schafer has documented a corresponding Chinese taste for exotica contemporary with the ancient Greeks, particularly in the form of imported goods, as well as in the familiar pattern of governmental control through sumptuary laws.

The Romans continued the Greek use of barbarian exemplars (e.g., Mithradates, Cleopatra) and added some from their own culture. The name of Lucullus (i.e., L. Licinius Lucullus) became synonymous with luxury itself. The conqueror of Mithradates, Lucullus was renowned for affronting the sea with extensions of his villas—for which he was called “Xerxes in a toga” (Velleius Paterculus, History, 2.33.4). He eventually became the namesake of a particularly beautiful marble imported from an island in the Nile (Pliny, Natural History, 36.2.2; 6.8). He was credited with bringing the cherry (Latin, cerasus) to Italy from Cerasus in Asia Minor (Varro, Rerum rusticarum, 1.39.2; Pliny, Natural History, 15.25.30). Cato the Elder, on the other hand, became synonymous with the condemnation of luxury. (He condemned, among other things, the use of warm water for baths.) Yet, even as the Romans were quick to condemn the luxury of private individuals, they were quite willing to accept it in a civic context. “The Roman people hate private luxury, but delight in public magnificence” (Cicero, pro L. Murena, 76). Where charges of luxury under the Republic (e.g., Cicero against Verres) usually portended political or partisan conflicts, such charges under the Empire revealed broader class conflicts. Critics contemporary with the Empire, such as Petronius, condemned the vulgar tastes of former slaves who appeared to him to have indulged in luxuries as signs of newly acquired fortunes (e.g., the character Trimalchio in Petronius's Satyricon). Like Petronius, the moralist Juvenal condemned the ostentation of wealthy individuals and foreigners whom he deemed inferior to him by birth.

Even to the historian Sallust, writing under the late Republic, luxury was a material cause of the decline of Rome following the destruction of Carthage (Historiae, 1.16). Under the Republic, luxury might be taken as a sign of ambition to a throne. With the achievement of monarchy, Augustus was careful to live amid modest circumstances in his house on the Palatine. Nero, ignoring the example of Augustus, came to grief on the charge of luxury for his extravagance in building the Domus Aurea (A.D. 64–69). “All Rome is transformed to a villa! Romans, flee to Veii, if only the villa does not also spread itself to Veii!” (Suetonius, Nero, 39). Since luxury was so commonly levied in accusation of the emperors, early historians accepted it as a material cause of the decline of Rome.

However, the historian of Roman names, Ludwig Friedlaender, has demonstrated that luxury, in comparative economic terms, was no more characteristic of ancient Romans than it was of the noblesse oblige of modern times.

In the tradition of Roman moralists, later officers of the church continued to condemn luxury. Augustine liberally quotes from Sallust in order to establish the role of luxury in the decline of the Roman state (De Civitate Dei, 2.18). Religious fervor has often sanctioned, or at least instigated, public acts of destruction aimed against ecclesiastical and private property. Acts of iconoclasm were often attacks against luxury. In Florence, Italy, under Girolamo Savonarola, parties of boys carried out attacks on private luxury by invading houses and carrying out objects for the sole purpose of burning them in public bonfires. The attacks against ecclesiastical property that took place in the Netherlands in 1566 were instigated as much by class conflict as they were by religious opinion.

The regulation of luxury—control of public and private behavior through sumptuary laws—became normative among west European monarchs of the modern period. Louis XIV of France confiscated Vaux-le-Vicomte, the estate of his superintendant des finances, Nicholas Fouquet, on the grounds that possession of such an estate by an inferior constituted an affront to his own majesty. As a royal possession, the estate that had once been considered an audacious luxury became exemplary decorum. Although the objective of sumptuary legislation in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century France and England was a rigidly stratified society, luxury was still presented to the public as a moral vice. The old arguments formulated by writers such as Sallust, Cicero, and Augustine continued to be cited as part of a larger philosophical argument.

Painters of the nineteenth century revived the classical association of luxury with the East in their sensuous odalisques. Likewise, Charles Baudelaire's poem "L'Invitation au Voyage" (1855, "Invitation to the Voyage") is classical in its use of luxury topoi:

Furniture that wears
The lustre of the years
Softly would glow within our glowing chamber,
Flowers of rarest bloom
Proffering their perfume
Mixed with the vague fragrances of amber;
Gold ceilings would there be,
Mirrors deep as the sea
The walls all in an Eastern splendor hung . . .
(lines 15–23, translated by Richard Wilbur)

At the end of the nineteenth century, authors such as J. K. Huysmans and Oscar Wilde explored themes of luxury under the rubric of hedonism. Both authors employ imagery of luxury that might have been borrowed from Apuleius for the ambiances of their respective heroes, Des Esseintes and Dorian Gray.

Somewhat more ambivalent, and more consistent with modern notions of the concept, is the representation of luxury given by Henri Matisse in Luxe, Calme et Volupté (1905–1906), the title taken from the refrain in Baudelaire's poem. Here the image of pleasure and material comfort is presented wholly without guilt, attainable by all who are privileged to experience it—a deliberate break with classical tradition.

Indeed, except for the eschewal of blatant envy, there is little inhibition to traditional luxury in modern life. Poor and even wealthy countries conduct lotteries that have the power to elevate even the most deprived members of society to life "in the lap of luxury." (The law of treasure trove permits the same small-scale, drastic mobility in many countries.) Those who have experienced such a rise in fortune are often featured as the subjects of popular art forms, as they are in the television series The Beverly Hillbillies (1962–1971). Advertisements for luxury items such as jewelry, perfume, designer apparel, and fine furniture occupy a disproportionate space in modern-day newspapers and magazines as publishers and merchants recognize the importance of fantasy in the lives of ordinary people. The change in mores undoubtedly reflects the triumph of a consumer-oriented economy in which the creation of a public demand for luxury items may have actually lowered their prices (art and rhinoceros horn excepted). Hence, the condemnation of luxury is now rarely heard outside of religious communities. Although images of luxury and luxury items abound in contemporary visual culture, discontinuity rather than continuity is most apt to be found within the luxury topoi (Williams).

Iconographic Topoi

The apparatus luxuriae may singly or collectively constitute an "iconography of luxury" in the history of art. That is to say, certain topoi signify class status: a pillow of "oriental potentate," or the horses of the young knights in the Parthenon frieze. Historian Friedlaender has distinguished seven categories of luxury: (1) the table and the importation of foreign foods, (2) the importation and use of edible animals and plants, (3) dress and adornment, (4) dwelling houses (city and country), (5) furniture and utensils, (6) funerals and tombs, and (7) slaves and servants. The iconography of luxury may correspondingly be broken down into these seven categories:

Food

The representation of food in art begins in the paintings and reliefs of the tombs of Old Kingdom Egypt (Vandier), but it is not until the appearance of Roman still-life painting that luxury food itself become a subject of painting and mosaic. Pictures known as xenia contained arrangements of food ingredients—fish, game, vegetables—presumably to whet the appetites of diners in the rooms where such a meal might be served. The tradition of illustrating culinary opulence continued into the Renaissance, especially with the emergence of the still-life genre in the late sixteenth century. Pieter Aertsen was among the first Netherlandish painters to specialize in this type of painting. Although creating the impression of abundance, and even opulence, remained the primary goal of seventeenth-century European still-life painters, moralizing themes such as excess and vanity temper the exuberance inherent in the subject. In many twentieth-century depictions of food—Andy Warhol's Campbell Soup cans, for example—luxury is no longer a consideration.

Animals and Plants

The horse, above all other animals, has the longest history as an object of luxury, a high status amply reflected in the history of art. Even before the appearance of beautiful, spirited animals in Greek monuments like the Temple of Zeus at Olympia or the Parthenon in Athens, the tombs of Russia and Kazakhstan held the remains of chariot horses slaughtered as grave goods to accompany buried princes (Wilford). Horses have merited even their own portrait galleries: the portraits commissioned during the T'ang dynasty by the Chinese emperor Ming Huang from the painter Han Kan; in sixteenth-century Europe, Federico Gonzaga's favorite horses painted after Giulio Romano in the Sala dei Cavalli of the Palazzo del Te in Mantua, Italy (1525–1535); and Don Juan of Austria's stable engraved by Hieronymus Wierix and Hendrik Goltzius after Johannes Stradanus (circa 1580).

Dogs have also occupied positions of importance among the possessions of the nobility, sometimes meriting portrait status alongside their masters and, in cases of renowned hunters, portraits of their own. Exotic imports constitute an entire class of luxury animals that includes various species of ape, the Amazon parrot, and so forth, depicted in European painting from the seventeenth century. Even the peacock, an import from China, has a very long history as a luxury item, all the more so as an attribute of Juno, the goddess of wealth.

Dress and Adornment

Clothing (including armor), coiffure, and jewelry may themselves be considered works of art, or they may be treated as attributes worn by human subjects. Collectively, such adornments always signify class status and are, therefore, subject to emulation. Perhaps the most striking examples may be found in the luxurious hairstyles worn by private women (like the so-called "Giulia di Tito," a marble bust in the Capitoline Museum in Rome) in emulation of the women of the imperial family during the reign of Vespasian and his successors. "Fabric is thought to decorate and beautify, not only because of its direct appeal but because it has been shown to do so in an incredible variety of works of art since the remotest antiquity" (Hollander, p. 2). The most luxurious fabrics are those, like silk and satin, that are most flattering to the body. Luxury in clothing may be expressed through the nature of the fabric, through the use of dyes, and through the cut of the garment. Given these variables, it has been extremely difficult to regulate dress through sumptuary legislation. In the seventeenth century, the restriction of color in clothing provided additional incentive to luxury in the use of fabrics. The height of bourgeois luxury might be seen in the black and white dress of J. A. Massa and Wife (circa 1640) as painted by Frans Hals.

Dwelling Houses (City and Country)

The historical examples of Lucullus, Nero, and Nicholas Fouquet have been discussed above. As in the case of food, the self-sufficiency of the subject as an artistic genre is a gauge of its popularity as luxury item. Elaborate architectural prospects taken from theatrical design, or from actual or imaginary country estates, form a class of Roman wall-painting of the second through the fourth styles (i.e., 80 B.C.–A.D. 79). Romans of this period spent an enormous amount of their income on the embellishment of their houses and gardens, even to the extent of making their city dwellings resemble luxurious country villas (Zanker). At other times in European and American history, a sudden increase in wealth has spurred increased luxury in private residences. The house of Jacques Coeur in Bourges, built between 1443 and 1451, set a standard of luxury for fifteenth-century France soon to be outdone by the royal residences of the sixteenth century. The appropriation of ecclesiastical property in sixteenth-century England resulted in a great increase in the number and general appearance of country estates. The windfall profits made by American families such as the Vanderbilts after the Civil War were poured into houses like The Breakers (1893) in Newport, Rhode Island, or Biltmore (1895) in Asheville, North Carolina, both works of Richard Morris Hunt, an architect who specialized in luxurious houses.

Furniture and Utensils

Imported goods and works of art have often been perceived as luxuries. Hence, historians of material culture sometimes distinguish art objects from the general class of "useful" or "utilitarian" objects. Among utensils, Corinthian and Tarentine bronzes were appreciated by the Romans as luxury items, while Chinese connoisseurs valued furniture made from the rare hardwoods of Southeast Asia. Silver service and glass vessels were such important signifiers of class status (hence topoi of luxury) in Rome that they were sometimes represented in fresco painting as still-life vignettes, as in the Silver Service in the tomb of C. Vestorius Priscus in the Necropolis of Porta Vesuvio in Pompeii, Italy. Turkish rugs achieved status as icons of luxury in northern European painting of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In his painting Madonna Enthroned Between Two Musical Angels (circa 1490) in the National Gallery in Washington, D.C., Hans Memling painted a particular type of carpet, known today as a "Memling carpet," to denote the sacred ground beneath the feet of the Virgin. Another carpet, known as a "Holbein," covers the table at which the merchant, Georg Gisze, sits in Holbein's Portrait of George Gisze. The feather bed or pillow is proverbial among Roman writers as a sign of luxury (e.g., Lucilius; Cicero, Tuscan Disputations, 3.19.46). Of a Roman matron who ran off with a gladiator, Juvenal wrote that she had been cradled in down pillows, raised "with a silver spoon in her mouth" (Satires, 6.88). Later in the same text, Juvenal refers to the "pillow of Sardanapalus" (Satires, 10.362), giving rise to the tradition that credited the Assyrian king with its invention. Sardanapalus continued in his role as chief oriental exemplar of the sin of luxury. Eugène Delacroix's painting The Death of Sardanapalus (1827–1828) shows the oriental monarch with all his apparatus luxuriae: horses, concubines, pillows, etc. Over the course of time, countless other objects achieved a name recognition that allowed them to be used as symbols of the good life.

Funerals and Tombs

After the pyramids of Egypt, the epitome of luxury in burial was reached by Mausolus, satrap of Caria, in his mausoleum (circa 350 B.C.), a monument that added the work of the most prominent Greek sculptors of the time to an enormous architectural mass. After Mausolus, Alexander the Great, Augustus, and Hadrian all received splendid tombs. Although the Roman empire managed to restrain private citizens in their funerary expenditures, the late Republic saw the construction of large monuments to such people as Cecilia Metella (Rome, Via Appia) and C. Munatius Plancus (Formia). A striking example of luxury may be found in the first-century B.C. tomb of the baker M. Virgilius Eurysacus, located at Porta Maggiore in Rome. Built of elegant travertine stone, it is shaped to look like an enormous bread oven in tribute to its occupant's profession. Amid the splendid tombs of the Italian Renaissance, the tomb planned by Pope Julius II for himself in the Basilica of St. Peter (1513, unfinished) was noteworthy not only for its conspicuous mass and expense, but also for its use of sculpted slaves (exempla servitutis), recognizable as a luxury topos (see below). The world's most luxurious tomb is the Taj Mahal in Agra (circa 1635).

Slaves and Servants

The exploitation and expenditure of human life as a sign of status is most graphically demonstrated in the 70-odd bodies of courtiers voluntarily killed in order to accompany the burial of a prince (circa 2500 B.C.) in the royal cemetery of Ur (i.e., "The Great Death-Pit"). Slavery has a long history and extensive iconography among monarchs and their emulators. Surrogate slaves in the form of life-size, or near life-size, statues must also be included in this category. The tombs of the Han emperors in China literally held statue armies.

Although it placed a high premium on individual human lives, the classical world of Greece and Rome was dependent upon the institution of slavery and adopted a corresponding iconography. A class of objects that epitomized luxury in the Greco-Roman world were the epheboi lychnophoroi (lamp-bearing youths). Several of the houses of Pompeii contained gilded bronze statues of youths that supported lamps for the illumination of nocturnal banquets, a custom that most likely derives from Homer's description of the palace of Alcinous (Odyssey, 7.100). The ephebic lamp stands exceed necessity in several ways: their costly material; their scale, which exceeds the minimum requirements of their function; and their depiction of humans exploited through labor and erotic function. Archaeological evidence suggests that such objects were extremely popular in Pompeii at the time of its destruction following the eruption of Mount Vesuvius (A.D. 79), even though such objects had been singled out for condemnation as luxurious by moralists like Lucretius (De rerum natura, 2.24–26) for well over a century. Similarly, caryatids and telamons (i.e., female and male supporting figures, exempla servitutis), were incorporated into architectural and furniture designs as luxurious embellishments.

Spanish painting of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries unabashedly records the aristocratic fondness for dwarfs, as does Venetian painting a taste for Moors and other Easterners. Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres and Delacroix made the odalisque (from the Turkish word meaning "for the bedroom") a familiar subject in French painting. Moral ambiguity notwithstanding, Jean-Léon Gérôme (1824–1904) developed the iconography of slavery to extremes of luxury in often repeated "orientalist" pictures like The Snake Charmer (late nineteenth century), The Moorish Bath (circa 1870), and The Slave Market (late nineteenth century).

See also Abundance; Excess; Hunting/Hunter/Huntress; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Tomb of Mausolus, circa 350 B.C., Halicarnassus, Turkey

Tomb of the Baker, first century B.C., Rome, Porta Maggiore

Domus Aurea, A.D. 64–69, Rome

Portrait of a Flavian Lady (Giulia di Tito), marble bust, circa A.D. 80, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Ephebe from the Via dell'Abbondanza (Pompeii), bronze sculpture, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale Archeologico

Silver Service, fresco from the Tomb of C. Vestorius Priscus, Pompeii, Necropolis of Porta Vesuvio

Asian

Han Kan, Horse, ink on paper, T'ang dynasty, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Renaissance

House of Jacques Coeur, 1443–1451, Bourges, France

Memling, Hans, Madonna Enthroned Between Two Musical Angels, oil on panel, circa 1490, Washington, D.C., National Gallery

Michelangelo, Tomb of Pope Julius II, 1513, unfinished

Giulio Romano, Sala dei Cavalli, frescoes, 1525–1535, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo del Te

Holbein, Hans, Portrait of George Gisze, oil painting, Berlin, Germany

Goltzius, Hendrik, and Hieronymus Wierex, The Stable of Don Juan of Austria, engravings, circa 1580

Seventeenth Century

Hals, Frans, J. A. Massa and Wife, oil on canvas, circa 1640, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Leveau, Louis, André Le Nôtre, and Charles Le Brun, 1657–1661, Château of Vaux-le-Vicomte, France

Nineteenth Century

Delacroix, Eugène, The Death of Sardanapalus, oil on canvas, 1827–1828, Paris, Louvre

Gérôme, Jean-Léon, The Snake Charmer, oil on canvas, late nineteenth century, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Gérôme, Jean-Léon, The Moorish Bath, circa 1870, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts; San Francisco, California, Palace of the Legion of Honor

Noüy, Jules-Jean-Antoine, Lecomte du, The Guard of the Seraglio: Souvenir of Cairo, oil on canvas, 1876, Paris, Pierre Bergé Collection

Hunt, Richard Morris, The Breakers, 1893, Newport, Rhode Island

Hunt, Richard Morris, Biltmore, 1895, Asheville, North Carolina

Twentieth Century

Matisse, Henri, Luxe, Calme et Volupté, oil on canvas, 1905–1906, Merian, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation

The Beverly Hillbillies, television program, 1962–1971

Further Reading

- Anderson, Maxwell, and Leila Nista, editors, Radiance in Stone: Sculptures in Colored Marble from the Museo Nazionale Romano, Rome: De Luca, 1989
- Baudelaire, Charles, "Invitation to the Voyage," translated by Richard Wilbur, in The Flowers of Evil, edited by Martha and Jackson Mathews, New York: Laughlin, 1955
- Baudrillard, Henri, L'Histoire du luxe privé et public depuis l'antiquité jusqu'à nos jours, Paris: Hachette et Cie, 1878
- Boethius, Axel, The Golden House of Nero, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1960
- Cox, Stephen, The Beverly Hillbillies, New York: Harper, 1992
- Croisille, Jean-Michel, Les Natures Mortes Campaniennes, Brussels, Belgium: Latomus, 1965
- Drerup, Heinrich, Zum Ausstattungsluxus in der römischen Architektur, Münster, Germany: Aschendorffsche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1957
- Friedlaender, Ludwig, Roman Life and Manners Under the Early Empire, translated from the seventh edition of Vom Sittengeschichte Roms, by L. A. Magnus, London: G. Routledge, 1913
- Gnoli, Raniero, Marmora Romana, Rome: Edizione dell'Elefante, 1988
- Hollander, Anne, Seeing Through Clothes, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1993
- Kates, George Norbert, Chinese Household Furniture, New York: Harper, 1948
- Schafer, Edward H., The Golden Peaches of Samarkand: A Study of T'ang Exotics, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1963
- Schama, Simon, The Embarrassment of Riches: An Interpretation of Dutch Culture of the Golden Age, New York: Knopf, 1988
- Sekora, John, Luxury: The Concept in Western Thought, Eden to Smollett, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1977
- Vandier, Jacques, Manuel d'archéologie Egyptienne, Paris: Picard, 1964
- Vollmer, John, Silk Roads, China Ships: An Exhibition of East-West Trade, Toronto: Royal Ontario Museum, 1983
- Wilford, John Noble, "Remaking the Wheel: Evolution of the Chariot," New York Times (February 22, 1994)
- Williams, Rosalind, Dream Worlds: Mass Consumption in Late Nineteenth-Century France, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1982
- Zanker, P., "Die Villa als Vorbild des Späten Pompejanischen Wohngeschmacks," Jahrbuch des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts 94 (1979)

MADNESS

Fritz Laupichler

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Madness:

HERCULES

AJAX

ATHAMAS

OTHER GREEK AND ROMAN MYTHS

NEBUCHADNEZZAR

JESUS HEALING THE POSSESSED AT GERASA

DAVID PLAYING THE HARP TO CURE SAUL

SAINTS HEALING MADNESS

REALISTIC DEPICTIONS OF
MADNESS

MODERN DEPICTIONS OF
MADNESS

LITERARY THEMES OF
MADNESS

Artus Quellinus the Elder, The Woman from the Madhouse (Frenzy), circa 1650, statue, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum. (Courtesy of the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, The Netherlands)

Madness as a phenomenon is as old as the history of humankind, and the changes in its depiction in art reflect the varying estimation of madness and insanity by society and by artists. Under the entry “Pazzia,” Cesare Ripa describes madness in his Iconologia (1603) as a laughing man clothed in a long black dress, riding on a reed, with toy windmills as attributes; alternatively, as a barefooted maiden with tousled hair, clothed in a shot-colored dress, with a bearskin and a candle.

Madness is only represented sporadically in the visual arts in general. Thematically it covers depictions of simple emotional disturbances (such as melancholy), real eruptions of madness, madhouse scenes, and portraits of insane persons. In a broader sense, the spectrum includes the madness sent by the gods as vengeance or punishment to persons from Greek and Roman mythology; healings of the possessed by Jesus Christ and a number of saints (for instance St. Cyriacus of Rome); and representations of insanity, including real madmen since the sixteenth century, madhouse scenes since the eighteenth century, portraits of insane persons, and descriptions of lunatic imaginations.

Madness may be defined as disorder of mind and soul that causes insane imaginations, and it can be represented by mimicry and gestures, by the pictorial description of hallucinations, by lunatic activities, or by the physiognomy alone. The subject of madness must be differentiated from, on the one hand, representations of the fool, in the sense of court jester or Schalksnarr, which must be iconographically verified in each single case; and on the other hand, medical illustrations (since the beginning of the nineteenth century) and pictorial representations of psychiatry patients.

In the sphere of antique mythology, eruptions of madness and activities deriving therefrom occur in the stories of Hercules, Ajax, Lycurgus, Melampus, Attis, and Athamas. Hercules married Megara, the daughter of King Creon, who bore him several children. His enemy, the goddess Hera, sent him an attack of madness, whereupon Hercules killed all his children by throwing them into a fire; his action is depicted in a calyx krater from Paestum, Italy (350–325 B.C.), and a painting (circa 1620) by Alessandro Turchi in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany.

Ajax, the bravest Greek hero (after Achilles) during the war against Troy, lost a quarrel about the weapons of Achilles. He was struck with madness by Athena, the goddess of wisdom, and raved against a herd of cattle, fancying they were his enemies. The scene is pictured in a Hellenistic drinking vessel from Boeotia, now in the National Museum in Athens, Greece; in a black-figured amphora of about 540 B.C. by Exekias in the Musée Municipal in Boulogne, France; and by Nicolas Poussin, in his painting The Kingdom of Flora (1631) in the Galerie Alte Meister in Dresden, Germany.

Lycurgus, king of the Edones in Thrace, opposed the introduction of the Dionysus cult. For punishment, Dionysus struck him with madness, whereupon Lycurgus cut off his own legs, mistaking them for his vine shoots. His gruesome action is shown in the Roman Lycurgus mosaic of the second century.

Melampus, one of the great Greek seers, cured King Proteus's daughters of madness. As his price, Melampus received parts of the authoritative power of Argolis. The scene appears on a Lucanian nestorid of about 380 B.C. Cybele, the great mother of the gods, drove her paramour, Attis, to madness when he broke his faith by loving the nymph Sagaritis. In his frenzy he castrated himself and died immediately. A terracotta statue in the Beautiful Style from Cyprus depicts him. He gained prominence in the cult of Cybele during Roman times. Her priests are reputed to have castrated themselves and simulated madness in commemoration of Attis's death.

Ino, the wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, brought up Dionysus, the son of Zeus, the king of gods, and the mortal Semele. The vengeful Hera, wife of Zeus, descended into Hades and asked for help. The Fury Tisiphone, one of the Erinyes who pursued the mortal Orestes, caused Ino and Athamas to become mentally disturbed, whereupon Athamas killed his son Learchus because he considered him to be a stag. Ino threw herself into the sea with her son Melicertes. An Apulian bell krater of 340–330 B.C. and Pio Fedi's sculpture The Fury of Athamas (circa 1890) in Florence, Italy, depict their story.

The gods caused many instances of madness, sometimes not directly but through an intermediary, for the purpose of revenge, often for some petty slight. The results nearly always led to the victim's self-destruction, and frequently, as a result of the madness, the victims killed other innocent members of their families. The representations of Odysseus, who plowed with an ox and an ass yoked together and sowed salt because he did not want to join the war with Troy, are worth mentioning, but they do not strictly belong in the present context because his madness was feigned. Representations of madness and insanity in Greek and Roman mythology are infrequent; the few exceptions are not reproduced to any extent in the art of later periods, even in the Renaissance and Baroque periods, which often drew on Greek and Roman mythology for subject matter.

Christian iconography contributes to the madness theme in the visual arts with examples from the Old Testament (Saul, Nebuchadnezzar), the New Testament (healing of the possessed at Gerasa), and the legends of saints.

When the spirit of God had left King Saul, he fell into a deep melancholy, and the young David cheered him up by playing his harp (I Samuel 16:23). The representation of this scene was very popular for centuries. Whereas medieval depictions usually only show Saul suffering and lying on his bed, later artists such as Rembrandt van Rijn are interested in both the mentally diseased Saul and the harp-playing David. The differences can be seen by comparing folio 26v of the French Shah-Abbas-Bible (circa 1250) to Rembrandt's painting David Playing the Harp Before Saul (before 1669) in the Städel Institut in Frankfurt, Germany.

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, corresponding to a prophecy of Daniel, had to live in the wilderness for seven years like an animal, without understanding, because of his hubris (Daniel 4:32–34). The scene is depicted on folio 252 in the Spanish Beatus-Apocalypse (circa 950) and by Santi di Tito in Nebuchadnezzar Eating Grass (before 1603), in the Museo Gregoriano Etrusco in the Vatican. The madness of David at the court of the king of Gath is seldom depicted and is irrelevant to this analysis because it was insanity feigned as self-protection.

Among New Testament scenes, representations of the healing of the possessed at Gerasa (Matthew 8:28–34, Mark 5:1–20, Luke 8:26–39) are worth mention because, in comparison with other scenes of this kind, they appear frequently in the visual arts, particularly in book illuminations of the ninth and tenth centuries. In the vicinity of Gerasa Jesus Christ met a man possessed by demons living naked in a graveyard. Jesus drew the demons out of the man and into a herd of pigs, which thereupon threw themselves into the Sea of Genezareth and drowned. Examples of this scene appear on an ivory relief, the so-called Magdeburg-Antependium (970); on folio 53v of the Codex Aureus (1040) from Echternach; and on the painting Christ and the Possessed (circa 1660–1690) by Mattia Preti in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence.

The representations of miraculous healings of Christ, as signs of the might and glory of God, were expressions of a deep desire for salvation. Since the twelfth century this longing turned away from the figure of Christ and toward a number of saints. The number of representations of miraculous healings of saints is therefore relatively high. Cyriacus of Rome, who healed Arthemina, daughter of Emperor Diocletian, and Jobia, daughter of the king of Persia, is an outstanding example. His healing skills are pictured on folio 57v in the Passionale (circa 1130) from Zwiefalten; in Matthias Grünewald's painting Cyriacus Heals Arthemina (early sixteenth century) in the Städel Institut in Frankfurt; and in Bartholomäus Bruyn the Elder's Cyriacus Heals Arthemina (before 1555) in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich.

In medieval Europe, insane people were treated as if they were condemned by God and therefore had to be exorcised or persecuted as bewitched or devilish. In Wild Man, a woodcut created in 1520, Lucas Cranach the Elder depicts such a madman running amok in the woods. In 1691 Giacomo Maria Giovannini published a print after Lodovico Carracci that shows A Fool Running to the Monastery of St. Benedict in Order to Regain Her Sanity.

Sometimes "fools" were locked up in wooden cages to be shown to onlookers for money, as in the anonymous woodcut The Fools' Cage (circa 1550). It is sometimes difficult to distinguish these representations of fools from those of the court jester or Schalksnarr without intensive iconographic research. Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Dulle Griet (Dull = Mad), which has frequently been interpreted as a representation of a madwoman, is actually a personification of avarice.

During the Renaissance and Baroque periods, artists and their patrons often chose miraculous healings of the possessed as themes. Examples include the altarpieces of Matthias Grünewald, Cyriacus Heals Arthemina in the Städel Institut in Frankfurt, and Peter Paul Rubens, Ignatius of Loyola Heals the Possessed (circa 1615–1616) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria. Rubens depicts the demoniac crisis of hysteria so strikingly that psychiatrists J. M. Charcot and Paul Richer integrated this picture as an artistic example in their Nouvelle iconographie Salpêtrière. Also worth mention are the realistic altarpiece (1628) by Rutilio di Lorenzo Manetti in S. Domenico in Siena, Italy, and works by Lodovico Carracci and Jacob Jordaens, inferred from engravings after the paintings.

In the course of time, belief in supernatural causes of madness crumbled; insane persons were increasingly considered only unsocial and consequently were imprisoned with criminals. The first special hospitals for mad persons were built in Spain in the fifteenth century; the rest of Europe did not follow suit until the seventeenth century.

In the garden of the madhouse of Amsterdam, The Netherlands, was the statue now called The Woman from the Madhouse (Frenzy) (circa 1650), attributed to Artus Quellinus the Elder (1609–1668). It depicts a woman who has torn off her clothes seated on a stump; she seems ready to jump up in wild excitement, but her maniacal disturbance is so great that coordinated movements are impossible. On the pedestal are four reliefs representing the heads of insane patients who want to liberate themselves from captivity. This sandstone statue, reminiscent of representations of the penitent Mary Magdalen, is now in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. Also in the Rijksmuseum is the terra-cotta group Two Madmen (1673) by Pieter Xavery. Long interpreted iconographically as Orlando Furioso, it is actually two madmen who suffer from their state of mind and their situation. The three statues in the Boboli Gardens at Florence, which are named Mattacini (Jokers), are representations of madmen as well, for which studies in a madhouse must have been made; the group is attributed to Romolo di Francesco Ferrucci (circa 1621).

The 49 almost life-size heads showing physiognomic studies by eighteenth-century Austrian sculptor Franz Xaver Messerschmidt probably do not represent the effects of mental illness, but rather the transformation of the demon of madness into human grimaces. German poet Nikolaus Lenau commented: "There must have been something in this sculptor, which could have let him become a fool. Fortunately it was deposited within him as art." This estimation applies to many artists.

In the English graphic arts of the eighteenth century, the representation of madness and insanity reached a new social and psychological intensity. William Hogarth, in the eighth and last engraving of the series The Rake's Progress (1735), depicts the interior of a lunatic asylum. After an attempted suicide, the fettered titular hero is cared for by a group of attendants and priests. The similarity of this group to representations of the Pietà is remarkable. The radical depiction of the group in this print probably forms the first exact physiognomic study of lunatics. In 1775 William Dickinson published the copper engraving Madness, which portrays a madwoman in chains, after a painting of Robert Edge Pine.

Francisco de Goya, probably influenced by Hogarth and inspired by his own physical and mental crisis of the years after 1790, painted the interior of the lunatic asylum of Zaragoza, Spain, around 1790. The inmates, who are acting out their hallucinations, are represented through grotesque pantomime. Unlike the Hogarth print, neither attendants nor chains are recognizable. Two versions exist: Casa de locos (circa 1795) in Madrid, Spain; and Corral de locos (1793–1794) in Dallas, Texas.

The German romantic Wilhelm Kaulbach, inspired by Hogarth and encouraged by his academic teacher Peter Cornelius, visited the lunatic asylum of Düsseldorf, Germany. Deeply impressed by what he saw, Kaulbach depicts the different states of mind and the physiognomies of the well-clothed inmates with great exactness in his drawing The Madhouse (1835). Male and female patients, not separated from each other, show no signs of excitement or disinhibition. Chains or fetters are not recognizable, and an attendant with a bunch of keys in his hand does not intervene. The treatment of the theme is nearly without emotion, and the scene resembles a theater performance with an allegorical and typological representation of lunatics.

Between 1822 and 1823 French painter Théodore Géricault produced 10 pictures of lunatics for the director of the Salpêtrière in Paris, probably to document clinical studies, for instruction, or as patterns for medical illustrations. These paintings represent—for the first time in art—portraits of insane persons without distorted mimicry, dramatization, demonizing, or any attributes of lunacy. Five of the original 10 paintings are extant: portraits of a kidnapper, a woman suffering from obsessive envy, a kleptomaniac, a man suffering from delusions of military rank, and a woman addicted to gambling.

Soon after Géricault's portrait cycle, prints of insane persons appeared in the medical publications of J. E. Esquirol (1838), Karl-Heinrich Baumgärtner (1840), Alexander Morison (1848), and Maximilian Leidesdorf (1865). These prints manifested interest in physiognomies as a mirror of the mental state of madhouse patients.

Géricault's artistic attainment becomes evident if his portraits are compared with the etching Hunger, Madness, Crime (circa 1845) by the Belgian artist Antoine Joseph Wiertz. A woman driven mad by social misery and hunger has killed her child and cut off one leg to put it into a cooking pot. Although bloodthirsty and terrible, the scene does not arouse horror because Wiertz does not succeed in expressing the physiognomic indications of introverted madness in a psychologically convincing manner.

In a series of drawings by the German classicist-romantic painter Bonaventura Genelli, From the Life of an Artist (after 1850), the drawing View into the Madhouse holds an exceptional position. It was created out of the "desire also to record in pencil the physiognomic language of human disturbance" (Genelli). For this purpose the artist climbed up the wall of the madhouse garden to look down at the inmates. Genelli expressed the affects of the insane persons compassionately and seriously: the madness of ecstatic enthusiasm, the megalomaniac, and the madwoman disappointed in her hope for lover's bliss. The main subject of the drawing, however, is romantic fantasy and its special affinity with the unusual and the grotesque and its specific mixture of compassion and observation.

English painter Richard Dadd murdered his father out of persecution mania, whereupon he was locked up in the madhouse of London for the rest of his life. During this time he produced several watercolors. Agony, Raving Madness (1854) quite conventionally shows a mad person put in chains and lying on straw in his cell. The watercolor, however, without interest in the actual situation in the madhouse, Bethlem (Bedlam), reveals only disturbance and despair.

In his painting The Ward of the Madwomen at S. Bonifazio in Florence (1865), Italian painter Telemaco Signorini depicts the great excitement of female patients who, wildly gesticulating, show first signs of protest against their situation. This painting, obviously influenced by Goya, impressed Edgar Degas. The perspective of the madhouse interior anticipates Vincent van Gogh's Vincent's Sleeping Room at Arles (1889).

The lithograph Madness (circa 1901) by Austrian expressionist Alfred Kubin, from the series Demon and Nightphantoms (first published in 1923), was produced while the artist was at least temporarily insane. Kubin reported that after having visited an exhibition of works by Max Klinger, an attack of demons and a hallucinatory episode of artistic imagination drove him to transform his obsessions cathartically into hundreds of drawings and prints. Madness shows the mad Kubin himself and a small demon with a hammer driving a nail into the artist's head. Kubin's pen drawing The Madhouse (1914) depicts an attempted escape of panic-stricken insane persons from a madhouse court. An attendant, dressed in nineteenth-century clothing and holding a whip in his hand, observes the scene but does not interfere.

The lithograph Nietzsche and the Madness (1907–1908) is the work of Luigi Russolo, the cofounder of Italian futurism. Nietzsche's head, exactly portrayed, appears directly beside Insanity, represented as a woman's head. Both heads nearly merge into each other and form an inseparable unit. The statue Mad Virgin (1912) by the Belgian sculptor Rik Wouters is an expressionistic study of movement inspired by the American dancer Isadora Duncan.

The German expressionist Erich Heckel, stimulated by his experiences in hospitals during World War I and because of his interest in social and psychological problems, produced several paintings with representations of insane persons, including Blind Lunatics at Table (1914) and From a Madhouse (1914). Simultaneous use of different perspectival viewpoints creates an unstable space and an undefined and threatening composition in both paintings.

Swiss artist Paul Klee exchanged drawings with Alfred Kubin and collected artworks of mad persons. French painter Jean Dubuffet also used such works for the development of his Art Brut. This influence is evident, for instance, in Klee's colored lithograph A Man in Love (1923). It symbolically represents sexual obsession through the expressions of lunatics. This circumstance made it simple to defame Paul Klee and his art in the exhibition "Entartete Kunst" (Degenerated Art) of 1937 in Munich as mad and degenerate. A decade and a half earlier, physician and art historian Hans Prinzhorn published his fundamental book on the works of art of lunatics, Bildneri der Geisteskranken (1922), in which he tried to analyze the "original creative impulse" that he thought inherent to all human beings. The question of whether the pictorial representations of lunatics have a special artistic value is brought up to the 1990s in the exhibition catalogue Parallele Visionen: Künstler und Aubenseiter (Parallel Visions: Artists and Outsider) (Basel, Switzerland, 1993).

The lithograph Dance in a Madhouse (1917), by American graphic artist George Bellows, is stylistically a romantic work, and the influence of nineteenth-century art is evident. However, Bellows takes more interest in the picturesque-melodramatic aspects of the scene and much less in the illness of the patients. The Mad Woman (1925) by Otto Dix—similar to the drawing of Luigi Russolo—is made of two spheres brought together like a montage: the realistic individual portrait is positioned above, and the phantasmagoria of the delusional ideas is positioned below.

The painting The Great Paranoic (1936) by Spanish surrealist Salvador Dalí depicts a head consisting of writhing and winding figures. These figures, illusionistically as well as photographically exact, project nervous energy and a mental constitution, the name of which is expressed in the title: paranoia as expression of hallucinations and delusional ideas.

American graphic artist Robert Riggs pursued intensive studies in the psychiatric department of the Philadelphia State Hospital in Pennsylvania. In his lithograph Psychopathic Ward (1945), he presents the patients and their situations with photographic accuracy. The American pop artist Roy Lichtenstein created a series dealing with science-fiction themes (1963–1964). The painting Mad Scientist (1963), a reproduction of an unknown comic strip, shows in a cool and detached manner how a megalomaniacal scientist handles a machine with which he threatens humanity.

German painter and draftsman Jan Peter Tripp spent some time in a psychiatric hospital in 1972. While there, he sketched his fellow patients. The portrait drawings Else and Jakob, which radiate a great suggestive power, are veristic and exact; each wrinkle and each pore are visible, and the subjects' states of psychic ruin are clearly recognizable.

Since 1968 Austrian artist Arnulf Rainer, known from the Documenta 1972 exhibition, has photographed himself again and again with grimaces and in poses that are adapted from old photographs of madhouse patients who have not been manipulated by psychopharmacological drugs. The work of Franz Xaver Messerschmidt provides the model for Rainer's physical-language self-representation, which attempts to preserve the culturally discriminated and provocative physiognomic singularity of madhouse patients.

In addition to the representations deriving from classical mythology, Christian iconography, and the madhouse pictures and portraits of insane persons in a broader sense, a number of insane figures from postclassical literature also occur in the visual arts. The main subject in Ludovico Ariosto's epic poem Orlando Furioso, in which the Roland saga has been combined with Arthurian legends, is the unfortunate love of Orlando for Angelica. This love drives him to madness because Angelica does not return his affections and prefers the love of Medoro. Although many artists have derived subjects from this story, perhaps the most elaborate are Julius Schnorr von Carolsfeld's frescoes (1822–1827) in the Casino Massimo, Ariosto Hall in Rome.

In Shakespeare's drama Hamlet Ophelia loves Hamlet, who rejects her out of his world-weariness. Singing and with flowers and herbs in her hair, the maddened Ophelia flees to her watery death in the river. Many nineteenth-century artists painted this scene; perhaps the best known version is by John Everett Millais (1851–1852). In Shakespeare's tragedy Macbeth, Lady Macbeth, plotting with her husband to kill the king, completes the task herself but collapses under the psychic pressure of the situation and becomes mad. Important Shakespeare illustrators include Henry Fuseli, Daniel Chodowiecki, Eugène Delacroix, Peter Cornelius, Oskar Kokoschka, and Max Slevogt.

In Goethe's Faust, Gretchen yields herself to her beloved, but conscious of having committed a sin, she kills her child and becomes insane. Although the number of illustrated editions of Faust is large, there have been only a few attempts by outstanding artists to treat this great literary work pictorially. Goethe himself commended the drawings of Peter Cornelius, the academic teacher of Kaulbach. In Scene in the Jail (1815) and other works, Cornelius, enthusiastic about bringing back to life the central figures of national sagas, shows Gretchen as a saint—a repentant Mary Magdalen—and an angel brings her a martyrs' wreath as a sign of salvation. The lithographs of Eugène Delacroix also won Goethe's recognition. The etchings of Max Slevogt and the woodcuts of Ernst Barlach deserve mention.

Madness is represented in the world's literature, religions, and mythologies. In giving visual embodiments to these descriptions, artists have also depicted their personal observations of madness, both in others and, in a few cases, in themselves.

See also Fools/Folly; Humors; Melancholy; Physiognomy

Selected Works of Art

Hercules

The Madness of Hercules, calyx krater, 350–325 B.C., from Paestum, Italy, now in Madrid, Spain, Museo Archeologico

Turchi, Alessandro, The Raving Hercules (Hercules and Omphale), oil painting, circa 1620, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Canova, Antonio, Hercules (in His Madness) Killing His Sons, painting, 1799, Bassano del Grappa, Italy, Musico Civico

Allar, André-Joseph, Hercules Discovering His Dead Son, sculpture, before 1926, Toulon, France, Musées Municipaux

Ajax

Exekias, The Suicide of Ajax, black-figured amphora, circa 540 B.C., Boulogne, France, Musée Municipal

The Madness of Ajax, drinking vessel, from Boeotia, now in Athens, Greece, National Museum

Poussin, Nicolas, The Kingdom of Flora, 1631, Dresden, Germany, Galerie Alte Meister

Fuseli, Henry, The Mad Ajax, After Slaying the Lambs, Recovers Himself and Is Surprised by His Comrades, drawing, 1768, Zurich, Switzerland, Kunsthau

Athamas

Athamas Kills His Son Learchus, bell krater, 340–330 B.C., from Apulia, now in Geneva, Switzerland, private collection

Flaxman, John, The Fury of Athamas, marble sculpture group, 1790–1794, Ickworth House, Suffolk, England, Ickworth House

Fedi, Pio, The Fury of Athamas, sculpture, circa 1890, Florence, Italy

Other Greek and Roman Myths

Melampus Cures the Daughters of Proteus of Madness, nestoris, from Lucania, circa 380 B.C., now in Naples, Italy, Museo Archeologico Nazionale

The Madness of Lycurgus, Roman mosaic, second century, Taormina, Italy, Villa S. Pankrazia

Mad Attis Castrates Himself, terra-cotta statue, Beautiful Style, from Cyprus, now in Paris

Nebuchadnezzar

Beatus-Apocalypse, circa 950, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M. 644, fol. 252)

Santi di Tito, Nebuchadnezzar Eating Grass, before 1603, Vatican, Museo Gregoriano Etrusco

Jesus Healing the Possessed at Gerasa

Magdeburg-Antependium, ivory-relief, 970, Darmstadt, Germany, Landesmuseum

Codex Aureus, from Echternach, 1040, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum (Ms 156142, fol. 53v)

Preti, Mattia, Christ and the Possessed, oil painting, circa 1660–1690, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

David Playing the Harp

Shah-Abbas-Bible, French, circa 1250, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M. 638, fol. 26v)

Rembrandt van Rijn, David Playing the Harp Before Saul, before 1669, Frankfurt, Germany, Städel Institut

Saints Healing Madness

Passionale, Zwiefalten, circa 1130, Stuttgart, Germany, Württembergische Landesbibliothek (Cod. bibl. 20, 36–58, fol. 57v)

Grünwald, Matthias, Cyriacus Heals Arthemias, early sixteenth century, Frankfurt, Germany, Städel Institut

Bruyn, Bartholomäus, the Elder, Cyriacus Heals Arthemias, before 1555, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Rubens, Peter Paul, Ignatius of Loyola Heals the Possessed, circa 1615–1616, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Realistic Depictions of Madness

Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Wild Man, woodcut, 1520, Berlin, Germany, Kupferstichkabinett

The Fools' Cage, woodcut, circa 1550, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum

Quellinus, Artus, the Elder, The Woman from the Madhouse (Frenzy), sandstone statue, circa 1650, Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum

Xavery, Pieter, Two Madmen, terra-cotta group, 1673, Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum

Giovannini, Giacomo Maria, A Fool Running to the Monastery of St. Benedict in Order to Regain Her Sanity, copper engraving, 1691

Ferrucci, Romolo di Francesco, Mattacini, stone figure group, circa 1621, Florence, Italy, Boboli Gardens

Hogarth, William, The Rake's Progress, copper engraving, 1735, London, The Bethlem Royal Hospital and the Maudsley Health Authority

Dickinson, William, Madness, copper engraving, 1775

Goya, Francisco de, Corral de locos (Yard of a Madhouse), oil on tin, 1793–1794, Dallas, Texas, Southern Methodist University, Meadows Museum

Goya, Francisco de, Casa de locos, oil painting, circa 1795, Madrid, Spain, Academia de San Fernando

Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Kidnapper, oil painting, 1822, Springfield, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Kleptomaniac, oil painting, 1822, Ghent, Belgium, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Man Suffering from Delusions of Military Rank, oil painting, 1822,

Winterthur, Switzerland, Oskar Reinhart Collection

Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Woman Addicted to Gambling, oil painting, 1822, Paris, Louvre

Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Woman Suffering from Obsessive Envy, oil painting, 1822, Lyon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Kaulbach, Wilhelm, The Madhouse, pencil drawing, 1835, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen

Wiertz, Antoine Joseph, Hunger, Madness, Crime, etching, circa 1845

Genelli, Bonaventura, View into the Madhouse, pencil drawing, after 1850, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

Dadd, Richard, Agony, Raving Madness, watercolor drawing, 1854, London, The Bethlem Royal Hospital and the Maudsley Hospital Health Authority

Vedder, Elihu, The Lost Mind, 1864–1865, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Signorini, Telemaco, The Ward of the Madwomen at S. Bonifazio in Florence, 1865, Venice, Italy, Gallery of Modern Art in Cà Pesaro

Modern Depictions of Madness

Kubin, Alfred, Madness, lithograph, circa 1901

Russolo, Luigi, Nietzsche and the Madness, lithograph, 1907–1908, Milan, Italy, Raccolta della Stampe, Castello Sforzesco

Wouters, Rik, Mad Virgin, bronze statue, 1912, Antwerp, Belgium, Musée Royal des Beaux-Arts

Kubin, Alfred, The Madhouse, pen drawing, 1914, Linz, Austria, Landesmuseum

Heckel, Erich, Blind Lunatics at Table, oil painting, 1914, Mönchengladbach, Germany, Städtisches Museum Abteiberg

Heckel, Erich, From a Madhouse, oil painting, 1914, Gelsenkirchen, Germany, Städtisches Museum

Bellows, George, Dance in a Madhouse, lithograph, 1917

- Klee, Paul, A Man in Love, lithograph, 1923
 Dix, Otto, The Madwoman, oil painting, 1925, Mannheim, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Dalí, Salvador, The Great Paranoic, oil painting, 1936, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans van Beuningen
 Riggs, Robert, Psychopathic Ward, lithograph, 1945
 Tripp, Jan Peter, Jakob, pencil watercolor drawing, 1963, Pforzheim, Germany, Collection R. Kraus Lichtenstein, Roy, Mad Scientist, oil painting, 1972, Cologne, Germany, Museum Ludwig Tripp, Jan Peter, Else, pencil watercolor drawing, 1972, Pforzheim, Germany, Collection R. Kraus

Literary Themes of Madness

- Cornelius, Peter, Faust: Scene in the Jail, pencil drawing, 1815, Frankfurt, Germany, Städel Institut, Graphische Sammlung
 Carolsfeld, Julius von, Ariost-Frescoes, circa 1822, Rome, Casino Massimo, Ariosto Hall
 Millais, John Everett, Ophelia, 1851–1852, London, Tate Gallery

Further Reading

- Allen, J. B. L., "Mad Robin: Richard Dadd," Art Quarterly 30:1 (Spring 1967)
 Bhattacharya-Stettler, Therese, Noxmentis: Die Darstellung von Wahnsinn in der Kunst des 19 Jahrhunderts, Bern, Germany, 1989
 Clair, Jean, Wunderblock: Eine Geschichte der Modernen Seele, Wein, Germany, 1989
 Coplans, John, Roy Lichtenstein, New York: Praeger, 1972; London: Allen Lane, 1972
 Dotson, Esther Gordon, Shakespeare Illustrated, 1770–1820 (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1973)
 Ebert, Hans, Bonaventura Genelli, Weimar, Germany, 1971
 Eitner, Lorenz, Géricault, His Life and Work, London: Orbis, 1982
 Geus, Armin, Krankheit und Kranksein, Marburg, Germany: Basiliken-Presse, 1983
 Gorsen, Peter, Kunst und Krankheit, Frankfurt, Germany: Europäische Verlagsanstalt, 1980
 Holländer, Eugen, Die Medizin in der klassischen Malerei, Stuttgart, Germany: F. Enke, 1950
 ———, Plastik und Medizin, Stuttgart, Germany: F. Enke, 1912
 Kiell, Norman, Psychiatry and Psychology in the Visual Arts and Aesthetics: A Biography, Madison, Wisconsin: University of Wisconsin Press, 1965
 Leeuwenberg, Jaap, Beeldhouwkunst in het Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Staatsuitgeverij, 1973
Lexicon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae, Zurich, Switzerland, 1981
 Lyons, Albert S., Histoire Illustrée de la Médecine, Paris: Presses de la Renaissance, 1979
 MacGregor, John, The Discovery of the Art of the Insane, Princeton, New Jersey, and London: Princeton University Press, 1989
 Miller, Margaret, "Géricault's Paintings of the Insane," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institute 4 (1941)
 Prinzhorn, Hans, Bildnerei der Geisteskranken, Berlin: Springer, 1922
 Putscher, Marielene, Geschichte der Medizinischen Abbildung, Munich, 1972
 Reitman, Francis, Insanity, Art, and Culture, New York: Philosophical Library, 1954
 Richer, Paul, L'Art et la Médecine, Paris, 1901
 Rosoman, Leonard, On Breugel's "Mad Meg," London: Cassell, 1969
 Salaman, Malcolm Charles, Shakespeare in Pictorial Art, London and New York: The Studio, 1916
 Sanchez, Alfonso E. Perez, et al. Goya and the Spirit of Enlightenment, Boston: Little, Brown, 1989
 Schadewaldt, Hans, and L. Binet, Kunst und Medizin, Köln, Germany: Schauberg, 1967
 Sheon, Aaron, "Caricature and the Physiognomy of the Insane," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 6:88 (October 1976)
 Vogt, Helmut, Das Bild des Kranken, Munich: Lehmann, 1980
 Wegner, Wolfgang, Die Faustdarstellungen vom 10. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Staatsuitgeverij, 1962
 Ziggrosser, Carl, Acta Medica: A Collection of Medical Prints Presented to the Philadelphia Museum of Art, Philadelphia: Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1955

MARGINS/OUTSIDERS

Priscilla Baumann

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Margins/Outsiders:

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

EIGHTEENTH–TWENTIETH CENTURY

French School, Bayeux Tapestry: Harold Journeying to Normandy, eleventh century, embroidered linen, Bayeux, France, Musée de la Tapisserie. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg/Art Resource, New York)

Many common contemporary expressions make reference to “the margin” or “the edge.” Certain people or activities are termed “marginal” or “beyond the pale”; the emotionally unstable are often categorized as “borderline” or “over the edge”; fashion in dress, food, language, or literary taste is considered either “in” or “out.” This contemporary vocabulary echoes the universal human reflex to organize and judge society, a process that often relegates those elements perceived as less desirable to the periphery.

Etymologically, the margin refers to the border, the edge, or the frontier. The original meaning of the term marginal evolved from a common medieval practice whereby the blank parchment of a manuscript surrounding or framing a written text was decorated with humorous, scatological, or subversive illustrations—hence, the negative connotation frequently associated with the term.

Throughout history, societies have repeatedly created their own metaphoric margins as invisible but powerful walls for protection, barriers for exclusion, or signs of danger. Depending on the period in time, the specific subjects relegated to the margins shift, and these changes in popular taste or political necessity are reflected in art with varying iconography and creative emphasis. In the physical world, geographic markers like rivers or mountains form natural margins that separate, protect, or enclose space. Political or national boundaries form similar, although more arbitrary, margins. Charlemagne created “marches,” or military margins, on the frontiers of his realm, which formed a buffer zone between relatively peaceful inner lands and the chaotic, lawless, and frightening wilderness of the regions outside.

Intellectually and philosophically, the marginal refers to ideas and concepts too alien or threatening for popular or general acceptance. Theories of an advanced nature might be described in a complimentary manner as being “on the cutting edge,” but a mystical poet or ragged street musician might be described in a derogatory sense as living “on the fringe.” Moral convictions not approved by the establishment might likewise be considered marginal and their resulting activities condemned. At various times, such marginal activities might have included the efforts of suffragettes, abolitionists, or proponents of euthanasia. The theological state of limbo—an intermediate place between heaven and hell, where souls, through no fault of their own, await redemption—constitutes yet another sort of fringe area. Psychological statisticians use the term outlier to describe exceptions: those members of society not within the normal distribution. All of these examples make specific reference in some way to the margin or the boundary and to the realm that lies beyond that limit.

Marginal members of contemporary twentieth-century society might include migrant workers, illegal aliens, or welfare recipients, as well as certain physically or emotionally handicapped persons. Feminists argue that women have been treated as marginal citizens throughout much of the history of Western civilization. From the Middle Ages to the present, marginal members of society have included lepers, Jews, prostitutes, witches, Gypsies, moneylenders, midwives, sexual deviants, and the physically malformed. During the Victorian Age, the poor, especially the homeless and the criminal, were particularly identified as marginal. In every century, the margins of society have been clearly defined physically, socially, and morally. From schoolchildren scolded when their handwriting slips outside the margins on their paper, to those persecuted or ostracized by society, the visible and invisible bounds of acceptable behavior and belief constrain us all. These perceived or real margins, along with the forbidden, feared, misunderstood, or despised subjects relegated within their boundaries, have inspired artists and their iconographic vocabularies for centuries.

Artists use various strategies to identify the marginal: compositional devices, where centrality and symmetry negate or minimize the marginal; specific iconographic markers like peculiar costumes or attributes; or depiction of a clearly marginal subject in a realistic or sentimental manner to transform their meaning or importance.

During the Middle Ages, scurrilous, subversive, or sinful subjects were placed safely within the margins. One example is found in the eleventh-century Bayeux Tapestry, with its clearly articulated horizontal bands at the upper and lower edge of an embroidered linen strip. In the border under a scene in which Harold is being led to William, a naked man and woman are shown about to copulate. This audacious counterpoint to the scene unfolding above hints at many possible meanings. Regardless of the intended effect, however, the overt sexual activity and shocking state of undress of the couple mean that they couldn't have been placed anywhere else but in the margin.

The twelfth-century central tympanum in the narthex of the Church of the Madeleine (1120–1132) at Vézelay, France, offers a more sophisticated example of placing the undesirable in the borders, at the edge, and as far as possible from the center. In the eight compartments of the archivolt, different kinds of human impairment are depicted: organic defects of the blind, the deaf, and the mute; mental illness and possession by the devil; and various physical disabilities like lameness or paralysis. The artist implies a hierarchy of these imperfect states and places the most seriously ill farthest from the central figure of Jesus Christ. Similarly, unusual races like the floppy-eared Panotii, considered monstrous because of their paganism and imagined deformities, are found on the lowest register, within the borders of the lintel.

On the exterior walls of many Romanesque churches, corbel sculptures of lewd, antic, or aberrational subjects decorate the cornice or string course. These images are placed a significant distance from any centrally planned sculptural program, often not plainly visible from the ground, and often relegated to the periphery of the building. Romanesque painting follows an analogous technique of exclusion. At Nohant-Vicq, in the province of Berry, France, a fresco of the Last Supper (twelfth century) depicts Judas in the foreground, separated from Christ and the other apostles by the horizontal barrier of the dining table. The asymmetrical placement of Judas serves to isolate him, exclude him from the others, and thereby indicate his treachery.

A scene from the fourteenth-century The Cloisters Apocalypse provides an example of the medieval technique of the diagrammatically conceived composition, where centrality and symmetry create a hieratic and static effect. Christ, the largest and most imposing figure, surrounded by a mandorla and the symbols of the Evangelists, sits at the exact center. Four rectangular frames placed at each corner of the picture contain six elders each. The resulting effect of controlled order reflects the medieval belief in a timeless, cosmic equilibrium, with God at its center, the ultimate source of power.

Fifteenth-century Italian painters employed similar methods to emphasize the hierarchical importance of their subjects. In Gentile da Fabriano's The Adoration of the Magi (1423), two miserable beggars, stooped outcasts, are placed in a lower right panel of a predella. Not a part of the central painting, the beggars are outside of the architectural center of the individual scene. Both figuratively and compositionally, these figures have been marginalized. In Expulsion from Paradise (circa 1445), Giovanni di Paolo depicts Adam and Eve at the very edge of a panel, pushed by an angel away from the fertile garden and into the unknown. In another version of this scene, in a fresco in the Brancacci Chapel in Florence, Italy (circa 1427), Masaccio emphasizes the grief of this moment of loss. His Adam and Eve, overwhelmed with remorse and shame, are shown scurrying away to the margins of the painting. In the Middle Ages, the edges of a panel, tympanum, or building assumed a dramatic and symbolic value, one appreciated by all observers. Soon, however, such didactic effects lost much of their impact, and artists were compelled to discover new methods to emphasize and develop their message.

Apart from the hierarchy established by a compositional scheme, artists also resorted to traditional iconography in order to identify marginal subjects. Lepers, for example, considered for centuries the most despised of outcasts, were forced to live and beg outside the normal limits of a village or town, sounding a bell or clapper to warn others of their approach. Artists often included such noisemakers in their representations of the leper and inevitably identified them by a spotted skin: red when painted, raised welts if worked in stone. These sure signs of leprosy identified the ostracized in all media and were understood by everyone. On a sculpture on the south porch wall at Moissac, France, the poor man Lazarus is clearly identified as a leper in this manner, replete with dogs licking his sores. An analogous iconographic example appears in a stained-glass panel in the cathedral at Bourges, France, where Lazarus, covered with red sores, stands outside a rich man's house. He is relegated to a half-medallion, adjacent to the one showing the rich man at a table, and thus forced visually and symbolically into the margins.

Another group of traditional outsiders were the Jews. During the early medieval period, they were often depicted wearing exotic headgear, sometimes called a Phrygian cap, of a pointed, conical, or bell shape. This distinctive sign of otherness was a recognizable marker and universally comprehended. In a manuscript from Speyer, Germany (circa 1233–1236), showing the triumphant entry of Jesus into Jerusalem, the doorway of the city is filled with men adorned with conical hats. Sculptural examples follow the same iconography, as on the tympanum at Strasbourg Cathedral in France, where a Jew helping Jesus carry the cross is identified by a sharply pointed hat. Another example appears at Rouen Cathedral in France, where the Jews stoning St. Stephen wear hats shaped like steeply pointed cones.

Later in the medieval period, prejudice against the Jews increased dramatically, and increasingly scurrilous depictions of the Jew appeared in manuscripts and woodcuts. The emphasis shifted to a denunciation of the Jew as heretic, sorcerer, and worshiper of the devil, as well as instigator of well poisonings, ritual murders of Christian children, and desecrations of eucharistic hosts. The Jew of this period was often depicted with exaggerated Semitic features, frequently with horns, often engaging in lewd activities, and in close proximity to the devil, or even disguised as a devil. A fifteenth-century wood carving on a choir stool in Aerschot, Belgium, shows a Jew riding backwards on a large goat, the devil's favorite animal, holding the animal's tail in a provocative gesture. This rich vocabulary, one that stereotyped and caricatured its subject, was frequently used to identify the Jew as the ultimate outsider, the most marginal member of Christian society.

With the rise of secular painting following the Reformation, many subjects previously ignored or given minor attention began to challenge artists in new ways. Gradually, the very members of society hitherto deemed marginal began to occupy a central position—worthy subjects for artists to depict and for society to commission.

Similarly, artists have traditionally portrayed the peasant as a marginal creature, crude and perhaps bestial in appearance. Sometimes the artist's attitude toward these "lower orders" would be sufficient to relegate them to a lesser stratum of society. One such example is Cornelius Mahu's Wedding Dance in a Barn (1645), where the exaggerated boisterousness of the rural folk is represented in hopes of eliciting a reaction of disdain from the viewer. Throughout the seventeenth century, Dutch and Flemish artists reveled in this humorous and satiric approach to the peasant populace. Elsewhere, however, painters like Louis Le Nain in France stressed the human dignity of the peasant, as in Peasant Family (circa 1640). This kinder and more sensitive reflection on the plight of the peasant was a theme renewed again, and very powerfully, in the nineteenth century. A very different view of the peasant is found in a series of etchings by Francisco Goya called Los Caprichos (1794–1799). Far from idealizing his subject, Goya emphasizes a horrifying spectrum of human violence, with its demonic and pathological sadism. Goya's dispossessed, the losers in war as well as in life, offer a timeless view of human suffering as a result of the ravages of war and economic deprivation.

Following the upheaval in society caused by the Industrial Revolution as well as the exodus of a starving populace from Ireland because of the potato famine of the 1840s, a new kind of art evolved, merging social conscience and interest in the documentary. Marginal subjects—the poor, homeless, criminals, the insane, prostitutes, and unwed mothers—became the central focus of artists and no longer served as incidental figures intended merely to animate a scene or landscape. In his many novels, Charles Dickens drew attention to the plight of mistreated laborers, destitute widows, children forced into a life of begging, and the injustices of an overcrowded industrial world. His descriptions of the abysmal working conditions of the mills and the cruelties and injustices of orphanages and prisons helped to effect social change and influenced the work of many nineteenth-century artists.

In France, interest in the less fortunate and often forgotten people of the metropolis emerged as a major artistic theme. Théodore Géricault created sympathetic studies of the physical characteristics of men and women in insane asylums and prisons and sketched human heads and limbs found in morgues. His painting The Madman (1821–1824) mirrors the horrors of dementia in hopes of eliciting a profound response in the social conscience of the viewer. Charles Meryon's engravings of claustrophobic city walls and threatening shadows of tenement streets impress on the observer the ugliness of the overcrowded metropolis and the concomitant evil effects on the people forced to live in such miserable conditions. Gustave Doré's nightmarish wood engraving of a prison yard, with its incarcerated denizens hopelessly shuffling in a circle under the heartless eye of two guards, evokes the modern problems of an industrial and impersonal society where the lower classes, often forced into a life of crime, seem to find no way out of their plight. Honoré Daumier concentrated on the prosaic world of the Parisian common folk—the laundresses, mountebanks, and blacksmiths—and on groups of quite ordinary people in public situations. Daumier's The Third-Class Carriage (1861), for example, presents a banal subject but hints at the alienation and lack of communication between human beings in crowded industrial cities.

During the Victorian Age, many painters in England examined the problems of society's poor and developed an iconography fully appreciated by the public. It was widely believed, for example, that physiognomy directly reflected character, and artists felt compelled to specifically detail facial expression, as well as the size and shape of the head, in order to fully identify the moral quality of the subject. Servants and lower-class workers were often depicted with a tendency toward prognathism (in which the jaws project beyond the upper part of the face), whereas the aristocrat would be shown with a straight profile and refined features. Dickens insisted that evil character was invariably detectable to the experienced eye. The criminal was considered a race apart, with quite distinctive features, including a low forehead, broad and heavy features, and a thick neck. One of John Tenniel's illustrations of a wife beater for Punch (May 30, 1874) clearly depicts such characterization. The concept of a specific criminal physiology persisted throughout the nineteenth century and is shown in an array of sketches in Havelock Ellis's The Criminal (1890). Although physical coarseness equaled moral ugliness, a certain hierarchy of criminal types existed as well, as evidenced in William Powell Frith's Derby Day (1858). This encyclopedic panorama depicts a day when social classes mingled freely, and the painting describes a variety of morally doubtful characters, all clearly identified by their physical attributes: the fallen woman, the aristocratic roué, the fortune-teller, the acrobat, the bookmaker, the pickpocket, as well as an assortment of gamblers and swindlers.

As a result of the economic depression of the 1870s in England, hundreds of workers were unemployed and pressed to the margins of existence. Artists mirrored the social anguish of this period in diverse ways. In his painting Hard Times (1885), Hubert von Herkomer portrays the grim search for work in a sentimental but hopeful vein. Other artists criticized the system that fostered the labor disputes and strikes that divided communities. In Robert Koehler's painting The Strike, threatening workers crowd around the front steps of a mill owner's office. Many painters chose to portray the dismal poverty and inhuman living conditions of the urban population, stressing themes such as mourning for the death (by famine or disease) of an infant, the humiliating search for a place to sleep, or the hopelessness of daily life when the husband/father has become a drunkard. In the tradition of William Hogarth, and mirroring the influence of the temperance union, George Cruikshank created a series of illustrations for The Bottle (1847) and The Drunkard's Children (1848). Luke Fildes's Applicants for Admission to a Casual Ward (1874) shocks the viewer with its realistic portrayal of the hungry and homeless: shivering men, women, and children huddled together under a street lamp, snow falling lightly in the gloom.

In the twentieth century, despite a growing freedom of expression in art and life, certain subjects and actions still retain their element of shock or scandal, and particular people remain marked as outsiders. Today's society offers a contemporary analogue to the medieval attitude toward lepers in its reaction to the person with HIV/AIDS, quarantined in a limbo of isolation and lonely suffering. Present prejudice against Gypsies (Romanies) in central Europe mirrors the communal distrust of Jews during the Middle Ages. Historically, itinerant peddlers were viewed with mistrust or even fear because they existed outside the accepted boundaries of society, with no known families or relatives and no established residences. Similarly, in today's world, men and women recoil from the homeless who live their rootless, transient lives pushed to the physical and emotional limits of marginalization.

The phenomenon of homelessness, with its concomitant alienation and despair, has been studied carefully by twentieth-century sociologists, following the pioneering efforts of Émile Durkheim, who referred to aspects of this societal disorder as anomie. But even the homeless, despite their unstable and dangerous existence, show proof of spontaneous and persistent creative powers, as evidenced in their tenuous "gardens," unusual and offbeat creations of plant and inanimate life, the latter objects often salvaged from rubbish heaps. These poignant gardens attest to the irrepressible human urge to create beauty in the least promising of spots and offer only one example of what has been termed Outsider Art.

Currently, the subject of Outsider Art has elicited much controversy. The term itself, coined in the 1970s, harks back to the passionate efforts of Jean Dubuffet, who championed the merits of extracultural art, which he called Art Brut. Dubuffet prized the artwork of psychotic patient Adolf Wölfli because he was uneducated, a social misfit, and had neither art training nor professional aspirations. In Dubuffet's opinion, contact with the art establishment destroyed the creative impulse.

Today, the term Outsider Art still defies precise definition. Does it mean that the artist has had no art training? No contact with the art world? Does it suggest that the artist has removed himself or herself from normal communal life, choosing the path of eccentricity? That the artist is slipping into schizophrenia? Does the term imply a lack of education or social sophistication as established by the dominant culture? Should women artists be included? Originally, the creative efforts of primitives and folk artists were classified in the category of Outsider Art, but now that judgment has been reevaluated. Since folk artists and primitives, as well as artists from black, Hispanic, or other ethnic communities, develop and create within a particular society that nurtures and responds to them, can they be considered true outsiders? From various perspectives, and at various times, anyone might be regarded as an insider or an outsider. The center creates the margins, and as the center shifts, so do those margins. Thus, the concept of Outsider Art remains frustratingly elusive as well as inconclusively defined. Ultimately, through its rigid sociological stratifications, the concept may serve to dehumanize both the art and the artist.

While art critics and art historians may determine what seems to belong in the category of Outsider Art, it has been the artists themselves who have cultivated the character or personality of the outsider. Beginning in the nineteenth century, as a result of the aesthetics of the romantic movement, great emphasis was placed on the individuality of the artists, their introverted sensitivity, and the emotional expressivity of their work. An early Self-Portrait (circa 1810) by Caspar David Friedrich, for example, epitomizes these qualities. The artist's probing, intense gaze suggests his relentless search for a reality beyond the obvious and his determination to follow this uncompromising vision regardless of the consequences. One of Gustave Courbet's self-portraits, Self-Portrait, Man with a Pipe (circa 1846–1847), depicts a brooding, veiled, and enigmatic image of the artist, while a halo of unruly hair frames the face and hints at his independent character. Max Beckmann's Self-Portrait in Tuxedo (1927), with its monumental frontality and confrontational stare, reinstates the artist's solitary role as seer and critic of the world around him. The romantic movement has been described as a veritable war of liberation, not only against established institutions of society, but against the bedrock of tradition and authority. Modern artists, as direct inheritors of this legacy, have often come to regard themselves as different, not bound by ordinary conventions, and as loners, set apart from the surrounding society. Artists, therefore, almost by definition have become outsiders, or "others."

Like the biblical scapegoat set loose in the wilderness (Leviticus 16:20–22), those members of society castigated for their "otherness"—whether because of social rank, physical disability, religion, ethnicity, or morals—are relegated to the margins of the community in an effort to ignore their existence or to prevent their assimilation into the group. Society seems to constantly redefine its margins according to new perceptions and desires, and the outsider always exists. The artist reflects these metamorphoses of taste and morality and offers pictorial and tangible proof of the existence and influence of the margin.

See also Abandonment; Madness; Melancholy; Music

Selected Works of Art

Medieval

Bayeux Tapestry, embroidered linen, eleventh century,

Bayeux, France, Musée de la Tapisserie

Archivolts, sculpture, circa 1130, Aulnay-de-Saintonge,

France, Church of Saint-Pierre

Tympanum, sculpture, central portal of narthex, 1120–1132,

Vézelay, France, Church of the Madeleine

Last Supper, fresco, west choir wall, twelfth century, Nohant-Vicq, Church of Saint-Martin

World Map, manuscript, Psalter, thirteenth century, London, British Library (Add MS 28681, fol. 9r)

Gospel Book, manuscript, from Speyer, Germany, circa 1233–1236, Karlsruhe, Germany, Landsebibliothek (Bruchs.I, fol. 17)

Renaissance

The Cloisters Apocalypse, manuscript, fourteenth century,

New York, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Cloisters (fol. 5v)

Gentile da Fabriano, The Adoration of the Magi, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Masaccio, Expulsion from Paradise, fresco, circa 1427, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria del Carmine, Brancacci Chapel

Giovanni di Paolo, Expulsion from Paradise, circa 1445, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, Robert Lehman Collection

Jew Astride a Goat, wood carving on choir stool, fifteenth century, Aerschot, Belgium, Church of Notre Dame

Eighteenth–Twentieth Century

Mahu, Cornelius, Wedding Dance in a Barn, 1645, private collection

Friedrich, Caspar David, Self-Portrait, circa 1810, Berlin, Germany, Staatlich Museen

Géricault, Théodore, The Madman, 1821–1824, Ghent, Belgium, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Courbet, Gustave, Self-Portrait, Man with a Pipe, circa 1846–1847, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre

Hunt, William Holman, Scapegoat, 1855, Manchester, England, Manchester Art Gallery

Frith, William Powell, Derby Day, 1858, London, Tate Gallery

Daumier, Honoré, The Third-Class Carriage, 1861, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, the H. O. Havemeyer Collection

Tenniel, John, The Wife Beater, from Punch LXVI (May 30, 1874)

- Herkomer, Hubert von, Hard Times, 1885, Manchester, Manchester City Art Galleries
- Wölfl, Adolf, Saint Adolf portant des lunettes, 1924, Lausanne, Switzerland, Collection de l'Art Brut
- Beckmann, Max, Self-Portrait in Tuxedo, 1927, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Busch-Reisinger Museum

Further Reading

- Arnheim, Rudolph, The Power of the Center, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1988
- Balmori, Diana, and Margaret Morton, Transitory Gardens, Uprooted Lives, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1993
- Blumenkranz, Bernhard, "Le juif médiéval au miroir de l'art chrétien," Études Augustinennes (1966)
- Camille, Michael, Images on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art, London: Reaktion, 1992
- Cardinal, Roger, Outsider Art, New York: Praeger, 1972; London: Studio Vista, 1972
- Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, Papers from the Twenty-Seventh Annual Conference, "On the Margins," Binghamton, New York, 1993
- Cowling, Mary, The Artist as Anthropologist: The Representation of Type and Character in Victorian Art, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989
- Hall, Michael D., and Eugene W. Metcalf, editors, The Artist Outsider: Creativity and the Boundaries of Culture, Washington, D. C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1994
- Harvey, Bessie, Black Art: Ancestral Legacy: The African Impulse in African-American Art, Dallas, Texas: Dallas Museum of Art, 1989
- Jones, Michael Owen, Exploring Folk Art: Twenty Years of Thought on Craft, Work, and Aesthetics, Logan: Utah State University Press, 1993
- Kenaar-Kedar, Nurith, Marginal Sculpture in Medieval France: Towards the Deciphering of an Enigmatic Pictorial Language, London and Brookfield, Vermont: Scholar Press, 1995
- Lewis, Susan, "Beyond the Frame: Marginal Figures and Historiated Initials in the Getty Apocalypse," J. Paul Getty Museum Journal 20 (1992)
- MacGregor, John Monroe, The Discovery of the Art of the Insane, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1987
- Maizels, John, Raw Creation: Outsider Art and Beyond, London: Phaidon, 1996
- Mellinkoff, Ruth, Outcasts: Signs of Otherness in Northern European Art of the Late Middle Ages, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1993
- Randall, Lilian M. C., Images in the Margins of Gothic Manuscripts, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1993
- Terkla, Daniel, "Cut on the Norman Bias: Fabulous Borders and Visual Glosses on the Bayeux Tapestry," Word and Image 11:3 (July–September 1995)
- Thévoz, Michel, Art Brut, New York: Rizzoli, 1976
- Treuherz, Julian, Hard Times: Social Realism in Victorian Art, London: Lund Humphries, 1987
- Vlack, John Michael, and Simon J. Bronner, Folk Art and Art Worlds, Ann Arbor, Michigan, UMI Research Press, 1986

MARRIAGE/BETROTHAL

Brucia Witthoft

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Marriage/Betrothal:

COURTSHIP

WEDDING CONTRACT

PREPARATION FOR THE WEDDING

EXCHANGING VOWS

EXCHANGING RINGS

JOINING OF HANDS

WEDDING FEASTS

WEDDING DANCES

WEDDING PROCESSIONS

THE WEDDING NIGHT

MARRIAGE BY PROXY

MARRIAGE PORTRAITS

FILMS

Jan van Eyck, Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), 1434, London, National Gallery (Courtesy of the National Gallery, London)

Marriage is the union of sexuality and property, and as such it has been a central concern of every human society and viewed as a fundamental condition of human life: “For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark” (Matthew 24:38). Uniting two persons, or more generally two families, has historically been a long and complex process. The time required for negotiation, betrothal, celebration, and consummation was often proportional to the social status of the parties involved. Remarkably, many of these rituals and customs have been conserved in the Western marital process despite vast transformations in religious and economic practices. Marriage is frequently the subject of novels and motion pictures, and therefore plays an important part in twentieth-century popular culture: a formal wedding photograph is often the most prominent work of art in the American household.

Marital customs were depicted on Greek pottery and Roman sarcophagi. Later, sacred weddings began to appear in medieval Christian art. Scenes of “real” wedding customs began to appear in the Renaissance, particularly on some Florentine marriage chests and in early Netherlandish painting. Married couples appeared in Dutch paired and joint portraits, and by the eighteenth century, the subject of marriage eventually attracted the sharp-witted criticism of artists such as William Hogarth. Because marriage is a contract carrying personal and financial obligations, its depiction in art can serve as a record of, or witness to, that contract.

Marriage in the primitive sense, reflected in the Old Testament story of Jacob and his wives, was the purchase of a female’s reproductive capacity by the labor, wit, or strength of a male. Females were assessed such a value because, when food supplies were ample, women represented the limiting factor in population. Jacob worked to pay for his two wives (not coincidentally, a job that increased the population of his father-in-law’s sheep) and was rewarded by the opportunity to father children of his own. The competition between his wives to bear children emphasizes the biological, rather than psychological, rewards of marriage.

Property, in the tangible sense of land, as well as the forging of familial or dynastic alliances, has been the motive for many historical and literary weddings. The Marriage of Solomon and Sheba (circa 1460) by Piero della Francesca depicts one such scene in contemporary forms, with symbolic references to the hoped-for union of Eastern and Western Christianity in the mid-fifteenth century. In the fresco, Solomon and his bride grasp hands (see description of Roman marital customs, below) to seal the marriage contract in the presence of numerous witnesses. The conquest of France by King Henry V of England yielded Katherine, daughter of the French king, as his bride.

This alliance is similarly portrayed in William Shakespeare’s play Henry V and in the film versions of the play (directed by Laurence Olivier, 1944; directed by Kenneth Branagh, 1989). Even the prosperous peasants painted by Pieter Bruegel the Elder in Peasant Wedding Banquet (circa 1565) seek to ally their child with an heir to fertile fields.

Among the propertied classes, the custom of exchanging property in marriage was formalized as bride-price (a payment that the groom owed to his wife’s parents) or dowry (money or objects of value given by the bride’s family to the groom, either totally into his control or under conditions stipulating disposal upon the death of the wife). For example, the price of the adulteress whom Hosea purchased to live with him in a monogamous relationship was 15 pieces of silver and one and a half homers (approximately 16 bushels) of barley (Hosea 3:2). Probably because the purchase of a bride prevails largely in tribal societies without significant narrative art forms, it is rarely represented. Dowry, on the other hand, has appeared in Renaissance paintings of marriage processions, such as the painted Florentine cassone (a traditional Italian chest that held the dowry) Wedding of Leonora Bardi and Ippolito Buondelmonte (fifteenth century), and in paintings of marriage feasts such as Apollonio di Giovanni’s Wedding of Dido and Aeneas (fifteenth century). Among the prosperous peasantry and small merchant classes, the dowry consisted of household linens, personal clothing, and jewelry. The rich, in addition, received monetary endowments or real estate. The pile of coins on the table in Hogarth’s Betrothal from Marriage à la Mode (1745) represents such a financial settlement.

Marriage is a process, not a single event. The stages in this process are remarkably consistent in Western culture. First is a determination of marriageability, that is, selection of a spousal candidate on the basis of physical maturity, health, financial standing, clan, tribal, or even political affiliation. Parents and relatives may make this choice; children’s rights to refuse a proposed spouse vary. Selection is followed by negotiation, which is concerned largely with monetary arrangements but may also in some societies determine issues such as whether the wife remains under the jurisdiction of her own family, becomes her husband’s property, or acquires legal independence. A successful negotiation leads to betrothal, an ambiguous state sometimes considered as binding as marriage but preceding the physical consummation. Physical union is usually required for the completion of the process, and the establishment of a new household, with concomitant financial settlement.

Sexual attraction is often considered an accidental impediment to the selection of a desirable marital partner, although legend and literature have long recognized the mystery of “the way of a man with a maid” (Proverbs 30:19). In the world of the ancient Greeks, concubinage and the low status of women virtually eliminated the romantic impulse from marriage. In medieval times and later, among the underclass with no property to divide, the choice of a wife or husband did depend on attraction. Cases in which personal preference conflicted with familial goals are described in Giovanni Boccaccio's "Third Tale of the Second Day" of The Decameron (1349–1351), Geoffrey Chaucer's "The Merchant's Tale" from The Canterbury Tales (1385–1400), as well as various fourteenth-century novelles. The main character of Daniel Defoe's Moll Flanders (1722) marries according to her own preferences and divorces just as easily and informally. Dalliance and amorous glances occur in contexts separate from marital imagery, as in the anonymous The Month of May (before 1407), a calendar fresco in the Torre Aquila in Trent, Italy.

Roman law specified that a son could reject the bride chosen for him by his father and that the father had the power to veto his son or daughter's choice of a mate, clearly implying that the young people in Roman society had at least some opportunity to meet and adjudge potential partners. Literature suggests that late medieval and early modern Europe saw personal choice largely in conflict with family interest. It was not until the Enlightenment that treatment of marriage as an economic transaction began to be thought of as immoral. America's agrarian democracy and the rootlessness of continental expansion left both the choice and the marital arrangements to the participants, as seen in John Rogers's popular plaster sculpture Going to the Parson (1875).

Betrothal and marriage in ancient Greece can be studied from abundant visual evidence and literary references. Wedding scenes appear on both black-figured and red-figured vases, especially on objects for women's use, according to John Oakley and Rebecca Hague Sinos (The Wedding in Ancient Athens, 1993) on objects for women's use. While ancient Greek marriage was arranged through negotiations between the parents of the couple, mythology tells of brides being won by a trial, as in the story of Hippodamia.

Marriage in the Greek world was a rite of passage, which, like any change of state or place, was dangerous. Just as a traveler crossing a bridge is not so secure as one standing on firm ground, transitions suspend people between secure roles, making them vulnerable—in Greek terms, vulnerable to the whims of the gods. To mitigate the risk, a bride and her family sacrificed to the gods before her wedding. The young woman dedicated objects to Artemis indicative of her childhood (toys, ornaments) and requested the protection of the Olympians as she passed from childhood in one household to adulthood in another. Both bride and groom were bathed in water drawn and carried from a sacred spring in a loutrophoros (wedding pitcher). The vessel might be decorated with marital imagery, perhaps of the wedding procession. The bride was led to her bath with accompanying musicians and gaily dressed women. She was then dressed in a special garment: a belt, which when tightly bound around her waist symbolized her virginity, and when undone by the groom, her deflowering. She wore jewelry, a crown, a veil, and bridal sandals.

The ancient Greek wedding began with a feast. Families of both the bride and groom participated, as well as friends and clients of the couple's fathers. Men and women ate separately in accordance with the customary Greek practice of separating the sexes. Sumptuary laws attempted to control the extent of the festivities, which clearly served the additional purpose of establishing, via "potlatch" economics, the power of the host. Sinos points out that the public nature of the festivities, in the absence of written contracts, also served to "publish" the wedding before witnesses. Both feasting and the procession are represented on a François vase (sixth century B.C.) in the story of the marriage of the mortal Peleus and the sea goddess Thetis.

The wedding procession, which transferred the bride from her state as a child in her parents' home to a woman in her husband's, followed the feast. At evening, the groom grasped the bride by the wrist and, with a mock show of force, removed her from her mother. She traveled by wagon in a torchlit procession to her new home, accompanied by attendants (often including a child, who appears to represent the god of erotic love, Eros). Sinos notes that this procession is the most common wedding scene to be portrayed on black-figured vases, indicating that it was the most significant event of the wedding process. Often the couple are depicted riding in a chariot, conflating them with the Olympian weddings of the gods, although the actual vehicle in Athenian practice was a plain wagon. Later red-figured vases more frequently portray the earlier moment when, still on foot, the groom has taken hold of his bride to lead her away. One red-figured vase shows the couple departing in a shower of old shoes thrown by the wedding guests.

After a ritualized reception, the couple were put to bed in the groom's paternal home to the accompaniment of song and ribald jokes. The door was guarded by the thyroros (a friend of the groom) as wedding guests and friends remained outside all night to sing, bang on the walls, and create a general distraction apparently meant to drown out the young girl's cries of pain. At dawn, the couple rose to another day of festivities, offering food to guests who arrived with gifts.

Almost every element of the ancient Athenian wedding ceremony is instantly recognizable today. The special preparation and dress of the bride, the importance of a shared meal, the release from the father's household and departure for a new one, and the opportunities for lewd remarks and mock-hostile behavior are constants that seem to have survived every social transformation in the ensuing centuries. The direct basis for marital practices in the medieval and Renaissance periods was Roman law and custom. And while Roman legal terms defined marriage for later eras, Roman practices appear to have been closely related, with a few alterations, to Greek rituals.

As in Greece, Roman marriage ordinarily began with research and negotiation. Roman myth incorporated an element of violence, however, most notably in the story of the Sabine women (the subject of a Peter Paul Rubens painting). Livy, the Roman historian (59 B.C.–A.D. 17) was the source of Rome's foundation myth, which symbolized the integration of the supposed immigrants with native tribal peoples. Actual Roman practice is probably better represented in either the letters of Pliny the Younger, who was looking for a suitable wife for the niece of Junius Maricus (Treggiari, p. 87), or in Roman comedy. Plautus, in Trinummus (early second century B.C.), has a character say, "My son has sent me to you to arrange a marriage-tie and good feeling between you and us. He wants to marry your sister; my decision is the same and I want it too" (442–445; in Treggiari, p. 108). The introduction of professional marriage brokers in the imperial epoch was an addition to the process, probably reflecting the increased complexity of the larger Roman society.

The prescribed dress of Roman brides mimicked the garments said to be worn by the wife of a priest of Jupiter, the king of the gods. Thus, the tie between marital practice and organized religion was more explicitly delineated in imperial Rome than it had been in classical Athens. The Roman bride's dress was supposed to be woven on an archaic upright loom; her girdle, like that of the Greeks', was tied with a special knot that the groom would loose. Her hair was parted with a spear and combed into six braids. This process is described in Lucius Apuleius's The Golden Ass (4:26) and appears in a Pompeian fresco Dressing the Bride (first century B.C.), now in Naples, Italy.

Roman society tolerated many nonstandard cults. The nonstandard, Dionysian preparation of a bride or initiate, with its attendant whipping and musical accompaniment, appears to be depicted in a fresco in the Villa of Mysteries in Pompeii (first century B.C.). The groom was also carefully, though never so violently, prepared: Roman biographer and historian Suetonius refers to sending a groom for a haircut. Even the house itself was prepared, with greens and lit with torches, probably resembling the decorations on the Ara Pacis Augustae in Rome.

A friend of the family assumed the role of ausper (soothsayer) and read the omens; it was considered "shocking" to omit this part of the ritual. The groom came to the wedding "surrounded by a great crowd of kinsmen and connections and sacrificing in the temples and public shrines." Attendance at the weddings of friends and relatives was considered a duty (Treggiari, p. 164).

A written contract for the dowry might be witnessed and sealed at the wedding. In Roman law (and in common law ever since) a handshake sealed a contract. Thus, the joining of the hands of the bride and groom, the most frequently represented marital image in Roman art, relates marriage to the larger world of Roman law and custom. This scene appears on a number of sarcophagi, such as one held by the British Museum in London on which the depicted arrangement of guests and witnesses simulates the iconography of military triumphal monuments. A similarity between depictions of weddings and triumphal processions reappears in Italian Renaissance imagery (see Francesca, below).

Uxorem ducere, or deducere, meant literally to lead a bride to her new home. The Romans, however, sent the groom ahead after the feast so that he awaited her at his home. The bride was tearfully, perhaps forcibly, torn from her mother. The deductio in domum mariti, or pompa (wedding procession) took place by torchlight. Three young boys led the bride, her many attendants threw nuts to the crowd, while onlookers sang obscene ditties and repeatedly shouted hymen hymenaeae (the marriage song). The marriage procession, not the conjoining of hands, was the most important element in the classical Roman ceremony because it served to publish the wedding, as in classical Athens, and because the physical removal of the bride once again served as metaphor for her change of state. The procession was neither a legal requirement, nor was it prescribed by religious doctrine. It was a ritual tied directly to marriage itself.

When she reached her new home, her attendants lifted the bride over the threshold. This echoes primitive bride-stealing traditions: once the bride is in the house, she is legally married. In Roman law, her presence indicated consent, and consent, not consummation, is the essence of contract. Inside, she performed certain rites, such as putting a coin in the hearth to ensure prosperity and fertility. A festive dinner took place in the groom's house the following day. The wedding feast and the postconsummation dinner might be lavish, and both served as displays of familial power. Although history includes many examples of divorce in the Roman world, there is no doubt that marriage was intended to be a true partnership and sharing of responsibility, and inscriptions on tombs often convey the grief of the surviving spouse (Treggiari, pp. 245ff).

Roman law and custom proved a powerful influence on the Christian societies of medieval and early modern Europe, shaping social behavior as they had shaped the Roman Catholic Church. The fact that the joining of hands is the most frequently chosen act in medieval and Renaissance imagery testifies to the power of Roman precedent. It is seen in Gothic manuscript illumination (late thirteenth century), on Lorenzo Ghiberti's bronze Gates of Paradise (circa 1440) for the Baptistry in Florence, in Francesca's frescoes in Arezzo, and is the subject of Jan van Eyck's Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami) (1434). To this tradition, Christianity added—rather, developed from a mere hint in Roman practice—an emphasis on the spiritual dimension of the marital bond. The Jewish duty to marry, because of the emphasis placed on family in celebration of holidays and the Sabbath, may have been an ingredient in the formation of Christian practice. The Anglican prayer book states the Christian view clearly: marriage is a sacrament, given to mankind by God when he created Eve. Its purposes are to bring children into the world, to "prevent fornication," and for the mutual "society, help and comfort" of the couple through good and bad fortune.

Wedding scenes from the Old and New Testaments appear in art as idealized or abstracted versions of actual practice, designed to illustrate moral principles, yet reflecting some aspects of the artist's own experience. In the Old Testament, marriage is more often mentioned than described in detail, so that artists wishing to illustrate Old Testament weddings had to draw upon later custom. Only a modest number of biblical examples of marriage are depicted in art with any frequency.

To begin at the beginning, Adam and Eve are married in the Garden of Eden by God, who joins their hands, Roman fashion (Heimann, 1975). The marriage of Solomon and Sheba is not recounted in I Kings 10, but Sheba's arrival in a lavish procession and her gifts to the king, who reciprocates by giving "all her desire," parallel marital customs. This elusive description grows into the formal conjoining of hands depicted by Ghiberti on the Gates of Paradise and as a component of Francesca's True Cross fresco cycle in Arezzo, Italy. The wedding of Tobias (Apocrypha, Tobit 8:4–5) seems to have been especially popular in the seventeenth century, the subject of paintings by Pieter Lastman, Nikolaus Knupfer, and Jan Steen. Tobias appears in his wedding chamber in Pieter Lastman's delightful painting Wedding Night of Tobias and Sarah (1611). In this work, the bride sits on the edge of the bed as Tobias, on his angel's advice, broils a piece of fish to drive off the devil that has murdered her previous suitors.

Two marriages in the New Testament are frequently portrayed in art of the fourteenth through the sixteenth century: Mary's marriage to Joseph, and the marriage at Cana, where Jesus Christ, as a guest, performed a protoeucharistic miracle. The Marriage of the Virgin is not described in the Gospels; only Matthew and Luke recount the infancy cycle. In both, Mary is espoused to Joseph but the union unconsummated (Matthew 1:18–19, Luke 1:27). A considerable body of extrabiblical legends have accrued to this marriage, most prominent among them the story of the choice of suitors. Joseph and other hopeful men each lay a bare branch upon the altar of a temple. God's choice of Joseph as Mary's spouse—to deceive the devil as well as skeptical contemporaries—was indicated when his branch was found to have sprouted leaves and flowers overnight. In Raphael's Marriage of the Virgin (1504), the disappointed suitors break their worthless sticks as the hands of Mary and Joseph are joined by a priest.

Depictions of Mary's marriage, lacking any specific biblical narrative details, are based upon late medieval and Renaissance marriage customs. Similarly, the depictions of the marriage at Cana look very much like the wedding feasts described in Florentine law and literature, or like mythological weddings, such as the portrayal of the Wedding of Dido and Aeneas in Apollonio di Giovanni's fifteenth-century Aeneid manuscript illuminations. The patterns of Renaissance marriage, therefore, may be used to interpret biblical and secular weddings portrayed in art.

Marriage in the Renaissance combined elements of Roman custom and law, Jewish and Christian medieval practice, and contemporary power politics. The process began with the selection of a possible candidate. Mothers might look over the young people they saw in church to judge apparent health and attractiveness; fathers might be more directly concerned with financial stability and political alliances. In Florence, a special type of bank account—the monte delle dote—enabled families to budget for their daughters' dowries as modern families save for college tuitions.

Once a candidate for a child's spouse was selected, a process not very different from that found in the ancient world ensued. Again, the stages in marrying consisted of negotiation, betrothal, celebration, transfer of the bride to the groom's household, and consummation.

Prebetrothal financial negotiations were conducted by a marriage broker or by relatives of the families. A dowry consisted of two parts. The donora (material goods) consisted largely of linens and clothing. These objects were evaluated by a professional appraiser and are often listed in Florentine merchants' ricordi (memoirs). The donora played an important part in the ceremonial transfer of the bride, as it was carried in the wedding chests that were such a prominent feature of Florentine marriage customs. The Buondelmonte wedding procession depicted on a fifteenth-century cassone shows that even heavy chests could be transported on the back of a single porter. (The story of Leonora Bardi and Ippolito Buondelmonte is recounted in an anonymous quattrocento novella.) For peasants and small merchants, the donora was the major or entire dowry. The rich, however, also exchanged substantial sums of money.

When two families were substantially in agreement, the fathers of the bride and groom, and often the groom as well, met before a notary to swear out a legal agreement. Without any formal participation of the bride, the couple were now considered engaged. Courtship was the next step, during which the groom would visit his betrothed, bring her gifts, and dine with her family. Because it was the groom's duty to furnish the new home (usually, the designated bedroom in the paternal house), he also ordered a bed, a pair of wedding chests, and a lettuccio (daybed).

The bride took part in the process for the first time on the "day of the ring." Combining Roman and Jewish or Byzantine custom, she and her fiancé declared their willingness to marry and shook hands. The notary, a key figure in the mercantile climate of the fifteenth century, conducted the ceremony. He then repeated the formula, "what God hath joined together," etc. A rare example of this scene is found in the fresco cycle Works of Charity (late fifteenth century) done by a follower of Domenico Ghirlandaio in S. Martino del Vescovo in Florence. Although the laws of many Italian communes stipulated the presence of a priest, in practice there was usually none. In fact, one law states specifically that the notary takes the place of the priest. In northern Europe the ceremony may have taken place on the steps of the church, as depicted by Robert Campin in Marriage of the Virgin (circa 1430) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain. Van Eyck's Arnolfini Wedding shows the couple joining hands in their bedroom, in the presence of a witness—the artist—whose image is reflected dimly in the mirror behind them.

At this ceremony, or within a few days, the groom gave his wife a ring. This custom, believed to be of Byzantine origin, had been practiced by the Jews of the Diaspora since the seventh century. In Renaissance Christian ceremony, the influence of Roman practice on the one hand, and the ring tradition on the other, led to a doubling of ritual. On the "day of the ring," a wedding banquet took place either at the bride's father's home or outside in the street to accommodate a large crowd of guests. Sumptuary laws attempted in vain to control the expense by limiting the number of guests or the number of dishes, but the opportunity for lavish display served the same power-enhancing function that it had in ancient societies. Because the laws were written and enforced to support the power of the ruling factions, enforcement against that class was negligible. Objects from the donora and gifts of gold and silver were often displayed at the feast, as in Giovanni's Wedding of Dido and Aeneas manuscript illuminations. If the wedding feast took place outdoors, tents might be strung across the street.

The wedding procession was in the Renaissance Christian ceremony, as it was in Rome, the central and most public element in the ritual. At the end of the banquet, the groom took his bride through the streets to her new home while the groom's party may have enacted a ritualized abduction (as was still the custom in village weddings in many rural areas well into the nineteenth century). The Renaissance procession was a festive demonstration related to other displays of power, such as the triumphal entries staged by returning monarchs, and the donora was carried through the streets like war booty. The spirit of the event can be judged from works such as Francesca's Triumph of Federigo da Montefeltro (circa 1459). Here, on the back of his wedding portrait, the duke rides in glory, accompanied by courtiers and symbolic figures. His "triumph" is analogous to the images that illustrate Petrarch's "Triumph of Love, Chastity, Death, etc.” on a pair of panels in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston. In Florence, processions were on foot—sumptuary laws restricted the use of horses or parade wagons. Musicians, friends, and allies of the groom’s party, accompanied the bride. Because the procession is a vital rite, even the Virgin, on her way to Joseph’s home, is led by a musician and accompanied by a crowd in Giotto’s fresco Marriage Procession of the Virgin (1303–1306) in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy.

Actual wedding processions were large and rowdy. There was good reason for a large party to accompany the newly married couple as the parade provided opportunities for expressions of hostility and jealousy. Rude joking, throwing objects, and even street barricades faced the wedding parade. (A novella by Agnolo Firenzuola follows a street gang as they intercept a wedding procession and demand a ring as ransom.) The throwing of stones and filth at the house of a newly married couple was a practice that had to be specifically forbidden by the Florentine Statuti of 1415.

A second banquet took place when the triumphal procession reached the groom’s home. Gifts were exchanged; the guests danced, drank, and played games. The couple would then be put to bed, a scene not considered suitable for artistic interpretation. (Pictures of bedded couples are likely to depict either adultery or rape.) A flurry of smaller celebrations continued for several days, like aftershocks following an earthquake, as the bride made a return visit to her parents, distributed gifts to her female relatives, and banqueted.

By the sixteenth century, aristocratic weddings had evolved into staged spectacles important in the development of European theater, but their essential components were unchanged. Peasant weddings in early modern Europe followed similar patterns. The Peasant Wedding Banquet (circa 1565) and Peasant Wedding Dance (1566) depicted by Bruegel are the best examples of sixteenth-century custom among the more prosperous peasantry. In the former work, a crowned bride is dressed in finery and sits between her parents before a cloth of honor. A pair of wheat sheaves hangs above her head. The lord of the manor has dropped in to offer congratulations; he chats with a monk. All present belong to the bride’s party. The groom’s family and friends are not included, but in all probability they are celebrating outside the door shown at the rear. The wedding dance will follow the meal. As late as the nineteenth century, Russian peasant weddings resembled scenes from Bruegel. In Vasili Maximovich Maximov’s The Magician Arrives at the Village Wedding (1874), family and friends sit on rough benches, gay banners hang from the rafters, and musicians entertain the company. Judging from peasant customs documented in countries isolated since the nineteenth century such as Sardinia and Albania, at some point the groom was to grab his bride and drag her away. She entered her new home, where the mock tears of the wedding abduction might correctly describe her future. She was the person of lowest status in the household, subject to the orders of her mother-in-law and the wives of her husband’s older brothers. Not until she bore a son was she accorded a measure of dignity.

The twenty-fourth session of the Council of Trent in 1563 gave the Roman Catholic Church actual control of European marriage for the first time. New regulations for record keeping mandated the publication of banns, or intents to marry, in the church in advance of the wedding date, the presence of a priest, as well as the presence of witnesses. This seems to have initiated the practice of celebrating the wedding vows with a conjugal mass inside the church before the altar. The sacramental ritual gradually supplanted earlier custom, although not without considerable resistance among conservative families. There remained the basic components of the process—selection, negotiation, contract, and celebration—but the bride’s banquet was postponed until after the church ceremony, and the groom’s banquet became obsolete. The wedding party still wandered about on foot: first to the church, then back to dine, physical travel retaining its symbolic significance as change of state. Jan Steen’s Village Wedding (1653) shows that the common people continued to transfer the bride to her husband’s home as they had a century earlier.

By the seventeenth century, there was no longer a special category of art (like Greek loutrophoroi or Florentine wedding chests) associated with weddings. Portraits of married couples, either paired panels that formed a sort of secular diptych, or a portrait of the husband and wife together, such as Rembrandt van Rijn’s so-called Jewish Wedding (circa 1666), commemorated weddings or anniversaries. Peter Paul Rubens chronicled the politically significant marriage of France’s Henry IV and Marie de Médicis, which took place by proxy (1621–1624). Because Henry would not accept the loss of status that traveling to his bride would have entailed, and Marie, as a maiden, could not properly travel to him, Henry sent a stand-in to Italy. The king’s glove served to represent him for the handclasp, which sealed the marriage.

The reforms of the Council of Trent were paralleled, to some extent, by continental Protestant churches. In England, however, most of medieval canon law, with its flexible standards, remained in place. The abdication of the authority of the church was most sharply challenged under Oliver Cromwell (1642), when the ceremony outlined in the Book of Common Prayer was denounced as “popish,” and again in 1653, when Parliament declared weddings that took place in church or before a clergyman illegal. This extreme position was unacceptable to much of the English population. Lawrence Stone has characterized the result as “chaos,” each family electing its own combination of secular and religious ceremonies, leaving endless scope for deception and litigation. These events may have spawned the spread to the middle classes of the loosely construed marriage customs prevalent among the poor. An example of this would be Defoe’s character, Moll Flanders, who several times in the course of the novel marries and separates on the basis of mutual agreement. The legal situation in England was not regularized until the passage of the Marriage Act of 1753.

The conditions in the English colonies in the Western Hemisphere provided further impetus for change. Religious dissidents who settled New England had their own ceremonies, loosely based on post-Tridentine principles as adopted by European sects. But primitive living conditions for the struggling settlers limited the scope of the visual arts to occasional European-derived portraits, usually of married persons. Narrative painting begins to appear in the English colonies only late in the eighteenth century.

The Enlightenment profoundly affected traditional views of marriage. As each person was accorded both autonomy and equality, the notion of arranged marriage, particularly those arranged for advantage, became anathema. Hogarth's novel-in-pictures Marriage à la Mode chronicles the personal and social effects that result from two fathers' attempts to control their children's choice of mate for their own gain. In Betrothal, an impoverished aristocrat, having disdained to profit from business ventures, offers his distinguished ancestral line in exchange for a non-pedigreed businessman's hard cash. Hogarth makes it clear that the young couple have not been consulted and are already looking elsewhere for returned affection.

Courtship, celebrated in poem and novel, became a matter between the young, who were granted greater opportunities for social contact. In actual practice, of course, individual choice often coincided with class interests—a girl who dressed in silk and played the harp attracted richer suitors than did the peasant maid. Antoine Watteau's Fêtes Champêtres and The Embarkation for Cythera (1717) depict in fantasized form the dalliance that children of the upper classes were now permitted. The couple who married upon personal choice then presided over household and land in a partnership in which the wife, although still unequal in law and status, nevertheless gained some personal autonomy. Such a couple appears, posed informally, in Thomas Gainsborough's Robert Andrews and His Wife (circa 1748). Andrews, with dog and gun, stands beside an ornate bench upon which his elegantly dressed wife is seated, and together they survey their domain, the rich grain fields and meadows that provide their wealth. Their appearance and pose are reminiscent of Elizabeth Bennett and Mr. Darcy, Jane Austen's characters from Pride and Prejudice (1813), at Pemberley.

Nineteenth-century painting dealt with sexuality and marriage in a variety of ways. Romanticism intensified the emphasis on individual choice, placing sexual attraction and emotional bonds foremost in the choice of marriage partners. When the romantic artists dealt with marriage customs, they tended to portray a "natural" society of peasants or tribes inspired by Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Salon painters, on the other hand, chronicled bourgeois social customs—sometimes approvingly, occasionally critically—with faithful attention to detail. American genre scenes emphasized freedom from family ties and showed how a nation of immigrants and migrants left arrangements for marriage up to the couples themselves.

Unions that crossed political or social boundaries became the subject matter of romantic literature, appearing in works such as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Werther (1774), Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights (1847), and Alessandro Manzoni's The Betrothed (3 vols., 1827). Eugène Delacroix illustrated Goethe's Faust (1808, 1832), a story of illicit sexual attraction (among other themes) fascinating to the romantic spirit. Among the romantics, only artists such as Philipp Otto Runge saw in intimate family relations a passion as exciting as the attraction of exotic and illicit love. In his Wir Drei (1804, We Three) the artist, his wife, and his brother are bound together by a "community of understanding" (Honour, p. 251) deeper than any other social tie.

A longing for earlier, more "natural" human relations led Delacroix to travel to North Africa; his Jewish Wedding (1839) associates modern Jewish customs in Morocco to a lost biblical world. In Delacroix's painting, guests recline on the ground in a stuccoed courtyard. A bride enters from the left, leading a dance to the accompaniment of lute and tambourine. In her rich, colorful costume and dark complexion, Delacroix seems to allude to the biblical Rachel or Esther. The simple, earthy expression of this scene was in contrast to the artifice of the European society of Delacroix's time.

The Health of the Bride (1889) by Stanhope Forbes is an example of such European social artifice. In Forbes's painting, a wedding dinner takes place in the confined space of a conventional nineteenth-century parlor. Prim women sit stiffly upright in their boned corsets, knives and forks placed precisely beside each dinner plate. Queen Victoria set just such an example for the middle class of late nineteenth-century England. Edwin Landseer's Windsor Castle in Modern Times (Queen Victoria, the Prince Consort and the Princess Royal at Windsor) (1840–1843) depicts the ruler herself as a bourgeois wife and mother, surrounded by family, pets, and upholstered furniture.

Coerced marriage was still a social problem addressed by a number of painters. In Vasili Vladimirovich Pukirev's The Unequal Marriage (1862), a young, pale, beautiful bride and a distinguished elderly groom stand before a priest. The priest's face is thrown into darkness, as the light from behind and above him illuminates the unhappy young woman. Grim-faced witnesses form a tenebrous background to the scene. The sequel to such a union, a cold and loveless partnership, is portrayed in works such as William Quiller Orchardson's Le Mariage de Convenance (1883). Here, an unhappy couple sit at opposite ends of a long table, scarcely willing to bid each other good day.

The persistence of long-standing behavioral patterns, even after the intellectual impact of the Enlightenment and the economic transformations of the Industrial Revolution, is a remarkable feature of marriage imagery in all schools of nineteenth-century painting. Negotiation, betrothal, preparation of the bride, shared meals, and obligatory travel remain as prominent themes. In John Henry Frederick Bacon's A Wedding Morning (1892), a bride stands in a bedroom, holding up her veil to assist an older woman (her mother?) in pinning a seam of her dress. In addition to being observed by other marriageable young women, a little girl (her sister?) watches the bride and perhaps sees in the bride her own future.

The greatest change in nineteenth-century marital behavior occurred in the initiation of the process. Increasingly, the choice of a partner rested with individuals. New social patterns, like informal dances and cafes, provided meeting places for children of the middle class. Pierre-Auguste Renoir's Le Moulin de la Galette (1876) is an earthier version of the amorous gardens painted by Jean-Honoré Fragonard, a place where flirtation and courtship might enable the youth of Paris to select a mate. A state of courtship might persist for years, as long as financial constraints prevented the couple from establishing a household of their own, a situation depicted by Arthur B. Hughes in The Long Engagement (1859). Hughes offers little hope for his engaged couple: they look at the names they carved into a tree trunk years ago, names that the ivy is already beginning to obliterate.

The initiative in taking the next step was also increasingly left to individuals. Rogers's aforementioned sculpture Going to the Parson depicts an awkward young man and his blushing fiancée on a visit to a comfortably middle-aged minister to ask him to preside at their wedding. The scenario is frequently repeated in popular culture. Innumerable Hollywood films (such as Frank Capra's It Happened One Night, 1934) bring an attractive young couple before a minister or justice of the peace and his wife, who serves as witness. The contrast between the sexual personae of the young and the postsexual coziness of the older married couple is part of modern myth.

The wedding procession is the subject of Marc Chagall's romanticized Village Wedding I (1909) and Village Wedding II (1910). Two musicians lead a bride and groom through a village street. They are followed by family and watched by passersby—the painting a kind of Polish shtetl (small town) version of Giotto's Arena Chapel Marriage Procession of the Virgin painted 600 years earlier. Although Chagall's painting is probably based on his childhood memories, the artist's choice of a subject is just as likely based on a desire to preserve an idealized past, like Delacroix's Jewish Wedding.

Although largely abandoned by avant-garde artists, the subject of marriage is a staple of contemporary popular culture. Weddings are recorded by a photographer, who is as essential to the ceremony as the Renaissance notary or the post-Tridentine priest. The record includes a formal portrait in which the bride's dress is artfully draped around her feet, as well as a large group of "candid" shots depicting the wedding dance and the cutting of the wedding cake. The popular iconography of twentieth-century marriage is displayed in a long series of episodes of the comic strip Gasoline Alley by Frank King. Nina and Skeezix are childhood sweethearts whose first step toward marriage is recorded in "Closer and Closer" (1941). The story of Skeezix and Nina's courtship and marriage satisfied a demand for a vision of a world more stable and more cohesive than contemporary reality supplies. It is also a genuine record of the persistence of centuries-old marital customs.

Technology has changed, but has not destroyed, old customs. The shoes thrown at an Athenian couple are today tied to the back of an automobile. The wedding dance that took place in Bruegel's sixteenth-century barn is now held in a rented hall, the bagpiper replaced by a disk jockey. Twentieth-century marriage is still a process that begins with the selection of a partner; includes a period of betrothal; requires a ceremony of special clothes, meals, and dancing; and concludes in a wedding journey. Its place as the subject of popular art is as secure as its earlier role in sacred works and genre painting.

See also Abduction/Rape; Adultery; Birth/Childbirth; Love and Death; Widowhood

Selected Works of Art

Courtship

The Month of May, from Labors of the Months, calendar fresco, before 1407, Trent, Italy, Torre Aquila

Steen, Jan, The Proposal, oil on canvas, seventeenth century, private collection

Vois, Ary de, Rustic Courtship, oil on panel, 1656, London, Wallace Collection

Terborch, Gerard, The Suitor's Visit, oil on canvas, circa 1658, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Mulready, William, The Sonnet, 1839, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Hughes, Arthur, The Long Engagement, 1859, Birmingham, England, Birmingham City Art Gallery

Sadler, Walter Dendy, Sweethearts, 1892, London, Guildhall Art Gallery

Wedding Contract

Steen, Jan, Wedding of Tobias and Sarah, oil on canvas, circa 1667, Brunswick, Germany, Staatliches Herzog Anton-Ulrich Museum

Hogarth, William, Betrothal, from Marriage à la Mode, 1745, painting and engraving

Charles, James, Signing the Register, circa 1880s, Bradford, England, Bradford City Art Gallery

King, Frank, Gasoline Alley: "Closer and Closer," 1941, comic strip

Preparation for the Wedding

Dressing the Bride, fresco from Pompeii, first century B.C., Naples, Italy, National Museum

Premarital Rites (Cult of Dionysus), fresco, first century B.C., Pompeii, Villa of Mysteries

Halliday, Michael Frederick, The Measure for the Wedding Ring, 1855, private collection

Rogers, John, Going to the Parson, 1875, plaster sculpture, Framingham, Massachusetts, Danforth Museum of Art

Bacon, John Henry Frederick, A Wedding Morning, 1892, Port Sunlight, England, Lady Lever Art Gallery

Exchanging Vows

Ghirlandaio, follower of, Marriage, fresco cycle from Works of Charity, late fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, S. Martino del Vescovo

Pukirov, Vasili Vladimirovich, The Unequal Marriage, 1862, Moscow, Russia, State Tretyakov Gallery

Frith, William Powell, The Marriage of the Prince of Wales, 1865, England, Collection of Her Majesty, the Queen of England

Exchanging Rings

Sassetta, Marriage of St. Francis to Lady Poverty, panel from Sansepolcro Altarpiece, 1437–1444, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

Verona, Michele da, Betrothal, panel, circa 1490, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz

Raphael, Marriage of the Virgin, 1504, Milan, Italy, Brera Veronese, Paolo Caliari, Mystical Marriage of St. Catherine, oil on canvas, circa 1570s, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Schiavone, Andreas, The Marriage of Cupid and Psyche, oil on panel, before 1563, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Lichtenstein, Roy, The Engagement Ring, oil on canvas, 1961, collection of Mr. and Mrs. S. L. Newhouse Jr.

Joining of Hands

Sarcophagus with Marriage Scene, Roman sculpture, London, British Museum

Bible Moralisée, circa 1230, Oxford, Bodleian Library (2706, F. 6)

Decretum Gratiani, Flemish illuminated manuscript, late thirteenth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery (MS 10.135, f275)

Speculum Humanae Salvationis, Italian illuminated manuscript, circa 1370, Cologne, Germany, Historisches Archiv (W105)

Campin, Robert, Marriage of the Virgin, circa 1430, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Eyck, Jan van, Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), 1434, London, National Gallery

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Marriage of Solomon and Sheba, from Gates of Paradise, gilt bronze, circa 1440, Florence, Italy, Baptistery

Piero della Francesca, The Marriage of Solomon and Sheba, fresco, circa 1460, Arezzo, Italy, San Francesco

Wedding Feasts

François Vase, Wedding of Peleus and Thetis, Greek, sixth century B.C., Florence, Italy, Archaeological Museum

Apollonio di Giovanni, Wedding of Dido and Aeneas, fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Biblioteca Riccardiana (Ms 492, Aeneid)

Veronese, Paolo, Marriage at Cana, oil on canvas, 1563, Paris, Louvre

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Wedding Banquet, circa 1565, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Steen, Jan, The Marriage at Cana, oil on canvas, 1660s, Blessington, Ireland, Sir Alfred Beit Collection

Steen, Jan, The Marriage at Cana, oil on canvas, 1676, Pasadena, California, Norton Simon Museum

Maximov, Vasili Maximovich, The Magician Arrives at the Village Wedding, 1874, Moscow, Russia, State Tretyakov Gallery

Forbes, Stanhope, The Health of the Bride, 1889, London, Tate Gallery

Wedding Dances

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Wedding Dance, oil on panel, 1566, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts

Delacroix, Eugène, Jewish Wedding, 1839, Paris, Louvre

Wedding Processions

François Vase, Wedding of Peleus and Thetis, sixth century B.C., Florence, Italy, Archaeological Museum

Marriage of Thetis and Peleus, Greek dinos, circa 580 B.C., London, British Museum

Wedding Chariot, Greek dinos, circa 530 B.C., Salerno, Italy, Provincial Museum

Marlay Painter, Wedding Procession, Greek pyxis, circa 440 B.C., London, British Museum

Giotto, Marriage Procession of the Virgin, fresco, 1303–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Florentine School, Wedding of Leonora Bardi and Ippolito Buondelmonte, carved chest, fifteenth century, Waltham, Massachusetts, Brandeis University

Piero della Francesca, Triumph of Federigo da Montefeltro (reverse of portrait), 1459, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Steen, Jan, Village Wedding, 1653, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-van Beuningen

Hicks, George Elgar, Changing Homes, 1862, London, Geffrye Museum

Frith, William Powell, For Better. For Worse, 1881, Forbes Magazine Collection

Chagall, Marc, Village Wedding (I), 1909, Foundation E. G. Bühle, Zurich, Switzerland

Chagall, Marc, Village Wedding (II), 1910, Paris, private collection

The Wedding Night

Sodoma, Il, Marriage of Alexander and Roxana, fresco, circa 1517, Rome, Villa Farnesina, bedroom

Lastman, Pieter, Wedding Night of Tobias and Sarah, 1611, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Steen, Jan, The Prayer of Tobias and Sarah, oil on canvas, 1654, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum

Knupfer, Nikolaus, The Prayer of Tobias and Sarah, oil on canvas, 1654, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum

Marriage by Proxy

Rubens, Peter Paul, Proxy Marriage of Henry IV and Marie de Medicis, 1621–1624, Versailles, France

Marriage Portraits

Rembrandt van Rijn, Jewish Wedding, circa 1666, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Gainsborough, Thomas, Robert Andrews and His Wife, circa 1748, London, National Gallery

Runge, Philipp Otto, Wir Drei, 1804, destroyed

Landseer, Sir Edward, Windsor Castle in Modern Times (Queen Victoria, the Prince Consort and the Princess Royal at Windsor), 1840–1843, London, Royal Collection

Orchardson, William Quillter, Le Mariage de Convenance, 1883, Glasgow, Scotland, City Art Museum

Films

Capra, Frank, It Happened One Night, film, 1934

Olivier, Laurence, Henry V, film, 1944

Branagh, Kenneth, Henry V, film, 1989

Further Reading

Aiazzi, G., Ricordi Storici di cino di Filippo di cino Rimuccini, Florence, Italy: Stamperia Piatti, 1840

Balsdon, John Percy Vyvian Dacre, Roman Women: Their History and Habits, London: Bodley Head, 1962

Barbaro, Francesco, Directions for Love and Marriage in Two Books, London, 1677

- Boccaccio, Giovanni, Il Decameron
- Brooke, Christopher, The Medieval Idea of Marriage, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989
- Carter, Charles Frederick, The Wedding Day in Literature and Art, New York: Dodd and Mead, 1900
- Chartier, Robert, editor, A History of Private Life, Volume Three: Passions of the Renaissance, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987
- Cowley, Robert, Marriage a-la-Mode: A Re-view of Hogarth's Narrative Art, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1983
- DeGubernatis, Angelo, Storia Comparata degli Usi Nuziali in Italia, Milan, 1878
- Duby, George, editor, A History of Private Life, Volume Two: Revelations of the Medieval World, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987
- Fatini, Giuseppe, editor, Novelle del Quattrocento, Turin, Italy, 1929
- Firenzuola, Agnolo, Tales of Firenzuola, Paris, 1889
- Gersdorff, Dagmar von, Liebespaare Eheleute, Berlin: Basiliken-Presse, 1987
- Hagstrum, Jean M., Esteem Enlivened by Desire: The Couple, from Homer to Shakespeare, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1992
- Hall, Edwin, The Arnolfini Betrothal: Medieval Marriage and the Enigma of Van Eyck's Double Portrait, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1994
- Heimann, Adelheid, "Die Hochzeit von Adam und Eva im Paradies nebst Einigen Anderen Hochzeitbildern," Wallraf-Richartz Jahrbuch 37 (1975)
- Herlihy, David, and Christiane Klapisch-Auber, Tuscans and Their Families, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1978
- Honour, Hugh, Romanticism, New York: Harper and Row, 1979
- Johnston, Harold Whetstone, The Private Life of the Romans, New York: Cooper Square, 1973
- Little, Alan MacNaughton Gordon, A Roman Bridal Drama at the Villa of the Mysteries, Wheaton, Maryland: Star Press, 1972
- Molho, Anthony, Marriage Alliance in Late Medieval Florence, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1994
- Molho, Anthony, and J. Kirchner, "Dowry Fund and Marriage Market in Early Quattrocento Florence," Journal of Modern History 49:3 (1978)
- Oakley, John, and Rebecca Hague Sinos, The Wedding in Ancient Athens, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1993
- Rehm, Rush, Marriage to Death: The Conflation of Wedding and Funeral Rituals in Greek Tragedy, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995
- Sacchetti, Il Trecento Novelle, Florence, Italy: Unione Tipografica, 1946
- Saslow, James M., The Medici Wedding of 1589: Florentine Festival as "Theatrum Mundi", New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1996
- Schubring, Paul, Cassoni: Truhen und Truhenbilder der Italienischenfruhrenaissance, Berlin: K. W. Hiersemann, 1923
- Seidel, Linda, Jan Van Eyck's Arnolfini Portrait: Stories of an Icon, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Stone, Lawrence, Uncertain Unions, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992
- Thomas, George, editor, Le Livre du Chastel de Labour par Jean Bruyant, 1909
- Treggiari, Susan, Roman Marriage: "Justi Coniuges," From the Time of Cicero to the Time of Ulpian, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991
- Witthoft, Brucia, "Marriage Rituals and Marriage Chests in Quattrocento Florence," Artibus et Historiae 5 (1982)
- Wolfthal, Diane, "A Hue and a Cry: Medieval Rape Imagery and Its Transformation," Art Bulletin LXXV:1 (March 1993)

MARTYRDOM

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Martyrdom:

CHRIST AS THE LAMB ON THE ALTAR

CHRIST AS MARTYR

EARLY CHRISTIAN MARTYRS

ST. AGATHA

ST. AGNES

ST. ANDREW

ST. CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA

ST. CECILIA

ST. HIPPOLYTUS

ST. JAMES THE MAJOR

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST

ST. LAWRENCE

ST. LUCY

ST. SEBASTIAN

ST. STEPHEN

PROTESTANT AND MODERN SECULAR MARTYRDOM

Flemish School, Martyrdom of Saint Hippolytus with a Bishop and Saints Catherine, Bavo, and Elizabeth of Hungary, fifteenth century, tempera and oil on panel, Walter M. Cabot Fund, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

A martyr is defined as a person who elects to suffer or die rather than give up his or her faith or principle, or a person tortured or killed for their beliefs, or, by extension, a person who suffers great pain or misery over a long period of time. Martyrdom is the state of becoming a martyr; the death or suffering of a martyr; or severe, long-lasting suffering, torment, or torture. Often the belief for which the martyr has died in one era becomes triumphant and accepted later, especially in the case of Christianity, and the martyrs become canonized. The word martyr originally came from the Greek word for witness and was first used in referring to the apostles as witnesses to Christ's ministry and resurrection (Acts 1:8, 22). After the persecution of the early Christians, however, it was restricted to those who had suffered and died for their faith. Russian novelist Fyodor Mikhaylovich Dostoyevsky summed up this state of affairs in an epithet: "Men reject their prophets and slay them; but they love their martyrs and honor those whom they have slain" (The Brothers Karamazov, part III, book VI, ch. 3).

Martyrdom seldom appears in the ancient or classical world, not because persons did not die for their beliefs, but because the concept and category were not described in that form. There were many sacrifices, but those sacrificed, like Iphigenia or the sons of Brutus, did not choose to die but were designated by others and were victims rather than martyrs. Even in the Old Testament, the main story of human sacrifice is the sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham, not Isaac's self-chosen martyrdom for a principle.

The first Christian victim and martyr can be seen in the person of Jesus Christ himself, who made willing atonement for the sins of others by his own life. He is often described as the Paschal Lamb sacrificed at Easter, and is even pictured as a lamb on the altar, as in the central panel of The Ghent Altarpiece (1432) in St. Bavo in Ghent, Belgium, by Jan and Hubert van Eyck. Jesus Christ's martyrdom on the cross is, of course, pictured in the many paintings of the Crucifixion.

The era that produced the greatest number of Christian martyrs began with the fierce persecutions of early believers in A.D. 64 under Nero and lasted until the reign of Diocletian in the fourth century A.D. Christianity was an outlawed sect, so Christians met in the catacombs or burial places in Rome and decorated the walls with symbols of the religion: the Good Shepherd stood for Christ, and Old Testament stories such as the sacrifice of Abraham or the escape from the fiery furnace referred to Christ's sacrifice or present persecution. Thousands of Christians died during this time, often as organized entertainment in Rome, thrown to lions, broken on the wheel, crucified, or even buried alive. Because their allegiance was to Christ as ultimate lord and savior, they regarded their allegiance to him higher than that to the emperor and the Roman state and were, therefore, seen as subversive and dangerous.

Eighteenth-century English historian Edward Gibbon, in The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, declared that Christianity destroyed the Roman Empire as a growing cell within it with different aims and allegiance; this thesis has been disputed, possibly even disproved, but it offers an interesting insight into the threat of martyrs to the system of government that condemned them. They were ultimately uncontrollable, unshakable, and unbribeable, and their "citizenship was in heaven," not on Earth in the Roman Empire. Persecutions ceased when Constantine the Great, a converted Christian, became emperor in A.D. 306 and later declared Christianity the official religion of the state.

Constantine the Great was proclaimed emperor at York in 306 and became senior ruler of the empire in 312 after defeating Maxentius at the Battle of Milvian Bridge. The victory enabled him to rule with Licinius as joint emperor. In 313 Constantine and Licinius met at Milan and agreed to recognize the legal status of the Christian church and pursue a policy of religious toleration. This agreement was commonly known as the Edict of Milan, but actually was neither an edict nor issued at Milan. The proclamation establishing Christianity as the state religion was not issued until 380 under Theodosius I, followed by an edict in 391 prohibiting pagan worship.

Although Constantine the Great was not baptized a Christian until he lay on his deathbed in 327, the persecution of Christians stopped in 313 and a new era for Christians began. Constantine became a champion of the once outlawed sect. The age of martyrs came to an end and their glorification began with the building of numerous churches in their honor under Constantine.

As many of the first Christian converts were Jews, the new sect had kept the prohibition against idols until around A.D. 200. After that time the tombs of the martyrs in the catacombs were decorated with paintings, not of their martyrdoms, but mainly of Old Testament themes of deliverance, such as Jonah's deliverance from the whale, the deliverance of Daniel from the lions' den, Noah delivered from the deluge, Moses striking the rock to get water in the wilderness, or the deliverance of the three Hebrews from the fiery furnace. There were also representations of the Last Supper and its commemoration in the Eucharist, Mass, or Communion. These rituals were especially significant in terms of the recognition of martyrs. Soon Christians developed the custom of having a funeral service and communion at martyrs' tombs on the day of their martyrdom or victory over death. The tomb holding their remains was often used as a table or altar in the service, prefiguring the importance of the actual remains of the martyrs as relics, both in terms of liturgical practice of the church and of church construction. An example of this is the priest kissing the altar at the beginning of the Roman Catholic Mass, revering the relics enclosed there. In the Mass the martyrs come before all other saints in worship and in intercessional prayers. Following the early practice of memorial services for martyrs on the day of their death, martyrs' days are celebrated throughout the church year in the calendars of Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches. The liturgical color for martyrdom is red, signifying the blood shed for their faith.

The earliest mention of the preservation of relics and the memorial services for saints at their tombs or the places they were martyred occurs in the Martyrium Policarpi (circa 156–157). The biblical reference to praying before the throne of God is in Revelation 6:9, and receiving white robes as a reward for martyrdom is referred to in Revelation 7:13–17. There were local calendars naming martyrs, their place of martyrdom, and the day of their festival in Rome as early as 354, and in the more general Breviarum Syriacum of 411. Many of the legends of the saints and martyrs were codified in the Golden Legend, written by Jacopo da Voragine, archbishop of Genoa in the thirteenth century. The Acta Sanctorum, a collection of the early lives of saints and martyrs, was compiled by a group of Jesuits known as Bollandists. It was begun in the seventeenth century and is not yet finished. Unfortunately, much of the evidence was documented a number of years, even centuries, after the life of the original martyr, by which time the material was often more legendary than accurate and very difficult to verify. Often the relics of saints are quite genuine, but little is known about the martyr; and in other cases, the story is well known, but the connection to the material remains of the martyr is tenuous.

One consequence of the legalization of the Christian faith was the building of numerous churches for worshipers. Constantine the Great was zealous in the building of martyries, or shrines built in honor of a martyr. The first basilica erected by Constantine the Great and Pope Sylvester was to preserve the tomb of the martyred St. Peter. The transept of the church was over the trophy of Gaius marking St. Peter's grave, and the church was therefore a martyr.

There were two main types of martyries. The first was built around a central dome under which the altar was placed, making the relic the focus of the entire plan. There were four aisles radiating from the altar, usually in the form of a Greek cross. In some early churches, such as San Lorenzo in Milan (circa 370), the central altar was surrounded by a circular ambulatory. San Stefano Rotondo in Rome, built during the rule of Pope Simplicius (468–483) is one of the largest and oldest martyries built on a central plan, although only two of the aisles now remain. The second type was the basilica with the altar located over relics, tombs, or catacombs where martyrs were buried, such as St. Peter's or San Sebastiano in the Via Appia, also built during the reign of Constantine the Great.

The cult of relics became very popular under the reign of Emperor Theodosius I in the late fourth century, and many martyries were built to house them in the fourth through the sixth century. Martyrs' remains were much sought after, especially after the Second Council of Nicaea in 787, which ruled that no church could be consecrated if it did not have relics. Pilgrimages were made, especially during the Middle Ages, to churches and shrines devoted to the relics of martyrs.

Martyrs were also exalted during the Counter-Reformation and Catholic Restoration, with the militant campaign of the Roman Catholic Church against Protestantism. Religious orders such as the Jesuits prepared novices for possible martyrdom in Protestant territory or the non-Christian world by focusing on the heroism of martyrs and their sacrifices for their faith. Seventeenth-century and Baroque art pictured vividly the sufferings of martyrs. The accidental rediscovery of the Catacomb of Priscilla in 1578 set off a campaign to rebuild early martyries that had fallen into disrepair.

Sometimes the discovery of the remains of a martyr created new works of art and architecture, as in the case of St. Cecilia. A Roman woman whose martyrdom may have taken place anytime between 177 and the fourth century, Cecilia's body was supposedly interred in the Catacomb of Callixtus and later put in the Church of St. Cecilia-in-Trastevere in Rome. Her sarcophagus was opened in 1599, and her body was found intact in a coffin of cypress wood, lying on her right side, her head bound with a cloth. According to legend, Cecilia was martyred by receiving three wounds in the neck and breast, after which she lived three days and gave all her possessions to poor Christians. In 1600 Stefano Maderno was commissioned to sculpt a statue of St. Cecilia for the church. Having seen her body when the sarcophagus was opened, he created a very touching and beautiful memorial, showing her reclining on her side in the same attitude as the body in the cypress wood coffin.

St. Cecilia was a very popular martyr and may be the subject of an early half-length drawing on a wall of the Catacomb of St. Lorenzo (before 313). Although she was the patron saint of music, she was not shown with a musical instrument until after the fifteenth century. Jan van Eyck painted her playing the organ with a heavenly choir in the Ghent Altarpiece, and Lucas van Leyden, in an early sixteenth-century painting now in Munich, Germany, showed her as a single figure holding a portable organ. Some of the most famous representations of her are in a series of frescos by Domenichino (1613–1614) in the Chapel of St. Cecilia in the Church of San Luigi dei Francesi in Rome.

Another dramatic case of the discovery of a saint's relics occurred in 1634 when the painter and architect Pietro da Cortona was given permission to rebuild the crypt of the church of the Academy of St. Luke at his own expense in order to make a tomb for himself. In October 1634 the body of the martyr St. Martini was discovered in excavating the space. At this point Cardinal Francesco Barberini took charge and in 1635 ordered the rebuilding of the entire church. Pietro da Cortona designed the building, which was dedicated in 1650 to the martyred St. Martini and to St. Luke, the patron saint of artists whose church it had originally been.

In painting and sculpture martyrs are often portrayed wearing a crown and holding a palm frond as symbols of their martyrdom. "The victor's crown of gold" stood for a victory over death and was adapted from the classical custom of rewarding winners, such as athletes or poets, with a wreath, at first of laurel, but later of gold. Among the Romans, the palm frond was a conventional symbol of victory, again indicating the martyr as one who wins everlasting life. An example of this convention can be seen in the sixth-century A.D. church of S. Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna, Italy. A procession of male and female martyrs is depicted in mosaic on each side of the interior.

In addition to these general symbols of martyrdom, certain saints are identified by the distinctive attributes of their martyrdom, such as the wheel (an instrument of torture and death) with St. Catherine of Alexandria; a human skin with St. Bartholomew, who was flayed to death; and an X cross with St. Andrew. Sometimes saints are shown with a gruesome token of their deaths, as in the case of St. Peter Martyr, who is portrayed with a knife planted firmly in his head. St. John the Baptist is usually shown as he is about to be decapitated with a sword. In The Beheading of John the Baptist by Caravaggio, the saint's head is being held down to the block, and a rivulet of blood flows from his neck. A variant of this scene shows the kneeling saint with the executioner about to swing his sword, as in the painting by Pierre Puvis de Chavannes in the Barber Institute of Fine Arts in Birmingham, England, and numerous other examples.

The first Christian to be martyred was Stephen, a deacon in the early church, who was stoned to death for his witness to Christ (Acts 7:54–60). His martyrdom is shown in many paintings, including Rembrandt van Rijn's first dated painting (1625) in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Lyons, France; Adam Elsheimer's painting of 1602–1605 in the National Gallery of Scotland in Edinburgh; Annibale Carracci's work in the Harvard Art Museums in Cambridge, Massachusetts; and Fra Angelico's Chapel of Nicholas V in the Vatican. Even as late as the nineteenth century, John Everett Millais's painting (1895) in the National Gallery in London and Gustave Doré's wood engraving depict the theme.

Rembrandt depicts Stephen's martyrdom very actively, showing his persecutors on all sides actually throwing stones at the saint while he sinks to his knees, looking up at heaven and asking forgiveness for his murderers. In other representations, such as Annibale Carracci's, the witnesses to the event are shown placing their clothes at Saul's feet. Still others show the saint alone, dead or dying, as in John Everett Millais's St. Stephen, an oil of 1895, where the young haloed martyr is stretched out on the ground, surrounded by a few stones, his murderers appearing only as shadowy figures in the right background. Some artists represent the stoning of Stephen with his vision of God the Father and angels in heaven, as in Annibale Carracci's version in the Louvre in Paris, while others show a vision of the Trinity, as in Lodovico Cigoli's painting (before 1613) in the Academy in Venice, Italy. In St. Stephen in Glory (before 1660), Giacomo Cavedone depicts a post-martyrdom version with angels carrying the soul of Stephen to heaven.

St. Sebastian, another popular early martyr, was an officer in the army of Diocletian in the third century. When he refused to sacrifice to Roman gods, he was stripped and bound to a stake for archery practice. He survived this ordeal with the help of a Christian woman named Irene, who unbound him and healed him, but Sebastian was disposed of more efficiently later. St. Sebastian's martyrdom was a favorite subject of artists as it allowed them a chance to show a minimally clad anatomical study. His ordeal was painted, among others, by Antonio del Pollaiuolo (circa 1475), the painting now located in the National Gallery in London; by Andrea Mantegna (circa 1455–1460), now in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; by Hendrik Terbrugghen (1625), now in the Allen Art Museum at Oberlin College in Ohio; by Georges De La Tour (circa 1649), in the Gemäldegalerie in Berlin; and by Louise Bourgeois in a 1990 engraving.

One of the most common representations of St. Sebastian shows him as a young man in a loincloth tied to a stake or pillar, usually pierced by some arrows. In the Renaissance example by Mantegna, the saint is bound to a classical arch and riddled with arrows. The broken arch and scattered fragments of sculpture may allude here to the passing of the classical, pagan world. An unusual variant of this theme by Antonio del Pollaiuolo shows St. Sebastian raised on a pole in the center of the composition, while on the ground below six crossbowmen are loading their weapons or taking aim. This composition enables the artist, who was also a sculptor and engraver, to show three active poses in pairs, each a mirror image of its partner. Hendrik Terbrugghen shows the aftermath of the shooting party, with St. Sebastian, slumped on the ground, being released from his bonds by St. Irene and a maid. Another representation exploiting the drama of torchlight is that of Georges de la Tour whose night scene depicts the recumbent figure of St. Sebastian lying on the left while a kneeling St. Irene and others holding torches look down on the wounded martyr.

St. Agnes was one of the most popular female martyrs. Her legend is one of the oldest in church history and is attested to by St. Jerome's mention of the spread of her cult in the fourth century. She was supposedly martyred under either the Emperor Decius's or Diocletian's persecutions in the third or fourth century. The son of a prefect of Rome saw her and wanted her as his wife, but she refused him, citing Christ as her heavenly bridegroom. The son fell ill and his father tried to make Agnes accept him, finally chaining her and stripping her naked before his soldiers. In response to her prayers, her hair grew long and covered her entirely, protecting her modesty. She was imprisoned and prayed not to be dishonored—referring to a practice of putting a virgin martyr in a brothel to be violated, as Roman law forbade the execution of a virgin (Hall, p. 11). An angel visited her in prison, bringing her a white and shining robe of martyrdom. After unsuccessfully trying to burn her to death (the flames kept being extinguished), an executioner killed her by the sword.

There are several churches in Rome built in her honor. The oldest, Sant'Agnese Fuori le Mura, originally constructed by Constantine the Great over the tomb of the martyr, was reconstructed under Pope Honorius (625–638). Several early representations of St. Agnes are in this church, including a relief from a fourth-century altar frontal showing her as an orant, or praying figure with arms raised, and a mosaic depicting her as a court lady (625–638). Sant'Agnese in Piazza Navona is a seventeenth-century church that replaced an older one begun by the architects Girolamo and Carlo Rainaldi in 1652. In 1653–1655 Francesco Borromini designed the facade of the church. A sculpture of St. Agnes by Ercole Ferrata (1660) in this church shows her on the pyre of flame, looking up to heaven in entreaty. She is also represented by Titian presenting her martyr's palm to Christ (sixteenth century), in the Louvre in Paris; and by Paolo Veronese, in the Academia in Venice, as a patroness of maidens presenting a nun to the Madonna (sixteenth century). Tintoretto painted The Martyrdom of St. Agnes (sixteenth century), in the church of S. Maria dell'Orto in Venice, as a theatrical spectacle. An unusual twentieth-century representation of St. Agnes shows the angel bringing the white and shining robe of martyrdom to the saint in prison. Painted by Frank Cadogan Cowper, a very late Pre-Raphaelite painter, this work is now in the Tate Gallery in London.

Another very popular female martyr was St. Agatha, a virgin believed to have died under the persecutions of Emperor

Decius at Catania in Sicily. Legend says she was desired by Quintian, the prefect of Sicily, and when she refused him he had her tortured by cutting off her breasts. She is often represented in art with a pair of pincers or with her breasts on a plate. The legend continues with a huge volcanic eruption of Mount Etna. The citizens of Catania fled to the tomb of St. Agatha and put the relic of her veil on a lance as a banner, miraculously stopping the lava. St. Agatha is the patron saint of Catania, and a town northwest of Mount Etna, Sant'Agata di Militello, is named after her. Italian families and families of Italian descent originally from that area bear the name Santagata in honor of the saint and her town.

There are a number of artistic representations of St. Agatha, the most dramatic showing her bound to a column, stripped to the waist, and threatened by an executioner with shears. These include Sebastiano del Piombo's Martyrdom of St. Agatha (sixteenth century) in the Pitti Palace in Florence and Parmigianino's St. Agatha and Her Executioner (early sixteenth century) in S. Giovanni in Parma, Italy.

In the late Middle Ages and early Renaissance, altarpieces for churches and private chapels frequently depicted martyrdoms, sometimes of the patron saint of the donor. The fifteenth-century triptych altarpiece of the Martyrdom of Saint Hippolytus with a Bishop and Saints Catherine, Bavo, and Elizabeth of Hungary, now in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, by an unknown Flemish artist, possibly influenced by Hugo van der Goes, is just such an altarpiece. Although the spectacle of someone being pulled to pieces by four horses going in opposite directions might not seem particularly attractive subject matter in the twentieth century, contemplation on the sacrifice of martyrs was encouraged during this period. This was a time when relics, or physical remains of saints, such as bones, nails, etc., were in great demand as objects of veneration, bestowing merit on the possessor. Picturing a martyr's painful death was an appropriate object of edification and worship. The work itself bristles with excitement and movement, the horsemen and henchmen contrasting with the still central figure of the saint.

Another era during which the martyrdoms of saints were extensively pictured and written about was the Counter-Reformation of the seventeenth century, when the Roman Catholic Church attempted to counteract the inroads of Protestantism by dramatizing the sacrifices of earlier saints. New churches and missionary orders like the Jesuits commissioned explicit, and often gory, paintings and sculptures dramatizing martyrdom. These vivid depictions, which draw the spectator emotionally into the event, appear in works like The Conversion of St. Paul and The Crucifixion of St. Peter in S. Maria del Popolo in Rome; The Martyrdom of St. Matthew in the Contarelli Chapel in S. Luigi dei Francesi in Rome, by Caravaggio; and The Martyrdom of St. Agatha in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin-Dahlem, by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo.

The church of San Andrea al Quirinale in Rome, commissioned of Gian Lorenzo Bernini by Cardinal Camillo Pamphili for the novices of the Jesuit order in 1758, was planned in its architecture, sculpture, and painting to re-create the drama of the martyrdom of St. Andrew. The convex curve of the church facade reaches out into the world; in the interior the painting Martyrdom of St. Andrew by Guglielmo Cortese (circa 1670) shows the saint's death on an X-shaped cross, while over the painting and high altar a sculpture of the saint by Bernini soars upward from the earthly zone toward heaven.

Poet T. S. Eliot made martyrdom the subject of his play The Cocktail Party (1950), in which a young woman, Celia, ends up as a martyred missionary. There is also a strong tradition of Protestant martyrdom, particularly in the reign of Mary Tudor (Bloody Mary). A Roman Catholic married to Philip II of Spain, she attempted to return England, which had become Protestant under Henry VIII, to Roman Catholicism. A number of Protestants would not forsake their beliefs, and their fates—beheading, burning, etc.—are detailed in John Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Another set of Protestant martyrs were the Scottish Covenanters, who subscribed to the National Covenant (1638) or to the Solemn League and Covenant (1643) to uphold the principles of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. They would not renounce their allegiance, even when condemned to die. Margaret Wilson was condemned in 1683 for being a Covenanter and was tied to a stake in Wigtown Bay to drown as the tide rose. Millais's The Martyr of Solway (1871) is a poignant view of her watching the waves rise.

A secular martyrdom has often been bestowed on those who were killed because of their principles, such as Joan of Arc, Nathan Hale, Abraham Lincoln, Sacco and Vanzetti, and Martin Luther King Jr. Lincoln's death was referred to by Samuel Cole in the poem In April: "Twas April when they laid the martyr's crown / On Lincoln's brow." Walt Whitman commemorated Lincoln's assassination in the poem "Oh Captain, My Captain." Nathan Hale, the American Revolutionary spy killed by the British, died saying, "I regret that I have but one life to give for my country." He was commemorated in sculpture by Frederick MacMonnies. Ben Shahn painted a secular Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, two anarchists wrongly condemned for their beliefs. Their story is dramatized in the play Winterset by Maxwell Anderson. Martin Luther King Jr. has many icons dedicated to his memory, one of the most dramatic being a giant sculptured head by John Wilson in Washington, D.C.

Still another type of secular martyrdom involves suffering from great pain or misery over a long period of time, as described by the poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow in Vittoria Colonna, stanza 6: "She knew the life-long martyrdom / Of waiting for some one to come / Who nevermore would come again." Phrases such as "she is a martyr to migraine headaches" or "he was a martyr to gout" (or even to imaginary diseases) refer to suffering from debilitating and lengthy illnesses that are equated to the painful process of religious martyrdoms.

One attribute shared by sacred and secular depictions of martyrdoms is the presentation of the victims with sympathy and admiration, as heroes or heroines. The viewpoint is that of a sympathetic observer seeing the event, usually in all its dramatic possibilities. The viewer is asked to admire and possibly even emulate the martyr.

One of the main differences between sacred and secular martyrdoms is the element of the divine. Depictions of martyrdoms of saints sometimes include visions of heaven, angels, God, Christ, or the Trinity, so that the viewer is seeing the same vision as the saint. Representations of religious martyrdoms or martyrs often appear in places of worship, especially in the Roman Catholic and other liturgically traditional churches, and are not excluded from many Protestant churches. In certain branches of the Christian church, some martyrs are worshiped.

Special healing powers are attributed to some, such as St. Margaret or St. Barbara. Despite the differences between sacred and secular martyrdoms, both continue to inform the present with their spirit, their power, and their principles.

See also Apotheosis/Deification; Beheading/Decapitation; Crucifixion; Death; Ecstasy

Selected Works of Art

Christ as the Lamb on the Altar

Eyck, Jan and Hubert van, The Ghent Altarpiece, oil on panel, 1432, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo

Christ as Martyr

Guttoso, Renato, Crucifixion, oil, 1942, private collection

Early Christian Martyrs

Procession of Martyrs, mosaic, sixth century, Ravenna, Italy, San Apollinare Nuovo

Nanni di Banco, Four Crowned Martyrs, marble sculpture, circa 1413, Florence, Italy, Orsanmichele

Delaroche, Paul, The Christian Martyr, oil, 1855, Paris, Louvre

Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, The Cavalcade of the Martyrs, circa 1898, Paris, Panthéon

St. Agatha

Sebastiano del Piombo, Martyrdom of St. Agatha, oil, first half of sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace

Parmigianino, St. Agatha and Her Executioner, oil, early sixteenth century, Parma, Italy, S. Giovanni

Cerrini, Giovanni Domenico, Cycle of St. Agatha, circa 1630, Rome, St. Agatha of the Goths

Zurbarán, Francisco de, St. Agatha, 1630–1633, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre

St. Agnes

St. Agnes as Orant, relief sculpture, fourth century, Rome, Sant'Agnese Fuori le Mura

St. Agnes, mosaic, 625–638, Rome, Sant'Agnese Fuori le Mura

Veronese, Paolo Caliari, St. Agnes Presenting a Nun to the Virgin Mary, oil, sixteenth century, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Titian, St. Agnes, oil, sixteenth century, Paris, Louvre

Tintoretto, Jacopo, The Martyrdom of St. Agnes, oil, sixteenth century, Venice, Italy, S. Maria dell'Orto

Ferrata, Ercole, St. Agnes on the Pyre, sculpture, 1600, Rome, Sant'Agnese in Piazza Navona

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Martyrdom of St. Agnes, oil, circa 1719, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie

Cowper, Frank Cadogan, St. Agnes in Prison Visited by an Angel with a Shining Robe, oil, 1905, London, Tate Gallery

St. Andrew

El Greco, St. Andrew, painting, circa 1590, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Caravaggio, St. Andrew, 1607–1610, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, San Andrea al Quirinale, church, 1658–1670, Rome

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Martyred St. Andrew Rising to Heaven, sculpture, 1658–1670, Rome, San Andrea al Quirinale

Cortese, Guglielmo, Martyrdom of St. Andrew, oil, circa 1670, Rome, San Andrea al Quirinale

Domenichino, St. Andrew, early seventeenth century, Rome, San Andrea della Valle

St. Catherine of Alexandria

Master of the First Prayer Book of Maximilian I, St. Catherine of Alexandria, miniature on vellum, from Hours of William, Lord Hastings, late 1470s, London, British Library

Marmion, Simon, The Martyrdom of St. Catherine, miniature on vellum, 1475–1481, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Raphael, St. Catherine of Alexandria, oil, circa 1507, London, National Art Gallery

Caravaggio, St. Catherine of Alexandria, oil, circa 1597, Lugano-Castagnula, Switzerland, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection

El Greco, St. Catherine with Her Wheel, oil, before 1614, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Preti, Mattia, St. Catherine of Alexandria Visited in Prison by the Emperor, oil, circa 1640–1643, Dayton, Ohio, Dayton Art Institute

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, St. Catherine, oil, 1857, London, Tate Gallery

St. Cecilia

St. Cecilia, drawing, before 313, Rome, Catacomb of St. Lorenzo

Eyck, Jan van, St. Cecilia Playing the Organ, from The Ghent Altarpiece, oil on panel, 1432, Ghent Belgium, St. Bavo

Leyden, Lucas van, St. Cecilia, oil on panel, early sixteenth century, Munich, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Maderno, Stefano, St. Cecilia, sculpture, 1600, Rome, St. Cecilia-in-Trastevere

Domenichino, Life of St. Cecilia, frescoes, Rome, San Luigi dei Francesi, Chapel of St. Cecilia

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, St. Cecilia, pen and brown ink drawing, 1856–1857, Birmingham, England, City Museum and Art Gallery

St. Hippolytus

Flemish School, Martyrdom of Saint Hippolytus with a Bishop and Saints Catherine, Bavo, and Elizabeth of Hungary, oil on tempera on panel, fifteenth century, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Bouts, Dirck, Martyrdom of St. Hippolytus, panel, circa 1475, Bruges, Belgium, St. Savior's Church

St. James the Major

Mantegna, Andrea, The Martyrdom of St. James, fresco, circa 1455, Padua, Italy, Church of the Eremitani

St. John the Baptist

- Donatello, Feast of Herod, gilt bronze on baptismal font, circa 1425, Siena, Italy, Cathedral
- Titian, Salome with the Head of John the Baptist, oil, circa 1511, Rome, Galleria Doria-Pamphili
- Caravaggio, The Beheading of John the Baptist, oil, 1608–1609, La Valetta, Malta Cathedral
- Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, Beheading of St. John the Baptist, oil, 1869, Birmingham, England, Barber Institute of Fine Arts
- Beardsley, Aubrey, Salome with the Head of John the Baptist, pen and ink drawing, 1892, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Library

St. Lawrence

- St. Lawrence*, mosaic, mid–fifth century, Ravenna, Italy, Mausoleum of Galla Placidia
- Angelico, Fra, Life of St. Lawrence, frescoes, 1448, Vatican, Chapel of Nicolas V.
- Donatello, St. Lawrence, relief sculpture, first half of fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo
- Titian, Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, oil, circa 1548–1547, Venice, Italy, Church of the Gesuati
- Bronzino, Agnolo, Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, 1569, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo
- Rubens, Peter Paul, Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, sixteenth century, Schleissheim, Germany, Castle
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, marble, circa 1616, Florence, Italy, Contini-Bonacousi Collection

St. Lucy

- Lorenzetti, Pietro, St. Lucy, circa 1332, Florence, Italy, San Lucia Frole Rovinante
- Caravaggio, Burial of St. Lucy, oil, 1608, Syracuse, Sicily, Church of San Lucia
- Zurbarán, Francisco de, St. Lucy, 1636, Chartres, France, Musée

St. Sebastian

- Mantegna, Andrea, St. Sebastian, circa 1455–1460, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Martyrdom of St. Sebastian*, miniature on vellum, from Hours of Marguerite Foix, circa 1470–1480, London, Victoria and Albert Museum (fol. 205v–206)
- Pollaiuolo, Antonio del, The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, oil, circa 1475, London, National Gallery
- Veronese, Paolo, The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, oil, 1560s, Venice, Italy, San Sebastiano
- Terbrugghen, Hendrik, St. Sebastian Tended by Irene and Her Maid, oil, 1625, Oberlin, Ohio, Oberlin College, Allen Art Museum
- La Tour, Georges De, St. Sebastian Tended by Irene by Torchlight, oil, 1649, Berlin, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
- Piot, René, Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, painting, circa 1913, Paris, Musée d'Art Moderne
- Ciry, Michel, St. Sebastian, etching, 1950
- Bourgeois, Louise, St. Sebastian (The Pins), engraving, circa 1990

St. Stephen

- Elsheimer, Adam, The Stoning of St. Stephen, oil, 1602–1605, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
- Cigoli (Ludovico Cardi), Martyrdom of St. Stephen, before 1613, Venice, Italy, Venice Academy
- Rembrandt van Rijn, The Stoning of Stephen, oil, 1625, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Cavedone, Giacomo, St. Stephen in Glory, before 1660, Modena, Italy, Pinacoteca Estense
- Millais, John Everett, St. Stephen, oil, 1895, London, National Gallery

Protestant and Modern Secular Martyrdom

- Millais, John Everett, The Martyr of Solway, oil, 1871, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery
- Jones, Lois Mailou, Meditation (Mob Victim), oil, 1944, private collection
- Gorky, Arshile, Agony, oil, 1947, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Shahn, Ben, The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, oil, 1967, Syracuse, New York, Joe and Emily Lowe Art Gallery, Syracuse University

Further Reading

- Cheney, Liana De Girolami, "The Cult of St. Agatha," Women's Art Journal 17:1 (Spring/Summer 1996)
- Eliot, T. S., The Cocktail Party, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1950; London: Faber, 1950
- Fish, Arthur, John Everett Millais, London: Cassell, 1923
- Freedberg, David, "The Representations of Martyrdom During the Early Counter-Reformation in Antwerp," Burlington Magazine 118 (1976)
- Galloni, A., Tortures and Torment of the Christian Martyrs, Paris: 1903
- Gerson, H., "La lapidation de St. Etienne peintre par Rembrandt en 1625," Bulletin des Musées et Monuments Lyonnais 3:4 (1989)
- Grabar, André, Early Christian Art, New York: Odyssey Press, 1968
- , Martyrium, Paris: Collège de France, 1943–1946
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, New York: Harper and Row, 1979
- Mâle, Émile, L'Art religieux après le Concile de Trente, Paris, 1932
- Mancinelli, Fabrizio, Catacombs and Basilicas: The Early Christians in Rome, Florence, Italy: Scala, 1981
- Puppi, Lionello, Torment in Art, New York: Praeger, 1991
- Thompson, C., Van Dyck: Variations on the Theme of St. Sebastian, Edinburgh: National Gallery of Scotland, 1975
- Waterhouse, Ellis, Italian Baroque Painting, London: Phaidon, 1962
- Wittkower, Rudolf, Art and Architecture in Italy, 1600–1750, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1975

MASKS/PERSONAE

Elaine Shefer

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Masks/Personae:

ANCIENT

NINETEENTH CENTURY

MEDIEVAL

TWENTIETH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH AND

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

James Ensor, Scandalized Masks, 1880s, painting, Brussels, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique. (Courtesy of A. C. L., Brussels)

Man is least himself when he talks in his own person.
Give him a mask and he will tell the truth.
(Oscar Wilde)

To paint or sculpt the human face is to transform it. This activity is already part of mask iconography because the very act of re-creating brings about something or someone else while the subject itself remains the same. Re-creating, then, produces ambiguity and equivocation. In some ways, a metamorphosis or transfiguration takes place, not only of the subject but also of the artist. Transfiguration implies mystery, and it often implies something shameful that must be hidden from view. Hence, the adoption of a persona and use of a mask.

The secrecy implied by a mask is evidence of a human dilemma, our private search for a “real” self. By wearing masks, are individuals hiding or revealing who they “really” are? Are they indulging in fantasies by playing a role, adopting a persona, or demonstrating more than one “real” self? The complexities and ambiguities inherent in the use of a mask are apparent even in the hard-edged definition Webster’s New World Dictionary of the American Language (1957) gives the word: “a covering for the face or part of the face” that serves “to conceal or disguise identity”; “a likeness of a person’s face . . . a sculpted or molded likeness that can identify a character.”

By helping people to become what they desire, in either a positive or negative sense, the mask has always had a magical, symbolic quality. This quality can be traced to cultures in Africa and Oceania where masks symbolized the authority of a particular spirit or power because of the widespread belief that the head was the prime residence of such powers. Essentially protective, these cult objects helped guarantee social order by frightening away interfering spirits. Examples of these types of masks include: an owl mask from Baining used as a protection for children; a fire-spitter mask from the Ivory Coast used to drive away “soul-eating” spirits; a mask from Mali used to ensure the fertility of the soil, an abundance of rain, and good crops; and the Ibibio mask from southwestern Nigeria used to ward off the demon (Elsen, p. 26).

Formally, masks show a relationship between reality and abstraction. Elements of reality are present in all of them—the eyes of the wearer in the owl mask, the features of different animals in the fire-spitter, the antelope’s ears in the mask from Mali, and the features of a human being in the Ibibio mask. None, however, could be said to imitate an actual person, type, or animal. The owl of the natural world has been transformed in the Baining mask into something mysterious, related to tribal symbols; the fire-spitter is a conglomeration of various animals; the antelope can be recognized in the Mali mask only by its ears; and the Ibibio mask is a head based on both a realistic and an abstract concept. By setting the real against the abstract, including the incongruous, and emphasizing short lines and surprise happenings, these types of masks made their meanings felt. Rather than mimicking reality, they allowed people to exert some control over an environment that they found hostile or, at best, incomprehensible. A particular fear could thus be overcome by wearing a mask even more fearful. The ugly and the grotesque, the real and the unreal—these have become hallmarks of mask iconography, features that remain present even when there is no intention to inspire fear.

Although religious and funerary masks are known from antiquity—having been discovered in Spartan, Carthaginian, and Mycenaean tombs—the mask type that has most clearly persisted throughout the ages, and has had the strongest influence on subsequent artists, derived from the Greek theater. The ancestor of modern mask imagery, of which caricature and cartooning are a part, developed prior to Attic comedy in mimic farce, staged in centers inhabited by the Dorian people. Corinthian vases provide early evidence of the mimes or comics who participated in this early Dorian or Megaron comedy, which was rude in form, popular in appeal, and intended to evoke boisterous merriment. These pagan figures, who ridiculed the legends of the gods, wore masks that appear to have depicted either Dionysus or his demons, thus stressing the mischievous side of an untroubled world. These masked mimes performed a mythological burlesque, in a sense.

In these stock, male, demonic characters lie the roots of one of the most popular characters in art, the clown, originally called marikas, a name connected to the Greek word moros (the generic term for mimic fool). Of the female characters—Mormo, Akko, and Alphito, visages described by Plutarch as “terrifying masks . . . designed to frighten children and cause terror” (Nicoll, Harlequin, p. 28)—lies another popular character in art, the witch. The British School of Athens has unearthed a sixth-century B.C. clay statuette of the witchlike type that persisted into and beyond the medieval period. The statuette is of an old woman with a heavily lined face, hideous jaw, and one or two teeth peering through her mouth (Nicoll, p. 28). In the Berlin Museum is a terra-cotta rendering (no. 7042a) of another famous type: Maison, the comic Megarian cook, symbol of gluttony (Nicoll, p. 29). In addition to the fool and the witch, other early character types include the doctor, the comic thief, and the animal mimic dancer, who impersonated animals by wearing animal masks. In addition to terra-cotta figurines, these masks found their way onto vases such as an amphora in Berlin on which men are disguised as horses (Flickinger, fig. 14), a sixth-century B.C. amphora in the British Museum in London displaying actors with bird masks (Journal of Hellenic Studies, vol. II, plate XIV), and bronzes such as that of an actor with the head of a rat (Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, no. 3682).

The mime dances influenced Attic plays such as Aristophanes' The Wasps (produced 422 B.C.), The Birds (produced 414 B.C.), and The Frogs (produced 405 B.C.). In The Clouds (produced 423 B.C.), the chorus wore masks with birdlike features. Doric farce not only influenced the Athenian theater but also provided the basis for the development of types that would outlast the Roman period, show up in the commedia dell'arte of Renaissance Italy, and ultimately find their way into the plastic arts.

Given the small number of actors required to play a myriad of male and female roles in Athenian theater, as well as the vast size of the theater itself, it is no surprise that the mask played a primary role in the actor's attire and was invariably double the size of the performer's face. The mask was the simplest means of giving the illusion of permanency to a favorite type of character and of revealing to the audience something important about that character. Caricaturists would come to rely on this device. In order to manifest the characters with the playwright's intended mood or establish them as a particular type or ethnic affiliation, masks would be cast into well-defined, recognizable shapes. Seen at close range, even the most comic mask had a terrifying look, although practical necessity might explain such grotesqueness: had they not been so crudely fashioned, they would have appeared featureless from a distance. From the medieval period, this grotesque quality came to be associated with humankind's spirit, its sinful soul, with which it was in constant battle.

Julius Pollux, an author of the second century A.D., identified almost 30 classical tragic masks, from representations of extreme old age to the very young, godlike types. The "squalid" wore masks that had downcast eyes or were "pale of face" (Wiles, p. 74). Although each mask was described so that there can be no mistaking the character, masks didn't always restrict themselves to one type of emotion particular to a given character. Menedemus of the new comedy had a raised right eyebrow and a horizontal left one, so that one profile indicated anger, the other calm. The actor playing Menedemus would have to turn his face one way or the other to reveal the emotion he was representing. Each mask was a kind of sign language that the Greek audience had come to know by heart: the unraised eyebrows of the "dark, young man"; the "young man with curled hair" and one wrinkle in his brow; or the "rustic type" with wide lips and a flat nose.

Mime drama existed throughout the Roman period and into the medieval period when it was gradually replaced by a new religious drama, the mystery play. Mime offered a circus type of entertainment, one that would eventually have strong repercussions in the world of modern art. The roots of these repercussions lie in the medieval period, during which religious leaders generally looked down on such popular entertainment. As far back as the fourth century, Roman Catholic Church records repeatedly warned that any person connected with the circus or pantomime could not be received into the Church. Bishops were told that they should not have bistriones (actors), buffoons, or acrobats at their dinners. Priests were forbidden to attend such entertainments or to visit places of public spectacle. Such decrees are indicative of the interest demonstrated by laypersons in mimic drama in spite of the threat that the masked mimics posed by revealing the more playful and sinful side of human nature. In fact, the masks of mime were thought by the Church fathers to hide humankind's purer character. A statement made by St. Jerome (fourth century) addresses this conflict: "For while we were created in God's image and likeness, by reason of our own perversity we hide ourselves behind changing masks. . . . We . . . have a counterfeit mask for every sin in which we are inclined" (Barasch, p. 261).

The Church protest against mimic drama reveals that the idea that man was made in the image of God wasn't always readily accepted. Although the Church spoke of the mask as that which disguised humanity's true, pure nature, the mask instead revealed what the Church would have liked to have kept hidden: humanity's impure, ungodly image. Herein lies the inherent ambiguity of the mask, one that continues to plague artists well into the twentieth century.

During the medieval period, the mask became increasingly associated with evil, sin, and the devil. Satanic clamor and diabolical dress were perpetuated in the performances of the jongleurs, masked dancing mimes who "with hair combed back . . . effeminate in look . . . take on the shape and disguise of a tender girl." These "soft limbed boys" were criticized for their ability to "transform and transfigure their bodies with indecent dance and gesture, indecently unclothing themselves or putting on horrible masks" (Nicoll, Masks, p. 138).

Secular entertainment continued throughout the Middle Ages in spite of the Church's condemnation of the mask as an artifice that plays upon and deludes people (Chambers, p. 10). It is no wonder that when the Church took possession of the theater and began to produce religious comedies, the mask became the motif used to personify evil. The religious mystery plays—medleys of mysticism and farce—had a more significant role in medieval life than did the secular, sporadic entertainment of traveling jongleurs. The mask took on a new role but with an old meaning: It depicted a nonhuman.

The story of God necessarily demanded the story of the devil. As opposed to the Scriptures, however, in which the devil, as the embodiment of temptation and darkness, was presented as a serious character, the mystery plays transformed him into a comic type. Satan is brought in for the merriment of the audience in such plays as The Creation, Lucifer's Fall; the serpent is similarly represented in The Garden of Eden and The Nativity. In the mystery plays, the devil is not so much evil as he is irresponsible or extravagantly silly, characterizations perhaps reflecting the subconscious wish to reduce one's enemies to the ridiculous so as to reduce their power and to relieve the audience's fear.

Although varied in appearance, the "Devyls Hede," or "the Demones Heed," was always fearsome (Nicoll, Masks, p. 190). Some representations of the devil consisted of animal masks with pointed snouts and huge horns—The Devil Astaroth (Hermann, fig. 125), or the mask from Sterzing in the Ferdinandeum in Innsbruck, Austria (Hermann, fig. 128)—while others were just plain grotesque. This latter quality could be seen in the devil Belial depicted in a miniature by J. Stainburger V. Sprinzensti in Jacobus Da Teramo's Ob Jesus das recht hab gehabt, dass er die Holl under Teufel hat beraubt Studien in the Bibliothek in Salzburg, Austria, with its long, projecting jaw, crooked nose, and wart on the right side of the face.

Warts, used so frequently by painters and caricaturists to satirize the old and ugly, come from a tradition going back to the secular entertainers, who had inherited some of this characterization from the classic mime. Several masks preserved in Innsbruck show warts and resemble what would later become the image of Punch. The humorous manner in which the Church portrayed evil shows the continuation of the satirical tradition that began in the Greek theater, where actor's costumes were padded with material to fill out bellies and buttocks. This heritage is still well mined in present-day caricatures.

Diabolical connotations were also associated with the "mouth of hell." An early example of this icon is a manuscript illumination from the Winchester School's Psalter of Winchester (before 1161) in the British Museum in London. The mouth of hell is not technically a mask but is derived from it, characterized by an exaggerated independent head, a predominant mouth, and deformed features. Appropriated by Anglo-Saxon England, the mouth of hell took the shape of the jaws of a devouring beast (Swallowing Human Figure, a bronze closing ring at the Church of St. John the Baptist in West Yorkshire). By the seventh century, Gregory the Great had already gathered all the relevant biblical quotations in his Moralia and had used the image of a monstrous beast to convey Satan's evil nature. In Gregory's writings, Satan is initially identified as "a Behemoth, or huge land beast, and then as the Leviathan or sea monster, his shape shifting from lion to dragon to whale to bird." Scholar Joyce Galpern notes that this was a "search for an iconography of hell that could be understood by pagan and Christians alike" (Galpern, p. 142).

By the sixteenth century, mask imagery became more ambiguous, neither concealing nor revealing, representative of either evil or virtue. In Annibale Carracci's painting Hercules at the Crossroads (circa 1596) at the Museo Nazionale Capodimonte in Naples, Italy, the mask is placed behind Voluptas rather than Virtus. Agnolo Bronzino does the same in his painting Exposure of Luxury (1540s) at the National Gallery in London, where two masks represent fraude (deceit) and gelosia (jealousy). In this respect, both artists were following the tradition established by Cesare Ripa, the codifier of Renaissance iconography, who in Iconologica described fraude as "a lady, richly ornamented, and with the mask of a beautiful youth under which is hidden the face of an old woman, deformed and ugly" (Barasch, p. 254).

Other painters, like Raphael in his Parnassus (1510–1511, Stanza della Segnatura in the Vatican) and Giorgio Vasari in his Allegorical Portrait of Lorenzo de' Medici, used the mask in a more classical sense to reveal and identify. In Raphael's Parnassus, a delicate mask identifies the Muse who holds it in her hands. The Vasari painting contains four masks. Vasari explained in a letter that the ugly, distorted one represents vice; the one next to a glass vase stands for virtue; while a beautiful one, hanging from the spout of a vessel, almost merges with the face of Lorenzo de' Medici.

The negative connotations of the mask were perpetuated in the Renaissance in works such as Michelangelo's Tomb of Giuliano de' Medici (designed 1521, carved 1524–1534) in the Medici Chapel in S. Lorenzo in Florence. To this unusual effigy—there is no inscription, and the effigy has been replaced by two allegorical figures for day and night—Michelangelo added a leering mask. Behind the shoulder of Night, whose elbow leans on the mask, there is an additional running frieze of tiny, snarling masks. Within this grandiose allegory of princely and papal power, the leering mask can be seen as a symbol of evil or false dreams. This would coincide with Niccolò Machiavelli's The Prince (published 1532, written 1513), in which an appeal is made in vain to Lorenzo de' Medici to liberate and unify Italy.

In the Renaissance, both attitudes toward masks—the classical and the medieval—were alive. But the Renaissance brought a new dimension of interaction to what had been two separate and opposed traditions. The medieval mask, concealing and awesome in itself, covered that which was supposedly hideous or terrible. In the Renaissance, the hideous was covered by a mask of beauty so the significance of concealment was inverted—for to remove the mask is, after all, to ruin the illusion. "Truly, to destroy the illusion is to upset the whole play" (Barasch, p. 264).

The link between the medieval period and the present is the Italian commedia dell'arte, a comedy of professional players that became active about 1550 or before. The commedia dell'arte probably derived from the Atellan farce of Rome, which was an important link between the Greeks and medieval jongleurs and other itinerant entertainers. The Atellan farce emanated from the ancient city of Atella, one of the first places known to have a theater. Like the wandering medieval mimics, the Atellan troupes were itinerant companies that performed in public squares. Since they did not belong to the regular theater, they were looked down upon and not taken seriously, labeled "traveling comedians" instead of "actors."

This early farce—with its flair for the exaggerated, its reversals of sexual roles, its masks and satire—formed the basis of what became known in fourteenth-century France as imageria populaire, or image d'Epinal. This entertainment manifested itself in children's picture books, comic strips, political caricature, folklore, and the like. Ironically, image d'Epinal suffered much the same fate in the minds of contemporary literati and later historians as did the performances of the Atellanae in the minds of the Roman intelligentsia, or the medieval mimics in the minds of Church fathers. Not considered high art, image d'Epinal was looked upon as unimportant, unworthy of notice, an attitude that persisted well into the nineteenth century. It was the commedia dell'arte that carried this tradition into the modern era.

Comic does not necessarily mean funny, and it is here that the commedia dell'arte distinguishes itself from other traditions of mask usage. By revealing humankind's weaknesses, naïveté, deceitfulness, cowardice, and insecurities, the mask of the commedia dell'arte allowed the audience to laugh and cry at itself. As George Sand commented:

The Commedia dell'Arte is not only a study of the grotesque and facetious . . . but also a portrayal of real characters traced from remote antiquity down to the present day in an uninterrupted tradition of fantastic humor which is in essence quite serious and, one might say, even sad, like every satire which lays bare the spiritual poverty of mankind. (Duchartre, p. 17)

Clown iconography, beginning with the commedia dell'arte and the figure of Pantalone, is based on the concept of the tragic-comic hero. Initially, the characterization of Pantalone was always the same: a mean, stingy, garrulous character played with the same darkish brown mask of a hooked nose, straggling gray beard, and a few wisps of hair from under a cap. Pantalone appeared in many roles: the old father, the greedy merchant, the doting husband, the silly guardian, the aged chancellor. Yet, in all these roles, he was to take himself very seriously, a fact that gave the role such a comic touch.

The multidimensional view of Pantalone's humanity was not the only distinctive feature of the commedia dell'arte, but it was the way the mask itself was used. The mask was never static, a technique whose roots lay in Greek times in the mask of Menedemus, which had two sides: anger and calm. The commedia dell'arte went further by asking its characters to express a wider range of emotions, although they neither wept nor laughed. Its indefinable expressions were full of possibilities. One did not put on a mask, one "played the mask" (Madden, p. 112), to such an extent that roles were not interchangeable. Commedia dell'arte confused identities and did not draw a clear distinction between art and life. Actors did not change out of their foolish identities at the end of their performance but were known, both on stage and off, as fools. "He who wore the harlequin mask became a harlequin" (Nicoll, Harlequin, p. 41), just as much as he who painted the mask became that mask. The commedia dell'arte, in fact, verified what the medieval bishops had feared: the mask is not a disguise, it is a revelation.

Pantalone's usual companion was Dottore, a character known for his doctorlike characteristics. The popularity of Dottore as an object of ridicule—a type developed in early mime as well as in early religious plays—was evident in seventeenth-century engravings (Duchartre, pp. 197–203) and continued into the satirical genre scenes of Jan Steen's seventeenth-century charlatan-doctor paintings, in which Dottore became an actual medical doctor. His original character, that of a jurist from Bologna, Italy, the center of legal studies, is best depicted in Honoré Daumier's nineteenth-century caricatures. Other artists also loved to depict the foolish affectations and academic excesses of this pedantic, hypocritical tyrant, who spoke above the head of his companions even as they jeered openly or behind his back.

Pietro Longhi's painting Pantalone, Dottore and Arlecchino (circa 1750) not only captured these excesses but also included another character who was to enjoy wide fame in nineteenth- and twentieth-century art: Arlecchino, better known as Harlequin. Physically, Harlequin is best visualized as being made of rubber. He knew how to dance, jump, and pantomime. Personally, he could be either stupid, forgetful, and buffoonish, or playful, cunning, and wise. An eighteenth-century writer rightly described him as . . . a mixture of ignorance, naivete, wit, stupidity and grace. He is both a rake and an overgrown boy with occasional gleams of intelligence and his mistakes and clumsiness often have a wayward charm. His acting is patterned on the lithe, agile grace of a young cat, and he has a superficial coarseness which makes his performances all the more amusing. He plays the role of a faithful valet, always patient, credulous and greedy. He is eternally amorous, and is constantly in difficulties either on his own or on his master's account. (Duchartre, p. 127)

In short, "he is a chameleon, which takes on every colour" (Marmontel, p. 418).

The evolution of Harlequin's personality, from the Renaissance to the nineteenth century, reflects a change in the ratio between his physical and mental spirit. Artists were fascinated by the various personalities reflected in his mask, which gave a strange expression of craftiness, sensuality, and astonishment that was both disturbing and alluring. The potentialities latent in the mask were innumerable, sometimes suggesting a cat, other times a satyr or an African.

The legend of the multifaceted Harlequin, the comic-melancholic clown, derives not only from his suggestive mask but also from his costume. Many sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century engravings show Harlequin in a costume of motley patches that settle into formalized lozenges or triangles by the seventeenth century, when Harlequin becomes a city man, a courtier who has moved from patchwork poverty to order and elegance. Claude Gillot's engravings The Humours of Harlequin (Duchartre, p. 35) show these lozenges, and it is the same costume Paul Cézanne and Pablo Picasso will put on their Harlequins (Nicoll, Harlequin, p. 5; Arnason, p. 337). The origin of the multipatches and colors is connected to Harlequin's multifaceted personality (Nicoll, Harlequin, pp. 6, 25, 68). As one writer noted, he is a messenger between heaven and earth, or between civilization and the savage world . . . he has special status as a being both superior and inferior to normal humans, closer both to divinity and animality than ordinary mortals; his confusion of role and self, stage and life; his ties with idiocy and with mysticism . . . (Nicoll, Harlequin, p. 70)

It is no wonder that so many artists could see so much in Harlequin's character with which to identify.

Much Harlequin iconography resides in the peculiar quality of this figure, who is always searching for his "true" self, unable to separate art from reality, artifice from man. The various depictions of Harlequin types derive from his diverse origins, which can be traced to Dionysian ritual, classical African slave comedy, the trickster god Mercury, and the medieval devil.

From this tradition evolved the figure of Pulcinello—foolish or shrewd, dull or witty—who would appear in art in various contexts. In Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo's Sherzi di Fantasia etchings (1750), Pulcinello, in a long beak-nosed mask, sits next to the magus in deep conversation. In this series of etchings there are even intimations of mortality (A Magus and Other Figures with Punchinello, Levey, p. 216). In one particular etching, a group of ill-assorted figures scrutinize the effigy of Punchinello on his tombstone. Death is an especially interesting phenomenon: "even for Punchinello there is death, but in death he is still an object of curiosity and wonder" (Levey, pp. 216, 217). Yet, this is but one side of Pulcinello: mellow, calm, and even philosophical in his old age. In La Vita Di Pulcinella (1750), Tiepolo shows the other side of Pulcinello, when he was young: the dancer, the clown, the circus performer walking a tightrope (Duchartre, pp. 210–213).

In the clown iconography, however, none was more famous for artifice and disguise than Pierrot, a French invention who provides much imagery for nineteenth-century artists working in France. First brought to light in Molière's play Don Juan (1665), Pierrot later became popular in the eighteenth-century artwork of Antoine Watteau. On stage, Pierrot's personality changed from Molière's simple, harmless, and not very intelligent peasant to what was once the figure of Harlequin: a funny, hungry valet, often frustrated in love. In the seventeenth century, this type of figure pleased the French public, which demanded spirit in everything. More importantly, it suited the character of the actor known as Dominique, who transformed Pierrot's personality to suit his own. This was, and is, typical of actors and painters, whose usage of the Pierrot character was often autobiographical. This also seems to have been the case with Watteau, who reinterpreted Pierrot in the eighteenth century under the name of yet another clown, Gilles, in a painting of that title (1718) in the Louvre in Paris. Was Gilles an actor on the French stage whom Watteau decided to call Gilles, or was he another clown in his own right? What was Watteau's relationship to one or both of these clowns? It appears that Pierrot enjoyed great fame and popularity at the Théâtre de la Faire, where he in fact did have a competitor, or possibly a double, named Gilles, whose name can be traced to clown in English. Gilles, in order to satisfy the demands of the public, eventually changed his uncouth, bedraggled appearance to the more attractive aspects of Pierrot, with whom he practically fused into one character.

While Pierrot played his part on the stage, Gilles grew in popularity at parades, which included farces or little comedies full of jokes, gross antics, indecency, and satire. It was during Watteau's lifetime that this light-hearted genre, always presented outdoors and free of charge, received an enormous stimulus by achieving a certain degree of literary respectability through the writings of Thomas Simon Gueulette. Gueulette wrote numerous parades, one of which he starred in himself as Gilles. Watteau's painting, Gilles, seems to be connected to Gueulette's series, L'Education de Gilles. In the painting, Gilles's unusual size can be explained by Watteau's primary task, which was to attract public attention from afar. The monumentality of the figure was a scheme of composition that Watteau took from the original founder of the theatrical painting genre, Jacques Callot, who used huge figures in his commedia dell'arte renderings. Even though Watteau knew these Callot prints, his painting assumes a wholly different meaning. Callot's figures are soulless ruffians in comparison to Watteau's shy, lonely Gilles—an image that is, as one critic has suggested, if not a self-portrait of the artist, then certainly a self-revelation (Sitwell, pp. 67–68).

Watteau's Gilles could just as easily have been called Pierrot (as is true of his other paintings of that figure), because for Watteau there was no difference between the two. In paintings, as on the stage, the Pierrot of the comedies and the Gilles of the parades are identical twins. Pierrot was also transformed by Watteau into a moving, almost tragic figure: still victimized but no longer ridiculous, still shy but no longer cowardly, and often deeply musical. Over and again, Watteau honors the Pierrot figure with these attributes, as in L'Amour du Théâtre Italien (circa 1716). In Watteau's work, the rigidly posed Pierrot always stands in front of the zigzag movements of Harlequin. Pierrot was a perfect character for Watteau: one decidedly French in origin, transformed several times, and now transformed again. Through Watteau, the characters of Gilles and Pierrot were transfigured into a dual ancestor for all tragic clowns: the heartbroken Pagliacci and the Pierrots Lunaires of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

The nineteenth-century romantics admired Watteau's Pierrot-Gilles, who represented a character, like themselves, who was too sensitive and feeling to survive a rising bourgeois society. Pierrot-Gilles was a stroller, a vagabond who sought the outdoor world of fêtes champêtres (country festivals) and hastily constructed, temporary stages in garden settings. His gardens were always Edens, but their theatricality revealed them as an artificial paradise. Pierrot-Gilles was always a gay, joyous musician and songster, but his merriment also appears contrived, artificially maintained, a hint at an underlying melancholy: almost always a symptom of the martyrdom of those who worship art in a crass society.

The romantic image of Pierrot, the suffering clown, experienced further blows from reality in great part because of the physical changes Paris underwent at this time. Street life, with its connection to comedy-farce, the circus, and carnival life in France, was being swallowed up into Georges-Eugène Haussmann's new boulevards. Comedy became more and more bourgeois and more and more pessimistic. Clown dialogues lost the liberating delight of nonsense and the bawdiness, becoming bitter verbal duets of biting satire, degrading parody, and mechanical repetition. Everywhere were images of bondage, enmity, and death.

This fin de siècle atmosphere had an influence on many French artists who were experimenting with various kinds of facial distortions. Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec, following the example of Edgar Degas, involved himself with the world of entertainment, like that in the Moulin Rouge, which represented a kind of circus transported from the street into the world of the bourgeois. Toulouse-Lautrec produced a type of theatrical painting in a mime-caricaturist style that he hoped would be accepted as popular culture for the bourgeois spectator. Relying heavily upon cosmetics, distortion, and strong, unnatural lighting, his portraits of the dancers, singers, and Parisian personae attending the Moulin Rouge became a critique of Parisian society. The effect of these frightening masks was not lost on people such as the mother of Yvette Guilbert, who was horrified by the ugliness of the portraits that Toulouse-Lautrec painted of her daughter (Yvette Guilbert, 1894).

In Belgium, James Ensor produced a body of work that is an even more concrete example of how artists used the mask to combine personal angst with fin de siècle melancholy. In Ensor's etchings and paintings, the mask takes on the form of a demon, and much of this iconography can be traced to his domineering family, who fostered in him a constricting and humiliating dependence. This biographical element is evident in Self-Portrait with Masks (1889). In his Scandalized Masks (1883), the biographical element again appears, this time as an old woman in a bespectacled mask, said to be Ensor's grandmother, who invades the space of a lonely drinker, said to be Ensor's expatriate, alcoholic father. Ensor's uses of the mask can be read both formally and metaphysically. In Scandalized

Masks, for example, the mask is used realistically in depictions of masked people. His Haunted Furniture (1885) exhibits a wider range of mask usage, and therefore a more ambiguous meaning: these are no longer the masks Ensor saw in his mother's shop in Belgium, nor are they masks covering people's faces as in Scandalized Masks. Without the actor, they take on a life of their own, nestled in curtain folds, half hidden in moldings, peeping from behind a wardrobe, and materializing in midair. Like some ancient Dorian masks, they aim to invoke fear, as can be seen in the petrified child's face in the painting. Like the medieval mask, they appear unclean, intent upon disturbing orderly thoughts (i.e., the child's), soiling innocent minds, and inflicting fear. Ensor's The Entry of Christ into Brussels (1888) is also reminiscent of medieval mystery plays such as The Coming of Anti-Christ and Doomsday, in which the masked devil had a major role. In Haunted Furniture, Ensor has gone a step further. Not only do people replace the devil, but people themselves become masks: autonomous, spectral beings. This transfiguration—the face becomes the mask—means that art no longer imitates life, but the reverse. It is a reversal that can be traced back to the commedia dell'arte tradition, in which characters did not play a role but became a role. ("He who wore the harlequin mask became a harlequin" [Nichol, Harlequin, p. 41].)

The religious event originally known as Christ's Entry into Jerusalem became, in The Entry of Christ into Brussels, a carnival. The political-religious world became, in Ensor's work, a farce, a symbol of human meanness and stupidity, an exposure of vice and vanity. In more personal terms, Jesus Christ, for whom the crowd appears to have no use, is a symbol of the artist, Ensor, whom the crowd also does not have the ability to understand. Ensor's identification with Christ is further symbolized by a white-faced, hooked-nose Pierrot, who appears in the painting no fewer than seven times: near a family group, wearing a blue hat; in the foreground, over the shoulder of a bishop; upward to the left, whispering obscenities into the ear of a white nun, who pretends to faint at the offense; and with a wry smile, at the lower left margin. In this painting, Pierrot has a double role, as both observer and schemer, that identifies him as a stand-in for the artist. Ensor, like Watteau, frequently used the figure of Pierrot as an alter ego, a lurking demon. He appears in Ensor's paintings Intrigue, Portrait of Old Woman with Masks and Self-Portrait with Masks. In Skeletons Fighting for Body of a Hanged Man (1891), Ensor's biting satire on matrimony, Pierrot is part of a greedy crowd, watching a hanging husband—a mere marionette in the hands of his wife—about to be eaten by three different women.

Ensor's deep misanthropy, which lay at the root of his preoccupation with masks, was immediately recognized when his art became known. The French decadent Jean Lorrain ascribed to his hero in Monsieur de Phocas (1901) a particular neurosis, "being . . . his insight into the corruption of his fellow men that every face appears to him as a hideous mask." A "homeopathic cure" is offered: "Don't be afraid, the only chance you have to be cured of this obsession with masks is to familiarize yourself with them and to see them day by day. . . . Their imagined ugliness will attenuate your painful awareness of the ugliness of mankind." Ensor's art is used as an example of how this exorcism works. "You will see what a man this Ensor is and what a marvelous divination he has of the invisible and of the atmosphere created by our vices . . . our vices that turn our faces into masks" (Julian, p. 244).

The broad interpretation of the mask that Ensor made is evident in The Astonishment of the Mask Wouse (1889). Here again he indulges in the game of making the viewer guess where art ends and where life begins. More than that, the work questions the very meaning of the mask itself. When someone puts on a mask, is he or she hiding that which is evil or displaying it? The Astonishment of the Mask Wouse is, first and foremost, a caricature of an ordinary person, a symbol of bourgeois stupidity. Masks lie on the ground as if having been put to rest in an attic following a carnival. The Mask Wouse, meant to be human, looks much less so than does the grinning specter in the top-right corner. The masks on the floor belie their condition as mere objects by exhibiting a certain nervous animation. They seem possessed by a subliminal life, ever ready to rise and blow their horns. Aware of this, the Mask Wouse is uneasy, even shocked, to the delight of the emerging spirits. The ultimate irony is that she, the bourgeoisie, is more grotesque—and, therefore, more of a mask—than are the quivering, grimacing trappings.

By working with three species of masks—objects, spirits, and caricatures of real people—and analyzing transitions among them, Ensor effectively explores most of the complexities and ambiguities inherent in mask iconography. Ultimately, Ensor's view was pessimistic as his masks are never far from the most foreboding of all masks: the skull, the ultimate symbol of death. The "mask of death" appears more prevalently in his Evening in Karl Johan Street (1890), in which ghoulish figures rush toward the spectator in a vacuumlike sweep. (These are the same masks that face the spectator in many antiwar posters in the twentieth century, such as John Steuart Curry's painting Parade to War [1938], in which soldiers bearing the faces of death skulls march to the cheers of the crowd in a ticker-tape parade.)

Ensor's work could not have escaped the attention of the young Pablo Picasso, whose arrival in Paris coincided with Ensor's artistic struggles. The connection between the two artists seems apparent, for in 1904 Picasso replaced suicidal artists and blind beggars in his paintings with circus entertainers and wandering acrobats. The figure that will appear over and over again in Picasso's art is Harlequin, who, like the Pierrot figure in the works of Watteau and Ensor, will be reinterpreted to fit the artist's own personal needs.

As opposed to the boisterous, playful Harlequin of the commedia dell'arte, Picasso's Harlequin is silent, still, and contemplative. The thin, rubbery quality of the harlequin's body, which in the past was used for dance and acrobatics, is now inactive, having taken on an emaciated, unmanly look. Out of its traditional place and role, Harlequin becomes a tragic figure who demands our sympathy. Like Ensor, however, Picasso was preoccupied with more than the solemnity of Harlequin. His depiction of him in The Death of the Harlequin (1905–1906) is evidence of his ultimate concern: death. The grave mood of this painting is similar to Renaissance entombments and crucifixions. As with Picasso, Ensor, and Watteau, the Harlequin type also served as an alter-ego for Englishman Aubrey Beardsley in his drawing The Death of Pierrot (1896). In all of these artists' works, the mask is no longer used to distort reality but to reveal another dimension of the human character and often the artist's own soul in the process. It is only through the use of a fictional type that he is able to show the feelings that haunted him: alienation, fraternity, jealousy, and love. The once happy-go-lucky Harlequin became, in Picasso's work, a figure of pathos, not because he is a victim, but because he is an agent of his own fate.

The persona of the clown used as a symbol of human suffering has its roots in the romantic tradition. But in Picasso's work, the clown is not just a symbol of the artist's alienation from society, it is much more personal. On one level, Harlequin symbolizes the alienation experienced by many in modern society, much like Toulouse-Lautrec's café and dance-hall personae. Harlequin, joined by Columbine, is a sad bohemian, like the bored and lonely creatures in Picasso's Family of Saltimbanques (1905). On the personal level, however, Harlequin is a picture of Picasso himself, unable to sit with the women who had caused the death by suicide of his best friend, Carlos Casagemas. In other paintings, such as Harlequin's Family (1905), The Mother's Toilet, and The Wedding of Pierrette, Harlequin, accompanied by Columbine, is a symbol of the tragic estrangement that Picasso feels from the woman with whom he shares his life. In these paintings, especially The Wedding of Pierrette, the so-called Harlequin seems to be more of a Pierrot type in the tradition of Watteau, a type that was revived at the end of the nineteenth century. His melancholia might be explained by his failures with women. It was this clown that Picasso was to identify with Charlie Chaplin. Although much in this painting is different from Picasso's self-portraits in the form of Harlequin, the ultimate meaning, symbolized here by a new set of masks, is still apparent: the melancholy ascetic's rejection of erotic love. The provocative, grotesque appearance of the masks reveals something of the moral and sexual tension that was always part of Picasso's conception.

Although the Harlequin character does not appear in Picasso's Demoiselles d'Avignon (1907), the work displays the same fear and rejection of erotic love. By shutting his eyes on the last vestige of carnival-theatrical life, as seen on Montmartre, and looking to African and Iberian societies, Picasso hoped to make a final statement on the evil of erotic love. For Picasso, these primitive masks were of much less interest as formal things than as actual spirits. As he stated, "They were magic things . . . intercesseurs, mediators; . . . I too believe that everything is unknown, that everything is an enemy! . . . I understood what the Negroes used their sculpture for" (Rubin, p. 255). Like the young Germans working in Dresden and Berlin during the first decade of the twentieth century who also used masks, Picasso shows that he is having trouble sustaining a human relationship with the women he painted in the Demoiselles. A parallel can be drawn between Picasso's Demoiselles and Ernst Kirchner's Girl Under a Japanese Umbrella (1909), both of which suggested, in effect, a violent sexual attack on the model. Kirchner's assertion over his model is different. Picasso gave an assertive, dominating power to the woman, but not so that she should dominate. The masks are so strong that, as the peoples who use them, Picasso hoped to exorcise that power out of her body. In the Demoiselles, Picasso deals not with one personal sexual relationship, but with the more universal problem of woman as a cursed sexual temptation. The viewer is thus faced with five women, or five masks. This was not an original theme, but it was Picasso's intention to make the final statement about it. The faces he painted are distorted, inhuman masks that are supposed to provoke a fear of the evil spirit within the woman's body. He understood the mask to be a "weapon . . . to help people avoid coming under the influence of the spirits again." Recalling a day in the Trocadero Museum when he first saw such masks, Picasso admitted that the idea of masks in the Demoiselles came to him not because of the forms he saw there in the museum, but "because it was my first exorcism painting" (Rubin, p. 55).

The mask has remained a perplexing element in the history of art. Strongly rooted in a theatrical tradition, it has fascinated artists throughout the ages because of its ambiguous possibilities: those who paint the mask, just as those who "play" the mask, are in fact a part of that "disguise." Like painting, the mask will always remain a fascinating subject, because both forms only provide questions, never answers.

See also Automata; Caricature/Cartoon; Comic; Evil Eye

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Mask of an Old Woman, clay, sixth century B.C.

Maison, The Megarian Cook, terra-cotta, Berlin, Germany, Berlin Museum

Medieval

Swallowing Human Figure, bronze closing ring, Adel, West Yorkshire, Church of St. John the Baptist

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Steen, Jan, The Doctor's Visit, 1663–1665, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Museum of Art, John G. Johnson Collection
Schalcken, Godfried, Visit to the Doctor, 1669, Germany, private collection

Rosa, Salvator, La Nenzogna (Philosopher Showing a Mask to Another Person), circa 1615, Florence, Italy, Galleria Pitti

Longhi, Pietro, Pantalone, Dottore and Arlecchino, circa 1750, Venice, Italy, Museo Civico

Tiepolo, Giovanni Domenico, scenes from La Vita Di Pulcinella, 1750, M. Victor Rosenthal Collection

Tiepolo, Giovanni Domenico, A Magus and Other Figures with Punchinello, 1750, Washington, D.C., National Gallery, Rosenwald Collection

Watteau, Antoine, Gilles, 1718, Paris, Louvre

Watteau, Antoine, The Italian Comedians, 1706, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Kress Collection

Watteau, Antoine, L'Amour du Théâtre Italien, circa 1716, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

Lancet, Nicolas, A Scene at the Théâtre Italien, Strasbourg, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Nineteenth Century

- Manet, Édouard, The Old Musician, oil on canvas, 1862, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Manet, Édouard, Masked Ball at the Opera, 1873, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Ensor, James, Scandalized Masks, 1883, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique
- Ensor, James, Haunted Furniture, 1885, Ostend, Belgium, destroyed
- Ensor, James, The Entry of Christ into Brussels, 1888, London, collection of Colonel Louis Frank
- Ensor, James, Self-Portrait with Masks, 1889, Antwerp, Belgium, private collection
- Ensor, James, The Astonishment of the Mask Wouse, 1889, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum Voor Schone Kunsten
- Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri de, Yvette Guilbert, 1894, Musée d'Albri

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, The Death of the Harlequin, 1905–1906, Zervos Collection
- Picasso, Pablo, Harlequin's Family, gouache and India ink, 1905, Sam A. Lewisohn Collection
- Picasso, Pablo, Family of Saltimbanques, 1905, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, Girl Under a Japanese Umbrella, 1909, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
- Picasso, Pablo, Demoiselles d'Avignon, 1907, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Picasso, Pablo, Harlequin, oil on canvas, 1915, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Nolde, Emil, Women and Pierrot, 1917, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
- Nolde, Emil, Masks and Dablias, 1919, Siebull Foundation, Ada and Emil Nolde
- Severini, Gino, The Two Punchinellos, oil on canvas, 1922, The Hague, The Netherlands, Haase Gemeentemuseum
- Picasso, Pablo, Seated Harlequin, tempera on canvas, 1923, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum, Öffentliche Kunstsammlung
- Derain, André, Pierrot and Harlequin, 1924, private collection
- Picabia, Francis, The Eclipse, circa 1927, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique
- Hoch, Hannah, Mother, collage, 1930, private collection
- Kahlo, Frida, Girl with Death Mask I, 1938, private collection
- Kahlo, Frida, Girl with Death Mask II, 1938, present location unknown
- Siqueiros, David Alfaro, Ethnography, enamel on composition board, 1939, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Kahlo, Frida, The Mask, 1945, Mexico, Dolores Olmedo Collection

Further Reading

- Arnason, H. Harvard, History of Modern Art, New York: Abrams, 1975
- Barasch, Moishe, "The Mask in European Art: Meanings and Functions," Art of the Ape of Nature, Lucy F. Sandler and Patricia Egan, editors, New York: Abrams, 1981
- Bieber, Margerete, The History of Greek and Roman Theater, Princeton, New Jersey, and London: Princeton University Press, 1971
- Chambers, Edmund Kerchever, The Medieval Stage, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1903
- Davidson, Clifford, and Thomas H. Seiler, The Iconography of Hell, Kalamazoo, Michigan: Medieval Institute, 1992
- Ducharte, Pierre-Louis, The Italian Comedy, New York: Dover, 1961
- Elsen, Albert Edward, Purposes of Art, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1962
- Flickinger, Roy Caston, The Greek Theater and Its Drama, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1918
- Galpern, Joyce, "The Shape of Hell in Anglo-Saxon England" (Ph.D., diss., University of California, Berkeley, 1977)
- Green, Martin, and John Swan, The Triumph of Pierrot: The Commedia dell'Arte and the Modern Imagination, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993
- Hermann, Max, Forschungen, Berlin: A. Asher, 1893
- Journal of Hellenic Studies II (1881)
- Julian, Philippe, Dreamers of Decadence, New York: Praeger, 1975
- Levey, Michael, Giambattista Tiepolo, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1986
- Madden, David, Harlequin's Stick, Charlie's Cane, New York: Popular Press, 1975
- Marmontel, Jean-François, Oeuvres Completes, Paris, 1819
- Nicoll, Allaryce, The World of Harlequin, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1963
- _____, Masks, Mimes and Miracles, London: G. C. Harrap, 1931; New York: Cooper Square, 1963
- Penrose, Ronald, editor, Picasso, London: Elek, 1973
- Rosenblum, Robert, "The Demoiselles d'Avignon Revisited," Art News (April 1973)
- Rubin, William, editor, Primitivism in Twentieth Century Art, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1984
- Sitwell, Sacheverell, The Dance of the Quick and the Dead, Boston: Houghton, 1937
- Steinberg, Leo, "The Philosophical Brothel," Art News (October 1972)
- Wiles, David, The Masks of Menander: Sign and Meanings in Greek and Roman Performance, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991

MELANCHOLY

Corinne Mandel

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Melancholy:

CLASSICAL

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE TO

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH AND

TWENTIETH CENTURIES

Albrecht Dürer, Melancholia I, 1514, engraving, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Rosenwald Collection.
(Courtesy of the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.)

Old Democritus under a tree,
Sits on a stone with book on knee;
About him hang there many features,
Of Cats, Dogs and such like creatures,
Of which he makes Anatomy,
The seat of black choler to see.
Over his head appears the skie,
And Saturn Lord of Melancholy.

With these words, Robert Burton begins the explanation to the frontispiece of his The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621). The frontispiece represents a kind of visual summa of the nature of the melancholiac, exemplified by Democritus (German philosopher Philipp Melanchthon's and Burton's "fatuously happy" Greek philosopher): jealous, solitary, amatory, hypochondriacal, superstitious, and beset by mania. His attributes, or rather his panaceas, are the borage and hellebore plants. From Burton's characterization, the melancholic state hardly seems an enviable one. It entails living alone on the fringes of society and finding solace in a kind of sardonic laughter, a terrible laughter originally dedicated to the god Saturn. This state can even lead to sterility, as Sigmund Freud explained in 1917:

The distinguishing mental features of melancholia are a profoundly painful dejection, cessation of interest in the outside world, loss of the capacity to love, inhibition of all activity, and a lowering of the self-regarding feelings to a degree that finds utterance in self-reproaches and self-revilings, and culminates in a delusional expectation of punishment. (Freud, pp. 243–258)

And yet, melancholiacs have not only been celebrated in the Western tradition, but countless men and women have also made a concerted effort to attain this state. One might even say that the melancholic disposition has been in vogue among the literati since Greco-Roman times.

Perhaps the quintessential representation of melancholy, to which Burton's Democritus defers, was created in 1514 by Albrecht Dürer. This engraving, Melancholia I, shows a wreathed, winged woman with a swarthy complexion seated with her left hand on her cheek, her right hand holding a compass on a closed book, her stare directed away from her work. She is accompanied by a sleeping dog, a studious cupid, and is surrounded by numerous objects: sphere, polyhedron, hammer, nails, saw, plane, pincers, another compass, crucible, bellows or clyster, scales, hourglass, bell, magic square, keys, purse, seven-runged ladder, and grindstone. In the background, a rainbow appears over the water, a comet shoots through the sky, and a bat shows the viewer the engraving's title. Dürer's engraving contains a plethora of symbols connected with the melancholiac, although to this day historians of art have been unable to agree upon a singular meaning that these symbols might collectively convey. What is certain is that the pose of Dürer's winged woman, with her hand on her cheek, is the pose of the melancholiac. Although popularized by Dürer and emulated by numerous artists—from Giambologna to Giorgio de Chirico, Michelangelo to Auguste Rodin—the woman's pose has an ancient pedigree that can be traced as far back as representations of mourners in the funerary processions of ancient Egypt. While such circumstances are manifestly quite different from those of Dürer's winged woman—or Burton's Democritus for that matter—the pose suggests the sorrow and despair that has been attributed to the melancholiac since Greek antiquity.

According to the theory of the humors as first set out by Hippocrates in the fourth century B.C., the human body produces four fluids that affect physiognomy and personality and that are intimately related to the workings of the macrocosm. In the ideal scenario, the four fluids, or humors (blood, yellow bile, black bile, and phlegm), are in perfect accord so that the body is healthy and enjoys equilibrium. However, such a state is rarely, if ever, attained. Of the four humors, by far the most discussed, and the most potentially damaging, is the black bile secreted by the liver; too much black bile makes a person melancholic. According to Theophrastus and Aristotle, if the black bile is cold, then the person is unfaithful, slovenly, dishonest, unhappy, cowardly, and avaricious and has a propensity to indulge in alcohol. The melancholiac affected by cold black bile does not, in other words, excel in human relationships. If the black bile is hot, conversely, then the melancholiac has the enviable potential of separating mind and body, and of becoming a genius. According to Aristotle, "hot" melancholiacs are:

all those . . . eminent in philosophy or politics or poetry or the arts. . . . An example from heroic mythology is Heracles. . . . Among the heroes many others evidently suffered in the same way, and among men of recent times Empedocles, Plato, and Socrates, and numerous other well known men, and also most of the poets.

Socrates' "deity," in other words, not only infused him with wisdom but also enabled the great sage to experience revelation in a manner that later ages would analogize to the Platonic divine "mania" and to the son of God in his earthly manifestation as Jesus Christ.

Because there is said to be an intimate connection between microcosm and macrocosm, melancholy has been related to the autumn season, to the element of earth, to the mineral lead, and with regard to the times of day, to the evening (or sometimes to the night that properly belongs to the phlegmatic). The melancholiac has also been thought of as cold and dry. It is on this account that the planet Saturn, Burton's "Lord of Melancholy," is connected to the melancholiac personality. According to the Babylonian astrological tradition as filtered through such sources as Servius and the ninth-century Islamic Picatrix, the planet Saturn has exceedingly negative influences on humans, hence exacerbating the production of cold black bile in the body. Conversely, the Hellenistic astrological tradition, as adopted by such sages as Macrobius and Boccaccio, holds that Saturn can imbue man with extraordinary faculties of reason and contemplative or metaphysical powers, hence facilitating the “hot” melancholiac’s separation of mind and body.

Whether black bile was ultimately maleficent or beneficent, it was deemed necessary to offset the effects of the black bile and of the melancholiac’s cold and dry saturnine makeup. Accordingly, the diet could be pressed into service. For example, “hot” and “wet” foods like red wine and lamb could be consumed in order to counteract the “cold” condition. One could also seek herbal remedies like Burton’s borage and hellebore and wear watery plants like watercress on one’s head in the manner of Dürer’s melancholic woman, who wears lovage. Even astral magic was used, hence the Jovian talisman in Dürer’s engraving that was said to counteract the maleficent influences of Saturn. Music, above all else, functioned as an excellent antidote to the black bile affecting the melancholiac. This was understood by ancient pagans and Hebrews: in order to purge the demons from Saul, who was verging on insanity, that is to say, melancholy, David played a harp (I Samuel 16:23).

When Christianity adopted the antique theory of the humors, it traced the cause of humankind’s physiological imbalance to Adam’s indiscretion in Eden. The moment that Adam followed Eve and took his fateful bite of the fruit (Genesis 3:1–7), the harmony of humankind’s constitution was forever upset. The lungs, liver, and circulatory system ceased to function optimally, and men and women were subsequently afflicted with the effects of the malfunctions. Dürer’s engraving Adam and Eve (1504) indicates this unfortunate state by means of the sanguine rabbit, choleric cat, phlegmatic ox, and melancholic elk. Above all else, Adam became afflicted with the melancholiac’s liver ailment, although he was by no means immune to the ill-effects of the remaining humors. As Hildegard von Bingen explained:

For because Adam knew the good yet did evil by eating the fruit, melancholy welled up within him, and with it the vicissitudes of change, which would not have occurred in man, either in his sleeping or in his waking hours, without the suggestion of the Devil.

Consequently, Adam is often depicted after the fall in the stance of the melancholiac, not at all unlike Joseph at the Nativity, or the penitent Magdalen.

The kind of dejection experienced by Adam—and by Joseph or Mary Magdalen, for that matter—was readily connected to the words of St. Paul by some Christian exegetes: “For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death” (II Corinthians 7:10). Much as the melancholy of Theophrastus is of two types, so the related tristitia (sorrow) could function either positively or negatively. When functioning in a good sense, sorrow acts in a way not at all unlike music or talismans, herbs or foodstuffs. That is to say, it is a cathartic that enables the believer to reach the Godhead. It is for this reason that William of Auvergne could view sadness, and specifically melancholy, as a “useful madness.” As the scholar Noel Brann has shown, William of Auvergne recognized, with the help of Aristotle, that the melancholic personality was the best possible receptor of illumination and divine radiation. Like the Man of Sorrows, or Geertgen tot Sint Jans’s Saint John the Baptist in the Wilderness (circa 1490), melancholiacs are ironically blessed with a kind of sorrow that enables them to achieve an ecstatic union with God.

When sorrow functioned in a negative way, it was known as the “Devil’s bath” and was believed ultimately to lead to evil, as aptly demonstrated in Lucas Cranach’s many depictions of melancholy witches. For some exegetes, sorrow even led to white magic and, worse, to alchemy. This despite protestations to the contrary by the spiritual alchemists, whose very art was begun under Saturn’s sway, and whose end product was mystical union with God. According to the art historian Maurizio Calvesi, the Jovian talisman in Dürer’s Melancholia I actually promises the completion of the alchemical opus, and hence revelation. Nevertheless, the solitude and lethargy inherent in a deeply sorrowful or depressed state—a common occurrence for an alchemist—was more often than not viewed as virtually synonymous with acedia, or sloth, one of the seven deadly sins.

Perhaps not surprisingly, sloth is represented through the ages in conjunction with the antique characterization of both the melancholiac and the slow-moving planet Saturn. For an eleventh-century miniaturist whose work appears on a manuscript housed in the Vatican Library, the model of sloth is a recumbent, sleeping figure. For Hieronymus Bosch, in his Tabletop of the Seven Deadly Sins (circa 1480–1485), sloth is a seated monk, with his hand on his head and a dog at his feet. In Bosch’s Temptation of Saint Anthony Triptych (circa 1505–1510), sloth is the bird with a funnel-shaped crown, wearing a pair of ice skates, accompanied by the inscription oisuif or ouisuy (idler). For the seventeenth-century artist Jan Vermeer, sloth is a woman with disheveled clothes and her hand on her cheek, seemingly asleep at the table from too much earthly pleasure, particularly of the alcoholic and amorous kinds.

As the apathetic, lovesick maidens of Vermeer’s compatriot Jan Steen demonstrate, however, a sinful melancholiac need not be prone or adopt the typical head-on-hand pose; he or she could merely sit, staring into space, in a manner wholly consonant with the Master F. B.’s positive treatment of the theme in his mid-sixteenth-century engraving Melancholy. Such delight in iconographic representations of sloth are not unrelated to such literary depictions as those by Geoffrey Chaucer of Arcite, William Shakespeare of Ophelia or Hamlet, and Charles Baudelaire of the malady of his century.

The Master F. B.’s and Steen’s uses of similar poses, respectively in bonum (in good) and in malum (in bad), are not confined to the melancholiac who sits staring into space. Around 1590, when Nicholas Hilliard depicted Henry Percy, ninth earl of Northumberland, reclining on the grass with his head on hand, he was hardly denigrating his patron. Hilliard was celebrating the earl’s virtues by drawing on traditional depictions of the reclining planet-god Saturn and, one might add, Christ in proskynesis at Gethsemane. Joseph Wright of Derby used a similar pose for his late-eighteenth-century portrait Sir Brooke Boothby (1781). Likewise, when Gilbert Stuart represented

William Grant on skates in 1782, he was not comparing the Scottish gentleman to an idler. Far from aids to slovenliness, Grant's skates were the apparatus of the upper-class gentleman, while his folded arms actually identified him as an inspired melancholiac, in keeping with another typical pose represented on Burton's frontispiece. Similarly, the numerous nineteenth-century depictions of sitters with disheveled clothes staring into space celebrate the romantic genius, not the lazy and despondent melancholiac. By the time Édouard Manet represents Baudelaire in such an attitude (1867) accompanied by a bat—the progeny of Dürer's Melancholia I and of Francisco Goya's The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters (circa 1799)—he is complimenting the author, not condemning him.

In order to understand Dürer's Melancholia I, Hilliard's Henry Percy, Stuart's Skater, and the grander notion of the romantic genius, one must consider the fifteenth-century watershed figure of Marsilio Ficino. This Florentine humanist, who syncretized antique and medieval notions, followed the lead of William of Auvergne and raised the melancholiac to the status of a demigod. Ficino attributed the cherished melancholia artificialis (the status of artistic genius) to those born under the influence of Saturn and consequently bequeathed the positive virtues of those beset by black bile to later ages. Drawing on the duality originally provided by Theophrastus and filtered through the medieval period, Ficino differentiated “cold” and “hot” saturnine melancholiacs. He did so by deferring to astrology and to the placement of the planets in the heavens at the moment of one's birth. If Saturn were badly aspected, then the child would be beset by cold black bile and consequently live a life overshadowed by darkness and evil. If Saturn were well aspected, then the child would be given the best possible faculties: wisdom and an understanding of theology and divinity. The child, in short, would be able to separate body and soul (or mind).

Stated slightly differently by Henry Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim, the source for Dürer's Melancholia I, the bile affecting the melancholiac is either black or white, evil or good. Whereas the black bile is “so depraved and horrible a thing that its violence is said . . . to draw into it, in addition to mania, even wicked demons to lay siege to the human body,” the white bile is a glorious substance, notwithstanding its side effects: “it stirs up a kind of madness which induces in us knowledge and divination, especially if it is aided by some celestial influx, above all Saturn. . . .” In this light, it is little wonder that sixteenth-century Europe saw a veritable “melancholomania,” in which the learned, whether born under Saturn or not, wished to be affected by the unpleasant effects of black (or, for Agrippa, white) bile. Nor is it surprising that later ages would not forget the association between melancholy and genius, or melancholy and madness.

As art historian Frederick Cummings has argued, the model melancholiac for the modern age was Jean-Jacques Rousseau, the “new Democritus,” who was ultimately displaced from the society he recognized as so laden with evil. Rousseau was joined by poets like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, Charles Baudelaire, and Gustave Flaubert and artists like Odilon Redon, Edvard Munch, and Vincent van Gogh. Whereas the Ficinian artist had been an active, “hot” melancholiac, the modern equivalent, although “hot,” would be riddled with the kind of self-doubt that verges on paranoia. Dürer's productive winged genius would accordingly be transformed by the romantic into the anxious paradigm of modern humankind. During the twentieth century, the mad, melancholic pariah was given a status of cosmic proportions, whether in the person of van Gogh, whose life has been commemorated in literature and on film and whose art fetches the highest market prices, or in the person of Andy Warhol, the self-made guru of the pop artist. Indeed, had modern society rebuked the nineteenth-century glorification of the wholly mad, yet brilliant, artistic genius, Andy Warhol might not have been given a second thought. The traditional melancholic pose of head on hand can't be missed in his Self-Portrait (1966).

See also Humors; Madness

Selected Works of Art

Classical

Funerary Procession of Nefer-renpet, High Priest of Memphis, circa 1313 B.C., Memphis, Egypt

The Seer Lamos, 470–256 B.C., East Pediment, Olympia, Greece, Temple of Zeus

Athena Relief, circa 470 B.C., Athens, Greece, Acropolis

Medea and the Two Daughters of Pelias, neo-Attic copy of first century B.C. relief, Vatican, Vatican Museums

Sleeping Ariadne, copy of Hellenistic Pergamene sculpture, second century A.D., Vatican, Vatican Museums

Priam Begging the Body of Hector from Achilles, silver cup, early first century A.D., Copenhagen, Denmark, National Museum

Gemma Augustea, early first century A.D., Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Medieval

John the Evangelist, from Gospel Book at Stauronikita on Mount Athos, tenth century, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, Museum of Art (Cod. 43, fol. 13r)

Gethsemane, from Dionysius Lectionary at Mount Athos, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, Museum of Art (Cod. 587, fol. 66r)

Tournai Artist, Nativity; Annunciation to Shepherds; John the Baptist Meeting Christ; Baptism of Christ, ivory relief, tenth century, London, British Museum

Illuminator from Lower Saxony, Nativity and Ecclesia with Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, late twelfth century, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art

Cologne Artist, Nativity with Annunciation to the Shepherds, ivory relief, twelfth century, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Renaissance to Eighteenth Century

Saturn, fifteenth century, Paris, Musée Jacquemart-André

Masolino, Crucifixion, circa 1425, Vatican, Vatican Museums

Botticelli, Sandro, Adoration of the Magi, circa 1475, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Bosch, Hieronymus, Tabletop of the Seven Deadly Sins, circa 1480–1485, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Geertgen tot Sint Jans, Saint John the Baptist in the Wilderness, circa 1490, Berlin, Germany, Gemäldegalerie, Staatliche Museen

Sansovino, Andrea, Sforza Monument, sculpture, 1505–1509, Rome, Santa Maria del Popolo

Raphael, School of Athens, 1508, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura

Dürer, Albrecht, Melancholia I, engraving, 1514

Michelangelo, Lorenzo de' Medici, 1519–1534, Florence, Italy, Medici Chapel, San Lorenzo

Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Melancholy, 1532, Copenhagen, Denmark, State Museum

Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Melancholy, 1532, Colmar, France, Musée d'Unterlinden

Campagnola, Giulio, Saturn, mid-sixteenth century

Beham, Hans Sebald, Melencolia, engraving, 1539

Pencz, Georg, Melancholy, 1545, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein

Vos, Maarten van, Melancholy, second half of sixteenth century

Gerung, Matthias, Melancholia, 1558, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle

Giambologna, Allegory of Francesco I de' Medici, sculpture, circa 1560, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Master F. B., Melancholy, engraving, 1561

Hilliard, Nicholas, Henry Percy, Ninth Earl of Northumberland, circa 1590, private collection

Fetti, Domenico, Melancholy, circa 1614, Paris, Louvre

Guercino, Night, 1621, Rome, Casino Ludovisi

Terbrugghen, Hendrik, Magdalen, circa 1627, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Tomb of Pope Urban VIII, sculpture, 1628–1647, Vatican, St. Peter

Dyck, Anthony van, Thomas Killegrew and Thomas Carew, 1638, London, Royal Collection

Walker, Robert, Portrait of John Evelyn, 1648, London, National Portrait Gallery

Rembrandt van Rijn, Man with the Golden Helmet, circa 1650, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Staatliche Museen

Maes, Nicolaes, Idle Servant, 1655, London, National Gallery

Vermeer, Jan, Girl Asleep, circa 1657, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rosa, Salvator, Democritus Deep in Thought, circa 1662, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Wright, Joseph of Derby, Democritus, 1770, Derby, Derbyshire, England, Derby Art Gallery

Kauffmann, Angelica, Allegory of Composition, circa 1780, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Wright, Joseph of Derby, Sir Brooke Boothby, 1781, London, Tate Gallery

Stuart, Gilbert, The Skater (Portrait of William Grant), 1782, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Goya, Francisco de, The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters, Los Caprichos, etching, circa 1799

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Charpentier, Constance, Melancholy, 1801, Amiens, France, Musée de Picardie

Géricault, Théodore, Raft of the Medusa, 1819, Paris, Louvre

Overbeck, Johann Friedrich, Vittoria Caldoni, 1820–1821, Wuppertal, Germany, Vand der Heydt Museum

Friedrich, Caspar David, Moonrise on the Sea, 1822, Berlin, Germany, Nationalgalerie, Staatliche Museen, Preussischer Kulturbesitz

Corot, Jean-Baptist-Camille, Woman Meditating, circa 1855–1865, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art

Rodin, Auguste, The Thinker, The Gates of Hell, sculpture, 1880, Paris, Rodin Museum

Redon, Odilon, In My Dream I Saw a Mysterious Face in the Sky (Homage to Goya), 1885

Sérusier, Paul, Melancholia or Breton Eve, 1890, private collection

Gogh, Vincent van, Portrait of Doctor Gachet, June 1890, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Munch, Edvard, Melancholy, oil on canvas, 1893, Oslo, Norway, National Gallery

Chirico, Giorgio, Melancholy, 1912, private collection

Hopper, Edward, Automat, Des Moines, 1927, Des Moines, Iowa, Des Moines Art Center

Dix, Otto, Melancholy, 1930, Munich, Germany, Galerie Klink

Magritte, René, Bather Between Light and Darkness, circa 1935, private collection

Warhol, Andy, Self-Portrait, 1966, David Whitney Collection

Kraemer, Dieter, Melancholy, 1970, Hagen, Germany, Städtisches Museum

Further Reading

Brann, Noel, "Alchemy and Melancholy in Medieval and Renaissance Thought: A Query into the Mystical Basis of their Relationship," Ambix 32:3 (1985)

Burton, Richard, The Anatomy of Melancholy, London, 1621

Calvesi, Maurizio, "A noir (Melencolia I)," Storia dell'Arte 1:2 (1969)

—, "Arte e Alchimia," Art Dossier insert, 4 (July–August 1986)

Del Canton, Giuseppina, "Redon e la melancolia," Artibus et Historiae 14:7 (1986)

Chastel, André, "La Tentation de Saint Antoine ou le songe du melancolique," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 6:15 (April 1936)

Cossa, Frank, "John Evelyn as Penitent Magdalen," Rutgers Art Review (January 1980)

Couliano, Ioan, Eros and Magic in the Renaissance, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1984

Cummings, Frederick, "Boothby, Rousseau, and the Romantic Malady," Burlington Magazine CX:789 (December 1968)

Fine, Amy M., "Portraits of Berthe Morisot: Manet's Modern Images of Melancholy," Gazette des Beaux-Arts LX (July–August 1987)

Finlay, Karen, Terbrugghen: Melancholy, Toronto, Ontario: Art Gallery of Ontario, 1984

Freud, Sigmund, "Mourning and Melancholy," in The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, London: Hogarth Press, 1957

- Hauptman, William, "Manet's Portrait of Baudelaire," Art Quarterly 1:3 (1978)
- Heyd, Milly, "De Chirico: The Girl with the Hoop," Psychoanalytic Perspectives on Art 3 (1984)
- Hults, Linda C., "Baldung's Bewitched Groom Revisited: Artistic Temperament, Fantasy and the Dream of Reason," Sixteenth Century Journal 14:3 (1984)
- Klibansky, Raymond, Erwin Panofsky, and Fritz Saxl, Saturn and Melancholy: Studies in the History of Natural Philosophy, Religion and Art, New York: Basic, 1964
- Meyenburg, Bettina von, "Lukas Cranach's Melankoli," Kunstmuseets Arsskrift 69 (1991)
- Milantoni, Gabriello, "Quale Melanconia?," Artibus et Historiae 2 (1980)
- Moffitt, John F., "Observations on the Poet by Ribera," Paragone XXIX:337 (March 1978)
- _____, "Painters 'Born Under Saturn': The Psychological Explanation," Art History 11:2 (June 1988)
- _____, "Who is 'The Man in a Golden Helmet'?", Art Bulletin LXVI:3 (September 1984)
- Nordström, Folke, Goya, Saturn and Melancholy: Studies in the Art of Goya, Stockholm, Sweden: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1962
- Pearson, Andrea G., "Gilbert Stuart's The Skater, and Henry Raeburn's The Reverend Robert Walker skating on Duddington Loch: A Study of Sources," Rutgers Art Review VIII (1987)
- Reuterswärd, Patrik, "The Dog in the Humanist's Study," Konsthistorisk Tidskrift 50 (1981)
- Schiesari, Juliana, "The Gendering of Melancholia," in Refiguring Woman: Perspectives on Gender and the Italian Renaissance, edited by Marilyn Migiel and Juliana Schiesari, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1991
- Schuster, Peter-Klaus, Melencolia I: Dürer's Denkbild, Berlin: Mann, 1991
- Sohm, Philip L., "Dürer's Melencolia I: the Limits of Knowledge," Studies in the History of Art 9 (1980)
- Spector, Jack, "An Interpretation of Delacroix's Michelangelo in his Study," Psychoanalytic Perspectives on Art 1 (1985)
- Strong, Roy, "The Elizabethan Malady: Melancholy in Elizabethan and Jacobean Portraiture," Apollo 70 (1964)
- Tinkle, Theresa, "Saturn of the Several Faces: A Survey of the Medieval Mythographic Traditions," Viator: Medieval and Renaissance Studies 18 (1987)
- Wittkower, Rudolph, and Margo Wittkower, Born Under Saturn: The Character and Conduct of Artists, New York: Random House, 1963; London: Widenfeld and Nicolson, 1963
- Yates, Frances A., The Occult Philosophy in the Elizabethan Age, London: Routledge and K. Paul, 1985

METAMORPHOSIS

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives, cultures, and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Metamorphosis:

ACTAEON

APOLLO AND DAPHNE

FLORA

GALATEA AND PYGMALION

NARCISSUS

CORAL

ALCHEMY

THE TRANSFIGURATION

AFRICAN

NATIVE AMERICAN

ABSTRACTION

SYMBOLIC

The Pan Painter, Artemis Shooting Actaeon, Attic red-figure krater, side A, circa 470 B.C. James Fund and Special Contribution, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

The primary definition of metamorphosis is a change of form, shape, structure, or substance or the form resulting from such a change. Secondary meanings can be more general, referring to a marked or complete change of character, appearance, or condition. In biology, metamorphosis is defined as a change of form, structure, or function as a result of development, especially as in the maturation of animal, insect, or plant life; in medicine, a morbid change of form in tissue; and in chemistry, a change causing decomposition. Transmutation is an ascending metamorphosis, as toward a deity. In alchemy, this transmutation goes through ascending stages, both physically and philosophically and both as an endeavor to make gold and as a symbol of salvation.

According to mythologist Joseph Campbell, the most ancient account of metamorphosis is the Sumerian myth of Inanna's descent to the underworld, when she was forced to give up part of her queenly regalia, jewels, and clothing at each of the seven gates leading to the underworld, arriving there stark naked.

In classical times, although there are references to metamorphosis in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey (such as Circe's transformation of Odysseus's men into pigs), the real encyclopedia of changes is Ovid's Metamorphoses, written by Publius Ovidius Naso, who was born in Sulmone, Italy, in 43 B.C. and died in exile in A.D. 17. It details three major types of transformations: those of punishment or revenge; those occasioned by love, especially the love of a god for a mortal; and those that describe the metamorphoses of mortals into flower forms.

The metamorphoses of punishment include those of Arachne, Actaeon, and Tiresias, the most dramatic being that of Actaeon. Actaeon was a hunter who came upon the goddess of the hunt, Diana (Artemis in Greece), and her nymphs bathing. In punishment, Diana turned Actaeon into a stag that was eaten by his own hunting dogs (Ovid, Metamorphoses, book III, ll. 141–250). The punishment of Actaeon was shown as early as 460 B.C. on a red-figure Greek krater by the Pan Painter in which the hounds are devouring the fallen hunter as the standing goddess on the left aims an arrow at him. Here the action is extremely vivid, the dying Actaeon's hand raised in extremis or imploration. Diana is shown fully clothed and armed in her character of huntress goddess. The moral is quite clear: Not only do not look at nude goddesses, but especially do not cause the wrath of an immortal (either a god or a goddess). This transformation scene was popular with later artists such as Titian (whose painting of Actaeon's fate now resides in the National Gallery in London), Joachim Antonisz Wtewael, and Francesco Albani. This scene also inspired many portrayals in Greek vase painting and relief sculpture.

The second type of metamorphosis, that resulting from love, has one of its most dramatic portrayals in Ovid's story of Apollo, the god of sunlight, and Daphne. Daphne, a nymph of Diana and daughter of the river god Peneius, was pursued by Apollo. When her strength was failing, she called to her father to save her and was transformed into a laurel tree. The moment of metamorphosis is depicted in Gian Lorenzo Bernini's virtuoso sculpture (1622–1625) in the Borghese Gallery in Rome in which the static form of the Apollo Belvedere is transformed into the eagerly pursuing god and the form of Daphne shown visibly changing, her toes beginning to grow roots, bark enclosing her body, and her hair and arms turning into leaves and branches. This scene is also shown in paintings by Antonio del Pollaiuolo in the National Gallery in London and by Paolo Veronese in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania (among others). This could have been the one described by John Keats in Ode on a Grecian Urn (ll. 5–10):

What leaf-fringed legend haunts about the shape
Of deities or mortals, of both,
In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
What mad pursuit? What struggles to escape?
What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

The third type of metamorphosis detailed by Ovid is the change of mortals into flowers. These transformation scenes were summed up by Nicolas Poussin in his painting The Realm of Flora (1630–1631) in the Gemäldegalerie in Dresden, Germany, in which he shows Clytie, who became a sunflower, gazing at Apollo in the sky; the lovers Smilax and Crocus; Ajax falling on his sword to become a larkspur; Hyacinth turned into that flower; Adonis transformed into an anemone at his death by a boar; and Narcissus gazing at his image in the water. It is interesting to note that the first image of self-reflection was a male, not a female, although a mirror in later iconography became an image of female vanity.

Another type of metamorphosis in Ovid can be seen as a result of love but may equally stand for the transformation wrought by art. This is the myth of Pygmalion and Galatea, in which the sculptor Pygmalion falls in love with the statue of a perfect woman he has created, and Venus brings the statue to life in answer to the sculptor's prayers. There are many versions of this scene, including Pygmalion and Galatea (1890) by Jean-Léon Gérôme in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Pygmalion Cycle (1878) by Edward Coley Burne-Jones in the Birmingham City Art Gallery in England. Perhaps most amusing is that by Honoré Daumier in his Histoire Ancienne lithographs in Le Charivari (December 28, 1842), in which Galatea leans over from her pedestal before the astonished sculptor with the following verse appended:

Oh, triumph of the arts, what surprise,
Great sculptor, when you saw your marble come to life

And with chaste, sweet air, slowly bend down
To ask you for a pinch of snuff!

The most common form of the metamorphosis of Galatea shows her at the moment the marble statue comes to life, as in Gérôme's work in New York. In Burne-Jones's series on the Pygmalion and Galatea story, four panels depict the sculptor in deep thought; the sculptor's perfect marble creation in the statue of Galatea on the right; Galatea turning to flesh embraced by the goddess Venus, in green, who is granting the sculptor's wish that the statue be brought to life; and the clothed sculptor kneeling on the right, holding the hands of the now human Galatea, standing to the left.

The Pygmalion myth has also appeared in literature, most notably in George Bernard Shaw's play Pygmalion (1912), the story of a cockney flower seller's transformation into a lady. This can also be seen as an allegory of the power of art to transform both matter and its viewers.

Myths and legends are often used to explain natural phenomena, many of which, as in the case of coral, involve magical transformations. As Perseus returns from his triumph over the Gorgons, bearing the decapitated but still dangerous head of the Medusa, his attention is caught by the sight of the naked Andromeda bound to a rock. Swooping down to rescue her from the dragon that menaces her, he carefully places the Medusa head onto a rock. The head's mysterious power metamorphoses the seaweed surrounding it into coral. The story is told by Ovid:

. . . lest the snake-girt head
Be bruised on the hard shingle, [Perseus] made a bed
Of leaves and spread the soft weed of the sea
Above, and on it placed Medusa's head.
The fresh seaweed, with living spongy cells,
Absorbed the Gorgon's power and at its touch
Hardened, its fronds and branches stiff and strange.
The sea-nymphs tried the magic on more weed
And found to their delight it worked the same,
And sowed the changeling seeds back on the waves.
Coral still keeps that nature; in the air
It hardens what beneath the sea has grown
A swaying plant, above it, turns to stone.
(Ovid, Metamorphoses, 741-754)

Giorgio Vasari's Perseus Freeing Andromeda, painted in 1570 for the Studiolo of Francesco I de' Medici in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, Italy, depicts the metamorphosis of coral. The painting presents the main features of the narrative. As the no-longer-threatening dragon expires in the background, the hero, Perseus, with the reins of Pegasus tied to his girdle and the magic mirror at his feet, frees the naked Andromeda. She looks with trepidation at the ugly Gorgon's head at her feet as blood from it turns the seaweed into branches of coral. The sea nymphs sport with this magical metamorphosis, showing the branches of coral to each other. It was a legend that attracted other artists, including Giulio Romano and later Nicolas Poussin and Claude Lorraine. Lorraine's Coast View with Perseus and the Origin of Coral (circa 1673) in England in the Earl of Leicester Collection in Holkham Hall shows Perseus washing his hands while the sea nymphs dance near the Medusa head.

From the Middle Ages through the nineteenth century, alchemists attempted to transmute base metals into gold and silver. Many illustrations document their efforts to effect this transformation. The alchemist is depicted as a scholar, priest, or philosopher delving into the world's secrets; as a magician or sorcerer, perhaps in league with the devil; or, especially in seventeenth-century Netherlandish paintings, as a charlatan or someone who, attempting to find gold, discovers some other element. A host of illuminated alchemical manuscripts and books, such as that by Elias Ashmole, the founder of the Ashmolean Museum of Oxford University in England, reveal the secrets of the art. In addition, paintings, such as that by Giovanni Stradano in the Studiolo of Francesco I de' Medici in the Palazzo Vecchio, document the alchemists' laboratory. Pieter Bruegel the Elder and David Teniers give a satirical view of the alchemist, whereas Joseph Wright of Derby depicts an alchemist's discovery of phosphorus, and Wenzel von Brozik depicts royal attendance at an alchemist's demonstration.

A major Christian example of metamorphosis is the Transfiguration, which occurs in Matthew 17:1-6 and Mark 9:2-4. In this episode in the Gospels, Jesus Christ goes up on a mountain with his disciples "and was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light" (Matthew 17:2). Paintings of the Transfiguration usually shown the figure of Christ in the center, standing between the prophets Moses and Elijah, with the apostles Peter, James, and John shown recumbent or kneeling on the ground before them, as in Giovanni Bellini's The Transfiguration of Christ (late 1480s) in Naples, Italy. Sometimes, as in Raphael's The Transfiguration of Christ (1517), the figure of Christ between Moses and Elijah is shown centrally but raised up in the air while the recumbent disciples shade their eyes from the brilliant vision.

Another biblical example of metamorphosis can be found in I Corinthians (15:42-49), where Paul describes the change of the mortal body into an immortal soul:

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. (I Corinthians 15:42-44)

In Japanese mythology, metamorphosis usually involves animals taking human form for some purpose. The plots of these stories often revolve around marriage between humans and animals in human form, such as the story of a man who saved the life of a crane, whereupon the bird turned into a beautiful woman, whom he married.

Metamorphosis in traditional African cultures usually occurs in rites and dances during which the participants wear masks. These groups believe that the wearer of the mask is transformed into the character that the mask represents, be it an animal or a deity. For example, the masked lion dancer becomes a lion in the ceremony, and the wearer of the chiwara mask among the Bapende becomes an antelope in the fertility dance. African art is especially rich in these personifications represented by masks, from spirits of the dead to expressive delineations of animals and birds. A similar metamorphosis also occurred among Native American tribes, especially those of the northwest coast, where the shaman became the character represented by his mask.

In twentieth-century art, metamorphoses are usually not religious or mythological. Some comment whimsically on the mechanization of forms, as in Raymond Duchamp-Villon's bronze sculpture The Great Horse (1914), in which the horse has become an engine with only a hoof, reminding us of the origin of "horsepower." Umberto Boccioni's sculpture Unique Forms of Continuity in Space (1913) shows the striding figure of a man whose head has been transformed into a mechanical helmet, reminiscent of a modern train engine, and whose legs displace the air in winglike projections.

For Remedios Varo, the transformations are tongue-in-cheek and surrealistic, as in her painting Mimesis (1960), in which the woman seated in a chair is beginning to assume the characteristics of the chair itself, with upholstered face, carved clay hands, and wooden feet, or in Still Life Reviving (1963), in which fruit that had been on plates on a table are now orbiting in space around a central candle. For Varo, the context of metamorphosis seems to comment wryly on the unexpectedness of life and to mock its established categories.

See also Apotheosis/Deification; Humors; Masks/Personae; Witchcraft/Sorcery

Selected Works of Art

Actaeon

The Pan Painter, Artemis Shooting Actaeon, Attic red-figure krater, 470 B.C., Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Veronese, Paolo, Metamorphosis of Actaeon, circa 1560, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art

Titian, Death of Actaeon, oil, mid-1560s, London, National Gallery

Masson, André, Actaeon Eaten by His Dogs, 1945, Mannheim, Germany, Städtische Kunsthalle

Staley, Earl, Story of Actaeon I and II, pair of paintings, 1977, New York, Chase Manhattan Bank Collection

Apollo and Daphne

Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Apollo and Daphne, marble, 1622–1625, Rome, Borghese Gallery

Poussin, Nicolas, Apollo and Daphne, seventeenth century, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Neck, Jan van, Daphne Changed into a Laurel Tree, 1677, Montreal, Quebec, Art Gallery

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Apollo Pursuing Daphne, oil on canvas, circa 1755–1760, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Caresme, Philippe, Metamorphosis of Daphne, before 1796, Toulouse, France, Musée des Augustins

Chirico, Giorgio de, Apollo and Daphne, 1939, Milan, Romano Gazzera Collection

Dalí, Salvador, Daphne, painting in jeweled setting on petrified wood, 1966, New York, Owen Cheatham Foundation

Flora

Poussin, Nicolas, The Realm of Flora, oil, 1630–1631, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Wit, Jacob de, Apotheosis of Flora, ceiling painting, 1743–1744, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Galatea and Pygmalion

Bronzino, Agnolo, Pygmalion and Galatea, circa 1529–1530, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio

Le Moyne, François, Pygmalion and Galatea, 1729, Tours, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Daumier, Honoré, Pygmalion and Galatea, lithograph, Le Charivari, December 28, 1842

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Pygmalion Cycle, oil, 1878, Birmingham, England, City Art Gallery

Gérôme, Jean-Léon, Pygmalion and Galatea, 1890, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Delvaux, Paul, Pygmalion, oil on wood, 1939, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique

Narcissus

Dalí, Salvador, Metamorphosis of Narcissus, oil on canvas, 1938, London, Tate Gallery

Coral

Vasari, Giorgio, Perseus Freeing Andromeda, 1570, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio, Studiolo of Francesco I de' Medici

Lorraine, Claude, Coast View with Perseus and the Origin of Coral, circa 1673, Holkham Hall, England, Earl of Leicester Collection

Alchemy

Ashmole, Elias, Four Astrological Schemes for the Alchemic Operations, from Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum, 1652, London

Stradano, Giovanni, The Alchemist's Laboratory, 1570–1575, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio, Studiolo of Francesco I de' Medici

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Alchemist, drawing, sixteenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Teniers, David, The Pleasure of Fools, seventeenth century, engraving after

Teniers, David, The Chemist, His Assistants, and a Prayer, seventeenth century, engraving after Teniers, David, Chemist Blowing His Fire, seventeenth century, engraving after

Wright, Joseph, of Derby, The Alchymist, in Search of the Successful Conclusion of his Operation, as was the Custom of the Ancient Chymical Astrologers, oil on canvas, 1771, Derby, Derbyshire, Art Gallery

Brozik, Wenzel von, Rodolphe II Assisting in a Transmutation, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Fischer Collection

The Transfiguration

Duccio, The Transfiguration, oil on panel, circa 1308–1311, London, National Gallery

Bellini, Giovanni, The Transfiguration of Christ, oil, late 1480s, Naples, Italy, Capidimonte Museum

Raphael, The Transfiguration of Christ, oil, 1517, Vatican, Vatican Museums

African

Bambara Tribe, Chiwara Antelope Mask, wood, Baltimore, Maryland, Museum of Art

Balumbo Tribe, Female Ghost, wood, Washington, D.C., Museum of African Art

Native American

Tlingit Tribe, Chilkat, Octopus Mask, wood, nineteenth century, Berlin, Museum für Volkerkunde

Abstraction

Duchamp, Marcel, The Bride, oil, 1912, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Boccioni, Umberto, Unique Forms of Continuity in Space, bronze, 1913, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Duchamp-Villon, Raymond, The Great Horse, bronze, 1914, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Symbolic

Varo, Remedios, Mimesis, oil, 1960, private collection

Varo, Remedios, Still Life Reviving, oil, 1963, Spain, private collection

Further Reading

Barkan, Leonard K., The Gods Made Flesh: Metamorphosis and the Pursuit of Paganism, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1986

Campbell, Joseph, The Hero with a Thousand Faces, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1949; London: Fontana, 1949

Cohen, Kathleen, Metamorphosis of a Death Symbol, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1990

Forbes, Irving, Metamorphosis in Greek Myth, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990

Hind, Stephen, The Metamorphosis of Persephone: Ovid and the Self-Conscious Muse, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987

Jung, Carl Gustav, Man and His Symbols, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1964; London: Aldus, 1964

Kaplan, Janet, Unexpected Journeys: The Art and Life of Remedios Varo, New York: Abbeville Press, 1988

King, Catherine, "The Liturgical and Commemorative Allusions in Raphael's Transfiguration," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 45 (1982)

Klossowski de Rola, Stanislas, Alchemy: The Secret Art, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1973

_____, The Golden Game: Alchemical Engravings of the Seventeenth Century, New York: Braziller, 1988

Lenep, Jan van, Art et Alchimie, Brussels, Belgium: Éditions Meddens

Lichtenstern, Christa, Die Wirkungsgeschichte der Metamorphosenlehre Goethe: von Philipp Otto Runge bis Joseph Beuys, Weiheim, Germany: VCH, 1990

Lubell, Winifred, The Metamorphosis of Baubo: Myths of Women's Sexual Energy, Nashville, Tennessee: Vanderbilt University Press, 1994

Malraux, André, The Metamorphosis of the Gods, translated by Stuart Gilbert, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1960; London: Secker and Warburg, 1960

Martindale, Charles, editor, Ovid Renewed: Ovidian Influences on Literature and Art from the Middle Ages to the Twentieth Century, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988

Mitchell, Breon, editor, Metamorphosis and the Arts, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1979

Ovid, Metamorphoses, translated by Mary M. Innes, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1981

Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1972

Truax, Elizabeth, Metamorphosis in Shakespeare's Plays, Lewiston, New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1992

MIRROR/REFLECTION

Elaine Shefer

The following motifs and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Mirror/Reflection:

MIRROR AS AID TO THE ARTIST

MIRROR AS ILLUSION/REFLECTION

VANITY

MIRROR AS DOCUMENT
MIRRORS AS DIVINATION
RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES
NINETEENTH CENTURY
TWENTIETH CENTURY

Parmigianino, Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, 1524, painting, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum.
(Courtesy of the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, Austria, Archivphoto)

Every mirror is false because it repeats something it has not witnessed.

The mirror has a great deal in common with art. Like art, it is an artifice. When you hold a mirror up to reality, you do not see reality but instead see the illusion of reality as it is reflected on a two-dimensional surface. In this sense, a mirror is much like the two-dimensional surface of a painted canvas. And like art, the mirror is full of contradictions. Although it purports to reflect reality, it always reverses its image and cannot, at any given time, show all sides of physical existence. Despite all of its limitations, the mirror allows us to confront our physical and spiritual selves, and some might say this is the same basic, underlying principle of art.

Mirror as Aid to the Artist

Mirrors have a long history as studio props that assist artists in their work. In addition to helping the artist to define dimension, space, and perspective (Albrecht Dürer did several works illustrating this point), the mirror has allowed artists to execute self-portraits. According to Pliny the Younger, Lala of Kyzikos painted a portrait of herself with the help of a mirror; and in a French illuminated manuscript (1402) of Giovanni Boccaccio's De claris mulieribus (Concerning Famous Women), there is a miniature of the nun Marcia painting her own portrait with the aid of a mirror. One copy of this manuscript was purchased for Christine de Pisan, who noted that "Marcia created a realistic portrait of herself by looking at herself in a mirror in order that her memory survive her" (Christine de Pisan, The Book of the City of Ladies, p. 85; bk. 1.41.3).

The scientific study of the mirror and its usefulness to the artist originated in sixteenth-century Italy. Leon Battista Alberti, who believed that Narcissus was the real inventor of painting, claimed that "things taken from nature are corrected with a mirror" (Alberti, p. 83). Leonardo da Vinci exclaimed that "the mirror, above all, the mirror, should be your teacher" (Leonardo, p. 160). Leonardo recommended the mirror as a model for an art that strove to reach a total reflection:

The painter's mind should be like a mirror, which transforms itself into the color of the thing that it has as its object, and is filled with as many likenesses as there are things placed before it. Therefore, painter, knowing that you cannot be good, if you are not a versatile master in reproducing through your art all the kinds of forms that nature produces—which you will not know how to do if you do not see and represent them in your mind. (Leonard da Vinci, Treatise, p. 48, par. 71)

Leonardo believed that a successful artist should initially understand his or her sense of vision as a kind of unselective mirror held up to nature. The vision of a true artist is more complicated than mere reflection, however. Leonardo was well aware of this and worried about the artist who found himself or herself in a situation of no choice, who was only concerned with the problem of total absorption. At another point in his writings, Leonardo warned the artist:

The painter who draws merely by practice and by eye, without any reason, is like a mirror which copies everything placed in front of it, without being conscious of their existence. (Leonardo da Vinci, Notebooks, 1:18, par. 20)

Leonardo urged the artist to be selective, and in this sense he called attention to the basic difference between mirror and artist: the mirror can only reflect the world, while the artist must always invent a new one.

The painter should be solitary and consider what he sees, discussing it with himself, selecting the most excellent parts of the appearance of what he sees, acting as the mirror which transmutes itself into as many colors as exist in the things placed before it. And if he does this he will be like a second nature. (Leonardo da Vinci, Treatise, 2:49, par. 72)

Artists like Parmigianino directly explored the properties of the mirror. According to Giorgio Vasari, Parmigianino's Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1524) was painted with the help of a convex mirror "such as is used by barbers" (Hartt, p. 516). The painting, executed on a spherical or parabolic panel segment, shows how people in the sixteenth century appeared to themselves as they faced a mirror; most mirrors of this period were blown, convex, and spherical in shape. Parmigianino did not use the mirror as an aid to observation in creating his self-portrait; he didn't filter out distortions. Instead, he seems to have substituted his painting for the mirror itself, even using a specially prepared convex panel. It's possible that Parmigianino meant to prove that there is no single "correct" reality, that distortion is as natural as the normal appearance of a thing. In this sense, it is not always a simple matter to interpret mirrored reflections: reflections are not objects themselves, only partial and commonly reversed representations of objects.

Jan Vermeer's The Music Lesson (circa 1662–1665) is another example of an artist exploring the very nature of the mirror itself. In this work, a man is attendant on a woman, his pupil, who is standing at a virginal. On the wall behind her, a mirror reflects part of the room and the woman's face, which is slightly turned. The mirror reminds the painting's viewers that Vermeer, like any artist, is dealing only with partialities.

The "real" woman is visible only from the back; her face, held in a different position, is reflected in the mirror; the picture on the wall is severely cut by the frame; the words inscribed on the virginal are hard to make out . . . and are further interrupted by the figure of the woman. (Alpers, p. 188)

Vermeer's The Music Lesson is an example of both the limitations and importance of art. Like the mirror, art can only reveal partialities, yet both are powerful and constant reminders of our own existence.

Mirror as Illusion/Reflection

Conjurers and magicians have long employed mirrors as devices of illusion. With mirrors, it is possible to make objects appear to be present when they are not and to make objects appear to be absent when they are not. From the moment Alice stepped through the looking glass and into Wonderland until the moment she emerged, she found herself in a topsy-turvy world of ambiguity, nonsense, and contradictions: a place where one runs hard to stay in the same place, where one cries out in pain and bleeds before pricking a finger, and where one remembers best the things that happen the week after next.

As artists, writers, and theologians have made clear throughout the ages, the effects of the mirror can be either positive or negative. Negative stories abound from ancient history. Seneca, in describing the luxurious period of the Roman Empire, tells the tale of a rich man who surrounded himself with full-length mirrors that were carved of gold and silver and adorned with jewels:

He had mirrors made of the type in which a finger exceeded the size and thickness of an arm. . . . I will surround myself with mirrors, the type of which renders the size of objects incredible. If it were possible, I would make those sizes real; because it is not possible, I will feast myself on the illusion. Let my lust see more than it consumes and marvel at what it undergoes. (Strem, Seneca, p. 117)

The mirror, in this sense, had the inherent properties of deception and illusion—it could flatter, exaggerate, and distort—but could never tell the truth. The mirror, the means by which a person could see a reflection of the self, either materially or figuratively, remained mysterious, awesome, self-delusory, and full of deceit.

In the time of Plato, the mirror's reflection was considered a poor imitation of a real thing. In The Republic, Plato sought to distinguish between true forms and images, ultimate truth and illusion. His philosophy was based upon a belief in a pure idea or high truth, an ideal that exists as a human being's ultimate goal, of which all physical existences are only imperfect copies (Guthrie, p. 95). The mirror, with its property of imperfect reflection, was the device with which he chose to convey this concept. While the sun can't be seen directly by humans because it is blinding, Plato pointed out, it can be seen in the mirror, which reflects it somewhat dimly and imperfectly.

The Christian take on this same concept was the Pauline mirror, named after Paul, who in A.D. 54 addressed his disciples: "For now we see through a glass, darkly" (I Corinthians 13:12). Paul reinterpreted this Platonic concept of reality as only a poor reflection of an ideal. Humankind, in Paul's theology, may see the glory of God only as in a mirror: dimly, never directly.

As Christianity spread throughout Western Europe, it made powerful figurative use of the mirror to disseminate its teachings. Philosophers and theologians employed the mirror as a metaphor to strengthen the concept of God and ideality, purity, wisdom, morality, and self-knowledge. Positive traits of the mirror began to be emphasized. Dante, in The Divine Comedy (circa 1307–1321), wrote of an "inferior" mirror that obeyed the natural law of reflection and a "superior" mirror that received the direct illumination of God (Torti, p. 27). The "good" mirror was the speculum sine macula, the "spotless" mirror that came to symbolize the purity of the Virgin Mary. This analogy was strengthened in the thirteenth century by Jacobus de Voragine, who said the glass represented her virginity because as the sun penetrates glass without violating it, so Mary became a mother without losing her virginity. Lead symbolized her ductility, and the ashen color of the mirror signified her humility. She is called a mirror because of her representation of things, for as all things are reflected from a mirror, so in the blessed Virgin, as in the mirror of God, ought all to see their impurities and spots, and purify them and correct them: for the proud, beholding her humility see their blemishes, the avaricious see theirs in her poverty, the lovers of pleasures, theirs in her virginity. (Richardson, p. 66)

This mirror-as-metaphor theory, which prevailed in Europe for more than 1500 years, was reflected not only in religion, but also in art and morality. Historically this concept—contempt for the world of matter and belief in the liberation of the soul through mystic revelation—found its roots in the theories of the Neoplatonists, who revived Plato's theories in the fourth century A.D. Using the analogy of a chain of being, the Neoplatonists explained the process of creation as one that emanated from God and worked its way down to the lowliest creatures on earth. Figuratively speaking, God's image was reflected sequentially in a chain of mirrors: the first mirror was that of the creation of the human mind, the second the human soul, and each subsequent reflection created life from its highest to lowest forms according to the degeneration of God's reflection. This analogy, because it conformed to Christian doctrine, was further disseminated through the writings of St. Augustine, whose theoretical mirror analogies took the form of a mirror of the soul and a mirror of the mind. The mirror of the soul held, according to St. Augustine, the image of the ideal or archetypal idea. The mirror of the mind, on the other hand, was ambivalent: it reflected the shadow world of the senses and led to additional mirrors that warned of the transience and illusiveness of this world.

The dualism of the mirror was reinforced in the thirteenth-century theories of St. Bonaventura, who spoke of the mirror of divinity, the mirror of creation, and the mirror of God, which were in opposition to the mirror of earthliness, which held material things that possessed no rational soul (Mâle, pp. 23–27). By the end of the thirteenth century, a paradox had developed in the figurative use of the mirror. The material nature of the mirror (as a window into human frailties) contradicted what came to be seen as its spiritual essence, or ideal reality (the mirror looked at with the soul). A mirror's reflection seemed to have a dual personality: the act of looking into the mirror and the physical object itself had gathered opposing symbolic associations.

This was a very different mirror than was found in the Renaissance, when the artist was no longer anonymous. During the Renaissance, the perfect male form was considered the mirror of the soul, a philosophy popular in Neoplatonist circles, especially in the ideas of Marsilio Ficino, who had translated Plato's writings. Neoplatonism sought to reconcile and combine the philosophy of the ancient Greeks (who also had considered the perfect male nude as the ideal physical form) with the beliefs of the Christian Church. Neoplatonists put great emphasis on the subjective expression of the artist. Such personal expressions found their way into homoerotic male nude artworks such as Donatello's David (circa 1430) in the Museo Nazionale in Florence, Italy; Leonardo da Vinci's St. John the Baptist (circa 1509–1516) in the Louvre in Paris; Michelangelo's Victory (circa 1530–1533) in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence; Jacopo da Pontormo's Vertumnus and Pomona (1520–1521) on the left side of the Poggio a Caiano lunette in the Villa Medici; Agnolo Bronzino's Venus, Cupid, Folly and Time (circa 1542–1545) in the National Gallery in London; and Caravaggio's Amore Vincitore (1598–1589) in the Staatliche Museum in Berlin.

While figurative use of the mirror in worship of the Virgin was widespread during the twelfth century, it was not the only form the mirror took during the medieval period. Concepts of gender roles remained substantially unchanged, but virginity was now able to be exchanged for "truthfulness." This exchange is apparent in Dante's description of Rachel and Leah in his Il purgatorio (XXVII) from The Divine Comedy, in which Leah, symbol of the active life, looks into the mirror while adorning herself with flowers, while Rachel, representing the contemplative life and recognizing truth, faces the mirror continuously. It was this theme that Dante Gabriel Rossetti depicted in the watercolor Vision of Rachel and Leah (1855) in the Tate Gallery in London. In Rossetti's rendering, a fountain of water acts as the mirror into which Leah, working with tendrils of honeysuckle, gazes, while Rachel, dressed in purple, a color Rossetti associated with inactivity and death, stares continuously into the water. Dante's verses read:

That I am Leah: for my brow to weave
A garland for these fair hands unwearied ply.
To please me at the crustal mirror, here
I deck me. But my sister Rachel, she Before her glass abides the livelong day.
Her radiant eyes beholding, charm'd no less,
Than I with this delightful task. Her joy
In contemplation, as in labour mine.
(Il purgatorio, Canto XXVII, lines 97–109)

During the fifteenth century, in addition to virginity and truth, the mirror became linked to prudence and wisdom. In the Tarocchi engravings (circa 1465) there are two faces: the face of a bearded man looking back, symbolizing retrospection and experience, and the face of a young woman looking into a mirror, symbolizing self-knowledge. In Lucca Della Robbia's Prudentia, a woman holds a mirror in her right hand, while her left hand grasps a serpent, a symbol of wildness. These same motifs appear in Hans Baldung Grien's Prudence (1529) in Munich, Germany, as well as in a small Prudentia engraving in the British Museum in London done by the Italian engraver Giovanni Battista Palumba known as Master I. B. with the Bird. The Latin inscription on this print reads: "I weigh the present and link the future with the past." The same motifs appear in Piero Pollaiuolo's Prudentia (1470), in which a woman holds a mirror in one hand and a serpent in her other. In the Tarocchi engravings, as well as in the Prudence reliefs on the tombs of Pope Sixtus IV and Pope Innocent VIII in St. Peter's in Rome, the serpent takes the form of a little dragon.

Prudentia's most common symbols, the mirror, the bird, and the serpent (sometimes in the form of a dragon), survived until the late nineteenth century. These symbols were known from the Apocrypha and the Bible: "For she [Wisdom] is . . . the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of His goodness" (Wisdom 7:26), and "Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matthew 10:16).

Given this established iconography, it is no wonder that many penitents were portrayed with mirrors in their hands. Famous examples include Mary Magdalen in paintings such as Georges de la Tour's La Madeleine au Miroir (before 1652) in the André Fabius Collection and Charles Le Brun's Sainte Madeleine (before 1690) in the Louvre. The mirror of redemption and purification was not the only one portrayed in the hands of women, however.

Vanity

When early humans viewed their reflections, they identified the duplicate as their spiritual double, or soul. The soul was a sign of immortality, but it was also a reminder of an impending bodily death (the soul leaving the body). The folklore, superstition, and custom that grew out of this idea greatly influenced the iconography of the mirror in literature and art.

Some tales told of covering mirrors or turning them to the wall after a death in the family. There was a belief that a living person's soul, in the form of a reflection in a mirror, could be carried off by the ghost of the deceased, who was said to hover around the house until burial. Some believed that persons who are ill should have their mirrors covered. In times of illness, when the soul is especially apt to take flight, there was thought to be a particular danger of its being ejected from the body by reflection. Other superstitions warned of looking into a mirror in other people's homes. The consequence of breaking a mirror was said to be a broken soul, or seven years bad luck. Such a superstition may have derived from ancient times, when mirrors were so expensive that it often took seven years for an ordinary person to buy another.

The Greek myth of overgazing encapsulated many of these superstitions—individuals were advised that such an indulgence could cause death. In particular, the myth of Narcissus has become the primary source for the theme of vanitas (vanity) in art. Narcissus, a beautiful Greek youth, was said to have perceived his image as a real person, with whom he eventually fell in love. He was devastated when he finally recognized the image as his own, yet he couldn't escape from the love it had aroused. He died and changed into a flower. The death of Narcissus, it might be said, was caused by the frustration of an inordinate love for one's own mirror image. His death might also have been a punishment for an activity more typically associated with women: mirror gazing. Hundreds of Greek caryatid mirrors from 600–430 B.C. have been studied and classified, and almost all of them have female figures for a handle—almost no male Greek supports are known (Congdon, plates 1–97).

Works of art from the sixteenth century through the first decade of the twentieth century—especially those in which women are portrayed gazing into mirrors—represented women almost exclusively as the object of the male spectator's pleasure. The Virgin was replaced by Venus. Nowhere can this be seen better than in the paintings of Tintoretto and Titian, works that ultimately became known under the general name of Venus at Her Toilette.

In Tintoretto's Susannah and the Elders (1550), viewers of the painting are asked to join a group of elders as they spy on Susannah taking her bath. In another version of the same subject, in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria, the artist added a mirror, thus invoking the ancient Etruscan and Greek associations between the mirror and Venus. By looking at herself in a mirror, Susannah joins the spectators in admiration of her own beauty. This painting was not unlike those of Titian, who depicted similar women under the guise of a mythological context. These "toilette" paintings, with their images of self-preoccupation, moralized about the vanity of women. The hypocrisy of this symbolism, however, has been widely acknowledged only recently. A male artist likely painted a naked woman because he enjoyed looking at her. Yet, when he placed a mirror in her hand and called the painting Vanity, he would morally condemn the woman for regarding the very form he had depicted for his own pleasure.

In another sense, mirrors in these paintings helped to uphold the status quo, as they assured viewers that women conceived of themselves, first and foremost, as a "sight." (Berger, p. 51). Although this type of painting was very popular in the eighteenth century, during which time the subjects were often mistresses of French kings, they had been condemned in the sixteenth century for signifying two of the deadly sins: superbia (pride), and luxuria (lust). An example is Pieter Bruegel the Elder's engraving Superbia (before 1569) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, which portrays an elaborately dressed woman looking conceitedly into a mirror while accompanied by a peacock, an emblem of the deadly sin of pride. Hieronymus Bosch's Superbia (before 1516) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, makes an even stronger implication: the mirror that reflects the face of the woman is held by a devilish creature, who mockingly wears the same headdress as she.

The mirror as a symbol of vanity did extend beyond portrayals of women, particularly in some fifteenth-century Flemish paintings. In a figurative sense, the convex glass used by Petrus Christus in his St. Eligius and the Lovers (1440) gave the artist an opportunity to exhibit his scientific virtuosity: the mirror simulates, on a small curved surface, a greater space than that in which the couple actually sit. Beyond a mere painterly exercise, the mirror exists here as a metaphysical statement. It reflects the couple in the outside world, alludes to the bride's virginity (she appears to be holding a bird, a classic symbol of virginity), and alludes to the evanescent image of the "world." Furthermore, because it reflects the transitory and delusive treasures that surround the husband, who is a goldsmith, the mirror may be a symbol of vanity. A similar iconography appears in Quentin Massys's painting The Money Changer and His Wife (1514). Here Massys clearly contrasts the earthly activities of the money changer with the spiritual activities of his wife, who is preoccupied with the Virgin Mary and Christ Child, who appear in miniature on her open Livre d'Heures (Book of Hours). The wife also appears in a mirror as an older woman who turns her face away from a church, painted behind a closed window.

The ambiguity of the mirror's connotations remained a compelling attraction for artists. In Laux Furtenagel's double portrait Hans Burgkmair and His Wife (1527), the mirror represents not only veritas (truth) and vanitas, but also prudentia (prudence). Instead of reflecting the couple's faces, it reflects two skulls. The inscription reads "This is what we looked like—in the mirror, however, nothing appeared but that." The mirror's frame reads "Know thyself," a mantra of self-knowledge, which, together with retrospection and foresight, are the connotations of the mirror when in the hands of Prudence. It is not surprising that, to this day, Furtenagel's double portrait has survived most popularly as a picture puzzle.

Mirror imagery in the artwork of nineteenth-century England and France has proven equally as puzzling. Although mirror imagery continued to be gender-related in both England and France, the significance of the mirror differed in the two countries. French associations with the mirror were more often those of vanity, whereas English paintings, in their more religious-moralistic leanings, were more concerned with the mirror as a document.

French associations with the mirror may in part be explained by the role the mirror had played prior to the nineteenth century. Although mirrors were still imported from Venice, Italy, in the seventeenth century, Venetian workers brought their secrets to France, where Jean-Baptiste Colbert started a mirror-making establishment in Paris in 1665. In keeping with the luxurious tastes of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, the huge mirror galleries of the palace at Versailles, for example, made walls seem to dissolve. The mirror was a reflection, both materially and figuratively, of the wealth and passions of this period. These eighteenth-century mirrors call to mind Seneca's tale of the Roman who exclaimed, "I will feast myself on the illusion."

Although the general French joie de vivre was periodically interrupted by events such as the Franco-Prussian War and the Commune, such realities had little bearing on nineteenth-century art. Artists continued to produce paintings of how they thought the middle-class wished to see itself. Édouard Manet's paintings are both an example and a critique of this phenomenon. A case in point in Nana (1876), from Émile Zola's novel of the same name. Nana stands in Manet's painting before the perennial mirror while a gentleman caller, barely perceptible at the periphery of the painting, waits for her. However, the image of Nana, based on Titian's Venus at Her Toilette, is called into question here. Nana does not stare into the mirror but looks confidently out at the audience. Standing in her undergarments, in a recognizable Parisian ambiance, she makes no pretense to disguise who she is or, as the waiting gentleman signifies, what she does for a living. As an object of beauty, a sight to be enjoyed, she is identified by her profession: the selling of services. Her services begin and end with her exterior, her appearance. In this way Manet reminds us of the dangers of the vanity theme, not only as it connects to a historical significance, but also as it relates to a middle-class audience: while they might enjoy this painting, they are at the same time held responsible for its subject. As vanity, it does not criticize Zola's lower-class heroine, who has become such a popular type in middle-class Parisian life, but the middle-class itself, which allowed this lower-class girl to become the courtesan of the Second Empire.

In keeping with Manet's propensity to base his paintings on well-known masterpieces—such as his Déjeuner sur l'herbe (1863) and the Olympia (1863)—Nana could be linked to vanity paintings of the past such as Jan van Eyck's Woman at Her Toilette (fifteenth century) in the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Like Manet's Nana, the sight of the woman in van Eyck's painting seems to be present expressly for the enjoyment of the male. In Nana the man sits to the extreme left of the painting, while in Woman at Her Toilette his presence is symbolized by his shoes, which are also positioned to the left of the painting, within view of the spectator.

Consistent with this reading would be Manet's Bar at the Folies-Bergère (1881–1882), which again brings together a young girl—probably from the lower class, according to her profession—and a mirror, which occupies the entire background of the painting. This unusually large mirror reflects a world of sociability and diversion in which the girl does not partake. The role she does play is oddly reflected in part of the mirror to her left. A gentleman can be seen talking or flirting with her, a reflection of what one might expect to see facing a woman of her occupation (service). While it is apparent that her job is to assist in providing a “good time” for the middle class, it is also apparent, as reflected in the mirror, that she also has to be ready to satisfy the peculiar whims of her male clients. Interestingly, the reflection of the woman and the gentleman in the mirror has nothing to do with the young girl herself, who is rigidly and symmetrically posed in the center of the painting, gazing at the spectator with extreme ennui. Manet seems to destroy the expected formula of Venus—the woman looking into a mirror as the sexual object of man's enjoyment—by having her turn her back to the mirror. Is that reflection, for Manet, a critique of the historical male-spectator/female-subject in Western art? Is it a criticism of the way we expect this woman to function, both in relation to her profession and to the mirror? Or is Manet, by including the mirror and what we see in it, still treating women as a “sight”? The artist, like the mirror itself, is ambivalent. He seems to be reinforcing Plato's contention that the mirror is, after all, an inferior copy, a poor reflection of reality.

Manet, in this sense, appropriates the function of the mirror. The mirror does not merely absorb reality, but reflects it. The image in the mirror in Manet's painting is not a reflection of the couple in front of our eyes (that is, before the mirror) but a reflection of the artist's image of that couple.

Edgar Degas made ample use of the mirror in his portrayals of women and dancers, both of whom have a strong relationship to the mirror. In the world of ballet, the mirror poses two dangers. A dancer who looks into it for too long may begin to dance for the mirror rather than the audience. Or a dancer may become too critical of him or herself. In either case, narcissism might destroy the dance. Yet, for the dancer, as for the painter, the mirror is an aid. It is the only “real-time” reflection a dancer has to improve his or her technical line.

Although narcissism is as inherent in women's imagery as it is in ballet, Degas does not emphasize the point. Mirrors are present in his paintings primarily because they're typically present in ballet classrooms, a favorite subject of his. One such example is Ballet Class (1878–1890), in which three dancers are absorbed in working out their poses. Not only have they positioned themselves against the mirror, to which they have turned their backs, they don't even look at the ballet master, who is opposite them. In Degas's two versions of Monsieur Perrot's Dance Class (1875–1876), the mirror, seen behind the dancers again, reflects the Parisian landscape outside. Even when there is no mirror present, as in The Rehearsal (1879), it is still apparent that the dancers Degas portrayed are looking into one. In this painting, three dancers, plus the leg of a fourth, are working out an adagio, their legs held in the difficult à la seconde position in the air. The emphasis here is on hard work, unified performance, and musicality, symbolized by the violinist in the foreground and the repetitive rhythms of the three windows behind them. Although these girls were subjected to the attention of the abonnées, the gentlemen who had yearly subscriptions to the ballet, and although ballet is a spectacle to be “looked at” just as women have been “looked at” in Western art, Degas downplays the point in these classroom scenes. In these paintings, the mirror functions as a witness, and one senses Degas's sympathy and fascination with this group of hardworking, lower-class girls.

Mirror as Document

In English painting, mirror imagery functioned both as documentary and prophecy. In the former sense, the English were inspired by paintings such as Jan van Eyck's Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami) (1434). Van Eyck's portrait is well known for its careful portrayal of the interior, nuptial chamber of a Flemish home, in which every detail can be read as having symbolic implications: the chandelier as symbol of the Virgin; its one burning candle, the “marriage candle,” as a symbol of the presence of the deity and the all-seeing wisdom of God; the little carved sculpture of St. Margaret triumphing over the dragon that crowns one post of the armchair as the image of the patron saint of women in expectation of a child; the dog at the feet of the couple as a symbol of fidelity; and the unusual inscription on the wall, Johannes de Eyck fuit hic (Johannes de Eyck was here), as not just an ordinary signature, but the testimonial of a witness to a marriage (Baldass, p. 75).

The painting includes a convex mirror in which a miniaturized reversal of the couple and the room is painted. This painting-within-a-painting is enclosed by a notched frame that bears small circular scenes of a gospel narrative, a simulation of painting on tiny glass discs. In this portrait of the Arnolfinis, the mirror's function is to provide information. “The miniaturized chandelier and looking glass . . . can . . . be seen as full scale features of a scribal practice—the notarial sign and the seal, marks regularly employed by notaries and witnesses to authenticate their works" (Seidel, p. 130). The mirror here does not function as some hidden symbol, but as an overt sign, based on a manipulation of familiar signs that van Eyck's viewers would have understood. In this traditional form of marriage documentation, the mirror functions as an authenticating mark: "the sign, the signature, and the mirror as seal all participate in this material discourse" (Seidel, p. 143). In addition to the mirror's function as surrogate seal, viewers were likely fascinated by the ambiguities of vision that this familiar item provided. (Mirrors were so popular in the fifteenth century that they were enumerated as part of the household furnishings that were included in the dowry.)

The mirror in the Arnolfini portrait was not without its religious quality, however. Seidel notes that documents contemporary with the painting show that mirrors were given to pilgrims journeying to religious shrines, used to capture in the glass reflections of "venerated relics or reliquaries." As "signs" of holiness, these mirrors would then be presented to local churches where their "remembered reflections would bestow testimonial power on a new location." The mirror in the Arnolfini panel brings to the painting a sense of this "remembered sight." This meaning is extended to the roundels.

The tiny roundels with scenes of Christ's Passion that ornament the mirror's frame further secure an association of the depicted object with sacred souvenirs. Painted medallions of a similar kind, in which images are applied to the undersurfaces of discs, enjoyed a revival in late fifteenth-century Italy for the ornamentation of reliquaries.

Seidel concludes that the glass discs thus extend the association of sacred relics of a particular Italian or Mediterranean kind with Jan's looking glass. And such marking of the mirror as sacred container reinforces its evidentiary status as personal emblem; both relic and seal as tokens of testimony confer the authority of a deep past on what appears in the painting to be present time. (Seidel, p. 144)

Van Eyck again illustrates how the artist, in fact, becomes the mirror.

Jan, very probably through the handling of such an instrument [the mirror] in his studio, has constructed what we see; the spatial effects of the chamber may have been first visualized by Jan with the aid of such a glass. But without Jan's consummate draftsmanship, this painted mirror would not have such potency. Jan flaunts the fact that the power of this glass is of his making by placing his name immediately above it, proclaiming thereby that he is the creator and manipulator of the object, not merely, if indeed at all, the object of its reflections. (Seidel, p. 145)

The complex iconography of van Eyck's mirror—a picture within a picture—took on as much importance for the artist as did the painting up front. By painting the mirror as he did, van Eyck the painter and mirror maker crossed the line from maker of mere illusion to maker of reality itself. In the Arnolfini portrait, the mirror is not just an aid or an item manufactured by a guild (in fifteenth-century Bruges, Belgium, painters and artisans belonged to the same Guild of St. Luke), it is something much more. In the hands of van Eyck, the mirror is transformed.

The mirror presents the viewer with an assertive appropriation by a painter of a fellow worker's production; the transformation of the mirror's frame and the juxtaposition of Jan's signature with the looking glass subsumes that craft production and subordinates it into the painter's art. Whereas the mirror as seal provides authentication for the signature, from this perspective, it is the signature that validates the mirror. By means of his expert "manufacture" of the reflecting glass, Jan comments on and ennobles his own art. (Seidel, p. 147)

The discs around the mirror again affirm that what we see in the mirror is more important than "reality." In other words, van Eyck has reversed the mirror-reflection roles. As Seidel states:

The miniatures that appear in the roundels share other properties with the mirror and these further intensify the latter's claims to special powers in the painting. Like the mirror's own reflection, the discs purport to reverse the images painted on their undersurfaces in a display of artistic virtuosity. Acknowledgment of the discs' creative origin in a technique of reverse image making links the roundels to seals, which similarly reverse the image of the matrix in the wax of the impression. Thus, as viewers, we are challenged to realize that what we are shown in the frame as well as in the mirror is the reverse of something that we cannot otherwise see either fully or directly. The miniature discs, by mimicking the larger glass, emphasize the "problematic" nature of such production. By showing us more in reflection than we can see in reality, the mirror constructs itself as the more authentic image. (Seidel, p. 144)

An English work greatly indebted to the Arnolfini portrait is Ford Madox Brown's Take Your Son, Sir (1857). Here a young woman holds a baby who is surrounded by a circular piece of drapery, the formation of which strongly resembles a uterus and even an umbilical cord. Behind the woman's head is a convex mirror, similar to the one used in the Arnolfini portrait and serving a similar function: to legitimize or sanctify the nuptial chamber of the woman and man reflected in the mirror. It appears that the woman is Emma Hill, who became Brown's second wife, which would make the baby their son, Arthur, born on September 16, 1856. The man in the mirror, with his side-whiskers and his hair parted in the middle, looks like Brown, who provides the connecting link between the name of the painting and the actual subject (as well as a link to the van Eyck portrait, in which the artist also appears in the mirror).

Hill became pregnant at the age of 15, which was the artist's compelling reason to marry her. Given their history, it is not surprising that Brown has employed the mirror as the speculum sine macula to equate Emma's condition with that of the Virgin Mary. Brown, as is apparent in the mirror, is the cause of this illegitimate birth; the purity of Emma, however, rather than her downfall, is emphasized by having the mirror raised so high that it becomes a halo for her head. The "eyes" of this mirror (the reflection we see in the mirror), explain the condition of the woman standing before it.

Mirror as Divination

Personal histories were not the only reason for the mirror's role as a sort of guardian of women's virginity. In a society, such as Victorian England, that defined itself in terms of gender differentiation, the mirror played a significant role in signifying woman's place within that scheme, often by looking into the future.

The use of mirrors in divination has an ancient history. The Greeks painted totemic animals on mirrors, and the Etruscans painted entrails. The engraved back of a bronze mirror in the Vatican Museum in Rome (circa 400 B.C.) illustrates an example of the latter. A winged old man, Chalcas, examines a strange object, apparently looking at the liver of a sacrificial animal. He represents a practice that loomed large in the lives of the Etruscans, the search for omens or portents. Divination—the Etruscan belief that the will of the gods manifested itself through signs in the natural world—can be traced back to ancient Mesopotamia as well as Greece, but the practice was most developed in Etruria, located in what is now central Italy. The secrets of this language of signs, especially as they believed to manifest themselves in the liver of sacrificial animals, were not known to all. It was a privilege enjoyed by the priests alone, who wielded enormous power and enjoyed great prestige. These scryers, or diviners, saw images of distant or future events.

On the positive side, divination had a practical function, allowing for the comforts of prediction and revelation. It also allowed people to live out their illusions. Merlin, magician to the court of King Arthur, was said to have once produced a mirror that would show, to those permitted to look into it, anything that pertained to them. Arthur's daughter, Britomart, supposedly saw in it her lover, Sir Artegall. On the down side, however, very few people could have such divining mirrors of their own, and so the power of the specularii, or diviners, was restricted to a select group of men on whom the future of the world was believed to depend. These men, associated in ancient times with the gods, were all-powerful. In the medieval period, a battle raged between these "crystal readers" and the Roman Catholic Church. Considered disciples of the devil who saw and heard demons when they looked into the mirror, they were in conflict with established religious doctrine and posed a threat to the authority of the established order. Eventually they were associated with witchcraft.

In art, the Pre-Raphaelites, fascinated as they were with the Medieval period in general and the tale of King Arthur in particular, painted the heroines of this tale in highly suggestive ways. The special magical or witchlike qualities of these heroines can be seen in paintings such as William Morris's Queen Guenevere (1857) and Edward Coley Burne-Jones's The Beguiling of Merlin (1873–1877).

In nineteenth-century England the depiction of the mirror as divination appears several times in the work of William Holman Hunt. In both his drawing Lady of Shalott (1850) and his later painting of the same theme (1889), Hunt goes to great lengths to show what happens to a woman when she leaves her preordained role, that of the mirror-gazer. In Hunt's representations, the mirror is cracked. The reflected image of Sir Lancelot, the agent of the woman's fall, is seen in the mirror, and the woman is entangled in the threads of the material she had been weaving. Hunt has the woman looking neither into the mirror nor out the window. Instead, he depicts the aftermath, her punishment for leaving the loom and the mirror. Instead of portraying Alfred, Lord Tennyson's lines from his poem, "she left the web, she left the loom," Hunt shows the consequences of her act: "out flew the web . . . the mirror crack'd from side to side; 'the curse is upon me,' cried the Lady of Shalott." The untamed, wild way in which the threads spin around her is a metaphor for the loss of control over her life. By contrast, weaving, an activity in which every thread has its place and which involves hours of mindless repetitive work, would give the woman the illusion—not unlike looking into the mirror—that her life is in order. Here, the narcotic act of weaving has ended, its magical spell has been broken. The mirror is no longer unblemished. Its crack conjures up the ancient superstitions of seven years' bad luck and a loss of virginity. (Both of these connotations had been treated earlier in paintings such as Jean-Baptiste Greuze's The Broken Mirror, late eighteenth century). The curse has befallen the lady for having left her work and looked out the window rather than into a mirror that reflects the outside world. All of this and more are encapsulated in the eight roundels encircling the central mirror, an idea that Hunt, like Brown, took from the van Eyck Arnolfini portrait.

The same motifs—the mirror, the undone tapestry, and the shawl knotted around the lady's hips (the knot is an ancient Greek symbol of the "false" virgin, who tried to copy the knotted headdress of the bride)—all appear in Hunt's painting The Awakening Conscience (1852). Consistent in his interpretation of his Tennysonian source, Hunt is also concerned in this work with the dereliction of duty. Here Hunt plays with the mirror in order to demonstrate, formally and metaphorically, its endless possibilities. Not unlike Augustus Egg's triptych Past and Present (1858) in the Tate Gallery in London, which also centers on mirror imagery, the mirror in The Awakening Conscience reveals, in a variety of ways, the woman's adulterous past, her present desperate condition, and her bleak future.

Hunt's painting goes even further than Egg's by using more than one mirror. The mirror into mirror imagery is confusing, both visually and conceptually. In a densely cluttered room, which again includes undone tapestry and a knotted shawl, a young girl tentatively rises from her lover's lap. Behind them is a mirror that, before reflecting the outside world (marked in this instance by a sunlit landscape), first reflects the claustrophobic room, which contains at least two other mirrors. The ambiguity of all these reflections is further enhanced by the open French windows, which, in their pristine clearness, contain their own reflection of the outside landscape. This "house of mirrors," reminiscent of the Neoplatonic concept of a chain of mirrors, makes the woman's "journey" toward redemption—which Hunt wishes to convince us is his concern here—all the more difficult. Although the final window offers purity for the woman, there is a series of impure reflections she has yet to encounter, such as the reflection in the mirror behind her. Ultimately she may reach a "state of nature," her childhood innocence as represented by the sunlit landscape, but even then it will not be in a condition of purity. Like the "false" virgin, with her falsely knotted headdress, this woman, with the same knot around her hips, can only attempt to be pure again. She cannot actually redeem her lost youth.

Hunt's Lady of Shalott must have appealed to Elizabeth Siddal, who identified with the theme both as a woman and as an artist. Her drawing Lady of Shalott (1853) shows Hunt's influence, but there are striking differences. Although Siddal chose to portray the moment the mirror is broken and the weaving comes apart—some threads appear to be coming out of the loom like electrified wires—the lady is not entangled in them at all. They move in a direction away from her, and she continues to sit at her loom, her head tilted toward the outside window, as if to check what the commotion could be.

There is no hint of her downfall and ultimate death. The confusion and tumult in Hunt's rendering are replaced here by calm, order, and even quiet. Hunt's majestic medieval setting is now a simple interior. The mirror, no longer a central motif, is pushed to the side—barely discernible are its crack and the image of Sir Lancelot—and separated from the lady by the loom. Siddal appears to break the formula of woman-as-mirror-gazer because her woman looks away from the mirror toward the "real" outside world. As opposed to Hunt's rendering, in which we never see the woman look toward the outside world, only the consequences of having looked, Siddal shows us exactly that courageous moment.

Although little is known of Siddal and her work, this drawing demonstrates that she was dependent neither on Tennyson's poem nor on Hunt's work for her inspiration. A closer look at the various motifs employed in the drawing suggests that she may have been familiar with van Eyck's Arnolfini portrait. On the right leg of a chair, she has placed a strange creature resembling, perhaps, a little dragon. Likewise in the van Eyck portrait, there is a little figure of St. Margaret triumphing over a dragon on the post of an armchair. It is known that in the fifteenth century, the serpent sometimes appeared in the form of a small dragon as a symbol of cleverness and wisdom. The bird on the top of the woman's loom may be a direct reference to Siddal herself, whom Dante Gabriel Rossetti called his "dove," or it may be related to medieval iconography, in which women, mirrors, and birds do appear together (Palumba's Master I. B. With the Bird and Christus's St. Eligius and the Lovers). The Crucifixion shown in the Siddal drawing may also be a link to the Arnolfini portrait, the frame of which dealt with the life of Christ. This combination of motifs demonstrates how Siddal's drawing falls outside the expected formulas of Victorian representations of women and mirrors.

When the loom is seen as a kind of canvas, then Siddal's drawing can symbolize the personal story of her at work as an artist. Her refusal to leave this work, to become entangled in the threads of her loom, would be in keeping with her pride, her sense of self as an independent person. (This quality in her character was confirmed by her refusal to accept an allowance from the art critic and connoisseur John Ruskin for producing a set number of works of art per year.) Lady of Shalott appears to be a sort of self-portrait of the artist in her studio. The tapestry hanging on the wall behind her is not unlike paintings accompanying artists at work. This is particularly evident when this drawing is set next to a painting that appeared in Boccaccio's De claris mulieribus, to which it bears an eerie resemblance. In describing the painting that illustrates Boccaccio's work, Pliny the Younger said that it is a "strange coincidence that the first literary and pictorial documents that refer to mirror self-portraiture [also] refer to women painters."

In this earlier work, a woman looks into a mirror as she paints her face. On the leg of her chair is a strange little dragon, the symbol of cleverness. Siddal's drawing, in the final analysis, might be said to speak of her purity of heart, in spite of the mirror's crack, symbolized by Jesus Christ on the cross; of her fearlessness, symbolized in the woman's gaze out of the window; of her cleverness and commitment to her work, in spite of the tension in her life, perhaps symbolized by her nervous drawing style; and of her ambiguous position as an artist and a woman in Victorian society.

In contrast to Siddal's more personal iconography, Hunt seems to have paid lip service to Victorian society by manufacturing just the type of painting that it had come to expect: the consequences that face a woman who has disobeyed the rules. The difference in construction may perhaps be related to the art market at the time. Siddal's drawing would have had very little opportunity of being seen. Hers was a private, autobiographical "endeavor," in Rossetti's description. Hunt's painting was assured of being hung on the walls of the Royal Academy.

Although the Hunt and Siddal works are examples of the moralistic, religious tone that characterized so much of Victorian narrative paintings, the lighter side of the woman and her mirror seems to have dominated the end of the nineteenth century in England. Painters such as Edward John Poynter and Thomas Armstrong continued with the Rossetti-Charles Swineburne aesthetic of the 1860s: "fleshy," narcissistic women looking into mirrors, such as in Rossetti's Fazio's Mistress (1863) in the Tate Gallery, or in his Morning Music (1864) in the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge. Painters such as Poynter and Armstrong replaced the mirror with its sixteenth-century companion, the peacock, the emblem of the deadly sin of pride, the ultimate symbol of vanity. This is not to say, however, that mirror iconography disappeared. After Manet's Nana and Bar at the Folies-Bergère, however, it never had quite the same meaning.

Twentieth-century works such as Henri Matisse's Carmelina (1903) illustrate this shift in meaning. Here the mirror, placed behind the seated female model, functions to reveal the ubiquitous male presence; in this case Matisse as he paints his model. Joan Miró's Nude with Mirror (1919) seems to have been lifted out of the traditional iconography of nudes as an excuse to present the incongruous and even the ludicrous. The humor and fantasy Miró presents in a deadpan manner is reinforced by the way he put this nude together. Holding a mirror at arm's length, she closes her eyes so as not to confront her image, which is indeed strange. None of the parts of her body match. She wears the long braid of a peasant girl. Her body is divided into cubist faceting, flat-color areas, and geometric patterns with sculptural legs.

Given Pablo Picasso's fascination with the problems of "reality" and art—his work in the 1930s, in particular, shows a preoccupation with reexamining the nature of reality rather than being its mere mimic—it comes as no surprise that his Woman in Front of a Mirror (1937) goes against all traditional representations of woman and mirror, model and painter. By breaking conventional patterns, Picasso introduces a note of fantasy. Reality and illusion are totally reversed and the painter and the model become surrealist ciphers. The woman, rapt in contemplation of her mirror image, sees not merely a reversed reflection, but a mystery and a prophecy. In this painting, Picasso seems to have closed the symbolic cycle of mirror meanings.

What had been suggested by Joan Miró and stated by Picasso—the incongruity and lack of communication between girl and mirror—is even more seriously confronted in George Segal's Girl Putting on Scarab Necklace (1975). Segal's free-standing nude sculpture is totally modern. The female figure fails to connect with the old world, symbolized here by her scarab necklace and the elegant, outdated floor-length mirror. With her head down, she is removed from the mirror and her reflection in it. Melancholy and apartness have replaced sensuousness and vanity.

If the vanity theme became diluted by the late twentieth century, the meaning Plato had given the mirror in The Republic was not. Paintings such as René Magritte's The Treachery (or Perfidy) of Images (1928–1929) and The False Mirror (1928) show how preoccupied the surrealists were with mirrors and images. Magritte confounds pictorial reality by portraying a meticulously rendered pipe with the attached logo, Ceci n'est pas une pipe (This is not a pipe). This sense of misdirection and playfulness is embodied further in The False Mirror (1928), which reduces the entire painting to an eye: the eye as a false mirror as it views the white clouds and blue sky of nature. The False Mirror introduces the illusionistic device of the landscape that calls attention to itself as a painting, rather than as an imitation of nature. Here Magritte was concerned with an age-old problem in art: real space versus illusionistic space. Reminiscent of such German romantics as Caspar David Friedrich and Jacob Alt, Magritte takes the implications of a view through a window even further in The Promenades of Euclid (1955). He depicts a cityscape with a great avenue in abrupt perspective: the avenue becomes a triangle that reiterates the conical shape of an adjacent tower. Playing with illusion and reality, mirrors and reflections, the promenade through the window (which has now replaced the mirror) becomes Euclidean: an illusion and an illusion of semblance, the painted picture as part of a painted picture.

In the second half of the twentieth century the Platonic mirror idea continued in many guises. In works such as Richard Lindner's 119th Division (1965) and Larry Rivers' Double Portrait of Birdie (1955), two images are diametrically opposed, one next to the other on the same picture plane. In his own way, Robert Rauschenberg questions the phenomenon in his Bed (1955), as do Jasper Johns and Andy Warhol in their respective works of the 1960s.

Illusion and reality, reflection versus absolute truth, are conflicts as old as art itself, those that have as many outcomes as mirrors do reflections. The photo-realistic paintings of artists like Richard Estes, Ralph Goings, Alex Katz, and Alfred Leslie are evidence of the continued struggle: is the absolute truth attainable or is illusion interesting enough?

See also Dreams/Visions; Female Beauty and Adornment; Masks/Personae; Toilet Scenes; Upside Down; Vanity/Vanitas; Voyeurism

Selected Works of Art

Renaissance

- Marcia, Painting Her Portrait, French illuminated manuscript, 1402, De claris mulieribus, by Boccaccio, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (MS. Fr. 12420)
- Eyck, Jan van, Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), 1434, London, National Gallery
- Master of Flémalle, Left Wing of Von Werl Altarpiece, 1438, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Christus, Petrus, St. Eligius and the Lovers, 1440, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, Lehman Collection
- Pollaiuolo, Piero, Prudentia, 1470, Florence, Italy, Palazzo del Tribunal de Mercanzia, Council Hall
- Massys, Quentin, The Money Changer and His Wife, 1514, Paris, Louvre
- Bosch, Hieronymus, Superbia, before 1516, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Parmigianino, Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, 1524, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Furtenagel, Laux, Hans Burgkmair and His Wife, 1527, Vienna, Austria, Gemäldegalerie
- Grien, Hans Baldung, Prudence, 1529, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Tintoretto, Susannah and the Elders, 1550, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Superbia, engraving, before 1569, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- La Tour, Georges De, The Penitent Magdalen, circa 1638–1652, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Vermeer, Jan, The Music Lesson, circa 1662–1665, London, Buckingham Palace
- Mieris, Frans van, the Elder, Young Woman in Front of Her Mirror, before 1681, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
- Le Brun, Charles, Sainte Madeleine, before 1690, Paris, Louvre
- Vouet, Simon, Toilet of Venus, eighteenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
- Greuze, Jean-Baptiste, The Broken Mirror, late eighteenth century, London, Wallace Collection

Nineteenth Century

- Hunt, William Holman, Lady of Shalott, drawing, 1850, Melbourne, Australia, National Gallery of Victoria
- Hunt, William Holman, The Awakening Conscience, 1852, Property of the Trustees of Sir Colin and Lady Anderson
- Siddal, Elizabeth, Lady of Shallot, drawing, 1853, London, Jeremy Maas Collection
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Vision of Rachel and Leah, 1855, London, Tate Gallery
- Morris, William, Queen Guenevere, 1857, London, Tate Gallery
- Brown, Ford Madox, Take Your Son, Sir, 1857, London, Tate Gallery

- Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Beguiling of Merlin, 1873–1877, Port Sunlight, England, Lady Lever Art Gallery
- Degas, Edgar, Monsieur Perrot's Dance Class, 1875–1876, Paris, Musée d'Orsay; New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Manet, Édouard, Nana, 1876, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle
- Degas, Edgar, The Rehearsal, 1879, New York, Frick Collection
- Manet, Édouard, Bar at the Folies-Bergère, 1881–1882, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries
- Hunt, William Holman, Lady of Shalott, oil, 1889, Manchester, England, City Art Galleries

Twentieth Century

- Matisse, Henri, Carmelina, 1903, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Miró, Joan, Nude with Mirror, 1919, New York, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Matisse
- Magritte, René, The Treachery (or Perfidy) of Images, 1928–1929, private collection
- Magritte, René, The False Mirror, 1928, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Léger, Fernand, Woman with Mirror, oil on canvas, 1929, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Picasso, Pablo, Woman in Front of a Mirror, 1937, private collection
- Magritte, René, The Promenades of Euclid, 1955, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Art
- Rivers, Larry, Double Portrait of Birdie, 1955, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art
- Rauschenberg, Robert, Bed, 1955, New York, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Leo Castelli
- Johns, Jasper, Painted Bronze (Beer Cans), 1960, New York, Robert C. Scull
- Lindner, Richard, 119th Division, 1965, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Walker Art Gallery
- Warhol, Andy, Electric Chair, 1965, New York, Leo Castelli Gallery
- Goings, Ralph, Airstream, 1970, Aachen, Germany, Neve Galerie-Sammlung Ludwig
- Leslie, Alfred, Self-Portrait, 1973, New York, Allan Frunkin Gallery
- Katz, Alex, Good Morning, 1974, New York, Marlborough Gallery
- Estes, Richard, Stationery, 1976, New York, Allan Stone Gallery
- Segal, George, Girl Putting on Scarab Necklace, 1975, New York, Sidney Janis Gallery

Further Reading

- Abrams, M. H., The Mirror and the Lamp, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1953
- Alberti, Leon Battista, On Painting, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1966

- Alpers, Svetlana, The Art of Describing: Dutch Art in the Seventeenth Century, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1983
- Baldass, Ludwig, Jan Van Eyck, New York: Phaidon Press, 1983
- Berger, John, Ways of Seeing, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1977
- Blankert, Albert, Vermeer of Delft, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1978
- Congdon, Leonore O. Keene, Caryatid: Mirrors of Ancient Greece, Mainz-Am-Rhein, Germany: Verlag Philipp Von Zabern, 1981
- Goldberg, Benjamin, The Mirror of Man, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1985
- Grummond, Nancy T. de, "Reflections on the Etruscan Mirror," Archaeology (September–October 1981)
- Gunn, Alan Murray Finlay, The Mirror of Love, Lubbock: Texas Tech University Press, 1952
- Guthrie, William Keith Chambers, The Greek Philosophers, London and New York: Routledge, 1950
- Hall, Edwin, The Arnolfini Betrothal: Medieval Marriage and the Enigma of Van Eyck's Double Portrait, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1994
- Hartt, Frederick, History of Italian Renaissance Art, New York: Abrams, 1969; London: Thames and Hudson, 1970
- Leonardo da Vinci, Treatise on Painting, London and New York: G. Bell, 1892
- , Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci, edited by Jean Paul Richter, London: Constable, 1883; New York: Dover, 1970
- Mâle, Émile, The Gothic Image, New York: Harper, 1958
- Minazzoli, Agnes, La Première Ombre, Paris: Les Editions de Minuit, 1990
- Richardson, Ernest Crushing, Materials for a Life of Jacopo da Voragine, New York: Wilson, 1935
- Richter, Gisella, Greek Etruscan and Roman Bronzes, New York: Gilliss Press, 1915
- Schwartz, Henrich, "The Mirror in Art," The Art Quarterly 15 (1952)
- Seidel, Linda, Jan Van Eyck's Arnolfini Portrait, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Seymour, Charles, "Dark Chamber and Light-Filled Rooms: Vermeer and the Camera Obscura," The Art Bulletin XLVI (1964)
- Slive, Seymour, and Englebert Hendrik Terkuile, Dutch Art and Architecture, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1966
- Strem, George, The Life and Teaching of Lucius Annaeus Seneca, New York: Vantage Press, 1981
- , The Mirror, The Lamp, London: Institute of Contemporary Arts, 1986
- Torti, Anna, The Glass of Form, London and Rochester, New York: Brewer, 1991
- Wilenski, Reginald Howard, Dutch Art, New York: Stokes, 1929; London: Faber and Gwyer, 1929
- Wimsatt, James, Allegory and Mirror, New York: Pegasus, 1970

MISFORTUNE

Fritz Laupichler

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Misfortune:

ALLEGORICAL

PROMETHEUS

TANTALUS

THE DELUGE

DESTRUCTION OF CITIES

PLAGUES

SHIPWRECK

AIRPLANE CRASHES

Anthonsiz., Cornelisz (Cornelis Teunissen), Misfortune, drawing, second quarter of the sixteenth century, London, British Museum.
 (Copyright The British Museum)

Misfortune may be defined as the state of bad luck leading to a condition of suffering. The affliction of misfortune often implies previous prosperity or well-being. The spectrum of representations of misfortune in the visual arts includes personification, the sufferings sent by the classical gods and goddesses, adversity as punishment sent by the Christian God the Father, and the profane representation of misfortune in the depictions of catastrophes and accidents.

Misfortune as an allegorical figure has been seldom represented because Fortuna, as a capriciously and arbitrarily acting being distributing good luck and bad luck purely at random, frequently causes misfortunes by her actions. Thus, for a long time it seemed that a separate personification for misfortune was not necessary. Cesare Ripa, who defined Fortuna as well, described Infortunio in Iconologia (1603) as a barefooted man in a tan-colored dress with a raven, an empty horn of plenty turned upside down, and the ruins of a house as attributes. In Hans Sebald Beham's copper engraving Infortunium (1541), misfortune is represented as a walking woman with wings who is accompanied by a little devil with a crawfish as an attribute. This print is a pendant to the representation Fortuna. German painter Martin Pfinzing von Henfenfeld produced a drawing in 1544 after this engraving for his sketchbook, now in the Germanisches Nationalmuseum in Nürnberg, Germany, that contains studies and sketches from the period (1537–1559). A drawing by Cornelis Teunissen shows the personification of misfortune as a seated woman with one bare breast, holding an eel by the tip of the tail and surrounded by signs of adversity: a broken pot, a perforated cask, a crushed wheel, the ruins of a city, a ship in distress, and dying cattle.

The print Fortune with Her Sons "Bonheur" and "Malheur" from Gilles Corrozet's emblem book Hecaton-graphie (1540) shows the personification "Malheur" tied to a tree. The commentary to the print explains the scene: "Malheur" (i.e., Misfortune) shall remain fettered and can be freed only from time to time by the free will of man.

Italian engraver Enea Vico, active between 1540 and 1560, published one in a series of emblematic figures, the copper engraving Infortunium, which was probably designed by Francesco Salviati. It shows a dressed woman falling down from a balustrade because of a breaking beam. P. van Boons depicts Misfortune as a half-naked woman with a sail in her left hand, sawing through the beam on which she is kneeling (circa 1627). On this beam we also find Abundance, standing on a footstool. The design for this painting was probably copied after a print from Dirck Volckertsz Coornhert, When Fortune Is Abundant, the Fall Will Be Deeper.

The emblem books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries also show the concept of misfortune as a scorpion pricking a man (Gilles Corrozet, Hecaton-graphie, Paris, 1540) and as a ship in distress (Julius Wilhelm Zincgreff, Emblematum, Heidelberg, Germany, 1619). Misfortune through one's own fault is shown as a sheep whose wool has been torn out by a brier (Jacob Cats, Proteus, Rotterdam, the Netherlands, 1627). Increasing adversity is depicted by the Hydra of Lerna, attacked in vain by the mythological hero Hercules (Joannes Sambucus, Emblemata, Antwerpen, Belgium, 1564). The transvaluation of fortune and misfortune as abstract ideas during the Renaissance becomes especially evident in such representations as that of overcoming misfortune by reflection. A man holding a broken wheel in one hand and a wing and a laurel in the other appears, for example, in Sebastián de Orozco Covarrubias's Emblemas morales, published in Madrid, Spain, in 1610.

In a broader sense, the misfortunes of the heroes of classical mythology, often brought on by the vengeance of the gods, belong to the subject, too. The most famous examples—the sufferings of Prometheus, Tantalus, and Sisyphus—should be mentioned. Prometheus was punished by Zeus, king of the gods, for helping mankind, especially for his gift of fire. Zeus ordered Prometheus bound to a rock and then sent an eagle or vulture every day to eat his liver. Artists have frequently depicted the binding of Prometheus, usually by Hephaestus (Vulcan), the god of fire and metalworking; Prometheus alone and chained to this rock; and, less frequently, the eagle's gory daily visit.

Tantalus tattled about the actions of the gods, served up his son to them for dinner, and lied about a golden dog. For these sins he was condemned to stand up to his chin in water that he could not reach to drink. He was also tantalized (the word comes from his name) by gorgeous ripe fruit hanging just out of his reach. He is usually depicted with his head just above the water, reaching for the forever-elusive water around him and fruit above him.

Sisyphus's long life was filled with incidents of cunning, duplicity, and lying. When he finally died, the punishment for this misspent life was to roll a giant stone up to the top of a hill, but on reaching the summit the stone inevitably rolled back down, forcing Sisyphus to begin all over again. He is usually depicted engaged in this fruitless task. Sisyphus and Tantalus are often paired with two other mythological wrongdoers, Ixion and Tityus, and painted in a series as the Four Blasphemers, Deceivers, or Condemned Men. Titian and Cornelis Cornelisz van Haarlem both painted such series, but they are now lost and are known only through engravings.

The most prominent example for the theme of adversity in Christian iconography is Job, the great sufferer of the Book of Job in the Old Testament. Job, a rich man from Uz, sitting on a dunghill, humble and God-fearing, resists all the buffets of fate that Satan imposes on him as temptations. Moreover, he undergoes the derision of his wife and his friends. Beginning in the twelfth century, and especially in late Gothic sculpture, the suffering, bearded Job is shown covered with sores or boils and sitting on a dunghill. As a sign of misfortune and lost prosperity, a crown is often placed at the foot of Job as an attribute. Especially in the first half of the sixteenth century, the representation of Job on the dunghill becomes the typological pattern for Jesus Christ in agony waiting to be crucified.

The Old Testament provides further examples of misfortune sent by God the Father as trial or punishment. As God saw that mankind was bad, He decided to exterminate it—except for Noah and his family—and sent a flood. A rain of fire and sulfur destroyed the sinful cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, and God sent the seven plagues because the pharaoh did not allow the Israelites to leave Egypt. These representations of events from the Bible are the beginning of the iconography of catastrophes and sudden and destructive events.

Representations of the burning cities of Sodom and Gomorrah influenced depictions of the burning cities of Troy, such as Adam Elsheimer's painting Troy Burning (circa 1600–1601) in Munich, Germany, and of Rome. Most of the representations of conflagrations—a very frequently represented form of misfortune and catastrophe—derive from the nineteenth century. One of the most remarkable of these is the painting by J. M. W. Turner, Burning of the Houses of Lords and Commons (1835), in the Cleveland Museum of Art in Ohio.

The motif of epidemics and their consequences also develops from religious into profane art. The earliest examples of this motif are the representations of the Egyptian plagues. The plague-epidemics in Milan and Venice in 1576 and in Marseilles, France, in 1720–1721 give rise to the production of contemporary profane representations of the subject. Remarkable examples of representations of plagues in modern times are The Plague in Siena (before 1905) by Pietro Vanni, The Plague in Rome (1869) by Jules Elie Delaunay, and The Plague in Venice (1666) by Antonio Zanchi.

The biblical patterns for representations of earthquakes and volcanic eruptions are rare, except in illustrating the Apocalypse, and the iconography of these subjects mainly developed autonomously during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. After the excavation of Pompeii in 1748, the archaeological finds allowed artists, such as the French painter Joseph Franque, to depict its destruction in A.D. 79 with thrilling accuracy. The earthquake of Messina, Sicily, in 1908 provides a twentieth-century example. German expressionist Max Beckmann painted this catastrophe the same year it occurred.

The motif of the deluge as punishment, with Noah's Ark as symbol of the Church, has been changed in the course of time to the representation of a pure seascape in the nineteenth century without the Ark. Most paintings focus on the narrative of Noah, especially the building of the Ark and the gathering of animals. A few painters, however, such as Jan Nagel and Francis Danby, show the destruction of sinful mankind as the waters rise.

Representations of dramatic scenes with ships in distress have appeared, especially in Dutch painting, since the sixteenth century. Without doubt, one of the most impressive of these paintings is The Raft of the Medusa (1819) by Théodore Géricault, in which, although the moment of salvation is depicted, the horrors of a shipwreck and its consequences are shown in all their intensity for the first time in art. Based on actual accounts of the shipwreck and rescue, the painting shows the 15 survivors, a bare remnant of the 150 who left the doomed ship Medusa 15 days earlier. In various states of distress, only the black man at the summit of the painting seems to have the strength to hail the ship in the distance.

The greatest sea disaster in the history of seafaring was the sinking of the Titanic in 1912. In this year, Max Beckmann produced a monumental painting titled The Sinking of the Titanic. It depicts the sinking ship in the background while in the foreground dozens of people in lifeboats and passengers swimming in the water desperately fight against drowning.

German painter Franz Radziwil witnessed a test pilot crash his airplane while still a child. The artist assimilated the experience in his painting Death Fall of Karl Buchstätter (1928). The night piece shows the fall as unstoppable catastrophe and brings to mind Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Fall of Icarus in the Folkwang Museum in Essen, Germany.

Whereas Radziwil shows the moment of the fall itself, American artist Andy Warhol presents the aftermath of a plane crash. As pattern for his painting 129 Die in Jet (Plane Crash) (1963), now in the Museum Ludwig in Cologne, Germany, the artist used the front page of a newspaper. With the large format he forcefully transforms the death of 129 unknown air passengers from mere news into a shocking event.

Whether divine retributions, natural disasters, catastrophic accidents, or quirks of fate are to blame, misfortune is a threat known to everyone, something lurking in everyone's future. No one can feel immune to the graphically depicted scenes of misfortune that make up a dramatic part of the world's art.

See also Apocalypse; Betrayal; Destruction of City; Fortune

Selected Works of Art

Allegorical

Vico, Enea, Infortunium, copper engraving, 1540–1560,

New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Beham, Hans Sebald, Infortunium, copper engraving,

1541

Henfenfeld, Martin Pfinzing von, Infortuna, drawing,

1544, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches

Nationalmuseum

Anthonisz., Cornelisz (Teunissen, Cornelis), Misfortune, drawing, second quarter of sixteenth century, London,

British Museum

Boons, P. van, Allegory of Misfortune, oil painting, circa

1627, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein

Prometheus

Garofalo, Benvenuto Tisi da, The Torture of Prometheus, fresco, 1540, Ferrara, Italy, Seminario Arcivescovile

Rubens, Peter Paul, and Frans Synders, Prometheus Bound, painting, 1610–1611, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania,

Philadelphia Museum of Art

- Baburen, Dirck van, Prometheus Being Chained by Vulcan, painting, 1623, Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum
 Daumier, Honoré, Promethean France and the Eagle-Vulture, lithograph, 1871
 Kokoschka, Oskar, Prometheus Bound, from Prometheus Sage, triptych, 1950, London, private collection

Tantalus

- Bloemaert, Abraham, The Punishment of Tantalus, drawing, early seventeenth century, London, Courtauld Institute
 Goya, Francisco de, Tantalus, etching, from Los Caprichos, 1797–1798
 Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Tantalus, drawing, late nineteenth century, London, Tate Gallery
 Klinger, Max, The Story of Tantalus, bas-relief, from Beethoven Throne, 1902, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

The Deluge

- Danby, Francis, The Deluge, 1840, London, Tate Gallery
 Nagel, Jan, The Deluge with the Last Survivors of the Human Race in the Foreground, early seventeenth century, London, Christie, Manson and Wood

Destruction of Cities

- Elsheimer, Adam, Troy Burning, oil painting, circa 1600–1601, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Franque, Joseph, Volcanic Eruption of the Vesuv, oil painting, 1827, London, Heim Gallery
 Turner, J. M. W., Burning of the Houses of Lords and Commons, oil painting, 1835, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art
 Beckmann, Max, The Earthquake of Messina, oil painting, 1908, St. Louis, Missouri, The St. Louis Art Museum

Plagues

- Zanchi, Antonio, The Plague in Venice, oil painting, 1666, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Delaunay, Jules Elie, The Plague in Rome, oil painting, 1869, Paris, Louvre Vanni, Pietro, The Plague in Siena, oil painting, before 1905, Rome, Galleria d'Arte Moderna

Shipwreck

- Géricault, Théodore, The Raft of the Medusa, oil painting, 1819, Paris, Louvre
 Beckmann, Max, The Sinking of the Titanic, oil painting, 1912, St. Louis, Missouri, The St. Louis Art Museum

Airplane Crashes

- Radziwil, Franz, Death Fall of Karl Buchstätter, oil painting, 1928, Essen, Germany, Museum Folkwang
 Warhol, Andy, 129 Die in Jet (Plane Crash), acrylic painting, 1963, Cologne, Germany, Museum Ludwig

Further Reading

- Henkel, Arthur, and Albrecht Schöne, Emblemata, Stuttgart, Germany: Metzler, 1967
 Lüthy, Hans A., “Zur Ikonographie der Katastrophe in der Malerei,” Kulturelle Monatsschrift 33 (1972)
 Osten, Gert von der, “Job and Christ,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 16 (1953)
 Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, London: Motte, 1709; New York: Garland, 1976
 Tervarent, Guy de, Attributs et Symboles dans l'art profane, Geneva, Switzerland: E. Droz, 1958
 Wescher, Paul, “Beiträge zu Cornelis Teunissen von Amsterdam,” Oud Holland XLV (1928)
 Westerhoff, Ingrid, “Hiob in der Französischen Kathedralskulptur,” Wallraf-Richartz Jahrbuch 50 (1989)

MONEY

Edward J. Nygren

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Money:

FIFTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

SIXTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Victor Dubreuil, Safe Money, 1898, oil on canvas, Washington, D.C., Corcoran Gallery of Art, George E. Lemon Fund. (Courtesy of the Corcoran Gallery of Art)

Money is a theme unique to Western art. While most societies have used items of value in exchange for goods and services, only the West has so fully explored the subject of money in art and literature, expressing at times an ambivalence toward, if not a loathing of, something so fundamental to its political systems, economies, and cultures. Minted gold and silver coins were, at one time, the primary form of exchange, valued according to their weight. Money today is primarily symbolic. Its physical form in base metal or paper has little or no intrinsic worth, and its value in commerce now wholly depends upon the backing of governments.

In artistic representations, money has signified a range of ideas and concepts from sinfulness to industry and mortality to good fortune. Money is, in and of itself, neither good nor evil, yet in Western thought, from antiquity to the present, there has been an underlying suspicion of wealth and those who pursue it. “For the love of money is the root of all evil” (I Timothy 6:10) is a view persistent in European and American literature from William Langland’s Piers Plowman (circa 1362–1395) and Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Pardoner’s Tale” from The Canterbury Tales (1478, written 1385–1400), to Honoré de Balzac’s Eugénie Grandet (1833) and Frank Norris’s McTeague (1899).

Money as a metaphor for venality and decadence has visual counterparts in both fine and popular art. As a discrete element in pictorial compositions, money made its initial appearance in the Middle Ages. One of the first painted representations of gold occurs in a Flemish illuminated manuscript from the early fourteenth century held in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, England (Shell, fig. 10). A grotesque head, placed at the tail end of a dragon’s body that has transformed into trailing vines, spews gold coins into a bowl held by one of several tendrils. The suggestion here seems to be that money is obscene and originates with the devil. Subsequent artistic renderings of the subject can, in part, be attributed to a response to the growth in capitalism and the secularization of society (Yunck, p. 310).

The pursuit of money was first satirized in the early Middle Ages when Roman Catholic Church reforms addressed clergy venality and indulgence peddling (Yunck, pp. 47, 82). During the first millennium of the Christian period, usury also emerged as a social ill subject to church discipline and secular restrictions. Although criticism of lending money at exorbitant interest rates often took on anti-Semitic overtones, sculptures of men with moneybags on Romanesque churches appear as damned, and therefore Christian, souls (Le Goff, p. 33).

Like usury or avarice, miserliness and profligacy were sins said to lead to damnation. In “The Inferno” in The Divine Comedy (1472, written 1307–1321), Dante Alighieri relegates those who are intemperate in their handling of funds to the Fourth Circle of Hell. Miserliness is also one of the subjects addressed in Ars Moriendi (Art of Dying Well, late fifteenth century), a treatise illustrated by the Master E. S. that offers guidance on how to overcome temptation and prepare for death. Hieronymus Bosch took up similar ideas, as did Guyot Marchant in his Dance Macabre (1485). Related themes of mortality and the insignificance of worldly wealth were explored by artists such as Hans Holbein the Younger, notably in the Death and the Rich Man woodcut he did for The Dance of Death series (1538). Later, Bosch, Frans Franken, and other members of their circle painted still lifes of coins and precious goods juxtaposed with scenes of misers on their deathbeds. Vanitas paintings from the early seventeenth century and later frequently included evidence of material wealth, such as coins, golden goblets, jewels, and crowns.

Although specie and avarice were only implied in scenes of alchemy, the subject of humans attempting to turn base metal into gold was popular. In compositions by Pieter Bruegel the Elder, Adriaen van Ostade, and others, alchemists were often depicted in cluttered and impoverished interiors as the epitome of a futile search for earthly riches.

All representations of money were not, however, associated with sinfulness or mortality. Quentin Massys and Marinus van Reyerswaele were among those sixteenth-century artists who painted bankers, moneylenders, and tax collectors—recurrent business types in an emerging capitalistic world—as personifications of venality. There were also portraits of merchants and businessmen in which gold was used simply as an attribute of their profession or occupation (Yamey, pp. 19–43). In The Adoration of the Magi (circa 1450–1460) by the Master E. S., the gold coins in the cup offered to the Christ Child by one of the Eastern kings serve as an acknowledgment of a superior being, as did contemporary depictions of tax money, or a tribute to a ruler.

The corruptive nature of money, however, has attracted greater artistic attention. Venality and avarice, generally considered universal human failings, have been repeatedly treated by succeeding generations of artists and writers since the Middle Ages, and remain major motivating forces in the fiction and films of the modern era. In any given year, several movies and television programs explore the power of money in contemporary life, and the love of money leading to social deviation, moral corruption, or crime. Contemporary fiction, such as Martin Amis’s comic novel Money (1984), have also dealt with these or related ideas.

Attitudes toward the materialism of a burgeoning capitalistic Western society are evident in numerous history paintings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Biblical compositions, such as the scene of Christ driving the money changers from the temple by artists such as Valentin de Boulogne or Bartolomeo

Manfredi, or the calling of St. Matthew by artists such as Caravaggio, Hendrick ter Brugghen, and Tobias Stomer suggest that spiritual concerns should be placed above earthly matters. Subjects like Moses and the golden calf caution against the misguided worship of wealth, while paintings of Judas with his 30 pieces of silver warn of an obsessive love of lucre.

Profane stories drawn from mythology served similar moralizing purposes. Such was the case with the tale of the seduction of Danaë by Jupiter, king of the Roman gods, in the form of a shower of gold. In the Middle Ages, Danaë, whose conception was considered immaculate, was viewed as a prefiguration of Mary. However, later artists, including Titian, Correggio, Orazio Gentileschi, Hendrick Goltzius, and Joachim Wtewael, used the image of gold or coins falling on a voluptuous Danaë to comment on the corruptive power of money and mercenary love. Mercenary love is a subject frequently found in the imagery of the time. For example, in Urs Graf's Vanitas (circa 1525), with one hand a woman takes money from a bag of gold in front of an old man who is fondling her. With the other hand the woman gives the money to a young man, presumably her lover. On the table before them lie an array of objects—musical instruments, gambling equipment, cards, food—that speak of worldly pleasures. In the late eighteenth century, Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson also used the Danaë myth in his portrait Mademoiselle Lange as Danaë (1799) to satirize the actress's immoral life.

Among other classical tales of disastrous greed popular during the Baroque period were those of Midas, mythological king of Phrygia, and Croesus, the last king of Lydia who reigned in the sixth century B.C. There were allegories of fortune that included cornucopias overflowing with gold and silver that warned against a reliance on chance. Allegory of Fortune (circa 1658–1659) by Salvatore Rosa, in which a female figure pours wealth and power from a horn onto the backs of base, and therefore undeserving, animals, is a painting on this theme that also alludes to a specific case of papal nepotism during the reign of Pope Alexander VII.

Money and moral depravity, gold and corruption, earthly treasures and mortality are repeatedly paired in seventeenth-century art. The blind and imprudent pursuit of pleasure, as represented, leads to victimization and brings on financial loss. Lecherous old men and gullible young gentlemen pay a price for their sexual transgressions—procuresses or prostitutes in compositions by Graff, Jan Steen, Johannes Vermeer, and Georges de la Tour easily separate a fool from his money, which they then pass to their accomplices. The unsuspecting, naive youths in works by Caravaggio, Valentin, and Manfredi are robbed or cheated as they have their fortunes told or play cards, and gambling is the cause of degradation and conflict in compositions by Steen and Jacob Matham. Money is frequently shown as the object of desire and the motivation for deceit. Paintings such as Erysichthon Selling His Daughter (circa 1677) by Steen present people as commodities that can be bought and sold, as do the ubiquitous images of prostitution and mercenary love. Vanitas compositions filled with luxurious items and piles of gold or silver coins express the dreams of the merchant class (Bryson, pp. 126–127) even as they moralize. Such is the case in still lifes by Franken, Jacques de Gheyn, and

Jean de Valdés Leal that address the insignificance of worldly goods when compared with eternity. The mythical Golden Age, a popular subject of the time in which humankind is placed in a pastoral paradise, was pointedly an age without competition for its namesake precious metal.

The growth of the middle classes during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the expansion of trade and commerce, and the onslaught of industrialization brought money to the fore in an increasingly bourgeois Western society shaped by laissez-faire economic policies. Currency continued to appear in images of prostitution and reckless gambling, as in works by William Hogarth and Thomas Rowlandson. As a metaphor for social decadence and moral depravity leading to financial ruin and even death, the accumulation of money could also symbolize the fruit of industry and economy, as it does in genre scenes by George Morland. Gaming was entertainment and a way of life for many levels of society. Cards and coins frequently appear in social satires of the period and were even embroidered on the cloths of gaming tables, emphasizing their illusionary qualities. Money clearly was considered a major objective in society, something everyone from beggar to ruler wanted and tried to acquire. It was a central theme in Daniel Defoe's novel Moll Flanders (1722), in which a fallen woman travels life's bumpy road from moral ruin to financial success. Artists in several countries caricatured its corrupting impact on the leaders of governments. Political money was even transmuted into excrement to emphasize its unseemly character. Caricatures in the twentieth century have continued to highlight the corruptive role money plays in the political realm.

In the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries, however, society's view of money remained ambivalent. Pursuit of it could be sordid, but ownership ensured independence. Time was equated with money as a measure of labor and productivity during the Industrial Revolution, and this concept was both embraced and parodied in literature and the visual arts. People were encouraged by some, such as Benjamin Franklin, to acquire and save money by whatever means possible. Yet, they were also cautioned against its dehumanizing effects. In an age that produced Karl Marx's view of class struggle and Thorstein Veblen's The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study in the Evolution of Institutions (1899), money became "the most common theme in nineteenth-century fiction" (Vernon, p. 7). In the novels of Honoré de Balzac, money was equated with power and often associated with the newly rich. The rags-to-riches story became a cliché. In the United States, writers such as Horatio Alger transformed money into an American myth. Money's psycho-sexual significance, evident in paintings of the mythological Danaë as well as in novels such as Norris's McTeague, gave rise to the Freudian concept of the "gold complex."

The nineteenth century saw an expansion in industrialization, particularly in the second half of the century. In the United States, monopolies led to the concentration of enormous wealth and power in the hands of a few. In the closing decades, a number of still-life painters began to paint canvases exclusively devoted to the subject of money. Displayed on tabletops, illusionistically tacked on boards, hung together with watches, piled high in vaults and barrels as a sign of wealth and conspicuous consumption, money became a unique subtheme in American painting. Paper money had been depicted occasionally in the trompe l'oeil compositions of British and continental art of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, but only in the United States was it exploited as a subject unto itself. This undoubtedly had to do with the United States lead in the use of paper money as a viable currency, and with the resultant, rampant counterfeiting. By depicting money, painters in effect artistically counterfeited it. Some were even harassed by the Department of the Treasury for their representations.

American artists also played with the conceit of illusion versus reality. At a time when the idea of wealth was an illusion or dream for most of the population, the reality of how a few made their money and what they did with it became a social concern. During a period marked by labor unrest and deep economic depressions, Franklin's preindustrial, eighteenth-century dictum "time is money" became, in the hands of Ferdinand Danton Jr. and others, the focus of artistic jokes in compositions depicting a bundle of money balancing a pocket watch. The proliferation of money images in American art also coincided with a political debate over whether silver could be used along with gold as a monetary standard to ensure the value of paper currency.

William Harnett is recognized as the first American to isolate a single piece of paper currency and make it the sole subject of a painting. Many of his contemporaries, including John Peto and John Haberle, as well as Danton, followed suit and frequently introduced deceptive, life-size images of money in their works. It was an obscure New York painter, Victor Dubreuil, however, who became obsessed with the subject, almost to the exclusion of everything else. He painted many compositions of barrels overflowing with money, barrels presumably sitting unused in the vault of a millionaire or in a bank. Occasionally, as in Safe Money (1898), which depicts a large office safe stuffed with the dividends of a fictional transcontinental railroad monopoly (North South East & West), Dubreuil changed the denominations of the bills to suggest the inflated values placed on the services rendered as well as the excessive profits realized through those inflated prices. Dubreuil's work alluded to criminal activity, perhaps as an acknowledgment of the so-called robber barons, who controlled so much of the nineteenth-century industrial United States. Occasionally his works exhibited paranoid, even anti-Semitic reactions at a time when the belief in an international Jewish financial conspiracy was being aired in the press. A similar fixation with money persisted in the art of Otis Kaye from the early to mid-twentieth century. However, his works, while frequently acknowledging a debt to his nineteenth-century predecessors, had few overt social or political overtones.

In the second half of the twentieth century, several artists, particularly in the United States, introduced money—real, conceptual, or representational—into their compositions (Coller, pp. 19–31). Their works raised issues about the nature and value of money and its connection with society and art. A pop image of one- and two-dollar bills was mechanically reproduced in prints by Andy Warhol in the 1960s and then again in the 1980s. Branda Miller gave major billing to The Almighty Dollar in a monumental lightboard on Times Square in New York (1987), perhaps an allusion to the economic dominance of the United States and the "star" quality of its currency. Artists such as Barton Beneš and Arch Connelly shredded and collaged money and constructed sculptures from bills and coins to exploit money's decorative qualities, illustrate a devalued currency, and comment on its relationship with art. Chris Burden's Tower of Power (1985), an installation at the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford, Connecticut, is composed of 100 bars of pure gold bullion and examines feelings about money during a period noted for its self-centered materialism. Not coincidentally, Burden tapped into money's visual potential at a time of escalating prices in the art market. In his conceptual piece called Money (1969), Robert Morris documented, through correspondence and an interest-bearing certificate of deposit, how money works and assumes, as does art, a life of its own. Among contemporary artists, J. S. G. Boggs has perhaps been the artist most dedicated to the theme in his explorations of the meaning and value of art versus money in modern society. Boggs has created currency, often with his own likeness on the front, and used it in business transactions, documenting from original drawing through receipts and change the entire process that is the work of art. His practices have led to his arrest and prosecution in several countries.

Although the subject of money was addressed in classical literature and its morally corrupting nature was discussed in the Bible, it was not until the Middle Ages that it emerged as a theme in the visual arts. Since the Middle Ages, compositions that exploited the symbolic meanings of money proliferated during periods of cultural and economic change and during periods in which secularism, mercantilism, capitalism, or materialism dominated and introduced inherent social problems. Whether it is a painting by Hieronymus Bosch of a miser on his deathbed being claimed by devils; a political cartoon by James Gillray that satirizes a corrupt politician in Georgian England; Victor Dubreuil's barrels of paper money representing the excessive wealth of America's robber barons; a film by Preston Sturges about a penniless movie director on a voyage of discovery in the United States during the Great Depression; or dollar bills glued to palm trees in Venice, California, by Chris Burden to parody the fantasy of easy money in contemporary America, images of money in art reveal the concerns and values of the societies that produced them. Given the increasing commitment throughout the world to capitalism and the profit motive, a few artists, while dependent themselves on the financial support of patrons and collectors, presumably will continue to be appalled by, as well as fascinated with, the materialism of modern life as they explore further the meaning of money, its effects on society, and its relationship to the arts.

See also Avarice; Damned Souls; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

Fifteenth Century

Christus, Petrus, Saint Eligius and the Lovers, 1449, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, Robert Lehman Collection

Master E. S., The Adoration of the Magi, circa 1490–1460, engraving, Chicago, Art Institute of Chicago
 Bosch, Hieronymus, Death of the Miser, circa 1490–1500, oil on panel, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Sixteenth Century

Massys, Quentin, Moneylender and His Wife, 1514, oil on panel, Paris, Louvre
 Lucas van Leyden, Card Player, circa 1515, oil on panel, Wiltshire, England, Earl of Pembroke, Wilton House
 Massys, Quentin, Ill-Matched Lovers, circa 1515, oil on panel, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Reymerswaele, Marinus van, Two Tax Gatherers, 1526, oil on panel, London, National Gallery
 Gossaert, Jan, Portrait of a Banker, oil on panel, circa 1530, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Holbein, Hans, the Younger, Death and the Rich Man, 1538, woodcut, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
 Reymerswaele, Marinus van, The Banker and His Wife, oil on panel, 1539, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Titian, Danäe, oil on canvas, 1554, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 El Greco, Christ Cleansing the Temple, oil on panel, circa 1570, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Caravaggio, Calling of St. Matthew, 1599–1600, oil on canvas, Rome, San Luigi dei Francesi

Seventeenth Century

Goltzius, Hendrick, Jupiter and Danäe, 1603, oil on canvas, Los Angeles, Los Angeles County Museum of Art
 Franken, Hieronymus, the Younger, Allegory of Worldly Riches, oil on panel, circa 1625, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Gentileschi, Orazio, Danäe, circa 1621–1622, oil on canvas, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art
 Manfredi, Bartolomeo, Christ Driving Money Changers from the Temple, oil on canvas, before 1620, Libourne, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Christ Driving Money Changers from the Temple, 1626, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum of Art
 Rosa, Salvatore, Allegory of Fortune, circa 1658–1659, oil on canvas, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
 Steen, Jan, Erysichthon Selling His Daughter, oil on canvas, circa 1667, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Brugghe, Hendrick ter, Calling of St. Matthew, oil on canvas, 1621, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum
 La Tour, Georges de, The Cheat with the Ace of Diamonds, oil on canvas, circa 1630–1640, Paris, Louvre
 Vermeer, Jan, The Procureess, 1656, oil on canvas, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen

Eighteenth Century

Hogarth, William, Scene in a Gaming House, 1733, oil on canvas, London, Sir John Soane's Museum
 Morland, George, The Fruits of Early Industry and Economy, oil on canvas, 1789, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Rowlandson, Thomas, The Gaming Table at Devonshire House, pen and watercolor, 1791, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Gillray, James, Midas, Transmuting All into Paper, etching, March 9, 1797, London, British Museum
 Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, Mademoiselle Lange as Danäe, oil on canvas, 1799, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Arts

Nineteenth Century

Harnett, William, Still Life: Five Dollar Bill, oil on canvas, 1877, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Nast, Thomas, Ideal Money, from Harper's Weekly, January 19, 1878
 Haberle, John, Can You Break a Five?, circa 1888, Fort Worth, Texas, Amon Carter Museum
 Peto, John, Five Dollar Bill, oil on canvas, after 1889, Brandywine River Museum, Pennsylvania
 Danton, Ferdinand, Jr., Time Is Money, oil on canvas, 1894, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Dubreuil, Victor, Safe Money, 1898, oil on canvas, Washington, D.C., Corcoran Gallery of Art
 Dubreuil, Victor, Barrels of Money, oil on canvas, circa 1898, Brandywine River Museum, Pennsylvania

Twentieth Century

Kaye, Otis, Breakout, oil on board, 1930, private collection
 Heartfield, John, Adolf, the Superman: Swallows Gold and Spouts Junk, from Workers Illustrated Newspaper, July 17, 1932
 Warhol, Andy, Two-Dollar Bills, silk screen on linen, 1962, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz-Museum
 Morris, Robert, Money, correspondence and stock certificate, 1969, collection of the artist
 Burden, Chris, Tower of Power, bars of gold bullion, 1985, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
 Boggs, J. S. G., Dialogue with Otis, 13 pieces (including drawings, invoice, receipt, change), 1988–1989, private collection

Further Reading

Bryson, Norman, Looking at the Overlooked, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990; London: Reaktion, 1990
 Chambers, Bruce, Old Money: American Trompe l'oeil Images of Currency, New York: Berry-Hill Galleries, 1988
 Clark, James, The Dance of Death in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, Glasgow, Scotland: Jackson, 1950
 Coller, Barbara, The Realm of the Coin: Money in Contemporary Art, Hampstead, New York: Hofstra University Press, 1991
 Cust, Lionel, The Master E. S. and the "Ars Moriendi," Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1898

- Foucault, Michel, The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences, New York: Pantheon, 1970; London: Tavistock, 1970
- La Borie, Henri, Otis Kaye: The Trompe l'oeil Vision of Reality, Oak Lawn, Illinois: Soutines, 1987
- Le Goff, Jacques, Your Money or Your Life: Economy and Religion in the Middle Ages, translated by Patricia Ranum, New York: Zone, 1988
- Lipman, Jean, "Money for Money's Sake," Art in America 58:1 (January–February 1970)
- Male, Roy, editor, Money Talks: Language and Lucre in American Fiction, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1980
- Michaels, Walter Benn, "The Gold Standard and the Logic of Naturalism," Representations IX (1985)
- Nygren, Edward J., "The Almighty Dollar: Money as a Theme in American Painting," Winterthur Portfolio 23:2–3 (Summer–Autumn 1988)
- Ratcliff, Carter, "The Marriage of Art and Money," Art in America 76:7 (July 1988)
- Shell, Marc, Money, Language, and Thought: Literary and Philosophic Economies from the Medieval to the Modern Era, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1982
- , Art and Money, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994
- Sill, Gertrude Grace, John Haberle: Master of Illusion, Springfield, Massachusetts: Museum of Fine Arts, 1985
- Tampa Museum of Art, J. S. G. Boggs Smart Money (Hard Currency), Tampa, Florida: Tampa Museum of Art
- Vernon, Money and Fiction: Literary Realism in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1984
- Weschler, Lawrence, "Boggs's Bills" in Shapinsky's Karma, Boggs's Bills, and Other True-Life Tales, San Francisco: North Point Press, 1988
- Yamey, Basil S., Art and Accounting, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1989
- Yunck, John, The Lineage of Lady Mead: The Development of Medieval Venality Satire, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1963

MONTHS

Shane Adler

The following periods, motifs, and regions are covered in the discussion of the theme Months:

ANTIQUITY

ARCHITECTURAL CYCLES

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS

LOW COUNTRIES, SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES

FRENCH CYCLES,
SEVENTEENTH CENTURY
ALMANACS AND CALENDARS

Octobre.

*L'Automne étale icy ses plus riches trésors,
Et pour nous enrichir fait de nouveaux efforts,
Non contents de donner des fruits en abondance,
Par diverses liqueurs nous montre sa puissance.*

Nicolas Bonnart, after Robert Bonnart, "October," from Series of the Months, seventeenth century, print, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale. (Courtesy of the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris)

The calendar system of measuring developed through the observation of the passage of time in its natural rhythms. By this means, food supplies could be organized using nature's schedule for planting and for preparing for the annual period of dormancy. Most ancient civilizations followed the phases of the moon to regulate the year by counting the days of the rising and setting sun between full moons. The Babylonians and the Sumerians of Mesopotamia, as well as the Chinese, recognized the span of 12 lunar months. Aware of the conflicting number of days distinguishing the lunar and solar cycles, the Mayans of Mexico and Central America developed a complex method of calculating over a prolonged period, superimposing a shorter sacred year on the civil year of 18 months; various symbols aided the calculation. The Greeks looked to the star patterns in the night sky for symbols to denote lunar time and named the constellations that dominated the celestial sphere according to the Earth's rotation. These constellations were called "little animals," or the zodiac. This circle of animals, a constant in the physical world, is still used to represent that particular span of time, but these images are temporary, as they change according to cultural values and record the passage of historic, or manmade, time.

Although the Greeks used the zodiacal creatures to mark time, the human dimension related the meaning of the months. The earliest extant calendar is the continuous narrative frieze now installed on the facade of the church of Hagios Eleutherios in Athens, Greece. This calendar displays the year as a figural sequence of man and zodiac animal. Each month that is personified wears distinctive clothing that is shed as the heat intensifies and then covers itself as protection from the cold. Following the initial, passive personification is another personification (man or god) who presides over a sacred event or feast. Prayers and offerings that the Greeks made to their gods pertained symbolically and actually to the provision of food; this ritual was performed in the belief that a good harvest depended on the humor of the ruling deities.

The Romans counted 10 lunar months because their agricultural calendar ignored the dormant stage of winter. Mars, god of Rome, took his place at the beginning: March. The second king of Rome, Numa Pompilius, added the remaining months and assigned dates to religious festivals. Astronomer-priests maintained this calendar. With a single figure personifying each month, the Roman calendar implied activity through posturing, and objects symbolically referring to characteristic work involved in gathering and producing food indicated the time of year. Allusions to war and peace are evident in calendars that trace the spread of the Roman Empire. The warrior Mars, in helmet and armor, appeared into the ninth century as far afield as Palestine. Simultaneously, the spirit of tranquility, associated with rural life in contemporary poetic description, was embodied in the flower-gatherer of early spring. The successively recopied Chronograph of 354 linked an early pictorial calendar with inscriptions of verse by Filocalus that express delight in the quotidian pleasures of the pastoral and join images to attributes that can be used for recognition: May, collecting blossoms in an elongated basket as "all the wealth of spring," met the reformed March, who became a rusticated shepherd with staff or a man of the soil at a time of renewal, pruning vines or digging into the earth with his tools.

The separate and boxed figures prevalent in mosaic floors or carved wall calendars were readily adapted to manuscript illumination. Medieval Books of Hours, intended for the laity in the daily recitation of prayer, preceded scriptures and opened with pages that listed each of the feast days of the saints by month. Even when illustrated, the months played a minor role in the labors of humans during their allotted terms in the earthly realm. Derived from Roman imagery, these labors were not physical but allegorical. With the corresponding zodiacal sign, they were incorporated into the overall design of a page as mere decorative embellishments. Confined within medallions in the Peterborough Psalter (circa 1320) or traveling around the text in historiated borders, as the bas-de-page of the Luttrell Psalter (circa 1340) or the heading in the Belleville Breviary (circa 1320), these agricultural occupations were an ensemble performed within the religious context. Initially, neither landscape nor nature was indicated except symbolically, and work was not physical but rather a moral obligation. Man himself was a passive allegorical figure representing the virtue of work, God's will, and man's proscribed place. The frozen figures working communally in Queen Mary's Psalter (early fourteenth century) are rhythmically organized against a glittering ornamental background enclosed in a Gothic framework. The daily feasts meant that one labored to serve God and celebrate with food provided by the ritual acts of sowing and reaping. Over the course of centuries, the months' representatives became more prominent and gained a sense of movement through active involvement in their labors, just as the briefest suggestion of land flourished and grew into a more realistic rendering of the natural world.

Moreover, these more animated and robust figures appeared when people began to exercise their own will and questioned God's. Striving individualism was first expressed by the inclusion of portraits of those for whom the books were made so that they might be admired for devotion to prayer. Determinism was shown in the actions taken by both laborers and the lords to whom they were bound. Liturgical tracts, with their richly painted pages, were owned by the literate, landholding nobility and urban merchants, for whom agricultural labor was the remote rural idyll of Roman poetry. The twelfth century concurrently saw the widespread use of the Labors of the Peasants motif sculpted on church portals or around holy fountains and greater rigidity in the structure and separation of classes. Dissension and resistance destabilized the feudal system, culminating in open revolts by the common people; peasants in the country and artisans in the towns vigorously announced their grievances throughout the fourteenth century. The manuscript tradition, with its images of peasants bent to their tasks, reflected the reaction of the nobility. Très Riches Heures, begun before 1415 and made for Jean, duc de Berry, depicted the peasants who populated the months as rough and slovenly beings carelessly clad in shoddy garments. These contrast sharply with the richly figured fabric of the clothing of the courtly nobles with its dense patterns of gold, similar to the elaborate backdrops that were a foil to the peasants' activity in more traditional books. Neither idealized nor always industrious, the image of the peasants has been altered, and their human dignity is in question. Furthermore, for the first time, the representation of a month fills an entire page, just as the calendar material does, and is placed before it. And the proud aristocrats themselves command pictorial prominence, replacing the peasants in the foreground of a significant number of pages with their pleasurable and purely secular pursuits, including courtship, hunting, and hawking. The landscape settings are vivid evocations of actual locations, yet this is not God's but the duke's own domain. In the distance, on the horizon between heaven and Earth, are magnificent castles, a different one for each month, with turrets and crenellated towers gracing the skies instead of the spires of cathedral or church.

During the time that elapsed between the commencement of work on Très Riches Heures and its completion in 1482–1489, a hall of months, “Sala dei Mesi,” was executed in Ferrara, Italy, for Duke Borso d'Este at his Palazzo Schifanoia. Inserting oneself in the miniatures of a devotional book was a grandiose gesture of self-tribute that was extraordinary in its time. Yet, this public room, enlivened with 12 large, vibrant fresco paintings in which the year revolves around the duke, clearly displayed his pretensions. Moreover, although peasants continued to perform their labors in unison—preparing food for their personal feasts—sacred content was absent from these months. Pagan deities of Olympus, the gods of the ancient world, reasserted themselves as rulers of the heavens, bestowing homage on the duke in a world apparently made for his pleasure. Another large-scale decorative scheme transforming four walls into the year-round indicates the northward movement of the calendar cycle during the Renaissance. The workshop of Bernaert van Orley produced several series borrowing the motifs of traditional laborers. For Emperor Charles V, the artist designed Hunts of Maximilien (circa 1525) with the theme of a single month extended to an entire cycle. The variety of settings was provided by the different hunting sites preferred by the emperor's uncle in the forest of Soignes outside Brussels, Belgium. The set, reproduced in tapestries at least three times in the following century by the Gobelins manufactory in France, defined a realm outside time, a realm mandated not by changes in nature's months but by a man's quest for diversion.

The smiling countenance in Simon Bening's calendar pages provided a foundation for the development of Netherlandish landscape art, with its deeply felt sentiment for nature. Bening's picture-book scenes of harmonious contentment and bright color seem to lead directly to the panoramic view of Pieter Bruegel the Elder. Although Bruegel's series of monthly activities was privately commissioned by a well-to-do patron, the artist's love of the land and respect for all who inhabit that land prevail. Bruegel recognized that life was not idyllic for those who lived by physical labor in the outdoor extremes of heat and cold, and he portrayed men of diligence alongside men who were indolent; some women were slothful, and others he conferred with beauty as a reward for hard work. The land itself was expansive and full of natural grandeur throughout the year; even harsh winter offered graceful abundance, as scenes are picturesque rather than spiritually desolate. Villages were nestled in rolling hills, and an entire community of all types of people was involved in their creation and maintenance. There was also pleasure. Visible in the distance of the January painting The Hunters in the Snow (1565) is a frozen pond where the townsfolk have gathered to exhibit their varying skills at ice-skating. In harsh contrast are the villagers and peasants of Cornelis Dusart's engraved cycle of months. With his sardonic, moralistic approach, Dusart depicts not labor but constant and consistent raucous misbehavior and drunken revelry. A cautionary note is added as his loutish skaters speed recklessly toward cracked ice.

The series of prints by Jacques Callot takes, as did that of Bruegel, a high vantage point, or a look downward on the village setting, as from a benevolent god. The months of Callot, however, share that perspective with an onlooker: a standing man on the crest of the hill, a single, parenthetical figure who, like the artist, might be commentator to this particular view of the lives of his fellows. Callot's countryman Jean Mariette saw rural life as pure and charmingly pastoral. Gentle rejoicing marked the village year. Resting gratefully from hard work, comely, nicely dressed peasants enjoy the fruit they have picked or find diversissements in rowing on the lake where clothes are washed or dancing in the fields.

Time and timelessness were explored by Pierre-Antoine Patel II in landscape months painted for the headquarters of the Jesuit order in Paris in 1699. As the year passed in eternal motion and continual change, he revealed ancient monuments fallen into ruin and the creations of nature and man counterpoised and frozen in time like icy winter. Although many artist-engravers still depicted the months as rural labors, their pictorial representation had become a subject for personal exegesis that was completely dissociated from a calendar function.

About a century later, in 1792, the structure of the human environment was dismantled in revolution and a new calendar given to the French nation. Time began again with the year 1, which was divided into 12 months of 3 decades, each of which was named according to natural phenomena of climate and season: for spring, Germinal (germination), Floréal (flowering), and Prairial (meadows). Female figures dressed like Roman goddesses returned the idiom to simple allegory in prints by Louis Lafitte. Ventôse, in a sleeveless chemise and holding a fishing rod and a basket with her catch (the sign of Pisces), clutches the scarf that has been blown from her shoulder by the late winter wind.

The first almanacs were published in China, where the months were represented by deities bearing baskets of flowers appropriately blooming. Widely disseminated in the West after 1500, almanacs were printed on an annual basis, and the calendar was specific to the days and months of real time. The calendar portion, conjoining aspects religious and scientific, maintained its Christian function as a reminder of feast and holy days and a reinforcer of spiritual authority through prayers and moral instruction in the text. Astronomical and agricultural information required the pictured labors of humans marking the months to be seen in a secular setting. As the forerunners of journals and magazines, the material in these volumes varied according to readership. The volumes intended for peasants usually provided their only source of written information.

By the seventeenth century, innovation appeared in the subject matter of almanac illustrations, which began to reflect the contemporary interests of the wealthy and literate. Concurrently issued were a Parisian calendar, with etched portraits of the French royal family framed as the literal headpiece to each month, and a peasant calendar, such as Almanach des Bergers with its rough woodcuts inherited from the medieval tradition and reused unchanged through the eighteenth century. Almanac illustration for the learned public was concerned with immediacy. Daniel Chodowiecki, working in the mid-eighteenth century, created a vast quantity of engravings for German almanacs and calendars by using current events and contemporary literary narratives as well as the latest fashion news. In France, the earlier print cycles of the brothers Bonnard or Pierre Valleran had featured modishly attired aristocratic women as the icons of the months, posed with the symbolic objects indicative of the labors. The association of women with changing fashions according to a monthly schedule was more pronounced and even encouraged in the many almanacs prepared for ladies.

One of these ladies almanacs, Le Petit Modiste Français, dédié aux Dames (Paris, Le Fuel, 1822), had 12 colored plates, each of a woman well dressed in clothes suited to the weather, with the only lettering the name of the month. Like other commercial books since the Livre Commode, later titled Almanac du Commerce de Paris, and the almanacs published by individual merchants as advertisements, it listed addresses for those who sold specialized services and products. In the nineteenth century, the profusion of women's monthly periodicals, aided by this association of fashionable women and the cachet of Paris, used fashion plates to correlate the timely image and the purchase of yet more finery. The months no longer represented male agricultural work but female embellishment.

In the United States, the Brown & Bigelow Company, printers of calendars since 1897, introduced the "calendar girl" as an independent subject in 1904. Thereafter, the appealing image of an attractive young woman was used to promote products through calendar advertising, as did Coca-Cola in 1922. Unlike fashion plates, however, references to time or temperature were gradually eliminated, the most conspicuous example being the bathing suit worn through the course of the year. More significantly, whereas the models initially suggested enjoyment for all who used the advertised merchandise, the calendar girls, by emphasizing attractiveness and thereby attracting attention, themselves became the product. Furthermore, their predecessors' purpose was to provide fashion information to women about their appearance; the pinup is a promotional form intended to entice male viewers to buy in order to look, and what is sold is an attitude.

At present, only those calendars with pictures of landscapes, nature photography, or fine art reproductions show concordance with a time of year or a vision of nature unaltered like a lost paradise. Holidays, the descendants of feast days and sacred celebrations, are marked by greeting cards marketed in turn year-round. Such cards best illustrate the maxim: If they didn't already exist, holidays would have to be invented. Originating in the mid-nineteenth century with Christmas and soon after with sentiments for sweethearts on St. Valentine's Day, greeting cards were developed by printers of advertising calendars.

The year has been visualized as a circle, ceaselessly revolving in recurring cycles. Familiar themes from Bruegel's village appear in Anno's Counting Book for preschoolers, in which each two-page spread is a wordless month bustling with activity. The building of the town progresses from one picture to the next. As the months and the weather change, the town and its population grow. By the year's end, the story, like the town, is completed, a concept not present in the separate occupations conventionalized as the months in art. Only in this book for young children is work a sign of progress that is seen to a logical and satisfying conclusion.

See also Harvesting; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Peasantry; Zodiac

Selected Works of Art

Antiquity

- Hagios Eleutherios (Panagia Gorgopiko)*, frieze, first century B.C., Athens, Greece, Little Metropolitan Church
- Floor Mosaic*, early sixth century, Argos, Israel, Villa of the Falconer
- Mosaic Pavement*, sixth century, Beisan, Israel, El Hamman
- Circular Calendar*, ninth century, Vatican, Vatican Library

Architectural Cycles

- Sculptured Slabs "Porta dei Mesi,"* twelfth century, Ferrara, Italy, Museo del Duomo
- Sculpted Capitals*, twelfth century, Brescia, Italy, Museo Civico, Età Cristiana
- Reliefs on Architrave of Porch*, twelfth century, Verona, Italy, San Zeno
- Reliefs on Archivolts of Portal*, twelfth century, Argenton-le-Château, France, St. Gilles
- Giraldus, Relief on Tympanum of Portal, twelfth century, Bourges, France, St. Ursin
- Baptismal Font*, twelfth–thirteenth century, St. Evroult-de-Montfort, France, Church of St. Evroult-de-Montfort

Illuminated Manuscripts

- Mss. Acq. e doni 181*, eleventh century, Florence, Italy, Laurentian Library
- Ms. 614*, twelfth century, Oxford, Bodleian Library
- Queen Mary's Psalter*, early fourteenth century, London, British Museum (Ms. Royal 2B VII)
- Peterborough Psalter*, circa 1320, Cambridge, England, Corpus Christi College (Ms. 53)
- Belleville Breviary*, circa 1325, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
- Luttrell Psalter*, circa 1340, London, British Museum (MS. lat. 10483)

Limbourg Brothers, and Jean Colombe, Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (Ms. 65)

Bedford Master, follower of, circa 1430, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery (MS. 285)

Bening, Simon, Da Costa Hours, circa 1515, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M 399)

Bening, Simon, Heures de Hennessy, circa 1520–1530, Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale de Belgique

Low Countries, Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries

Orley, Bernaert van, The Hunts of Maximilien, drawings, circa 1525; tapestries, circa 1531, Paris, Louvre

Orley, Bernaert van, School of, The Months of Lucas, tapestries, circa 1535, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Hunters in the Snow, 1565, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Gloomy Day, 1565, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Return of the Herd, 1565, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Haymaking, 1565, Prague, Czech Republic, National Gallery

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Harvesters, 1565, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Engraved Cycles: Cornelis Dusart, Hans Bol, Frederick Bloemaert, Jan van de Velde, Jacob Matham, Jost Amman, Crispijn de Passe, Julius Goltzius, Adriaen Collaert, Jeremias Falck, Peter van der Borch IV

French Cycles, Seventeenth Century

Jacques Callot, Abraham Bosse, Jean Mariette, Jean Bonnard, Nicolas Bonnard, Pierre Valleran, Antoine Trouvain, Pierre-Antoine Patel II

Almanacs and Calendars

Kalendarium, 1499–1512, Augsburg, Germany

Almanach des Bergers, fourteenth–twentieth century, Paris, Liège

Oxford Almanack, 1634–present, Oxford, England

Almanach de la Toilette et la coëffure des dames françaises, 1777–1779, Paris, Chez Desnos

Gravelot, Hubert, Almanachs iconologiques, 1765–1781, Paris

Almanach de la Cour de la Ville et des Departments 1806–1848, Paris, Chez Janet

Grevin, A., and Adrien Huart, Almanach de Parisiennes, 1870–1899, Paris, Dépôt Central des Almanachs Publiés à Paris

Pelletan, Édouard, Almanach du Bibliophile, 1898–1903, Paris

Meynial, Jules, La Guirlande des Mois, 1917–1922, Paris

Boy Scout Calendar, 1925–1975, St. Paul, Minnesota, Brown & Bigelow

Further Reading

Åkerström-Hougen, Gunilla, The Calendar and Hunting Mosaics of the Villa of the Falconer in Argos, Stockholm, Sweden: Svenska Institute, 1974

Alexander, Jonathan, “Labeur and Paresse,” Art Bulletin LXXII:3 (September 1990)

Andries, Lise, “Almanacs: Revolutionizing a Traditional Genre,” Revolution in Print, edited by Robert Darnton and Daniel Roche, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1989

Gordon, Olga Koseleff, “Two Unusual Calendar Cycles of the Fourteenth Century,” Art Bulletin XLV:3 (September 1963)

Lehmann, Karl, “The Dome of Hell,” Art Bulletin XXVII:1 (March 1945)

Levi, Doro, “The Allegories of the Months in Classical Art,” Art Bulletin XXIII:4 (December 1941)

Parker, Richard Anthony, The Calendars of Ancient Egypt, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1950

Pearsall, Derek, and Elizabeth Salter, Landscapes and Seasons of the Medieval World, London: Paul Elek, 1973

Webster, James Carson, The Labors of the Months in Antique and Medieval Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1938

Wieck, Roger S., Time Sanctified: The Book of Hours in Medieval Art and Life, New York: Braziller, 1988

Willard, James F., “Occupations of the Months in Medieval Calendars,” The Bodleian Quarterly Record 7:74 (1932)

MUSIC

Yona Pinson

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Music:

APOLLO

ORPHEUS

IMMORTALITY

DAVID

PRAISE OF GOD: SACRED AND CELESTIAL MUSIC

MUSIC: TRANSCIENCE AND FUTILITY

MUSIC AND LOVE: HARMONY

MUSIC AND LOVE: LUST AND CORRUPTION

PERSONIFICATIONS OF
MUSIC

Achilles Painter, A Muse with a Lyre Seated on the Mount Helicon with a Nightingale on the Ground, circa 440 B.C., red-figured, white-ground lekythos from Attica, Lugano, Switzerland, Von Schoen Collection. (Courtesy Max Hirmer)

Music oft hath such a charm
To make bad good, and good provoke to harm.
(William Shakespeare, Measure for Measure)

Music has been assigned conflicting attributes from the very beginning of Western culture. Symbolically, this conflict has often split the concept of music into the mythical realm of Orpheus and Apollo's stringed instruments versus the wind instruments of Dionysus/Bacchus, Eros, and Venus. Music in the former sense was thought to represent the sublime, the divine, and relate to Pythagorean measure, reason, and harmony. The latter, contrasting concept of music thought of it as an orgiastic, sensual, low form of expression that evoked bestial passions and stimulated sinfulness. This dichotomous legacy, invested with moral significance, has been emphasized throughout Christian and humanistic thinking.

In the Middle Ages, music was considered part of the quadrivium (the arts of science and measure), a Pythagorean concept championed by the Roman philosopher Boethius and adopted by the fathers of the Roman Catholic Church, as evident in their theological, poetical, and mystical texts. St. Augustine's treatise De Musica (fourth century) is related to the quadrivium concept: music signifies measure and symbolizes the harmonious movement of the celestial spheres. St. Augustine also stressed that music without measure—that is, without science—signified corruption. This concept is expressed in church decorations and illuminated manuscripts from the twelfth century on, in which depictions of music relate it to measure and harmony through its personification as one of the liberal arts, as well as its association with the heavenly spheres. Music was, at that time, regarded as the perfect vehicle through which to praise God: the Gloria in Excelsis said to be sung by the angels was a symbol of eternity. Musical activity is often on the side of vice rather than virtue, however, as reflected mainly through marginal decorations referring to lust as human folly.

Apollo

Apollo, the Greek and Roman god of music, was said to dwell on Mount Parnassus. He was envisioned as playing a lyre and acted as the personification of music, poetry, learning, and science. In the drawing Apollo in the Garden of Arts and Science (before 1605) by Jan van der Straet, Apollo holds a lyre and plectrum and sits in front of Mount Helicon with the Muses around him.

The story of Apollo and Marsyas is told by Ovid (Metamorphoses, 6:382–400; Fasti, 6:703–708) and Philostratus the Younger (Imagines, 2). Marsyas, a satyr who was one of Bacchus's companions, was charmed by the sounds of the aulos (flute), an instrument that Athena/Minerva rejected and upon which she laid a curse. Marsyas, innocent victim of the curse, was challenged by Apollo, who was irritated by the harsh sounds of the flute, to a musical contest of pipe versus lyre. This competition between the noble music of the stringed instrument (lyre) and the low music of the wind instrument (aulos) ended, naturally, in the victory of the lyre. As punishment Apollo had Marsyas flayed alive. The contest and Marsyas's punishment are usually depicted as separate scenes. Marsyas typically plays a traditional double-flute, occasionally replaced in Renaissance representations by a syrinx (panpipe). In classical antiquity and the Renaissance, the contest took on a symbolic meaning. The pure, elevated tone of strings was thought to have spiritual, ethical, and intellectual qualities, while the coarse, sensual sound of a wind instrument was related to blind passion and corruption. Thus, Athena's rejection of the aulos became an allegorical act of reason.

Apollo Musagetes (Apollo as represented in the act of playing the lyre while accompanied by the Muses) is a classical source of artistic inspiration, as in Dante's Il paradiso in The Divine Comedy (1472, written 1307–1321), in which the poet addresses Apollo Musagetes and asks him for help. In Raphael's Parnassus (1508–1511) in the Stanza della Segnatura in the Vatican, Apollo plays a lira de braccio (lyre) while accompanied by the Muses and an assembly of ancient and modern poets.

The lira de braccio became an emblem of Musicae and Poesia, personifications of music and poetry respectively, two of the seven liberal arts. Its seven strings became associated with the cosmological symbolism of music, representative of the seven spheres (Zarlino, Le istituzioni harmoniche, Venice, Italy, 1558). Raphael's rendering of Apollo's lira da braccio has nine strings, a possible reference to the nine Muses but perhaps also to the nine Greek modes. In playing the nine strings, Apollo was thought to move the Muses: "residing among them he embraces the Universe" (Natalis Comes, Mithologiae libri decem, Padua, Italy, 1616).

Nicolas Poussin also used Apollo's sublime music as the source of poetic inspiration in his Apollo and the Muses (Parnassus) (circa 1632), and his two versions of the Inspiration of the Poet (circa 1677) in Hannover, Germany, and the Louvre in Paris. In the Louvre version, Apollo's lyre has no strings—one can only imagine an inner music made by plucking.

The theme of the inspired musician is rather rare in painting. There is an allegorical portrait by Andrea Sacchi (circa 1648) that shows the famous musician and singer Marcantonio Pasqualini crowned by Apollo. The pendant to this is a painting of Marsyas lasciviously playing his bagpipes (in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York).

Orpheus

Like Apollo, Orpheus, the legendary Thracian musician and poet, was said to be endowed with magical and divine powers. Through his music he calmed the ferocious forces on Earth and in Hades by defeating the agents of evil, such as the sirens and the dragon of Colchis, who guarded the Golden Fleece.

The subject of Orpheus charming and calming nature with his music (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 10:84–105) became a popular one in Greco-Roman culture: it decorates many floor mosaics, mural paintings (Pompeii, Italy), and art objects. Orpheus is almost always portrayed with a young, beardless, and dreamy face; seated on a rock under a tree; and holding a lyre or a kithara (like a lyre, but larger) and a plectrum. Since the Greco-Roman period, this scene of Orpheus beneath a tree has been imbued with allegorical meanings and used as a symbol of a peaceful, paradisiacal era when wild and tame animals would live side by side (Macrobius, Commentarii in Somnium Scipionis, II, 3, 7). This messianic motif was adopted by Jewish and early Christian artists to illustrate Isaiah's prophecy that "the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid" (Isaiah 11:6–9). The symbolic figure of Orpheus can be compared to another messianic musician, King David, as in the Gaza synagogue mosaic and the Dura-Europos wall painting in Syria. Early representations of Jesus Christ as a shepherd sitting among his flock, holding a lyre, derive from the Orphic image, such as the Good Shepherd lunette of the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia in Ravenna, Italy.

This concept of peaceful and purifying Orphic music was one set against that of orgiastic, Dionysiac music. In a Jerusalem floor mosaic now in the Archeological Museum in Istanbul, Turkey, the viewer can see Orpheus among wild animals, a centaur, and Pan holding his syrinx. The moralizing legacy of the Orphic myth can be traced first to the writings of Cassiodorus, and later to Ovid's Moralisée. It was eventually adopted by Renaissance humanists (Dante, Il convivio, II, 1, 3; Marsilio Ficino, Opera, 318; Poliziano, Orpheus, 1480). The moralistic quality of Orphic music was expressed in many Renaissance works, especially in Neoplatonic circles and at the court of Lorenzo de' Medici. Bertoldo di Giovanni, Lorenzo's court sculptor, made a series of bronze plaques devoted to the Orphic myth (circa 1480) as well as a lyric statuette, now in the Bargello in Florence, Italy, of Orpheus playing a lira da braccio, eyes uplifted toward divine inspiration.

When Orpheus descended into Hades to deliver his beloved Eurydice, his music was said to overcome infernal forces and momentarily change the course of time (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 10:11–16). Pluto, god of the underworld, and his queen Persephone were charmed by Orpheus's playing. This scene has been portrayed on a cassone (a marriage chest for dowry) by Jacopo del Sellaio (fifteenth century), on a plaque (fifteenth century) by Giovanni, and in a drawing (before 1611) by Bartholomaeus Spranger at the Germanisches Nationalmuseum in Nürnberg, Germany.

During the Renaissance, the scene of Orpheus in the underworld became part of a larger humanist-religious iconographic program. Luca Signorelli's decoration in Orvieto Cathedral in Italy (1500) is dedicated to the Five Last Things, an expression of a reformist tendency and Neoplatonic attitudes. A very interesting mix of Greco-Roman and Christian connotations is thus produced as Orpheus's deliverance of Eurydice is infused with allegorical meanings, as it was in Dante's Il purgatorio from The Divine Comedy and later by Ficino.

Immortality

Music and immortality have a long association. When played by the Muses as conducted by Apollo Musagetes, music was symbolic of the divine harmony of the spheres. In Greco-Roman theology, this motif was fused with the image of Phoebus (Apollo as the sun-god, center of the universe and source of life). The image of Apollo (or Orpheus) playing his lyre while accompanied by the Muses' music was one of redeeming promise. Sepulchral monuments in late antiquity are often decorated with this motif as a promise of immortality, as on the Roman Sarcophagus of the Muses in the Vatican Museum. Sometimes a representation of the purifying music of Apollo's lyre is contrasted with one of Marsyas's lascivious playing, a symbol of the souls that will not rise from Hades, as on the Roman Sarcophagus of Sidon in the Ny Carlsberg Glyptotek in Copenhagen, Denmark. Sometimes the Apollonian motif is combined with the image of Orpheus, a human who survived a journey into Hades. The idea that immortality is granted to those who dedicate themselves to the arts of music and poetry was expressed in many funerary monuments of late antiquity.

The ardent Renaissance interest in classical heritage and the concurrent discovery of Roman sarcophagi influenced quattrocento memorial monuments. The tendency to achieve a reconciliation of pagan and Christian doctrines of immortality and redemption can be seen in Ficino's influential work Theologica Platonica de Immortalitate Animarum (1480). The allegorical association of the Muses' music with salvation and immortality was also adopted by Filippino Lippi in decorating the Strozzi burial chapel (1497–1502) in Santa Maria Novella in Florence, in which pagan musical symbolism is combined with Christian salvational symbolism. Images of the Muses making music are accompanied by biblical inscriptions that promise eternal life, such as "The gift of God is the water of Life" (John 4:10). The metaphorical figure of Parthenice, related to Mantovano's poem of 1480 celebrating Mary playing a lyre, is modeled on a Muse, who is a pagan promise of immortality. A palm tree stands behind her, as a Christian emblem of triumph over death. With great virtuosity, Filippino combines the ancient doctrine of immortality with a Christian theological concept. The juxtaposition of virtue with the celestial music of the Muses confirms the Christian promise of salvation.

The Renaissance notion of music as a means of overcoming death is therefore inherited from classical theology, although it is sometimes completely transformed into a Christian idiom, such as when angels playing musical instruments accompany the dying or ascending Virgin. This subject is represented in Vittore Carpaccio's Death of the Virgin (early sixteenth century) in the Accademia in Venice, Italy; his The Assumption of the Virgin (early sixteenth century) in the National Gallery in London; and the Master of St. Lucy's Mary Queen of Heaven (Assumption) (late fifteenth century) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. Images of music-making angels symbolic of immortality and specifically related to Christ are seldom found. In the Missal of Henry of Chichester (circa 1200), an English illuminated manuscript in the John Rylands Library in Manchester, England (Ms. lat. 24 fol. 12), Christ steps out of a tomb holding the cross pennant of victory over death. He is flanked by angel-musicians, emblems of his immortality, an image that is unique to this iconographic program.

David

King David's music is similarly related to a messianic promise. David the psalmist, first composer of liturgical hymns and sacred music, personified the praise of God. His music was also said to have possessed therapeutic qualities. In the art of late antiquity and the early Middle Ages, scenes of David the shepherd playing his harp in a pastoral setting (I Samuel 16) are reminiscent of those of Orpheus charming the animals. In these scenes, David, the anointed and chosen son, incarnates a messianic promise and typifies Christ—God's son as the Good Shepherd. David sometimes plays a psaltery, which refers to Christ's body, while his kithara is related to Christ's Passion (Jacques-Paul Migne, Patrologia Latina, XXI:872; Ovid, Moralisée, X, 2925–2928). In late antique Judaism, David's harp was endowed with mystic meanings. According to some Talmudic legends, the strings were made out of the gut of the ram sacrificed by Abraham on Mount Moriah; at midnight they vibrated to call the royal psalmist to praise God.

David was the founder of the cult of music and liturgical hymns in the Tabernacle (I Chronicles 15:16ff; 16:7–24; II Chronicles 5:12–13) and devoted himself to God's service: "Seven times a day do I praise thee, because of thy righteous judgments" (Psalm, 119:164). David in praise of God is represented in works such as Jodocus van Winghe's David Singing God's Praise (before 1603) in the Episcopal Museum in Haarlem, The Netherlands, and Rembrandt van Rijn's King David in the Kaplan Collection in New York. In Pieter de Witte's David Singing God's Praise (before 1628) in the Frans Hals Museum in Haarlem, David the psalmist orders a congregation of saints to "sing unto the Lord a new song" (Psalm 149:1) and conducts a heavenly choir of angels and saints. In this composition, earthly and heavenly music are metaphorically joined. St. Ambrose compared the psalmist's singing to the harmony of the spheres (Migne, Patrologia Latina, XIV, 926) and according to Cassiodorus, celestial melodies were contained in David's music (Institutiones divinarum et humanarum litterarum, III). An early twelfth-century Psalter in the Bibliothèque Municipale in Metz, France (Ms. 14, fol. 1, now destroyed) depicted David playing heavenly melodies on his kithara, enthroned with personifications of the seasons and humors, seated within the concentric circles of the cosmos.

David playing his harp before Saul has also been frequently represented in works of art. Through his music, David was said to have delivered the tormented soul of Saul, the rejected king, from the spell of melancholia (I Samuel 16:23). Therapeutic functions have traditionally been ascribed to music, especially in the treatment of melancholy, such as in Johannes de Muris, Summa Musica (thirteenth century).

Musical healing has also been assigned moral meaning. John Calvin saw the healing of the tormented soul of King Saul as a victory over diabolical domination. In Rembrandt's David Before Saul (1656) in the Mauritshuis, in The Hague, The Netherlands, the delivered king grasps a curtain to wipe away his tears, showing that the music has indeed softened his disturbed spirit.

When the triumphant David returned from his battle with Goliath, the Israelite women came out singing, dancing, and playing music to praise him (I Samuel 18:6–7). This scene is depicted in Hendrick Terbrugghen's Triumphant David With Singers in the Raleigh, North Carolina, Museum of Art, and in Poussin's The Triumph of David in the Dulwich Picture Gallery in London. In Poussin's Victorious David (circa 1627) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, David is crowned by Victory as the triumphant warrior returns from battle with Goliath's head.

Praise of God: Sacred and Celestial Music

The image of celestial music from heavenly choirs derives from the ancient notion that the Muses' music was symbolic of the harmonious motion of the seven celestial spheres. An early Christian Apocrypha, Ascension of Isaiah (first century), describes the seven celestial circles as populated by angelic choirs singing in praise of God. This image later inspired Dante (Il purgatorio, XXX, 93). Beginning in the thirteenth century, the motif became associated with Mariological topics. It became widespread and was originally connected to September 6, the birth of the Virgin. At that time, laudes were flourishing all over Europe, sung in churches and processions in honor of Mary. Musical angels singing Gloria became a popular motif in Italy and the Netherlands in the fifteenth century. Examples of such representations include Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry (before 1415) in the Musée Condé in Chantilly, France; Fra Angelico's Coronation of the Virgin (1445) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence; and Robert Campin's Nativity (circa 1427) in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Dijon, France. Sometimes heavenly music played by the angels is opposed by bad music inspired by the devil. This dichotomy is expressed in the Annunciation (fol. 16) in Jean Pucelle's Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux (circa 1325) in the Cloisters at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, in which a choir of angels singing laudes is opposed by corrupt, music-making "pseudo-angels," who turn into demons in the marginal decorations.

In Virgin in Glory (before 1495), an apocalyptic image (Revelation 12:1–13) attributed to the artist Geertgen tot Sint Jans, the Virgin holds the Christ Child in the middle of an enormous, luminous glory of angels. This shining assembly is composed of a large number of angel-musicians who carry the instruments of the Passion and pennants inscribed sanctus (holy). This marvelous visualization of a heavenly angel choir arranged in concentric rings refers to the classical concept of the celestial spheres as it was interpreted in Christian theology. The Christ Child animatedly shaking a pair of bells may be seen as conducting, or even originating, the heavenly music. According to Gregory of Nyssa, God is the prime mover who generated the music of the universe by creating the harmonious motion of the spheres. Angels playing music in the Virgin's mandorla also suggest her immortality.

The Gloria Christi is also one of the great themes of religious music and painting. Apocalyptic liturgy refers to 24 enthroned elders in the vision of the mystic lamb (Revelation 5:6), and to a celestial choir of angels (Revelation 15). The elders praising the Lord "fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, . . . and they sung a new song" (Revelation 5:8–10). This messianic melody was accompanied by "the voice of many angels round about the throne . . ." (Revelation 5:11) singing the Lord's glory, as in the tympanum of St. Pierre (1136–1153) in Moissac, France, and Hans Memling's Saint John's Vision; The Mystic Marriage of St. Catherine (1479) in St. John's Hospital in Bruges, Belgium. In another apocalyptic vision, the Dutch illuminated manuscript The Choir of Seven Angels on the Crystal Sea, angels stand on a sea of glass and hold the harps of God to celebrate victory over the Beast (Revelation 15:2–4).

In Jan van Eyck's The Ghent Altarpiece (completed 1432), a choir of angels sings in a motet while accompanied by organ, harp, and violin. This image of celestial music refers to apocalyptic liturgy but may also be related to the Gloria Dei motif. On the floor, one can distinguish Christ's monogram IHS, the alpha and omega, and the abbreviation of Isaiah's messianic prophecy, AGALA, in glorification of the Lord. This Gloria Dei theme is also the subject of Memling's two Christ in Glory paintings—one at the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Strasbourg, France, the other at the Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunst in Antwerp, Belgium—in which the King of Kings is surrounded by singing and playing angels.

Music: Transience and Futility

Transience and futility are two themes associated with music that are amply illustrated in Western paintings. Music, the transient art of sounds, is often associated with time, death, and vanity. In Poussin's allegory The Dance of Human Life (1638–1639) in the Wallace Collection in London, a "ballet" is danced to the sound of Father Time's lyre. Two putti, one holding an hourglass and the other blowing bubbles (homo bulla), connote transience and futility. In an earlier work, Phaethon Before Helios in Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Poussin expresses vanity and the destructive powers of Time, who blows a wind instrument (Ovid, Metamorphoses II, 19ff).

Music-making is symbolically related to death as the triumph of Father Time. This idea is expressed in late medieval and Renaissance allegories, especially north of the Alps, and later in seventeenth-century emblematic still lifes. A drawing in the form of a diptych attributed to Albrecht Dürer in the British Museum in London and a similar later work by Baldung Grien in the Prado show three seductive women playing and singing from a polyphonic score, signifying transience, as they are pursued by a macabre image of Death. Hans Holbein's Dance of Death Alphabet in Basel, Switzerland, opens with a musical parade. The Orchestra of Death figures in many German and French prints of the Dance Macabre; a music-making skeleton dragging its victims is another common motif. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, emblems in northern Europe combined music-making, musical instruments, and music books with fading flowers, skulls, hourglasses, wine, bubbles, and other symbols of Vanitas Vanitatum as allegories of vanity.

The Allegory of Transitoriness, attributed to a pupil of Frans van Mieris and held in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands, is composed of a woman pointing to a skull that holds a musical score in its mouth, accompanied by the homo bulla and faded flowers motifs. In northern European humanist culture, the idea of vanity was so closely associated with music that it is not surprising to find musical instruments and scores inscribed with pessimistic citations from Ecclesiastes. Dutch seventeenth-century composer Jan Pietersz Swillink signed a canon with the words Vanitas vanitatum et omnia vanitas (Vanity, vanity all is vanity). Other musical scores are decorated with additional emblems of vanity such as skulls and flowers.

Musical instruments and books are often integrated into Dutch seventeenth-century vanitas portraits or vanitas self-portraits. Examples include Gerard Dou's The Artist in His Studio in the Staatliche Kunstsammlungen in Dresden, Germany, and Edwaert Colyer's emblematic self-portrait (before 1702) in a private collection in Munich, Germany, in which the painter presents his late wife's portrait to the onlooker. An open score of funerary music is entitled Memento Mori, and a piece of paper emerging from a book bears the legend Vita brevis ars longa (life is short, art long). The still life on the table combines different vanitas emblems, such as a skull, musical instruments, a watch, a pipe, and the artist's palette. Music in vanitas allegories is sometimes found in conjunction with emblems that belong to the Vita Voluptuosa (life is full of pleasure). On the table before Colyer, a flute lies on a musical score showing a melody by Jacob van Eyck entitled The Flute of the Garden of Pleasure.

Music and Love: Harmony

"Love is always in the company of music" according to Giorgio Vasari. Music in visual representations can have one of two meanings when love is also concerned. It can signify sublime love, harmony, and concord. But most often visual references to music are related to the earthly Venus, the Roman goddess of love, or to the personifications Lust and Voluptia (Sensual Pleasure) in both religious and profane themes.

"Music unites—it creates harmony, agreement and love" was inscribed on a seventeenth-century clavichord. In Renaissance and Baroque painting, a musical duet in the form of portraits of couples became a metaphor of love and harmony. In family portraits, music symbolized concordia (harmony), especially in northern Baroque painting, as in The Van Bercheman Family Portrait by Frans Floris in the Wuyts-Van Campen en Baron Cavoly en Timmermans Museum in Lier, Belgium, which has an inscription on the frame that calls attention to the concordia symbolism. Sometimes the music played in family concert scenes is religious. In Abraham van den Tempel's Portrait of the Family of David Leeuwe (before 1672) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, the family is about to perform a religious song.

Music and Love: Lust and Corruption

In descriptions of voluptuousness, musical instruments were often used as symbols of love. Sexual significance had been attributed to wind instruments since antiquity, and later to some string instruments as well. Late medieval and Renaissance astrologers believed that musicians of all kinds, together with lovers, were among the “children of Venus.”

During the “psychomachia” of the early Middle Ages, Luxuria (the personification of Luxury) began to inherit Venus’s attributes. In a twelfth-century rendering on a capital in Saint Nicholas Church in La Chaize-le-Vicomte, Vendée, France, she is armed with a mirror and flowers, especially roses, and accompanied by Venus’s children—musicians inciting lascivious passions. In Renaissance “psychomachia” representations, a naked Venus making music, or accompanied by musicians, personifies Voluptia, in opposition to Minerva, who personifies Prudentia (Prudence). This can be seen in Baldung Grien’s Music and Prudence in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, and Peter Vischer the Younger’s Virtue and Voluptia in the Kupferstichkabinett in Berlin.

In the Tabletop of Seven Deadly Sins (circa 1490), Hieronymus Bosch inserted his Luxuria in reversal of the utopian Garden of Love, where music had originally been related to harmony. In Luxuria, musical instruments are emblems of lust and diabolical temptation. They become instruments of torture in his Musical Hell from The Garden of Earthly Delights (early sixteenth century), in which the lustful are tormented and an infernal choir is condemned to sing eternally from the notes inscribed on the posterior of a damned soul half buried under a giant lute-gallows. Bosch adopted a diabolical music-making motif from medieval marginal decorations and made it a dominant element in a world haunted by evil, filled with demons playing musical instruments and inciting lust and blowing shawms to accompany a lovers’ duet (The Haywain Triptych in the Prado).

In northern European humanistic writings, music was related to sensual love and folly (Sebastian Brant, Ship of Fools, 1497). Erasmus attacked secular music, especially amorous and “lascivious melodies” (Opera omnia, VI, col. 731). Bosch was also the forerunner of secular moralist genre painting, which flourished in the Netherlands for two centuries. In his various versions of Merry Makers, music-making has a principal role in stimulating lascivious behavior (Ship of Fools [circa 1500], A Concert in an Egg [before 1516], Merry Makers in a Carnival Celebration, Carnival, etc.).

In Italian Renaissance and Baroque painting, the corruptive power of music is veiled in more sophisticated mythological references. Musical themes were especially favored in Venice. Titian painted several versions of Venus in the company of a musician. In his Venus and a Lute Player in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, an admirer plays a serenade before a naked reclining Venus. She holds a suggestive recorder (a “low” instrument), while a viola da gamba stands waiting to be played, a motif later adopted by Caravaggio, Jan Vermeer, and many others. In Paolo Veronese’s Concert, now in the Palazzo Ducale in Venice, an erotic concert is played by three beautiful young women inspired by Amor—thus “Amor is born from music” and is always “in the company of music.”

In Caravaggio’s The Concert (1594) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, three seminude youths are engaged in making music. The musical party has been inspired by Eros, who holds a bunch of grapes in a Bacchic gesture, and it has an allegorical appearance to it. (“Music and wine are associated with the company of Bacchus” [Cesare Ripa, Iconologia, 1603].) In his Lute Player, Caravaggio combines hints of homoerotic seduction with vanitas references such as fading flowers and overripe fruits. The lute here becomes an erotic messenger. In a Dutch seventeenth-century emblem book Neuwe Nederduytsche Gedichten (1624) in Leiden, The Netherlands, a lute played by a woman symbolizes feminine sexuality. In many Netherlandish compositions of the seventeenth century this image is related to erotic seduction, as in Dirck van Barburen’s The Procureess (1622) in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston; Philippe van Dirck’s Woman Playing the Lute, a personification of Luxuria in the Mauritshuis in The Hague; and in a large number of “Duet,” “Merry Company,” and brothel scenes, among others.

In Gabriel Rollenhagen’s Nucleus Emblematum (1611) in Cologne, Germany, Cupid holds a lute and points at music-making lovers in the background. Temptation through music, the invitation to a “love duet,” was a subject formulated in moralist emblematic literature, a subject that became a common theme in seventeenth-century northern European art (Dirck van Barburen, Jan Molenaer, Jan Steen, Vermeer, and many others). In Jacob Cat’s Quid non sentit Amor emblem Sinne en Minne beelden (1615), a man playing a lute invites a woman to pick up the second lute and join him in a “love duet.”

Wind instruments had a phallic significance. Pipes, recorders, shawms, and especially bagpipes were related to dissolute life. “When the bagpipe is pumping up one sings better,” says a sixteenth-century Flemish proverb. Since antiquity, wind instruments had also been considered Bacchic attributes. In seventeenth-century iconography, pipe instruments were related to bucolic erotic imagery (Rembrandt’s Uylenspiegel [before 1699], for example), which inspired Antoine Watteau’s L’Indiscret in the Boymans-van Beuningen Museum in Rotterdam.

Musical divertimenti in secular or semisecular representations are infused with erotic symbolism, denoting corruption and vanity and illustrating a state of sin. Examples of this include many sixteenth- and seventeenth-century scenes of the Prodigal Son in taverns and brothels, Gardens of Love, Fêtes Galants, Mankind Before the Last Judgment, and Mankind Before the Flood. In seventeenth-century Calvinist Dutch society, music was so closely associated with lascivious behavior that brothels were surnamed musicus.

Music’s corrupting power is often associated with Eros and Bacchus. In Maerten van Heemskerck’s didactic allegory Triumph of Bad Music (mid-sixteenth century) in the Prentenkabinet in Leiden, a triumphal procession opens with a group of male figures singing from a large choir book bound to a satyr’s back, followed by Vices such as Desire (Eros) and Pleasure. Musicae’s car is followed by personifications of Waste of Time, Waste of Money, Sloth, and Foolish Liberality. Drunkenness is drawing Bacchus’s car, while his goblet is being filled by Immoderatio (Appetite), who is followed by Poverty.

Music under the spell of Eros and Bacchus is thus thought to be intended for “ignorant ears,” its results said to be adultery, drunkenness, and misery. Such “bad” music is contrasted in the inscriptions with “good” (harmonious) music in the form of the celestial liturgy.

Personifications of Music

During the Renaissance and Counter-Reformation, St. Cecilia became the patroness of sacred music. She is usually portrayed playing an instrument, most often the organ. The belief that St. Cecilia rejected earthly instruments for heavenly music is presented in some works. In Raphael's Santa Cecilia (1513–1514) in the Pinacoteca Nazionale in Bologna, the figure of St. Cecilia, inspired by a heavenly angelic choir, is set against the broken musical instruments that she has repudiated, some of which refer to Bacchic motifs.

Musicae, one of the Seven Liberal Arts, is typically portrayed as a woman playing an instrument. According to Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, this should be a woman who holds Apollo's lyre with both hands and has various musical instruments at her feet. Ripa elsewhere describes Musicae tuning an angelica while accompanied by a nightingale, another symbol of music, “for the marvelous effects of his voice.” This image, based on ancient representations of Musicae, influenced Laurent de la Hyre's Music (before 1656). But the words of the song on the music score in this painting also associate music with love and wine, Eros and Bacchus, and therefore stress the old dichotomy between the sublime and corrupting characters of music. In Theodor van Thulden's Allegory of Music (before 1669) in the Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts in Brussels, Belgium, an Eros holding the torch of love crowns Musicae with Venus's roses. Historically, this sends us back to a Martianus Capella poem, one of the first medieval formulations of Musicae, in which he describes Musicae leading a procession of gods, poets, and musicians, among them Orpheus, Amor, and Voluptas.

See also Death; Luxury; Margins/Outsiders; Melancholy; Vanity/Vanitas

Selected Works of Art

Apollo

- Raphael, Apollo and Marsyas, ceiling fresco, 1508, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura
 Raphael, Parnassus, fresco, 1508–1511, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura, Straet, Jan van der, Apollo in the Garden of Arts and Sciences, drawing, before 1605, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Teylers Museum
 Poussin, Nicolas, Apollo and the Muses (Parnassus), circa 1632, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Ribera, Jusepe de, Apollo and Marsyas, 1637, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale de Martino
 Poussin, Nicolas, Inspiration of the Poet, circa 1677, Paris, Louvre; Hannover, Germany

- Moreau, Gustave, Hesiodus and the Muse, before 1898, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Hugo, Jean, The Poet and the Muse, 1923, private collection

Orpheus

- Orpheus Charming the Animals*, Roman floor mosaic, Palermo, Italy
 Giovani, Bertoldo di, Orpheus Playing a Lira de Braccio, late fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Spranger, Bartholomaeus, Orpheus Before Pluto, drawing, before 1611, Nürnberg, Germany, Germanisches Nationalmuseum

Immortality

- Sarcophagus of the Muses*, Vatican, Vatican Museums
 Lippi, Filippino, Strozzi Chapel, 1497–1502, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella Master of St. Lucy Legend, Mary Queen of Heaven (Assumption), late fifteenth century, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Carpaccio, Vittore, The Assumption of the Virgin, early sixteenth century, London, National Gallery

David

- Winghe, Jodocus van, David Singing God's Praise, before 1603, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Episcopal Museum
 Witte, Pieter de, David Singing God's Praise, before 1628, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Episcopal Museum;
 Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Rembrandt van Rijn, David Before Saul, 1656, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Victorious David, circa 1627, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Praise of God: Sacred and Celestial Music

- Gloria Christi, The Twenty-Four Elders*, tympanum sculpture, 1136–1153, Moissac, France, St. Pierre
The Choir of the Seven Angels on the Crystal Sea, Dutch Apocalypse, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. Neer 3)
 Campin, Robert, Nativity, circa 1427, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts Angelico, Fra, Coronation of the Virgin, 1445, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Memling, Hans, Saint John's Vision; The Mystic Marriage of Saint Catherine, triptych, 1479, Bruges, Belgium, St. John's Hospital
 Geertgen tot Sint Jan, Virgin in Glory, before 1495, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Boymans-van-Beuningen Museum

Music: Transience and Futility

- Rouge, Nicolas le, Dance Orchestra of Death, from La Grant Danse Macabre, Troyes, France
 Holbein, Hans, Dance of the Death Alphabet, Basel, Switzerland
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Dance of Human Life, 1638–1639, London, Wallace Collection
 Colyer, Edwaert, Self-Portrait, before 1702, Munich, Germany, private collection

Music and Love: Harmony

- Tempel, Abraham van den, Portrait of the Family of David Leeuwe, before 1672, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Le Chant d'Amour, 1868–1877, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Music and Love: Lust and Corruption

- Luxuria*, capital, circa twelfth century, La Chaize-le-Vicomte, Church
- Bosch, Hieronymus, Luxuria, from Tabletop of Seven Deadly Sins, circa 1490, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Bosch, Hieronymus, Musical Hell, from The Garden of Earthly Delights, early sixteenth century, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Bosch, Hieronymus, Ship of Fools, circa 1500, Paris, Louvre
- Bosch, Hieronymus, A Concert in an Egg, before 1516, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Heemskerck, Maerten van, Triumph of Bad Music, mid-sixteenth century, Leiden, The Netherlands, Prentenkabinet
- Caravaggio, The Concert, 1594, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Vermeer, Jan, The Concert, circa 1600, Boston, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, now missing
- Vermeer, Jan, The Music Lesson, circa 1600, London, Buckingham Palace
- Barburen, Dirck van, The Procuress, 1622, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Ochtervelt, Jacob, Violinist and Two Serving Women, circa 1663–1665, Manchester, England, City Art Gallery
- Ochtervelt, Jacob, The Music Lesson, 1671, Chicago, Art Institute
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Uylenspiegel, before 1669, engraving
- Picasso, Pablo, The Pipes of Pan, 1923, Paris, Musée Picasso
- Picasso, Pablo, Pan Pipe Players and Erotic Figures, 1923, private collection
- Picasso, Pablo, L'Aubade, 1942, Paris, Centre Pompidou
- Picasso, Pablo, Bacchanal, 1955, Paris, Musée Picasso
- Picasso, Pablo, Reclining Nude with a Man Playing Guitar, 1970, Paris, Musée Picasso
- Picasso, Pablo, Flute Player and a Female Nude, 1970, Paris, Galerie Leiris

Personifications of Music

- Musicae with Pythagoras*, Portal of the Seven Liberal Arts, twelfth century, Chartres, France, Cathedral
- Raphael, Santa Cecilia, 1513–1514, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca

- Caravaggio, Allegory of Music, circa 1595, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Hyre, Laurent de la, Music, before 1656, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art; Dijon, France, Musée Magnin
- Thulden, Theodor van, Allegory of Music, before 1669, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts

Further Reading

- Barasch, Moishe, "The David Mosaic of Gaza," Assaph: Studies in Art History I (1980)
- Christiansen, Keith, A Caravaggio Rediscovered: The Lute Player, exhibition catalog, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1990
- Cumont, Franz Valéry-Marie, Recherches sur le symbolisme funéraire des Romains, Paris: Picard, 1949
- Ettlinger, Leopold David, "Muses and Liberal Arts," in Essays in the History of Art Presented to Rudolph Wittkower, London: Phaidon, 1967
- Fischer, Pieter, Music in Paintings of the Low Countries in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Swets and Zeitlinger, 1975
- Fumaroli, Marc, L'Inspiration du Poète de Poussin: Essai sur l'Allegorie de Parnasse, exhibition catalog, Paris: Louvre, 1989
- Leppert, Richard, The Sight of Sound: Music, Representation and the History of the Body, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1994
- Meyer-Baer, Kathi, "Musical Iconography in Raphael's Parnassus," The Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism VIII (1989)
- Pomme de Mirmonde, Albert, L'Iconographie musicale sous les Rois Bourbons: La Musique dans les Arts Plastiques, Paris: Picard, 1975
- Ovadia, Asher, and Sonia Mucznik, "Orpheus Mosaics in Roman and Early Byzantine Periods," Assaph: Studies in Art History I (1980)
- Scillia, Charles E., "Meaning of the Cluny Capitals: Music and Metaphor," Gesta XXVIII (1988)
- Walker, Daniel, "Orpheus the Theologian and Renaissance Platonists," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes XVI (1953)
- Winternitz, Emanuel, Musical Instruments and Their Symbolism in Western Art: Studies in Musical Iconology, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1979

NAKED/NUDE

Kathryn Moore Heleniak

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Naked/Nude:

ANCIENT

CLASSICAL

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba at Her Bath, 1654, oil on canvas, Paris, Louvre.
(Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

The two English words naked and nude describe the same human condition yet are often imbued with remarkably different meanings in Western art. British art historian Kenneth Clark observed in his influential book The Nude: A Study in the Ideal Form (1956), “To be naked is to be deprived of our clothes, the word implies some of the embarrassment most of us feel in that condition.” Whereas the term nude calls up not an unclothed real body but an idealized, “balanced, prosperous, and confident body: the body re-formed” (Kenneth Clark, p. 23). In other words, naked suggests the real, faulty, imperfect form of a specific individual ordinarily clothed and nude the idealized, perfected form of a human body that was never intended to be covered. Nakedness suggests vulnerability, nudity an easy, proud confidence in the human fleshly form. Despite these permutations of meaning, there is no firm demarcation between the terms, and they are often used interchangeably. But whether naked or nude, the unclothed human figure is not, properly speaking, an iconographic category. Rather, male and female nudes appear in numerous iconographic settings—historical, mythological, biblical, allegorical, and pornographic—and in genre scenes of everyday life. Given the enormous scope of the nude in art, and in light of the vast and constantly increasing literature on the subject, this essay simply directs readers to some of the key developments in the appearance of the nude and to the meanings and values attached to its appearance in art.

Many books, exhibitions, and articles have taken up the subject of the nude. Traditional art historical studies have tended to view the nude as an aesthetic object—a marker of “high art.” The fact that ancient Greek artists focused on the nude and that Greek civilization was in turn considered the font of Western culture only enhanced the association of the nude with high art in Western eyes. With the Renaissance and the rise of academic art theory in the fifteenth century, not only was the nude of antiquity revived and revalued but the nude male body became the centerpiece of professional training in the art academies. Thus, serious “Art with a capital A” became intrinsically associated with the study of the nude body and with its appearance in large ambitious works of art (Pevsner, Academies). Because until modern times women were excluded from these art academies (except as models in a later period), they were not (with rare exceptions) the creators of these nudes. However, they were often, and increasingly so from the seventeenth century onward, the nude subject favored by male artists.

Recent scholarship has focused on these gender issues. Feminist studies have deconstructed the idea of the neutral “aesthetic” nude, seeing it instead as a field of power politics, of domination and submission, where (until the twentieth century) male artists depicted male and female nudes for male patrons. The resultant images inevitably embodied or reflected patriarchal values: The active dominant role of men in society was contrasted with the passive role of women, who were depicted as objects of male desire. In his influential essay in Ways of Seeing (1972), British critic and writer John Berger stated his belief that women were often depicted as colluding with this role. As Berger observed, “Men act and women appear. Men look at women. Women watch themselves being looked at . . . thus she turns herself into an object—and most particularly an object of vision: a sight” (Berger, p. 47). This voyeuristic sight is inevitably eroticized. Indeed, much of the ambiguity and uneasiness associated with the nude in its various manifestations—its attraction and repulsion for viewers—hovers around its erotic appeal. In a society that associates nudity with the divine, or the spiritual—one thinks of ancient Greece or India, as, for example, the Yakshi figure Girl Playing with Balls of the first century B.C. in the National Museum in New Delhi, India—the nude is frank, triumphant, untroubled. In a society that associates nudity with sin, shame, and guilt, or the decadent fleshly world, as it has been historically in the Judeo-Christian context, the nude is fraught with unease, moral reprobation, or suffering. In the modern era, it is seen as a manifestation of social defiance.

The female nude, which has been almost synonymous with “the nude” in modern times, is a late arrival. One finds simplified, unclothed female forms in prehistoric art. These early sculptures are presumably mother-goddesses. Some have a rounded, overblown shape, like the so-called Venus of Willendorf (circa 25,000–20,000 B.C.) in the Naturhistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; others exhibit the simple, stark geometry of Cycladic female idols (circa 2500–1400 B.C.).

With Greek art, one encounters the first real flowering of the nude, and here the male nude predominates as god, hero, or athlete. The Greeks envisioned their male gods as beautiful human figures with strong, muscular, youthful forms, as in Apollo Belvedere of the fourth century B.C., known by its Roman copy of the first century B.C. in the Vatican Museums. Nude men in Greek art were tied to the appearance of nude men in Greek life. Public nudity for Greek men was the norm in athletic competitions and in the gymnasium. But even Greek depictions of human suffering were expressed by powerful nude forms with well-developed muscles writhing to express both physical and emotional pain, as in the statue Marsyas, a Roman copy of a Pergamene original (third century B.C.) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, and the Laocoön (circa first or second century A.D.) in the Vatican Museums.

Greek women, whose lives were restricted to the domestic sphere, were clothed in public. Their goddesses conformed to these clothed norms until the fourth century B.C., when Praxiteles sculpted his famous nude Aphrodite. The statue of the goddess of love was displayed in an open shrine on the island of Knidos. A Roman copy can now be seen in the Vatican Museums. This earliest (and thereafter extraordinarily influential) example shows the modest Venus (normally clothed) reaching for her drapery at her bath. Her nudity is circumstantial and momentary—unlike the permanent nude state of male gods. The viewer/voyeur must glimpse her before she restores her covering. The erotic appeal of this statue for male viewers is confirmed by early writings that describe men kissing the statue or leaving more telling stains behind after their visits to the shrine. This first nude Aphrodite/Venus, model to so many variations in ancient and post-Renaissance periods, established one of the most potent images of the female nude: the bather caught unaware, revealing and partially concealing her nude form. In later classical variations, the nude continued to reflect this so-called Venus Pudica pose, seen, for example, in the Venus de Medici (circa 150–100 B.C.) in the Louvre, where the figure's arms are used to shield while bringing attention to the breasts and pudendum. This modest pose had a very long afterlife in Western art, having its most famous resurrection in Botticelli's Birth of Venus (circa 1480), in the Uffizi Gallery. It migrated into other subjects as well, as can be seen in Giovanni Pisano's modest cardinal virtue, Temperance (or Chastity, 1300–1310), on the pulpit of the Cathedral of Pisa, or Masaccio's anguished Eve (1427) in the Brancacci Chapel in Sta. Maria del Carmine in Florence.

Although Aphrodite/Venus was the principal occasion for the female nude in Greek art, other themes also called for the female nude. Her companions, The Three Graces, appeared in the second century B.C. A Roman copy is in the Louvre in Paris. This composition features the elegant intertwining of three female nudes so as to reveal both the front and back views in one "sight." Raphael revived it in the Renaissance period in The Three Graces (1504–1505), now in the Musée Condé in Chantilly, France; not surprisingly, it remained a popular motif with male artists and patrons thereafter. In the seventeenth century, Peter Paul Rubens painted a memorable full-bodied example, now in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, with his typical abundant pink flesh. One can even see echoes of the subject without the obvious mythological tag (although surely with an intentional bow to the traditional theme) in the work of the impressionist and postimpressionist generation, as in Pierre-Auguste Renoir's Large Bathers (1884–1887) in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania, Paul Cézanne's Three Bathers (1879–1882) in the Musée du Petit-Palais in Paris, and Georges Seurat's Models (1886–1888) in the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania.

Less important female characters in Greek mythology—maenads (companions of Dionysus), dryads (wood nymphs), and Nereids (sea nymphs), who embodied "the irrational elements of human nature, the remnants of animal impulse that the Olympian religion had attempted to sublimate or to subdue" (Clark, p. 358)—could also appear nude or near-nude with streaming drapery falling away and displaying their bodies to full effect, as in the fourth-century B.C. Maenad, after Skopas, in Dresden, Germany. Nudity also characterized the women (prostitutes?) cavorting with lusty nude male companions in Orgy Scene on an early fifth-century B.C. Attic cup in the Louvre as well as the mythical Amazons, the ferocious female enemies of the Greeks whose public nakedness identified them as barbarians (i.e., uncivilized non-Greeks).

The Romans had little taste for the nude. Occasionally their emperors, once dead, could assume the idealized nude form of a god, as in the Emperor Trebonianus Gallus (251–253) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Of course, they engaged in wholesale copying of Greek nude originals, whether in sculpture or painting. The Roman copies played an extremely important role in the Renaissance revival of the antique nude in the fifteenth century by providing material examples of the ideal nude for Renaissance artists to emulate after centuries of its repression in the Middle Ages under the influence of Christian asceticism.

With the rise of Christianity, the nude was initially rejected because of its association with pagan idols. But more important, Christians associated the naked human body with shame, corruption, and sin, as indicated by a reading of the Old Testament. Genesis described Adam and Eve as innocent, unembarrassed nudes in Paradise until Eve yielded to temptation and persuaded Adam to eat the forbidden fruit. Then "the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons" (Genesis 3:7). Ejection from Paradise, mortality, pain in childbirth, and suffering accompanied Adam and Eve's recognition of their nakedness. A bronze relief, Adam and Eve Reproached by the Lord (1015), on the doors of the Hildesheim Cathedral, captures the mortification the naked Adam and Eve feel as they cringe and shield their bodies from God's sight (and ours). With their slender, awkward bodies so far removed from the classical ideal, these self-conscious figures exhibit an appropriately medieval abhorrence of human flesh.

Whereas the biblical story of Adam and Eve was one of the few subjects that required nudity in the medieval period (and it would continue to be an important subject for the display of the nude male and female form until modern times), for sheer numbers of nudes in medieval art one turns to the Last Judgment, which remained an important Christian theme through the Baroque period, fading thereafter. Taking up prominent positions on the facades of Romanesque cathedrals to warn Christians of their final reckoning, these scenes featured lumpy men and women, naked and vulnerable, plucked from their graves to be raised into heaven or, more dramatically, to be thrown by monstrous devils into the gaping jaws of hell, as in the Last Judgment on the west tympanum of Autun Cathedral in France (circa 1130–1135). The subject appeared in paintings as well with equally gruesome effect, as in Hubert and Jan van Eyck's Last Judgment (1425–1430), now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, with its writhing men and women who, naked before God, are the pawns of frightening creatures. This is one of a pair of panels, the other of which depicts the Crucifixion.

The Crucifixion is another important Christian theme that calls for the nude or nearly nude suffering human form, in this case the male form. Like Adam and Eve and the Last Judgment, it is established as an iconographic theme in the early Christian period, as in The Crucifixion and the Death of Judas (circa 420–500) in the British Museum in London. The Crucifixion begins to flourish only in the medieval period, however, and it remains a central Christian image up to the modern period. Thomas Eakins's The Crucifixion (1880) in the Philadelphia Museum of Art is an outstanding nineteenth-century example. In van Eyck's painting, the crucified Jesus Christ wears a very slight, transparent loincloth (revealing pubic hair and concealing very little of his human anatomy); his nakedness is made more emphatic in contrast to the neighboring two thieves, who sport significant drapery. Christ's nakedness underlines his vulnerability, his self-sacrifice. Art historian Leo Steinberg, in his controversial study The Sexuality of Christ in Renaissance Art and in Modern Oblivion (1983), takes up this theme of the previously ignored nakedness (or more commonly near-nakedness) of Christ not only in scenes of his Passion (the Crucifixion, the Flagellation, the Pietà, and the Entombment) but also in scenes of his Baptism and childhood. Steinberg emphasizes that these unclothed images of Christ were consciously introduced to manifest the human side of Christ's nature (the divine being taken for granted), which was made insistent by the depiction of the genital area. His genitalia (revealed or suggested) were a sign of his "manliness," his human nature.

One of the most beautiful examples of the naked Christ appears in the Renaissance in Michelangelo's sculpted Risen Christ (1514–1520) in Sta. Maria Sopra Minerva in Rome. Unlike the common, unclothed images of the suffering Christ of the Passion or the depictions of vulnerable, wounded, nearly naked male saints (e.g., innumerable St. Sebastians, beginning in the fifteenth century) whose states of anguished martyrdom reflect Christ's own suffering, this risen Christ is triumphant, muscular, and idealized; he adopts the heroic quality of the Greek gods of antiquity. Michelangelo's Christianized Neoplatonism allowed for his resurrection of the ancient ideal of the beautiful body as an appropriate embodiment of the divine. Moreover, in theological terms, Christ had no need to feel the shame of Adam and Eve's guilt; he was sinless. Indeed, his Crucifixion and Resurrection reopened the gates of Paradise for humanity. His nudity could be seen as a sign of human salvation (although Michelangelo's contemporaries were not comfortable with this nude imagery, as Steinberg argues). Michelangelo was devoted to the male nude in sculptural and painted form. (He is the only artist to warrant his own chapter in Margaret Walters's excellent survey The Nude Male, 1978.) The Sistine Chapel in the Vatican is filled with innumerable painted examples: the ceiling (1508–1512) with the mysterious ignudi and the stunning images of Adam (and unusually for him, the beautiful female nude Eve) and the Last Judgment (1534–1541) above the altar with its anguished tumbling, hovering nude forms. Renaissance artists such as Michelangelo looked back to ancient sculpture for models of what they might imitate or even surpass.

Donatello and Lorenzo Ghiberti had already revived the beautiful nude of antiquity in the fifteenth century, adapting it to biblical subject matter (although the subjects themselves did not call for the nude). Donatello's David (circa 1425–1430) in the Bargello in Florence, with his slender, lithe proportions and easy contrapposto stance, recalls the delicacy of Praxitelean sculptural norms, a nude delicacy that makes his conquest of Goliath (like Florence's own strength against its enemies) all the more miraculous. The nude state of Ghiberti's adolescent Isaac in his relief The Sacrifice of Isaac, also in the Bargello, underlines Isaac's vulnerability and makes Abraham's threatened execution of him all the more terrifying.

In the late fifteenth century, Italian artists revived mythological subjects and idealized/classicized nude forms with gusto. This was a more direct way for them to demonstrate their knowledge and admiration of the now-revered antiquity. One thinks of Botticelli's Birth of Venus (circa 1480) in the Uffizi Gallery with its central female nude adopting the pose of a classical Venus Pudica (albeit a very decorative, ornamental example). But this was no simple revival of the pagan goddess. Neoplatonic philosophy clothed her in a mystical new Christian meaning as a symbol of the birth of beauty in the mind of humankind. This was quite different from the tense, muscular male nudes in Antonio Pollaiuolo's Hercules canvases for the Medici Palace in Florence (1460). These canvases are now destroyed, but a smaller example, Hercules and the Hydra, is now in the Uffizi. Hercules' classical form and mien survived in the Middle Ages as the virtue Fortitude, as in Nicola Pisano's sculpted figure (circa 1260) on the pulpit of the Baptistery of Pisa (much like Temperance assumed the pose of the Venus Pudica on Giovanni Pisano's pulpit of the Cathedral of Pisa noted earlier). In Pollaiuolo's canvases, Hercules returns in his own heroic guise to symbolize the strength of Florence in the face of its enemies. In these and other works, Pollaiuolo displayed his profound understanding of male anatomy. His powerful figures look back to the sculpted figures of Greek warriors and athletes, but they also depended on the careful anatomical study of the human form that was undertaken by Renaissance artists.

Mythological scenes featuring the nude continued to inspire artists during the High Renaissance. Examples include Raphael's The Judgment of Paris (before 1520), known through Marcantonio Raimondi's engraving, and his previously mentioned The Three Graces; Leonardo da Vinci's now lost Leda and the Swan (before 1519); Michelangelo's sculpted adolescent Bacchus (circa 1496–1498) in the Bargello; and Correggio's Jupiter and Io (circa 1532) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna.

Northern European artists, under the influence of Italy, produced some especially striking examples of mythological scenes featuring the nude as well. Lucas Cranach the Elder painted charming, even fashionable Venuses displaying not only their small doll-like bodies through delicate transparent drapery but also stylish jewelry. An example of this is his Venus (1532) in the Städelsches Kunstinstitut in Frankfurt, Germany. No sense of higher philosophical meaning is evident here, nor is any latent Christian puritanism. Albrecht Dürer's depictions of Venus were less successful in adopting a classical ideal; somehow they continued to look like his study of an unclothed hausfrau, like his Nude (before 1528) in Bayonne, France. But Dürer's most important contribution to the iconography of the female nude was his woodcut Draftsman Drawing a Nude (1525) in the British Museum, which depicts the passive female model and the active male artist: The naked female model reclines while the clothed male artist actively creates art. The female nude is his raw "natural" material. This image recurs with great frequency in Western art up to the twentieth century (Pablo Picasso did many interpretations of the theme). In a sense, the theme of Pygmalion, so popular in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, is another manifestation of this male fantasy or power. Examples include Étienne-Maurice Falconet's Pygmalion and Galatea (1763) in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland, and Edward Coley Burne-Jones's Pygmalion series (1879) in the Birmingham Art Gallery in England, in which the male artist molds a female statue that comes to life under his hands (and desire).

Venetian artists are credited with creating the image of the reclining female nude both in nature and in a domestic setting. In the early sixteenth century, Giorgione painted a reclining nude in nature, the Sleeping Venus, now in the Gemäldegalerie in Dresden. With a rural Italian landscape backdrop, his Venus sleeps peacefully on a bed of soft, glistening fabric. She is both innocent (unaware of any viewers) and sensuous, as her relaxed supine pose allows for a cunning display of her form. This is the perfect view for the voyeur—assumed to be a male viewer. One should not be too quick to deny the appeal of such images to women, however, who were encouraged to identify with Venus, goddess of love and beauty (or with other nude mythological females such as Diana). Isabella d'Este purchased a sculpture of Venus by Antico (Pier Jacopo Alari Bonacolsi), the Venus Felix (circa 1519), now in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, and Madame de Pompadour ordered François Boucher's painting of The Toilet of Venus (1751), now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

Giorgione's Sleeping Venus also suggests the harmonious confluence of female nude and nature, of woman as sign of fertility and fecundity. In this traditional equation, which is reiterated by many artists into the modern period, women are associated with nature while men are equated with culture—an equation emphatically denied by a contemporary American artist, Barbara Kruger, in a collage that declares, "We won't play nature to your culture" (Warner, p. 325).

Titian moved the reclining Venus into a contemporary interior and opened her eyes in his Venus of Urbino (1538) in the Uffizi Gallery. She looks out at the viewer with a steady gaze while her attendants gather in the background. This is the sensuous goddess of love for which the Venetians became famous. These two nudes by Giorgione and Titian became the ultimate models for the many reclining Venuses thereafter. These two artists also left behind the two most mysterious images of the female nude in their "problem paintings," Giorgione's (and/or Titian's?) Fête Champêtre (circa 1508) in the Louvre and Titian's Sacred and Profane Love (circa 1515) in the Borghese Gallery in Rome. In both, the presence of female nudes being accompanied by contemporary clothed companions has led to problems in interpretation. Certainly, the nudes inhabit lofty allegorical territory. Although theories abound as to their meaning, the nudity of the female figures alerts us to their otherworldly, ideal allegorical associations.

By the sixteenth century, there had already been a long tradition of allegorical nude forms. Nicola Pisano's thirteenth-century sculpted pulpit figure Fortitude and Giovanni Pisano's early fourteenth-century figure Temperance (or Chastity), cited earlier, come to mind. But with the coming of the Renaissance and its revival of the classical nude, many lofty subjects seemed to call for the nude, including not only virtues but also vices (lust), seasons, times of day, rivers, and continents (especially Africa and America). "Truth," which should conceal nothing, was perhaps the most obvious candidate (Warner, chap. 13, "Nuda Veritas"). One finds countless examples in Western art: Botticelli's depiction of "truth" as a severe female nude in The Calumny of Apelles (circa 1497) in the Uffizi Gallery; Gian Lorenzo Bernini's joyous Baroque expression Truth with an Engaging Smile (before 1652) in the Borghese Gallery; or, more recently, Gustav Klimt's startling and intentionally shocking version (pubic hair and all) Nuda Veritas (1899) in the Theatersammlung der Oesterreichischen Nationalbibliothek in Vienna.

Male and female nudes could serve allegorical ends (e.g., Michelangelo's Day, Night, Dawn, and Evening, 1521–1534, in the Medici Chapel in Florence), but female nudes were more prevalent and their numbers increased following the Renaissance. Evidently, one of the most satisfying subjects for male artists and patrons, given its popularity, was the allegory of Vanity, in which a female nude (often identified as Venus) is depicted looking at herself in a mirror. As Berger pointed out, this allowed male artists to associate the sin of vanity with a woman, "thus morally condemning the woman whose nakedness [the artist] had depicted for [his] own pleasure" (p. 51). One of the most memorable examples in seventeenth-century art is Diego Velázquez's Rokeby Venus in the National Gallery in London. He portrays his subject from behind as she reclines in a languorous fashion, gazing at the mirror as we in turn gaze at her. Rubens also opts for this back view, although the female nude is now seated, in his interpretation of the same theme, Venus Before the Mirror (circa 1616), in the collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein at Vaduz Castle.

Remarkable here are the wildly different proportions given these two idealized figures—Velázquez's Venus is graceful and svelte, Rubens's broad and fleshy, yet they both represent idealized depictions of the female form. The ideal of beauty simply differed for each artist and for each country. Most studies of the nude have observed this phenomenon. Certainly, Clark discusses it in depth in his book, as art historian Anne Hollander does with great perception in Seeing through Clothes (1978). Tracking one subject through several centuries (e.g., Eve) reveals the shifting ideals of beauty in different periods and places, something that is more apparent in the female nude than in the male. Even within the relatively narrow geographic area of Northern Europe, the norm for beauty encompasses a wide range, as can be seen in Jan van Eyck's swaying Eve on the Ghent Altarpiece (1432) with her smooth, protruding stomach (an erotic zone in the fifteenth century), Albrecht Dürer's sturdy Eve in his engraving of 1504, and Rembrandt van Rijn's soft-fleshed, heavy figure with her furrowed brow offering fruit to a dubious Adam in his etching of 1638. Compare the different proportional norms of Agnolo Bronzino's mannerist Venus in Venus, Cupid, Folly and Time (circa 1546) in the National Gallery in London, whose every limb and finger are extended to an impossible degree, with Antoine Watteau's delicate, petite nudes with their short legs and small hands and feet. If one extends the comparison into the twentieth century, "beautiful" female bodies would continue to change over the centuries, displaying hips wide or narrow, stomachs flat or round, breasts small or full, legs short or long, and flesh firm or soft. Although much noted in discussions of the nude, these norms for beauty have little to do with iconography per se, and modern viewers are in danger of missing the deeper meaning of an image if they miss the sensual appeal of a different norm of beauty.

Along with the heavier standard for beauty of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries came new subject matter. The Old Testament themes of Susannah at her bath and of Bathsheba became very popular in the Baroque period. Tintoretto provides an early example from the mid-sixteenth century with his Susannah and the Elders (1555–1556) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna. Susannah crouches before her mirror, gazing at her nude form while two old balding men sneak a look at her. As Gil Saunders observes in The Nude: A New Perspective (1989), “The woman is clearly blamed for her predicament and presented as an exhibitionist: vain, worldly, narcissistic. . . . If she finds her own beauty so spellbinding, how can the elders be blamed for succumbing to its temptations?” (p. 34). Of course, viewers are also involved in the voyeurism of the old men.

The theme of Bathsheba offered similar possibilities for presentations of the female nude. Both subjects provided a rare opportunity in the Baroque period for a woman to paint the female nude. Artemisia Gentileschi painted many versions of Bathsheba (e.g., one early seventeenth-century version is in the Columbus Gallery of Art in Ohio) as well as Susannah at her bath. Indeed, she seemed to specialize in subjects that required the female nude and complained in letters to a patron of the great expense incurred in obtaining models for her paintings (Ann Sutherland Harris and Linda Nochlin, Women Artists 1550–1950, 1978, p. 119). As with other women artists in the premodern period, Artemisia Gentileschi had to depend on male family members for instruction and encouragement. Her father, Orazio Gentileschi, taught her the “male art” of history painting. Certainly, it was overwhelmingly male artists who turned to acceptable biblical subjects that required them to focus on the female nude.

Rubens and Rembrandt also painted scenes of Bathsheba—Rembrandt’s Bathsheba (1654) in the Louvre being especially memorable for the tender, melancholy expression of its subject. Through no fault of her own, she attracted the attention of King David, who surreptitiously observed her naked body, precipitating her eventual seduction and the murder of her husband by King David. Bathsheba embodies just one strand of the fatal woman motif, whereby the erotic attractions of the woman prove fatal to others.

Often, as with Bathsheba, the fatal woman is depicted as a nude woman displaying her unclothed body as a temptation to a male companion. Of course, the ultimate fatal woman in this context is Eve, who is seen as enticing Adam into sin and thereby bringing death on all humankind. Other fatal women—Judith (with the head of Holofernes), Salome (with the head of John the Baptist), sirens (and their “cousins,” mermaids)—were often shown nearly nude to underline the role of their erotic appeal in overcoming their male victims. Or, in the case of Edvard Munch’s lithograph Madonna (1895), the “new Eve” was turned into a languorous nude who produced a skeletal child victim as the product of sexual union. Death and sex and attraction and repulsion are united in these themes and are emphasized in late nineteenth-century examples of the nude femme fatale.

In the nineteenth century, we see the blossoming of the nude without an obvious historical subject attached. It began in the eighteenth century with Watteau’s paintings of female nudes containing only the slightest reference to mythology in the background furnishings and continued with François Le Moyne’s Bather (1724), now in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia, and Boucher’s Mlle. O’Murphy (mid-eighteenth century) in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany, with its frank display of fleshy buttocks on silk and satin. This in turn was multiplied and given an outdoor setting in Jean-Honoré Fragonard’s scene of tumbling bathers (circa 1765) in the Louvre. All these were painted at a time when many artists continued to draw on more traditional mythological scenes that called for the nude.

At the same time that the female nude was breaking free of mythology, history, and narrative in the eighteenth century, the heroic male nude—staple of the academy—was losing its central position. Although one could still find representative examples of the strong male nude in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries (e.g., in neoclassical sculpted portraits, as in Antonio Canova’s depiction of Napoleon as a nude Greek god, 1806, at the Apsley House in London), a “feminized” male nude was replacing the muscular ideal of antiquity and the Renaissance. The baby cupids that proliferated in Boucher’s paintings and Falconet’s sculptures grew into slender, androgynous adolescents in Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun’s late eighteenth-century Portrait of Prince Henry Lubomirski in the Gemäldegalerie in Berlin and in Antonio Canova’s sculpture (1787–1793) and François Gerard’s painting Cupid and Psyche (1798), both in the Louvre. Indeed, a crop of passive, feminized male nudes appeared in French paintings in the last years of the eighteenth century—for example, Jacques-Louis David’s Death of Joseph Bara (1793) in the Musée Calvet Avignon, France, or Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson’s Sleep of Endymion (1791) in the Louvre—representing what Abigail Solomon-Godeau has labeled “male trouble,” a postrevolutionary crisis of masculinity (1993, pp. 286–312). This development coincides with the rise of the genre of the independent female “nude.”

Given its long Counter-Reformation sensibility, Spain seems an unlikely place for an appearance of this new genre, but Francisco de Goya’s life-size Naked Maja (circa 1800) in the Prado is an emphatic example. One sees an ordinary, contemporary woman with an individualized face reclining on a non-descript sofa and looking out boldly at the viewer. Examined in the context of its companion, Goya’s Clothed Maja, also in the Prado, the naked woman looks even more defiant—more naked than nude—stripped of her clothing. Arms behind her head allowing for the frank display of her full breasts silhouetted against pillows, pubic hair indicated by a dark shadow, eyelids slightly lowered, and a hint of a smile on her face all contribute to the sensual charge of this inviting nude. Nothing hints at a higher meaning; she appears to be simply an alluring and available object of male desire.

In France, Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres contributed to this genre with his many odalisques, such as the Grande Odalisque

(1814) in the Louvre, with their exotic turbans that nevertheless fail to displace the sophisticated French air of the models. Yet the perfectly smooth flesh of these models removes them from the here and now, placing them on a plane with Ingres's mythological figures, such as Venus Anadyomene (1848) in the Musée Condé in Chantilly. In the romantic generation, Eugène Delacroix produced the earthiest female nudes, but he generally confined them to grand historical contexts, frequently featuring a bondage theme, as in The Massacre at Chios (1824) and The Death of Sardanapalus (1827), both in the Louvre. In these paintings, Delacroix provided a more direct pictorial statement of the powerful male/passive female scenario than the most common bondage subjects, which entailed an armored knight rescuing a nude damsel in distress, as in the many scenes of Perseus rescuing Andromeda or John Everett Millais's The Errant Knight (1870) in the Tate Gallery in London. Gustave Courbet, the professed realist, adopted Delacroix's voluptuous figures for a contemporary environment, as in The Bathers (circa 1853) in the Musée Faber in Montpellier, France, and Studio of a Painter (1854–1855) in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris. He moved into pornography for select male patrons, as in The Origin of the World (1866), in a private collection, which depicts the cut-off headless torso of a woman and focuses on a view looking up at the pudendum: the ultimate voyeur's view.

The development of photography in the mid-nineteenth century allowed artists (e.g., Delacroix and Courbet and many others thereafter) to consult photographs of nude figures in place of or to supplement live models in the preparation of their work. This was cheaper and more convenient than employing live models. The professional photographers, usually anonymous, who created these "artist's figures" borrowed conventional poses from painting and sculpture for their photographic nudes, as in the albumen print Nude Study (circa 1856–1858), perhaps by a photographer called "Watson" in the Victoria and Albert Museum in London. It was left to scientist Eadweard Muybridge to ignore such conventions in his remarkable series Animal Locomotion (1887), which presents nude men and women (among other living beings) captured in lively actions, as in plate 367, Woman, Kicking, a collotype in the Museum of Modern Art in New York.

Impressionist painters also took up the nude, usually as generalized female "bathers"; with Pierre-Auguste Renoir the subject became almost obsessional in his later career. But it was Édouard Manet and Edgar Degas who created the modern nude—Manet's defiant prostitute with her pert individual features and bold gaze reclining in her boudoir in Olympia (1863), now in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris, which in turn looked back to Titian's Venus and Goya's Maja, and Degas's generally faceless prostitutes exposing unidealized bodies (perhaps embodying a misogynistic attitude?), who are observed bathing in their domestic interiors, as in Woman Bathing (1886) in the Musée d'Orsay. Although poet and art critic Charles Baudelaire had called for such themes as early as 1845 and Degas had seen such scenes in earlier Japanese prints, including Torii Kiyonaga's Women's Bath (circa 1780), which he owned, only with Degas's many pastels do we get a sense of real, ordinary women engaged in real, ordinary behavior—not displayed for an intentional viewer but inadvertently observed in the privacy of their own rooms. They were observed by a male viewer/artist, however, and we are reminded even here of the persistent voyeuristic male gaze—something noted and mocked by Watteau as early as 1721 in Gersaint's Shopsign in the Schloss Charlottenburg in Berlin, where a fashionable man is depicted ogling the nude female bathers in a painting displayed for sale in the store while his female companion, unaware of his interest, admires the landscape elements in the work.

The women, probably prostitutes, who served as models for Degas's pastels of bathers present another realistic aspect of his work. Generally speaking, artists' models were recruited from the working class. Men might be laborers or even boxers; women were reduced to modeling for want of employment in respectable working-class occupations, the same condition that drove them to prostitution. Certainly, female models and prostitutes were often one and the same. In 1894 Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec actually took up residence in a house of prostitution; his images of prostitutes, clothed and nude, sometimes boldly engaged in a lesbian embrace, are matter-of-fact records of their mundane existence.

Pablo Picasso returned to the theme of prostitutes in his famous depiction of five female nudes, Les Femmes d'Alger (O. J.) (1907), in the Museum of Modern Art in New York, in which, leaving realism far behind, he violently shattered the women into early cubist fragments. Picasso arrived at this original expression after absorbing the lessons of Cézanne, for whom male and female bathers had been a principal preoccupation. But the expressive, unnaturalistic distortion of Picasso's figures came from his study of African art, which served as a guide and inspiration for the abstracted forms in modern Western art.

African art was by no means monolithic. Whereas the art of the Ife and Benin cultures of Nigeria was relatively naturalistic, other African peoples commonly simplified and exaggerated certain anatomical features and often depicted men and women in naked or near-naked states. Like the statues of ancient Greek athletes, this reflected customary undress in their societies. In Africa (and in other non-Western communities), such conditions shocked European colonialists and led to another category of the nude: the "naked Savage" as depicted by European artists, a category that goes back to the seventeenth century, the great age of European exploration. Not surprisingly, the English provided many examples in the nineteenth century, one of the most demeaning being Thomas Rowlandson's watercolor Broad Grins (circa 1800) in the Courtauld Institute in London, which depicts a toothy crocodile face to face with a toothy naked African in a frank equation—a reflection of contemporary European pseudoscientific racism that then emphasized the close kinship of Africans with brutes or the animal world. This stance persisted throughout the nineteenth century and is reflected in the derogatory "primitive" label attached to African art by a European colonialist culture.

Much of African art is still shrouded in mystery, as dates and artists are unknown, but we do know that African sculpted nude figures were not simply aesthetic objects but were generally endowed with spiritual powers, for example, for healing or fertility. In addition, they might have multiple identities as gods and/or ancestors. The large wooden figure of a mother and child of the Bamana people of Mali, created in the nineteenth–twentieth century, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York is a good example. Such sculptures were used in fertility rites. Their exaggerated forms (here enlarged breasts, in others swelling stomachs) related to a woman's role as childbearer.

Such so-called primitive art of Africa, Polynesia, and the Americas (made available to European artists as a by-product of the imperialist mission of colonizers) had a profound impact on modern Western art. Paul Gauguin's painted South Sea islanders, as in Aha oe Feii? (What! Are You Jealous?) (1892) in the Pushkin Museum in Moscow; Henri Matisse's simplified nudes cavorting in an imagined paradise, as in Bonheur de Vivre (1906) in the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania; the German expressionists' brilliantly colored bathers striding into the north German sea, as in Max Pechstein's Under the Trees (1913) in the Detroit Institute of Arts in Michigan; or Ernst Ludwig Kirchner's depiction A Girl Under a Japanese Umbrella (1909) in the Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen in Düsseldorf, Germany, with its backdrop of coarsely drawn, wildly dancing figures—all these were created under the impact of a new appreciation for the so-called primitive, a Western myth that often suggested an idyllic innocence free of moral constraints or middle-class concerns.

The twentieth century brought a deluge of nudes despite the arrival of complete abstraction. Photographers began to use the nude figure as a nearly abstract form in some of the most stunning photographs of the early modern period, such as Imogen Cunningham's Nude (1932), a practice that continued to flourish in the hands of many artist/photographers throughout the twentieth century. John Colans produced some of the most startling examples, using his own hairy body to create strong formal patterns in his photographs, as in Self-Portrait (1895). Nude self-portraits by Munch and Egon Schiele, such as Schiele's watercolor Self Portrait Crouching (1912) in the Dr. Eugene A. Solow and Family Collection in Chicago, brought self-revelation (self-flagellation?) to a deeper level and seemed to embody the tremendous anxiety associated with the modern era. Paula Modersohn-Becker's wishful self-portrait in a state of pregnancy (1906) in the Modersohn-Becker Haus, Bottcherstrasse in Bremen, Germany, and Alice Neel's cool, clear nude portraits of pregnant women, as in Maria (1964) in the collection of the family, gave attention to a distinctly female condition that had been all but ignored by male artists in earlier periods. The twentieth century also found women artists, now participating in the public production of art in numbers unheard of before, turning the table on male artists by directing their "gaze" on male nudes with ironic results, as in Sylvia Sleigh's Turkish Bath (1973).

The Freudian concerns of the mostly male surrealists made the nude, with its inherent sexual associations, an especially apt subject for them. Whether displaced to the street in Paul Delvaux's paintings, as in The Hands (1941) in the Claude Spaak Collection in Paris, or transformed into facial features, as in René Magritte's The Rape (1934) in the Menil Collection in Houston, Texas, the female nude in surrealist art was intentionally startling and unsettling.

In the late twentieth century, the unclothed figure, male and female, continued to play a central role in artistic expression. Examples include a faceless pinup with the artificial air of a billboard advertisement in Tom Wesselman's Great American Nude series from the pop era; the cool, clinical male and female models in Philip Pearlstein's studio sessions, as in Male and Female on Red and Purple Drapes (1968) in the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden in Washington, D.C.; the entwined gay couples engaged in frank sexual acts in Robert Mapplethorpe's stunning photographs; the great unclothed "middle class," who, while naked, are nevertheless mysteriously clothed in ambiguity and unease in Eric Fischl's mundane suburban scenes of the 1980s, such as Noon Watch (1983) in the Mathias Brunner Collection in Zurich, Switzerland; and the stripped body of the artist Karen Finley in her politicized performance pieces of the 1990s.

See also Bath/Bathing; Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Voyeurism

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Venus of Willendorf, Paleolithic sculpture, circa

25,000–20,000 B.C., Vienna, Austria, Naturhistorisches Museum

Girl Playing with Balls, Indian Yakshi figure, sculpture, eleventh century, New Delhi, India, National Museum

Classical

Orgy Scene, Attic cup, early fifth century B.C., Paris, Louvre
Skopas, Maenad, sculpture, fourth century B.C., Dresden, Germany

Apollo Belvedere, sculpture, fourth (Greek original) and first century B.C. (Roman copy), Vatican, Vatican Museum

Lysippus, Apoxyomenos, sculpture, fourth century B.C., Vatican, Vatican Museums

Praxiteles, Aphrodite of Knidos, sculpture, fourth century B.C., Vatican, Vatican Museums

Marsyas, sculpture, third century B.C., Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

The Three Graces, sculpture, Roman copy of Greek original, second century B.C., Paris, Louvre

Venus de Medici, marble sculpture, circa 150–100 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Laocoön, Hellenistic sculpture, circa first–second century A.D., Vatican, Vatican Museums

Emperor Trebonianus Gallus, sculpture, 251–253, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Medieval

The Crucifixion and the Death of Judas, sculpture, circa 420–500, London, British Museum

Adam and Eve Reproached by the Lord, sculpture, 1015, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral

Last Judgment, west tympanum sculpture, circa 1130–1135, Autun, France, Cathedral

Pisano, Nicola, Fortitude, sculpture, circa 1260, Pisa, Italy, Cathedral

Pisano, Giovanni, Temperance, sculpture, 1300–1310, Pisa, Italy, Cathedral

Renaissance

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, The Sacrifice of Isaac, sculpture, fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Donatello, David, sculpture, circa 1425–1430, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Eyck, Jan and Hubert van, Last Judgment, painting, 1425–1430, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Masaccio, Adam and Eve, Expulsion from Paradise, painting, 1427, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria del Carmine, Brancacci Chapel
 Eyck, Jan van, Eve, painting, Ghent Altarpiece, 1432, Ghent, Belgium, Church of St. Bavo
 Pollaiuolo, Antonio, Hercules and the Hydra, painting, circa 1460, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Botticelli, Birth of Venus, painting, circa 1480, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Michelangelo, Bacchus, sculpture, circa 1496–1498, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Botticelli, The Calumny of Apelles, oil on panel, circa 1497, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Giorgione, Sleeping Venus, painting, early sixteenth century, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Dürer, Albrecht, Apollo, drawing, circa 1501–1503, London, British Museum
 Dürer, Albrecht, Eve, engraving, 1504
 Raphael, The Three Graces, painting, 1504–1505, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé
 Giorgione (and/or Titian), Fête Champêtre, painting, circa 1508, Paris, Louvre
 Michelangelo, ceiling frescoes, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Michelangelo, Risen Christ, sculpture, 1514–1520, Rome, Sta. Maria Sopra Minerva
 Titian, Sacred and Profane Love, painting, circa 1515, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Leonardo da Vinci, Leda and the Swan, before 1519, lost
 Antico, Venus Felix, sculpture, circa 1519, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Raphael, The Judgment of Paris, before 1520, lost
 Dürer, Albrecht, Draftsman Drawing a Nude, woodcut, 1525, London, British Museum
 Dürer, Albrecht, Nude (Hausfrau), drawing, before 1528, Bayonne, France
 Correggio, Jupiter and Io, painting, circa 1532, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Cranach, Lucas the Elder, Venus, painting, 1532, Frankfurt, Germany, Städelches Kunstinstitut
 Michelangelo, Day, Night, Dawn and Evening, sculptures, 1521–1534, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo, Medici Chapel
 Michelangelo, Last Judgment, fresco, 1534–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Titian, Venus of Urbino, painting, 1538, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Bronzino, Agnolo, Venus, Cupid, Folly and Time, painting, circa 1546, London, National Gallery

Tintoretto, Susannah and the Elders, painting, 1555–1556, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Seventeenth Century

Rubens, Peter Paul, Three Graces, painting, early seventeenth century, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Gentileschi, Artemesia, Bathsheba, painting, early seventeenth century, Columbus, Ohio, Columbus Gallery of Art
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Venus Before the Mirror, painting, circa 1616, Liechtenstein, Vaduz Castle, collection of the Prince of Liechtenstein
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Adam and Eve, etching, 1638
 Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, Truth with an Engaging Smile, sculpture, before 1652, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Velázquez, Diego, Rokeby Venus, painting, seventeenth century, London, National Gallery
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba, painting, 1654, Paris, Louvre

Eighteenth Century

Watteau, Antoine, Gersaint's Shopsign, painting, 1721, Berlin, Schloss Charlottenburg
 Le Moyne, François, Bather, painting, 1724, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Boucher, François, The Toilet of Venus, painting, 1751, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Boucher, François, Mlle. O'Murphy, painting, mid-eighteenth century, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Falconet, Étienne-Maurice, Pygmalion and Galatea, sculpture, 1763, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, Bathers, painting, circa 1765, Paris, Louvre
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Portrait of Prince Henry Lubomirski, painting, late eighteenth century, Berlin, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 Kiyonaga, Torii, Women's Bath, woodcut, circa 1780
 Canova, Antonio, Cupid and Psyche, sculpture, 1787–1793, Paris, Louvre
 Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, Sleep of Endymion, painting, 1791, Paris, Louvre
 David, Jacques-Louis, Death of Joseph Bara, painting, 1793, Avignon, France, Musée Calvet
 Gérard, François, Cupid and Psyche, painting, 1798, Paris, Louvre

Nineteenth Century

Rowlandson, Thomas, Broad Grins, watercolor, circa 1800, London, Courtauld Institute
 Goya, Francisco de, Naked Maja, painting, circa 1800, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Canova, Antonio, Napoleon, sculpture, 1806, London, Apsley House
 Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, Grande Odalisque, painting, 1814, Paris, Louvre
 Delacroix, Eugène, The Massacre at Chios, painting, 1824, Paris, Louvre
 Delacroix, Eugène, The Death of Sardanapalus, painting, 1827, Paris, Louvre

Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, Venus Anadyomene, painting, 1848, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé
 Courbet, Gustave, The Bathers, circa 1853, Montpellier, France, Musée Faber
 Courbet, Gustave, Studio of a Painter, painting, 1854–1855, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Watson (presumed photographer), Nude Study, albumin print, circa 1856–1858, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
 Manet, Édouard, Olympia, painting, 1863, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Courbet, Gustave, The Origin of the World, painting, 1866, private collection
 Millais, John Everett, The Knight Errant, painting, 1870, London, Tate Gallery
 Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Pygmalion, painting series, 1879, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Art Gallery
 Cézanne, Paul, Three Bathers, painting, 1879–1882, Paris, Musée de Petit-Palais
 Eakins, Thomas, The Crucifixion, painting, 1880, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Renoir, Auguste, Large Bathers, painting, 1884–1887, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Degas, Edgar, Women Bathing, pastel, 1886, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Muybridge, Eadweard, Woman Kicking, collotype, plate 367, from Animal Locomotion, 1887, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Seurat, Georges, Models, painting, 1886–1888, Merion, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation
 Gauguin, Paul, Aha oe Feii? (What! Are You Jealous?), painting, 1892, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum
 Munch, Edvard, Madonna, lithograph, 1895
 Klimt, Gustav, Nuda Veritas, painting, 1899, Vienna, Austria, Theatersammlung der Oesterreichischen Nationalbibliothek
Mother and Child, Bamana sculpture, circa nineteenth–twentieth century, Mali, Africa, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Twentieth Century

Matisse, Henri, Bonheur de Vivre, painting, 1906, Merion, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation
 Modersohn-Becker, Paula, Self-Portrait in a State of Pregnancy, painting, 1906, Bremen, Germany, Bottcherstrasse, Modersohn-Becker Haus
 Picasso, Pablo, Les Femmes d'Alger (O. J. R. M.), painting, 1907, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Sickert, Walter Richard, Mornington Crescent Nude, painting, 1907, private collection
 Pechstein, Max, Under the Trees, painting, 1913, Detroit, Michigan, Institute of Arts
 Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, A Girl Under a Japanese Umbrella, painting, 1909, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
 Schiele, Egon, Self-Portrait Crouching, watercolor, 1912, Chicago, Illinois, Dr. Eugene A. Solow and Family Collection

Cunningham, Imogen, Nude, photograph, 1932, Berkeley, California, Imogen Cunningham Trust
 Magritte, René, The Rape, painting, 1934, Houston, Texas, Menil Collection
 Spencer, Stanley, Self-Portrait with Patricia Preece, painting, 1936, Cambridge, England, Cambridge University, Fitzwilliam Museum
 Spencer, Stanley, The Leg of Mutton Nude, painting, 1937, London, Tate Gallery
 Delvaux, Paul, The Hands, painting, 1941, Paris, Claude Spaak Collection
 Wesselman, Tom, Great American Nude #57, collage, 1964, private collection
 Neel, Alice, Maria, painting, 1964, collection of the family
 Pearlstein, Philip, Male and Female on Red and Purple Drapes, 1968, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Gardens
 Sleigh, Silvia, Turkish Bath, painting, 1973
 De Andrea, John, Woman on Bed, 1975, New York, O. K. Harris Gallery
 Freud, Lucian, Naked Portrait with Reflection, painting, 1980, London, Odette Gilbert Gallery
 Mapplethorpe, Robert, photographs, circa 1980s
 Fischl, Eric, Noon Watch, painting, 1983, Zurich, Switzerland, Mathias Brunner Collection
 Coplans, John, Self-Portrait, photograph, 1985, property of the artist Finley, Karen, performance pieces, 1990s

Further Reading

Berger, John, Ways of Seeing, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1972
 Carr, J. L., "Pygmalion and the Philosophes," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes XXIII (1960)
 Clark, Kenneth, The Nude: A Study in the Ideal Form, New York: Pantheon, 1956
 Clark, Timothy, "Olympia's Choice," in The Painting of Modern Life: Paris in the Art of Manet and His Followers, Princeton, New Jersey, and London: Princeton University Press, 1984
 Cormack, Malcolm, The Nude in Western Art, Oxford: Phaidon, 1976; New York: Dutton, 1976
 Ewing, William, The Body: Photographs of the Human Form, San Francisco: Chronicle, 1994
 Farwell, Beatrice, Manet and the Nude: A Study of Iconography in the Second Empire, New York: Garland, 1981
 Gerds, William, The Great American Nude: A History in Art, New York: Praeger, 1974; London: Studio Vista, 1977
 Grewenig, Meinrad Maria, Der Akt in der Deutschen Renaissance die Einheit von Nacktheit und Leib in der bildenden Kunst, Freren, Germany: Luca, 1987
 Harris, Ann Sutherland, and Linda Nochlin, Women Artists 1550–1950, New York: Knopf, 1978

- Havelock, Christine Mitchell, The Aphrodite of Knidos and Her Successors: A Historical Review of the Female Nude in Greek Art, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995
- Hayward Gallery, London, In the Image of Man: The Indian Perception of the Universe Through 2000 Years of Painting and Sculpture, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1982
- Hobhouse, Janet, The Bride Stripped Bare: The Artist and the Nude in the Twentieth Century, London: Cape, 1988
- Hollander, Anne, Seeing Through Clothes, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1978
- Hudson, Liam, Bodies of Knowledge: The Psychological Significance of the Nude in Art, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1982
- Kestner, Joseph, Mythology and Misogyny: The Social Discourse of Nineteenth-Century British Classical Subject Painting, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989
- Laguna, Larissa, "Nudity as a Costume in Classical Art," American Journal of Archaeology 93 (1989)
- Leighton, Patricia, "The White Peril and L'art negre: Picasso, Primitivism and Anticolonialism," Art Bulletin LXXII (1990)
- Lesser, Wendy, His Other Half: Men Looking at Women Through Art, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1991
- Lewinski, Jorge, The Naked and the Nude: A History of the Nude in Photographs, 1839 to the Present, New York: Harmony, 1987
- Lipton, Eunice, Looking Into Degas: Uneasy Images of Women and Modern Life, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1986
- Lucie-Smith, Edward, The Body: Images of the Nude, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1981
- Miles, Margaret, Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West, Boston: Beacon Press, 1989
- Nead, Lynda, The Female Nude: Art, Obscenity and Sexuality, London and New York, 1992
- Nead, Lynda, "Representation, Sexuality, and the Female Nude," Art History (June 1983)
- Pevsner, Nikolaus, Academies of Art: Past and Present, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1940
- Pointon, Marcia, Naked Authority: The Body in Western Painting, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990
- Saunders, Gil, The Nude: A New Perspective, London: Herbert Press, 1989
- Smith, Alison, The Victorian Nude: Sexuality, Morality and Art, Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 1996
- Solomon-Godeau, Abigail, "Going Native," Art in America (July 1989)
- , "Male Trouble: A Crisis in Representation," Art History (June 1993)
- Source* XXII:2 (Winter 1993), issue devoted to essays on nudity in antiquity
- Steinberg, Leo, The Sexuality of Christ in Renaissance Art and in Modern Oblivion, New York: Pantheon, 1983
- Stokes, Adrian, Reflections on the Nude, London and New York: Tavistock, 1967
- Suleiman, Susan, The Female Body in Western Culture: Contemporary Perspectives, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1986
- Thomson, Richard, Degas, the Nudes, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1988
- Walters, Margaret, The Nude Male: A New Perspective, New York and London: Penguin, 1978
- Warner, Marina, Monuments and Maidens: The Allegory of the Female Form, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1985
- Webb, Peter, The Erotic Arts, London: Secker and Warburg, 1975
- Willett, Frank, African Art: An Introduction, New York: Praeger, 1971

NIGHT

Stephen Lamia

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Night:

ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE AND BAROQUE

ROMANTICISM THROUGH POSTIMPRESSIONISM

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Richard Bosman, Night Web, 1993,
Minneapolis, Minnesota, Thimmes
Gallery. (Courtesy of the artist)

The appearance of night in art is frequently, although not exclusively, based on an observation of sequential nocturnal phenomena such as the setting of the sun or the waxing and waning of the moon. Concerned literally with the passage of time, the theme of night may also appear in imaginative reverie and symbolic manifestation.

This essay covers two broad categories: figurative and nonfigurative works of art. In the first group one finds personifications of night from the ancient era through the twentieth century. Figurative art also includes biblical narratives, secular scenes, and allegorical representations whose chronologies span the late Gothic to modern periods. Nonfigurative nocturnes have been dominated chiefly by the landscape, from its earliest sporadic appearance in Baroque Europe through the end of the twentieth century.

Most ancient and medieval works are atemporal in designation. For instance, the plowing of a field carved in an ancient Egyptian relief, a mythological scene painted on a Greek vase, or any number of religious narratives unfolding in fresco on the nave walls of a Romanesque church seldom indicate day or night.

The origin of the iconographic theme night may be attributed to classical representations of Selene, Greek goddess of the moon. In a second-century A.D. sarcophagus depicting the myth of Endymion, Selene steps out of her chariot and approaches a sleeping nude youth. The crescent moon appears as a crown atop her head, and a billowing cloak—a conventional symbol of the heavens—arcs and enframes her upper body. Strikingly similar in disposition is a hauntingly beautiful, standing female figure labeled nyx (“night” in Greek) in the miniature of the Prayer of Isaiah from The Paris Psalter (circa 900), a tenth-century masterpiece of manuscript illumination from the Macedonian Renaissance. Here the Byzantine artist represents night as a personification whose costume, face, exposed arms, and shoulders are conceived in monochromes of blue. As with her Roman predecessor, this figure also holds aloft the veil of the night sky, this time replete with a pattern of white dots that suggest stars.

The most celebrated instance of the personification of night came from the chisel of Michelangelo and adorns the tomb of Giuliano de’Medici in the Medici Chapel in Florence, Italy. Although this Night (1524–1534) lacks the grace of the earlier examples, she possesses a pathos brought on by a time-worn existence, and her fitful posture underscores the sorrow and loss of death. A late eighteenth-century drawing by Asmus Jakob Carstens, a devotee of Michelangelo’s art, carries the personified representation of night into the romantic period. Carstens’s Night with Her Children, Sleep and Death (before 1795), based on Hesiod’s Theogonia (circa 700 B.C.), includes Nemesis, Fate, and Parcae in addition to the three main figures. An ambitious, although unrealized, project by Philipp Otto Runge executed in the early nineteenth century, Four Phases of Day, includes one very detailed pen and ink drawing titled Night (1803). The composition of slumbering children, winged genies, stars, flowers, and the moon is arranged in strict bilateral symmetry around the central figure of Night, a unique and mystical interpretation of the closing hours of day.

In the late Gothic period artists began to take an interest in setting certain religious episodes, especially those from the life of Jesus Christ, in the appropriate time of day according to biblical texts. Thus, an abundance of nocturnal Nativities (Lorenzo Monaco, Gentile da Fabriano, Jean Fouquet, Geertgen tot Sint Jans, Albrecht Altdorfer, Georges de La Tour), Annunciations to and Adorations of Shepherds (Taddeo Gaddi, Correggio, Rembrandt van Rijn), and Adorations of Magi (Boucicaut Master) lent a new dimension of realism and a heightened sense of sacred awe to Infancy cycles. Last Suppers (Pietro Lorenzetti), Arrests of Christ (Jan Joest von Kalkar), and Lamentations (Nicolas Poussin), all set at night, augmented the dramatic tension of scenes of the Passion. On the other hand, Matthias Grünewald’s star-studded nocturnal Resurrection panel from the Isenheim Altarpiece (1510–1515) presents a luminous and visionary exaltation of death. In a secular, but still reverential, manner twentieth-century artist Georges Rouault retained the nighttime atmosphere in his Christ in the Suburbs (1920).

Other biblical narratives employ nocturnal settings of night without Christocentric iconography. These include Ludovico Carracci’s Old Testament painting Jacob’s Dream (1605–1608), Hieronymus Bosch’s apocalyptic Last Judgment (the 1510 fragment), and the Detroit, Michigan, version of Artemisia Gentileschi’s Judith and Her Maidservant with the Head of Holofernes (circa 1625). Gentileschi herself, an artist of international reputation, helped to promote the powerfully dramatic, tenebrist style made famous by the great Baroque master Caravaggio. Georges de La Tour, mentioned above in conjunction with the Nativity of Christ, was the most accomplished French adherent of this seventeenth-century tradition. In works of hagiography such as Piero della Francesca’s Vision of Constantine from The Legend of the True Cross (1452–1457) fresco program and Raphael’s The Liberation of St. Peter from Prison (1513) nocturnal elements such as a dusky tent or a dark cell with flashes of divine or natural light are craftily employed to befit the story.

Artists have often used night settings in secular narratives for the sake of heightening dramatic or emotional content. Both versions of Francisco de Goya’s Witches’ Sabbath, as well as his Executions of the Third of May, 1808 (1814), plunge figures into gloomy, sinister darkness to increase a macabre atmosphere. John Quidor’s The Money Diggers (1832), a painting that illustrates one of Washington Irving’s Tales of a Traveller, shrouds the excavators of a buried treasure with the pitch blackness of night. As a result, the ghostly apparition of the owner, barely discernible in the upper right portion of the canvas, surprises the trio of figures as well as the viewer.

On the other hand, charm and enigma simultaneously suffuse the nocturnal imagery of Henri Rousseau's The Sleeping Gypsy (1897), Vasily Kandinsky's Night (1906–1907), Grant Wood's The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere (1931), and even Pablo Picasso's Night Fishing at Antibes (1939). Other twentieth-century works utilize night settings to fuel a psychological charge. Edward Hopper's Night Windows (1928) and Nighthawks (1942) and Alex Katz's Self-Portrait, Portrait of Frank and Sheila Lima, and Hiroshi and Marsha present discomfiting arrangements of figures in isolated thought set against dark, urban backdrops.

Night as a temporal setting in allegorical works provides visual imagery with a range of moods. Night creates a sense of indefinite mystery in Marcantonio Raimondi's engraving The Dream of Raphael (circa 1506), while a more intense Romantic terror results in Goya's The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters (1799) and The Colossus (1808–1812). Night perpetuates a fantastic fin-de-siècle malaise in Ferdinand Hodler's The Night (1890), while post-World War I cruelty emanates from the dark of Max Beckmann's The Night (1918–1919) and Otto Dix's Meeting a Madman at Night (1924), an etching with aquatint and drypoint from his series Der Krieg.

The combined figurative and nocturnal elements in romantic and symbolist works of art lend an expressive dimension of eroticism to works such as Henry Fuseli's two versions of The Nightmare (1781); quasi-religious tranquillity to works such as Caspar David Friedrich's Two Men Contemplating the Moon (1819) and Moonrise over the Sea (1822); shadowy ambiguity to works such as Odilon Redon's L'homme fut solitaire dans un paysage de nuit, from a portfolio of lithographs entitled The Night; and personal, psychological uneasiness in public places to works such as Vincent van Gogh's The Night Cafe (1888) and Edvard Munch's Evening on Karl Johannstrasse (1892).

Surrealist artists who set figures in nocturnal environments include Max Ernst in Pietà or Revolution by Night and One Night of Love (1927); Paul Delvaux in Phases of the Moon (1939) and Sleeping Venus (1944); and Australian artist Max Dupain in Night with Her Train of Stars and Her Gift of Sleep (circa 1936). No checklist of surrealist nocturnes, however, would be complete without the inclusion of works by Joan Miró, because themes of the night constitute a major portion of his oeuvre. From the early Dog Barking at the Moon (1926), to the works of his peinture sauvage (savage painter) period such as Nocturne (1938), to the works of his Constellation series such as The Nightingale's Song at Midnight and Morning Rain (1940) and People in the Night Guided by the Phosphorescent Tracks of Snails (1940), to those belonging to the latter part of his career such as People in the Night (1950), Miró had a fondness for nocturnal iconography and, at one point, even stated that one of the most emotional moments of his life was a night flight. His paintings of the night are not dark obliterations populated with shadowy forms but dense, colorful, even bright compositions teeming with life culled from fact, fantasy, and the astral realm.

This survey of figurative night imagery concludes with a work that must be mentioned—if only to exclude it. Rembrandt's group portrait The Company of Captain Frans

Banning Cocq (1642), known by its more popular title, The Night Watch, is a misnomer.

The second category of night themes dispenses with the human figure altogether or, if it is included at all, diminishes its role to a minor level. Instead, nature becomes resplendent in the form of landscape, seascape, and skyscape—the visual vehicle through which artists render nocturnal imagery.

The earliest examples of independent landscape painting yield very little in the way of the iconography of night. El Greco's View of Toledo (circa 1610) at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and Jacob van Ruisdael's Dresden, Germany, version of The Jewish Cemetery (1655) are premonitions of the grand, nineteenth-century nocturne—the true heyday for this theme.

Caspar David Friedrich, the chief exponent of German romantic painting, used the theme of night to express his deeply rooted religious sentiments. The moon, one motif that appears in almost all of Friedrich's night paintings, was for him a symbol of divine light, specifically of Jesus Christ. The small companion pieces Moonlit Night on the Shore of the Baltic Sea and Moonlit Night with Ships on the Baltic Sea both contain his favorite pictorial references to the transition from life to death—land, sea, ships, moonlight. Identical imagery recurs in the later Sea Piece by Moonlight and Sea Shore with the Rising Moon (1835–1837). In other night works, however, Friedrich's forms are more idiosyncratic: in The Cross at Rügen, a memorial painting for a deceased friend, an anchor emphasizes the hope of resurrection; in Picture in Remembrance of Johann Emmanuel Bremer, a gate symbolizes the transition between life and death; in Greifswald in Moonlight (1816–1817), the artist transforms his hometown into an earthly paradise; and in The Temple of Juno at Agrigentum, the ruins of the Greek temple symbolize death and decay. The moon illuminates objects in the darkness of night in all of these works. Yet the moon does not simply define forms in Friedrich's canvases, it also symbolizes Christ and the resurrection of the spirit after death. Carl Gustav Carus (Gothic Church and Treetops in the Moonlight) and Ernst Ferdinand Oehme (Moonlit Night on the Gulf of Salerno), younger artists who worked in Friedrich's circle, employ nocturnal imagery to present a similar spiritual content.

English painter Samuel Palmer also imbued nocturnal landscapes (Moonlit Landscape, 1829–1830; Coming from Evening Church; Harvest Moon) with deep religious significance. Figures, although clearly visible, do not dominate the painted surface but merge, like a dense patchwork, with trees, Gothic spires, and the moon. Another English painter, Atkinson Grimshaw, a contemporary of James Abbott McNeill Whistler, takes an emphatically more realistic approach to nighttime landscapes. His Scarborough Lights (1877) is an inviting view of a sparkling harbor, twinkling lamps dispersed among such forms as a bridge, ships, and various buildings.

French artist Jean-François Millet literally lifts the spectator off the ground to witness a comet-streaked, star-studded skyscape in The Starry Night (1850–1851), a work that may have inspired the lesser-known of van Gogh's two versions of the same theme.

Nocturnal imagery from the early career of Piet Mondrian shows a distinct persistence of romanticism, as if it had filtered down through the century directly from Friedrich. However, as has been pointed out, Mondrian's Ships in the Moonlight

(1890), Mill by the Moonlight, Summer Night (circa 1907), and Trees on the Gein by Moonlight owe as much to the native, seventeenth-century Dutch tradition of topographical landscape painting as they do to the more au courant, nineteenth-century romantic interpretations of night.

American artists of the early romantic era, such as Washington Allston (Moonlit Landscape, 1819) and later Ralph Blakelock (Diana's Mirror, circa 1880–1890), Albert Pinkham Ryder (Moonlight Marine, circa 1870–1890), and the tonalist George Inness (Moonlight, Tarpon Springs, 1892), exhibited a strong interest in nocturnal motifs. They transformed their moody, dark landscapes into mysterious, ethereal, elusive, and contemplative expanses.

Although the artists of the impressionist generation were mostly concerned with daylight effects on material form, a few, such as Camille Pissarro (Evening on the Boulevard Montmartre, 1897) and the Americans John Singer Sargent (Luxembourg Gardens at Night, 1879), Childe Hassam (Fifth Avenue Nocturne), Winslow Homer (Kissing the Moon), and Ernest Lawson (Spring Night, Harlem River) ventured into the darker territory of night.

The most persuasive and experimental of all the impressionists who mined this seductive theme, however, was American expatriate James Abbott McNeill Whistler. Throughout the 1870s Whistler—actually only marginally affiliated with the impressionist movement—pursued tonal rather than formal equivalents in painting and even titled the group of canvases he produced in this decade after the musical term nocturne. All of these landscapes unfold during the nighttime hours and many, such as Nocturne in Black and Gold: The Falling Rocket (1874), are so loosely painted as to anticipate the abstract innovations of many twentieth-century artists. Indeed it was this very work that critic John Ruskin vituperously attacked as “a pot of paint flung in the public’s face,” inciting Whistler’s lawsuit. Other paintings included in the series, such as Nocturne in Blue and Silver: Bognor, Nocturne in Blue and Gold: Old Battersea Bridge (1872–1875), and Nocturne in Gray and Gold: Chelsea Snow (1878), retain the vestiges of discernible, identifiable imagery, although it is the sensation of color tones that dominates the viewer’s visual experience.

Nocturnal themes attracted two very important artists of the post-impressionist period, each of whom utilized it for different ends. Van Gogh translated the iconography of night into both a curiously sensory and a uniquely spiritual expression. His The Cafe Terrace on the Place du Forum, Arles, at Night (1888) shows his interest in combining the artificial light of a gas jet lamp with the natural illumination of glimmering stars. In other canvases, however, such as the two versions of The Starry Night (1889) and Road with Cypresses and Stars, animated landscapes and intensely glowing celestial bodies that pulsate in writhing, undulating skies communicate a powerfully expressive, otherworldly message. In a missive written to his brother Theo (letter #543, September 1888) van Gogh stated, “That does not prevent me from having a terrible need of shall I say the word?—of religion. Then I go out at night to paint the stars.” Van Gogh was referring to the earlier of the two The Starry Night paintings, the one that may have been inspired by Millet in which two minuscule figures in the right foreground are seemingly less lifelike than the energetic astral bodies in the sky above. The slightly later second version galvanizes the stars and moon into the heightened crescendo of a quasi-apocalyptic vision—the human figures are dispensed with altogether.

On the other hand, Munch initially took an impressionist tact on nocturnal landscape imagery in works such as Banks of the Seine at Night. Later he replaced it with broader, flatter brushwork and a psychological content that can only be described as desolate and bleak. Examples of this approach include his Starry Night (1893), White Night (1901), and Coast at Aasgaard.

The early twentieth century witnessed the continuity of night themes under a variety of visual identities and stylistic manifestations, typical of the era’s widening pluralistic modes. These include the frankly realistic urban landscapes of the Ash Can School artists, such as George Luks’s Armistice Night (1918) and John Sloan’s The City from Greenwich Village (1922), as well as the initial forays into abstraction executed by their contemporaries in the United States and abroad. Examples of these works include Georgia O’Keeffe’s New York Night (1928–1929), Arthur Dove’s Moon (1935), and Paul Klee’s The Departure of the Boats (1927) and Fire at Full Moon (1933).

Surrealist artists, as already noted in the figurative subcategory, displayed a strong affinity for nocturnal imagery. Even in the realm of pure landscape Max Ernst continued to favor the haunting moodiness of the night. In several of his “forest” works (1925–1927), such as The Great Forest and Vision Induced by the Nocturnal Aspect of Porte Saint-Denis, the combined techniques of frottage (rubbing) and grattage (scraping) yield forms that strongly suggest dense, vertically aligned tree trunks set against dark “skies,” with a hovering white circle to indicate the moon. Roberto Matta presents even more abstract intangibles in his Invasion of the Night (1941), while René Magritte’s often reproduced The Empire of Light II depicts a disquieting, quixotic streetscape that exists in both day and night.

Although less imagistically oriented, a number of abstract expressionist artists explored nocturnal evocations within their personal, established aesthetic. Arshile Gorky (study for Nighttime, Enigma, and Nostalgia) and William Baziotes (Night Figure, No. 1), for example, painted biomorphic shapes on dark grounds. Bradley Walker Tomlin (Tension by Moonlight, 1948) and Mark Tobey (Awakening Night, 1949) employed their hallmark calligraphic symbols on black backdrops, and Adolph Gottlieb displayed the power of simplified forms defined through bold, gestural strokes in his Blue at Night (1957).

Roy Lichtenstein’s Moonlight (1967) carries the iconography of night into the generation of the pop artists, although the theme is less common during this period than in previous eras. However, more recent movements, especially photo-realism, or new realism, reinvested nocturnal imagery with vigorous, individualized interpretations. For instance, Paul Rickert’s Fog at the Station is redolent of melancholy and loneliness in its sepia-toned depiction of a fog-shrouded parking lot at a commuter railway stop late at night. April Gornik’s Pulling Moon, on the other hand, shows the splendid life of nature that exists wholly and majestically independent of any person whatsoever.

Alex Katz, already encountered in the section on figurative nocturnes, excludes the human figure in several of his paintings with amazingly strong results. Luna Park, an early work, shows a view out a window onto a body of water, a Munch-like path of moonlight shining vertically on its surface. By contrast, his later urban nocturnes of the 1980s, referred to as his “pure” night paintings, verge on the abstract. They are almost totally black save for the scattered rectangular specks of white that imply the florescent “night lights” left burning in Manhattan office towers. Some of these “pure” nocturnes, such as Quarter Moon (1987) and Night I, retain vestigial references to nature, if only in title. Others, however, such as Varick (1988) and Hudson (1988), more emphatically relate the midnight hours to the urban environment by citing specific street names.

Discussion of the night theme closes with the early 1990s new realist paintings by Richard Bosman and his “Nocturne” series (1993). These huge works, which include Study for Meteor, Canis Major/Canis Minor, Moonlight, Navigator, and Night Web, present the visual wonder of a star-studded, blue-black field complete with identifiable constellations and the moon. By their very scale, these works invite the viewer to enter a limitless space and to participate with the artist as he discovers and experiences harmony, mystery, beauty, and awe.

The iconography of night is rich in its variances and unpredictable in its manifestations. The subcategory of figurative scenes unfolds with imposing personifications of night during the ancient, Byzantine, and Renaissance periods. These archetypes waned—although never totally disappeared—in favor of more temporally conceived settings. However, no expected pattern prevailed as that temporality was, at first, based upon written biblical description. Later, nocturnal imagery became informed by the conditions characteristic of the modern world: mystery, terror, eroticism, malaise, isolation, and all psychological states of mind. Finally, in the second subcategory, unpopulated scenes, the range of formal possibilities extended from dark brooding landscapes or interiors to sparkling vistas of night skies that may or may not have contained terrestrial objects as visual reference points. In paintings that lack such detail, the celestial expanse offers the miraculous possibility of contemplating and exploring infinity.

See also Dawn/Dawning; Nightmare; Sleep/Sleeping

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Medieval

Sarcophagus with the Myth of Endymion, second century

A.D., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Prayer of Isaiah in The Paris Psalter, circa A.D. 900, Paris (B.N., cod. gr.139, fol. 435v)

Gaddi, Taddeo, Annunciation to the Shepherds, after 1328, Florence, Italy, Sta. Croce, Baroncelli Chapel

Limbouurg Brothers, Christ in Gethsemane, from Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, Musée Condé (fol. 142v)

Lorenzo Monaco, Nativity, predella of The Coronation of the Virgin, 1414, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Gentile da Fabriano, Nativity, predella of the Strozzi Altarpiece, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Renaissance and Baroque

Piero della Francesca, Vision of Constantine, from The Legend of the True Cross, circa 1452–1457, Arezzo, Italy, St. Francesco

Geertgen tot Sint Jans, Night Nativity, circa 1480, London, National Gallery

Kalkar, Jan Joest von, Arrest of Christ, 1505, Kalkar, Nikolaikirche

Raimondi, Marcantonio, The Dream of Raphael, engraving, circa 1506, London, British Museum

Raphael, The Liberation of St. Peter from Prison, 1513, Vatican, Stanza de Heliodoro

Michelangelo, Night, statue on the tomb of Giuliano de' Medici, 1524–1534, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo, Medici Chapel

Correggio, Adoration of the Shepherds (Holy Night), 1522, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Carracci, Ludovico, Jacob's Dream, 1605–1608, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Judith and Her Maidservant with the Head of Holofernes, circa 1625, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts

La Tour, Georges de, The Newborn, circa 1630, Rennes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Ruisdael, Jacob van, The Jewish Cemetery, circa 1655, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Romanticism through Postimpressionism

Fuseli, Henry, The Nightmare, 1781, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts

Carstens, Asmus Jakob, Night with Her Children, Sleep and Death, black and white chalk on beige, 1795, Weimar, Germany, Schlossmuseum

Goya, Francisco de, The Sleep of Reason Produces Monsters, etching, 1799

Runge, Philipp Otto, Night, 1803, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Goya, Francisco de, The Colossus, 1808–1812, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Goya, Francisco de, Executions of the Third of May, 1808, 1814, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Friedrich, Caspar David, Greifswald in Moonlight, 1816–1817, Oslo, Norway, Nasjonalgalerie

Allston, Washington, Moonlit Landscape, 1819, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Friedrich, Caspar David, Two Men Contemplating the Moon, 1819, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Friedrich, Caspar David, Moonrise over the Sea, 1822, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Palmer, Samuel, Moonlit Landscape, 1829–1830, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Art Museum

Quidor, John, The Money Diggers, 1832, Brooklyn, New York, The Brooklyn Museum

Friedrich, Caspar David, Sea Shore with the Rising Moon, 1835–1837, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlung

Millet, Jean-François, The Starry Night, 1850–1851, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery

Ryder, Albert Pinkham, Moonlight Marine, circa 1870–1890, New York, The Metropolitan Museum of Art

- Whistler, James Abbot McNeill, Nocturne in Blue and Gold: Old Battersea Bridge, 1872–1875, London, Tate Gallery
- Whistler, James Abbot McNeill, Nocturne in Black and Gold: The Falling Rocket, 1874, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts
- Grimshaw, Atkinson, Scarborough Lights, circa 1877, Scarborough, England, Art Gallery
- Whistler, James Abbot McNeill, Nocturne in Gray and Gold: Chelsea Snow, 1878, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Sargent, John Singer, Luxembourg Gardens at Night, 1879, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art, Johnson Collection
- Blakelock, Ralph, Diana's Mirror, circa 1880–1890, Akron, Ohio, Akron Museum of Art
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Cafe Terrace on the Place du Forum, Arles at Night, 1888, Otterloo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Night Cafe, 1888, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Art Gallery
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Starry Night, 1889, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Hodler, Ferdinand, The Night, 1890, Bern, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
- Mondrian, Piet, Ships in the Moonlight, 1890, The Hague, The Netherlands, J. C. Tenkink Collection
- Inness, George, Moonlight, Tarpon Springs, 1892, Washington, D.C., Phillips Collection
- Munch, Edvard, Evening on Karl Johannstrasse, 1892, Bergen, Norway, Collection Rasmus Meyer
- Munch, Edvard, Starry Night, 1893, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Fantin-Latour, Henri, L'Aurore et la Nuit, 1894, Birmingham, England, Museum and Art Gallery
- Rousseau, Henri, The Sleeping Gypsy, 1897, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Pissarro, Camille, Evening on the Boulevard Montmartre, 1897, London, National Gallery
- Twentieth Century*
- Munch, Edvard, White Night, 1901, Oslo, Norway, Nasjonalgalerie
- Kandinsky, Vasily, Night, 1906–1907, Munich, Germany, Städtische Galerie
- Mondrian, Piet, Summer Night, circa 1907, The Hague, The Netherlands, Gemeentemuseum
- Luks, George, Armistice Night, 1918, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art
- Beckmann, Max, The Night, 1918–1919, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
- Rouault, Georges, Christ in the Suburbs, 1920, Tokyo, Bridgestone Museum of Art
- Sloan, John, The City from Greenwich Village, 1922, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Dix, Otto, Meeting a Madman at Night, etching with aquatint and drypoint, 1924, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Miró, Joan, Dog Barking at the Moon, 1926, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art
- Ernst, Max, One Night of Love, 1927, Paris, private collection
- Ernst, Max, Vision Induced by the Nocturnal Aspect of Porte Saint-Denis, 1927, private collection
- Klee, Paul, The Departure of the Boats, 1927, Berlin, Nationalgalerie
- Hopper, Edward, Night Windows, 1928, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- O'Keeffe, Georgia, New York Night, 1928–1929, Lincoln, Nebraska Art Association, Sheldon Gallery
- Wood, Grant, The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere, 1931, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Klee, Paul, Fire at Full Moon, 1933, Essen, Germany, Folkwang Museum
- Dove, Arthur, Moon, 1935, Beverly Hills, California, Max Zurier Collection
- Dupain, Max, Night with Her Train of Stars and Her Gift of Sleep, circa 1936, Canberra, Australia, National Gallery
- Dove, Arthur, Rise of the Full Moon, 1937, Washington, D.C., The Phillips Collection
- Miró, Joan, Nocturne, 1938, New York, private collection
- Picasso, Pablo, Night Fishing at Antibes, 1939, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Delvaux, Paul, Phases of the Moon, 1939, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Miró, Joan, The Nightingale's Song at Midnight and Morning Rain, 1940, Osterville, Massachusetts, Collection H. Cameron Morris Jr.
- Miró, Joan, People in the Night Guided by the Phosphorescent Tracks of Snails, 1940, New York, Collection Leonard B. Stern
- Matta, Roberto, Invasion of the Night, 1941, San Francisco, California, Museum of Modern Art
- Hopper, Edward, Nighthawks, 1942, Chicago, Art Institute
- Delvaux, Paul, Sleeping Venus, 1944, London, Tate Gallery
- Tomlin, Bradley Walker, Tension by Moonlight, 1948, New York, Betty Parsons Gallery
- Tobey, Mark, Awakening Night, 1949, Utica, New York, Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute, Museum of Art
- Miró, Joan, People in the Night, 1950, New York, collection of Mrs. Genia Zadok
- Gottlieb, Adolph, Blue at Night, 1957, Richmond, Virginia, Museum of Fine Arts
- Lichtenstein, Roy, Moonlight, 1967, Sheffield, England, Sheffield City Art Galleries
- Gornick, April, Pulling Moon, 1983, Cleveland, Ohio, Phyllis Seltzer Collections
- Katz, Alex, Quarter Moon, 1987, New York, Marlborough Gallery
- Katz, Alex, Hudson, 1988, New York, Marlborough Gallery
- Katz, Alex, Varick, 1988, New York, Marlborough Gallery
- Bosman, Richard, Moonlight, 1993, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Thimmesch Gallery
- Bosman, Richard, Night Web, 1993, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Thimmesch Gallery

Further Reading

Arts Council of Great Britain, Under the Cover of Darkness: Night Prints, London: Arts Council, 1986

- Boime, Albert, "Van Gogh's Starry Night: A History of Matter and a Matter of History," Arts Magazine LIX (December 1984)
- Buchthal, Hugo, The Miniatures of the Paris Psalter: A Study in Middle Byzantine Painting, London: Warburg Institute, 1938
- Canberra, National Gallery of Australia, Surrealism: Revolution by Night, Canberra, National Gallery, 1993
- Cincinnati Museum of Art, Night Lights: 19th and 20th Century American Nocturne Paintings, Cincinnati, Ohio: Taft Museum, 1985
- Hijmans, Willem, Rembrandt's Nightwatch, Alphen aan den Rijn, The Netherlands: Sijthoff, 1978
- Kuspit, Donald, Alex Katz: Night Paintings, New York: Abrams, 1991
- Lanchner, Carolyn, Joan Miró, New York: The Museum of Modern Art, 1993
- Lippincott, Louise, Edvard Munch, Starry Night, Malibu, California: J. Paul Getty Museum, 1988
- Payne, Sandra, Atkinson Grimshaw: Knight's Errand, Wokingham, England: Corporate Link, 1987
- Penrose, Roland, Miró, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1985
- Powell, Nicholas, Fuseli: The Nightmare, New York: Viking Press, 1973; London: Allen Lane, 1973
- Rosenblum, Robert, Modern Painting and the Northern Romantic Tradition, New York: Harper, 1975
- Sutton, Denys, Nocturne: The Art of James McNeil Whistler, London: Country Life, 1963
- Vaughan, William, et al., Caspar David Friedrich, 1774–1840: Romantic Landscape Painting in Dresden, London: Tate Gallery, 1972
- Whitney, C., "The Skies of Vincent van Gogh," Art History IX (1986)

NIGHTMARE

Petra ten-Doesschate Chu

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Nightmare:

RENAISSANCE

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Henry Fuseli, The Nightmare, 1781, oil on canvas, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts, gift of Mr. and Mrs. Bert L. Smokler and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence A. Fleischman. (Courtesy of the Detroit Institute of Arts, 1955)

The word nightmare is derived from maere, an Old English term referring to an erotic night visitor of a monstrous nature whose visits are experienced by its victims as bad dreams. A similar creature, called mara, appears in Teutonic folklore (cf. the German Nachtmär and the French cauchemar). Many stories from Old English and Teutonic folklore tell of infants fathered by maeres. Perhaps the most famous among them is Merlin, the character from the Arthurian legend. The Conception of Merlin, represented in a French Gothic manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, shows a diabolical monster seated on a sleeping woman's chest.

The Old English and Teutonic maere or mara had their counterparts in classical antiquity. An ephialtes (Greek) or incubus (Latin) likewise brought bad dreams, usually of a sexual nature. Their identities could range from a deity to a demon, from the reincarnated ghost of a dead person to a goat-like animal or deformed human being.

During the Renaissance, Swiss physician-chemist Paracelsus (Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim) turned folk belief into pseudoscience by integrating incubi and their female counterparts, succubi, into a classification system of monstrous creatures. Thus, they found their place between nymphs, sylphs, pygmies, salamanders, and other exotic and imaginary creatures. The male incubi caused women's nightmares, the female succubi those of men.

It is interesting to note that, from ancient times, bad dreams were related to sexuality. This seems to anticipate Sigmund Freud's theory that dreams have their origins in sexual fears, conflicts, and repression.

Henry Fuseli's painting The Nightmare (1782), which is known in numerous versions and copies, illustrates Paracelsus's ideas, as it shows an incubus seated on the chest of a young sleeping girl, causing her to breathe with difficulty. In most versions of the painting its effect—simultaneously terrorizing and erotic—is enhanced by the presence, behind a parted curtain, of a white horse (a mare?) with flared nostrils and wide-open eyes. Fuseli's painting operates on three different levels of reality (or, if one prefers, unreality) in that it shows the dreamer, the mythical creature causing the dream, and the dream vision combined in a single image.

A small number of other images that similarly combine dreamers and their nightmares readily come to mind, the best known of which is probably Francisco de Goya's The Dream of Reason Produces Monsters (1799). Here an artist (no doubt Goya) has dozed off in his studio and is attacked by a swarm of owls and bats. On the ground, a huge catlike creature may represent the demon who has caused the dream. Odilon Redon's lithograph Marguerite Haunted by Specters is another example of a figure haunted by animalistic monsters, although here the dreamer is not reclining but appears to be sleepwalk-ing (a condition modern researchers have found not to be REM sleep, or a dream-conducive state). Paul Gauguin's The Loss of Virginity (1890–1891) is in the incubus tradition, as it shows a young naked girl about to be kissed by a fox. The same artist's The Spirit of the Dead Watches (1892) illustrates the close affinity between nightmares and pavor nocturnus, or night anxiety. The painting shows a young girl lying on a bed, rigid with fear, just as she has turned away from a dark witchlike creature behind her. In Ferdinand Hodler's Night (1890), which represents a landscape with sleeping couples and individuals, the central male figure is haunted by a succubus, completely covered by a black cloth, who crouches down over the lower part of his naked body. Eroticism and pavor nocturnus are combined here in an image that powerfully expresses the close connection between eros and thanatos.

More problematic than these images is Marcantonio Raimondi's engraving The Dream of Raphael (circa 1507–1508). The title of the print, which is probably apocryphal, implies that this is Raphael's dream vision. However, recent research has shown that Marcantonio's print is probably a copy of a lost work by Giorgione, which may have represented the dream of Hecuba, who, also represented in other Renaissance works (e.g., in a fresco by Giulio Romano in the Palazzo Ducale in Mantua, Italy), was the mother of Paris. Shortly before Paris was born, Hecuba dreamed that she gave birth to a torch that set the city of Troy on fire (Ovid, Heroides, xvi, 44ff). Art historian G. F. Hartlaub, who first ventured this interpretation of Marcantonio's print, suggests that one of the two sleeping women in the print is Hecuba, the other being the image of herself that she sees in her dream—a nightmare that includes a city catching fire in the background and several monstrous creatures in the foreground.

The list of works combining dreamers and their nightmares may be expanded if we add to it the frightening visions of both saints and sinners. Among the former are the temptation of St. Anthony (depicted by artists like Martin Schongauer, Hieronymus Bosch, Matthias Grünewald, and James Ensor) and the apocalyptic vision of St. John (Hans Memling); among the latter is the gruesome vision of Salome, who, dancing before her father and his guests, sees the decapitated head of John the Baptist hovering in the air (Gustave Moreau). It is noteworthy that in these works the dreamers are rarely depicted asleep. They seem wide awake, although possibly in a hallucinatory state.

So far we have assumed that the monstrous visions of these dreamers truly represent nightmare experiences. On initial consideration, nothing would seem further from the truth. The nightmare visions presented in these works are artfully composed images inspired by a variety of literary descriptions and visual imagery found in folklore, hagiography, botanical and zoological prints, alchemical and other occult texts and images, and so on. Dream experts, starting with Sigmund Freud, have demonstrated that, on waking, only a “dramatized” part of a dream is remembered (Freud called it the “manifest” as opposed to the forgotten, or “latent,” content), and even that part is generally long on generalities and short on detail. Moreover, dream researchers since Freud have shown that dreams are generally gray and only rarely chromatic, whereas dream and nightmare imagery in paintings often tends to be brightly colored.

Much of the imagery (by Hieronymus Bosch, Pieter Bruegel the Elder, Hans Baldung Grien, David Teniers, Francisco de Goya, and others) that has been called “nightmarish” appears on close study to be highly complex regarding its derivation. From a purely formalist point of view, however, much of it consists of the mixture of parts of different creatures. Albrecht Dürer once remarked, “If a person wants to create the stuff that dreams are made of, let him freely mix all sorts of creatures.” Dürer’s line has been related to a famous verse from Horace’s Art of Poetry (Epistola II, 3) that reads (in the translation of John G. Hawthorne):

Should a painter join a human head
And horse’s neck, add limbs from every beast
And cover them with multi-colored feathers
So that a lovely woman at the top
Ends in a black and ugly mermaid’s tail
When you saw this, my friends, wouldn’t you laugh?
Believe me, Pisos, such will a book
Where idle fancies, like a sick man’s dreams
Are fashioned without unity of head or foot.

To paraphrase Horace’s words, imagery that is produced by “idle fancies,” or by the free play of the imagination unrestricted by aesthetic rules and reason, is monstrous and can be compared with only one aspect of human experience: the nightmare (“a sick man’s dreams”). In art bound by classical rules, unbridled imagination is not encouraged, nor, for that matter, is it found in art that obeys the tenets of naturalism. But in periods when “anticlassicism” and “antinaturalism” predominate—the Middle Ages or the romantic, symbolist, and surrealist periods—free imagination is seen as the highest faculty an artist can possess.

If, with Sigmund Freud, we believe that dreams and free association (one of the key elements of imagination) “dredge” up repressed thoughts and images from the subconscious, then the connection between dreams and fantastic imagery becomes pertinent. That was certainly the way the surrealists saw it, as stated by the movement’s leader, André Breton: “Surrealism rests in the belief in the superior reality of certain forms of association neglected heretofore; in the omnipotence of the dream and in the disinterested play of thought.” Much surrealist imagery has a dreamlike, even nightmarish quality, and the same may be said for the work of many of their symbolist predecessors, such as Arnold Böcklin, Jean Delville, James Ensor, Alfred Kubin, Max Klinger, Odilon Redon, and Félicien Rops. Often these artists specify the importance of the dream for their work by including the words dream or night in their titles (e.g., Alfred Kubin’s graphic albums Traumgroteske [1908–1910, Grotesque Dream] and Traumwelt [1922, Dream World]). The word nightmare, however, is rarely encountered in symbolist and surrealist titles.

In conclusion, we may perhaps posit that although nightmarish imagery in art is not derived from nightmares per se, it is possible that nightmares and fantastic imagery have some shared roots in the subconscious mind.

See also Dreams/Visions; Sleep/Sleeping; Witchcraft/Sorcery

Selected Works of Art

Renaissance

The Conception of Merlin, manuscript, north French school, fourteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms Fr 95, fol. 113v0)

Memling, Hans, The Vision of Saint John on the Island of Patmos, painting, 1479, Bruges, Belgium, St. John’s Hospital, Municipal Museum

Schongauer, Martin, Temptation of Saint Anthony, engraving, circa 1480–1490

Bosch, Hieronymus, Temptation of St. Anthony, engraving, circa 1500, Lisbon, Portugal, National Museum

Raimondi, Marcantonio, The Dream of Raphael, engraving, circa 1507–1508

Grünwald, Matthias, Temptation of Saint Anthony, from Isenheim Altarpiece, circa 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden

Giulio Romano, Hecuba’s Dream, 1538, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo Ducale

Eighteenth Century

Goya, Francisco de, The Dream of Reason Produces Monsters, etching and aquatint, plate 43 of Los Caprichos, 1799

Fuseli, Henry, The Nightmare, painting, 1782, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Art

Fuseli, Henry, An Incubus Leaving Two Girls, 1793, Zurich, Switzerland, Muraltengut

Nineteenth Century

Grandville, The Dream of Grandville, drawing, circa 1829, Nancy, France, Musée Historique Lorrain

Grandville, The Nightmare, drawing, circa 1830, Nancy, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Johannot, Tony, The Nightmare, wood engraving, circa 1830

Holst, Theodor von, Bertalda Frightened by Apparitions, circa 1830–1840, England, private collection

Holst, Theodor von, Bertalda Frightened by Apparitions, circa 1830–1850, London, Anthony Mould Ltd.

Moreau, Gustave, The Apparition, watercolor, 1876, Paris, Musée d’Orsay

Redon, Odilon, Marguerite Haunted by Specters, lithograph

- Ensor, James, Temptation of St. Anthony, painting, 1887,
New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Hodler, Ferdinand, Night, painting, 1890, Bern, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
- Gauguin, Paul, The Loss of Virginity, painting, 1890–1891,
Norfolk, Virginia, Chrysler Museum
- Gauguin, Paul, The Spirit of the Dead Watches, painting, 1892, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Gallery

Twentieth Century

- Kubin, Alfred, Traumgroteske; Traumwelt, print albums, 1908–1910, 1922
- Kahlo, Frida, The Dream, 1940, New York, Selma and Nesuhi Ertegun Collection
- Fini, Léonor, Chthonian Divinity Watching over the Sleep of a Young Man, 1947, private collection

Further Reading

- Born, W., “Der Traum in der Graphik des Odilon Redon,” Die Graphischen Künste (1939)
- Breton, André, Manifeste du Surréalisme: Poisson soluble, Paris: Simon Kra, 1924
- Daniel, Howard, Devils, Monsters and Nightmares: An Introduction to the Grotesque and Fantastic in Art,
London and New York: Abelard-Schuman, 1964
- Getty, Clive, Grandville: Dessins originaux, Nancy, France:
Musée des Beaux-Arts, 1986
- Jones, Ernst, On the Nightmare, New York: Liveright, 1951
- Kiessling, Nicolas, The Incubus in English Literature, Ellensburg: Washington State University Press, 1977
- Powell, Nicolas, Fuseli: The Nightmare, New York: Viking, 1973; London: Allen Lane, 1973

OFFERING

Erika Cruikshank-Dodd

The following motifs and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Offering:

DIONYSIAC

JEWISH

CHRISTIAN

SACRIFICE OF CAIN AND ABEL

MUSLIM

GENRE PAINTING

The Fruit and the Knife, eighth century
A.D., mosaic, Khirbet el-Mafjar, Jordan.
(Courtesy of the author)

When Cain and Abel, sons of Adam and Eve, brought their offerings to God, God was said to have preferred Abel's sacrifice of an animal to the fruit of the field offered by Cain. According to Genesis 4, Cain became jealous and killed his brother. However, the unhappy demise of Abel and the inheritance of a terrible curse by the descendants of Cain did not put an end to the offering of the fruit of the field. On the first day of Sukkoth, a Jewish harvest festival that commemorates the temporary shelters used by the Jews during their wandering in the wilderness, Leviticus commanded the Jews to take "the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook . . ." (Leviticus 23:40). Considered in mythological terms, the inherent conflict that lies between these two kinds of offerings suggests the struggle between the herdsman, or wandering shepherd, and the settled farmer. According to fourteenth-century Arab historian Ibn Khaldun, this struggle has been repeated throughout history and has been the source of the rise and decay of civilizations. The difference between these two types of offerings illustrates a chapter in the developing consciousness of humankind.

The two different kinds of religious sacrifice, the "offering made by fire," as the Bible calls it, and the "fruit of the land," are distinguished in early Jewish history and ritual. The former is considered separately in this encyclopedia in the essay Sacrifice. This essay is concerned with offerings such as Cain's, the sacrifice of the fruit of the land, but it is evident that the distinction between the two kinds of offerings was not always so precise.

There was no distinction made between the two kinds of offerings in the early civilizations of Egypt and Mesopotamia where offerings of slaves, animals, fruits of the field, and precious objects were presented to the pharaoh, or to God, or to whomever was in authority. Later, in the classical world, offerings to cajole or appease the gods were either private, such as the conventional burning of incense or the sacrifice of an animal, or were great public ceremonies that sought the assurance of victory in war or games, or were in thanks thereof. It was not until the cult of Dionysus, the god of wine, captivated the Mediterranean world with its promise of renewal and reward that a wider vocabulary of offerings with specific symbolic connotations developed.

Offerings to Dionysus were typically from the harvest gathering, in particular the grape. By the first century A.D., the vine and grape cluster had not only become a part of Dionysian harvest celebrations, they also adorned all forms of art in the Mediterranean world and became the single most ubiquitous motif in sculpture, painting, and minor decoration from England to India. The vine motif has survived, sometimes with specific connotations, in Christian art and unconsciously in Islamic art and Indian textiles. The offering of the grape and the cultivation of the vine were associated with the expectation of spring, renewal, and rebirth, and to the grape icon were added other rewards of the harvest, such as wheat, poppy seeds, pomegranates, and other fruity delights. For Christians, Jews, and Muslims, these fruits preserved their original pagan meaning and continued to symbolize hope for rebirth and the expectation of a life after death. Pictures of the harvest gathering—garlands of fruit, grapes, fruit-bearing trees, and other rewards of the harvest season—were chosen to adorn the sarcophagi of the later Hellenistic period, during which they conveyed a symbolic message of renewal and rebirth connected with a future life in paradise.

The development of this symbolic meaning for the offering was enormously influential and may be illustrated through a discussion of only one fruit, the ethrog (a type of citrus fruit), one of the early Dionysiac symbols of renewal and rebirth. The ethrog, along with other harvest fruits from this period, belonged to a symbolic language that was eventually understood, interpreted intelligently, and assimilated by cultures that were different in many other respects. It was almost as common as the grape vine and had an equally long and productive history.

In the first centuries of the Christian era, there were several varieties of this fruit with shapes that differed in their representations. The original ethrog was citrus medica, a citrus fruit with a thick, lumpy, yellow skin that resembles a lemon but is about four times larger, has a thicker skin, and is sweeter than the garden variety of lemon. It seems to have preceded the orange and the lemon and to have come into the Near East from India as early as the third century B.C. As a symbol of bounty and goodness, citrus medica became prominent among the offerings made to Dionysus and eventually assumed wider associations understood by Jews, Christians, and Muslims. Even in Jewish tradition today the ethrog is firmly embedded in the religious festival of the Feast of the Tabernacles, or Sukkoth, the feast of harvest and thanksgiving. It also survives in Muslim and Christian folk tradition.

One of the earliest representations of a "paradise garden," or an idyllic pagan landscape, are the magnificent gardens painted in the Villa of Livia in Prima Porta in Rome (first century B.C.). The frescoes portray trees laden with ethrogs. The ethrog is also carved among the grape vines and bunches of fruit that adorn the cornices and the door jambs of temples in Palmyra, Syria, and Petra, Jordan (first and second centuries A.D.). A third-century painted pagan tomb, at one time in the National Museum of Beirut, Lebanon, is decorated with swaths of fruited garlands, hung with ethrogs. Ethrogs also adorn garlands surrounding the moon goddess Artemis on mosaics in a villa (third century A.D.) in Chah Bahar, Iran, the home town of the Roman emperor Philip the Arabian. These mosaics are presently in the museum at Soueida, but in a mosaic still located in Chah Bahar, ethrogs are carried, along with pomegranates, by the bountiful Ge, or Earth. In the later Hellenistic pavement mosaics of Apamea, Syria (third century A.D.), ethrogs are frequent ornaments.

In spite of the warnings in the Old Testament, by the second century B.C. the Jews had adopted many pagan ideas. Visions of plenty, represented by the ethrog, became a precious symbol of the Jewish harvest. As early as 136 B.C., the ethrog was formally represented on coins during the reign of Simon Maccabaeus, and in the following centuries, contemporary with the followers of Dionysus, it was liberally represented on the walls and mosaic floors of synagogues, in ornamental carvings for the synagogue, on tombs, and on coins. Ethrogs are among several Dionysiac motifs decorating the walls of the third-century synagogue of Dura-Europos, Syria. According to Jewish tradition, the ethrog was the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden. An ethrog in a dream was also regarded as an omen that one was "precious before his maker." If a pregnant woman bit into an ethrog, it was said she would bear a male child.

Thus the ethrog acquired symbolic associations with a life after death long before the rise of the formal Christian church. What is more, in the Jewish synagogue, the ethrog also acquired associations with the other kind of sacrifice, the "sacrifice by fire." On the left side of the niche in the synagogue at Dura-Europos, the ethrog is painted prominently beside the ancient symbols of the menorah and the lulab, whereas on the right of the niche, balancing the Jewish symbols, Abraham stands holding a knife beside the altar, his son Isaac upon it. Below the altar, a ram is portrayed caught in a thicket, and in the upper corner Abraham's wife Sarah stands in a tent. This may be the earliest documented example of an ethrog depicted in association with the sacrifice of Isaac. Art historian Erwin Ramsdell Goodenough has shown that eventually the knife alone, or in a group of three, replaced the pictorial version of this scene. In this capacity the knife stood for circumcision or a symbolic child sacrifice, such as the sacrifice of Isaac. The association of an ethrog with a knife then resolved the ancient quarrel between Cain and Abel.

The vision of paradise and a future life after death was very real to early Christians, and paradise was the central theme in the decoration of their churches. Like the vine, the pomegranate, and other symbols of earthly abundance, ethrogs in rinceaux (ethrog trees) commonly adorn the mosaic pavements of fifth- and sixth-century churches in Israel; Lebanon; the ancient Syrian regions of Hauran and Jebel ed Druze; Aleppo, Syria; and Amman, Jordan, among others. In the National Museum of Damascus in Syria, the beautiful paradise mosaic from Um Hartain (sixth century A.D.) is planted with ethrog trees. In several of these mosaics the trees are depicted beside scenes of animals and sacrificial altars, as in the sixth-century mosaics of Khirbet el-Mukhayyat on Mount Nebo (Pisgah) in Jordan.

By the middle of the fifth century A.D., iconoclastic ideas were spreading among Jews and Christians throughout Syria and Palestine, and the replacement of the figural depiction of the sacrifice of Isaac with the symbol of the knife was a response to this movement. This image is less common in early Christian art, although it was used to decorate church pavements. It occurs among the fruit in the acanthus scrolls on a church pavement in Apamea, Syria; in the churches of Madeba in nearby Ma'in, Jordan; and in churches on Mount Nebo (Pisgah). In the latter example, the fruit is in a bowl, accompanied by one or two knives. It appears that the symbol of the fruit and the knife was also understood by early Christians and—consciously or not—carried with it the theme of the sacrifice by fire along with the sacrifice of the fruit of the land.

The sacrifice of Isaac was particularly significant in early Christian iconography as it was regarded as a prefiguration of the Crucifixion. The language used to describe the sacrifice of Isaac acquired new, specifically Christian, meaning, just as the New Testament reinterpreted the Old Testament. While Jews had once insisted that the sacrifice by fire was preferable to the pagan sacrifice of the fruit of the field, Christians began to insist that the sacrifice of Isaac signified not the chosen descendants of Jacob, but the risen Christ.

The first Muslims decorated their buildings using an artistic vocabulary common to all three religions. The vine and the grape, as well as other fruits of abundance, appear in Omayyad mosaics to represent the rewards of the future life in paradise. The ethrog appears in abundance in garlands and on trees in the mosaics of the Dome of the Rock (seventh century A.D.) in Jerusalem and on the trees heavily laden on the facade of the prayer hall in the Omayyad Mosque (eighth century A.D.) in Damascus, Syria. Ethrogs in garlands and in baskets of fruit lavishly decorate the arches of the courtyard, appear in the soffits, and appear in the vaults of the Omayyad Mosque.

The only striking difference between these and other contemporary Jewish or Christian mosaics is that the landscapes were not filled with any breath of life nor with other symbolic imagery, such as the Christian fish or cross or the Jewish menorah or lulab. The only specifically Muslim vocabulary in these mosaics lies in their inscriptions and in their lack of figural representation. Iconoclasm as understood by early Islam firmly applied to the decoration of the mosque where the habitations of the next world were indicated, but figural restrictions did not apply outside the precincts of the mosque—in Omayyad palaces, figural decoration was as prolific as it was in contemporary Byzantine art.

On the floor of the main hall of the baths in the Omayyad palace at Khirbet el-Mafjar, near Jericho, Jordan (eighth century A.D.), there is a large geometric mosaic with no obvious representational designs, a floor pattern that conforms to the patterns on contemporary Christian and Jewish iconoclast pavements. However, at the head of the room before the throne is a single panel that portrays an ethrog with a knife. Because there is no other representational mosaic in the room, this mosaic can be attributed special meaning. If, like other mosaics of the same period, it is supposed to represent the sacrifice of Isaac, it assumes a specifically Muslim context in its palace location.

From the beginning of Islam, Muslims understood Abraham to be the founder of the Ka'aba and the first Muslim. Celebration of the Adha, the feast of the sacrifice, is the most significant feast and the most profound ritual occasion in Islam. The Prophet Muhammad proclaimed Abraham to be the "representative of the absolute primitive religion from which Judaism and Christianity have diverged and to which Islam has returned." The fruit and the knife represented in the panel of the Omayyad palace bath hall would presumably convey to both Christians and Jews in Palestine the original authority of Islam.

The meaning of the offering panel at Khirbet el-Mafjar is complicated by another story that connects the ethrog with paradise: the story of Yusuf (Joseph) as told in the Koran and in later traditions. The story of Yusuf in the Koran is virtually identical with the story of Joseph in the Bible except for the addition of a few incidents. The neighbors of Zuleika, Potiphar's wife, were said to have gossiped about her and criticized her for her open love of the slave Yusuf. In order to exonerate herself, she invited the local ladies to visit her and, at a chosen moment, she summoned Yusuf, who appeared before them to serve them. At the sight of his beauty, the ladies cut their hands with the knives they were using to cut their fruit. Zuleika was promptly justified, an example of a lover of truth, beauty, and the divine. Yusuf was seen as an example of purity, resistance to temptation, and divine beauty. A story later arose that, before the birth of Yusuf, a tree stood outside the house in the garden of Yakub (Jacob). This tree produced a twig on the occasion of the birth of each of Jacob's sons. The tree already had 11 twigs when, on the occasion of Yusuf's birth, it did not produce a twelfth twig. Yakub prayed to God, whereupon the angel Gabriel descended from paradise and brought a twig that surpassed all the others by blossoming and bearing fruit. The Surah of Yusuf became associated with purity, beauty, justice, and with the heir to a new dynasty, the hope of future generations.

The Surah of Yusuf and the traditions connected with it would not be so attractive in the context of paradise imagery were it not for the associations already connecting the fruit of paradise with the Garden of Eden in Jewish tradition. Jewish tradition also carried the belief that the appearance of an ethrog in a dream meant that one was precious before his or her maker (as was Jacob, the father of the 12 tribes of Israel) and was associated with the birth of a male child (Joseph). For Jews, the story of Joseph and Zuleika was embellished—the fifth-century Midrash Tanhuma specifically states that Zuleika gave her guests citrons and knives. Islamic tradition inherited much of Jewish tradition, and this story is no exception.

Whereas the main court of the Khirbet el-Mafjar palace is properly decorated with spiritual symbols conveyed by nonfigurative motifs, the entrance to the bath hall has representations of voluptuous dancers displaying the physical delights of paradise. Separation of physical delights from spiritual pleasures is difficult in Islam, for the divine is always one, both in this world and the next. For Islam, however, the pleasures of the next world are a taste, or a reflection, of the pleasures of the next, so that in their placement at the doors of the hall the dancers anticipate the pleasures of the bath.

The bath is both a literal and symbolic cleansing agent, and water's attendant symbolism can be traced back to the first ancient bathing rituals. The position of an ethrog tree beside water in a garden stems from a long tradition that can be traced back at least to first-century B.C. Persia. A courtyard with a pool and the fruit of paradise are thought to be an earthly reflection of paradise, "the gardens underneath which rivers flow." This imagery still lives on in Arab folklore: in the gardens of the Middle East—in Damascus, Beirut, and Aleppo—the kibbad (ethrog) is traditionally planted beside the courtyard birket (pool) in everything from ordinary homes to great palaces. Six ethrog trees were planted around the swimming pool of the United States Embassy in Damascus.

Thus the image of the ethrog with the knife in the main bath hall of the Khirbet el-Mafjar palace was traditional, but along with general associations of paradise it carried other, strictly contemporary, connotations. The placement of the panel before the throne indicated who owned the palace. The person identified by the fruit and the knife was in a position of authority, at the head of an earthly paradise that lay between this world of equals and the first Muslim. In the context of the sacrifice of Abraham and the story of Joseph, the mosaic of the fruit and the knife in the Khirbet el-Mafjar palace could be read by all who entered the hall—by Christians, Muslims, and Jews—as a proclamation of faith to the People of the Book, an announcement of the glories of future generations attributed to the person who sat on the throne, and an affirmation of the all-embracing unity of Islam.

The ethrog is only one of several offerings from the fruit of the field with a long and varied history. Although these fruits preserved something of their original symbolic content over time, their interpretations became broadened, modified, or vague. Other motifs from the repertoire of Dionysus, such as shafts of wheat, the ivy leaf, or the grape vine, have a similar history and have persisted through different cultures to this day. While the sacrificial knife connected with ethrogs dropped out of our symbolic vocabulary altogether, the same fruit that was once enjoyed by the nymphs of Dionysus still lives on in the Feast of the Tabernacles, on the pear tree at Christmas, and by the pool in the courtyard of an Arab house.

See also Abundance; Honor/Honoring; Logos/Word; Sacrifice

Selected Works of Art

Dionysiac

Frescoes, first century B.C., Rome, Prima Porta, Villa of Livia

Sculpture on temples, first and second centuries A.D., Palmyra, Syria, and Petra, Jordan

Pagan tomb, third century, Beirut, Lebanon, National Museum

Villa mosaics, third century, Chah Bahar, Iran, now in Soueida, Iran, Museum

Mosaics and acanthus scrolls, third century, Apamea, Syria

Jewish

Coins of Simon Maccabaeus, second century B.C.

Mosaics, second century A.D., Capernaum, ancient Palestine, Synagogue

Wall decorations, second century A.D., Dura-Europos, Syria, Synagogue

Stone relief, first–fourth century A.D., Ostia, Italy

Menorah stem on a bone plaque from Bet She'an, Israel, Department of Antiquities and Museums

Jewish cenotaphs depicting the sacrifice of Abraham

Christian

Mosaics, sixth century, Khirbet el-Mukhayyat, Mount Nebo (Pisgah), Jordan, Church of Saints Lot and Procopius

Mosaics, sixth century, Khirbet el-Mukhayyat, Mount Nebo (Pisgah), Jordan, Chapel of the Priest John

Mosaics, sixth century, Madaba Baptistry

Paradise mosaics, sixth century, from Um Hartain, Damascus, Syria, National Museum of Damascus
Mary and Sergius, mosaics, early seventh century, Jerash, Jordan, Church of Elijah
 Mosaics, eighth century, Ma'in, Jordan, churches of Madeba

Sacrifice of Cain and Abel

Sacrifices of Cain and Abel, bronze bas-relief, 1015, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral

Sacrifice of Cain and Abel, fresco, circa 1200, Sigena Monastery, Chapter House

Eyck, Jan and Hubert van, Cain and Abel: Sacrifice and Murder, panels over Adam and Eve in the Ghent Altarpiece, 1432, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo

Albertinelli, Mariotto, The Sacrifice of Cain and Abel, circa 1510, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Byzantine School, Story of Cain and Abel, fresco, sixteenth century, Mount Athos, Greece, The Laura, Refectory

Vernet, Claude-Joseph, Cain and Abel Bringing Their Sacrifice, before 1789, Sacramento, California, Crocker Art Gallery

Millais, John Everett, The Rejection of Cain's Sacrifice, before 1896, Birmingham, England, Art Gallery

Muslim

Mosaics, seventh century A.D., Jerusalem, Dome of the Rock
 Facade of the prayer hall, eighth century A.D., Damascus, Syria, Omayyad Mosque

The Fruit and the Knife, mosaic, eighth century A.D., Khirbet el-Mafjar, Jordan

Genre Painting

Monticelli, Adolphe, The Offering, oil on panel, circa 1865, Los Angeles, Los Angeles County Museum

Further Reading

Encyclopedia Judaica, Jerusalem, Israel: Keter, 1971

Balty, Janine, Mosaïcs Antiques de Syrie, Brussels, Belgium: Centre Belge de Recherches Archéologiques, 1977

Creswell, Keppel Archibald Cameron, Early Muslim Architecture, Oxford: Clarendon, 1932

Dodd, Erica Cruikshank, "The Mosaic of the Fruit and the Knife in Khirbet al-Mafjar," Studies in the History and Archaeology of Palestine, Aleppo, Syria: Aleppo University Press, 1984

Donin, Hayim Halevy, Sukkot, Jerusalem, Israel: Keter, 1974

Ettinghausen, Richard, From Byzantine to Sassanian Iran and the Islamic World, Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1972

Goodenough, Erwin Ramsdell, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, New York: Pantheon, 1954

Grabar, Andre, "Recherches sur les sources juives de l'art paléochrétien," Cahiers Archéologiques XI (1960)

Kitzinger, Ernst, Israel Mosaics of the Byzantine Period, Milan, Italy: UNESCO, 1965

Piccirillo, Michele, I Mosaici di Giordania, Rome: Quasar, 1986

ORDER/CHAOS

Paul Grimley Kuntz
Lee Braver

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Order/Chaos:

CREATION OUT OF CHAOS: IN THE BEGINNING . . .

THE LAST JUDGMENT

APOCALYPTIC FEAR AND MILLENARIAN HOPE

ORDER OUT OF CHAOS: ARTIST AS CREATOR

MORAL ORDER

William Hogarth, Tailpiece, or the Bathos, April 1764, engraving, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University, Lewis Walpole Library. (Courtesy of the Print Collection, Lewis Walpole Library, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut)

The traditional view is that chaos was the primordial state out of which God brought order to the cosmos. Creation was ordered into a hierarchy in which each element had its place, and human beings were at the summit. Chaos, still existing in this ordered hierarchy, would finally be rectified at the ordered division of the Last Judgment. Artists who use symbols of chance, lack of constant regularity, monsters, calamities, catastrophes, and irreversible decay call attention to what had been overlooked or believed transcended in the traditional view. Modernity revolts against this traditional understanding of the cosmos.

If this outline contrasting traditional and modern symbols seems too abstract and philosophical and seems to omit the vividly concrete works of art, compare Michelangelo's frescoes in the Sistine Chapel with the final etching and engraving of William Hogarth. In the frescoes, the all-encompassing scope is from Creation to the Last Judgment, from the beginning to the end of time. In a most beautiful creation, God places Adam and Eve only slightly lower than the angels and Himself. But they disobey and are driven out of paradise. The rest of the biblical story is of the righteous who were saved, as Noah from the flood, but again fell and disobeyed God. The prophets and sibyls warn of temptations and try to save the people until the divine Son of God, Jesus Christ, gives his life to ransom all peoples. The story has an ending, when, at the end of time, the righteous ascend and are lifted by titanic angels into heaven, and the wicked descend and are pulled by devils into the abyss. Thus, there is an overall design, and evil is finally overcome. We can foresee the final reordering of the human actors in this divine drama according to the cosmic judge.

Hogarth reflects ordinary life in London during the eighteenth century, as seen in the crowded streets, homes, shops, and courts. Hogarth is famous for two sequences: the Rake's Progress and the Harlot's Progress. "Progress" is retrograde. As for the cosmic vision, it survives only in his print of a sermon, in which the few persons in church fall asleep.

People strive to satisfy their ordinary natural needs. People get money and sexual satisfaction, and those who succeed are pompous and contemptuous of those who fail. Critics find the results summed up in Hogarth's final etching, Tailpiece, or the Bathos (1764). Hogarth mocks the sublime in painting. The scene is outside what was once a tavern, called The World's End, and the signpost leans (its symbol is the world in flames). Winged Time is exhausted and leans against a crumbling tower. Time's scythe is broken, and he has just written his last will. He bequeaths, "All and every Atom thereof to chaos whom I appoint my sole Executor." The witnesses who signed are the Three Fates. Everything is broken: the bow, the crown, the rifle, and the palette. The bell is cracked and fallen from the tower, and its clock is without hands. The tree is dead, and the gravestone has a skull and crossed bones. The source of light, the sun god Apollo, is dead in his chariot, which is drawn by collapsing horses going into the clouds. A century earlier, John Donne, dean of St. Paul's in London, had foreseen a new world view and lamented in An Anatomie of the World:

'Tis all in peeces, all cohaerence gone.

All just supply, and all relation.

Hogarth presents profound symbols of disorder, as Michelangelo elaborates a vision from the first ordering (separating light from dark) to the last reordering in the hierarchical levels of the best, good, bad, and worst of us.

Just how much portrayals of the Last Judgment have changed over the years can be seen even more forcefully when turning to the twentieth century. Although few modern artists depict the Last Judgment literally, many use its icon in new contexts, usually that of war. Pablo Picasso's Guernica is one excellent example, as is Otto Dix's triptych War. Dix's central panel shows a "chaotic landscape of desecration" (McGreevy, p. 79), littered with corpses and ruins, where the only living figure is dehumanized by gas mask and helmet. Inspired by World War I, Dix's apocalyptic vision shows humanity destroying itself. If Hogarth embodies Donne's image of "all cohaerence gone," Dix's painting renders the lines of Irish author William Butler Yeats's description from The Second Coming: "Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world."

Although Hogarth's depiction of entropy seems tame next to Dix's cry of utter despair, both use images of chaos. Michelangelo's world had a perfect, divine order that allowed him to show a purposeful history of humanity. Hogarth, his faith perhaps undermined by new scientific advances, saw an impersonal universe winding down without a final purpose. Dix, who lived through the horrors of World War I, was deeply pessimistic. Where Hogarth was stripped of religion's ordering power, Dix's cynicism forces him to transform the Last Judgment into a vision of destruction that humanity inflicts on itself. Hogarth's world lacks a reassuring order, whereas Dix's world has gone mad.

Creation Out of Chaos: In the Beginning . . .

The Western vision of order coming out of disorder is constructed, in various proportions, from the Hebraic faith in a creator God and from Hellenic views. Some philosophers, such as Plato (in his Timaeus), require a Demiurge who shapes a world out of elements or, as Aristotle put it (in his Metaphysics), a being who thinks about thought. The biblical view is anthropomorphic and thus more appropriate to visual art. The story from Genesis began with an original nothing or utter waste, sometimes still called tohubohu, but chaos, from the Greek poet Hesiod, is the common name. The famous line from Hesiod was quoted by both Plato and Aristotle: "First was chaos and endless night, but then broad-breasted earth" (Theogony). Chaos acquired the biblical meaning of "without form and void.” Thus, one should not be surprised that when the creation from Ovid’s Metamorphoses was pictured, “God or Kindlier Nature” appears less like Jupiter than like Christ (Heninger, p. 15).

There are deep paradoxes in trying to visualize the invisible, to represent and imagine the condition before there was space and form. We can respect one artist, Mykola Shramchenko, who knew his Bible in Hebrew and who believed in the prohibition against making an image of the divine because it tempts people to worship what they have found in the material world or have themselves made. The artist inscribed the words “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” but left the page utterly blank. Pictures begin with Adam and Eve. The paradox of presenting an invisible creator with an unvisualizable chaos has a second solution, namely, to use the unpronounceable four Hebrew letters, too sacred to be uttered, and to inscribe YHWH on a cloud (in the English Bible, the name of God is Jehovah). Similarly, we have examples where these four Greek letters are inscribed: XAOΣ (Henkel and Schöne, fig. 1).

Rather than using the verbal to confess the inability to devise a visual symbol, one can take seriously the Hebrew connotation of tohu va bohu, the trackless waste or boundless ocean, and to picture turbulent water (although of course there was not yet any water or other matter). Chaos is, according to etymologists, “a yawning gap,” or as one translator says, “chasm” in English. In the nineteenth century, John Martin used this meaning in The Bridge over Chaos.

Medieval artists devised three common solutions to symbolize chaos. The first takes the word form in a Euclidian sense. The perfect shape was a circle, a closed figure, with every point of its circumference equidistant from a center. Therefore, a cloud, with an indefinite, irregular wavy contour, was in this sense formless, a shapeless glob of whatever. This image does well when coupled with the divine architect with a compass, which is well known through William Blake’s God Creating the Universe, or Ancient of Days, although it was a medieval tradition (Blunt, pp. 71–87). The modern word gas is derived from chaos. Gas cannot be cubical, spherical, or cylindrical. Obviously, the question of form makes sense only of solids.

Another solution is to think of the “elements,” as they were called, of the physical universe. They are, from Greek physics, earth, water, air, and fire, and they belong in this sequence from bottom to top. Naturally, a rock sinks, air rises above water, and flames go even higher. If this is the natural order, then the artist defies nature by mixing them symbolically. This is most clearly done in a symbol of chaos devised by Robert Fludd in 1617 in his Utriusque Cosmi Historia: “The chaos of elements at the beginning of the creation of the world.”

This may seem naive because it is a concept of element (outdated by our chemistry) that was defined by Antoine-Laurent Lavoisier in the French Enlightenment. However, even now some very sophisticated physicists, in their cosmology, refer to a “primordial soup,” for soup is simply neither liquid nor solid but both—a liquid of varying thickness with bits of various sizes floating around in it.

A third solution is to follow Moses and Hesiod in thinking of cosmos as a world in which there is light, which is, after all, a necessity for our perceiving separate things. Thus, darkness is the symbol of chaos, for we cannot distinguish one thing from another, and God utters the words that begin cosmos, “Let there be light” (Genesis 1:3). In Joseph Haydn’s oratorio The Creation (1798), this commandment, sung majestically, transforms the cacophony that precedes it into music.

By no means have all the solutions been exhausted in this tradition of bringing cosmos out of chaos. In 1990, Egai Fernandez, a Philippine artist, exhibited Creation in the Gallery Genesis in Manila, Philippines. In a circular frame with gaseous background is a baby whose right hand shows the outline of a dove, which can be read as the spirit moving on the face of the deep and as the hope for peace (Takenaka and O’Grady, pp. 16–17).

The biblical ordering of Creation is a sequence of six “days.” During this period, there is a transition from the most general conditions, light and dark, to the summit of earthly creations, man and woman, who share characteristics with the animals but are with “spirit” or “soul” in God’s image. God “breathed into [Adam’s] nostrils the breath of life” (Genesis 2:7).

“In the Beginning” (Genesis 1–2:4)

The tradition of picturing God bringing order out of chaos can be followed in illuminated Bibles and, when Bibles were printed, in woodblocks. One medieval convention, later appropriated by William Blake, is to show the Lord of Creation as a geometer with a compass and, when the central point is fixed in the tohubohu of a world to be shaped, God as the cosmic architect.

Two very different sequences of the days of Creation occur in mosaic in the atrium of St. Mark’s Basilica in Venice, Italy, and in one of the four marble pilasters on the facade of the Cathedral of Orvieto, Italy, both from the high Middle Ages (thirteenth century). A cupola of St. Mark’s shows the six days of creation in six segments of the inner of three rings. These concentric circles are divided by inscriptions from the biblical story. In the first scene, the dove hovers over the swirling waters; in the second, Christ commands the yellow and white spherical sun and blue moon to shoot their rays into the darkness. The Earth also is a sphere, and angels celebrate the separation of dry land from water. With plants and animals, the mosaicist shows a love of the variety of living forms. The climax is man formed from the dust and a court scene in which the Sabbath is hallowed. The Creation continues in the second circle. The Creator, breathing his breath into Adam, is pictured as a little man with butterfly wings entering Adam. Adam is set in paradise; names the animals; and is given a helpmate, Eve. By stages, the viewer’s eye moves into the outer circle of the Temptation, Fall, and Expulsion. The embracing vision is that human history has cosmic significance (Demus, vol. 2, text and plates).

Presentation of the days of Creation is not uncommon in medieval mosaics and sculpture (Réau). A most remarkable and influential sequence is depicted on the first of four marble pilasters of the Cathedral of Orvieto. The sculpture, attributed to Lorenzo Maitani, is, in its tree-and-branches organization, related to the lignum vitae (tree of life) tradition, as in the north doors of the Hildesheim Cathedral in Germany. This is quite different from the Byzantine tradition of St. Mark’s. Each of four piers has the bottom row of scenes beginning the story, with five panels on either side of a vinelike tree. The branchlike arms of leaves and fruit divide the levels. The Lord of Creation is Christ presiding over a landscape with trees and birds perched ready to fly. The dove represents the Spirit, and the hand from on high represents God the Father. Thus, the three persons of the Holy Trinity participate in the Creation. The sculptor pictures the animals as four-footed mammals and arranges them from the smallest to the tallest (a camel) in regular sequence. The Christlike creator in a third panel, the sixth day of Creation, bends over the sleeping Adam. The rest of the scenes, witnessed by heavenly messengers, as in the mosaics of St. Mark's, are of the Fall and Expulsion and the violence of Cain's murder of his brother. The second panel shows the prophets foretelling the coming of a Savior, the third his redeeming sacrifice, and the fourth the end of time—the Last Judgment (Carli; Norton).

The most famous sequence of days of Creation is from the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican. The Renaissance tended to revert to the earlier representation of the Creator as a white-bearded patriarch, distinctly God the Father rather than God the Son. Michelangelo compresses five days into three panels, and, as in the whole tradition (except for some of the most recent), it is the sixth day of creation, the creation of man and woman, that is the climax of the first week. God the Creator, able with His mighty arms to separate light from darkness, able by His word to bring worlds into being and to divide earth from water, shares His power with humanity. The stupendous painting of the naked youthful Adam, his outstretched hand almost touched by the finger of God, is the most familiar visualization of human dignity. No need any longer for a little winged soul, for Adam is almost as large as the Father, and no need of any story of Eve drawn from Adam's side. A most intelligent and beautiful Eve is in the embrace of God. She glances admiringly, even amorously, at her male counterpart. He has been created for her, as well as she for him.

Among other great visualizations of the Creator's acts are those of Raphael, also in the Vatican. The sixteenth-century painters bring out as never before the contrast between God visualized as above and outside of creation and pictured as within nature. Lucas Cranach the Elder shows the Father, emitting rays of light, above the outer spheres of stars and planets in Creation of the Animals. His arms are outstretched in blessing the Earth with humans at the center. However, Tintoretto, in his painting of the same title, shows the Creator soaring above the fish and monsters of the deep; he is with the birds. The great event requires a god who is himself active (Valcanover and Pignatti, pl. 9).

The most frequently reproduced symbol of God creating the cosmos is Blake's print Ancient of Days. The long white hair and beard float in the high wind, and the kneeling figure is set against a sunlike spherical source of light. The left arm of the Creator stretches down, holding a wide compass. The paradox, in Blake's case, is that the compass (used in medieval illustrations probably to ascribe to the cosmic mind the source of form, such as the circle) was also a symbol of a world laid out mathematically. Blake preferred the biblical vision to that of Newton's mathematical physics, and it is curious that a symbol precious to the Enlightenment and used by Masonic lodges should be best known in its depiction by this prophet of the romantic revolt (Bindman and Toomey, pl. 655). Blake also followed the text of the English Bible very closely to visualize each of the six days of Creation. But in the marginal panels there is this expression of joy: "When the morning stars sang together and all the Sons of God shouted for joy."

Blake, who probably knew the Bible available to him (the King James English version of 1611) better than any other artist, coupled the six days of Creation with this text. This is the fourteenth plate of his Book of Job (London, 1825). In contrast to human misery is the glory of God's Creation. Throughout his book, Blake selects the texts that contrast the weakness of humanity to the beauty of the creator's work. Five human figures below are on their knees. In the middle with arms outstretched, blessing them and all creation, is the creator, and above four angels lift their arms and sing praises.

The six days of Creation are three vignettes in the left- and right-hand margins. "Let there be light," with light written in the midst of a sunburst; "Let there be firmament," with a sphere so designated; and finally, on the left-hand side, "Let the waters be gathered together into one place" is symbolized by the sea, and "Let the Dry Land appear" is the contoured series of mountains rising above. On the right-hand side, "And God made Two Great Lights" has a large central earth with other spheres, "Sun" and "Moon." "Let the Waters bring forth abundantly" shows a sea monster appearing from the ocean and birds flying in the air while "Let the Earth bring forth cattle and creeping things and beasts" shows prominently a cow, a lion, and so on. But the main theme is human weakness in the cosmos and in a world that humanity could not make and cannot control. The text is from Job: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" (Job 38:31) (Bindman and Toomey, pl. 619).

Exactly a century later (1926), one of the most original and popular of twentieth-century graphic artists, M. C. Escher, presented an exhibit in Venice that included his Six Days of Creation. A great bird flies over the surface of a sphere on the first day. It is not a dove representing the Spirit, and neither God the Father nor God the Son appears. With boldness the wild waters, massive land, and thunderclouds separate. Plants flourish, and all kinds of animals appear, among them a duck-billed platypus! Finally, instead of a bleak, hilly Earth comes the luxuriant garden. Adam and Eve, standing close together, backs toward the viewer, enjoy a spectacular view of a sea with islands under an overarching palm tree. They are black, although Eve has flowing blonde hair. Perhaps Eden has become a tropical island, a Tahiti, but it is home, with a cat and mouse, a dog, a rabbit, and a cow (Bool and Kist, pp. 104–109). Earlier, in 1921, Escher had cut a paradise in wood with a fierce tiger and lion. Between the couple holding hands sits a grinning monkey. Escher adds to the tree of knowledge an owl with outstretched wings (Bool and Kist, p. 69).

Photographer Ernst Haas linked his reading of the text of Genesis 1–2 with photographs of the elements, the seasons, and the creatures. The first edition of The Creation (1971) was so popular that when it sold out, the artist prepared a revised edition (1983). The significant change is that, because the book had circulated worldwide, Haas wanted to avoid the parochialism of quoting only the Old Testament story:

For the text I considered choosing creation myths from each continent, but I soon decided against that and selected only these words and sentences that had inspired me even before the first edition. (Haas, p. 8)

The photographer had spent many years in India and loved the powerful words of the Hindu text Rig-Veda. The other text is from the Tao-te Ching of Lao-tzu, which Haas carries with him on his travels. Hymn 129 of book X of the Rig-Veda is not anthropomorphic as is the Hebrew myth. The Taoist adoration of the "Eternal Tao" is to celebrate "The Mother of All Things" (Haas, p. 21). The Creation may rightly be claimed for the female. Haas knew and might have quoted from Babylonian or Egyptian scriptures or from stories of the Creation by peoples without scripture, such as Native Americans (Haas, pp. 13–14). The theme is universal, but strong distinctions are made.

The photographer's interest is in the elements. In addition to earth, water, air, and fire, the alchemists induced him to consider sulfur the fifth element, and in Yellowstone Park he photographed the fantastic forms in the sulfur pits. When these and other photographs were assembled and viewed while listening to Haydn's music, Haas came to recognize that he had "photographed the creation of the world" (Haas, pp. 145–146).

One point must be made in conclusion. Escher's woodcuts of nature are without a visible God, but there was still in the Garden the conflict over God's commandment "Thou shalt not eat" and Eve's taking the fruit, heeding to the tempter, a beautiful lizard in the tree. Adam sits, holding his head in distress. There is human struggle between obedience and disobedience (Boal and Kist, The Fall of Man, fig. 114). By half a century later, Haas's Creation scene includes nature, only without a Creator. God is missing, as are Adam and Eve.

The Last Judgment

As the Hebrew Scriptures begin with order shaped out of chaos, so the Christian Gospels and the Apocalypse, the Revelation of St. John the Divine, bring the sacred story to its conclusion. Out of the disorder of human history will come a new order. This moral chaos must be shaped by a Last Judgment, in which the suffering saints are exalted and the prospering wicked cast down.

The hope of Israel, proclaimed by the prophet Daniel, was that God will weigh the evils of earthly kingdoms in his balances (Daniel 5:27) and send a Son of Man "with the clouds of heaven" to establish "an everlasting dominion" over "all people, nations, and languages" (Daniel 7:13–14). The judgment is not only of the living but also of the dead. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Daniel 12:2). The Creation was light shining out of darkness, and the end of time is as the beginning: "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever" (Daniel 12:3).

The Christian Gospels identify the Son of Man as Jesus Christ, the Messiah. His return can be known by troubles, as Daniel had predicted, and Matthew adds, "The sun [shall] be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven. . . . And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in Heaven" (Matthew 24:29–30).

Out of the hundreds of visualized Last Judgments, a few must suffice to provide the main features of these compositions. The Byzantine principle of hierarchy demands clear horizontal division between the levels. In Torcello, an island in the Lagoon of Venice, is a cathedral whose eastern wall was once covered with mosaics. On the highest level is the Christ risen from the dead, welcomed by Mother Mary and accompanied by John the Baptist, who proclaimed the coming of the Messiah.

On the level of judgment, Christ sits on rainbows in a mandorla, with saints surrounding him. Six of the 12 apostles are on each side. From underneath the throne is a rivulet of fire that flows down to the lower right corner, shown as a hell of punishment. On the lower left is a heaven of rewards. The work of separating the "goats" from the "sheep" is administered by winged angels. We are reminded that this moral ordering is in a context of cosmic order, for the angels blow their trumpets, as on the days of the Creation. On one hand is dry land with animals and on the other water with fish. The contrast between a good angel and bad angels (devils) is clearly made in the next level down. The good holds the balances or scales, as mentioned by Daniel (weighing the souls was an ancient metaphor in the Egyptian Book of the Dead). The devils try to tip the scales with rods. The order of justice must prevail, for on the left hand (of the judge above) are the damned being tortured. In contrast to these are the elect praising God. As we get to a lower level of hell, we go from whole naked bodies in flames to dismembered hands, arms, and skulls. The garden is sharply separated by the main portal. In paradise, where grow the Tree of Life and the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, sits a kindly patriarch whose throne is surrounded by children. Is this not the Jesus who rebuked his disciples for not allowing the children to come unto him (Polacco, pp. 110–114; Schulz, p. 33, pls. 26–27; Kirschbaum, vol. 4, "Weltgericht," cols. 513–523)?

Among other iconographic aspects of Byzantine Last Judgments that need to be noted is the presentation of three divine persons to represent the Trinity. A diagram of interlocking circles is perhaps more appropriate to the unity aspect of a triune God, but the judgment has to be personal rather than abstract. There may be the Father seated on his throne, holding the crucified Son in his lap, with the dove representing the Holy Spirit. Another threefold group is the succession of patriarchs of the Hebrews: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They are in paradise, and we are reminded of the Gospel reversal of the place of the rich and the poor: The beggar Lazarus finds ultimate comfort "in Abraham's bosom."

A third peculiarity of the Byzantine tradition is the use of an empty throne. The text is the ninth Psalm: "He hath prepared his throne for judgment" (Psalm 9:7). The psalm prophesies, "And he shall judge the world in righteousness" and also "will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble" (Psalm 9:8–9). There is also a note of mercy, with the Mother of God and the forerunner of Christ, often on their knees, pleading as intercessors that the Lord will pardon sinners. But there is still the river of fire that flows from the throne and keeps hell burning (Réau, vol. 2:II, pp. 732–736).

The most original uses of the Last Judgment in Western or Latin Christendom are in sculptures of French Romanesque and Gothic churches. Whereas the Byzantine tradition called for the decoration of the western inside wall in mosaic (or fresco), the French carved the theme into the central portal of the western facade, as in the cathedrals of Autun, Beaulieu, Paris, Bourges, and others. In the first there is an enormous Christ, as tall as the tympanum itself, a giant among dwarfs. The organizational pattern is no longer the horizontal Byzantine hierarchy of sharply divided levels but a vertical focus showing the resurrection of the dead. This becomes a familiar part of the scene, with bodies coming back to life and pushing the stones off their tombs. Then the risen men and women present themselves to be judged. The artists resisted the theologians, who claimed that in the resurrection people will lose their distinct sexual differences and will be as angels without marriage in heaven. The risen men and women are portrayed as naked as Adams and Eves and 30 years old, the age considered perfect and that of Christ at his Crucifixion (Réau, vol. 2:II, p. 729).

The sculptor who carved the Last Judgment on the west tympanum of the Cathedral of St. Lazarus at Autun inscribed his name in the center of the composition: "Gislebertus hoc fecit" (Gislebertus made this). This is his signature, and it indicates what we think of as a self-confidence more characteristic of a Michelangelo of the Renaissance; however, written records from the twelfth century have not revealed anything about the sculptor. We know only that he worked for 10 years (approximately 1125–1135) on the sculptures for the church. He may have been trained at Cluny, France, and from Autun he went on to the church at Vézelay, France, another celebrated sculptural masterpiece.

The arch above the Autun tympanum, a half-moon, is a frieze depicting the zodiac, the months, and flowers. The horizontal lintel over the divided doorway has the damned on the viewer's right (Christ's left) and the saved on the viewer's left (Christ's right). The most noted aspects of the tortures of hell are two huge hands choking the head of one of them. The bodies are in angular poses, making the scene one of excitement. Among the saints, many of whom look up (in contrast to the damned, who tend to look down), is an angel to whom children are clinging. It is only in this bottom lintel that the just and the unjust are sharply divided.

We may wish to ask the blessed why they are happy, and the sculptor puts several arguments in stone. Some are pilgrims who wear the cockleshells of Santiago de Compostela. Others are a husband and wife holding hands (their child is freeing itself from its shroud). Only the religious are clothed (the others are as Adam and Eve before they knew they were naked). And why are the damned in hell? One is a miser with a bag of money hanging around his neck and a snake coiled around his body. A woman has two snakes biting her breasts (she has committed adultery). One is beating his barrel of wine (perhaps he is a drunk). Are these unrepentant sinners who have not asked forgiveness?

Christ dominates the full height of the tympanum, from the lintel to the top. He is in glory in a mandorla supported by four angels. At the extreme ends of this register angels with trumpets announce Judgment Day. Beneath Christ's feet an angel holds a sword, dividing the elect from the rejected. A hand from the heavens holds the scales in which a soul is judged. It is being welcomed by an archangel while a devil tries to tilt the balance; another sits on the scales.

The mother of Christ is prominent, and rather than a row of 12 apostles, Gislebertus has only 10. Two play roles in the drama. St. Peter, with the keys of heaven, and St. Paul and saints with angels help people get into a heaven, represented by arcades. The heavenly powers are kind and gentle and have fitting beauty. The diabolical powers are horrible, monstrous, and ugly. Gislebertus created, with endless detail, the message that obedience to God's commandments is goodness and beauty, whereas disobedience is evil and ugliness (Grivot and Zarnecki, chap. 2).

After the Last Judgments in Torcello's mosaics and in Autun's sculptures, the third that must be considered is the huge fresco at the altar end of the Sistine Chapel. To consider only three of thousands shows strong bias in allowing these masterpieces to cast in the shadow a number perhaps equally worthy. A doctoral dissertation by art historian Craig Harbison lists 260 Last Judgments from the sixteenth century alone, and they tell a vivid story of an age marked by Protestant reforms, Catholic reforms, secularization, and millenarianism.

Since it was completed at the end of October 1541, Michelangelo's Last Judgment has challenged critics to define its order. Why? One of the earliest rejections of it was that it was only a "great stew of nudes" (Salvini, p. 245). In contrast to a composition with strict divisions between five zones at Torcello, Michelangelo presents "a unified dramatic event" (De Tolnay, p. 19). There is still a central figure of Christ, as in the Last Judgment of Autun's tympanum, but it is not a Christ in glory, in a mandorla supported by four winged angels. He is rather an Apollo, a naked Greek sun god, originally nude, and the angels are no longer winged spirits but Titans. Can this be explained as a move from a more biblical concept of the strict separation of heaven and hell to the conception of a single humanity in struggle, in a single dynamic world process?

The mighty Christ raises his right arm as a conquering hero. "The gesture draws up to him the Elect and at the same time catapults the Damned into the abyss" (De Tolnay, p. 24). A mass of figures ascend, and another mass of figures are thrust downward. There must still be in this cosmic movement an up and a down, for the apostles are on the clouds above, and down below is the underworld with the bark of Charon, who transported the departed over the Styx in the pagan underworld. With the divine power in the center and organization around him as the sun, the pattern is circular. We can feel "circular streams of figures revolving" (De Tolnay, p. 30). The "dynamic currents" are not seen from any specific point but from beyond Earth; the drama is played in infinite space. It is from within human experience that the cosmic rhythms are grasped. The biblical story of the end of the world comes from prophets who warn that it will come as a surprise to those who are unprepared for the return of Christ. Michelangelo captures the surprise and violence (De Tolnay, p. 44). The purpose of the Last Judgment of Michelangelo was not different from many others: to stir the conscience of the beholder, but to do this as a "reawakening of man's cosmic awareness" (Salvini, pp. 232–261; De Tolnay, pp. 19–50, 98–128).

Apocalyptic Fear and Millenarian Hope

Albrecht Dürer's Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse is a symbol expressing the worst fears of humanity: war, famine, plague, and death. Edward Hicks's Peaceable Kingdom is a symbol of harmony and happiness. They demand our attention because the Last Judgment is not the only version of the end of history. The Last Judgment combines into one vast cosmic drama the fear of those whose sin and lack of atonement may plunge them into hell and the hope and trust of the righteous and repentant that they will find their treasure in heaven. Edward Hicks gained from the Bible a zeal to see peace on Earth and the American faith that we are building the kingdom of God, placing himself in the same tradition in which Dürer stood: the prophetic Judaism that generated Christian faith (Rossi, cols. 788–831, pls. 449–468).

Dürer issued his Revelations of St. John (1498) in both German and Latin. Fifteen scenes are full of the fantastic iconographic symbols of the Apocalypse: the seven candlesticks, the breaking of seven seals, a seven-headed dragon, the woman clothed in the sun, and the whore of Babylon. The print of the four horsemen is the fourth in the Dürer series. The text is from the last book of the Christian Bible, the Revelation of St. John the Divine. It is sometimes called the Apocalypse, but it is one of many. The Book of Daniel in the Hebrew Bible is the Jewish appeal to God to avenge the pagan oppressors. Revelation is a Christian burst of anger against the Roman persecutors.

Hicks opens his Bible to the prophecies of Isaiah. The righteous judge cares for the poor and the meek, and the messianic age gathers the scattered Israelites under an ensign to which gentiles also flock. Then the peace and harmony of paradise are restored:

The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. (Isaiah 11:6)

That God's love can transform nature into an ideal state was the message. Hicks, faithful to scripture, cares that each animal should be present in his words and images. Sometimes he rendered scripture into verse and painted lines on the four sides of the frame.

The point about Creation is that then "innocent nature reigned." Hicks painted a child with a ribbon inscribed "innocence, meekness, liberty" (Ford, ill. 36). With the child is an American eagle. Edward Hicks was as able an iconographer as he was a painter. A discourse given in Goose Creek Meeting at London, Virginia, in February 1837 does more than elucidate The Peaceable Kingdom. It serves also to tie together the whole theme of bringing order out of chaos.

Hicks honored the Creator's glory. Adam was so created, but in Eden the Fall signified that, through Adam, "the animal man became a slave to that cruel, selfish nature emblematically described by the wolf, the leopard, the bear and the lion." Adam lost the "innocent, angelic covering of God's righteousness." He could not hide his nakedness with a fig leaf and wore "skins of beasts." "The lamb, the kid, the cow, and the ox are emblems of good men and women . . . [who] would dwell harmoniously together." Abel was a lamb and Cain the wolf. The wolf would destroy the lamb, and the fierce animals would destroy each other.

Something has gone wrong with people who received "dominion over the work" of the Creator. Humans were meant to be superior to all other animals, to be "a little lower than the angels." But because they are composed of earth, air, water, and fire (the four elements), they are like a single, predominating element. If earth rules, the human is as a wolf, a money-mongering usurer and a would-be suicide. This human is melancholic and, unlike a lamb, wants "education, fame, and speculation." If air predominates, the human is sanguine, a leopard, "the most subtle, cruel, restless creature" although also "most beautiful of all . . . the cat kind." The male, a "beautiful monster," robs "the poor negatively innocent females of their virtues." Sanguines are also overfond of "gaiety, music and dancing, taverns and places of diversion." Even female leopards tear "their friends to pieces." If water dominates a human, he or she is as phlegmatic as a bear: "cold, unfeeling, dull, inert and beastly." The bear becomes very fat, retires to its den, curls up in bed, and lives by sleeping. If fire predominates, the human is as choleric as the lion. Then he or she is proud and intellectual—a would-be leader. One of the apostles,

St. Paul, was in part malignant and a persecutor. "The voracious, cruel Lion ruled in him," but there came a vision, turning him into the opposite, an ox.

What gives hope is the conversion or transformation of the human from the lower animal nature to the higher. Love converts the fierce into the gentle. The sermon concludes with this iconographic message:

May the melancholy be encouraged and the sanguine quieted; may the phlegmatic be tendered and the choleric humbled.

May self be denied and the cross of Christ worn as a daily garment.

May his peaceable kingdom forever be established in the rational, immortal soul.

Then will be fulfilled the prophetic declaration . . .

(Ford, pp. 85–88)

Order Out of Chaos: Artist as Creator

One would expect Michelangelo, the preeminent artist-genius of the Renaissance, to shun chaos. After all, he believed he was completing the divine task of creating the world. Unlike earlier artists who were limited to mere making or imitating, the quasi-mystical figure of the Renaissance genius could actually create (Janson, p. 436). The artist's task was to give form to whatever chaos was left, and Michelangelo took this mission very seriously. Most of his work represents a height of order not achieved before or since.

Several of Michelangelo's last sculptures, however, mark a strange departure from the perfectly fashioned works that had gone before. Possibly influenced by recent discoveries of fragments of ancient Greek and Roman art, he left these late sculptures incomplete: smooth, finished marble alternates with tracts of rough, unpolished rock. Although there is historical evidence that some of these were left unwillingly because of external reasons, the artist considered several of them. It is hard to imagine how he could have improved even the ones he intended to work on further; Henry Moore has called the Rondanini Pietà "one of the greatest works of Michelangelo" (Hodin, p. 35). In the words of Marcel Duchamp, these works had reached their "definitive stage of incompleteness" (Tomkins, p. 80).

In these haunting sculptures (especially Awakening Slave, St. Matthew, and the Milan or Rondanini Pietà), Michelangelo leaves large sections of stone unformed. Figures partially emerge from the rock and are partially swallowed back into it. The master appears to be meditating on the role of the artist in an inchoate world. Without the perfect order of Eden for guidance, the artist is constantly engaged in a fight or dialogue with chaos. In the boundless confidence of the Renaissance genius, he portrays himself as victorious over the encroaching chaos; he calls forth a form from the raw stone and keeps the entropy of the world at bay.

Auguste Rodin continued this same dialogue between chaos and creativity in his Hand of God, in which a divine hand, "emerging from rock, chaos, clouds" (de Caso and Sanders, p. 71), forms man and woman out of inchoate stone. Art critic David Rosand examines this relationship in detail: "If the artist, mimic of God, creates like nature, it is not in his finished products that we recognize the analogy . . . but rather in the very processes of creation” (Kritzman, p. 21). Thus, the unformed sections actually heighten our awareness of the artist’s power to form.

The background chaos serves to emphasize the artist’s heroic act of imbuing the raw material with order. St. Matthew being called forth from the surrounding chaos reminds one of the opening of Ludwig van Beethoven’s Ninth Symphony, when the composer (who was Michelangelo’s musical analog in many ways) summons an earthshaking theme from swirling mists of sound by sheer force of will. However, to take on this new role of artist-genius, Michelangelo had to acknowledge chaos as no previous artist did. Chaos plays such an important part in the creator’s quest that it remains an important element of his completed work.

The notion of artist as tamer of the world’s disorder became less feasible as time passed. Ironically, although in modern times understanding and power over the world has increased radically, confidence in ourselves as capable of controlling or understanding it has greatly diminished, having reached its nadir in the twentieth century. As a race, human beings no longer consider themselves masters of the forces they have unleashed; instead of omniscient God forming the world out of chaos, the dominant myth of the twentieth century was Pandora, clumsily freeing evil spirits with little hope of ever putting them back in their place.

Marcel Duchamp is in many ways the clearest enemy of the Renaissance artist-genius. In his famous 1919 L.H.O.O.Q., he drew a mustache on a reproduction of the Mona Lisa, Leonardo da Vinci’s quintessential work of the High Renaissance. Duchamp is rebelling against the heavy burden left him by the Renaissance—creating perfectly ordered, beautiful paintings. To the modern artist, this kind of art no longer seems honest. Although Duchamp bitterly ridicules what he sees as the overweening pride of these earlier artists, underlying this bitterness is a layer of nostalgia for a time when artists could see themselves as participating in divine creation. In the secular twentieth century, the world is irreducibly chaotic, and art is powerless to order it.

Duchamp also invented the “ready-made,” a mundane object such as a bottle rack, snow shovel, or urinal that is transformed into art simply by an artist’s signature. This approach, continued later by Andy Warhol and other pop artists, tries to break down the distinction between art and “mere things.” This breakdown can be seen as the elevation of everyday objects to art, reminiscent of John Cage’s definition of music as “all sounds.” As Jean Arp, a prominent dadaist, says, “We declared that everything that comes into being or is made by man is art” (Tomkins, p. 58). Another interpretation of this breakdown is the degradation of art. As Ecclesiastes and the postmodernists claim, there is nothing new under the sun. Any creation of an artist is ultimately just a reworking of already present things. If true originality is impossible, then art is merely signing one’s name to something already existing. Duchamp’s ready-mades, as much as his L.H.O.O.Q., confess his feeling of artistic impotence.

Duchamp’s ready-mades took a different turn in a new form of art: the collage. In these works, which include Pablo Picasso’s and Georges Braque’s early cubist paintings and many of Kurt Schwitters’s works, the artist puts bits and pieces of rubbish on a canvas in new relationships to each other.

We have here the exact opposite of Michelangelo calling forth a new form from stone. We have regressed to Adam’s weak position of simply labeling what exists without any creative powers. What restricted Adam in Eden was the perfection around him, but now it is the intractable chaos of the world that strips away artistic power. In four centuries, the artistic attitude has gone from the mastering of chaos to helplessness in the face of it.

Unlike Duchamp’s lack of faith in our ability to order the world, cubism challenges the very idea that we naturally try to order the world. Cubism, which tries to capture the subjective way we experience the world, portrays a jumbled cacophony of planes and shapes shown from various points of view at once. The cubists seem to be saying that Aristotle’s static rules of unity and stability have nothing to do with the world or with how we experience it. The world actually appears as a chaos of shapes, materials, and meanings, in William James’s words, “a bloomin’, buzzin’ confusion.” The cubist lays bare the chaos that always lies under the thin veneer of order that habit has painted onto it.

Surrealism continues this effort to display the chaos of our experience. The bizarre works of the surrealists anticipate Albert Camus’s definition of the absurd as the human demand for rationality and order clashing with the lack thereof in the world (Camus, p. 16). René Magritte’s The Unmasked Universe portrays a landscape where the sky has fractured into sharply angled blocks and the grassy field is marred by bare spots and a large ditch. The sole artificial element, a two-story house, lies rotten and partially fallen in. Once we unmask the universe, Magritte says, we find radical discontinuity, and our attempts to construct order out of it are doomed to fail. Marc Chagall’s I and the Village concentrates on the temporal disorder of experience. There is no frozen, captured instant here as Aristotle demands of art, exemplified by Jan Vermeer. Instead, memories and anticipations crowd the canvas, blurring the line between past, present, and future. The largest figures, the boy and his horse, loom over and inform the rest of the painting, just as a vivid memory dominates one’s thoughts.

The art form that deals most directly with chaos is abstract expressionism. Pioneered by Wassily Kandinsky and taken up most famously by Jackson Pollock, these works dispense with representation entirely. Going a step further than the cubists, these painters do not even have distorted shapes at their command. Instead, they immerse themselves in the simplest elements of painting (lines and color) without the stabilizing influences of coherent forms. Elements of their paintings dynamically engage one another in flashes of energy in an attempt to capture the naked face of chaos itself. These painters represent the most extreme examples of channeling chaos rather than using any obvious techniques to master it. They claim, along with Friedrich Nietzsche, that “the total character of the world . . . is in all eternity chaos” (Nietzsche, p. 168).

A very different direction is taken by Piet Mondrian, whose works portray pure order, a harmony of lines and colors unmarred by any representation. Mondrian wants to seal off his paintings from the chaotic influences of reality, to create a clean, hermetic order. Like Kandinsky and Pollock, he feels that the world is in a permanent state of chaos, triumphing over it only by abandoning it. Mark Rothko achieves a more human order in his color field paintings. Instead of Mondrian’s neurotic sharp lines and inhuman blocks of color, Rothko creates a soft, earthy peace with harmonious interplay between two organic shapes of soft color. He rejects representation without losing his humanity.

An interesting late twentieth-century example of this rebellion against the Renaissance masters is Mark Tansey's postmodernist Triumph over Mastery II. A shadowy figure leans backward from a ladder whitewashing Michelangelo's Last Judgment, perhaps preparing it for a Kazimir Malevitch or Mark Rothko treatment. At first, this seems an unimaginative imitation of Duchamp's L.H.O.O.Q. On closer inspection, however, it turns out that the man is painting over his own shadow as well as the ladder's shadow. Perhaps Tansey is warning of the dangers inherent in attacking earlier styles. As a postmodernist but also a critic of postmodernism, he harbors as much suspicion of the artist as creator ex nihilo as anyone. However, his solution is not to reject completely other styles or artistic attitudes but to appropriate them for his own purposes. Although Michelangelo's self-conception is not literally accessible to a late twentieth-century artist, Tansey can take it and use it in a new way. This is postmodernist creativity: reordering other artists' attempts at order.

Salvador Dalí's The Persistence of Memory, with its famous limp watches and exaggerated distances, questions the fundamental organizing forms of reality: time and space. Whether Dalí knew of Albert Einstein or not, this work has the same effect on the intuitive understanding of the universe as relativity. It shatters many of the fundamental assumptions structuring an understanding of the world, such as the Newtonian stability of time and space and the universe's adherence to Euclidean geometry. Duchamp expressed this new distrust of science with his Unhappy Readymade: "a geometry textbook . . . hung from the balcony of [his sister's] Paris apartment so that the problems and theorems, exposed to the test of wind, sun, and rain, could get the 'facts of life'" (Tomkins, p. 78).

Artists were exploring and embracing chance at the same time as scientists, but for different reasons. Jean Arp wrote, "Intuition led me to revere the law of chance as the highest and deepest of laws" (Tomkins, p. 58). Marcel Duchamp created an entire system of science called "playful physics," which embraced the "adage of spontaneity" as one of its laws. He derived his standard unit of measurement by dropping pieces of thread one meter long onto a canvas from a height of one meter. He bonded them onto the canvas and had rulers made that matched the shapes of the dropped thread perfectly (Tomkins, pp. 33–35). This incorporation of randomness into art was taken up by many musicians, most famously by Karl Stockhausen and by John Cage in his "aleatory" or chance music. Trying to explain his bewildering pieces, Cage claims that art should not be "an attempt to bring order out of chaos nor to suggest improvements in creation" (Meyer, p. 176).

Moral Order

When God walked the Earth, God anchored human morality. A virtue was good because it enjoyed divine approval, and a vice was evil through divine rejection. However, after expulsion and secularization, God cannot serve as arbiter or authority, so humans must take up this role. As French literary critic Henri Peyre says, "Man will set himself up as the creator of values, in the place of an absent or silent God" (Sartre, p. xv). Humans can no longer appeal to God as witness and punisher of atrocities. Just as they assumed the role of creator, so they must pass judgment on themselves, and just as artists took the lead in creating, so they have been humanity's greatest judges, creating a new genre of art: social protest.

Traditional Christian art could rely on the Last Judgment to sort out the sinners from the saints; all would get their just deserts in the end, even if injustice reigns on Earth. This idea of retroactive justice at the end of time became more suspect as time went on. To the modern conscience, particular evils are more real and vivid than divine harmony, and the artist became the conscience, protesting these evils.

Although pioneered by William Hogarth, social protest art reached maturity in the nineteenth century. Two important nineteenth-century participants in this field were Francisco de Goya and Eugène Delacroix. Goya's The Third of May, 1808 presents a tremendously powerful scene of horror. As art historian H. W. Janson comments, "The picture has all the emotional intensity of religious art, but these martyrs are dying for Liberty, not the Kingdom of Heaven; and their executioners are not the agents of Satan but of political tyranny" (Janson, p. 602). The very title of the piece, a specific date, places the scene squarely in history; it has happened, and no higher harmony can ever erase it. An injustice has occurred, the artist is crying, and it will always have happened. Goya's image held so much power that both Édouard Manet, in Execution of the Emperor Maximilien, and Picasso, in Massacre in Korea, appropriated it. Delacroix contributed The Massacre at Chios, protesting the slaughter or enslavement of 20,000 innocent bystanders. His use of "feverish convulsive drawing and . . . violent coloring," in the words of novelist and art critic Théophile Gautier (Fleming, p. 375), had great influence on expressionism.

As powerful as these works are, the twentieth century added a new dimension to this genre. The world wars surpassed anything in human history for sheer destruction. World War I was made absurd by the generally acknowledged lack of a true cause as well as by the massive slaughter suffered to gain minuscule advances in trench warfare. World War II produced the horrors of the Holocaust. The atrocities of the war had so destroyed the world's order that even language fell away. As Marcel Janco, a dadaist, said of the time, "Who on earth, in those days of collapse, was still ready to believe in 'eternal values,' in the 'canned goods' of the past" (Tomkins, p. 70)?

In the nineteenth century, protest artists could contain the atrocities they witnessed within the confines of traditionally formed art. The events experienced were tragic but comprehensible. Twentieth-century protest art, on the other hand, was shaken to the core by what it saw. The scale of horror so far exceeded anything known before that the artist was all but struck dumb.

The vast scope of outrage felt by these artists forced them to find radically new modes of communication. Two German expressionists who protested their country's actions deserve attention. The first is George Grosz, a man "enraged and furious at the injustice, narrow-mindedness, and deceiving impudence of those he portrays" (Sabarsky, p. 8). Grosz combines the savagery of expressionism with the disorientation of cubism in his bitter caricatures of Berlin. Grosz was inspired by the cartoons of Honoré Daumier, although Daumier's satires look positively benign and generous compared to Grosz's work. Explosion uses cubist technique to exaggerate the force of the explosion in the painting. The entire world is blown out of its normal orbit. The distortion of form shows that the physical destruction of Berlin took its correlative toll on the artist's mind. All means of ordering the world disintegrate along with the city's buildings. In Germany, a Winter's Tale, a timid citizen sits at the center of the painting while all around him swirls a chaotic mess of figures and shapes that threaten to engulf him at any moment. Unlike the natural stone that tried to swallow up Michelangelo's sculptures (a relatively benign entropy), Grosz portrays civilization as the true threat, and it is winning.

Max Beckmann, who is closer to surrealism than to cubism or expressionism, is perhaps the greatest artist to comment on the horrors of the two world wars. Art historian Stephan Lackner has called Beckmann's early masterpiece The Night "surely one of the most gruesome pictures ever painted." He contrasts it with traditional religious depictions of suffering:

Torture and pain are often represented as the just deserts of sinners tumbling into hell, and the roasting and beheading of saints are depicted to serve the greater glory of God. But Beckmann sees no purpose in the suffering he shows; there is no glory for anybody, no compensation, no gloating over justice accomplished—only senseless pain, and cruelty for its own sake. (Lackner, p. 56)

The victims do not deserve their torture, and the torturers will go unpunished. Such is one man's vision of a world with no moral order.

Beckmann's later Birds' Hell depicts Nazi Germany in a surrealistic style reminiscent of Hieronymus Bosch's treatment of hell in The Garden of Earthly Delights. This Kafkaesque hallucination (with an apparent allusion to Franz Kafka's story "In the Penal Colony"), however, is a human creation and thus a human problem.

One of Beckmann's greatest works is the triptych Departure. The two side panels contain images like those of The Night. In the artist's own words, "life is what you see right and left. Life is torture, pain of every kind—physical and mental" (Lackner, p. 88). The hideous depiction of life here is reminiscent of O'Brien's "picture of the future" in George Orwell's novel 1984: "imagine a boot stamping on a human face—forever." The center panel, however, represents a rare occurrence in Beckmann's oeuvre: peace. Heroic figures "have freed themselves of the tortures of life" (Lackner, p. 88) and sail out onto a calm, clear sea. Like Mondrian's assessment, Beckmann has judged the modern world hopeless and incorrigible; the only solution is escape. Still, he continues to protest, which betrays some small hope that we can change.

Now we come to what is surely the twentieth century's greatest work of social protest and what may be its greatest work in any genre: Picasso's Guernica. This enormous painting, called "a fervent prayer against violence, barbarism and cruelty" by the catalog written for its installation in the Prado at Madrid, Spain (Boudaille, p. 108), decries the destruction of a defenseless Basque town as a training mission in the first saturation air raid of the century. Like Grosz, Picasso uses the disorientation of cubism with the distortion of expressionism to convey the reality-destroying shock this atrocity evoked in him. As Janson says, "The anatomical dislocations, fragmentations, and metamorphoses . . . express a stark reality, the reality of unbearable pain" (Janson, p. 686).

José Clemente Orozco, a Mexican muralist, created some very powerful protest art, such as his Gods of the Modern World. The title, of course, shows its ties to the thesis that humans, in this case academics, have assumed the role of gods for the modern world. Orozco vividly portrays his belief that humans have ruined what they had the audacity to rule. These academics are skeletons witnessing a skeletal mother giving birth to a tiny skeleton. In this painting, Orozco uses biblical icons in an astonishing way. Adam and Eve were expelled from the Garden of Eden's perfection but recompensed with the ability to create, symbolized most evocatively in Eve's ability to give birth. Orozco depicts academics, the people who have fed most fully on the fruits of knowledge, as emaciated down to their bones, and woman's great act of creation, the creation of life, yields only skeletons.

Conclusion

For the traditionalist, order out of chaos is a formula that defines good coming out of bad, the direction in which the process ought to go. One way for the conservative to praise an artist is to characterize the artist as a friend once characterized Lord Tennyson: "Alfred is always carrying around a bit of chaos and turning it into order." The order of the traditional world provides a unifying framework for artists to communicate; icons have certain set meanings and can be used unequivocally to express determinate ideas. This framework provides the necessary order and stability for true art to take place. This view seems to be held by more conservative contemporary artists such as Norman Rockwell, Edward Hopper, or Andrew Wyeth, who tenaciously cling to representational styles.

Robert Frost succinctly expresses this thought in his short poem called "Pertinax." Frost uses an obsolete word for stubborn and the root of pertinacious.

Let chaos storm!
Let cloud shapes swarm!
I wait for form.

By portraying chaos as a storm, Frost claims that it is a passing unpleasantness. One should neither fight nor support it but just wait it out; the world will eventually regain its order and its sanity.

For the modernist, chaos out of order is a formula that defines the direction in which the process ought to go. Chaos is the truer characterization of modern life, and it allows for greater creativity. The modern artist views traditional iconography as suffocating and exhausted; the icons handed down are like coins with their markings worn away by too much handling. True artistic expression must be personal rather than borrowed from a public language.

The modernist revolution has been an iconographic Tower of Babel: From a single accepted iconography dominant in the Middle Ages, a cornucopia of personal symbols has exploded. This fracturing creates a chaotic din of ephemeral "isms," radical styles dying out as soon as they stabilize. This mode contrasts with the glacial movements of the past. Many modernist artists feel compelled to create their own languages to say something new.

Perhaps the most extreme examples of this position are the dadaists, who scorned and mocked traditions as completely irrelevant to the shock of twentieth-century life. Language must be reinvented to express what these artists saw. Twentieth-century icons exist, but they are individualistic icons tied to a single work or artist. We can speak of Picasso's Guernica, Paul Cézanne's Mt. St.-Victoire, or Vincent van Gogh's sunflowers, which have resonance as modern icons. Instead of a public, shared iconography that requires and presupposes a meaning-imbuing order, modernist artists express the chaos of their times in their own ways, resulting in a bewildering flurry of styles. Many people today object to modern art as a product of madness, an effort to shock sanity and decency, or a bad joke.

The twentieth-century writer Tom Stoppard offers a more post-modern suggestion in his novel Lord Malquist and Mr. Moon: "Since we cannot hope for order, let us withdraw with style from the chaos." Like Mark Tansey, Stoppard derives wry humor from the chaos and from human efforts to contend with it.

We have painted with too broad a stroke, however. Although artists and critics inhabit the extremes, this picture of two opposing camps under the respective banners of order and chaos is much too simplistic. As always, the majority lands somewhere in the middle. Indeed, there can be no true instance of pure order or chaos in an artwork. To hold the viewer's interest, a work must have the tension that results from the seed of disorder; no matter how completely resolved, there must be some chaos. The mere act of artistic presentation gives some order to the wildest, most chaotic work. Even the work of Jackson Pollock, whom we have represented as coming closer to grasping pure chaos than anyone else, evinces dominant shapes or patterns that lend it some degree of stability (Rohn). Although a general shift of emphasis occurs in the twentieth century, every great piece of art represents the vital interplay between order and chaos.

See also Apocalypse; Damned Souls; Fortune; Logos/Word; Zodiac

Selected Works of Art

Creation Out of Chaos: In the Beginning

Scenes from Genesis, atrium mosaic, circa 1200, Venice, Italy, St. Mark's Basilica

Maitani, Lorenzo, four marble facade pilasters, circa 1320, Orvieto, Italy, Cathedral

Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Creation of the Animals, woodcut, sixteenth century

Tintoretto, Jacopo, Creation of the Animals, oil on canvas, 1550–1553, Venice, Italy, Gallerie Dell'Accademia

Fludd, Robert, "The Chaos of Elements at the Beginning of the Creation of the World," from Utriusque Cosmi Majoris Scilicet et Minoris Metaphysica, Physica Atque Technica Historia, Oppenheim, Germany, 1617–1619

Blake, William, God Creating the Universe or Ancient of Days, color over relief-etched print, 1824–1827, Manchester, England, Whitworth Art Gallery

Martin, John, The Bridge over Chaos, mezzotint, nineteenth century, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Houghton Library

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Days of Creation, six panels, before 1877, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Watts, Frederic, The Sower of Systems, 1902, Compton, England, Watts Gallery

Escher, M. C., Six Days of Creation, Adam and Eve, woodcuts, 1926

Shramchenko, Mykola, In the Beginning . . ., 1962, New York, Ivan Obolesky

Haas, Ernst, The Creation, revised edition, New York: Viking Press, 1983

Fernandez, Egai, Creation, 1990, Manila, Philippines, Gallery Genesis

The Last Judgment

Gislebertus, Last Judgment, bas relief on west tympanum, circa 1130, Autun, France, Cathedral

Giotto, Last Judgment, fresco, after 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, The Last Judgment, oil on wood, sixteenth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Michelangelo, Last Judgment, fresco, 1534–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Picasso, Pablo, Guernica, oil on canvas, 1937, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Dix, Otto, War, triptych, before 1969, Dresden, Germany, Neue Galerie

Apocalyptic Fear and Millenarian Hope

Dürer, Albrecht, Die Heimliche Offenbarung Iohannis or Apocalipsis cum Figuris, including The Four Riders of the Apocalypse, woodcut, 1498

Hogarth, William, Tailpiece, or the Bathos, etching, 1764, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University, Lewis Walpole Library

Hicks, Edward, Peaceable Kingdom, oil on canvas, circa 1830–1840, New York, Brooklyn Museum

Hicks, Edward, Noah's Ark, oil on canvas, 1846, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Order Out of Chaos: Artist as Creator

Michelangelo, St. Matthew, marble, 1505–1506, Florence, Italy, Academy of Fine Arts

Michelangelo, Awakening Slave, marble, circa 1530–1534, Florence, Italy, Academy of Fine Arts

Michelangelo, Milan Pietà or Rondanini Pietà, marble, 1554–1564, Milan, Italy, Sforza Castle Civic Museums

Rodin, Auguste, The Hand of God, marble, 1898, Paris, Rodin Museum

Chagall, Marc, I and the Village, oil on canvas, 1911, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Kandinsky, Wassily, Sketch I for "Composition VII," oil on canvas, 1913, Bern, Switzerland, Collection Felix Klee

Duchamp, Marcel, L.H.O.O.Q., rectified ready-made, pencil on reproduction of Leonardo da Vinci's Mona Lisa, 1919, private collection

Schwitters, Kurt, The First Merzbau, altered house with collages, 1923

Mondrian, Piet, Composition with Red, Blue, and Yellow, oil on canvas, 1930, New York, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Armand P. Bartos

Dalí, Salvador, The Persistence of Memory, oil on canvas, 1931, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Pollock, Jackson, One (#31), oil on canvas, 1950, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Magritte, René, The Unmasked Universe, oil on canvas, 1961, Brussels, Belgium, Mme Crik Collection

Tansey, Mark, Triumph over Mastery II, oil on canvas, 1987, New York, Collection Emily Fisher Landau

Moral Order

- Hogarth, William, The Rake's Progress, engraving, 1725, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Goya, Francisco de, The Third of May, 1808, oil on canvas, 1814–1815, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Delacroix, Eugène, The Massacre at Chios, oil on canvas, 1824, Paris, Louvre
- Manet, Édouard, Execution of the Emperor Maximilien, oil on canvas, 1867, Mannheim, Germany, Kunsthalle
- Grosz, George, Explosion, oil on canvas, 1917
- Grosz, George, Germany, a Winter's Tale, oil on canvas, 1918
- Beckmann, Max, The Night, oil on canvas, 1918–1919, Düsseldorf, Germany, Kunstsammlung Nordrhein-Westfalen
- Beckmann, Max, Departure, triptych, oil on canvas, 1932–1933, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Orozco, José Clemente, Gods of the Modern World, fresco, 1932–1934, Hanover, New Hampshire, Dartmouth College
- Beckmann, Max, Birds' Hell, oil on canvas, 1938, St. Louis, Missouri, St. Louis Art Museum
- Picasso, Pablo, Massacre in Korea, oil on canvas, 1951, Paris, Musée Picasso

Further Reading

- Arnheim, Rudolf, "Order and Complex in Landscape Design," in The Concept of Order, edited by Paul Kuntz, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1968
- , Entropy and Art: An Essay on Disorder and Order, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1971
- Arnold, Thomas, The Old and New Testaments in Muslim Religious Art, London: The British Academy, 1932
- Barrett, William, Irrational Man, New York: Anchor, 1958
- Beardsley, Monroe, "Order and Disorder in Art," in The Concept of Order, edited by Paul Kuntz, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1968
- Bindman, David, and Deidre Toomey, editors, The Complete Graphic Works of William Blake, New York: Putnam, 1978; London: Thames and Hudson, 1978
- Blunt, Anthony, "Blake's Ancient of Days: The Symbolism of the Compasses," in The Visionary Hand: Essays for the Study of William Blake's Art and Aesthetics, edited by Robert Essick, Los Angeles: Hennessey, 1973
- Bool, Flip, and J. R. Kist, editors, M. C. Escher: His Life and Complete Graphic Work, New York: Abradale Press, 1982
- Boudaille, Georges, Picasso, Stamford, Connecticut: Longmeadow, 1985
- Bürger, Peter, The Decline of Modernism, translated by Nicholas Walker, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1972
- Camus, Albert, The Myth of Sisyphus and Other Essays, New York: Vintage, 1955; London: Secker and Warburg, 1959
- Carli, Enzo, Le Scutori del Duomo di Orvieto, Bergamo, Italy: Istituto Italiano D'Arti Grafiche, 1947
- Caso, Jacques de, and Patricia B. Sanders, Rodin's Sculpture, Rutland, Vermont: Tuttle, 1977
- Cennini, Cennino, The Book of the Art of Cennino Cennini: A Contemporary Practical Treatise on Quattrocento Painting, translated by Christiana Jane Powel, London: George Allen and Unwin, 1930
- Cioffari, Vincenzo, "Fortune, Fate, and Chance," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Clark, Kenneth, "Turner: The Snowstorm," in Looking at Pictures, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1960
- , "The Blot and the Diagram," in Moments of Vision and Other Essays, New York: Harper, 1981
- Cohn, Norman, Cosmos, Chaos, and the World to Come: The Ancient Roots of Apocalyptic Faith, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1993
- Courcelle, Pierre, La Consolation de Philosophie dans la Tradition Littéraire, Paris: Études Augustiniennes, 1967
- Danto, Arthur Coleman, Beyond the Brillo Box: The Visual Arts in Post-Historical Perspective, New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1992
- , Mark Tansey: Visions and Revisions, New York: Abrams, 1992
- Demus, Otto, The Mosaics of San Marco in Venice, vol. 2: The Thirteenth Century, 1984
- De Tolnay, Charles, The Final Period, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1960
- Dostoyevsky, Fyodor, The Brothers Karamazov, New York: Dutton, 1957; London: Dent, 1957
- Dresden, Samuel P., Humanism in the Renaissance, translated by Margaret King, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1968
- Essick, Robert N., editor, The Visionary Hand: Essays for the Study of William Blake's Art and Aesthetics, Los Angeles: Hennessey, 1973
- Fleming, William, Arts and Ideas, sixth edition, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1955
- Ford, Alice, Edward Hicks: Painter of the Peaceable Kingdom, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1952
- Gimferrer, Pere, Magritte, New York: Rizzoli, 1986; London: Phaidon, 1986
- Gleick, James, Chaos: Making a New Science, New York: Viking, 1987; London: Heinemann, 1988
- Grivot, Denis, and George Zarnecki, Gislebertus: Trianon Sculptor of Autun, New York: Orion, 1961
- Haas, Ernst, The Creation, revised edition, New York: Viking Press, 1983
- Hahn, Lewis, editor, The Philosophy of Charles Hartshorne, La Salle, Illinois: Open Court, 1991
- Harbison, Craig, The Last Judgment in Sixteenth-Century Northern Europe, New York: Garland, 1976
- Harris, Victor, All Coherence Gone, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1949
- Heninger, S. K., Jr., The Cosmographical Glass: Renaissance Diagrams of the Universe, San Marino, California: Huntington Library, 1977
- Henkel, Arthur, and Albrecht Schöne, Emblemata: Handbuch zur Sinnbildkunst, Stuttgart, Germany: Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1967
- Herbert, Robert, editor, Modern Artists on Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1964

- Hodin, Josef Paul, Modern Art and the Modern Mind, Cleveland, Ohio: The Press of Case Western Reserve University, 1972
- Janson, H. W., History of Art, third edition, New York: Abrams, 1986
- Jones, E. Michael, Degenerate Moderns, San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1992
- , Dionysos Rising, San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1994
- Kendall, Maurice, "Chance," in Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Kirschbaum, Engelbert, Lexicon der Christlichen Ikonographie, Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder, 1968
- Kritzman, Lawrence, editor, Fragments: Incompletion and Discontinuity, New York: New York Literary Forum, 1981
- Kuntz, Paul Grimley, "Religion of Order or Religion of Chaos?," Religion in Life XXXV:3 (Summer 1966)
- , "The Art of Blotting," Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism XXV:1 (Fall 1966)
- , editor, The Concept of Order, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1968
- , "The Hidden Order of Anton Ehrenzweig," Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism XXVII:3 (Spring 1969)
- , "Charles Hartshorne's Theory of Order and Disorder," in The Philosophy of Charles Hartshorne, edited by Lewis E. Hahn, La Salle, Illinois: Open Court, 1991
- Kurth, William, Albrecht Dürer: Complete Woodcuts, New York: Crown, 1946
- Lackner, Stephan, Max Beckmann, New York: Abrams, 1991
- Lemay, Richard, editor, Pietro Pomponazzi's De Fato, De Libro Arbitrio, Luani, Italy: In Aedibus Thesauri Mundi, 1957
- McGreevy, Linda F., The Life and Works of Otto Dix, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1981
- Mather, Eleanore Price, Edward Hicks: Primitive Quaker, His Religion in Relation to His Art, Wallingford, Pennsylvania: Pendle Hill, 1970
- Merrill, Linda, A Pot of Paint, Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1992
- Meyer, Leonard, "The End of the Renaissance?" The Hudson Review XVI (1963)
- Nahm, Milton, "Creativity in Art," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- , The Artist as Creator, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956
- Nietzsche, Friedrich, The Gay Science, translated by Walter Kaufman, New York: Vintage, 1974
- Nimrod, Frank, The Last Judgment as Final Control of the World History, New York: Vintage, 1977
- Norton, Charles Eliot, Notes of Travel and Study in Italy, Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1859
- Paulson, Ronald, Hogarth: His Life, Art and Times, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1971
- Peckham, Morse, Man's Rage for Chaos: Biology, Behavior, and the Arts, Philadelphia: Chilton, 1965
- Pickering, Frederick, Literature und darstellende Kunst Im Mittelalter, Berlin: Erich Schmidt Verlag, 1990
- Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, Heptaplus, or, Discourse on the Seven Days of Creation, New York: Philosophical Library, 1977
- Pincus-Witten, Robert, Against Order: Chance and Art, exhibition, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Institute of Contemporary Art, Philadelphia University
- Pognon, Edmond, Les Très Riches Heures du Duc du Berry, translated by David Macrae, New York: Crescent, 1984
- Polacco, Renato, La Cattedrale Di Torcello, Venice, Italy: L'Altra Riva, 1984
- Réau, Louis, "Le Symbolisme Humain, Occupations des Mois," in Iconographie de l'Art Chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955
- Rohn, Matthew, Visual Dynamics in Jackson Pollack's Abstractions, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1984
- Rossi, Annabella, "Eschatology," in Encyclopedia of World Art, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961
- Sabarsky, Serge, editor, George Grosz: The Berlin Years, New York: Reynal, 1965
- Salvini, Roberto, "Painting," in The Complete Work of Michelangelo, New York: Reynal, 1965
- Samuelson, Norbert Max, The First Seven Days: A Philosophical Commentary of the Creation of Genesis, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1992
- Sartre, Jean-Paul, The Age of Reason, New York: Bantam, 1968
- Schulz, Bruno, Die Kirchenbauten auf der Insel Torcello, Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1927
- Takenaka, Masao, and Ron O'Grady, The Bible Through Asian Eyes, Auckland, New Zealand: Pace, 1991
- Tomkins, Calvin, The World of Marcel Duchamp, New York: Time-Life, 1966
- Tuzet, Hélène I., "Cosmic Images," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by Philip P. Wiener, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Ungers, Oswald Mathias, "Ordo, Fondo et Mensura," in Renaissance: From Brunelleschi to Michelangelo: The Representation of Architecture, Milan, Italy: Bompiani, 1994
- Valcanover, Francesco, and Terisio Pignatti, Tintoretto, New York: Abrams, 1984
- West, M. L., editor, Hesiod's Theogony, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1966; New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1966
- Wiener, Philip P., Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Zaehner, Robert Charles, Concordant Discord: The Interdependence of Faith, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1970

PATH/ROAD/CROSSROADS

Christine M. Boeckl

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Path/Road/Crossroads:

ADORATION OF THE MAGI

FLIGHT INTO EGYPT

CHRIST'S ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM

AGONY IN THE GARDEN

ROAD TO CALVARY

ROAD TO EMMAUS

OTHER CHRISTIAN ROADS

NON-CHRISTIAN ROADS

SPIRITUAL PATH

PILGRIM'S WAY

SECULAR ROADS

"Y"

HERCULES AT THE CROSSROAD

TRIUMPHAL PROCESSIONS

Gustave Courbet, The Meeting, or Bonjour M. Courbet, 1854, oil on canvas, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre. (Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

Roads and thoroughfares indicate directions, a route to be traveled toward a goal: in space, in time, or even in spirit. However, the proverbial narrow path of virtue (or the yellow brick road, for that matter) often does not lead directly to its destination but forces the traveler to halt at crossroads and make decisions. Since antiquity, the Littera Pythagorae (Y) has been regarded as the mystical symbol that indicated a fork in the road requiring moral judgments. An illustrated woodcut by Geoffroy Tory, Y with Symbols of Awards and Punishments (1529), with its uneven branches, also refers to a biblical quotation:

Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matthew 7:13–14).

In the print, the wider, left branch leads to a life of vice that will end with the gallows and fires of hell; however, the narrow, virtuous part of the fork is crowned with heavenly laurel wreaths and palm branches. Dutch artists of the seventeenth century (Jan Christiaensz Micker and others) created Symbolic Representation of the Broad and the Narrow Way, which elaborated on the moralistic theme. Humankind's attempt to decide its own destiny inspired a good number of artists, reviewed here in greater detail.

Deities to protect roads and crossroads probably originated in Asia Minor. A classical goddess with three heads and arms extended in three directions was called Hecate Trioditis in Greece and Hecate Trivia in Rome. She was also known as Hecate Enodia, the surname signifying that she protects roads. Although this figure is now lost, several versions are reported to have stood in the Greek cities of Argos, Athens, and Epidauros. In non-Western art, crossroads were indicated in Aztec codices; for example, Yacatecutli Bearing Crossroads shows the god carrying a large St. Andrew's cross signifying the four cosmic regions. In Christian art, the Byzantine Madonna type of the Hodegetria (showing the way) points to her divine son as the spiritual guide toward salvation ("I am the way, and truth, and the life," John 14:6). The legendary gigantic ferryman Christophorus (Christopher), who had carried the Christ Child across the river on his shoulder, was the saint most commonly invoked by travelers for protection from danger until Vatican II demoted him. Depictions of spiritual roads, as those in the life of Jesus Christ and the lives of the saints and biblical narratives as well as metaphorical applications of roads, are addressed. Secular depictions of paths and crossroads are also reviewed. In the last category, the choice of Hercules is the most fertile field to investigate.

Christological Roads

Christological cycles dominate the depictions of religious roads in Western art. Some examples of the most important biblical travelers are discussed: the Three Magi on their road to Bethlehem, the Holy Family on the flight into Egypt, Jesus Christ's entry into Jerusalem, and the road to Calvary. Giotto included all these scenes in his Arena Chapel frescoes in Padua, Italy. He synthesized earlier medieval iconographic trends with those of his own time and highlighted the stories' protagonists. Each event is framed and takes on the reality of a staged performance.

The Adoration of the Magi gave painters a chance for a brilliant display of wealth within a landscape. Some of the most famous examples were created in the Florentine Renaissance by Gentile da Fabriano in his altarpiece and by Benozzo Gozzoli in his frescoes in the Medici Chapel. In both works, the Holy Family appears in the foreground next to the foreign dignitaries, whose retinues fill the middle ground. Farther back, tiny riders on winding roads show the great distance the Three Wise Men had traveled. In Domenico Veneziano's Berlin tondo The Adoration of the Magi, the receding road reveals a shocking detail: Corpses are hanging on gallows along the roadside, a warning that law and order are enforced in this part of the world.

In proto-Renaissance scenes of the flight into Egypt, the Holy Family is often guided by angels. Giotto's oeuvre can provide an example of this. Later works show greater emphasis on realism. Annibale Carracci devised an innovative classical landscape genre in his serene Flight into Egypt. Mannerists exploited distant scenes to indicate a disunity of time and place. For example, Jacques Callot's Massacre of the Innocents simultaneously depicts cause and effect: The foreground is taken up by the horrors of the massacre of the children of Bethlehem (the reason for the escape into Egypt), and in the background the tiny figures of the Holy Family seem to vanish in the distance. Egypt is identified as the safe haven by an obelisk (at times also indicated by "the fall of the pagan idols"), where the Virgin and her son will take refuge.

One of the oldest Christological scenes is Christ's entry into Jerusalem. The relief on the fourth-century Junius Bassus Sarcophagus leaves the road to the imagination of the viewer but establishes once and for all the iconography of the event: Christ riding the donkey, people throwing coats under the animal's hoofs, and children breaking tree branches will be repeated for almost 2,000 years. Duccio di Buoninsegna's Maestà Altarpiece includes the panel Christ's Entry into Jerusalem along with the customary scenes from Christ's life. The trecento artist describes realistically the cobblestoned road in the foreground. The gate to Jerusalem is crowded, and behind the walls the characteristic octagonal shape of the Florentine Baptistry can be seen. In the late nineteenth century, James Ensor painted a modern variation in Christ's Entry into Brussels. The Lord is surrounded by a masked crowd resembling a carnival procession (which precedes Lent). Also, Emil Nolde created a colorful but equally disturbing image in Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.

Andrea Mantegna's Gethsemane (the subject was also painted by Giovanni Bellini, El Greco, and many others) included a second important event of Christ's life: his capture after the celebration of the Last Supper. In all three paintings, Jesus kneels in prayer and the three sleeping apostles occupy the foreground. However, a distant road, where the betrayal takes place revealing Christ's future, becomes visible.

The road to Calvary is one of the most commonly depicted scenes from Christ's Passion. Most artists imbue this event in Jesus' life with great religious fervor. Simone Martini places the scene on a crowded road outside Jerusalem's walls (following Duccio's design). In later centuries, artists such as Raphael and Pieter Bruegel the Elder take advantage of the same theme to show an open landscape closer to the final destination, Golgotha, where the Crucifixion will take place. The difference in the two artists' perceptions of the event lies in the assumed viewpoints. Raphael brings the viewer close to the suffering figure of Christ, whereas Bruegel adopts the distant view of a bird in flight.

Comparatively rare is the depiction of Jesus on his walk to Emmaus after the Resurrection, expounding scripture to the apostle Cleopas and his unidentified companion on the way to the inn. Both Lelio Orsi and Caravaggio dress the three figures in the garb of pilgrims who appear close to the picture plane and dominate the compositions. On the other hand, Lucas van Valckenborch places the three wanderers in a vast landscape that represents the miracle of Christ's Resurrection.

Other Spiritual or Metaphorical Roads

In hagiographies, the format of a continuous narrative is a frequent choice. For example, Hans Memling's Joys of Mary links several biblical events by roads: the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Annunciation to the shepherds, the Three Magi, King Herod, the massacre of the innocents, the flight into Egypt, the temptation of Christ, the Resurrection, noli me tangere (touch me not, John 20:17), Emmaus, Peter at the sea, Christ appearing to his mother, the Ascension, Pentecost, and the death and Assumption of Mary. Similarly, Giovanni di Paolo, in St. John Entering the Wilderness, depicts the saint several times on his way to seclusion. John leaves Jerusalem's gate behind and appears again on a steep, rocky road that leads into the desert.

Saints also are often portrayed on their road to martyrdom. Mantegna's fresco St. James Led to Martyrdom (Padua, Italy, destroyed in World War II) uses an intriguing perspective: the vantage point of the kneeling jailer who asks forgiveness from St. James. A large mural by Guido Reni represents St. Andrew on his way to his crucifixion. Emphasizing the arduous journey that prepares the apostle spiritually for his final hour, Reni renders the saint, surrounded by his companions, on his knees in adoration of the cross. The analogy with Christ is emphasized by visual quotes from Raphael's Way to Calvary, which differs primarily in the shape of the cross.

Medieval travelers, pilgrims, or wanderers are frequently depicted following the straight, narrow, and virtuous path mentioned by Matthew. Hieronymus Bosch's enigmatic Tramp (at times interpreted as Poverty) graces the exterior of the Haywain Triptych. Similar moral implications appear in Bosch's Landloper panel, where a figure, representing Everyman, stumbles along the road of life. Dante's famous journey through hell, purgatory, and paradise is frequently depicted in book illustrations of his Divine Comedy.

The concept of the Christian as a stranger in the world who longs for a home in heaven has been treated in various ways, especially in literature, an example being John Bunyan's Puritan allegory The Pilgrim's Progress. Augustinian concepts of the City of God dominate some of Joachim Patinir's cosmic landscapes. They are frequently populated with tiny personae who cannot be characterized as mere accessory figures; on the contrary, identifying them is essential for interpreting his paintings. For example, St. Jerome in the Desert depicts the hermit seated in the wilderness. In the background, one road, via mortis (road of death), leads to civitas terrena (terrestrial city) and another road, via vita (road of life), to solitude and eventually to the final goal, civitas dei (city of God). Art historian Reindert Falkenburg argues further that these elements served as a guide for the meditation on the lives of the different protagonists whose examples need to be followed.

Albrecht Dürer's print Knight, Death, and the Devil implies a different road metaphor. The artist intended to show a Christian knight in warfare against evil, a realization of Desiderius Erasmus's Enchiridion militis Christiani. Its text, and thus Dürer's print, warn of the danger of erring from a direction dictated by an inner voice. It suggests that a Christian should march along "level ground" without paying attention to threats either by death or by Satan.

Even nineteenth-century artists frequently paint landscapes with quasi-religious meanings. A good example is Jules Breton's Blessing of the Wheat in the Artois, which appears to be a naturalistic painting of beautiful scenery. The photorealism of the landscape and the equally naturalistically conceived rural congregation walking on a narrow path in a eucharistic procession may hinder the modern viewer's understanding of the work as a simile of a spiritual road. Moreover, the wheat field can serve as an allegory for the "daily bread" and the Host in the monstrance to the body of Christ. Equally symbolic is Thomas Cole's series Voyage of Life. A river replaces the customary road the human traveler is about to embark on. Four canvases represent the four stages of humankind: infancy, youth, maturity, and old age—when the soul, again guided by an angel, returns to God.

In times past, traveling was not only arduous but also outright dangerous. Thus, for the benefit of the general public, spiritual pilgrimages were offered to the faithful in lieu of physical journeys to do penance or gain indulgences from the church. For example, Gothic cathedrals, such as those at Amiens and Chartres in France, had labyrinthine mazes that depicted mental pilgrimages to Jerusalem on the pavements. These mazes, deriving ultimately from classical mythology and the legend of Daedalus, measured about 40 feet in diameter and 1,000 feet in length. Recent scholarship indicates that such spiritual routes were more common than previously assumed.

The stations of the cross provide another spiritual path to Jerusalem. Every Roman Catholic church displays 14 crosses that correspond to the events of Christ's Passion. This custom dates to the times of the crusaders' "Way of the Cross," or "the little Jerusalem." Although few examples are of high artistic quality, the most famous is Henri Matisse's Via Crucis in the Dominican Chapel in Vence, France. Barnett Newman painted 15 very esoteric panels in the 1960s. His Stations of the Cross do not relate to the orthodox practices of the Roman Catholic Church, but they do give the individual viewer the opportunity for a spiritual experience.

To end the discussion of spiritual roads, a rare meaning of St. Bonaventura's Itinerarium Mentis in Deum (mind's road to God) deserves mention. Located in the St. Bonaventura chapel in SS. Apostoli in Rome, life-size statues of Faith and Wisdom by the sculptor Paolo Cavaceppi (literal visualizations of Cesare Ripa's allegories) appear with the painted altarpiece Virgin and Child Adored by Saint Bonaventura and the Blessed Andrea Conti. The two theological virtues relate to this passage in the saint's writings: "Faith assists the soul's itinerary and through Faith the contemplative is brought to the final step in his ascent and passes over to God by the light of Wisdom."

Secular Roads

Art historian Erwin Panofsky treated the origin of the story of the choice of Hercules as well as the iconography and iconology of the subject in depth in his erudite book Hercules am Scheidewege (1930). The sources for the images included the classical authors Hesiod and Prodicus, among others. The theme, however, was not depicted in antiquity. A Greek fable tells of a fork in Hercules' path that requires the hero to make an ethical decision: a choice between an easy road symbolic of vice or a steep incline up to virtue, where the winged horse Pegasus was waiting for the weary traveler. The Pythagorean Y, used throughout history as a metaphor for the two roads (one of vice, the other of virtue), in Geoffroy Tory's woodcut Y with Symbols of Awards and Punishments (1529) has already been mentioned. Since the Renaissance, numerous illustrations of Hercules at the crossroad have appeared in a variety of media, and the iconography of the subject developed over several centuries.

In the graphic arts, a number of images depicting the choice of Hercules appeared in the 1500s and addressed a variety of audiences. Examples range from crude, didactic woodcuts for Sebastian Brant's The Ship of Fools (Stultifera Navis, 1497), meant to educate the general public, to the sophisticated engraving by Friedrich Sustris for Prince Maximilian of Bavaria. The former work shows Hercules dressed in armor, reclining in the foreground next to a Pythagorean Y-shaped road. In his dream he sees two females, representing vice and virtue. Voluptas is depicted as a nude surrounded by lush roses, and a skeleton hides behind her back. A chasm divides her from a demurely dressed, virtuous lady who holds a spindle against the background of thistles. The print's passive hero (the motif of a sleeping knight resurfaced in Raphael's Dream of Scipio) contrasts sharply with the mannerist design of Sustris's Hercules at the Crossroad, which displays a muscular figure standing with his club over his shoulder, ready for action. Hercules expresses the humanist idea of humankind's free will. Sustris's emblematic Latin inscriptions explain the encyclopedic meaning. In a third print, Christoph Murer etched the same pagan subject but also introduced some religious concepts: Above Virtue appear the words Via vita (road of life) and above Vice Via mortis (road of death).

In painting, too, the Prodicus topos became a favorite of many patrons. Carracci found a "canonical" solution for Hercules at the crossroad in his ceiling decoration for Cardinal Ranuccio Farnese in his Roman palace. The program for the whole room was probably written by Fulvio Orsini. Carracci's center Hercules panel differs from earlier prototypes of the hero's pose. He is seated, linking him to the judgment of Paris. Moreover, by using the dorsal view of the statue Callipygian Venus (Museo Nazionale in Naples, Italy) as a prototype for his figure of Vice, the Bolognese artist not only created a scene al antica (in the antique style) that referred to lust but also hinted at yet another classical beauty contest. The famous Farnese marble represented a legendary peasant girl who had asked a young man on the highway to pass judgment on her and her sister's physical attributes. Apart from the different poses of the two women, the contrast in hairstyles also emphasizes the difference between Virtus and Voluptas. Carracci's influence can be assumed in all future versions of the subject if the symbols of vanitas (vanity) appear in the shape of two masks and musical instruments.

The essential differences in the various interpretations of Hercules' choice lie in the indication of his crucial decision. Sustris's and Carracci's heroes seem to have chosen the virtuous path. On the other hand, Pompeo Batoni, who treated the subject at least four times, seats Hercules closer to the woman who promises an easy life. Batoni's Hercules seems to be a captive of love. However, a glance indicates the possibility that he will "change his ways." In Batoni's first version of Hercules at the Crossroad (1742, Palazzo Pitti in Florence, Italy), the choice relates again to the judgment of Paris, and the women represented are Venus/Love and Pallas Athena/Wisdom.

Endless variations on the theme of Hercules at the crossroad occur in painting. For example, Angelica Kauffmann puts herself in the hero's place, trying to decide between painting and music, and Joshua Reynolds creates a frivolous mood when he portrays David Garrick Between Tragedy and Comedy. The actor is physically accosted by two women who pull him in opposite directions. His sheepish grin indicates that he will succumb to the lures of pleasure.

Didactic symbolism was implied in a maze in Louis XIV's garden in Versailles, France, designed by André Le Notre in 1667 (destroyed in 1774). The conceit of the famous Bosquet du Labyrinthe was based on numerous quotes from Aesop's Fables, which supplied moral lessons for the visitors. Finding one's way and solving the puzzle depended on one critical turn in front of fountain 29, which required a decision between "good and evil." Recent scholarship indicates that the topographical features of such garden labyrinths—they first became popular in the sixteenth century—served as clues for the "art of memory."

Finally, a very different crossroad deserves mention. The Ludwig Museum in Cologne, Germany, displays a modern, cruciform installation of rocks entitled A Crossing Place, which fills a large exhibition hall. The boulders have such sharp points that only a fakir would be able to travel this road. It seems that for the artist, Richard Long, the road has not been made any easier than it was for the ancient hero.

Landscapes depicting roads can be divided into two groups. Some are merely geographical recordings that made their debut with the rise of Western landscape painting, whereas others impart some moral symbolism. Many work well on either level. Ambrogio Lorenzetti's Allegory of Good Government in Siena, Italy, depicts a well-traveled thoroughfare taking nobles hawking into the country and farmers with their produce to the city. The Limbourg brothers' February calendar page from the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry includes a charming vignette of a farmer on his way to a village. Peter Paul Rubens's Landscape with the Castle of Steen portrays a common hay wagon on a country road. His influence on John Constable's Haywain is undeniable; this painting in turn strongly influenced the development of nineteenth-century landscapes. Meindert Hobbema's Avenue Middleharnes finally transcends sheer topography. Deep cart-wheel ruts serve as a conspicuous device to lead the viewer into the picture and tell of industrious farmers, some of whom are seen as tiny specks in the distance. A steeple under a magnificent sky appears on the horizon. All is well in the world. The difficult question in interpreting Hobbema's works is to decide on the depth of the implied symbolism. For example, did the artist merely follow convention in his "pilgrims" populating his country roads, or does he mean to convey a deeper meaning?

Early American artists, although inspired by Dutch landscapes, generally avoided representing traces of humans. They depict no paths in the pristine wilderness, which they equated to the earthly Eden. Later, western painters recorded some of the hardships and dangers of the westward expansion. For example, Emanuel Leutze's Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way is based on Bishop George Berkeley's poem On the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America (1730s):

Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day:
Time's noblest offspring is the last.

The sketch possibly was a working model for a mural in the House of Representatives in Washington, D.C. It is organized as a large landscape filled with subplots of American frontier life, looking from the Great Divide into the "Promised Land." Such expeditions, however, were not without losses, and the members of the wagon train stop for a funeral. The main emphasis in the canvas is on the family gathered on a rocky ledge in the middle ground. The realistic narrative is given additional allegorical meaning by including explorers, such as Christopher Columbus and Daniel Boone, and juxtaposing them with figures from the Old Testament, such as Moses and Elijah.

Other American painters avoided symbolic interpretations and simply wanted to record history. John Gutzon Borglum's Staging in California shows the thrills of the Wild West. His wagon is pulled by wild horses, leaving their coachman just barely in command. The coach comes precariously close to the edge of an abyss. Thomas Ottern's On the Road makes a statement on modernity in the New World—an old-fashioned wagon races a railroad train.

Roads often create depth in composition. Probably the first attempt to show perspective is seen in the Assyrian relief Sack of the City of Hamanu by Ashurbanipal. The road leading to the city's gate narrows considerably toward the back. Perhaps one of the most recent perspectival exercises also concerns a road: Alan d'Arcangelo's Highway 2. The one-point perspective leads the viewer to a focal point in the rear. The artist appeals to our experiences, evoking nostalgia. We all have traveled this lonely road; where will it lead us?

The literary topos of Roman triumphs and the visual tradition of the Petrarchan "triumphs" of Love, Virtue, Death, and Time served as inspiration for Mantegna's masterpiece Triumph of Julius Caesar at Hampton Court in England. Albrecht Dürer's Triumphal Arch of Maximilian I, or arcus triumphalis (triumphal arch), is composed of 192 woodcuts of a procession and presents the emperor seated in profile, similar to Mantegna's Caesar. Heroic also is the road that Napoleon rides triumphantly across on a rugged mountain pass in Jacques-Louis David's Napoleon at St. Bernard (Hannibal's and Charlemagne's names are engraved on the rocks). It portrays Napoleon on a white charger rather than on the common mule that had actually served the future emperor on this journey. However, his own troops, supposedly on the same road, must follow a more arduous path. Nicolas Antoine Taunay's French Army Crossing the St. Bernard Pass records realistically the hardships the soldiers had to endure. Wounded men drag themselves through the wintry landscape.

Mundane dangers of country roads and ambushes by brigands were fashionable subjects that were popularized in bambocciate (small pictures depicting low-life and peasant scenes), yet this tradition lasted well into the nineteenth century. Pieter van Laer, Philips Wouwerman, and Francisco de Goya, among others, repeated this genre, which generally displayed a melee of horses, riders, and coaches. However, Horace Vernet treated the subject in the manner of a history painting. Italian Brigands Surprised by Papal Troops appears to be a battle between good and evil. A makeshift cross and a small votive offering signify God's order as some of the brigands seek refuge and mercy on the chapel's steps. Whether the pagan sarcophagus is a mere prop or should indicate death is anyone's guess.

There is a surprising absence of depictions of traffic accidents in art if we consider the death toll on modern highways. TO-D 593, an installation by U. Weingart and F. Meurer, presents a fatality on a motorcycle. The body of the rider is slumped over the front wheel, hiding the dead person's identity (Jedermann/Everyman). The letters of the license plate allude to the German word TOD (death). Skid marks on the road accentuate the reality of the man's demise, yet death has little meaning in this context, as the artist expresses the fatalism of an existentialist.

Gustave Courbet used roads twice in idiosyncratic works. His Meeting, later dubbed Bonjour M. Courbet, records an important encounter in the artist's career. The painting describes realistically the hot dusty road, receding into the distance, that Courbet had traveled to visit his most important patron, friend, and benefactor, Jacques-Louis-Alfred Bruyas. The wealthy art collector from Montpellier, France, had invited Courbet to the south and had come to meet the painter with extended arms. The host is followed by a servant, who might help the weary traveler with his backpack loaded with painting utensils. Although contemporary sources ridiculed Courbet's canvas as opportunistic and self-glorifying, the painter intended it as a personal allegory. Thus, the composition of the three-figured group, resembling popular prints of The Wandering Jew Ahasverus Welcomed by Two Burghers, must be interpreted in light of contemporary treatment of the subject. In nineteenth-century French literature and visual arts, the old legend served as a metaphor for a feeling of human brotherhood. Courbet expressed the importance of the road in a short song: "I have no fatherland / The earth is my abode / I must end my life on a great road." Thus, Courbet expressed in the Wandering Jew the concept of the artist as prophet seeking to bring truth to his disciples. Courbet wrote in a letter to Bruyas that realism is a "holy and sacred cause, which is the cause of liberty and independence." The depiction of a road already had played a role in an earlier work of Courbet's. One of his most controversial paintings depicted two road menders. The canvas generally known as The Stone Breakers influenced nineteenth-century poets and caused a great stir about its socialist implications. The critics found great fault in honoring common road laborers with a life-size canvas.

Depictions of roads are not limited to Western art. The Aztec example was already mentioned. Japanese woodcuts present native topographical sites. The Famous Views of the 53 Stations Along Tokaido Road, a road that led from the old capital Kyoto to the new city that is now Tokyo, were depicted by Hiroshige, who also was the designer of Sudden Showers at Atake. This latter print became famous because Vincent van Gogh copied it in his painting Bridge with Rain, taking advantage of the elegant arch of the Japanese bridge and the non-Western tradition of showing rain as long diagonal lines.

The theme of roads conjures up something universal, ethical, and eternal. On the other hand, depictions of city streets evoke temporal ideas and the experience of isolation. Few depictions of roads deny themselves the opportunity to incorporate some symbolic significance, whether they express religious meanings or worldly sentiments.

See also Choice/Choosing; Expulsion; Journey/Flight; Labyrinth/Maze

Selected Works of Art

Adoration of the Magi

Giotto, Adoration of the Magi, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Gentile da Fabriano, Adoration of the Magi, altarpiece, 1423, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Veneziano, Domenico, The Adoration of the Magi, 1438, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Gozzoli, Benozzo, Procession of the Magi, 1459, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Medici-Ricardi

Flight into Egypt

Giotto, Flight into Egypt, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
Carracci, Annibale, Flight into Egypt, 1604, Rome, Galleria Doria Pamphili

Callot, Jacques, The Massacre of the Innocents, 1618, etching

Christ's Entry into Jerusalem

Junius Bassus Sarcophagus: Entry into Jerusalem, A.D. 359, Vatican, Grottoes of St. Peter's Basilica

Giotto, Entry into Jerusalem, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
Duccio di Buoninsegna, Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, Maestà Altarpiece, 1308–1311, Siena, Italy, Museo dell'Opera del Duomo

Ensor, James, Christ's Entry into Brussels, 1888, private collection

Nolde, Emil, Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, 1915, Munich, Germany, Neue Staatsgalerie

Agony in the Garden

Mantegna, Andrea, Gethsemane, circa 1460, London, National Gallery

Bellini, Giovanni, Gethsemane, circa 1460, London, National Gallery

El Greco, Gethsemane, 1585, London, National Gallery

Road to Calvary

Giotto, Road to Calvary, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
Simone Martini, Way to Calvary, 1340, Paris, Louvre

Raphael, Way to Calvary, 1516, Madrid, Spain, Prado
Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Way to Calvary, 1564, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Road to Emmaus

Orsi, Lelio, Walk to Emmaus, circa 1565, London, National Gallery

Caravaggio, Walk to Emmaus, circa 1590, lost

Valckenborch, Lucas van, Walk to Emmaus, before 1597, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Carracci, Annibale, Domine quo vadis, 1601, London, National Gallery

Other Christian Roads

Virgin Hodegetria, circa 609, Rome, Pantheon

Virgin Hodegetria, twelfth century, Moscow, Russia, Tretyakov Gallery

Giovanni di Paolo, St. John Entering the Wilderness, circa 1450, Chicago, Art Institute

Mantegna, Andrea, St. James Led to Martyrdom, 1457, destroyed

Memling, Hans, Joys of Mary, circa 1480, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Patinier, Joachim, St. Jerome in the Desert, 1520, Paris, Louvre

Patinier, Joachim, St. Christopher, 1521, El Escorial, Spain, Museos Nuevos

Reni, Guido, St. Andrew Led to Martyrdom, 1608, Rome, San Gregorio al Celio

Non-Christian Roads

Yacatecuhli Bearing Crossroads, circa 1400–1521, Codex Fejervary-Mayer, p. 37 Liverpool, England, National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside, Liverpool Museum (12014)

Spiritual Path

Cavaceppi, Paolo, Faith and Wisdom, 1775, Rome, SS. Apostoli, Capella di San Bonaventura

Matisse, Henri, Via Crucis, 1949–1951, Vence, France, Chapelle du Rosaire des Dominicaines

Pilgrim's Way

Bosch, Hieronymus, Tramp, from Haywain Triptych, 1500–1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Landloper, 1510, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymanns van Beuningen

Dürer, Albrecht, Knight, Death, and the Devil, 1513, engraving

Patinier, Joachim, St. Jerome in the Desert, 1520, Paris, Louvre

Patinier, Joachim, St. Christopher, 1521, El Escorial, Spain, Museos Nuevos

Secular Roads

Sack of the City of Hamanu by Ashurbanipal, sculpture, circa 650 B.C., London, British Museum

Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Allegory of Good Government, 1338, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico

Limbourg Brothers, February, calendar page from the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Blind Leading the Blind, 1568, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale di Capodimonte
- Rubens, Peter Paul, Landscape with the Castle of Steen, 1636, London, National Gallery
- Laer, Pieter van, Attacked by Brigands, circa 1637, Lucca, Italy, private collection
- Wouwerman, Philips, Attacked by Bandits, 1650s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Hobbema, Meindert, Avenue Middleharnes, 1689, London, National Gallery
- Goya, Francisco de, Attacked by Brigands, 1776, Madrid, Spain, de Lardies Collection
- Constable, John, Haywain, 1821, London, National Gallery
- Vernet, Horace, Italian Brigands Surprised by Papal Troops, 1831, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
- Cole, Thomas, Voyage of Life, series of four paintings, circa 1840, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Courbet, Gustave, The Stone Breakers, 1849, destroyed
- Courbet, Gustave, The Meeting, or Bonjour M. Courbet, 1854, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
- Hiroshige, Ando, Famous Views of the 53 Stations Along Tokaido Road, 1855, woodcuts
- Hiroshige, Ando, Sudden Showers at Atake, 1856–1858, from A Hundred Famous Views of Edo Ohashi, woodcuts
- Breton, Jules, Blessing of the Wheat in the Artois, 1857, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
- Borglum, John Gutzon, Staging in California, 1860, Omaha, Nebraska, Joslyn Museum
- Ottern, Thomas, On the Road, 1860, Omaha, Nebraska, Joslyn Museum
- Leutze, Emanuel, Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way, 1861, Washington, D.C., National Museum of American Art
- Gogh, Vincent van, Bridge in Rain, 1887, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Vincent van Gogh
- D'Arcangelo, Allan, Highway 2, 1963, Wasserman Private Collection
- Weingart, U., and F. Meurer, TO-D 593, 1970, object installation
- Long, Richard, A Crossing Place, sculpture, 1983, Cologne, Germany, Ludwig Museum
- “Y”
- Tory, Geoffroy, Y with Symbols of Awards and Punishments, 1529, woodcut
- Micker, Jan Christiaensz, Symbolic Representation of the Broad and the Narrow Way, circa 1635, Leiden, The Netherlands, Lakenhal Museum

Hercules at the Crossroad

- Hercules at the Crossroad*, woodcut from Sebastian Brant's Stultifera Navis, 1497, Basel, Switzerland
- Raphael, Dream of Scipio, circa 1502, London, National Gallery
- Murer, Christoph, Hercules at the Crossroad, 1580, etching
- Sustris, Friedrich, Hercules at the Crossroad, circa 1590, engraved by Johann Sadeler

- Carracci, Annibale, Hercules at the Crossroad, fresco, circa 1596, Rome, Palazzo Farnese
- Reynolds, Joshua, Portrait of David Garrick Between Tragedy and Comedy, 1760, Collection Rothschild
- Batoni, Pompeo, Hercules at the Crossroad, 1742, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Pitti
- Batoni, Pompeo, Hercules at the Crossroad, 1748, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Liechtenstein Galerie
- Batoni, Pompeo, Hercules at the Crossroad, 1750s, Turin, Italy, Galleria Sabauda
- Batoni, Pompeo, Hercules at the Crossroad, 1763–1765, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
- Kauffmann, Angelica, The Artist Hesitating Between the Arts of Music and Painting, circa 1794, Nostell Priory, England, Lord St. Oswald

Triumphal Processions

- Mantegna, Andrea, Triumph of Julius Caesar, 1484–1492, Hampton Court, England
- Dürer, Albrecht, Triumphal Arch of Maximilian I, 192 woodcuts, 1515
- David, Jacques-Louis, Napoleon at St. Bernard, 1800, Versailles, France, Musée National du Chateau de Versailles
- Taunay, Nicolas Antoine, French Army Crossing the St. Bernard Pass, 1808, Versailles, France, Musée National du Chateau de Versailles

Further Reading

- Brucke, O., “Betrachtungen über das Bild des Weges in der hofischen Epik,” in Acta Germanica, Kapstadt, Germany, 1966
- Conan, Michael, “The Conundrum of Le Notre's Labyrinthe,” in Garden History: Issues, Approaches, Methods, Washington, D. C.: Dumbarton Oaks Research Library, 1992
- Eberle, Matthias, Individuum und Landschaft: Zur Entstehung der Landschaftsmalerei, Giessen, Germany: Anabas-Verlag, 1980
- Falkenburg, Reindert, Joachim Patinir: Landscape as an Image of the Pilgrimage of Life, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: J. Benjamins, 1988
- Helfers, James, “The Mystic as Pilgrim,” Journal of the Rocky Mountain Medieval and Renaissance Association 13 (1992)
- Hydes Minor, Vernon, “The Mind's Road to God: A Recorded Commission for Paolo Cavaceppi,” The Art Bulletin (1983)
- Panofsky, Erwin, Hercules am Scheidewege und andere antike Bildstoffe in der neuen Kunst, Berlin: Tleubner, 1930
- The Voyage of Life by Thomas Cole: Paintings, Drawings, and Prints*, exhibition catalog, Utica, New York: Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute, 1985

PATRONAGE

Claire Lindgren

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Patronage:

ANCIENT

BYZANTINE AND MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Altar of Zeus at Pergamum, reconstruction of west front, Berlin, Pergamum Museum, Staatliche Museen, Antike Sammlung. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg/Art Resource, New York)

Patronage, the act of supporting and protecting an artist or an artist's work, is as old as art itself. The intent of patrons, however, has rarely been a simple love of the arts. Viewed chronologically and comparatively, there has been a wide spectrum of goals that patrons have hoped to attain—and an equally wide spectrum of depictions of patrons in art. The depiction of a mythological or religious tale or desired action, for instance, may have another subliminal purpose: to reflect honor, glory, and power on the patron. Or the image of a patron might literally be included in such a work. Often these kinds of depictions took the form of a portrait of the patron holding the commissioned piece, be it a statue, temple, church, book, or city, as an offering to a deity. At the simplest level, such a work might be a flattering portrait of the patron for his or her own aggrandizement.

The idea of supporting the work of an artist, or in some way insuring that an idea is transmitted via a work of painting, sculpture, or architecture, can probably be traced back to prehistoric times. For example, the shaman or artist painting cave walls in return for a portion of the spoils of the hunt would have the hunters as patrons. Unfortunately, because there is no documentation available, this example, however logical, is speculative.

An early documented example of patronage and how the sculptural depiction of a mythological tale with all its ramifications was used to flatter a patron is found during the reign of Eumenes II over the ancient Greek city of Pergamum. One of the best known patrons in antiquity, Eumenes II was responsible for the erection of the Altar of Zeus (180 B.C.) at Pergamum, the rebuilding of the Pergamene Library (second century A.D.), the construction of a copy of Pheidias's chryselephantine (ivory and gold sheeting on a wooden framework) statue of the Athena Parthenos (447–432 B.C.) for the Pergamene Library, as well as numerous copies of earlier Greek masterpieces for placement throughout Pergamum. These many works made Pergamum one of the most beautiful centers of the Hellenistic world, a rival to Athens and Alexandria and a symbol of the political and cultural mission of the Eumenes dynasty (Strabo, Geographia, XIII, 4, 2).

The Pergamene Library had been conceived by Eumenes' father and was rebuilt to surround the temple of Athena Nikephoros, protector of the pre-Attalid Greek city. Moreover, Eumenes restored the precinct outside the city, which was sacred to Athena, goddess of the arts, crafts, and war, and established a new festival in her honor. Eumenes' devotion to Athena and patronage of projects connected with honoring the goddess was not limited to his homeland. He and his brothers visited Athens for the Panathenaea of 178 B.C. Archaeologist William Bell Dinsmoor suggested it was at this time that colossal statues of Eumenes and his father, Attalus I, were erected on the west slope of the Athenian Acropolis. This devotion to Athena enhanced cultural and artistic connections between Athens and Pergamum.

Although the Attalid monarchs had been avid art collectors and patrons, it was not until the reign of Eumenes II that the most original Hellenistic sculpture was commissioned, such as the great frieze of the Altar of Zeus (180 B.C.). This altar, dedicated to the king of the Olympic deities and father of Athena, had a precinct wall more than 400 feet in length and approximately 8 feet in height, which was covered with a frieze in high relief depicting the gigantomachy, the supreme battle in Greek mythology that marked the uncontested supremacy for the Olympic gods—a suitable subject to commemorate the great service to civilization performed by the Attalids in their defeat of the barbaric Celtic tribe, the Gauls. Just as Pericles had saved the classical Greek world and rebuilt the Athenian Acropolis, so Eumenes II glorified his house, which had saved the Hellenistic Greek world, with similar construction. Thus, a pattern of patronage in art and architecture similar to that found in fifth-century B.C. Athens was instituted in second-century B.C. Pergamum. A tradition was established whereby commissioned monuments deliberately carried references that could be easily associated with positive past political events. A later ancient example of this kind of patronage is the Ara Pacis Augustae (Altar of the Augustan Peace, 13–9 B.C.) with its stylistic references to both the Altar of Zeus and the cella (principal enclosed room of a temple) frieze of the Parthenon.

The story of the gigantomachy, as seen on the Altar of Zeus frieze, derived from Hesiod's Theogonia (circa 700 B.C.) and is very complex. According to archaeologist Erika Simon, it was probably the work of Eumenes' librarian Krates, who modified the Hesiodic tale. Art historian Margarete Bieber contends that the design was the product of a leading artist and the learned society at the Attalid court. Archaeologist Dieter Thimme believes that the frieze was the work of many different sculptors under the direction of a leading master whose identity has been disputed. Yet, there is no doubt that the driving force behind the work was Eumenes II, whose patronage made it possible.

Although Eumenes was prompted by political considerations, devotional reverence, and aesthetics in commissioning the great altar, history has interpreted this example of patronage in a variety of ways: Ampelius and the Spartan general Pausanias saw it as a wonder of the ancient world; the Revelation of St. John the Divine saw it as Satan's throne; and German archaeologist Carl Humann, who discovered it in 1871, called it "the greatest expression of art remaining from antiquity."

Examples of this kind of political-artistic patronage abound in antiquity. Examples include the previously mentioned Ara Pacis Augustae, the Forum and the Column of Trajan, The Basilica of Maxentius and Constantine, the numerous temples, bath complexes, and triumphal arches that were erected all over the Roman world, as well as the palace and court complexes so important to ancient rulers. Hellenistic monarchs and Roman generals and emperors used art and architecture as propaganda tools, commissioning works ostensibly for the good of the state and the gods but in reality most often for the good of the patron.

In the postantique world, although politics certainly can never be totally dismissed, the concept of patronage as a devotional expression appears to have become far more common. The building of huge churches, beginning with the construction of Old St. Peter's under Constantine I, was impossible without large donations from patrons such as the emperor, feudal aristocracy, or the clergy, and the commissioning of elaborate illuminated manuscripts for use in private daily devotions testifies to a change in the primary motivation of the patron during this time.

There are abundant examples of devout patronage from the early Christian, Byzantine, and medieval periods: Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome; Sta. Sabina; the Hagia Sophia in Istanbul, Turkey; the Hagios Georgios; St. Michael's in Hildesheim, Germany; St. Sernin in Toulouse, France; St. Front in Périgueux, France; Reims Cathedral and Chartres Cathedral in France, etc.

Ravenna, Italy, on the Adriatic Sea, has particularly good examples of the visualization of the act of patronage. The Church of San Vitale (A.D. 526–547), founded by Bishop Ecclesius in the last years of the reign of Theodoric and begun under Bishop Victor, contains extensive mosaics. Within it one finds mosaic portraits of those connected with the founding and construction of the building: from Bishop Ecclesius, depicted holding a model of the building in the apsidal mosaic (somewhat inaccurate, if one judges by the completed structure), to Emperor Justinian I, under whose rule the church was completed. Justinian is shown presenting a costly paten to the church in a mosaic that flanks the altar. He is attended by the archbishop Maximianus, who holds a jeweled cross, and others such as the general Belisarius and the banker Julianus Argentarius, who probably financed the building. Directly opposite this mosaic is a mosaic depicting the Empress Theodora and her retinue, with Theodora offering a chalice as her donation. A later representation of a founder offering a church can be seen in the fresco on the lower wall of the apse of Sant'Angelo in Formis, Italy (1072). Here Abbot Desiderius (later Pope Victor III) is shown offering the church to Christ.

In the many illuminated manuscripts commissioned during the postantique period, one frequently finds a patron shown receiving a copy of a work, such as is illustrated in The Presentation of the Bible to Charles the Bald (fol. 423) in the Vivian Bible (ninth century) or in Abbess Hitda Presenting Her Book to Saint Walburga in the Hitda Codex (circa 978). In other instances the patron is shown receiving an honor from God and from the secular world, as in Otto III Enthroned Between Church and State in the Gospels of Otto III (circa 1000) or in the dedication page of the Bible Moralisée (circa 1179), which depicts Blanche of Castile and her son, Louis IX. Gradually, it seems that much of the binding of church and state was accomplished in works of art.

On the other hand, the many works initiated under the patronage of Charlemagne appear to be less an attempt to placate and influence a populace than to follow the tenets of religion. Under Charlemagne one finds the alliance of church and state initiated by a ruler devoted to the utilization of the arts to aid and abet the dissemination of the Christian doctrine. The principal motivation for Charlemagne's commissions, from his palace chapel (A.D. 792–805) at Aachen, Germany, to the imperial monastic community at Centula and the manuscript illuminations of the Coronation Gospels (circa 800–810) that, according to legend, were entombed with the emperor, seems to have been devotional, augmented by other more worldly considerations. This curious synthesis of church, state, and art persisted, for a variety of reasons, through most of the medieval period, reaching a peak in the Gothic period in France during the reign of Louis IX with the construction of Sainte-Chapelle (1243–1248) in Paris, the palace chapel built to house relics acquired by the king.

The Renaissance saw an attempt to return to the ideas and patronage concepts of classical antiquity; art was seen as more of a temporal, rather than spiritual, propaganda device. Without the patronage of the merchant princes, such as the Medici family, who wished to turn Florence into a new Christianized Athens, or the ecclesiastical authorities, such as Pope Julius II, a temporal and spiritual ruler who embellished the Vatican with the work of artists such as Michelangelo and Raphael, the Renaissance as we know it might never have occurred. All the major monuments of that period, from Lorenzo Ghiberti's Gates of Paradise (circa 1435) for the Florentine Baptistery to Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel frescos (1508–1512) to the rebuilt St. Peter's Basilica (1503–1513) were conceived and completed because individuals commissioned artists to create works that would glorify God and secular powers, although not necessarily in that order.

These individuals often wished to ensure an everlasting reputation by having themselves included in the commissioned piece. This inclusion could be in the architectural sculpture of a cathedral, such as found on the portal of the Chartreuse de Champmol (1385–1393) in Dijon, France, where Claus Sluter, who was employed by the duke of Burgundy, included Duke Philip the Bold and his wife in the portal's jamb statues. Or the inclusion might occur in the painted portraits seen on altarpieces such as the Master of Flémalle's Merode Altarpiece (circa 1425–1430) and Jan van Eyck's Ghent Altarpiece (1432), in which the donors are included kneeling in separate panels. Similarly, in Masaccio's Holy Trinity with the Virgin and St. John (1425) two donors kneel and worship the holy persons on either side of the main subject. In a more secular vein, a portrait of the patron can be found in the Limbourg Brothers' manuscript Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry (before 1415), in which the duke is shown seated at a table in the January calendar page.

After the Protestant Reformation, church patronage was virtually obliterated in non-Roman Catholic areas. Even in the predominately Roman Catholic countries, artists could no longer look forward to vast commissions and so sought other means of support.

Commissioned portraits seemed to be the answer, and the portrait grew in popularity as did cycles that detailed the lives of the aristocracy, glorifying their words and deeds. A supreme monument of this sort was commissioned by Marie de Médicis, widow of Henri IV of France. Peter Paul Rubens, in order to satisfy her vanity, executed a cycle of paintings (1620s) for his patron, the former queen, in a style that turned her life into a spectacle of glory far removed from actuality. Because she was no longer the queen of the reigning king, the impact of these paintings did not have serious political consequences.

By the next century the court portrait had gained greater significance. Frequently it was the vehicle used to express the aims of a monarchy to a significant inner circle. If the depiction did not violate reasonable probability, it was effective, and the patron, viewers, and artist were pleased; but if the depiction and reputation of the patron were not compatible and the work was scorned by the intended audience, both the artist and patron could suffer dire consequences. For instance, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-LeBrun painted Marie Antoinette and her Children (circa 1787) at the request of Marie Antoinette as an effort to counter the pejorative image the queen had acquired. The importance of this commission is indicated by the amount paid the artist, almost five times the amount paid for a 1785 portrait of the queen by Adolph Ulric Wertmüller. In Vigée-LeBrun's work, the queen, surrounded by her children, is seated in a manner reminiscent of depictions of the Holy Family. Her features have been beautified and her costume is luxurious, creating a positive image that emphasizes the grandeur of monarchy. To this idea Vigée-LeBrun attempted to add the concept of maternal love, with a younger child clasping the queen's breast, while an elder child gazes at the queen in a loving manner. But the painting was not able to counter opposition to the queen and the French monarchy. Ultimately Marie Antoinette was executed, and because the queen had been her patron, Vigée-LeBrun was forced to flee France.

During the eighteenth century, notions of patronage expanded to include rendering the ideas a patron held dear, such as Johann Joseph Zoffany's The Tribuna of the Uffizi Gallery (1772–1779), commissioned by Queen Charlotte of Britain presumably to celebrate her taste and education. In this scene, the revered pieces of the Uffizi Gallery in Florence can be seen on the walls. Around and among these works one finds the intelligentsia and elite of the British community in Florence, a testament to the cultured taste of the queen. This type of subject was a model frequently followed by eighteenth-century collectors, and, to this day, the wealthy like to be photographed in the midst of their art. An eighteenth-century antithesis to this crowded work, Thomas Gainsborough's Mr. and Mrs. Robert Andrews (circa 1748), is also a visualization of that which was most important to the patron—in this instance, his love of the land. An entire half of Gainsborough's painting depicts the well-tended farm of this member of the landed gentry.

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the rise of democracies and the subsequent gradual demise of the dictatorial state resulted in the establishment of artistic academies and affiliated exhibitions. Artists, now no longer certain of eventual support within a closed system, were in even greater need of financial backing. Sponsorship came in various ways. Individuals of wealth who sought recognition for a number of reasons sometimes chose to support an artist. A nineteenth-century English example of such beneficence was Lord Egremont III, at whose home, Petworth, J. M. W. Turner often stayed for months at a time.

In the early twentieth century the Steins—Michael, his wife Sarah, brother Leo, and sister Gertrude—aided many artists at the start of their careers, including such great modern masters as Henri Matisse and Pablo Picasso. Picasso's Gertrude Stein (1906), although ostensibly a portrait of his patron, marks the beginning of the formal breakthrough to cubism. A patron less avant-garde than Gertrude Stein might have rejected the finished work. Her support, in a way, marks the beginning of the importance of patronage in the development of modern movements. Other turn-of-the-century patrons of avant-garde artists were the Cones of Baltimore, Maryland, and Sergei Shchukin of Moscow.

The most significant expansion of patronage in the twentieth century was concurrent with the rise of the art dealer, who, in effect, became the arbiter of taste in the modern art world. To a great extent, a kind of marketplace patronage replaced the political and religious patronage of the past. By 1912, dealer Daniel Henry Kahnweiler was the single agent for Georges Braque and Picasso and had total control over their works in exchange for a monthly stipend paid to the artists. For at least 10 years dealer Ambroise Vollard, whose portrait was painted by Picasso in 1910, enjoyed the same control over the output of Georges Rouault. This system of dealer-dominated patronage did not apply to architecture, however. From the mid-nineteenth century onward, due to the complexities inherent to construction and architecture's relationship to engineering, architectural commissions were subject to an increasingly close collaboration between architect and patron.

Painting and sculpture in the second half of the twentieth century continued to be dominated by the dealer/patron, who assembled stables of artists ready to produce for a specific clientele with the instincts of an excellent merchant. Leo Castelli, one such dealer whose gallery played a key role in the shaping of art in the post-World War II era, featured artists such as Jasper Johns, Robert Rauschenberg, Roy Lichtenstein, Andy Warhol, and Frank Stella to promote and sell the latest movements in art. Sidney Janis, another dealer equally as famous as Castelli, was himself immortalized as a collector and patron by George Segal in a mixed media work entitled Portrait of Sidney Janis with a Mondrian Painting.

From antiquity to the present, various types of patronage have contributed to the creation and completion of works of art. For patronage to exist, there must be an artist who wishes to receive payment for his or her labor and a patron who expects to achieve a specific result by meeting the expenses and needs of the artist. The artist's need is the more constant of the two requirements; the patron can be motivated by a variety of desires: religious, social, political, economic, or a combination of these and other factors that, in most instances, reflect the spirit of the times in which they both live. Although the goals of individual patrons may have differed over the centuries, the use of the visual arts to achieve these results has been a constant since antiquity.

See also Artists/Art; Honor/Honoring

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Athenian Acropolis, Greek, fifth century B.C., Athens, Greece
Athena Parthenos, copy of Greek original, 447–432 B.C., Pergamum, Greece
 Pergamene Library, Greek, second century A.D., Pergamum, Greece
 Altar of Zeus, Greek, 180 B.C., Pergamum, Greece Ara Pacis Augustae, Roman, 13–9 B.C., Rome, Museum of the Ara Pacis
 Pantheon, Roman, circa A.D. 118, Rome

Byzantine and Medieval

San Vitale, Byzantine architecture, 526–547, Ravenna, Italy
 Palace chapel of Charlemagne, Carolingian architecture,
 792–805, Aachen, Germany
Coronation Gospels, illuminated manuscript, circa 800,
 Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
Vivian Bible, illuminated manuscript, ninth century, Paris,
 Bibliothèque Nationale
Hilda Codex, illuminated manuscript, circa 978, Darmstadt,
 Germany, Hessische Bibliothek
Gospels of Otto III, illuminated manuscript, circa 1000,
 Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek
Bible Moralisée, illuminated manuscript, circa 1179, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Nationalbibliothek (Cod.2554. versions)
 Sainte-Chapelle, medieval architecture, 1243–1248, Paris
 Sluter, Claus, Chartreuse de Champmol, portal sculpture, 1385–1393, Dijon, France

Renaissance

Limbouurg Brothers, Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, illuminated manuscript, before 1415, Chantilly, France,
 Musée Condé
 Masaccio, Holy Trinity with Virgin and St. John, fresco, 1425, Florence, Italy, Santa Maria Novella
 Master of Flémalle, Merode Altarpiece, circa 1425–1430,
 New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Eyck, Jan van, Ghent Altarpiece, 1432, Ghent, Belgium, St.
 Bavo
 Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Gates of Paradise, circa 1435, Florence, Italy, Baptistry of St. Giovanni Bramante, Donato, Michelangelo, et al., St. Peter's Basilica, architecture, 1503–1513, Vatican
 Michelangelo, Sistine Chapel, ceiling frescos, 1508–1512, Vatican
 Raphael, Vatican Stanze, 1510, Vatican

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Rubens, Peter Paul, Life of Marie de Médicis, 1620s, Paris,
 Louvre
 Gainsborough, Thomas, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Andrews, circa 1748, London, National Gallery
 Zoffany, Johann Joseph, The Tribuna of the Uffizi Gallery, 1772–1779, London, Royal Collection Barry, James, The Distribution of Premiums at the Society of Arts, 1777–1784, London, Royal Society of Arts

Vigée-LeBrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Marie Antoinette and Her Children, circa 1787, Versailles, France

Twentieth Century

Picasso, Pablo, Gertrude Stein, 1906, New York,
 Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Picasso, Pablo, Ambroise Vollard, 1910, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum
 Segal, George, Portrait of Sidney Janis with Mondrian
Painting

Selected List of Individual Patrons

Ancient

Pericles of Athens
 Eumenes II of Pergamum
 Caesar Augustus
 Hadrian

Byzantine and Medieval

Constantine the Great Justinian I
 Charlemagne
 Bernward of Hildesheim
 Louis IX of France

Renaissance

Charles IV of Spain
 Lorenzo de' Medici
 Cosimo de' Medici
 Pope Julius II
 Francis I of France
 Henry VIII of England
 Philip II of Spain

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Louis XIV of France
 Peter the Great of Russia
 Catherine the Great of Russia
 Louis XVI of France
 Napoleon Bonaparte

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Victoria of England
 Lord Egremont III
 Gertrude Stein
 Sergei Shchukin
 Daniel Henry Kahnweiler
 Leo Castelli
 Sidney Janis
 Peggy Guggenheim

Further Reading

Bieber, Margarete, Sculpture of the Hellenistic Age, New York: Columbia University Press, 1961
 Blum, Shirley Neilsen, Early Netherlandish Triptychs: A Study in Patronage, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1969

- Cox-Rearick, Janet, Dynasty and Destiny in Medici Art: Pontormo, Leo X, and the Two Cosimos, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
- Dinsmoor, William Bell, The Architecture of Ancient Greece, New York: Batsford, 1950
- Foss, Michael, The Age of Patronage: The Arts in England, 1660–1750, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1972
- Gold, Barbara K., editor, Literary and Artistic Patronage in Ancient Rome, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982
- Goldberg, Edward L., Patterns in Late Medici Art Patronage, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1983
- _____, After Vasari: History, Art and Patronage, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Hanson, Esther Violet, The Attalids of Pergamon, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1971
- Harris, John S., Government Patronage of the Arts in Great Britain, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1970
- Haskell, Francis, Patrons and Painters: A Study in the Relations Between Italian Art and Society in the Age of the Baroque, London: Chatto and Windus, 1963
- Hollingsworth, Mary, Patronage in Renaissance Italy: From 1400 to the Early Sixteenth Century, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994; London: John Murray, 1994
- Jackson, Marjory, Art for Work: The New Renaissance in Corporate Collecting, Boston: Harvard Business School, 1993
- Jones, Pamela M., Frederico Borromeo and the Ambrosiana: Art Patronage and Reform in Seventeenth Century Milan, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Kahler, Heinz, Der Grosse Fries von Pergamon, Berlin: Mann, 1948
- Kempers, Brian, Painting, Power, and Patronage: The Rise of the Professional Artist in the Italian Renaissance, Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1992; London: Allen Lane, 1992
- Lytle, Guy Fitch, and Stephen Orgel, editors, Patronage in the Renaissance, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981
- Macready, Sarah, and F. H. Thompson, editors, Art and Patronage in the English Romanesque, London: Society of Antiquaries, 1986
- Morrow, Deborah, The Art Patronage of Maria de' Medici, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1982
- Pillsbury, Edmond P., Florence and the Arts: Five Centuries of Patronage, Cleveland, Ohio: Cleveland Museum of Art, 1971
- Schmidt, Eva Maria, The Great Altar of Pergamon, Leipzig: VEB, 1962
- Simon, Erika, Pergamon und Hesiod, Mainz, Germany: von Zabern, 1975
- Thimme, Dieter, "The Masters of the Pergamon Gigantomachy," American Journal of Archaeology 50 (July 1946)
- Vigée-LeBrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Memoirs, translated by Lionel Stechy, New York: G. Braziller, 1989

PEACE

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following arts are covered in the discussion of the theme Peace:

EMBLEMS

GRAPHIC ARTS

PAINTINGS AND DRAWINGS

METALWORK

SCULPTURE

TAPESTRY

Giorgio Vasari, Portrait of Alessandro de' Medici, 1534, panel, Florence, Italy, Museo Mediceo. (Courtesy of Scala/Art Resource, New York)

The Hebrew word for peace is shalom, which appears numerous times in the Bible with several significations: individual reference to good health and safety (Genesis 15:15, 43:23; Exodus 18:7; Joshua 10:21; I Kings 22:17; Job 5:23; Psalm 4:8, 38:3; Proverbs 3:2; Isaiah 38:17); social reference to public righteousness and judgment (Judges 4:17; Isaiah 48:18; 60:17; I Kings 5:26); and theological reference to God as the source for individual contentment (I Kings 2:33; Psalm 4:8, 29:11; Isaiah 45:7) (Hawthorne, p. 579).

The Greek word for peace is eirene, which is related to a harmonious state of mind as well as harmonious rulership. The Romans, like the Greeks, focused on the symbolism of peace (Latin pax) to mean the end of war. The Christian concept of peace fuses the Hebraic meaning of shalom with the Greek signification of eirene; thus, through God/Jesus Christ, humanity can achieve tranquillity of mind and soul (Romans 5:1).

In Christian iconography, the dove becomes a symbol of peace and renewal of life because it was the dove that was sent out from Noah's ark after the flood seeking God's message. The dove returned with an olive branch, thus alluding to God's reconciliation with humanity. This ancient image of the dove as a symbol of peace has continued through the centuries. In the twentieth century, Pablo Picasso's poster image of the white dove recalls the ancient symbol of peace. Although Picasso had already joined the Communist Party when he designed this poster of the peace dove, it became a true symbol for the peace movement. The signed poster contained at top an image of a white dove with an inscription announcing a world congress for peace in April 1949 in Paris. Picasso's reputation and action encouraged others to protest against the threat of nuclear war (Berger, p. 175).

Peace is celebrated at the end of a war by burning the arms and weapons with a flaming torch. Usually the attributes of peace as a symbol of good government, or the peaceful qualities of a ruler, are the olive branch (symbol of immortality and renewal of life), the dove (the life spirit or soul), the cornucopia (horn of plenty), and the caduceus (symbol for a messenger of good will). Sometimes peace is depicted with wings or is honored with an olive crown alluding to the crown of olives worn by the victor at the Heraea races, acclaiming the moon goddess, Hera; the crown of wild olives alludes to the victor at the Olympic games, praising Zeus, the king of the gods. Legend has it that in Greek as well as in Roman ritual the laurel had the power to shake up those who had shed the blood of others. Also, the laurel was the only tree that was never struck by lightning. When offerings were kindled with laurel branches, the crackling in the fire was considered an omen of peace (Biedermann, p. 202).

Rulers often used the symbols of peace to enhance their reign and celebrate the tranquil aftermath of military victories. Emperor Augustus, who preferred to appear as a prince of peace rather than as a triumphant victor, built the Ara Pacis Augustae (Altar of the Augustan peace) in Rome in 9 B.C. to celebrate the successful pacification of Spain and Gaul four years earlier. The large enclosure (39 feet by 35.5 feet), decorated with bas-reliefs, surrounds the inner altar raised on a platform. The reliefs depict Roman power and wealth resulting from the fertility of the earth and the abundance of nature made possible by peace. For example, in the Tellus Relief, the Roman earth mother, an embodiment of fertility, sits with two children in her lap, surrounded by an abundant landscape and the personifications of the winds. Other bas-reliefs depict a procession of citizens led by the emperor himself. Many graceful plant forms underscore the abundance and plenitude of nature.

The classical symbols of peace were equally familiar during the Renaissance and Baroque periods, as can be seen in the iconographic description of the Sala dei Cento Giorni in the Palazzo della Cancelleria in Rome (1546), where Giorgio Vasari referred to peace as "having an olive branch in hand (aver l'oliva in mano)." This earlier iconographic motif was again applied in the Chamber of Abraham in Vasari's house in Arezzo, Italy (1548), as well as in the Refectory of Monteoliveto in Naples, Italy (1545). The olive tree or olive branch was a symbol of peace for both the Greeks and the Hebrews. According to St. Augustine, olive trees symbolize the feast of the Epiphany because Abraham and Isaac and Jacob are the progenitors from whom the Jews drew their lineage. They might feast, not as legitimate offspring of these trees, but as grafts upon their stock made through faith, so as to preserve the wild olive which is to be grafted upon the olive tree of which Saint Paul speaks [in Romans 11:24].

Thus, in the figure of Peace, as in that of the Virtue of Chastity, one observes the fusion of pagan motifs with religious symbolism. The fact that Peace is located just below the tondo scene and has the same orientation is significant. Unlike the personifications of Modesty, Concord, and Chastity in the ceiling, Peace relates directly to God's blessing of Isaac and Abraham, as if God were reassuring the Hebrew people of His protection and of peace on Earth.

According to Piero Valeriano and Vincenzo Cartari, peace and concord are one and the same. Both were adored by the ancients, who desired a quiet and peaceful life. Cesare Ripa, in his Iconologia, later adds that the olive tree was an attribute of Pallas, goddess of peace. According to the Bible, since the time of Noah the olive tree was a symbol of peace (Genesis 8:11). The Hebrews used the symbol of the olive tree as a reference to the peaceful election of a king and to remind the people of Judea to live in harmony. Also, because of its quantity of oil, the olive tree was called a "tree full of richness" and symbolized the providence of God toward the Hebrews (Judges 9:8–9). Valeriano recounts that the olive tree or olive branch was also a symbol of peace for the Greeks.

Vasari's drawing Peace Bearing an Olive Branch (1545) in the Graphische Sammlung Albertina in Vienna, Austria (Inv. 462), which in the past was attributed to Perino del Vaga, represents a theme similar to that in his painting in the Refectory of Monteoliveto in Naples. A second drawing on the theme of peace, found in an American private collection, has also been attributed to Vasari. Both drawings have been related to Vasari's Apparato dei Sempiterni (1541–1542), which was used for the Pietro Aretino comedy La Talanta in Venice, Italy.

As Vasari recounts in his autobiography, his knowledge of hieroglyphs and emblemata derived from his education in the classics with Pollastra, his tutoring with Piero Valeriano during his formative years, and his contact with the emblemist Andrea Alciati in Bologna, Italy. Evidence of these influences on Vasari's paintings can be seen in the Portrait of Alessandro de' Medici (1534) in the Museo Mediceo in Florence, Italy, in which he portrays the duke as the symbol of peace. In a letter to Ottaviano de' Medici, Vasari describes the symbolism in this portrait, comparing himself to the ancient painter Apelles, who painted the portrait of his patron, Alexander of Macedonia, as Vasari painted Alessandro de' Medici. Obviously, the paragone, or comparison, does not rest solely on the portrait commission but also extends to the patronage of two rulers named Alexander. In this letter, Vasari further elaborates on the meaning of the duke's armor as a symbol of public protection, courtly love, and public trust. The artist continues explaining how the reflections in the Duke's shining armor mirror self-trust as well as people's trust. Moreover, he explains that the seated position of the duke on a circular chair, holding the bastone del dominio (the baton of power), signifies eternal governance. Furthermore, according to Vasari's letter, the decorated chair with three legs of truncated bodies and leonine paws refers to the submission of nations to the Florentine governance of the Medici. Vasari further describes the background in the portrait: Behind the seated duke a row of ruined columns and edifices allude to the siege of Florence in 1530. For Vasari, the red mantle covering the chair symbolizes the blood shed by the duke and his ancestors. In the letter he also describes the meaning of the emblem of the flowering truncated tree, which refers to the necessity of preserving the Medici family. For Vasari, the burning helmet is purposefully placed on the ground and not worn by the duke because it symbolizes the eternal peace created by the duke's good governance, which has brought a reign of friendship and love for his people. This letter concludes with a Latin epitaph probably composed by Paolo Giovio.

Numerous art historians have analyzed this portrait, but none as eloquently as Janet Cox-Rearick, who viewed it as a Vasarian conceit (invenzione) with a complex set of symbolic references to legitimize the duke and aggrandize him politically. According to Cox-Rearick (pp. 234–236) and other scholars, such as Leo Steinberg, Julian Kliemann, and J. Malcolm Campbell, this portrait is the first example of official Medici propaganda. By contrast, Karla Langedijk (p. 49) and Kurt Forster (p. 135) focus on the uniqueness of the portrait as a fusion of a commemorative line of ancestral images with a notion of peaceful government.

For Duke Alessandro's seated position, Vasari obviously recalls Michelangelo's statue Giuliano de Medici (1534), in the sacristy of San Lorenzo. However, according to Richard Trexler (pp. 109–111), Michelangelo's statue holding the bastone del dominio (here symbolizing decorum of sovereignty) should be identified as Lorenzo, a Florentine captain-general, and not Giuliano de' Medici, a papal captain-general. Also, the Medici's lineage followed from Lorenzo to his illegitimate son Alessandro, as visually reinforced in this comparison of seated images in sculpture and painting.

Cox-Rearick has unveiled the meaning of the laurel branch, which derives from a personal impresa for Lorenzo the Younger of 1512 and from Vasari's description of the Duke Alessandro painting: "The dry laurel branch which puts forth that erect and flesh leafy twig is the Medici house, once extinguished, which must grow with infinite progeny in the person of Duke Alessandro." In this allusion to the Medici family's dynasty and strength, Vasari's imagery seems to be derived not only from Francesco Melchiori's impresa, where a laurel branch feeds an oak tree and thus symbolizes an illegitimate birth from a branch of the family (in this instance Alessandro's illegitimacy), but also from Antonio Borghesi's impresa, signifying the power of ancestry. Vasari illustrates the implication of this symbolism not only in his depiction of the laurel branch, seen on the left of the seated Alessandro and alluding to the political power of the Medici family, but also in the painted truncated tree on Alessandro's right, signifying the interruption of the Medici dynasty caused by Duke Alessandro's present lack of heirs and his illegitimate birth.

Although difficult to see, behind the seated duke are two columns and a tree encircled by a vine with a laurel crown. From his interactions with the humanists Annibale Caro and Paolo Giovio, Vasari had continued to assimilate the emblematic imagery; for example, the two columns framing a truncated branch decorated with laurel derive from Giovio's impresa for Stefano Colonna. The two columns, referring to Hercules' columns, are a conventional symbol of fortitude. However, the meaning of the duke's imagery may be elaborated further from yet another Medici impresa executed by the Milanese Luigi Marliano for the Medici Pope, Leo X, which alludes to the Medici good political fortune as well as to their fortitude in governing.

Vasari parallels the armored duke with the goddess Minerva, probably because of his familiarity with Raphael's fresco painting of 1512 in the Sala della Segnatura at the Vatican. Minerva or Athena was the goddess of peace, although she frequently is represented in full armor, alluding to her victory for peace through war. However, when she is surrounded by laurel branches and truncated trees with laurel, Minerva the warrior becomes Minerva the peaceful, thus symbolizing governmental peace.

Francesco Laurana's Minerva Pacifica, the reverse of the medal of René of Anjou (King of Sicily) (1465), with an inscription "Pax Augusti" (Augustus's Peace), symbolizes the transformation of Minerva from a goddess of war to a goddess of peace (Wittkower, p. 135). She holds a dove in one hand and a laurel in the other. A truncated laurel tree balances her discarded armor, which is no longer needed for protection and is now used as a trophy. In the 1480s, Botticelli, inspired by the imagery of Laurana, executed several drawings of Minerva Pacifica in the Uffizi Gallery as a preparatory studies for the tapestry Minerva Pacifica for Comte Guy de Baudreuil, (1491, Favelles, France, Collection Vicomte de Baudreuil). Botticelli further expanded this subject in the 1480s with a painting, Minerva and the Centaur, for the Medici family, now at the Uffizi Gallery. Between the two columns, a tree with the encircled vine refers to Alciati's Emblem 116, Prudentes vino absti- nent (Those who indulge in wine do not possess prudence). With the laurel crown on the tree, Vasari honors the duke with virtue for his fortitude and prudent political behavior.

The last significant emblem or hieroglyph to be deciphered is the depiction of the flaming helmet. Obviously, Vasari visually quotes Alciati's Emblem 178, Ex bello pax (Peace from war). The painter has replaced Alciati's blood-covered helmet with a helmet on fire, alluding to the burning of the arms, a symbol of peace. The helmet clearly alludes to Duke Alessandro as a peace-giving Mars because a glyph of Mars, Roman god of war, is incised in the helmet (unnoticed before). Cox-Rearick has observed that a commemorative medal by Francesco del Prato (1534) portraying the duke as peacemaker contains the inscription "Fundator quietis" (Founder of Peace), and a glyph for Mars derives from Vasari's painting. Originally, the frame of the painting (now lost) contained the inscription "Fundator quietis." All these attributes reinforce the symbolism of peace in the painting. Thus, this painting is a pictorial emblem, with an inscription, the Latin inscription originally painted on the frame; a pictura, or painting; and a subscription, Vasari's letter to Ottavio de' Medici explaining the meaning of the images in the painting.

Clare Robertson's study "Annibale Caro as Iconographer: Sources and Method" also informs us that Vasari acquired his knowledge of iconography and emblems through his study of the works of Caro. In his history of Italian Renaissance artists (1550), Vasari praises Caro, poet and translator of classical literature and secretary to Cardinal Farnese, for his clever and creative invenzioni. Caro, in turn, considered Alciati's and Cartari's books iconographic manuals and praised them for their significance. Furthermore, Julian Kliemann, in "Il Pensiero di Paolo Giovio nelle pitture eseguite sulle invenzioni," has brilliantly demonstrated the influence of Giovio's writings, such as Gli Elogi and Dialoghi, in Vasari's Roman decorative cycles. Thus, the painter's manner of composing images for a program as a compendium of visual iconography parallels and derives from the literary practices of Alciati, Cartari, Francesco Colonna, Giovio, and Valeriano. Obviously, Giorgio Vasari has been influenced by them.

In addition, Giovio's Dialogo delle imprese militare et amorse (1555), Vasari's prefaces to his history, and later Ripa's Iconologia (1603) concur that the image should provide visual interest by showing beautiful elements, that its motto should be brief (two or three words or a line of verse), and that its meaning should be suggestively incomplete to intrigue or tease the viewer—in sum, a mannerist conceit.

Renaissance and Baroque paintings also incorporated the Christian iconography of the representation of the dove as a symbol of peace as well as the symbol of the third person of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, as noted in scenes of the baptism of Christ (Matthew 3:16), the Trinity (Masaccio's Trinity, 1427, in the Sta. Maria Novella in Florence), and the Annunciation (Hubert van Eyck, Annunciation, circa 1425, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York). The dove as a symbol of divine inspiration and spiritual well-being relates to the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit (wisdom, understanding, counsel, fortitude, knowledge, piety, and fear of the Lord). In cemeteries, stelae or grave markers sometimes represent the dove as a symbol of the spirit or soul of the deceased resting in peace.

In the United States in the eighteenth century, a new symbol of peace grew out of the relations between settlers and Native

Americans. This was the calumet, or peace pipe, which was made from a reed decorated with eagles' quills or women's hair. About two and a half feet long, with a bowl made of catlinite or red pipestone, it was smoked on ceremonial occasions, especially during the making of treaties of peace. Benjamin West's William Penn's Treaty with the Indians (1772) depicts Penn, the founder of the colony of Pennsylvania, concluding a treaty with the Lenape shortly after his arrival in 1682. The Quakers, in their sober black costume, contrast with the seminaked forms of the Native Americans, some wearing feather head-dresses and decorated robes. Prominent in the composition is the sheaf of arrows thrown down on the ground in the center foreground as the Lenape examine a roll of cloth offered to them by Penn. The Native American in a central position is holding his peace pipe. West, writing about the painting, explained his motivation:

The great object I had in forming that composition was to express savages brought into harmony and peace by justice and benevolence, by not withholding from them what was their right [sic], and giving what they were in want of, as well as a wish to give by that art a conquest made over native people without sword [sic] or dagger [sic]. (Von Erffa and Staley, p. 207)

In another painting contrasting the two cultures, West painted a seated English officer wearing a red coat and holding an upright musket but also wearing Indian moccasins and an Indian cloak. The Native American standing behind him holds a peace pipe in a position parallel to the musket as he points to a Native American encampment by a waterfall. The identity of the sitters, as well as the date of the painting, is disputed, but again West depicts a certain accommodation arrived at between these men of two cultures. However, as the Native American gestures toward the peaceful scene and the pipe to indicate his intentions, the Englishman firmly grasps the musket.

American painters also looked to the Bible for their symbols of peace. Edward Hicks's Peaceable Kingdom (1835–1838), of which there are many versions (one in the Brooklyn Museum in New York), illustrates Isaiah's prophecy of a peaceful world: "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them" (Isaiah 11:6). Hicks evoked the new Eden to be found in the natural abundance of the United States, if only the example of the innocent child and belief in the Gospels would prevail.

J. M. W. Turner's Peace—Burial at Sea (1842) in the Tate Gallery in London, a memorial painting to his friend the artist David Wilkie, suggested another meaning of peace. Wilkie died on board the ship Oriental as he was returning from the Middle East and was buried at sea off the coast of Gibraltar. The funeral aspect of the event is echoed in the black sails of the ship and the black bird in the foreground. Wilkie had achieved final peace.

See also Abundance; Virtue/Virtues

Selected Works of Art

Emblems

Alciati, Andrea, Peace, emblem, woodcut, 1546

- Alciati, Andrea, Prudentes vino abstinent, emblem, woodcut, 1546
 Borghesi, Antonio, Idem et alter, impresa, woodcut, sixteenth century
 Giovio, Paolo, impresa, woodcut, 1550
 Marliano, Luigi, Plus ultra, impresa, woodcut, sixteenth century
 Ripa, Cesare, Peace, emblem, from Iconologia, 1603

Paintings and Drawings

- Eyck, Hubert van, Annunciation, circa 1425, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Masaccio, Trinity, 1427, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria Novella
 Botticelli, Minerva Pacifica, drawing, 1480s, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery, Gabinetto dei Disegni
 Vasari, Giorgio, Peace, fresco, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
 Vasari, Giorgio, Peace Bearing an Olive Branch, drawing, 1545, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina (Inv. 462)
 Vasari, Giorgio, Portrait of Alessandro de' Medici, panel, 1534, Florence, Italy, Museo Mediceo
 Vaga, Perino del, Peace, drawing, first half of sixteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina
 Guercino, Peace, fresco, 1627, Modena, Italy, private collection
 West, Benjamin, Sir William Johnson, oil on canvas, 1767–1770, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 West, Benjamin, William Penn's Treaty with the Indians, oil on canvas, 1772, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts
 Hicks, Edward, Peaceable Kingdom, oil painting, 1835–1838, New York, Brooklyn Museum
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Peace Leading Abundance, before 1842, Paris, Louvre
 Turner, J. M. W., Peace—Burial at Sea, oil on canvas, 1842, London, Tate Gallery

Sculpture

- Sansovino, Jacopo, Peace, sculpture, 1540s, Venice, Italy, Loggetta

Graphic Arts

- Picasso, Pablo, Dove, lithograph, 1949, Paris
 Picasso, Pablo, Peace Dove, poster, 1949
 Picasso, Pablo, Dove in Flight IV, poster, 1950

Metalwork

- Laurana, Francesco, Minerva Pacifica, medal, 1465, Florence, Italy, Bargello

Tapestry

- Minerva Pacifica*, tapestry, 1491, Favelles, France, Collection Vicomte de Baudreuil

Further Reading

- Alciati, Andrea, Emblematum libellus cum commentariis, Paris: 1531
 Berger, John, The Success and Failure of Picasso, New York: Pantheon, 1980
 Biedermann, Hans, Dictionary of Symbols, translated by James Hulbert, New York and London: Thames and Hudson, 1994

- Campbell, J. Malcolm, “Il Ritratto del Duca Alessandro de' Medici,” in Giorgio Vasari: Tra decorazione ambientale e storiografia artistica, Florence, Italy: Leo S. Olschki, 1981
 Caro, Annibale, Lettere Familiari, Florence, Italy: Leo S. Olschki, 1957
 Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, Venice, Italy: 1557
 Cheney, Liana De Girolami, “Giorgio Vasari's Chamber of Abraham: A Religious Ceiling in the Aretine House,” Sixteenth Century Journal (Fall 1987)
 Colonna, Francesco, Hypnertomachia Poliphili, Venice, Italy: 1499
 Corti, Laura, et al., Principi, letterati e artisti nelle carte di Giorgio Vasari, Florence, Italy: Edam, 1982
 Cox-Rearick, Janet, Dynasty and Destiny in Medici Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
 Del Vita, Alessandro, Lo Zibaldone di Giorgio Vasari, Rome: 1938
 Forster, Kurt W., “Metaphors of Rule: Political Ideology and History in the Portraits of Cosimo I de' Medici,” Mitteilungen des Kunsthistorischen Institutes in Florenz 15 (1971)
 Hawthorne, Gerald F., “Peace,” in The Oxford Companion to the Bible, edited by Bruce M. Metzger and Michael D. Coogan, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993
 Horapollon, Hieroglyphica, 1505
 Katzenellenbogen, Adolf, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices, London: Warburg Institute, 1939; New York: Harper, 1962
 Langedijk, Karla, De Portretten van de Medici tot omstreeks 1600, Amsterdam: Van Corcum, 1968
 Larkin, Oliver, Art and Life in America, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1960
 Mâle, Émile, L'art religieux de la fin du Moyen Âge en France, Paris, 1949
 Monbeig-Goguel, C., “Giorgio Vasari et son temps,” Revue de l'art XIV (1971)
 O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of the Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988
 Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, 1603, 1611
 Robertson, Clare, “Annibale Caro as Iconographer: Sources and Method,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 45 (1982)
 Russell, Daniel, “Emblems and Hieroglyphics: Some Observations on the Beginnings and the Nature of Emblematic Forms,” Emblematica II (1986)
 Scorza, R. A., “Vincenzo Bordini and Invenzione: The Florentine Apparato of 1565,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 44 (1981)
 Sebastian, Santiago, Alciato Emblemas, Madrid, Spain: Akal/Arte y Estetica, 1993
 Trexler, R. C., “Two Captains and Three Kings,” Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History 4 (1981)
 Valeriano, Piero, Hieroglyphica sive De sacris Aegyptiorum, Lyon, France: 1521
 Von Erffa, Helmut, and Allen Staley, The Paintings of Benjamin West, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1986
 Wittkower, Rudolf, Allegory and the Migration of Symbols, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1977

PEASANTRY

Margaret A. Sullivan

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Peasantry:

ANCIENT

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Jean-François Millet, The Sower, circa 1850, oil on canvas, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Gift of Quincy Adams Shaw through Quincy A. Shaw Jr. and Mrs. Marian Shaw Haughton. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

The peasantry, as represented in art, has traditionally served the interests of classes other than their own. The attitudes and anxieties of the prosperous and powerful determine how they are depicted, and the peasants' own response to the harsh, often inhuman realities of their lives is rarely in evidence. Industrious and peaceful, they swing their sickles in reliefs on the walls of Egyptian tombs, as in the Eighteenth Dynasty (1570–circa 1342 B.C.) mortuary chapel of Nakht in Thebes, Egypt; decorate the August page of Queen Mary's Psalter in the fifteenth century; and cut golden grain in Vincent van Gogh's Reaper (1889, after Jean-François Millet). However, the harvest song "The Peasant Speaks," sung by Sicilian peasants and recorded in 1876, tells a different story. To the rhythmic swing of their sickles the peasants sang a vicious litany that called for all landlords to be burned, lightning to strike all priests, "punches and kicks" to rain on the artisans, and hanging for all policemen. This violent and vindictive song, hostile toward all classes, is consistent with the long and bloody history of peasant rebellions from the great Peasant War of 1525 to the uprising of the Mexican peasants in the twentieth century.

Expressed in a visual medium, the viewpoint of real peasants who perform such backbreaking labor might bear little resemblance to the ways in which the peasantry are traditionally represented. The "Potemkinization" of Russian peasants in a Stalinist movie such as Traktoristy (Tractor-Drivers) is at odds with the actual response of the peasants to the collectivization of Soviet agriculture in the 1930s. The fictionalized and idealized representation of the Irish peasant in the work of William Butler Yeats and John M. Synge justifies the title of Deborah Fleming's study, A Man Who Does Not Exist (1995).

The more privileged in a society create, and consume, art in which peasants are the subject. Occupation distances artists even when their roots are in peasant culture. Jean-François Millet, a leading painter of the peasantry in the nineteenth century, was born into a peasant family in the Normandy region of France, but he was influenced by art and literature—the Bible, Virgil, the High Renaissance, and memories of "old Bruegel"—when he produced paintings such as The Gleaners (1857), The Grafter (1855), and The Angelus (1857–1859). Millet read Latin, drew casts after antique sculpture as part of his training, cultivated his contacts with other artists and professionals, and was responsive to the demands of the market, all of which helped him to promote the myth of "peasant Millet."

Art with the peasantry as the subject has traditionally been purchased by the aristocracy and the upper and middle classes, city dwellers more often than country people, those who govern or earn their living in the trades or professions. Millet's cycle The Four Seasons (circa 1866–1873), for instance, was painted for a wealthy industrialist who was one of Millet's chief patrons.

During those fortunate times when peasants had energy and resources over and above the minimum required for survival, they tended to focus their artistic efforts on the decoration of their homes, tools, and utensils, and on the elaboration of costumes to be worn on special holiday celebrations. On those rare occasions when peasants depicted themselves, as in the stylized and colorful Rainbow over a Miao Village (circa 1980s), a painting by Ou Dehua (Miao), a member of China's Jinshan Peasant Painting Society, a power relationship still dominates the representation. The painting was created at the instigation of others, in a government program, under government supervision, and in terms of governmental goals. The 30-year-old effort to develop peasant art was considered successful when traditional skills such as embroidery and paper cutting were incorporated into art acceptable to other classes. "Hands, more accustomed to the pick and the hoe and to needle and thread, were at a loss with the brush and the palette," according to the publication of the China Social, Culture Editing and Publishing Committee, "but after a short period of practice and patient coaching, real peasant painting flourished" (p. 14).

Defining the Peasantry

The term peasantry, as used here, refers to representations of nameless and obscure persons who occupy a subordinate place in the social hierarchy and earn their livelihood by working the land. It encompasses the figural (anonymous human beings), situational (rural rather than urban settings), occupational (agriculture rather than trade or manufacturing), and hierarchical (whether implicit or explicit, the subordinate place of the peasantry in society is a significant factor in the way they are represented). The urban proletariat are excluded, although the distinction between the two groups can be ambiguous, as in some seventeenth-century Flemish tavern scenes. Adriaen van Ostade's painting of 1652 is known as Villagers Merrymaking at an Inn, although a near-contemporary described it as "peasant-like." In the twentieth century the rural peasant and the urban worker are often linked, as in Vera Mukhina's The Worker and the Collective Farm Girl (1937), a gigantic sculpture placed on top of the stepped art deco tower of the Soviet pavilion for the 1937 Paris World Exhibition.

The Working Peasant

Although manipulated to serve radically different ends from the most conservative to the most revolutionary, representations of the working peasant are remarkably stable in their imagery. Hand tools and work animals—the spade, scythe, hoe, sickle, and horse-drawn plow—rather than the tractor or mechanized reaper, identify the working peasant. The implements used by the peasant in van Gogh's drawing Reaper with Sickle (1885) are no different than those in Simon Bening's Book of Hours (August or September, circa 1540). Even in an era when agriculture is mechanized, the peasant continues to be shown in art using tools that require strength rather than intelligence.

Typically, working peasants are depicted in simple, utilitarian clothes usually of a neutral color—writer Théophile Gautier said of Millet's peasants that they were painted in the colors of the earth they tilled. They are usually in bare feet or wear crude shoes, a head covering for the women, and short, unkempt hair for the men. The everyday garb of the peasants in Millet's drawing Peasant Family (before 1875) differs little from that worn by the peasant woman going to market in Albrecht Dürer's drawing of Maximilian II for the Book of Hours (1514) or that worn by the peasants in N. M. Kochergin's poster The First of May (1920). Three central figures make up Kochergin's poster: a peasant woman, sickle in hand, wearing a kerchief, her head thrown proudly back as she marches with her two male compatriots, one carrying a scythe and the other a spade. The immobility of peasant fashion contrasts with the changing fashions of the more privileged. When variety in peasant dress appears early in the nineteenth century, it is most evident in the clothes worn for leisure rather than work. In costume books such as A Pictorial History of Costume (W. Bruhn and M. Tilke), little diversity can be seen in peasant costumes before 1800. After that date there are numerous regional variations and elaborate holiday costumes that for the most part were handed down from generation to generation. As French historian Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie has demonstrated, far from being ancient and rooted in the peasant past, many peasant costumes recorded in nineteenth-century prints and paintings were of recent origin.

The physiognomy of the peasantry tends to reflect the view, common among their social superiors, that peasants are closer to animals than to other people. Although in periods when the peasant is viewed with sympathy, the bestial may be minimized so that body type and physiognomy more closely resemble depictions of the upper classes. Faces and figures are romanticized and idealized in Louis Léopold Robert's Arrival of the Harvesters in the Pontine Marshes (1830), in which the peasants look much like the heroes and heroines in history paintings. In the sixteenth century, on the other hand, the distance between classes was more emphasized. The grotesque old man and woman in the woodcut Rustic Couple (1526) by Christoph Amberger are exaggerated. In art the peasant represents a type rather than an individual, and their features are often generalized, as in Millet's The Winnower (circa 1847), or Diego Rivera's mural Mexican Peasant with Sombrero and Serape (1923) in the Court of Labor in Mexico City, Mexico. Even when the peasant is portrayed with more specificity, as in van Gogh's many peasant portraits such as his Head of a Peasant Woman in a Day Cap (1885), the title remains general and the peasant unnamed.

Until modern times, working peasants appeared most frequently in cycles of the months, seasons, or estates where their supporting role in a stratified society was made clear by the context, or their labors served to decorate objects intended for a well-to-do audience removed from actual peasant life. In Egyptian art the context is religious and funerary, with the activities of the peasants organized in registers, an orderly and traditional arrangement, one repeated in tomb after tomb, century after century, with little variation. Peasants harvest and thresh grain, milk cows, plow the fields, tend livestock, mill corn, and slaughter animals in reliefs in the mastabas of Ti in Saqqara, Egypt (Fifth Dynasty, 2225–2134 B.C.). In tomb effigies peasants continue to occupy a fixed and subordinate role in relation to other classes, supplying the needs of the deceased as they did in life.

In Greek art the working peasant has a decorative function in houses, palaces, and bathing establishments. In the relief Peasant Driving a Cow (first century B.C.), the peasant brings his cow to market, stooping under his load, a hare hanging from a pole over his shoulder, a basket of fruit in his right hand. Hellenistic sculpture, such as the Statue of an Old Peasant Woman (circa second century B.C.), was suited to the tastes of a sophisticated clientele for whom the peasant was slightly exotic. The old peasant woman wears a sleeveless belted chiton, a kerchief on her head, and carries to market a wicker basket filled with fruit, vegetables, and three chickens.

In medieval art, the context is religious, with the working peasant included in seasonal series, especially in cycles of occupations appropriate for the month. Peasants at their tasks appear in books and manuscripts for the wealthy, as in an eleventh-century manuscript, now in the British Museum in London, that includes peasants plowing and sowing in a calendar illustrated by an occupation for each month. The portals of many churches built during this period are decorated with carved calendars. At Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris, a reaper whets his scythe for the month of July, and for December, in preparation for the feasts of the Christmas season, the peasants kill pigs and slaughter beef. Placed below an appropriate sign of the zodiac, these small carved vignettes are emblems of the eternal peasants' bent to their never-ending tasks. Increased urbanization in the fourteenth century broadened the context in Italy to include the secular and political. Ambrogio Lorenzetti's fresco Good Government in the Countryside (circa 1338) in the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy, shows peasants plowing with oxen, flailing grain, taking a pig to market, and tending the vineyards.

The Peasant at Leisure

Representations of peasants resting or celebrating their holidays with dancing and feasting appear more sporadically; exhibit greater variation in settings, costumes, and activities; and in general have negative connotations. Snoring on their backs or dancing wildly, engaged in their pastimes and merry-making, corpulent and overfed, with grotesque features, their farm implements laid aside or wielded as weapons, peasants are a problematic image, arousing laughter, fear, and occasionally envy. Representations of the peasant at leisure reached the height of their popularity in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, then declined in importance in the modern era. The lazy peasant began to appear in the thirteenth century, a period of increased open revolts. An early example of the bad or lazy peasant occurs in an English bestiary (circa 1200), in which wolves are about to attack sheep left untended by a sleeping shepherd. The lazy peasant is contrasted with the hardworking peasant in the Somme le roi (1279), a treatise on sin and virtue that reflects the viewpoint of both the clergy and royalty (it was written by a Dominican for the king of France Philip III. Paresse (Laziness) is illustrated by a sleeping peasant who has abandoned his plow and horses, and contrasted with Labeur (Labor), represented by a man sowing corn. In the print The Good and the Bad Peasant (second half of the sixteenth century) by Maarten de Vos, a peasant in tattered clothes lies half-asleep on the ground, his decrepit dwelling and a gallows behind him, receiving what he “deserves”—a cudgel and whip from a winged, allegorical figure in the center—while the hardworking peasant, spade in hand, looks up from his work and is rewarded with a crown, scepter, and open book. In Maerten van Heemskerck’s prints of the Three Estates (circa 1560) the peasants are shown at their labors, and the text says they must plow, build, dig, reap, and “shun leisure and not tamper with the duties and functions of either king or clergy.” Class lines are clearly drawn.

Already a source of humor—as in the February page of the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry (before 1415) in which the peasants expose themselves in an unseemly way as they warm by the fire—by 1500 negative images of peasants are ubiquitous on playing cards, decorating tapestries, in the Shrovetide plays, and as book illustrations, sculptures, and prints. As the butt of coarse jokes, peasant was used as a synonym for fool, and peasants were derided for their stupidity, gluttony, boorish manners, blasphemy, lust, violent nature, and envy of their betters. The popularity of peasant satires was a response by the middle and upper classes to the strains of rapid urbanization, the rising peasant discontents that culminated in the great Peasant War of 1525, the upheavals of the Reformation, and increased familiarity with ancient literature. The nineteenth century favored the Virgilian tradition—idyllic peasant imagery in the tradition of Virgil’s Georgics (circa 35–29 B.C.)—but the Renaissance preferred the rusticus (rustic) of the satires, Horace’s stupid bumpkin waiting for the river to run out (Epistles, I. ii. 42), and associated the peasant with the woodland satyrs, the lusty, violent, and uncivilized goat-footed creatures of the ancient world.

Peasant satires were a mechanism for maintaining social boundaries without any direct influence on the peasantry: the peasants were the subject, not the audience. The emphasis on social stratification was reassuring, both to the nobility at a time when they felt their power being undermined, and to the new and upwardly mobile urban audience anxious to differentiate themselves from the lower classes. Wittenwiler, in his peasant satire Ring, advises the reader who wishes to become courtly and elegant to keep the peasants in mind, and whatever the peasants do in their boorish way, do exactly the opposite. Shown drinking and dancing, indulging their lust in public, duped by quack doctors, and fighting each other with sword and flail in Hans Sebald Beham’s Great Country Fair (1539), or dancing wildly with arms high and feet kicking in Dürer’s engraving Peasant Couple Dancing (1514), the behavior of the peasant was the opposite of that appropriate for an urbane gentleman or lady. Erhard Schöen’s woodcut Peasant Wedding Feast (circa 1527) is a typical example of these peasant satires, one that is divided between two of its most popular settings: the peasant dance and the peasant wedding banquet. On the left, inside the hut, the peasants are seated around the bride, eating and drinking, their gluttony indicated by one man defecating on the floor and the dog lapping the vomit of another guest. On the right, the peasants dance, one man raising his arm in a familiar, open-handed gesture while another man fondles his partner’s bottom. There is nothing subtle about the satire.

By the middle of the sixteenth century the status of the peasant at leisure is elevated artistically, if not morally. Peasants’ festivities become the focus in large, expensive panel paintings, such as Pieter Aertsen’s Peasant Company (1556), filled with visual references to emblem books, ancient proverbs, and other literature favored by educated, urban audiences. The jokes are wittier, with less obscenity, “the ugly” is painted beautifully, and the paintings compare with ancient art. Pieter Bruegel the Elder, who became renowned as a painter of peasants, continued to use many of the traditional settings, as in the print Fair on St. George’s Day (circa 1562) or his Peasant Dance (circa 1566) in Vienna, Austria. These works are innovative in their complexity and artistry, and like Aertsen he extends the range of peasant subject matter, crossing class boundaries in an unprecedented way. In his Peasant Wedding Banquet (circa 1566) a friar, a gentleman, and a scholar share the peasant feast; in his grisaille Visit to the Farm (known from copies) well-dressed people dispense charity to a peasant family. The lazy peasant is joined by an equally somnambulant scholar and soldier in the Land of Cockaigne (1567); his portraitlike Head of a Yawning Peasant (circa 1566) was related to the physiognomic and moralistic interests of his audience; the full range of peasant life—leisure as well as labor—is included in his seasonal paintings. In The Harvesters (circa 1565) some peasants reap grain and pick fruit while others eat their noonday meal, one peasant sleeping sprawled at the foot of a tree.

The inclusion of people from other classes in renderings of peasantry, an innovation during this period, has a curiously circumscribed history. Unless outsiders have a punitive role, they are rare in representations of the working peasant. Overseers watch the peasants in Egyptian reliefs, an armed and uniformed man monitors women and children gathering the last grains of wheat in Jules Breton’s The Gleaners (1854), and men with whips supervise peasants in ragged clothes in Rivera’s mural Harvesting Sugar Cane (circa 1930). There is little visual evidence to suggest that those who enjoy regarding peasants at work wish to share their labors, or even their space. In the illumination for the October page of the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, the classes are separate. Peasants plow and sow in the foreground, while the city dwellers in the middle distance take their ease on the other side of the River Seine, close to the wall of the Louvre palace. David Teniers the Younger and others continued to elaborate the interaction between the classes in the seventeenth century. In Teniers’s Kermess Before the Half Moon Inn (1641) burghers and peasants mix—one male peasant tries to pull a well-dressed female visitor to her feet to join the peasant dance—but such images are rare outside the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

In the seventeenth century the Flemish and Dutch bourgeoisie preferred images of peasant festivities rather than peasants at work. Scenes of plowing and sowing became almost nonexistent, although the peasant continued to arouse condescending laughter and serve as an object lesson. David Vinckeboons's Peasant Kermis (1629) follows the conventional schema for a multifigured painting of peasant festivities: an inn prominent in a foreground; clusters of revelers gathered to eat, drink, dance, and fight; a church in the background; and glut-tony emphasized by details such as the family of pigs in the distance. An engraving after the painting calls these peasants "minions of Bacchus" who indulge themselves while health and money ebb away. Both the ancient reference and the didactic message suggest that these images, like their predecessors, are meant to educate as well as amuse.

Conventional settings continued to be used as others were added, including indoor settings such as the tavern and the barn. Adriaen van Ostade's Villagers Merrymaking at an Inn (1652) and Adriaen Brouwer's Peasants Playing Cards in a Tavern (circa 1631) are typical, and such settings, unlike the peasant fair, underline the distance between the classes because these are places in which the urban, middle-class public would be reluctant to set foot. The theme of the peasant brawl is elaborated, with peasants fighting soldiers instead of the traditional peasant versus peasant melee, as in Vinckeboons's Boerenverdriet (before 1632, The Peasants' Grief) in which richly dressed soldiers and their camp followers harass the peasants. In the companion painting, Boerenvreugd (before 1635, The Peasants' Joy), the unwilling hosts send the soldiers flying.

In Italy during the latter part of the sixteenth century, the Bassani—Jacopo dal Ponte (known as "Bassano") and his sons—satisfied the demand of the upper classes for decorative works by painting sober peasants at work, frequently in seasonal series. The more caustic and colorful northern point of view was introduced early in the seventeenth century. Pieter van der Laer, known as "Il Bamboccio," went from Haarlem, The Netherlands, to Rome in 1625 and joined the Bentvueghels, an association of northern expatriate artists. With his small outdoor scenes of peasants intent on some game or on their work, his name became synonymous with paintings of shepherds, peasants, and other "low life." The humorous and grotesque art of the bambocciate appealed to wealthy patrons. "What they abhor seeing alive," Salvator Rosa wrote, referring to this audience, "they like to see painted" (Briganti, p. 14).

In France, during the same period, the paintings of the brothers Le Nain (Antoine, Louis, and Matheiu) foreshadowed a shift to the more positive view of the peasantry that prevailed in the nineteenth century. The resting peasant is not criticized in Louis Le Nain's La charrette (1641) in which a reserved peasant woman sits in front of a cart and holds her sleeping child while other children pose quietly, some with folded hands, creating a peaceful, classically balanced composition. The respite from work in the Le Nains' Le Repas des paysans (1642) is celebrated quietly, with simple food. Peasants drink wine, but there is no sign of excess. A young boy holds a violin rather than a bagpipe, which has traditional sexual connotations, and another man folds his hands in a prayerful gesture.

These peasants are not working, but they invite respect rather than laughter.

The paintings of the Le Nains were exhibited in Paris in 1850, attracting great interest, and many nineteenth-century works exhibit the same positive view of the peasantry. Each of the five panels in Frédéric Léon's The Stages of a Peasant's Life (1885–1887), is devoted to a different stage, from youth to old age, children to parents and grandparents, with the peasants placed frontally in somewhat awkward poses as though they had sat for a provincial group photograph. The series recalls the paintings of the Le Nains as well as the medieval and Renaissance cyclical conception of peasant life; the peasant again serves as an image of the eternal, never-ending cycles of human life.

The Cult of the Peasant

The rise of positive peasant imagery in the nineteenth century is coincident with the modernization of European life, and the "cult of the peasant" is, in many ways, a response to the dislocations caused by the Industrial Revolution and the rapidly changing conditions of city and country life. The consumers of art continued to be members of the middle and upper classes, purchasing art to decorate their homes, but their preference shifted from satires that denigrated the peasantry to art that idealized peasant life.

Happy peasants in picturesque costumes celebrate their holidays with grace and decorum in Robert's Return from the Pilgrimage to the Madonna dell'Arco Near Naples at Whitsuntide (1827). A madonnalike peasant woman rides a donkey, holds a garlanded child, and is surrounded by dancing peasants in William Bouguereau's Return from the Harvest (1878). No longer stigmatized as lazy, the peasant enjoys well-deserved rest in Léon Lhermitte's The Noonday Rest During the Harvest (1905) and Camille Pissarro's The Rest, Young Peasant Woman Lying on the Grass (1882). These were popular images, but the greatest enthusiasm was reserved for representations of the peasant at work, for scenes of a contented peasantry laboring in pleasant, expansive fields, accepting their lot and intent on their tasks.

The peasants carrying out their labors with quiet devotion embodied the conservative moral values championed by the bourgeoisie: work, family, religion, and patriotism. With raking light and in sunny fields, as in Ferdinand Georg Waldmüller's The Harvest (1846), these often nostalgic images offered stability in a period of instability, reassurance in a period of rapid change. In Giovanni Segantini's Ploughing in the Engadine (1888) and Rosa Bonheur's Ploughing Scene (1854), horse, peasant, and landscape are a seamless whole, a harmonious, interconnected, and eternal universe. For Millet, the peasant at his labors was a symbol of humankind's endless struggle with existence. Millet's The Sower (circa 1850), portrays a solitary figure silhouetted against the sky who scatters seed with a gesture unchanged since it was depicted on the walls of Egyptian tombs.

Gustave Courbet, more politically motivated, preferred peasant mediocrity over urban change and innovation, and in paintings such as Peasants of Flagey Returning from the Fair and Burial at Ornans (both 1850) the peasantry are cast in the role of guardians of traditional values. Van Gogh shared with Millet a conservative, somewhat nostalgic preference for the traditional countryside: "To feel what has always been and what always will be," wrote van Gogh about being with peasants in the countryside (van Tilborgh, p. 18). In van Gogh's copies after the paintings of Millet, such as Men Digging (1889) or The Sower (1888), the colors are brighter, but the peasants remain monumental in their gravity, evoking religious prayer rather than political action. Even Pissarro, an avowed anarchist, did not call for rebellion in his paintings of the peasantry. The hardships of peasant life are excluded from Apple Picking at Eragny (1888). The painting is an optimistic expression of Pissarro's hope for an agro-industrial state in which everyone would joyfully share in the labors of agriculture.

A call for radical action is not characteristic of the period, but toward the end of the nineteenth century, there are signs of change. The conventional attributes remain, the plain clothes and hand tools, but their function is different and they serve different ends. In Félicien Rops's etching Le Semeur des Paraboles (before 1898), an emaciated farmer sows seeds on rocky, unpromising soil, laboring with little promise of reward. In Léon Lhermitte's The Harvester's Wages (1882), the farm is prosperous, but the laborer, his fatigue evident as he slumps on a bale of hay in the barnyard, receives a pittance from the proprietor. The title of Angelo Morbelli's painting of five peasant women bent double as they plant the field, For Eighty Centimes (1895), calls attention to a similar inequity. Théophile-Alexandre Steinlen, in two lithographic covers made for the journal Chamade (1894), is even more explicit. In one lithograph a peasant family—a father and a mother holding a baby in her arms—are yoked like animals to a plow, and their agonizing struggle to pull the plow is overseen by a fat, complacent, cigar-smoking man. In the second print the father, who has broken out of the yoke, grimly pounds the fat proprietor into the ground.

Even though it was a period when agricultural problems were far from being solved—peasants made up more than half of the French population yet had benefited least from the growing prosperity at mid-century—nothing indicates these problems in Jules Bastien-Lepage's etching Mower Sharpening His Scythe (1878). He endows the peasant with nobility: the laborer and the expansive landscape are in harmony and the subject is dignified and suitable for an audience that wished to believe in the stability of the social system. Käthe Kollwitz, in one of seven etchings in her series Peasant's War (1905), takes the same subject and turns it upside down. In a shadowy, unspecified space a peasant woman hones her huge scythe, her face almost hidden, one eye glaring malevolently over its sharpened edge. The activity of honing the scythe, peaceful and reassuring in Bastien-Lepage's etching, becomes a symbol of intolerable discontent in Kollwitz's print, an image of hatred about to explode into violence. The scythe is destined to cut down human oppressors, not stalks of wheat, and the print recalls the violent song of the Sicilian peasants rather than the images of van Gogh or Millet.

In the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, peasant festivities continued to satisfy the taste for the romanticized and unreal. Paul Gauguin treated the peasants of Brittany as an exotic, primitive people in his painting The Vision After the Sermon (1888), and Marc Chagall creates a poetic dream in The Peasant's Life (1925). Representations of the peasant at rest, as in Ernst Barlach's sculpture Two Sleeping Peasants (1912), or enjoying a meal, as in Arkadi Plastov's painting Collective Farm Festival (1937) in which the portrait of Stalin presides over a decorous and abundant peasant feast, continued to have the same positive connotations they had in the nineteenth century. It is the image of the working peasant that underwent the greatest change. When the working peasant—with his scythe, sickle, or spade—is adopted by the revolutionary movements in Russia, Mexico, and China, this once reassuring symbol of a stable society, well-loved by the upper classes, becomes a unifying symbol for those who oppose them.

See also Harvesting; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Shepherds/Shepherdesses

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Mastabas of Ti, Fifth Dynasty, Old Kingdom, Saqqara, Egypt
Mortuary chapel of Nakht, Eighteenth Dynasty, Thebes, Egypt

Peasant Driving a Cow, Greek relief, first century B.C., Munich, Germany, Glyptothek

Statue of an Old Peasant Woman, Hellenistic sculpture, circa second century B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Medieval

Occupation of the Months, medieval manuscript, eleventh century, London, British Museum (MS. Cottonianus Julius A.VI, no. 33)

Sleeping Peasant, illumination, circa 1200, Aberdeen, Scotland, Aberdeen University Library (MS 24, fol. 16v.)

Paresse, Labeur, manuscript illuminations, from Somme le roi, 1279, London, British Library (Add. 54180, Fol. 121v.)

Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Good Government in the Countryside, fresco, circa 1338, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico

Renaissance

Queen Mary's Psalter, August page, first half of 1400s, London, British Museum (MS. 2B VII, Fol. 78r.)

Limbouurg Brothers, Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

Dürer, Albrecht, Maximilian II, for Book of Hours, drawing, 1514 (Fol. 51v)

Dürer, Albrecht, Peasant Couple Dancing, engraving, 1514

Amberger, Christoph, Rustic Couple, woodcut, 1526

Schöen, Erhard, Peasant Wedding Feast, woodcut, circa 1527

Beham, Hans Sebald, Great Country Fair, woodcut, 1539

- Bening, Simon, Book of Hours, August and September, circa 1540, London, Victoria and Albert Museum (Satling MS. 2600)
- Aertsen, Pieter, Peasant Feast, painting, 1550, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Aertsen, Pieter, Peasant Company, painting, 1556, Antwerp, Belgium, Museum Mayer van den Berg
- Heemskerck, Maerten van, Three Estates, engraving, circa 1560, Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Fair on St. George's Day, engraving, circa 1562
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Harvesters, painting, circa 1565, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Dance, painting, circa 1566, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Wedding Banquet, painting, circa 1566, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Head of a Yawning Peasant, painting, circa 1566, Brussels, Belgium, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Land of Cockaigne, painting, 1567, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Vos, Maarten de, The Good and the Bad Peasant, engraving, second half of sixteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal
- Bassano, Jacopo, The Seasons, before 1592, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Seventeenth Century

- Vinckeboons, David, Peasant Kermis, painting, 1629, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis
- Brouwer, Adriaen, Peasants Playing Cards in a Tavern, painting, circa 1631, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Vinckeboons, David, The Peasants' Grief (Boerenverdriet), painting, before 1632, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Vinckeboons, David, The Peasants' Joy (Boerenvreugd), painting, before 1632, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Ostade, Adriaen van, Peasants Making Merry in a Tavern, painting, circa 1635, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Teniers, David, the Younger, Kermess Before the Half Moon Inn, painting, 1641, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Le Nain, Louis, La charrette, painting, 1641, Paris, Louvre
- Le Nain, Louis, Le Repas des paysans, painting, 1642, Paris, Louvre
- Ostade, Adriaen van, Villagers Merrymaking at an Inn, painting, 1652, Toledo, Spain, Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Robert, Louis Léopold, Return from the Pilgrimage to the Madonna dell'Arco Near Naples at Whitsuntide, painting, 1827, Paris, Louvre
- Robert, Louis Léopold, Arrival of the Harvesters in the Pontine Marshes, painting, 1830, Paris, Louvre
- Waldmüller, Ferdinand Georg, The Harvest, painting, 1846, private collection

- Millet, Jean-François, The Winnower, painting, circa 1847, London, National Gallery
- Millet, Jean-François, The Sower, painting, circa 1850, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Courbet, Gustave, Burial at Ornans, painting, 1850, Paris, Louvre
- Courbet, Gustave, Peasants of Flagey Returning from the Fair, painting, 1850, Besançon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Bonheur, Rosa, Ploughing Scene, painting, 1854, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
- Breton, Jules, The Gleaners, painting, 1854, Dublin, Ireland, National Gallery of Ireland
- Millet, Jean-François, The Gifter, painting, 1855, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsgemaldegammlungen, Neue Pinakothek
- Millet, Jean-François, The Gleaners, painting, 1857, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
- Millet, Jean-François, The Angelus, painting, 1857–1859, Paris, Louvre
- Millet, Jean-François, The Four Seasons, paintings, circa 1866–1873
- Millet, Jean-François, Peasant Family, drawing, before 1875, Cardiff, National Museum of Wales
- Bouguereau, William, Return from the Harvest, painting, 1878, Paris, Louvre
- Bastien-Lepage, Jules, Mower Sharpening His Scythe, etching, 1878, Chicago, Art Institute
- Pissarro, Camille, The Rest, Young Peasant Woman Lying on the Grass, painting, 1882, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle
- Lhermitte, Léon, The Harvester's Wages, painting, 1882, Aisne, France, Hôtel de Ville, Musée de Chateau-Thierry
- Gogh, Vincent van, Head of a Peasant Woman in a Day Cap, 1885, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Gogh, Vincent van, Reaper with Sickles, drawing, 1885, Otterlo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller
- Léon, Frédéric, The Stages of a Peasant's Life, paintings, 1885–1887, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts
- Segantini, Giovanni, Ploughing in the Engadine, painting, 1887–1890, Munich, Germany, Neue Pinakothek
- Gauguin, Paul, The Vision After the Sermon, painting, 1888, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
- Pissarro, Camille, Apple Picking at Eragny, painting, 1888, Dallas, Texas, Museum of Fine Arts
- Gogh, Vincent van, The Sower, painting, 1888, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Vincent van Gogh
- Gogh, Vincent van, Men Digging, painting, 1889, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Stedelijk Museum
- Gogh, Vincent van, Reaper, 1889, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Vincent van Gogh
- Steinlen, Théophile-Alexandre, two lithograph covers for Chamade, 1894
- Morbelli, Angelo, For Eighty Centimes, painting, 1895, Vercelli, Italy, Civico Museo Antonio Borgogno
- Rops, Félicien, Le Semeur des Paraboles, etching, before 1898, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Twentieth Century

- Lhermitte, Léon, The Noonday Rest During the Harvest, painting, 1905, Toledo, Spain, Museum of Art
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Peasant Woman with Scythe, etching, from Peasant's War, 1905
- Barlach, Ernst, Two Sleeping Peasants, sculpture, 1912, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Servaes, Albert, Peasant Life: Death, oil on canvas, 1920, Antwerp, Belgium, Museum of Fine Arts
- Kochergin, N. M., The First of May, poster, 1920
- Rivera, Diego, Mexican Peasant with Sombrero and Serape, mural, 1923, Mexico City, Mexico, Court of Labor
- Chagall, Marc, The Peasant's Life, painting, 1925, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Art Gallery
- Miró, Joan, Head of a Catalan Peasant, oil on canvas, 1925, England, private collection
- Permeke, Constantine, Peasant Family with Cat, 1928, Bruges, Belgium, Heritage of West Flanders
- Rivera, Diego, Harvesting Sugar Cane, mural, circa 1930, Cuernavaca, Mexico, Palace of Corte
- Plastov, Arkadi, Collective Farm Festival, painting, 1937
- Mukhina, Vera, The Worker and the Collective Farm Girl, sculpture, Soviet Pavilion, 1937, Paris, World Exhibition
- Ou Dehua (Miao), Rainbow over a Miao Village, painting, circa 1980s

Further Reading

- Alexander, Jonathon, "Labeur et Paresse: Ideological Representations of Medieval Peasant Labor," Art Bulletin LXXII:3 (September 1990)
- The Best in Modern Chinese Folk Painting*, edited by China Social, Culture Editing and Publishing Committee, Beijing, China: Foreign Languages Press, 1990
- Brettell, Richard R., and Caroline Brettell, Painters and Peasants in the Nineteenth Century, New York: Rizzoli, 1983; London: Phaidon, 1983
- Briganti, Giuliano, The Bamboccianti: The Painters of Everyday Life in Seventeenth Century Rome, Rome: Ugo Bozzi, 1983
- Fitzpatrick, Sheila, Stalin's Peasants: Resistance and Survival in the Russian Village After Collectivization, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994
- Fleming, Deborah, A Man Who Does Not Exist: The Irish Peasant in the Work of W. B. Yeats and J. M. Synge, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995
- Herbert, Robert L., "City vs. Country: The Rural Image in French Painting from Millet to Gauguin," Art Forum (February 1970)
- Klinge, Margaret, David Teniers the Younger: Paintings and Drawings, Antwerp, Belgium: Snoeck-Ducaju and Zoon, 1991
- Minister for Culture, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen, Dresden, Germany, Der Bauer und seine Befreiung, Dresden, Germany: Staatliche Kunstsammlungen, 1976
- Minneapolis Institute of Art, Millet's "Gleaner", Minneapolis, Minnesota: Minneapolis Institute of Art, 1970
- Moxey, Keith, Peasants, Warriors and Wives: Popular Imagery in the Reformation, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1989
- Raupp, Hans-Joachim, Bauernsatiren, Niederzier, Germany: Lukassen, 1986
- Scheider, Jane, and Peter Scheider, "The Peasant Speaks: Sicilian Harvest Song," Journal of Peasant Studies 1:3 (April 1974)
- Sullivan, Margaret, Bruegel's Peasants: Art and Audience in the Northern Renaissance, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Sutton, Peter, Masters of Seventeenth-Century Dutch Genre Painting, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1984
- Thompson, James, The Peasant in French Nineteenth-Century Art, Dublin, Ireland: Douglas Hyde Gallery and Trinity College, 1980
- Tilborgh, Louis van, editor, Van Gogh and Millet, Zwolle, The Netherlands: Waanders, 1989
- Webster, James Carson, The Labors of the Months in Antique and Medieval Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1938

PENITENCE/REPENTANCE

Christine M. Boeckl

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Penitence/Repentance:

ALLEGORIES OF PENITENCE

RELIGIOUS PENITENTS

MARY MAGDALEN

PRODIGAL SON

ST. JEROME

ST. CHARLES BORROMEO

ST. PETER

OTHER SAINTS

SACRAMENT OF PENANCE

SECULAR PENITENTS

Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, The Prodigal Son, circa 1879, canvas, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Chester Dale Collection. (Courtesy of the Board of Trustees, National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.)

In Judeo-Christian theology, penitence is closely related to the concept of sin. Repentance insinuates that the offender regrets the transgressions against divine laws and wants to redeem himself or herself spiritually or with good deeds. In Western religious art, the most important penitent of the New Testament is St. Peter, who was contrite for having forsaken Jesus Christ. Even more frequently depicted is St. Jerome, who withdrew from the world, trading his bishop's seat and his scholarly study for a life in the wilderness to repent. Images of Mary Magdalen, the harlot whom Jesus found worthy to redeem and who would spend the rest of her life in solitude to atone for her sins, are especially prevalent during the Counter-Reformation. Hendrick Goltzius's engraving Mary Magdalen Crying over Her Sins, which shows the penitent saint sparsely dressed as a half-length figure in a rocky landscape, is dated 1582. The saint is surrounded by her attributes: the skull, a book, and the jar with which she had anointed Christ's feet. Magdalen is pictured once more in the background, kneeling under the cross.

Other familiar contrite figures from the New Testament are the Good Thief (good malefactor) and the Prodigal Son. The former is mostly seen in three-cross Crucifixion scenes, yet the latter's story repeatedly appears in secular settings. The Old Testament subject of King David's Remorse also represents repentance. The king had disregarded Jehovah's commandments and brought death to his people; for his sin David did penance (this event is more thoroughly discussed in the essay Plague/Pestilence). A rueful Adam and Ahadab represent themes from the old law as well, but they are rarely seen in the visual arts. Penance (confession) is one of the sacraments of the Eastern, Roman, and some Anglican churches that are briefly discussed in this essay. Although allegorical figures representing penitence are uncommon, the concept is centuries old. Of course, outside the religious realm, repentance also can indicate grief for actions taken or compunction for omissions and resolve to amend one's life. The most charming contrite figure in Greco-Roman mythology is Psyche, the bride of the god of love, Cupid. Her story is told by the Latin writer Apuleius and illustrated by Raphael and his followers in numerous palaces from Italy to England.

As already noted, allegories illustrating repentance are rare. One of the first, if not the first, such figures appears in Botticelli's Calumny of Apelles. The subject is based on an Albertian concept: Calumny drags her victim before Midas, the unjust judge. Penitence wears a tattered Dominican habit. Equally rare in monumental art is the demurely veiled penitent figure depicted in an allegory for the Sala della Pazienza in the residence of Duke Ercole II in Ferrara, Italy. Girolamo da Carpi's Chance and Penitence belongs to a large, impressive cycle of Justice, Peace, and Patience. Together the series represents the virtues of a Christian ruler.

In the seventeenth century, Cesare Ripa, in Iconologia, represents Penitenza (Penance) as a woman holding a fish, which indicates that fasts are an appropriate way to do penance. In his rococo edition, Poenitentia resembles depictions of Mary Magdalen chastising herself with a whip, and in a vignette farther toward the back of the book, John the Baptist preaches repentance in the wilderness. Philip Galle's Allegory of Penitence also depicts a figure holding a rod in one hand and a water vessel in the other, which alludes to the words that penitence "not only beats but also purifies." Contritione (Contrition) is not illustrated in Ripa but is described as a crying woman with her eyes turned toward heaven to seek God's forgiveness, a pose frequently chosen to represent lamenting penitents.

The largest group of religious repentant sinners is made up of male and female saints. Most commonly, a repenter is characterized as a figure clutching his or her chest with the left hand (the heart, according to St. Augustine the seat of sin, was thought to be located on the left). St. Jerome's image, most favored in Italy during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, was closely related to contemporary literature on penitence. He spent three years as a hermit battling impure thoughts and sexual temptations to atone for his sins by self-chastisement. Leonardo da Vinci's unfinished painting St. Jerome in the Wilderness is probably the most haunting treatment of this subject. The saint appears in a beautiful rocky landscape; no unnecessary accoutrements clutter the painting, the lion in the foreground being his only companion. The saint's body language expresses remorse. Crouched low to the ground, kneeling on one foot, St. Jerome fills the whole panel. His left hand covers his chest in the customary gesture. His eyes seem to ask forgiveness, and he presents himself to God through a sweeping gesture with his right arm. Palma Giovane shows the kneeling saint pointing toward Christ, symbol of salvation, while he reads the Bible—indicating St. Jerome as the author of the Vulgate. Lucas Cranach's early painting St. Jerome as a Hermit shows strong emotions and the urgency of his self-punishment. The saint holds the stone in his rigid right hand while the left pulls his beard in despair. The religious fervor is echoed in the dense woods of the Danube School landscape. On the right, toward the back, an expressive Crucifixion scene becomes visible. The saint does not kneel exactly in front of Christ's image, as seen frequently in other works, such as Jerome Contemplating the Cross by Cima da Conegliano, Tintoretto, and others. A variation of the topic appears in Guido Reni's St. Jerome and the Angel, in which a messenger from God visits the hermit in the wilderness. The saint's leathery skin contrasts sharply with the smooth complexion of the angel.

Although St. Jerome is the most important ascetic saint pictured in seclusion, he frequently is replaced by other contrite hermits conveying similar didactic messages: St. John Chrysostomos (Albrecht Dürer, Penance of St. Chrysostomos), Onuphrius (Palma Giovane, St. Onuphrius), and others. The life of St. Francis inspired many penitent orders. Seventeenth-century Dutch artist Gerrit Dou conceived his Hermit less spiritually and more like a genre painting. The religious zest of the previous centuries seems lost, yet the visual tradition is still strong: The lonely figure is surrounded by vanitas (vanity) symbols, such as a skull and a lantern.

The subject of a repentant St. Peter involves most commonly a half-length view of the apostle. Spanish artists are especially fond of showing St. Peter's contrite heart. They emphasize his tear-filled eyes turned toward heaven and his sensitive hand that rests on the saint's chest, trying to ease his pain of guilt for betraying Jesus Christ. This expressive tradition was started by El Greco and continued until Francisco de Goya in the late eighteenth century. Georges de La Tour's The Penitent Peter handles the night scene with the highlight and shadow of a Caravaggio. The bearded saint stares wide-eyed in despair at the cock, referring to Christ's prediction of his betrayal.

The main female character representing penance was undeniably Mary Magdalen; her conversion was already mentioned in the Bible and elaborated further by Pseudo Bonaventura as well as in the Legenda aurea. Over the centuries, the image of Mary Magdalen changes, with different traits emphasized according to local customs and beliefs. The saint's narrative iconography was first consolidated circa 1285 by the Magdalen Master. The large panel is dominated by the central figure in a long, hairy chemise. Magdalen's life is told in several smaller scenes: anointing Christ's feet, doing penance, under the Cross, after the Resurrection, and others. In contrast to this early ascetic version, in most later perceptions of the saint, Magdalen's beauty is part of her iconography. She is often found meditating, standing, kneeling, or humbly seated on the ground.

Although the former sinner was renowned for her devotion, it was probably the alluring submission of the female that inspired so many different versions of the Magdalen, all painted by male artists (for male patrons?). Titian, working for the Spanish court, created several versions of the most sensuous nude saint expressing her undying love for God. The canvas, documented to be shipped to Philip II in 1562, was placed in the sacristy of Spain's El Escorial (destroyed by a fire in 1841). This type shows Magdalen turning her teary eyes toward heaven while covering her nakedness with her beautiful tresses. La Tour's version emphasizes the long nights spent in prayer; the saint ponders her life as she gazes into the candle, holding the whip and skull on her lap. One of the most dramatic narratives is by Charles Le Brun. His Repentant Mary Magdalen Renounces All the Vanities of the World shows Magdalen's inner turmoil before she goes into the wilderness. The beautifully dressed and coiffed saint, with her treasures at her feet, gestures emotionally. She is saying farewell to her accustomed life and will henceforth turn to God. Nineteenth-century artist Jean Béraud, in Mary Magdalen in the House of the Pharisee, presented the saint in the dress code of the 1890s. Although Christ is depicted in the traditional classical garb, the sinner prostrate at his feet is dressed by a Parisian couturier. The rest of the dinner guests wear black tie and include a number of recognizable notables of the day. The artist's intention was to depict contemporary social mores, for which he was praised as well as criticized in the Salon. It has recently been proposed that Paul Cézanne, in his early work The Harrowing of Hell and Mary Magdalen, intended to link the two themes visually as well as thematically, drawing on the Provençal tradition of Pasqual plays. (The iconography of Mary of Egypt, a sixth-century saint whose biography also was included in the Legenda aurea, often is indistinguishable from that of the penitent Magdalen in the wilderness.)

Although painting is by far the most appropriate medium to describe the emotional state of redress, a few sculptors attempted this theme with various degrees of success. Donatello's wood carving Mary Magdalen represents the repentant saint in what is probably the most expressive depiction of her ascetic lifestyle. Her beauty gone, she has conquered vanity. Dressed only in her hairy shirt, she is the female hermit who becomes a counterpart to John the Baptist. A Baroque sculpture by Jérôme Duquesnoy was designed to engage our emotions. His Repentant Mary Magdalen in a Cave, which presents the saint in the state of an "elegant dishabille," is situated in the secluded, natural setting of a park in Brussels, Belgium. The viewer is invited to enter her world and follow the saint's example.

Generally, single penitent figures are the rule, yet at times a number of sinners were grouped together to address the complete issue of remorse. Abraham Bloemaert's Series of the Penitents includes, with the more familiar biblical types, some rare examples of sinners grouped in three pairs to indicate their common mistakes. First, Saints Peter and Paul appear in penitent poses. St. Peter wrings his hands in front of a crowing cock; St. Paul points toward a scene in the background that shows his fall from the horse when he was on his way to Damascus to persecute Christians. The two apostles had sinned against God but were absolved because of their contrite prayers. Next, Magdalen and Zacchaeus were mundane sinners. They demonstrate their foibles: Magdalen's vanity and Zacchaeus's ill-gotten gold. The two penitents that would not be forgiven are King Saul and Judas Iscariot. They committed the gravest sin, suicide, and would be condemned for all eternity. Some painters grouped a number of penitents in the company of Christ. For example, Otto van Veen's Christ and Penitent Sinners depicts King David, Mary Magdalen, the Prodigal Son, and the Good Thief (holding his cross). Peter Paul Rubens followed van Veen's, his teacher's, iconography by surrounding Jesus with the same penitents, but his Baroque work gained in liveliness through emotional gestures and expressions.

The sacrament of penance was another infrequent yet important subject for artists. In Catholic theology, Mary Magdalen is most closely associated with this sacrament (a necessary step to regain grace after committing a sin); therefore, she is frequently depicted on confessionals. Before this type of liturgical furniture was invented, the priest would hear confession in public places. To induce expiatory sentiments, the confessor held a rod in his hand, as illustrated in books of Doctrina Christiana (several versions were printed in Rome in the sixteenth century). One of the few paintings of the sacrament of penance that comes closest in spirit to the catechetical illustration is the depiction of a Catholic priest hearing confession from a penitent in Antonio de Bellis's St. Charles Borromeo Administers the Viaticum to a Plague Victim. Ruefully, the sinner kneels before the clergyman, who leans heavily on a cane.

In Rogier van der Weyden's Altarpiece of the Seven Sacraments, Confession and Absolution are depicted as a small figure group in the left background.

Nicolas Poussin treated the Seven Sacraments twice in very similar compositions. His primary source for the two canvases of penance was the text describing the supper at Simon (Luke 7:36–50), where Christ forgave Magdalen's sins because "she loved much." Poussin was very intent on literary accuracy in religious art, yet in the earlier series (commissioned by the antiquarian Cassiano del Pozzo), Poussin displays his erudite grasp of authentic classical interiors. In the first Sacrament of Penance, he depicts Christ reclining at the banquet on a triclinium. The weeping sinner kneels at her Savior's feet (closest to the viewer) in the lower left-hand corner and demonstrates great emotion. Poussin sent the second version to his French benefactor Freart de Chantelou. Although the two sacrament series are less than 10 years apart, the second Sacrament of Penance presents Magdalen adhering even closer to the biblical text, which reads that she "stood at his [Christ's] feet behind him" (Luke 7:38), convincingly showing that the reason for Magdalen's changed position refers to the Jansenist controversy over the four essential parts of the sacrament of penance: contrition, confession, satisfaction, and absolution. Because Christ's gesture signifies granting Magdalen absolution, it was important to emphasize the sinner's deep inner feelings (affetti) describing her remorse. The theological concept of contrition rather than attrition advocated by the Jesuits (an imperfect form of penance) is guaranteed by the pose of Magdalen, "whose very name suggested life-long repentance and expiation."

Two more aspects of the sacrament of penance were illustrated by artists: one concerned the sanctity of the confession and the second the power of the Catholic clergy to absolve from sins (power of the keys). Giuseppe Maria Crespi treated the first in his St. John Nepomuc Confessing the Queen of Bohemia. The painting describes the confessional: The saint attentively listens to the queen, yet unbeknownst to both, one of the king's spies eavesdrops. It was common knowledge that St. Nepomuc refused to divulge the queen's secrets and preferred martyrdom by drowning in the Moldava River. The second scene, Heinrich von Angeli's At the Confessional, relates to the sacrament of penance as well. The painting depicts the stony countenance of a priest leaving a young woman, who cowers at his feet and raises her arms in a gesture of sheer desperation, without absolution. It must have expressed the anxiety of a great many people because the scene was reproduced in Gartenlaube, one of the most popular German magazines of the nineteenth century.

The Roman Catholic Church frequently staged propitiatory processions to express penitence. Medieval flagellants (Les Belles Heures du Duc de Berry) or St. Charles Borromeo (G. B. Rovere and Pietro da Cortona, among others) led such public displays of repentance of communal sins. To avoid divine punishments, the faithful would humble themselves before God. Dressed like sinners, often barefoot, they would walk through city streets. Baroque penetente figurines are small wood carvings, produced in the Hispano-American culture, that were carried during Lenten processions. They have their roots in Catholic Spain. The sculptures represent saints, the Immaculata, and death imagery.

Penitence also is an integral part of the Prodigal Son parable. Although it is frequently debated whether any particular pictorial version is Protestant or Catholic, it is seldom proved beyond the shadow of a doubt. Protestant artists chose the subject of the filius prodigus (prodigal son) because it indicated a personal conversion. According to their beliefs, people are saved by faith and Christ's mercy rather than by their own merits. The aged Rembrandt van Rijn treated this theme most memorably in his version in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia. In his Return of the Prodigal Son, the father opens his arms to the repenting youth, seemingly embracing the whole world. The impoverished son kneels before the old man in perfect harmony and peace. According to Catholic doctrines, the assumption would have been that the contrite son had repented, confessed, and atoned before he would be absolved from his sins. Seventeenth-century Counter-Reformation art favored the scenes of the return, as in Bartolomé Esteban Murillo's recounting of the story in epic breadth. Not only is the penitent received by his forgiving father, but even the dog rejoices in the reunion. The preparations for the feast and the clothing of the "lost son" are illustrated in minute detail.

Guercino, too, depicted the return of the son numerous times, yet he limited the narrative features. All his three-figure compositions are only half-length and appear close to the observer. Guercino's earlier versions emphasize the outer changes by including the servant with the new clothes (Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; Galleria Borghese in Rome). Yet, his later paintings are more indicative of the son's contrite state of mind (the importance of contrition already was mentioned in the context of Poussin's The Sacrament of Penance)—crying, he confesses his sins (Diocesan Museum in Włocławek, Poland; Tim Ken Museum in San Diego, California). The servant of the earlier scenes is replaced by the "model brother" who had stayed home with his parent. However, a century later, in Pompeo Batoni's Return of the Prodigal Son, the emphasis on the religious doctrine is less obvious. The artist dazzles the viewer with the grandeur of the oriental costumes.

Even in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the topos remained popular. Again artists chose between a descriptive narrative style and an emphasis on the inner conversion. The latter is clearly intended by Pierre Puvis de Chavannes's The Repentant Prodigal Son. A large, almost nude figure is seated in a monotone landscape. The man is self-absorbed and lost in thought. Similar scenes, painted by Lovis Corinth, Max Slevogt, and others, displayed greater psychological finesse than in the previous centuries. On the other hand, Eduard von Gebhardt's Return of the Prodigal Son accents the outer drama of the reunion. Following tradition, the son kneels before the old man, yet Gebhardt places the scene inside a quaint farmhouse—following not scripture but Jean-Baptiste Greuze's non-biblical story of The Punishment of the Son (in which the young man returns too late to make peace with his father).

A secular version of the Prodigal Son, a girl finding forgiveness, paralleling the biblical parable, appeared in the nineteenth century. The Victorian period's fondness for the "fallen woman" was mentioned earlier. George Morland's The Fair Penitent is a narrative series about a rural heroine, Laetitia. The young woman, after a life of sin in the city, returns to the bosom of her family in the country. Humbly, the girl sits on the front steps, where her kind relatives find her. The Laetitia theme was popularized and disseminated in a series of engravings. The Pre-Raphaelite Dante Gabriel Rossetti painted a variation of the theme. Found shows a woman down on her luck, seated in the gutter in London, turning away in shame from a young farmer (perhaps her former suitor) who extends his helping hands.

One of the most endearing penitents is the mortal Psyche in Apuleius's Golden Ass. This work recounts the endless trials and tribulations the beautiful girl endured to prove herself worthy to wed the god of love. Although this tale is based on an ancient Greek myth symbolizing the union of Cupid (love) with Psyche (soul) and is known in ancient sculpture, the first narrative fresco cycles appeared during the Renaissance. The archetypes in the myth can be interpreted in many different ways, which gave the artists and patrons the liberty to suggest a great variety of symbolism. In Raphael's Farnesina frescoes (possibly commissioned for a wedding), Psyche Received on Olympus and Wedding Celebration take the lion's share of the decorations. Comparatively little space is given to the contrite bride and her redeeming tasks. A subordinate scene, Psyche Before Venus, depicts her humiliation; contrite, the girl kneels before her future mother-in-law. Psyche offers as a sign of atonement the vase she had retrieved from the river Styx.

It was Giulio Romano who expanded the iconography of the fairy tale for Duke Federico Gonzaga of Mantua, Italy. (Parallels can be drawn between the story and the prince's relationship with his mother.) The Sala di Psichi in the Palazzo del Te in Mantua displays most of the obstacles the young woman had to overcome to regain Cupid's trust. She loses her lover when she disobeys the god's command not to gaze at him during their "trial marriage." Psyche, finding herself abandoned by Cupid, resolves to devote her whole life to reclaiming his love. The soap-opera events continue as the regretful and humbled Psyche delivers herself into the power of the goddess of love, Venus. The jealous Venus takes revenge, abusing Psyche mentally as well as physically. Romano depicts Psyche being whipped by Sorrow (Sollicitudo) and Sadness (Tristitia). Apuleius describes this incident, and The Scourging of Psyche appeared on fifteenth-century wedding chests. The viewer also feels empathy with the young girl's dilemma as she faces Cinderella-like chores, as in Psyche Sorting Grains. In her seated pose in Dürer's Melancholia, she seems overwhelmed by the futility of the labor. To comply with Venus's whims, Psyche finishes one dangerous mission after another, often receiving outside help. Finally, Cupid convinces the gods to make his bride immortal and win his mother's approval, and the lovers are united.

About 20 years after the Mantua frescoes were executed, the subject of Cupid and Psyche was taken up again in the bed chamber of Pope Paul III in Castel Sant'Angelo in Rome. Perino del Vaga, another Raphael follower, used the format of a narrow frieze all'antica (in the antique style). The mood of the paintings seems more serious (Psyche's disobedience has at times been interpreted as analogous to the Fall of Man). The political and religious climate had changed, and although the concetto (concept) has not yet been fully analyzed, it stands to reason that the pontiff, who called the Council of Trent (1545–1563) and reinstituted the Inquisition, would have read the myth's meaning differently than people did in the preceding hedonistic period. Again, The Scourging of Psyche appears in a prominent spot. The moralizing tone of the cassone (wedding chests) paintings seem to have been partly responsible for Perino del Vaga's iconography in the papal chamber, a subject worthy of further research.

Another secular topic is Emperor Henry IV's proverbial, penitential Walk to Canossa. This event took place in 1077, yet it is rarely seen in the visual arts before the nineteenth century. This incident ended imperial superiority in papal elections and curtailed lay appointments in the clergy. However, the theme was little in demand because it describes the defeat the German emperor had suffered at the hands of Pope Gregory VII when the penitent ruler had to wait for three days, barefoot in the snow, for an audience to have his Roman Catholic Church ban lifted. Historic re-creation of Canossa found great favor in nineteenth-century Germany. The subject involving a supreme pontiff and the German emperor was used to communicate various political slogans. Much has been written about its conveyance of antipapal tendencies in the years before Germany's reunification (Friedrich Gross, Jesus, Luther und der Papst im Bilderkampf 1871 bis 1918, among others). German artists did not try to portray a humbled penitent but rather a powerful emperor, unbroken in spirit. In 1863, Hermann Freihold Plüddemann, as well as Hermann Wislicenus, conceived the victim in Henry IV in Canossa as a reflective yet determined man. Henry IV, a commanding figure, stands in front of the papal palace while the papal court appears much reduced in size on a balcony in the background. Otto Friedrich, in his version of 1890, sees Henry IV as accuser. At the same time, Pope Gregory VII seems shaken and regretful about his own inhuman treatment of the emperor. The tables are turned.

Penitents in art are often touchingly human and quite emotional subjects. Unless the stories can be assumed to be common knowledge, their inner struggles do not lend themselves well to depiction; therefore, at times the images appear stereotyped (St. Jerome, Mary Magdalen). Moreover, fervent experiences of repentance occur far more often in religious scenes than in secular works.

See also Betrayal; Calumny; Plague/Pestilence; Protestantism

Selected Works of Art

Allegories of Penitence

Botticelli, Calumny of Apelles, 1485–1490, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Girolamo da Carpi, Chance and Penitence, circa 1541, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Galle, Philip, Allegory of Penitence, from Prosopographia, circa 1600

Ripa, Cesare, Penitenza, from Iconologia, circa 1603, p. 389

Ripa, Cesare, Poenitentia, from Iconologia, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, circa 1758, plate 176

Religious Penitents

Limbourg Brothers, Flagellants, from Les Belles Heures du Duc de Berry, before 1415, New York, The Cloisters

Veen, Otto van, Christ and the Penitent Sinners, 1586, Mainz, Germany, Mittelrheinisches Museum
 Abraham Bloemaert (engraved after), Series of the Penitents, circa 1611
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Christ and the Penitent Sinners, circa 1615, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Laer, Pieter van, Flagellantes, before 1642, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Dou, Gerrit, The Hermit, 1670, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art Goya, Francisco, Flagellants, oil on panel, 1794, Madrid, Spain, Academia de San Fernando

Mary Magdalen

Magdalen Master, Repentant Mary Magdalen, circa 1285, Florence, Italy, Accademia
 Donatello, Mary Magdalen, sculpture, 1454, Florence, Italy, Baptistery Titian, Repentant Mary Magdalen, 1560s, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Goltzius, Hendrick, Mary Magdalen Crying over Her Sins, engraving, 1582
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, The Penitent Magdalen, oil on canvas, circa 1619–1620, Florence, Italy, Galleria Palatina, Palazzo Pitti
 La Tour, Georges de, Repentant Mary Magdalen, circa 1621–1623, Paris, Louvre
 Duquesnoy, Jérôme, The Repentant Mary Magdalen in a Cave, sculpture, circa 1650, Brussels, Belgium, Parc de Bruxelles
 Le Brun, Charles, The Repentant Mary Magdalen Renounces All the Vanities of the World, circa 1656, Paris, Louvre
 Sirani, Elisabetta, The Penitent Magdalene in the Wilderness, oil on canvas, 1660, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
 Cézanne, Paul, The Harrowing of Hell and Mary Magdalen, 1869, collection of John Rewald Béraud, Jean, Mary Magdalen in the House of the Pharisee, 1891, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Walker

Prodigal Son

Dürer, Albrecht, The Prodigal Son's Conversion Among the Swine, engraving, 1496
 Guercino, Return of the Prodigal Son, 1619, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Guercino, Return of the Prodigal Son, 1627–1628, Rome, Galleria Borghese
 Guercino, Return of the Prodigal Son, 1651, Włocławek, Poland, Diocesan Museum
 Guercino, Return of the Prodigal Son, circa 1655, San Diego, California, Tim Ken Museum
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Return of the Prodigal Son, circa 1668, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Murillo, Bartolomé Esteban, The Return of the Prodigal Son, circa 1670, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Batoni, Pompeo, Return of the Prodigal Son, 1773, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Puvis de Chavannes, The Repentant Prodigal Son, 1879, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Corinth, Lovis, The Prodigal Son Among Swine, 1891, private collection
 Slevogt, Max, The Prodigal Son Triptych, 1898–1899, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie
 Gebhardt, Eduard von, Return of the Prodigal Son, 1908, location unknown
 Lipchitz, Jacques, Return of the Prodigal Son, bronze sculpture, 1931, New York, Marlborough Gallery

St. Jerome

Botticini, Francesco, Saint Jerome in Penitence with Saints Damascus, Eusebius, Paula, Eustochium, and Donors, tempera on panel, circa 1460, London, National Gallery
 Leonardo da Vinci, St. Jerome in the Wilderness, 1481, Rome, Pinacoteca Vaticana
 Cima da Conegliano, St. Jerome Contemplating the Cross, 1495, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, St. Jerome as a Hermit, 1502, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Tintoretto, Saint Jerome, 1570s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Palma Giovane, Jerome Contemplating the Cross, circa 1603, Riva del Garda, Italy, Santuario della Madonna Involata Reni, Guido, St. Jerome and the Angel, circa 1635, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

St. Charles Borromeo

Rovere, Giovanni Battista della, St. Charles Leads the Procession of the Holy Nail, 1602, Milan, Italy, Cathedral
 Palma Giovane, St. Charles Borromeo, circa 1603, Riva del Garda, Italy, Santuario della Madonna Involata Pietro da Cortona, St. Charles Borromeo Leads the Procession of the Holy Nail, 1667, Rome, San Carlo di Catinari

St. Peter

El Greco, Repentant Peter, 1603–1607, Toledo, Spain, Hospital de San Juan Bautista de Afuera
 La Tour, Georges de, The Penitent Peter, 1645, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art Goya, Francisco de, Repentant Peter, 1820–1824, Washington, D.C., Phillips Collection

Other Saints

Dürer, Albrecht, Penance of St. Chrysostomos, engraving, before 1495
 El Greco, St. Francis in Meditation, 1587–1597, Valencia, Spain, Montesinos Collections
 Palma Giovane, St. Onuphrius, circa 1603, Riva del Garda, Italy, Santuario della Madonna Involata
 Nolde, Emil, Mary of Egypt with Sinners; Conversion; Death in the Desert, triptych, 1912, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Sacrament of Penance

Angeli, Heinrich (print after), At the Confessional, illustration in Gartenlaube, vol. 9, 1874
 Bellis, Antonio de, St. Charles Borromeo Administers the Viaticum to Plague Victims, circa 1640, Naples, Italy, San Carlo alle Mortelle

- Crespi, Giuseppe Maria, St. John Nepomuc Confessing the Queen of Bohemia, 1743, Turin, Italy, Galleria Sabauda
- Poussin, Nicolas, The Sacrament of Penance, 1630s, destroyed
- Poussin, Nicolas, The Sacrament of Penance, 1640s, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
- Weyden, Rogier van der, Altarpiece of the Seven Sacraments, circa 1453, Antwerp, Belgium, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Secular Penitents*
- Francesco di Giorgio Martini, The Scourging of Psyche, Florence, Italy, Villa I Tatti
- Raphael, Psyche Before Venus, fresco, 1519, Rome, Farnesina, Loggia di Psichi
- Giulio Romano, Psyche Sorting Grains; The Scourging of Psyche, circa 1527, Mantua, Italy, Palazzo del Te, Sala di Psichi
- Perino del Vaga, The Scourging of Psyche, circa 1545, Rome, Castel Sant'Angelo
- Greuze, Jean-Baptiste, The Punishment of the Son, 1778, Paris, Louvre
- Morland, George, The Fair Penitent, 1789, engraved by J. R. Smith, from Laetitia, plate 6
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Found, 1854, Wilmington, Delaware Art Museum
- Wislicenus, Hermann, Henry IV in Canossa, drawing, 1863, sketch for Goslar, Kaisersaal, location unknown
- Plüddemann, Hermann Freihold, Henry IV in Canossa, print, sketch for Goslar, Kaisersaal, 1863, from Gartenlaube, vol. 2, 1877

- Friedrich, Otto (print after), Henry IV in Canossa, sketch for Goslar, Kaisersaal, 1890

Further Reading

- Gaudioso, Alberti, and Eraldo Gaudioso, Gli affreschi di Paolo III a Castel Sant' Angelo, Rome, 1981
- Gross, Friedrich, Jesus, Luther und der Papst im Bilderkampf 1871 bis 1918, Marburg, Germany: Jonas, 1989
- Haeger, Barbara, "The Prodigal Son," Simiolus 16:2-3 (1986)
- Henneberg, Josephine von, "Poussin's Penance: A New Reading," Storia dell' Arte 61 (1987)
- Lewis, Mary Tompkins, "Cézanne's Harrowing of Hell and Magdalen," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 97 (1981)
- Nochlin, Linda, "Lost and Found: Once More the Fallen Woman," in Feminism and Art History: Questioning the Litany, edited by Norma Broude and Mary D. Garrard, New York: Harper, 1982
- Ridderbos, Bernhard, Saint and Symbol: Images of St. Jerome in Early Italian Art (Ph.D. diss., Rijksuniversiteit Groningen, 1984)
- Roethlisberger, Marcel G., "Abraham Bloemaert's Series of the Penitents," Print Quarterly 9 (1992)
- Vetrova, Luisa, "Cupid and Psyche in Renaissance Painting Before Raphael," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 92 (1979)
- Wethey, Harold E., "Titian's Escorial-Ashburton Magdalen," Burlington Magazine 118 (1976)
- Wittkower, Rudolph, Allegory and Migration of Symbols, Boulder: University of Colorado Press, 1977

PHYSIOGNOMY

Margaret A. Sullivan

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Physiognomy:

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Pieter Bruegel the Elder, Head of a Lansqueniet, circa 1566, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre.
(Courtesy of Musée Fabre)

As it relates to the visual arts, physiognomy can be defined as that which involves the relatively dispassionate and analytic rendering of the human face, as distinct from both caricature and portraiture. Broadly defined, physiognomy can refer to any representation or description of facial features, especially when linked to science and medicine.

A portrait involves the depiction of a specific individual and is frequently a commissioned work that presents the subject as he or she wishes to be seen. In Diego Velázquez's Portrait of Pope Innocent X (1650), the novelty of the sitter's rueful response—tropo vero (too true)—is a reminder that portraits rarely reveal the subject's inner person. The artist is usually constrained by stereotypes, the image he produces normalized and adjusted to the aspirations and social position of the sitter. In caricature, the situation is reversed. The personal bias of the artist dominates, and whether representing a specific individual, an occupational group, or racial type, the caricaturist uses deformation and exaggeration to create a terse, often defamatory image that emphasizes those aspects of a person's features that are most readily identifiable.

The physiognomic study differs from both portraiture and caricature in the degree to which it reflects the scientific knowledge current at the time the artist is working. If the artist's purpose is uncertain, however, it can be difficult to identify. When Thomas Rowlandson gave labels such as "The Pernicious," "The Ostentatious," and "The Suspicious" to a series of faces and on the same sheet layered a series of profiles, it is likely that the profiles were physiognomic studies distinct from the labeled caricatures. On the other hand, it is not known whether Leonardo da Vinci intended his "grotesques" as physiognomic studies (see the essay Caricature/Caroon). The sculptures Austrian artist Franz Xaver Messerschmidt created in the eighteenth century are even more problematic. In each of these 49 busts a man displays a different, grossly distorted expression. But Messerschmidt's purpose in producing these renderings is not known, and his history of mental difficulties complicates the question of motivation even further. It is not certain whether these are physiognomic studies, caricatures, or projections of Messerschmidt's own volatile personality.

In a physiognomic study, the attitude of the artist toward his or her subject tends to be analytical, either to suit the artist's own research interests, or as a response to the scientific concerns of a doctor, psychologist, or other professional who wishes to have facial features recorded accurately for a diagnostic or investigative purpose. When Albrecht Dürer created physiognomic studies for his treatise on human proportions, he was pursuing his interest in rationalized art. According to his own statement, Dürer investigated "about two or three hundred living persons," coordinated their images into types, and presented his findings in a schematic way, as in his print of overlapping heads in a profile series. For

Dürer, this research and codification of the beautiful and the ugly was seen as necessary preparation for his paintings, such as Christ Among the Doctors (1506), in which grotesque faces communicate inner ugliness.

On the other hand, the series of portraits French artist Théodore Géricault painted around 1822 reflect a different scientific perspective, and were probably created as a response to the medical concerns of doctors involved in the treatment of mental illness. Only five of the paintings are known today, but each represents a patient suffering from some form of monomania (obsessive concentration on a single idea). The portraits became the property of Étienne-Jean Georget, a doctor at Salpêtrière, an institution for the mentally ill in France where the affliction was originally described. Géricault's physiognomic paintings were probably created as contributions to the "archive of the iconography of nervous illness" begun by the doctors in Georget's circle—a kind of gallery of clinically classifiable types. They also may have been painted records made for diagnostic purposes, painted as examples of certain mental disorders for training medical personnel or painted for use in bolstering Georget's argument that medical experts should testify in criminal cases. In any case, some degree of collaboration between the artist and the medical world had to have occurred because the subjects were mental patients, the project was private rather than commercial, and the portraits were not exhibited in the Salon or sold on the art market.

The belief that facial features predict mental states, character, health, occupation, and even an individual's life span first appears as an important topic in the literature and painting of the ancient world. The classical, and classic, formulation of the physiognomic point of view is Cicero's declaration in De oratore (circa 50 B.C.) that image animi vultus vultu (The face is the image of the soul) (III. lviii. 221). Ancient ideas were also formulated in the pseudo-Aristotelian fragment Physiognomics, which stressed the importance of the "region around the eyes, forehead, head and face" (314b), as well as in allusions to physiognomy in the writings of Seneca, Pliny the Elder, and the ancient satirists. Juvenal, the Roman satirical poet, wrote, "One can detect in a sickly body the secret torments of the soul, as also its joys: the face takes the stamp of either" (Satire IX, 19–21). Other ancients noted parallels between the features of humans and animals, used facial features to divide humans into races and indicate behavioral differences, and recognized facial expressions as the outward manifestation of differing emotional states. The ancient world widely accepted that occupational aptitude, susceptibility to certain diseases, character, and even the future could be read from facial features. In both its permanent and temporal aspects—as genetic endowment, but also as the traces left on the face by habit, experience, and fleeting emotions—physiognomy was important in ancient literature, and from its inception the artist and the physiognomist became related. Pliny praised the portraits of the fourth century B.C. Greek painter Apelles that were so absolutely lifelike that incredible as it sounds . . . one of those persons called “physiognomists,” who prophesy people’s future by their countenance, pronounced from their portraits either the year of the subjects’ deaths . . . or the number of years they had already lived. (Pliny, Natural History, XXXV. xxxvi. 88–89)

The sixteenth century saw a resurgence of interest in physiognomy, with classical views widely disseminated in the popular physiognomy books of Jean de Indagine and Bartolomeo Cocles—which included crude woodcuts and were obviously indebted to ancient literature. Hans Baldung Grien’s Head of a Fool (circa 1520s)—a charcoal drawing of a man with large lips, open mouth, lowered brows, and a long, sharp nose—was recognizable as a fool on the basis of the contemporary physiognomy texts even if the artist had not made the identification explicit by giving him the fool’s traditional eared hood. Grien was clearly familiar with these books as his Portrait of Jean de Indagine (1522) appears in Indagine’s Introductiones apotelesmaticae elegantes, in chyromantiam, physiognomiam, astrologiam (1522) published in Strasbourg, France. Other artists, including Pieter Bruegel the Elder, depict occupational types in ways that are consistent with the physiognomy books. The faces of the peasants in Bruegel’s Peasant Dance (circa 1566) are related to the physiognomy books, as are his tiny physiognomic paintings such as Head of a Lansqueniet (circa 1566) in Montpellier, France. This study of a wide-eyed, mustached soldier, only about three inches in diameter, is minutely detailed. He has wide-open eyes that slightly protrude, the whites entirely visible around the iris; a subtle red shade of skin; taut facial muscles; and a fierce expression, all of which exemplify the choleric individual as described in the physiognomy books contemporary to Bruegel.

The view that character can be communicated by means of a physiognomic repertoire increasingly influenced artists, audiences, and art criticism. Francesco Bocchi’s response to Donatello’s sculpture of St. George, written in 1571 and published in 1584, revealed his familiarity with physiognomic books and physiognomic theories. The codification of features that began with the physiognomy books of Indagine and Cocles continued in Giambattista della Porta’s De humana physiognomonia (1583, On Human Physiognomy), first published in Naples, Italy. Della Porta visited prisons and gallows to see the dead, observing the bodies of criminals who had been hanged and taking plaster casts of their faces; he was especially concerned to elaborate parallels between men and animals. A typical illustration from della Porta’s physiognomy book places the head of a young boy with slanted eyes and long nose next to the head of a pig with the same features.

In the seventeenth century, these same physiognomy books continued to be influential. In Velázquez’s painting Aesop (1639–1640), some see a bovine type with “great forehead, fleshy face, and very large eyes” as described in della Porta’s physiognomy book. Johann Caspar Lavater’s L’Art de connaître les hommes par la physionomie (1806–1809, The Art of Knowing Men by Physiognomy) continued the tradition of reading faces from physiognomic signs. The influential works of Charles Darwin and Charles Bell, specifically Bell’s The Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression as Connected with the Fine Arts (1844) published in London, followed Lavater’s efforts.

Cautions about judging character solely on the basis of physiognomy are present from its beginnings. They appear in the Bible—“Judge not according to the appearance” (John 7:24)—and in classical literature. When Hippocrates’ face was “read” by a physiognomist as that of a fraud and a voluptuary, he responded that while his “natural tendencies and evil desires” were accurately identified, reason had allowed him to suppress them. Predictions made on the basis of inherited facial structure (the more permanent aspect of physiognomy), as well as magical and astrological subfields such as metoposcopy (predictions made from observing the lines of the forehead), were frequently under attack. During the Renaissance, for example, Leonardo da Vinci dismissed physiognomy as “false,” although he accepted the assumption that the face shows some indication of the nature of people, their vices and character. Dutch scholar and theologian Desiderius Erasmus tempered his generally positive view of physiognomic forecasting by admitting that appearances could be deceptive.

By the nineteenth century, however, few took these caveats seriously, and physiognomy, profiting from its affinities with the emerging sciences of ethnography and anthropology, reached the high point of its influence. Artists could count on the physiognomic literacy of their audience and their willingness to accept its premises. For the English artist William Powell Frith, a self-confessed physiognomist, criminals had low brows; Irishmen looked like apes; the “bull-terrier type” was common in England; and virtue, vice, race, and social class could all be recognized from facial features. In his panoramic paintings of mid-Victorian urban society, Derby Day (1858) and Railway Station (1862), Frith includes dozens of types in which physiognomic distinctions are made between so-called embezzler, cockney gamester, fake country squire, man about town, aristocrat, and country bumpkin. Frith could depend on his audience to study all these faces, identify them accurately, and recognize them as representatives of familiar types.

Vincent van Gogh, in similar fashion, used physiognomic criteria when selecting peasant subjects for his paintings. In one of his letters, van Gogh reports he has found among the peasants “physiognomies reminding one of pigs or crows,” and in another he writes that he is continuing his search for “rough, flat faces with low foreheads and thick lips” (Uitert, p. 160). Van Gogh’s terminology reflects the belief, common to nineteenth-century artists and audiences alike, that the face reveals character, intelligence, occupational aptitude, and even criminal propensities.

In recent times, photography has replaced the recording function of the artist, and in the process has helped demolish many of the physiognomic stereotypes that were widely accepted in the nineteenth century. In “The Physiognomy of Murderers” (1889), a visitor to a British prison noted the “ape-faces . . . angry dog-faces, heavy sullen ox-faces” of the criminals, confirming the belief that there was an identifiable criminal physiognomy, but when Charles Goring in The English Convict (1913) compared drawings of 30 English criminals with an equal number of portraits based on photographs of criminals, he found that an identifiable criminal physiognomy existed only in the minds of the observers (artist and audience alike). Physiognomic stereotyping began to be eroded.

Art and science have tended to go separate ways in the modern period, at least as far as the human body is concerned; science has discredited physiognomy, which has left it to matters of historical interest. The camera has replaced paintbrush and pencil, and with the exception of the study of facial expression as it communicates temporary emotional states, physiognomy has lost legitimacy.

However, even if artists are no longer concerned with physiognomy or engaged in a scientific collaboration that focuses on facial features, many premises of the physiognomist are still operative in daily life. Recent studies of the responses electorates have to their political leaders suggest we continue to believe we can read character from the face. Anyone sitting for a portrait may still be concerned that the outcome will be tropo vero. Doctors continue to use exterior evidence to make deductions about physical condition and inner states, and the art of “reading” faces is still considered a valuable asset in the conduct of daily life.

See also Caricature/Cartoon; Fools/Folly; Humors; Madness; Self-Portraits I: Men; Self-Portraits II: Women

Selected Works of Art

Renaissance

- Dürer, Albrecht, Christ Among the Doctors, 1506, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection
- Dürer, Albrecht, series of physiognomic studies (reproduced in Panofsky, fig. 320)
- Grien, Hans Baldung, Head of a Fool, charcoal drawing, circa 1520s, London, British Museum
- Grien, Hans Baldung, Portrait of Jean de Indagine, from Introductiones apotelesmaticae elegantes, in chyromantiam, physiognomiam, astrologiam, 1522, Strasbourg, France
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Dance, circa 1566, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Peasant Wedding Banquet, circa 1566, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Head of an Old Man, oil on wood, circa 1566, Bordeaux, France, Musée de Beaux-Arts
- Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Head of a Lansquenet, oil on wood, circa 1566, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
- Bruegel, Pieter the Elder, Head of a Yawning Peasant, oil on wood, circa 1566, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux de Beaux-Arts

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- Velázquez, Diego, Portrait of Pope Innocent X, oil on canvas, 1650, Rome, Galleria Doria-Pamphili
- Velázquez, Diego, Aesop, oil on canvas, 1639–1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Messerschmidt, Franz Xaver, series of 49 sculptured busts, eighteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie Lower Belvedere

Nineteenth Century

- Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Kidnapper, oil on canvas, circa 1822, Springfield, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Kleptomaniac, oil on canvas, circa 1822, Ghent, Belgium, Museum of Fine Arts
- Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Man Suffering from Delusions of Military Rank, oil on canvas, circa 1822, Winterthur, Switzerland, Oskar Reinhart Collection
- Géricault, Théodore, Portrait of a Woman Addicted to Gambling, oil on canvas, circa 1822, Paris, Louvre
- Géricault, Théodore, Woman Suffering from Obsessive Envy, oil on canvas, circa 1822, Lyons, France, Musée de Beaux-Arts
- Frith, William Powell, Derby Day, oil on canvas, 1858, London, Tate Gallery
- Frith, William Powell, Railway Station, oil on canvas, 1862, Egham, Surrey, Royal Holloway College
- Van Gogh, Vincent, Head of a Peasant Woman in a Black Cap, oil on canvas, 1885, Otterlo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Further Reading

- Barasch, Moshe, “Character and Physiognomy,” Journal of the History of Ideas XXXVI (July–September 1975)
- Bell, Charles, Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression as Connected with the Fine Arts, third edition, London: John Murray, 1844
- Boime, Albert, “Portraying Monomaniacs to Service the Alienist’s Monomania: Géricault and Georget,” Oxford Art Journal XIV:1 (1991)
- Camden, Carroll, “The Mind’s Construction of the Face,” in Renaissance Studies in Honor of Hardin Craig, edited by Baldwin Maxwell, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1941
- Cowling, Mary, The Artist as Anthropologist, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989
- Darwin, Charles, The Expression of the Emotion in Man and Animals, London: John Murray, 1872
- Domiquen Ortiz, Antonio, Velázquez, New York: Abrams, 1989
- Eitner, Lorenz, Géricault: His Life and Work, London: Orbis, 1983
- Evans, E. C., “Physiognomics in the Ancient World,” Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 59:5 (August 1969)
- Förster, Richard, Scriptors Physiognomonici: Graeci et Latini, Leipzig, Germany: Teubner, 1894
- Jaton, Anne-Marie, Johann Caspar Lavater, Zürich, Switzerland: International-Schweizer Verlagshaus, 1988
- Kwakkelstein, Michael, “Leonardo da Vinci’s Grotesque Heads and the Breaking of the Physiognomic Mold,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 54 (1991)
- Laharie, Muriel, La Folie au Moyen Âge, Paris, Presses de la Renaissance, 1991
- Lavater, Johann Caspar, Essays on Physiognomy, London: Robinson, 1789

- LeBrun, Charles, Series of Lithographic Drawings Illustrative of the Relation Between the Human Physiognomy and That of the Brute Creation, Paris, 1806
- Meller, Peter, "Physiognomical Theory in Renaissance Heroic Portraits," in The Renaissance and Mannerism: Studies in Western Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963
- Miller, Margaret, "Géricault's Portraits of the Insane," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes IV (1940)
- Montagu, Jennifer, The Expression of the Passions: The Origin and Influence of Charles Le Brun's "Conférence sur L'Expression Générale et Particulière", New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1991
- Panofsky, Erwin, The Life and Art of Albrecht Dürer, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1971
- Pseudo-Aristotle, Physiognomics, in Minor Works by Aristotle, translated by W. S. Hartt, London and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Loeb Classical Library, 1936
- Rivers, Christopher, Face Value: Physiognomical Thought and the Legible Body in Marivaux, Lavater, Balzac, Gautier and Zola, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995
- Shookman, Ellis, The Faces of Physiognomy: Interdisciplinary Approaches to Johann Caspar Lavater, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1993
- Stafford, Barbara Marie, Body Criticism: Imaging the Unseen in Enlightenment Art and Medicine, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1991
- Sullivan, Margaret, Bruegel's Peasants: Art and Audience in the Northern Renaissance, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Tytler, Graeme, Physiognomy in the European Novel: Faces and Fortunes, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982
- Uitert, Evert van, editor, Van Gogh in Brabant, Zwolle, The Netherlands: Waanders, 1987
- Wechsler, Judith, A Human Comedy: Physiognomy and Caricature in Nineteenth-Century Paris, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1982

PLAGUE/PESTILENCE

Christine M. Boeckl

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Plague/Pestilence:

VOTIVE COMMISSIONS

ALLEGORIES

DEVASTATION OF THE PLAGUE

ST. CHARLES

ST. ROCH

OTHER SAINTS

AIDS POSTERS

Plague Victim and Her Children, drawing after Nicolas Poussin, Plague at Ashdod, 1631, chalk on blue-gray paper, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der bildenden Künste. (Courtesy of the Museum der bildenden Künste)

Plague and pestilence, like death, war, and famine, are universal themes and have been mentioned by Homer and in the Bible. Yet, plague scenes appear only late in Western art and, as far as we know, do not exist in any other culture. In both the Judeo-Christian tradition and classical antiquity, early literature equates plague with divine punishment for human transgressions. The sun god Apollo is said to have sent epidemics by shooting his arrows from heaven. However, no illustration of his punishment for the rape of Chryseis from the Iliad, “which kept the Greek funeral pyres burning,” has survived. The delay in developing a specific plague iconography can be attributed to the difficulties in characterizing the medical symptoms and, more important, the disease’s absence from Europe between the sixth and fourteenth centuries. In 1347, the Black Death returned from Asia with a vengeance and remained a constant threat in the West throughout the next 400 years. (In this essay, except when specified as bubonic plague, the terms pestilence and plague are used indiscriminately to mean an epidemic disease.)

Unquestionably, the Black Death was a cataclysmic event of almost unprecedented proportions that drastically altered medieval European civilization. An estimated one-third to one-fourth of Europe’s population perished during the period from 1347 to 1353. Giovanni Boccaccio, in his Decameron, vividly describes the terror that had gripped the city of Florence, Italy. The resulting changes in postplague society have occupied scholars for years.

In the arts, a debate concerns the fascination with the “power of death,” a topos prominent since the beginning of the fourteenth century. In 1951, Millard Meiss proposed that the Pisan fresco Triumph of Death reflected a reaction to the Black Death. However, the fresco is now dated prior to 1347; therefore, scholarly opinions are more apt to blame trecento theological controversies regarding eschatology for its morbid iconography. Still, after the onslaught of bubonic plague we find new adaptations of already existing themes of memento mori or of the Madonna of Mercy. Completely new subjects appeared as well. Because the true cause of the plague was an enigma until the 1890s, many fantastic theories circulated about its origin and its infectious nature. It was commonly thought that the disease was transmitted by air, so one characteristic sign was a figure holding his nose. The man protecting himself against contagious vapors while trying to save a child who clings to his dead mother is a cliché repeated for hundreds of years in both profane and religious works.

Plague images can be grouped into two major categories. The first includes votive commissions that show the Trinity, the Virgin, and saints such as Sebastian, Anthony, and Roch invoked as healers—their thaumaturgic powers characterized by a Greek as well as by numerous early Christian martyrs. These religious figures appear in plague banners and devotional altarpieces created to ensure health, to give thanks, and to avert future epidemics. The second category—religious and secular paintings describing the devastation of the plague—is more diversified. Most of the narratives describe events from the lives of saints who had been actively involved in comforting victims of the bubonic plague. St. Charles Borromeo was the favorite subject for altar paintings that serve didactic and messianic functions. Over the centuries, a progressive secularization becomes apparent. During the romantic period, plague paintings allude to new, threatening diseases, such as cholera and yellow fever. Even today, the word plague is often used as an analogy for a force unknown to and uncontrollable by humans. In this sense, it describes the latest scourge: AIDS.

Plague ex-votos are numerous, and they fulfilled a specific function in sacred art. Their complex iconography draws on literary and visual sources. Many votive paintings refer to the Second Coming of Christ. Eschatological scenes are based on the New Testament, which prophesied earthquake, war, famine, and plague to precede the final cataclysm. Although many of the works refer to epidemics, they do not depict the victims. Frequently, plague symbols such as skeletons, skulls, arrows, swords, and crosses, indistinguishable per se from death allegories, imply the Middle Age’s favorite theme: memento mori. The Parisian “dance of death,” painted on the walls of the Cimetière des Innocents (now lost) is specifically plague related, as its visual realization was inspired by Jean Lefebvre’s plague poem. The fresco Triumph of Death in Palermo, Italy (circa 1447), differs iconographically from Francesco Traini’s in Pisa, Italy: Its victims are wasted by plague arrows. Death as a metaphor for pestilence remains the most lasting tradition in the north and in the graphic arts. The grim reaper, swinging his scythe, rides a haggard mare in Albrecht Dürer’s drawing Plague.

A sense of guilt and attempts to placate God appear in many devotional images showing the merciful Virgin and plague saints in prayer (in an effort to save the suffering people). The icons that were said to have been painted by the physician-evangelist St. Luke, such as Madonna of Constantinople, were especially popular for plague commissions. The Nikopoia, as well as the misericordia type, also was believed to shelter the faithful from pestilence. One of the earliest specifically plague-related examples of the Madonna of Mercy is Barnaba da Modena’s Madonna della Misericordia. The Virgin spreads her mantle over some of the members of a confraternity while the figures outside her protection are struck by plague arrows. Raphael’s Madonna di Foligno shows the typical compositional pattern of ex-votos: the Madonna and Christ seated on clouds in the celestial region. The city of Foligno is visible below, and several saints can be seen interceding for the city and the donor. It has been convincingly shown that eschatological connotation can be read into the little nude boy, holding a cartello (poster), standing in the center of the terrestrial zone. This schematic view of heaven and Earth was repeated by Guido Reni, Anthony Van Dyck, Luca Giordano, and Jacques-Louis David, to name the best-known examples. Giovanni Battista Tiepolo adheres to the established tradition in his commemorative painting St. Thecla Interceding for the City of Este; however, his late Baroque aestheticism renders the dramatic scene ineffective. The work appears to be routine and fails to convince the viewer either of its religious fervor or of the serious threat posed by the disease.

In Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, Pest/Pestilentia is described as an ugly old woman with hanging breasts, holding a flagellum. She becomes the most lasting allegory for plague in the visual arts. In Ripa's 1760 edition, Pestilence is illustrated next to King David. However, Plague is found more frequently in religious sculptures than in painting. The very fact that Ripa made use of a disease in Iconologia should alert us to the metaphorical use of the word. After the Protestant Reformation, written documents frequently implied a simile of plague with heresy, a concept less readily traceable in the visual arts. A rare painting is found in the Jesuit House in Antwerp, Belgium, The Triumph of the Cross over the Plagues of Heresy.

The second group, the plague paintings that narrate the horrors of an epidemic, chose this unappealing subject for a number of reasons. The earliest visual recordings can be dated back to the late Middle Ages, when, as might be foreseeable, most of the images remain in the realm of religion. Only a few secular medieval chronicles depict the multitude of victims and the overwhelming task of burying the dead as well as the phenomenon of flagellants who hoped to appease God by self-castigation. The fourteenth-century burning of Jews falsely accused of spreading the disease is recorded in rare woodcuts. Many of these dramatic events were revived in romantic paintings, as in Eugene Beyer's The Burning of the Jews in Strasbourg in 1349.

Interest in medical subjects and aspirations to realism swayed artists in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to paint the characteristic symptoms, the plague buboes, for the first time. A scene depicting a surgeon operating on a plague sore, rendered with clinical objectivity, is preserved in a fifteenth-century fresco of Savoyard Sebastian's Chapel in Lansleville, France. The only religious references are the plague angel and a demon who appear in the upper right-hand corner; their images are based on the Golden Legend. Numerous plague altars are surprising because of the physicality in their renditions of an angel lancing and thereby healing St. Roch's leg wound. Tintoretto, in St. Roch, described for the first time the plight in a plague hospital; the scene was comparable to a setting in a cancer ward. Renaissance humanism is expressed in the heroic quality of the victim as he points to his plague sore, hoping to be miraculously cured by St. Roch.

The verism of painting skin lesions, discolorations, and swelling of the flesh was abandoned after the Council of Trent (1545–1563) called for decorous art. This directive necessitated the introduction of stereotyped plague motifs to ensure legibility. Raphael, in The Phrygian Plague, first introduced the appropriate gesture of holding the nose against the miasmatic air, an age-old convention to indicate the smell of death, in a plague subject. The medical facts that women miscarry at the onset of the disease and that children under the age of five months have the best chance of surviving are borne out in another Raphael invention: the dead or dying mother with a healthy baby on her breast. A third but rarely seen motif is the man covering his head to show grief. In the two latter examples, Raphael had translated antique figures taken from nonplague subjects (the capture of a city and the sacrifice of Iphigenia) mentioned by Pliny in a descriptive plague narrative. These groups were further publicized in Nicolas Poussin's Plague at Ashdod, after which they become the symbol for plague itself.

The change of spiritual climate after the council is documented by the domination of religious plague themes and a lessened concern for the physical condition of the sick, who show acceptance of death in the hope of life everlasting. This view was adopted from plague sermons, which spoke for the first time of a merciful God who sends epidemics as a reminder to repent and reform. Ars ad propaganda fidem (art for the propagation of faith) emphasized the importance of the spiritual sustenance of prayer, sacraments, and piety during times of pestilence. These sentiments are reflected in a new topos: a priest, most often St. Charles Borromeo, dispensing the Eucharist to plague victims. This emphasis, developed from the Last Communion of a Saint, is now on the salvation of the common man. This innovative and polemic subject was used by the Roman Catholic Church to defend doctrines against Protestant teachings because it focused on theological issues, such as communion for laity in one species only, and upheld the Catholic clergy's priestly status. The painting that proved most influential in European Catholic regions during the Baroque period was Pierre Mignard's St. Charles Administers the Viaticum to a Plague Victim, which was proliferated in numerous prints. It depicts the Milanese archbishop among the sick and shows his self-sacrificing concern, humility, and devotion. In the foreground, the mother with a child on her lap receives communion per modum viatici (in the manner of a traveler), which during an epidemic frequently replaced the last rites. The communicant is seated on the ground and is reminiscent of a penitent Mary Magdalen supported by her loving husband or father and surrounded by other plague victims in makeshift beds.

Apart from the ever-popular St. Charles, other saintly priests, such as Saints Camillus, Francis of Regis, and Anthony of Florence, show their ministries on Earth as designated "pestilentiarius" (a clergyman assigned to comfort the plague stricken). In every one of these Eucharistic scenes, the Communion wafer, the spiritual and compositional focal point, gives the artist the welcome opportunity to display a chalice-shaped ciborium (container for consecrated hosts). The most popular Flemish plague saint was the eleventh-century bishop of Ghent, Belgium, who is depicted in Jacob van Oost the Younger's St. Macarius Administers the Viaticum. The touching scene portrays in seventeenth-century dress an elderly, devoutly kneeling couple about to receive communion. Close to the picture plane lies a dead mother with her two infants. One has already died, and a charitable man who cautiously covers his nose helps the surviving child. At times, the custom of distributing blessed pieces of bread, eulogia (not consecrated hosts), to prevent plague is shown, as in Karel Skreta's Nicolas da Tolentino.

Plague scenes were especially suited to depict other sacraments as well—a neglected subject in Christian art. Common variations of the Eucharistic theme were baptism, penance, confirmation, and last rites, all set in the gruesome surroundings of an outbreak of pestilence. These scenes are invaluable records not only because they show the human condition during an epidemic but also because they accurately portray Catholic rituals that were implemented after the Council of Trent until Vatican II. The large canvases show an idealized world: The clergy wear festive liturgical paraments, although ordered to abandon them for hygienic reasons; the priests also abstain from the use of communion tongues to reach quarantined people. Moreover, religious history paintings convey an idyllic picture of family support and impeccable ethical behavior. The attending figures show loving care and even refrain decorously from pipe smoking, which was commonly used as a disinfectant. The raison d'être for these frightening plague documentaries was the didactic message that the clergy would never abandon their parishioners. There is a lacuna of plague subjects in Protestant northern countries until the romantic period, when William Blake, for his Europe a Prophecy, would create his relief etching Plague—one of his most gripping images.

Scenes depicting nonordained plague saints were commissioned to promote religious figures of charitable nursing orders, such as the Olivetans and the Camillians. Because the Roman Catholic Church granted martyr status to people who gave their lives nursing during an epidemic, these didactic paintings present positive role models for the communities. Related themes include the Seven Acts of Mercy, especially the call to tend to the sick and bury the dead. A typical example is Giuseppe Maria Crespi's Blessed Bernhard Tolomei Comforting the Plague Victims. The fourteenth-century Olivetan lay brother, who had given his life in Siena, Italy, during the Black Death, is surrounded by a suffering crowd. The artist has transposed this historic event into his own time: Monks perform charitable deeds, and a parish priest, walking under a baldachin, brings the Eucharist to the plague encampment outside the city walls. This design has been repeated in a number of workshop copies. Only the canvas in the Academy in Vienna, Austria, diverges from the original in one important figure, the torch-bearing acolyte having been replaced by a skeleton clad in the garment of a ministrant. Although it would seem contradictory that death should precede the life-giving sacrament, one has to consider the painting's older prototypes in print. Hans Holbein's Parish Priest of his Totentanz series introduced such a skeleton accompanying the clergyman on his last errand of mercy.

Another saint especially venerated for his love of his fellow man was St. Roch. Peter Paul Rubens's altar design was disseminated in prints throughout Europe. In St. Roch, Rubens sums up the saint's legendary life in a few key motifs. In the upper half, St. Roch, dressed as a pilgrim, is accompanied by an angel and received by Jesus Christ. Below, in a dungeonlike abyss, the plague victims are bedded down on straw. They express a variety of emotions, ranging from despair to hope. Many eighteenth-century Italian and French paintings emphasize St. Roch's Christlike qualities of self-sacrifice and his healing powers (manus imponens curabat) by portraying him like the Savior. At times, only the pilgrim hat, staff, and St. Roch's faithful dog distinguish the saint from Christ.

Although now lost, Jean-François Millet's Salon entry St. Roch in a Plague Hospital Healing by Laying on Hands

(1761), commissioned for St. Louis in Versailles, France, would have supplied a link between the old regime and Antoine-Jean Gros's Napoleon Visiting the Pesthouse of Jaffa. Clearly, the implications in the propagandist painting, which portrays the dictator touching a soldier's plague sore (the event never occurred), refer to the healing powers of the venerated saint as well as to the legendary thaumaturgic gifts of the French kings, especially those invoked against the plague, such as those of the sainted Louis IX. Gros's text speaks of the "moral-raising effects" of Napoleon's death-defying courage, which is described as "having healing powers of its own"—a current medical opinion.

A political figurehead as plague intercessor is an old and frequent motif in art that can be traced back to the most important text in the Old Testament relating to pestilence: King David's Remorse. Many illustrated Bibles depict David kneeling before the plague angel with the city of Jerusalem appearing in the background. David atones for his sin by building an altar, and that sacred site was predestined to be chosen by Solomon for his famous temple. (This accounts for the common Christian practice of dedicating plague votive chapels and churches, for example, the "Spanish Chapel"; Santa Maria Novella in Florence; Santa Maria della Salute in Venice, Italy; and Karlskirche in Vienna.) A cityscape remains part of the plague iconography throughout the centuries, be it Foligno, Milan, Naples, or Marseilles, to name a few examples. The grandiose stair decorations in the Scuola di San Rocco in Venice show Pietro Negri's commemorative painting Plague in Venice, the female figure of the Serenissima humbling herself before Christ, the Virgin, and Saints Michael, Mark, and Roch. Allegories of Christian virtues surround her, the Salute Church visible in the background. In another section of that large painting, frightened crowds shy away from the allegorical figures of Death and Plague.

The counterpart to the political figurehead interceding for the good of his people is the high church official who prays to lift the collective guilt from his flock. The subject of Pope Gregory's intercession is mentioned in the Golden Legend and will become the prototype for other propitiatory plague processions. The changes in the iconology of this theme can be observed over a period of 400 years. One of the oldest plague frescoes can be found in San Pietro in Vincoli in Rome. St. Gregory is depicted in full papal regalia descending the stairs of that church as his clergy follow him. God had commanded an angel and a demon to bring death to Rome. These representatives of good and evil are pounding on the door of a house on the right. The emphasis on an angry God in the story changes to a more conciliatory mood in later versions: a vision of the plague angel sheathing his sword over Castel Sant'Angelo (also based on a quote from the Golden Legend). Therefore, in Federico Zuccaro's St. Gregory Interceding for the Cessation of the Plague, a ray of hope replaces the feeling of despair. Similarly, the theme is treated by Agnolo Solimena and others, among them Sebastiano Ricci, who depicts the pope on his knees in front of a heavenly vision of the Virgin with her Son blessing the crowd. A deceased mother is placed in the foreground, and a man takes charge of her orphaned children.

Although the demons are omitted in the Baroque versions, by the nineteenth century art has come full circle. Jules-Élie

Delaunay, who knew the prototype in the Eternal City, painted Plague in Early Christian Rome. On the basis of the text of a nineteenth-century French translation of Golden Legend, the artist replaced the medieval demon with a dark but handsome wingless creature, “le mauvais ange” (the bad angel) who assists the plague angel in knocking down the door to the temple of Asclepius, the god of medicine. The foreground is littered with corpses while farther back and to the left the pope is holding his procession. Delaunay emphasizes the true Christian faith triumphing over false hope in the pagan idols.

A variant of the propitiatory procession is presented by Pietro da Cortona in St. Charles Leads the Procession of the Holy Nail, which shows the saint in defiance of secular health ordinances demonstrating to the world his conviction that divine obligations precede human laws. A charming, smiling angel swings a censer above the saint’s baldachin (fumigation was used to cleanse houses of plague air), seemingly incongruous to the modern viewer in a scene describing an epidemic; yet, to the seventeenth-century faithful, he represents the messenger from a better world, thereby mirroring the Roman Catholic Church’s philosophy on the ultimate questions of life and death.

True profession of faith and divine chastisement are juxtaposed in Lodovico Carracci’s St. Sebastian Resting on the Niobe Sarcophagus. The saint’s innocence is emphasized by his heroic endurance as he proudly displays his arrow wounds (they resemble plague lacerations). The Christian martyr rests his foot on an antique sarcophagus that depicts the slaughter of Niobe’s children by Apollo and Artemis, thereby linking two plague subjects. The queen’s punishment for her pride and insolence in taunting Leto, the mother of Apollo and Artemis, has been interpreted by Boccaccio and Carel van Mander, to name the most popular authors, as sudden death by pestilence. Luca Giordano paints the Niobe subject a number of times after the devastating Neapolitan epidemic, possibly as a profane alternative for a plague subject. Other plague-related commissions chose the theme of St. Michael punishing the rebel angels’ resurrection. Exodus in the Old Testament describes the 10 Egyptian plagues. Bernardino Luini depicts a number of these divine scourges in his painting The Slaying of the Firstborn, emphasizing in the foreground mothers mourning the slaying of their firstborns (often identified with pestilence). In the middle ground appear cadavers of domestic animals. Antonio Tempesta’s series of prints individually illustrating all 10 plagues can be found in both Christian and Hebrew texts.

Divine interference for blasphemy is implied in Poussin’s Plague at Ashdod, where the Philistines are punished for capturing the Ark of the Covenant (II Samuel 4–7). The artist characterized the scourge (until then thought to be dysentery) for the first time as the bubonic plague. Because the Bible does not specify the disease as pestilence (Hebrew deber, Greek loimos), it was not considered a traditional plague text. Therefore, Poussin’s masterpiece, although frequently copied and quoted in part, did not inspire other versions of the Samuel text. However, the Raphael-Poussin tradition mentioned above is responsible for developing the psychological responses to the cataclysmic events. Some individuals show despair, others are stoic in the face of death, some attempt to escape the epidemic, and a few assist the less fortunate. Because of his innovative painting, Poussin was associated with the subject of pestilence, and the litter bearers in his Phocion’s Funeral (Oakley Park, Plymouth Collection) are often included in other artists’ plague scenes (e.g., Pierre Mignard).

Although no physician appears in a religious painting, Johannes Lingelbach’s Carnival in Rome shows a birdlike creature wearing the typical protective garb of a plague surgeon, which makes him indistinguishable from the other carousing masked revelers. In the same picture, a physician with a tome under his arm and a doctor sign on his back rides in the foreground. The whole scene reflects the artist’s distrust of medicine. The reality of suffering during an epidemic, the breakdown of morality induced by fear that caused inhumane treatment, the abandonment of family members, and calloused people turned into stone (Niobe), all so frequently described in literature, are less popular in the visual arts. Only a few secular works describe such plights. Micco Spadaro, who survived the 1656 Neapolitan epidemic, faithfully records the microcosm of human suffering in Plague in Naples by showing the sick and the agony of the dying. Galley slaves, hired to clear the streets, drag bodies to mass burials. Violators of city ordinances were punished on the wheel or other instruments of torture.

France produced plague scenes long after the last major European epidemic of 1721, reviving some of the earlier traditions. In fact, poet Charles Baudelaire speaks of “les pestiférés de Scio,” indicating that in the nineteenth century, suffering and the color of corpses were still associated with plague paintings, which had played such a decisive role in the development of French romanticism. Some secular nineteenth-century plague scenes show little concern for traditional iconography and iconology. Hans Makart, in Plague in Florence, depicts a lusty orgy. He emphasizes the corruption and lack of moral principles during the chaotic times as frequently deplored in plague literature. On the other hand, Arnold Böcklin’s Plague, painted only a few years after the final discoveries of its causative agents, depicts the disease as Death riding on a dinosaur, a resurgence of a fossil from times past. Finally, Max Klinger’s print Plague, from a series of etchings on death, introduces the ancient topos into the twentieth century. It shows plague as an invisible force against which the humans in the hospital wards are powerless.

Although the plague bacillus is still with us, its terror has subsided. Modern authors, most famous of all Albert Camus, expressed the isolation experienced in a quarantined city in La Peste (1947, The Plague). Still, we find few plague scenes in the twentieth century. In 1956, Ingmar Bergman’s film The Seventh Seal (referring to the Revelation of St. John the Divine) gives a compelling description of a medieval epidemic in Sweden.

Some AIDS posters draw on traditional plague iconography, reviving a sense of memento mori, showing unrelenting symbols that signify death: skulls and crossed bones. Others show St. Sebastian, and a few posters appeal to the viewers’ compassion. One print shows a child, infected with the HIV virus, reaching out, saying, “Please hug me.” A similar campaign to save the children has often been depicted in plague scenes.

See also Death; Misfortune

Selected Works of Art

Votive Commissions

- Barnaba da Modena, Madonna della Misericordia, circa 1372, Genoa, Italy, Santa Maria dei Servi
- Raphael, Madonna di Foligno, circa 1513, Rome, Pinacoteca Vaticana
- Van Dyck, Anthony, Rosary Madonna, circa 1625, Palermo, Italy, Oratorio del Rosario
- Reni, Guido, Palla della peste, 1630, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca
- Giordano, Luca, The Virgin and San Gennaro Interceding for Naples, circa 1662, Naples, Italy, Santa Maria del Pianto
- Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, St. Thecla Interceding for the City of Este, circa 1759, Este, Italy, Cathedral
- David, Jacques-Louis, St. Roch Interceding for the Plague-Stricken, circa 1780, Marseilles, France, Museum

Allegories

- Dürer, Albrecht, Plague, drawing, 1505, London, British Museum
- The Triumph of the Cross over the Plagues of Heresy*, 1617, Antwerp, Belgium, Jesuit University
- Corte, Josse de, Queen of Heaven Expelling the Plague, sculpted high altar, 1670, Venice, Italy, Santa Maria della Salute

Devastation of the Plague

- Traini, Francesco, Triumph of Death, fresco, mid-fourteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo
- Triumph of Death*, fresco, circa 1447, Palermo, Italy, Palazzo Sclafani
- Plague Doctor Performing an Operation*, fifteenth century, Lansleville, Savoy, France, Sebastian's Chapel
- Raphael, The Phrygian Plague (Il Morbetto), circa 1513, print by Marcantonio Raimondi
- Luini, Benardino, The Slaying of the Firstborn, circa 1515, Milan, Italy, Brera
- Lepautre, Jacques, or Jean, The Plagues of Egypt, engraving, seventeenth century
- Poussin, Nicolas, The Plague at Ashdod, 1631, Paris, Louvre
- Lingelbach, Johannes, Carnival in Rome, circa 1650, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Spadaro, Micco, Plague in Naples, 1660s, Naples, Certosa di San Marino
- Negri, Pietro, Plague in Venice, 1673, Venice, Italy, Scuola di San Rocco
- Blake, William, Plague, print, from Europe a Prophecy, plate 11, 1793
- Gros, Antoine-Jean, Napoleon Visiting the Pesthouse of Jaffa, 1804, Paris, Louvre
- Blake, William, Pestilence, pen and watercolor over pencil, circa 1805, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Beyer, Eugene, The Burning of the Jews in Strasbourg in 1349, circa 1850, Strasbourg, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Gérôme, Jean-Léon, Bishop Belzunce During the Plague in Marseilles, 1854, Paris, St. Severin
- Vedder, Elihu, The Plague in Florence, 1867, Lee B. Anderson Collection

- Makart, Hans, Plague in Florence, 1868, Schweinfurt, Germany, Collection Georg Schafer
- Warwick, Frank William Topham, Rescued from the Plague, 1898, London, Guildhall Art Gallery
- Böcklin, Arnold, Plague, 1898, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
- Klinger, Max, Plague, print, from Death Series II, plate no. 3, 1903

St. Charles

- Landriani, Paola Camillo, St. Charles Confirms Adults During the 1575 Epidemic, 1602, Milan, Italy, Cathedral
- Borgianni, Orazio, St. Charles Accepts the Care of an Infant During the Plague in Milan, 1613, Rome, Chiesa da Casa Generalizia dei Padre Mercedari
- Carracci, Annibale, St. Charles Baptizes an Infant in a Plague Encampment, circa 1613, Nonatola, Italy, Abbey Church
- Mignard, Pierre, St. Charles Administers the Viaticum to a Plague Victim, 1657, Le Havre, France, Museum
- Pietro da Cortona, St. Charles Leads the Procession of the Holy Nail, 1667, Rome, San Carlo ai Catinari
- Luti, Benedetto, St. Charles Administers the Extreme Unction, 1713, Schleissheim, Germany, Schloss Museum

St. Roch

- Tintoretto, St. Roch, 1549, Venice, Italy, Chiesa di San Rocco
- Rubens, Peter Paul, St. Roch, 1623, Alost, Belgium, St. Martin

Other Saints

- St. Gregory Interceding for Rome*, fresco, 1476, Rome, San Pietro in Vincoli
- Zuccaro, Federico, St. Gregory Interceding for the Cessation of the Plague, 1581, Bologna, Italy, Sta. Maria del Baraccano
- Carracci, Lodovico, St. Sebastian Resting on the Niobe Sarcophagus, circa 1610, Rome, Vatican, Pinacoteca
- Skreta, Karel, Nicolas da Tolentino, circa 1635, Vienna, Austria, Erzbischöfliches Dom-und Diözesan Museum
- Oost, Jacob van, the Younger, St. Marcellus Administers the Viaticum, 1673, Paris, Louvre
- Solimena, Agnolo, St. Gregory Interceding for Rome, circa 1698, Sarno, Italy, Cathedral
- Ricci, Sebastiano, St. Gregory Intercedes for the Cessation of the Plague, circa 1701, Padua, Italy, Santa Giustina
- Crespi, Giuseppe Maria, Blessed Bernhard Tolomei Comforting the Plague Victims, circa 1735, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
- Crespi, Giuseppe, School of, Blessed Bernhard Tolomei Comforting the Plague Victims, eighteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste
- Delaunay, Jules-Élie, Plague in Early Christian Rome, 1869, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

AIDS Posters

- Dead Give Away, Don't Share Needles: Don't Get Stuck with AIDS*, Michigan Department of Public Health, Bethesda, Maryland, National Library of Medicine
- I HAVE AIDS: Please Hug Me*, Center for Attitude Healing, Bethesda, Maryland, National Library of Medicine

Further Reading

- Biraben, Jean-Noel, Les hommes et la peste en France et dans les pays européens et méditerranéens, Paris, Mouton, 1975
- Boeckl, Christine, Baroque Plague Imagery and Tridentine Church Reforms (Ph.D. diss., University of Maryland, 1990)
- , "A New Reading of Nicolas Poussin's The Miracle of the Ark in the Temple of Dagon," Artibus et Historiae 24 (1991)
- , Six Hundred Years of Plague Imagery: Its Iconography and Iconology (in preparation)
- Cagnetta, François, "Theater of Vanity: Gaetano Zumbo," FMR 37 (1989)
- Cipolla, Carlo, Fighting the Plague in Seventeenth-Century Italy, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981
- Clifton, James Dean, Images of the Plague and other Contemporary Events of the Seventeenth Century (Ph.D. diss., Princeton University, 1987)
- Gregg, Charles T., Plague: The Shocking Story of a Dread Disease in America Today, New York: Scribner, 1978
- Grimm, Jurgen, Die literarische Darstellung der Pest in der Antike und Romania, Munich, Germany: Fink, 1965
- Heitz, P., and Wilhelm Ludwig Schreiber, Pestblätter des 15. Jahrhunderts, Strasbourg, France, 1901
- Herrlinger, Robert, History of Medical Illustration, from Antiquity to 1600, London: Pitman Medical, 1970; New York: Medicina Rara, 1970
- Marshall, Louise Jane, "Manipulating the Sacred: Image and Plague in Renaissance Italy," Renaissance Quarterly 47 (Autumn 1994)
- , "Waiting on the Will of the Lord:" The Imagery of the Plague (Ph.D. diss., University of Pennsylvania, 1989)
- Mollaret, H., and J. Brossollet, "La peste, source méconnue d'inspiration artistique," Jarr book Kon. Mus. schone kunsten Antwerp (1965)
- Puglisi, Catherine R., "Guido Reni's Pallione del Voto and the Plague of 1630," Art Bulletin 57:3 (September 1995)
- Schroter, Elisabeth, "Raphaels Madonna di Foligno-ein Pestbild?," Zeitschrift fur Kunstgeschichte (1987)
- Venezia e la peste: 1348-1797*, Venice, Italy: Marsilio, 1979

POINTING/INDICATING

Fritz Laupichler

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Pointing/Indicating:

ANCIENT

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Albrecht Dürer, Self-Portrait, Nude, circa 1519, drawing, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg)

Generally speaking, a gesture of indication is a form of nonverbal communication by means of bodily signs that conveys information and supplements or replaces speech. It is dialogic and can be performed by the index finger, the hand, or the whole arm stretched out. The pointing/indicating gesture can be specifically used in the sense of showing a direction, displaying something to someone, or presenting or accusing someone. Gestures of indication have occurred frequently in art because they produce relations between persons, between persons and objects, and between the work of art and the viewer.

In ancient Greek art, gestures of indication were reserved almost exclusively for vase paintings. The arrival of spring is the theme of a pelike by Euphronius (circa 500 B.C.) in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, Russia. In it, three men point their index fingers or widely stretched arms at a swallow, the first messenger of spring. On Euphronius's calyx krater (circa 500 B.C.) in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin, a young guardian points an index finger at a discus thrower who is being given instructions for his training.

Christian iconography contains numerous examples of gestures of indication, such as The Fall portrayed on the bas-reliefs of Bernward's doors (1015) at the Cathedral of Hildesheim, Germany. Reproved by God, Adam blames Eve by pointing at her as she simultaneously points at a serpent, transferring the blame. Similarly, in Masaccio's fresco The Expulsion (circa 1420–1428) in the Brancacci Chapel at Santa Maria del Carmine in Florence, Italy, an angel points Adam and Eve the way out of Paradise.

In the Bible, Abraham's nephew Lot was said to have been ordered by God to leave the doomed town of Sodom. In Hendrick Goltzius's engraving Lot's Flight from Sodom (before 1617) after Anthonie van Blocklandt, one of the advising angels shows Lot and his family the way. In another Bible story, Abraham, following the birth of his son Isaac, was said to have banished his concubine Hagar and their son Ishmael after providing them with bread and water (Genesis 21:9–21). In depictions of this scene, such as Jacob Matham's engraving The Dismissal of Hagar (before 1631) after Abraham Bloemaert, Abraham very clearly shows Hagar and Ishmael with his stretched arm that they have to leave. In representations of the sacrifice of Isaac, the angel who is said to have restrained Abraham's hand from killing his son sometimes points at a ram caught in a thicket, as in Caravaggio's painting The Sacrifice of Isaac (circa 1603–1604) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence.

New Testament depictions of the Annunciation often include the angel Gabriel pointing at a dove as symbol of the Holy Spirit, as in Jacob Matham's engraving The Annunciation (before 1631) after Giuseppe Valeriani. In a similar fashion, representations of the Adoration of the Magi sometimes show a Magus pointing at the star of Bethlehem, as in the Cologne School panel painting The Adoration of the Magi (circa 1340) in the Louvre in Paris. In Benoit Audran the Elder's engraving The Flight to Egypt (before 1721) after Nicolas Poussin, an angel (floating or going with them) directs the Holy Family during their flight to Egypt.

John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus Christ, has often been depicted pointing with one hand at a lamb that he is holding in the other, as in Martin Schaffner's wing panel John the Baptist (1521) in the Münster in Ulm, Germany. Sometimes John the Baptist is depicted with the disciples Peter and Andrew, pointing at Christ and thus identifying him Ecce Agnus Dei (Behold the Lamb of God), as in Paolo de'Matteis's painting John the Baptist with Peter and Andrew, Pointing at Jesus (before 1728) in the Certosa di San Martino in Naples, Italy. John the Baptist can also be seen pointing at Christ in representations of the Crucifixion, the most famous example of which may be Matthias Grünewald's Isenheim Altarpiece (1510–1515) in the Musée Unterlinden in Colmar, France. In the center panel, John stands beside the cross and points at the crucified Christ with an abnormally large index finger.

Of course, sometimes a gesture of indication is used to refer to oneself. Matthew points at himself at the moment of his calling, unbelieving and astonished, in Caravaggio's The Calling of Saint Matthew (before 1610) in San Luigi dei Francesi in Rome. In the Bible's parable of the rich man Dives and the diseased beggar Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31), it is usually the final scene that is depicted: Lazarus in paradise and Dives in hell. Sometimes Dives is represented pointing at his tongue in thirst as he regards Lazarus in paradise, as in the Prayer Book of Mary of Geldern manuscript illumination (1415–1425, folio 132v) in Berlin.

Gestures of indication occur frequently in works that portray trials or acts of judgment. During the trial of Christ before the high priest Caiaphas (Matthew 26:57–70), a servant girl is said to have pointed at the apostle Peter and asked him if he was a disciple of Christ. This scene is depicted by Bernardo Strozzi in The Denial of Peter (before 1644), a painting in the Collection Carvalho in Villandry. Since the late Middle Ages, Ecce Homo (behold this man) representations have shown Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator of Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea, gesturing toward Christ, whom he condemned. In Honoré Daumier's Ecce Homo oil painting (before 1879), for example, Pilate points at Christ in a dramatic gesture.

One scene from the acts of Peter has seldom been depicted: when Peter, fleeing from Rome, meets Christ, who is carrying the cross and shows him the way back to town. Annibale Carracci's Domine, quo vadis? (Christ Appearing to Saint Peter on the Appian Way), 1601–1602) in the National Gallery in London depicts this rare scene, Peter's right arm widely stretched.

In Italian painting since the quattrocento, assistant figures called festaiuolo have often been used to call attention to the work's central scene. An angel points at the Christ Child, who lies on the ground adored by Mary, in Filippo Lippi's painting The Virgin Adoring the Christ Child (circa 1465) in the Uffizi Gallery. Similarly, Leonardo da Vinci depicts an angel pointing at John the Baptist as a child, instead of the Christ Child, in The Grotto-Madonna (circa 1483–1485) in the Louvre. In his altarpiece The Burial of the Count of Orgaz (1586) in Santo Tomé in Toledo, Spain, El Greco depicts a boy pointing at the dead count, a device that urges the viewer of the painting to contemplate him.

In about 1519, Albrecht Dürer drew Self-Portrait, Nude, now in the Kunsthalle in Bremen, Germany, which included an inscription: "Where I point with my finger, it hurts." Although reminiscent of Ecce Homo representations, it was presumably made to be sent to an out-of-town physician. Preparatory drawings for the apostles in Dürer's Heller Altarpiece such as The Right Hand of the Hooded Apostle (1509) contain impressive hand studies that show the relevance of the pointing gesture in relation to the spatiality of the composition, as well as the accentuation of indicated persons or objects.

The showing gesture serves an important function in situations of choice or designation. The most prominent examples of this derive from the story of the Judgment of Solomon, when a quarrel between two prostitutes, each claiming to be the mother of a disputed child, is settled before King Solomon. This scene is depicted by Giorgione in The Judgment of Solomon (circa 1506) in the Uffizi Gallery, and by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo in a fresco of the same title (circa 1726–1728) in the Archbishop's Palace in Udine, Italy.

Accusation is another function of the gesture of pointing. In medieval legend, King Mark of Cornwall is said to have sent the knight Tristan to Ireland to bring back the princess Yseult to be his bride. On the way back, Tristan and Yseult fall tragically in love. In the manuscript illumination Roman de Tristan (1401–1450, folio 186) in the Musée Condé in Chantilly, France, the lovers are accused by King Mark of having slept together.

Gestures of accusation have also been portrayed in relation to the early Germanic poem Nibelungenlied (circa 1200). In the poem, Siegfried, a member of the Burgundian court at Worms, is murdered after winning the hand of Kriemhild, King Gunther's sister. Siegfried had previously helped win King Gunther the hand of Brunhilde, an Icelandic queen. Brunhilde, however, displayed an affinity for Siegfried, and circumstances eventually forced her to bid Hagen, Gunther's uncle, to kill Siegfried. The scene in which Kriemhild stands beside the corpse of Siegfried and points at Hagen, accusing him of murder, is depicted in both Julius Schnorr von Carolsfeld's fresco Kriemhild Accuses Hagen of Murder (1846) in the Residenz in Munich, Germany, and Henry Fuseli's drawing of the same title (1805) in the Kunsthau in Zurich, Switzerland.

The nonreligious history paintings of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries offer many examples of gestures of indication. In Greek mythology, Sarpedon, the son of Zeus and Europa, is said to have been killed by the Greek warrior Patroclus during the Trojan War. In Jean-Simon Berthélemy's painting Apollo and Sarpedon (before 1811) in the Musée Didier in Langres, France, Sarpedon's body is carried away by Hypnos (Sleep) and Thanatos (Death), while the god Apollo shows them the way to Lydia (in what is now Turkey). In Roman mythology, Venus, the goddess of love, is said to have brought weapons forged by Vulcan, the god of fire and forge, to the Trojan leader Aeneas to be used in the battle of Latium (in what is now Italy). In Nicolas Poussin's painting Venus Bringing Arms to Aeneas (1639) in the Musée des Beaux-Arts in Rouen, France, Venus gestures toward Vulcan's weapons. In Theodor van Thulden's Croesus Displays His Treasures to Solon (before 1669), an oil painting of yet another Greek mythological scene, Croesus, the rich king of Lydia, displays his treasures to the Athenian philosopher and statesman Solon. Finally, in Théodore Géricault's The Raft of the "Medusa" (1819) in the Louvre, the weary shipwrecked passengers are depicted pointing at a barely visible ship on the horizon.

A gesture of indication can simply be the attitude of presenting someone or something to someone else. In the Bible, Joseph, one of 12 sons of Jacob, was sold into Egyptian slavery by his jealous brothers but soon became an Egyptian official (Genesis 30:22–24; 37; 45). In Ferdinand Bol's painting Joseph Presenting His Father to the Pharaoh (before 1680) in the Gemäldegalerie in Dresden, Germany, Joseph points a stretched hand toward Jacob, presenting his father to the pharaoh. In Michelangelo Presenting the Model of St. Peter to Pope Paul IV (before 1638), Domenico Cresti (Passignano) portrays Michelangelo pointing his index finger at the model of St. Peter in a presentation to Pope Paul IV.

In portrait paintings and portrait prints, the gesture of indication is often used to accentuate the rank, positive attributes, or profession of the portrayed person. In the eighteenth century, Antoine de Favray painted the Grand Master Pinto of Malta in the "grand manner style." In the portrait (before 1791), the Grand Master Pinto points at a king's crown and thus exaggerates his real importance. Similarly, gestures of indication are often used to call attention to vanitas (vanity) symbols. In Jan Muller's engraving after Michiel Janszoon van Miereveld, Johann Neyer of the Order of St. Francis points his index finger at an hourglass.

Another example of a prominent gesture of indication is that of the military general directing his troops, as in Jacques-Louis David's oil painting Napoleon Crosses the Saint-Bernard (before 1825) in the Musée de Versailles in France. This also appears in Antoine-Jean Gros's painting The Battle of the Pyramids (1810), also at the Musée de Versailles.

The madwoman portrayed in Giacomo Balla's painting The Madwoman (1905) in the Donazione alla Galleria d'Arte Moderna in Rome points her index finger and stares out at the viewer of the painting. The mysterious etching The Philosopher (1909) by the German graphic artist Max Klinger, held in the Museum der bildenden Künste in Leipzig, Germany, depicts a standing nude man who points at his own reflection, yet is unable to recognize it.

Propaganda and political posters employ the appellative form of gestures of indication. Probably independently, artists of several countries discovered the emotional effectiveness of the gesture of pointing: the index finger pointed directly at the viewer to stimulate involvement and send a message to the individual. The United States recruiting poster emblazoned with the slogan “I want you for the U.S. Army,” by James Montgomery Flagg (1917), is a famous example. In it, a respectable nineteenth-century Uncle Sam, with the stars of the nation on his hatband, establishes eye contact with, and directly points at, the viewer. Roy Lichtenstein produced the drawing Finger Pointing (1961) with likely knowledge of Flagg’s poster. Lichtenstein’s drawing depicts only a large closed hand with an index finger that points at the viewer.

Artists have incorporated gestures of indication in many different situations. Whether to explain or further a story line, emphasize the central focus of a work, play a part in the composition of a work, highlight an attribute of a subject, or to make reference to an earlier work, gestures of indication provide an important means by which artists might tell a story in visual terms.

See also Arms Raised; Gaze

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

- Euphronius, pelike, circa 500 B.C., St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage Euphronius, calyx krater, circa 500 B.C., Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen

Medieval

- The Fall*, Bernward’s door, bronze bas-relief, 1015, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral
 Cologne School, The Adoration of the Magi, panel painting, circa 1340, Paris, Louvre

Renaissance

- Roman de Tristan*, manuscript illumination, circa 1401–1450, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (fol. 186)
Prayer Book of Mary of Geldern, manuscript illumination, 1415–1425, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen (fol. 132v)
 Masaccio, The Expulsion, fresco, circa 1420–1428, Florence, Italy, Brancacci Chapel
 Lippi, Filippo, The Virgin Adoring the Christ Child, painting, circa 1465, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Leonardo da Vinci, The Grotto-Madonna, circa 1483–1485, Paris, Louvre
 Giorgione, The Judgment of Solomon, circa 1506, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Dürer, Albrecht, The Right Hand of the Hooded Apostle, drawing, 1509, Vienna, Austria, Graphische Sammlung Albertina
 Grünewald, Matthias, Isenheim Altarpiece, center panel, 1510–1515, Clomar, France, Musée Unterlinden
 Dürer, Albrecht, Self-Portrait, Nude, drawing, circa 1519, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Schaffner, Martin, John the Baptist, wing panel, 1521, Ulm, Germany, Münster
 El Greco, The Burial of the Count of Orgaz, painting, 1586, Toledo, Spain, Santo Tomé
 Goltzius, Hendrick, Lot’s Flight from Sodom, engraving, before 1617, after Anthonie van Blocklandt

Seventeenth Century

- Carracci, Annibale, Domine, quo vadis? (Christ Appearing to Saint Peter on the Appian Way), panel, 1601–1602, London, National Gallery
 Caravaggio, The Sacrifice of Isaac, painting, circa 1603–1604, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Caravaggio, The Calling of Saint Matthew, before 1610, Rome, San Luigi di Francesi
 Matham, Jacob, The Dismissal of Hagar, engraving, before 1631, after Abraham Bloemaert
 Matham, Jacob, The Annunciation, engraving, before 1631, after Giuseppe Valeriani
 Cresti, Domenico (Passignano), Michelangelo Presenting the Model of St. Peter to Pope Paul IV, before 1638, Florence, Italy, Casa Buonarrotti
 Poussin, Nicolas, Venus Bringing Arms to Aeneas, painting, 1639, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Strozzi, Bernardo, The Denial of Peter, painting, before 1664, Villandry, Collection Carvalho
 Thulden, Theodor van, Croesus Displays His Treasures to Solon, oil painting, before 1669, private collection
 Rosa, Salvator, Lo Spavento (Fear), oil on canvas, before 1673, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Bol, Ferdinand, Joseph Presenting His Father to the Pharaoh, painting, before 1680, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Eighteenth Century

- Audran, Benoit, the Elder, The Flight to Egypt, engraving, before 1721
 Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, The Judgment of Solomon, fresco, circa 1726–1728, Udine, Italy, Archbishop’s Palace
 Mattei, Paolo de’, John the Baptist with Peter and Andrew, Pointing at Jesus, before 1728, Naples, Italy, Certosa di San Marino
 Favray, Antoine de, Grande Master Pinto, painting, before 1791, Valetta, Malta, Conventual Church of St. John

Nineteenth Century

- Fuseli, Henry, Kriemhild Accuses Hagen of Murder, drawing, 1805, Zurich, Switzerland, Kunsthaus, Graphic Collection
 Gros, Antoine-Jean, The Battle of the Pyramids, painting, 1810, Versailles, France, Musée de Versailles
 Berthélemy, Jean-Simon, Apollo and Sarpedon, painting, before 1811, Langres, France, Musée Didier
 Géricault, Théodore, The Raft of the “Medusa,” oil painting, 1819, Paris, Louvre
 David, Jacques-Louis, Napoleon Crosses the Saint-Bernard, oil painting, before 1825, Versailles, France, Musée de Versailles
 Schnorr von Carolsfeld, Julius, Kriemhild Accuses Hagen of Murder, fresco, 1846, Munich, Germany, Residenz
 Daumier, Honoré, Ecce Homo, oil painting, before 1879, Essen, Germany, Folkwangmuseum

Twentieth Century

- Balla, Giacomo, The Madwoman, painting, 1905, Rome, Donazione alla Galleria d’Arte Moderna
 Klinger, Max, The Philosopher, etching, 1909, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

- Flagg, James Montgomery, I Want You for the U.S. Army, recruiting poster, 1917
 Lichtenstein, Roy, Finger Pointing, drawing, 1961, New York, collection of Kiki Kogelnik

Further Reading

- Brilliant, Richard, Gesture and Rank in Roman Art: The Use of Gestures to Denote Status in Roman Sculpture and Coinage, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1963
 Critchley, Macdonald, The Language of Gesture, London: E. Arnold, 1939; New York: Haskell House, 1971
 Gandelman, Claude, "Le Geste du 'montreur'," in Le Regard dans le texte. Image et écriture du Quattrocento, Paris: Leopard d'or, 1986
 Garnier, François, Grammaire des Gestes, Paris: Leopard d'or, 1989
 Griffin, Jocelyn Crane, Pointing Gestures in Medieval Miniatures: A Study Based on Illustrated Manuscripts of the Terence Comedies (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1991)
 Neumann, Gerhard, Gesten und Gebärden in der Griechischen Kunst, Berlin: Walter De Gruyter, 1965
 Reinach, Salomon, "L'histoire des gestes," Revue Archéologique 20 (1994)
 Revilliod, Alphonse, La geste, l'attitude et l'expression dans les arts plastiques, Geneva, Switzerland: La Classe des Beaux-Arts, 1904
 Smart, Alastair, "Dramatic Gesture and Expression in the Age of Hogarth and Reynolds," Apollo 82 (1965)
 Strehle, Hermann, Mienen, Gesten und Gebärden, Munich, Germany: Reinhardt, 1974
 Wittkower, Rudolf, "El Greco's Language of Gestures," Art News 56 (1957)

PREGNANCY

Beth Gersh-Nešic

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Pregnancy:

FERTILITY GODDESSES

SCIENTIFIC OBSERVATION

IMPREGNATION: ANNUNCIATION TO THE VIRGIN

IMPREGNATION: DANAË

IMPREGNATION: LEDA

MATERNITY

PORTRAITURE

POVERTY

SORROW

SHAME

Venus of Willendorf, circa 25,000–15,000 B.C., Paleolithic sculpture, Vienna, Austria, Naturhistorisches Museum. (Courtesy of the Naturhistorisches Museum, Vienna, Austria)

Perhaps the oldest extant works in art history are representations of a pregnant woman. With bulbous breasts and swollen belly, Paleolithic fertility goddesses, such as the Venus of Willendorf, testify to a time when the portrayal of pregnancy inspired reverence and hope. However, pregnancy in art does not always signify fertility and optimism. In some contexts, it is the premise for sorrow or shame. This essay examines the iconography of fertility, medieval and Renaissance scientific illustrations of embryos, impregnation, maternity, portraits of pregnant women, and pregnancy in scenes of poverty, sorrow, and shame.

Fertility

Humans first worshiped mother-goddesses who would intercede to bring forth bounty from the earth. Fashioned during the Paleolithic and Neolithic periods, statuettes of fertility goddesses had round pregnant bellies, small heads, and short pointed legs. They were also very small: The Austrian Venus of Willendorf (circa 25,000–15,000 B.C.) and the Romanian Fertility Goddess of Cernavoda (circa 5,000 B.C.) are only 4.75 inches and 6.25 inches high, respectively. It is believed that worshippers would push the pointed legs into the earth to erect a temporary shrine for this itinerant culture.

The Neolithic Fertility Goddess (circa 6000 B.C.) of Çatal Hüyük in Anatolia, Turkey, sits on a birthing chair. Enthroned, she becomes a sign of fertility and a site of power. In early matriarchal societies, the queen would sit on the lap of the enthroned mother-goddess to symbolize her union with the goddess's power. Enthronement as a sign of power continues through the history of art in ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Western Europe and among the Ashanti in West Africa (Sjöö and Mor, pp. 72–73).

Sacred mountains or mounds were considered sites of enthronement (“sitting” on the earth) and fertility. The earth was the divine body of the Mother-Goddess (Sjöö and Mor, p. 73), and the sacred mountain or mound was the primordial pregnant belly from which sprang the water of chaos, “the world egg born from the primordial sea of night” (Sjöö and Mor, p. 104).

Silbury Hill at Wiltshire Downs in southwestern England is an example of a sacred mountain. More than 4,500 years old, it is 130 feet high and 520 feet in diameter. Silbury Hill is one of more than 1,500 sites that have an enclosure at the top and earthen banks arranged in circles or coiled in a spiral around its circumference. The circles or spirals may have been sacred mazes (Sjöö and Mor, p. 104).

The sacred maze gave rise to the labyrinth as a metaphor for the womb. Among the Hopi Indians of the southwestern

United States, the Minoans of ancient Crete, and the prehistoric peoples of Ireland, the symbol of the labyrinth as earth-womb is similar. An eighth-century B.C. Etruscan bronze amulet shows a labyrinth of three concentric circles, each incomplete at one end so that they form a passageway, like the uterus opening into the birth canal. A long shaft piercing through the three circles ends in a cruciform with a rounded “head” that fills the center of the womb. The cruciform seems to be the fetus. This amulet may have been used to protect women during labor and delivery.

In ancient Egypt, the goddess Ta-Urt/Taweret/Thoeris was the protectress of women in childbirth. She had the body of a pregnant hippopotamus and carried an ankh to symbolize life. In an ivory amuletic wand from the Middle Kingdom (circa 2000 B.C.), Ta-Urt stands with Bes, a dwarf-deity with leonine features; he is the helper of women in childbirth. She also stands with Thith, scribe to the gods, and a number of snakes, lions, and other animals. Again, this object may have been used to protect women during childbirth.

Reminiscent of prehistoric sacred mounds is Diego Rivera's mural painting El Cárcamo for the Lerma Water Supply System in Chapultepec, Mexico. Commissioned in 1951, its theme is “Water, Origin of Life on Earth,” and it features the workers, architects, and contractors who made this hydrodynamic facility possible. Outside the building is a sculptured pool with the rain lord and master spirit Tlaloc lying outstretched on the bottom. Inside the building on the chamber's walls and floor a giant mural depicts a fertile body of water teeming with fish, crustaceans, protozoa, and fossils. Giant hands cradle the gushing flow, and two nude people—a pregnant Mongoloid woman (whose unborn child in utero is painted on her abdomen) and a Negroid man—stand half submerged in the depicted water. They represent the roots of Mexico's population and are seen rooted in the life that fills the water's underworld. Thus, the fertility of the water and that of their bodies intermingle, each enriching the other.

Scientific Illustrations

The first drawing of an actual fetus in the womb appears in Leonardo da Vinci's notebooks (circa 1510–1512). Previously and subsequently, manuals on midwifery provided copies of illustrations found in a book written in the sixth century by Moschion. It was a translation of Soranus of Ephesus's Gynaecia (On Gynecology) from the early second century A.D. The earliest extant copy of the Moschion manuscript is a ninth-century codex, now in the Bibliothèque Royale in Brussels, Belgium. This ninth-century copy and subsequent copies from the thirteenth through the sixteenth century show a series of flasklike forms with cherubic bodies representing the fetus in utero. Moschion's influence can be clearly seen in Eucharius Rösslin's book on midwifery Rosengarten (1513), Scipione Mercurio's La Comare (1595), and Andrian Spiegel's De Formato foetu (1626), among many others. In the eighteenth century, William Hunter departed from copies of Moschion's illustrations by basing his drawings on direct observation. His book The Anatomy of the Human Gravid Uterus was published in 1774, 350 years after Leonardo sketched from life in his notebooks.

Impregnation

The illustrations in medieval and Renaissance books on embryology show that Aristotle's explanation for conception in On the Generation of Animals (fourth century B.C.) remained the main source of information among theologians, medical practitioners, and the general public. According to Aristotle, the woman provided "Matter" with her menstrual blood in her womb and the man provided "Form" in his semen. The "Form" transformed woman's "Matter" into a human being, Aristotle explained, like rennet transformed milk into cheese.

Art historian Susan Koslow, in her essay on Rogier van der Weyden's Columba Annunciation, discussed the influence of Aristotelian ideas on contemporary images of the Annunciation in early Netherlandish art and concluded that the "curtain-sack"—the balled-up swag hanging from the canopy of the bed, which resembles the cheese-maker's cloth wrapped around the finished product—seems to describe Aristotle's notion that conception was a kind of cheese-making process. Koslow supported her thesis by pointing out that the Holy Ghost in the form of a hovering white bird (not necessarily a dove) or homunculus appears near the curtain-sack, thus signifying the moment of impregnation, when the Word was made flesh and "Matter" united with "Form."

Whereas Koslow's article decodes fifteenth-century Netherlandish Annunciations, Michael Baxandall decodes fifteenth-century Italian Annunciations in his book Painting and Experience in Fifteenth Century Italy (pp. 48–56). According to Baxandall, the priest and the painter interpreted the Gospels for each other. For example, in Fra Roberto Caracciolo da Lecce's sermons on the Annunciation, he discussed three principal mysteries: the Angelic Mission, the Angelic Salutation, and the Angelic Colloquy. The Angelic Colloquy was the exchange between the archangel Gabriel and the Virgin Mary. Caracciolo described five moments that occurred during their conversation that account for the different expressions of the Virgin in fifteenth-century Italian Annunciations. Baxandall describes these moments with the following examples: Conturbatio (Disquiet—when the angel Gabriel first appears suddenly, as in Annunciation in Florence by Fra Filippo Lippi); Cogitatio (Reflection—the Virgin understands the meaning of his presence, as in Annunciation by the Master of the Barberini Panels); Interrogatio (Inquiry—the Virgin asks why she has been chosen, as in Annunciation by Alesso Baldovinetti); Humiliatio (Submission—the Virgin accepts her fate, as in Annunciation in Florence by Fra Angelico and Virgin Annunciate by Antonello da Messina); and Meritatio (Merit—the Virgin meditates on the divinity of her condition).

Paralleling the impregnation of a mortal virgin by a divine source, the story of Danaë was viewed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as a prefiguration of the Annunciation. Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, was shut away in an underground bronze chamber when her father learned from the oracle of Delphi that his daughter would give birth to a son who would kill him. The room had one opening, and through this opening Zeus, king of the gods, came to Danaë in a shower of golden rain (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 4:611). The seduction produced Perseus, who accidentally slew Acrisius with a discus during athletic games in Greece.

Paintings from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries demonstrate the prefiguration of the Annunciation through their iconography: Danaë (the virgin), a putto (the angel), and the shower of golden rain (the divine source of impregnation). Correggio's nude Danaë lies on her bed as one putto lifts her cover to facilitate the entry of a shimmering glow (paralleling Gabriel's facilitation of the union between the Virgin and the Holy Ghost). Two other putti at the side of Danaë's bed dip their arrows in a love potion (reminding us that this extraordinary event belongs to pagan mythology). Titian's nude Danaë lies on her bed, resting her head against the pillows as she stares at a golden cloud hovering above. In the Naples version, a lively little putto strides in, looking over his right shoulder at the golden mist; in the Prado version, an old woman chaperon lifts her apron as the golden shower comes drifting in. Francesco Primaticcio and Rembrandt van Rijn included the maidservant and the putti: Primaticcio's maidservant and putto play together while the cloud hovers above the nude virgin sitting upright in bed, and Rembrandt's maidservant sweeps aside the curtains of the bed to let in a golden mist while a putto flies over the head of the enchanted nude Danaë. The mood of these paintings is quietly erotic: an occasion to show off young female flesh placed in a tantalizing pose of expectation and wonder. Such scenes call forth associations with Venus rather than the Virgin, for they portray Danaë as an odalisque (passive and inviting) whose womanly beauty, availability, and innocence constitute most of her charm.

Similarly, the mortal Leda, wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta, is impregnated by Zeus, who came to her as a swan. In paintings by Michelangelo, Correggio, and André Lhote, this supernatural event provided the opportunity to depict sexual intercourse, a far cry from Leonardo's earlier Leda, which depicts her standing under the shelter of the swan's wing gazing lovingly at her four children, who have just hatched from two large eggs. Michelangelo's Leda was painted in 1529 for Alfonso d'Este to reciprocate his hospitality (Panofsky, p. 146).

Maternity

During the Hellenic and Hellenistic periods, small statues of women were popular images. Among them are depictions of pregnant women. In ancient Greece, women were valued as breeders of healthy children, preferably sons. Funerary stelae and vases commemorate women who died in childbirth, such as the Attic lekythos with the scene of a midwife holding the limp body of a dead pregnant mother while the husband looks on in grief.

The Christian era continued the veneration of the pregnant woman, influenced by the cult of the Virgin Mary (Warner, pp. 177–205; Kristeva, “Stabat Mater”). However, unlike previous mother figures, the Virgin’s pregnancy connotes not fertility but self-sacrifice—the giving of oneself (and one’s most prized possession, virginity) for the greater good. Thus, statues of the pregnant Virgin become devotional images and paradigms of the ideal woman.

Three sculptures from Europe show the pregnant Virgin alone: a fifteenth-century Spanish sculpture of a standing figure with her right hand raised and left hand resting on her rounded abdomen, a fifteenth-century Bohemian seated figure with her right hand over her gravid stomach and her left hand resting on her left knee; and a seventeenth-century Spanish standing figure whose abdomen remains open to reveal the Holy Child. These figures were probably appealed to by expectant mothers, as was Piero della Francesca’s fresco Madonna del Parto, where the pregnancy protrudes through a vaginally shaped opening in her robe, an indication of her “supreme femininity” (Lavin, p. 104).

The pregnant Virgin also appears in scenes of her life awaiting the Nativity. In a fourteenth-century French ivory carving, Mary and Joseph sit under an elaborate arch, Joseph’s outstretched hand touching the rounded stomach of his wife; in a fourteenth-century apse fresco in San Abondio Basilica in Como, Italy, a very pregnant Virgin lumbers along on the back of a donkey heading for Bethlehem.

The Visitation, the meeting between the newly pregnant Virgin and her six-months-pregnant cousin, Elizabeth (who carries St. John the Baptist), was often included in scenes of the life of Jesus Christ or the Virgin Mary. In early Byzantine versions from the fifth and sixth centuries, tiny children in mandorla-shaped uteri were placed on the mothers’ abdomens, like a window to their wombs; in sculpture, these exposed wombs were called platytera (Hall, p. 337). The exposed womb appeared in Europe during the Middle Ages (especially in Germany). It resembled the embryos illustrated in contemporary copies of Moschion’s translation of Soranus’s On Gynecology. Examples of these Visitation scenes with exposed wombs include a painting by the Master of the Cologne School (circa 1410); a fresco in St. Georg zu Rhäzüns in Graubünden, Switzerland (1375); an initial in a Cistercian gradual (circa 1340); and a miniature from the Pontificale di Würzburg in Germany (circa 1507). The in utero infant Jesus appears again about 250 years later in Gottfried Bernhard Goz’s fresco Maria, die Mutter der schönen Liebe (circa 1750), although here the Christ Child seems to be a sunburst applied to a Virgin floating in majesty. Around 1900, Margaret MacDonald MacKintosh painted an art nouveau version of The Visitation wherein the two mothers overlap and intertwine at the stomach, sharing one womb that holds one child.

The Child in utero rarely appeared outside Germany. More typically, the Visitation simply showed the two women greeting each other, as depicted on the west portal of Reims Cathedral (circa 1225–1245), where jamb figures of the Virgin and Elizabeth turn toward each other. In the sixteenth century, the Visitation becomes a more emotional event, and the pregnancies become quite full. Jacopo da Pontormo and Albrecht Dürer show the expectant mothers embracing, whereas Giulio Romano has Elizabeth taking hold of the Virgin’s right hand while embracing her with her left arm.

References to maternity also appear in secular art, as in Jan van Eyck’s Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), in which the “curtain-sack” hangs from the canopy of the bed and a carving of St. Margaret of Antioch (patron saint of childbirth) appears in the center background. These symbols either promise fertility in the marriage or announce the pregnancy of the bride. Jan Vermeer’s paintings Woman in Blue Reading a Letter and Woman Holding a Balance (both circa 1660–1665) seem to incorporate pregnancy into a vanitas theme, representing life surrounded by material goods and subject to the vicissitudes of fate. In his book on Vermeer, John Nash claims that the reader in blue “represents the truth that though her love is physical and fruitful its fundamental reality is spiritual” (Nash, p. 92) and that the woman with a balance may represent the weighing of one’s soul because she stands before a picture of the Last Judgment (Nash, p. 98).

Such sober and serene images of pregnant women contrast with Samuel van Hoogstraten’s The Sick Lady from the late seventeenth century, wherein a doctor performs a uroscopy before the pale and wan female patient. The humor of detecting pregnancy can also be found in the early nineteenth-century satiric print Time the Best Doctor, in which four doctors try to explain the cause of a female patient’s swollen stomach. Some years later, Honoré Daumier ridiculed the pregnant woman’s hearty appetite in his lithograph Une envie de femme grosse (1840). Here, a pregnant bourgeois wife tries to take a bite out of the butcher’s arm while he carries a tray full of meat. Meanwhile, her husband grabs her arm and pulls her back, exhibiting his annoyance and exercising the manly duty of controlling his wife.

Far from finding humor in the subject of pregnancy, Gustav Klimt selected the pregnant woman as a symbol of hope for his 1903 painting of that title. This young expectant mother, with flaming red hair and ghostly white skin, stands before specters of death and decadence, representing the “truism,” art historian Alessandra Comini believes, “that life and death are equally present in the great continuum of biological renewal” (p. 15).

In a happier vein is Marc Chagall’s The Pregnant Woman (1912–1913), a childlike description of maternity wherein the “window to the womb” returns to painting about a decade after Margaret MacDonald MacKintosh depicted it in her Visitation. Otto Dix’s playful postcubist pregnant woman follows in 1920 with the display of a colorful nude body composed of disks that look like bubbles converging into an S-curve. The mother rides a diminutive cow, her face aglow with stars in her eyes and a star in her womb. This fanciful image of pregnancy may be another symbol of hope in response to the horrors of World War I.

Faith Wilding wove the Womb Room for Womanhouse, a project created by the Feminist Art Program at the California Institute of the Arts in 1972. Comprised of a web vault that represents “everybody’s first room” (Raven, p. 443), this piece produces an atmosphere of comfort and enclosure while it asserts the language of feminist rhetoric in Wilding’s choice of medium and execution, something reminiscent of crocheting and macramé, which are usually considered women’s crafts.

In Japan, an artist painted five upper bodies and five lower bodies of nude pregnant women tumbling through the air, overlapping one another to form nine different bodies in nine different positions with nine different wombs—all on a novelty fan (undated). In an undated Japanese print (perhaps from the same era), several pregnant women, nude from the waist up, display the different stages of fetal development on their exposed wombs.

Portraits

Portraits of pregnant women also vary in their spirit of presentation. Raphael’s La Gravida (1505–1507) is a very plain woman in fine Renaissance clothes who puts her left hand on her belly and clasps her gloves in her right hand, which rests on a book (perhaps the Bible). The gloves in her hand symbolize trust and openness. She looks at the spectator with an implacable stare, revealing nothing, as if her pregnancy should speak for itself.

Thomas Couture portrayed his pregnant wife Marie-Héloïse Servent walking toward the open gate of a garden in his painting La Lecture (1860). Lost in a book as she walks, the pregnant woman is enfolded in a large shawl that hides the contours of her body. The iconography refers to approaching a change and the prospect of entering another phase of one’s life.

Berthe Morisot, too, suppressed the look of pregnancy in the portraits of her sister that she painted during Edmé’s two confinements: Madame Morisot and Her Daughter Madame Pontillon (1869–1870), Interior (1871), Portrait of Madame Pontillon (1871), and Madame Pontillon and Her Daughter, Jeanne (1871). Both Couture and Morisot reflect the Victorian preference for hiding the look of pregnancy from public view.

Contrary to this Victorian attitude, two German artists, Lovis Corinth and Paula Modersohn-Becker, celebrate the physicality of pregnancy in portraits that clearly highlight the condition. Corinth painted a portrait of his wife, Charlotte Berend-Corinth, while she was in her ninth month. Dated October 8, 1904, in the upper right-hand corner, Im Seidenmantel (In a Silk Coat) shows off Frau Corinth’s full pregnant stomach in profile. She faces the viewer with a serene expression and holds a small handbag at her side as if she is about to go out. Their son Thomas was born on October 13, 1904.

Paula Modersohn-Becker painted a self-portrait in which she envisioned her own pregnancy before she had even conceived. A three-quarter length nude with amber necklace, she encircles her rounded stomach with her two hands and seems to peer into a mirror. Self-Portrait on Her Sixth Wedding Anniversary (1906) marked her fifth wedding anniversary. She married Felix Modersohn on May 25, 1901. She became pregnant in early 1907, gave birth to a daughter on November 2 of that year, and died three weeks later from an embolism.

Alice Neel’s portraits of pregnant women are less sentimental. In an early work from 1930, she drew a young couple sleeping on a train, the wife quite pregnant. Later she painted Pregnant Maria (1964) and Pregnant Woman (1971), in which she focuses on frank sexuality and womanly pride, as these two nude women lie recumbent, gazing directly at the viewer as in Édouard Manet’s Olympia. Neel’s Margaret Evans Pregnant (1978) lacks the confidence exuding from the earlier two. Also nude, Margaret sits upright, grasping the sides of an armless yellow stuffed chair, her eyes wide and her mouth and chin set firmly. Less graceful with her pale skin and a sunburn on her neck and shoulders, she seems vulnerable and ill at ease as an expectant mother.

Poverty

While the blessings of fertility and maternity inspired many artists in many cultures, the burden of caring for too many children concerned others. Alphonse Levy dramatized this situation in his 1880 lithograph Ça, c’est pour les riches, which depicts a poor pregnant woman standing outside a bakery shop with a baby in her arms and a toddler at her side, eyeing the cakes and chocolates in the window. Here, pregnancy augments a pictorial commentary about poverty and class consciousness with the issue of birth control, a topic that gained attention with urbanization and its attendant problems.

Käthe Kollwitz’s etching Woman with Folded Hands (Pregnant Woman) (1898) focuses on a pregnant woman whose simple clothes and haunting eyes convey the anxiety, helplessness, and resignation of poor pregnant women among the peasants and working class. Kollwitz’s “At the Doctor’s” from Scenes of Poverty (1908–1909) shows a pregnant woman knocking on the door of her physician, her downcast face in shadow, her large powerful hands strengthened by hard work, and her body slightly bent with the physical and psychological strain of bringing a new life into a poor family. Compounding the hardship of pregnancy and poverty, Kollwitz added the burden of loss in a woodcut entitled The Widow I (1922–1923), which portrays a young pregnant woman shrouded in black, her large hands enfolding her chest above a swelling stomach and her head turned to the right and resting on her shoulder. She is lost in her pain, lonely, and desperately in need of solace. With her 1924 poster Down with the Abortion Paragraph! Kollwitz added her voice to the fight for birth control. Reminiscent of Levy’s lithograph, it also depicts a pregnant woman with an infant in her arms and a toddler at her side holding her hand. The exhausted face of the mother, her eyes sunken into two black hollows, becomes a poignant plea to relieve women who are trapped by their biological and economic circumstances.

Similarly, in his painting The Soup (1903), Pablo Picasso portrays a poverty-stricken pregnant woman who wearily offers her small daughter a bowl of piping-hot soup. Bent over with eyes closed and Madonnaesque in her draped mantel, this mother reflects the continued influence of the pregnant Virgin as the symbol of humility and self-sacrifice.

Sorrow

In his book La Femme, French historian Jules Michelet wrote, "Happy the man who liberates a woman, who frees her from the physical frailty to which Nature condemns her, from the weakness which is her lot in her loneliness, from so many chains, and miseries" (translated in Seznec, p. 132). These words surely influenced Vincent van Gogh while he composed Sorrow (1882), a drawing of a seated nude pregnant woman folded in on herself, hiding her head in her arms to show her loneliness and suffering. Clasina (Sien) Maria Hoornik, who posed for this drawing, was van Gogh's mistress and had been abandoned by the man who had made her pregnant.

In the first version of Sorrow, given to his brother Theo, the figure appears with the word Sorrow written in English in the lower right-hand corner. Two other drawings were made at the same time by pressing down on three sheets of paper. Of those two drawings, one was embellished with landscape elements and a quote from Michelet's La Femme: "Comment se fait-il qu'il y ait sur la terre une femme seule—délaissée. Michelet" (How is it that on earth there can be a woman alone—and forsaken. Michelet). With this subsequent version we can ascertain van Gogh's state of mind as he identified Sien with Michelet's everywoman.

Pablo Picasso's The Embrace (1903) describes the sadness of two lovers affected by an untimely pregnancy. With bodies entwined and heads resting on each other's shoulders, they seek mutual support and comfort for a problem they both must share. Their nudity obviates their socioeconomic identities and directs attention to the sexuality of pregnancy, his penis resting on her large belly. Three preparatory sketches executed in January 1903 inform us about the implicit narrative for The Embrace: Man Kneeling at a Woman's Feet, wherein a nude pregnant woman stands and a nude man kneels, reaching toward her feet pleading for forgiveness; The Surprise, wherein a nude man stands with raised hands in rejection while a nude pregnant woman clings to him desperately; and The Reconciliation, wherein a nude pregnant woman walks toward her solicitous lover, her face buried in her hands, weeping. In these sketches, Picasso seems to have worked out his meditation on the threat of an unwanted pregnancy, and at the age of 22 it seems likely that he or a close friend had been involved with this sort of situation. Mary Matthews Gedo suggests that these sketches may "relate to Picasso's guilt and ambivalence about his sexual desires and activities" (Gedo, p. 52).

Untimely pregnancy may be the subject again in Picasso's little-known painting of Marie-Thérèse Walter titled Figure (dated April 15, 1936). The woman, Picasso's lover, was pregnant at this time. Here, two yellow ovals form a face, and one pale blue oval forms the round belly. In a surreal cubist manner, the anxious face seems divided between happiness and fear while the third oval, like a robin's egg, promises life—perhaps hope eternal. The colors in this work certainly appear gay, if not celebratory, although the eyes again betray Picasso's ambivalence about fatherhood.

Less than 15 years later, Picasso's stiff Pregnant Woman and awkwardly skinny She-Goat Great with Kid (two sculptures from 1950) seem to represent another kind of sadness brought about by pregnancy. According to Françoise Gilot, Picasso's lover during the late 1940s and early 1950s, Picasso wanted more children after the births of Claude (May 15, 1947) and Paloma (April 19, 1949) but was disappointed that Gilot was too ill at the time to consider it (Gilot and Lake, p. 320). Mary Matthews Gedo views Pregnant Woman, She-Goat Great with Kid, and Baboon with Young (1951) as evidence of Picasso's jealousy and anger, Gilot having become so caught up in her role as mother that she had little time to devote exclusively to Picasso. Gedo proposes that the sculptures may be his "efforts to master deep disturbance and ambivalence" (Gedo, p. 212).

Sadness brought about by pregnancy also appears in Judy Chicago's Birth Project (1980–1985), a collection of works that celebrates the personal, political, and mythological significance of childbirth. Having talked to experienced and new mothers, Chicago focused her vision on their anxiety and sadness. In Smocked Figure (1984), the artist drew an outline of a pregnant woman in profile with the hands covering the face to show weeping and her dress clinging to her body, as if it were a metaphor for her confining condition. Mary Ewanoski, who embroidered Smocked Figure, said it reminded her of the time her mother cried when she learned she was pregnant for the fifth time (Chicago, p. 73). In another series of five pregnant figures, Chicago depicted mothers worrying about their unborn babies: "One is staring at her bulging stomach in dismay; the next gazes at the milk pouring from her breasts; the third sees a monster growing in her womb; and the last figure ponders with horror the miscarriage that is carrying away the child she wants to bear" (Chicago, p. 78). The fifth figure from this series is a pregnant woman, swaddled like a mummy, and a newborn child—"a metaphor for the containment of the self and the ego that childbearing requires" (Chicago, p. 80). Chicago also created birth garments that she hoped would "speak of power and imprisonment simultaneously" (Chicago, p. 122).

From Zaire, a father from the Keenge in the northeastern Kuba kingdom carved a sculpture of his daughter who died in childbirth. The sculpture follows Kuba artistic traditions, with only the pregnancy as a mark of identification (Vansina, p. 112). In another work from Kuba country, a standing pregnant woman seems to have a sad expression, which art historian Jan Vansina relates to the sadness of womanhood, the result of being taken from one's family to live among strangers (Vansina, p. 205).

Shame

Pregnancy also signifies the loss of virginity, sometimes a shameful revelation for a young, unmarried woman. For Callisto, a nymph and one of the attendants of Artemis (Diana), goddess of childbirth and wild animals, pregnancy was the result of a rape. She had been duped by Zeus (Jupiter), king of the gods, who approached her disguised as Artemis and then defiled her while ignoring her protests. Some months later, while Artemis and her nymphs were bathing in a stream, the other nymphs tore off Callisto's clothes to reveal her pregnancy to Artemis. According to Ovid, Artemis immediately banished Callisto from her retinue, and Callisto was forced to wander. After she gave birth to her son, Arcas, the jealous Hera (Juno), wife of Zeus, transformed Callisto into a bear, thus depriving her of motherhood. When Arcas grew up, he and a hunting party found his mother. Callisto recognized her son and approached. Arcas raised his spear to kill the menacing bear, but Zeus stayed his hand and transformed the mother and son into the constellations Ursa Major and Arctophalax. Incensed by this honor, Hera asked the river god Oceanus and his wife, the sea goddess Tethys, to prevent the two constellations from resting in their cool water. Thus, these constellations never fall below the horizon (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 2:407–461).

In two woodcuts from the sixteenth century and paintings by Annibale Carracci, Titian, Jan Saenredam, Peter Paul Rubens, and Rembrandt, the Callisto tale is reduced to the revelation of her pregnancy and Artemis's angry response. Although this moment dramatizes Callisto's humiliation and shame, in the hands of these male artists, the plethora of female nudes brings an erotic element to a moralistic subject.

During the medieval and Renaissance periods, interpreters of Ovid ignored Callisto's rape and decided that she willingly succumbed to Zeus's advances (Wall, p. 28). The significance of the story became her misfortune, which parallels the story of Actaeon, who accidentally discovered the bathing Artemis, was turned into a stag by the goddess and was then devoured by his own dogs. Titian and Rembrandt made this parallel clear: Titian painted pendants of the stories, and Rembrandt painted both stories in one work. Their focus portrays Callisto as a victim, and her story becomes allegorical, with Artemis the personification of fortune.

The shame of lost virginity and illegitimacy is given a much more straightforward treatment in Godfried Schalcken's La consultation indiscrete (1680–1685) and its pendant La remonstration inutile (1685–1690). In the former, a young woman stands behind her father and a doctor who examines a flask of urine in which a tiny fetus floats. The daughter holds a kerchief to her closed, tearful eyes. Her father sneers at his daughter in disdain. In the latter, a young woman sits next to a table with her hand on an elaborate box. The lid of the box is slightly ajar, and the head of a bird emerges; the bird is about to fly away, symbolizing her lost virtue. An older man (presumably her father) stands before the young woman lecturing her in vain. The two paintings inform each other, and it appears that the spectator should sympathize with the frail young women (as one should sympathize with the victimized Callisto) but still agree with the condemnation of the older men. Thus, pregnancy in art infers a wide range of meanings and provokes a wide range of sentiments, from reverence to sadness to censure.

See also Annunciation; Birth/Childbirth; Visiting/Visitation

Selected Works of Art

Fertility Goddesses

Venus of Willendorf, Paleolithic sculpture, circa 25,000–15,000 B.C., Vienna, Austria, Museum of Natural History

Fertility Goddess, Neolithic sculpture, circa 6000 B.C., from Shrine A. H. 1, Çatal Hüyük, Turkey, now in Ankara, Turkey, Archeological Museum

Fertility Goddess, Neolithic sculpture, circa 5000 B.C., originally from Cernavoda, Romania, now in Bucharest, Romania, National Museum

Silbury Hill, Wiltshire Downs, southwestern England

Egyptian amuletic wand, ivory, circa 2000 B.C., London, British Museum

Foetus in Utero, Etruscan amulet, eighth century B.C., Zurich, Switzerland, Sammlung Grünwald

Rivera, Diego, El Cárcamo: El Agua Origen de la vida en la tierra, mural painting, 1951, Chapultepec, Mexico, Cámara de Distribución del Agua del Lerma

Scientific Observation

Positions of the Fetus in Utero, manuscript, ninth century, copy of sixth-century Moschion manuscript (translation of Soranus of Ephesus, On Gynecology, first century A.D.), Brussels, Belgium, Bibliothèque Royale

Positions of the Fetus in Utero, Moschion manuscript, thirteenth century, Munich, Germany, Universitätsbibliothek

Positions of the Fetus in Utero, Moschion manuscript, thirteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, 1400, drawing, Leipzig, Germany, Universitätsbibliothek

Positions of the Fetus in Utero, Moschion manuscript, fifteenth century, Erlangen, Germany, Universitätsbibliothek

Leonardo da Vinci, Fetus in Utero, drawing in notebooks, circa 1510–1512, Windsor, England, Windsor Castle

Rösslin, Eucharius, Positions of the Foetus in Utero, from Rosengarten, 1513

Vogtherr, Heinrich, Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, from Tabula foeminae membra demonstrans, 1539, Strasbourg, France

Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, in Propleumata Aristotelis, 1543, Strasbourg, France

Ryff, Walter Hermann, Anatomy of a Woman, from Description anatomiques de toutes les parties du corps humain

Estienne, Charles, Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, from De dissectione partium corporis humani libri tres, 1545, Paris

Dryander, Johannes, Abnormal Positions of the Foetus in Utero, from Artzenei Spiegel, 1547, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany

Rueff, Jacob, Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, from Du conceptu et generatione hominis, 1580, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany

Mercurio, Scipione, Positions of the Foetus in Utero, from La Comare, 1595

Spiegel, Andrian, Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, from De formato foetu, 1626, Padua, Italy

Berrettino, Petro, Anatomy of a Pregnant Woman, from Tabulae anatomicae, 1741, Rome
Stages of the Foetus in Utero, sculpture, mid-eighteenth century, Bologna, Italy, University of Bologna, Teatro Anatomico
 Hunter, William, The Anatomy of the Human Gravid Uterus, 1774, Birmingham, England

Impregnation: Annunciation to the Virgin

Lippi, Filippo, Annunciation in Florence, painting, 1440–1460, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo
 Angelico, Fra, Annunciation in Florence, fresco, 1440–1460, Florence, Italy, Museo di San Marco
 Christus, Petrus, Annunciation, altar wings, panel from Annunciation and Nativity and Last Judgment, 1452, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Gemäldegalerie, Staatliche Museen
 Weyden, Rogier van der, The Annunciation, panel from The Columba Triptych, 1460–1462, Munich, Germany, Pinakothek
 Bouts, Dirck, Annunciation, painting, mid-fifteenth century, Los Angeles, California, J. Paul Getty Museum
 Master of the Barberini Panels, Annunciation, painting, fifteenth century, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Baldovinetti, Alesso, Annunciation, painting, fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Antonello da Messina, Virgin Annunciate, painting, circa 1473, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Impregnation: Danaë

Correggio, Danaë, painting, 1531, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Titian, Danaë, painting, circa 1554, Naples, Italy, Galleria Nazionale di Capodimonte Titian, Danaë, painting, 1554, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Primaticcio (after), Danaë, tapestry, sixteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Danaë, painting, 1636, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Impregnation: Leda

Leda, drawing after classical relief, Veste Coburg, Germany, Kunstsammlungen (MS. HZ II, Codex Coburgensis)
 Leonardo da Vinci (after), Leda and the Swan, painting, 1506, Rome, Spiridon Collection
 Rosso Fiorentino (after Michelangelo), Leda, painting, 1529, London, National Gallery
 Correggio, Leda and the Swan, painting, 1530–1532, Berlin, Gemäldegalerie, Staatliche Museen
 Lhote, André, Leda and the Swan, painting, 1934, Paris, Stiebal Collection

Maternity

Death of a Woman in Childbirth, Attic gravestone, sixth–fourth century B.C., originally from Oropus, Greece, now in Athens, Greece, National Archaeological Museum

Pregnancy with Abdominal Binder, terra-cotta statue, fifth century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Archaeological Museum
Woman Dying of Childbirth, Attic lekythos, fourth century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Archaeological Museum
Pregnant Woman, Hellenistic statue, second century B.C., Izmir, Turkey, Gulf of Smyrna Visitation, sculpture, circa 1225–1245, Reims, France, Cathedral
Saint Joseph and the Virgin, French ivory carving, fourteenth century, Paris, Musée de Cluny
Mary on the Road to Bethlehem, fresco, fourteenth century, Como, Italy, San Abondio Basilica, Apse
The Visitation, initial in Cistercian gradual, from Wonnenthal Cloister, circa 1340, Karlsruhe, Germany, Badische Landesbibliothek
The Visitation, fresco, circa 1375, Grädunden, Switzerland, St. Georg zu Rhäzüns
 Piero della Francesca, Madonna del Parto, painting, fifteenth century, Arezzo, Italy, Chapel of Monterchi
 Master of the Cologne School, Mary and Elizabeth: The Visitation, circa 1410, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Aaetsbisschoppelijk Museum
Die Schwangerschaft der Heiligen Maria, Bohemian sculpture, circa 1430, Prague, Czech Republic, National Gallery
 Eyck, Jan van, Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), 1434, London, National Gallery
 School of Amiens, The Expectant Madonna with Saint Joseph, oil on panel, circa 1437, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
The Pregnant Mary, Spanish sculpture, circa 1450, Santiago de Compostela, Spain, Diocese Museum
 Dürer, Albrecht, The Visitation, woodcut from The Life of the Virgin, circa 1500–1505
 Giulio Romano, The Visitation, painting, sixteenth century, Madrid, Spain, Museum of Madrid
The Visitation, German miniature, circa 1507, from Pontificale di Würzburg, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo
 Pontormo, Jacopo da, The Visitation, circa 1530, Camignano, Italy, Parish Church
The Virgin, Spanish sculpture, seventeenth century, Amiens, France, Bibliothèque Municipale
 Vermeer, Jan, Woman Holding a Balance, circa 1660, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Vermeer, Jan, Woman in Blue Reading a Letter, circa 1665, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Hoogstraten, Samuel van, The Sick Lady, late seventeenth century, Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum
 Goz, Gottfried Bernhard, Maria, die Mutter der schönen Liebe, fresco, circa 1750, Bernau am Bodensee, Wallfahrtskirche San Marien
Time, the Best Doctor, English print, 1804 (Speert, p. 47)
 Daumier, Honoré, Une envie de femme grosse, lithograph from Moeurs Conjugales, 1840
 MacKintosh, Margaret MacDonald, The Visitation, relief, circa 1900, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Klimt, Gustav, Hope, 1903, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
 Chagall, Marc, The Pregnant Woman, 1912–1913, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Stedelijk Museum
 Dix, Otto, Schwangeres Weib, circa 1920, Berlin, Galerie Nierendorf
 Wilding, Faith, Womb Room, installation, mixed media, 1972, collection of the artist
Pregnant Women with Fetus in Utero at Various Stages of Development, Japanese print, undated Positions of the Fetus in Utero, Japanese novelty fan, undated

Portraiture

Raphael, La Gravida, 1505–1507, Florence, Italy, Pitti Palace
 Couture, Thomas, La Lecture, 1860, painting, Compiègne, France, Musée de Compiègne
 Morisot, Berthe, Madame Morisot and Her Daughter Madame Pontillon (Mother and Sister of the Artist), 1869–1870, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Chester Dale Collection
 Morisot, Berthe, Interior, circa 1871, private collection
 Morisot, Berthe, Portrait of Madame Pontillon, 1871, Paris, Louvre, Cabinet de Dessins
 Morisot, Berthe, Madame Pontillon and Her Daughter, Jeanne, 1871, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Alisa Mellon Bruce Collection
 Corinth, Lovis, Im Seidenmantel, 1904, oil on paper, Linz, Germany, Neu Galerie de Stadt Ling, Wolfgang-Gurlit-Museum
 Modersohn-Becker, Paula, Self-Portrait on Her Sixth Wedding Anniversary, 1906, Bremen, Germany, Ludwig-Roselius Sammlung, Böttcher-Strasse
 Neel, Alice, Pregnant Maria, painting, 1964, New York, Robert Miller Gallery
 Neel, Alice, Pregnant Woman, painting, 1971, New York, Robert Miller Gallery
 Neel, Alice, Margaret Evans Pregnant, painting, 1978, New York, Robert Miller Gallery

Poverty

Levy, Alphonse, Ça c'est pour les riches, lithograph, circa 1880
 Kollwitz, Käthe, Woman with Folded Hands (Pregnant Woman), etching, 1898 (Kl. 41.)
 Picasso, Pablo, The Soup, painting, 1903, Toronto, Canada, J. H. Grang Collection
 Kollwitz, Käthe, At the Doctor's, 1908–1909, reproduction of a drawing published in Simplicissimus 14 (November 29, 1909)
 Kollwitz, Käthe, The Widow I, woodcut, 1922–1923 (Kl. 180.*)
 Kollwitz, Käthe, Down with the Abortion Paragraph!, lithograph-poster commissioned by the KPD, 1924 (Kl. 189.)

Sorrow

Gogh, Vincent van, Sorrow, lithograph, 1882, Laren, Germany, Sammlung V. W. Van Gogh

Picasso, Pablo, The Embrace, pastel, 1903, Paris, Collection Walter-Guillaume, Musée de l'Orangerie
 Picasso, Pablo, Man Kneeling at a Woman's Feet, drawing, 1903, Barcelona, Spain, Museu Picasso
 Picasso, Pablo, The Surprise, drawing, 1903, Barcelona, Spain, Museu Picasso Picasso, Pablo, The Reconciliation, drawing, 1903, Barcelona, Spain, Museu Picasso Picasso, Pablo, Figure, painting, 1936, Marina Picasso Collection, courtesy of Jan Krugier Gallery, New York
 Picasso, Pablo, Pregnant Woman, sculpture, 1950, New York, Museum of Modern Art Picasso, Pablo, She-Goat Great with Kid, sculpture, 1950–1951, New York, Museum of Modern Art
Female Figure, sculpture, circa 1953, from Mapey, Kuba country, Zaire, now in Tervuren, Koninklijk Museum voor Midden Afrika
Figure of a Pregnant Woman: Portrait of the Daughter of the Carver, sculpture, circa 1956, Keenge, northeastern Kuba kingdom (Vansina, p. 112)
 Chicago, Judy, Smocked Figure, executed by Mary Ewanoski, from The Birth Project, smocking and embroidery on linen, 1980–1985, collection of the artist
 Chicago, Judy, Birth Figures, constructed by Sally Babson, from The Birth Project, fabric, 1980–1985, collection of the artist
 Chicago, Judy, Swaddled Figures, fabricated by Sally Babson and weaving by Jan Cox-Harden, from The Birth Project, weaving, 1980–1985, collection of the artist
 Chicago, Judy, Birth Garments, fabricated by Sally Babson and Pamela Nesbit, from The Birth Project, appliqué and embroidery, 1980–1985, collection of the artist

Shame

The Story of Callisto, woodcut, from P. Ovidii Metamorphosis, Venice, Italy, 1513, p. xxii
 Duke, Lodovico, The Story of Callisto, woodcut, from Les Transformationi, Venice, Italy, 1553, p. 44
 Titian, Diana Discovering the Pregnancy of Callisto, 1559, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Titian, Diana Discovering the Pregnancy of Callisto, 1559, Edinburgh, National Museum of Scotland
 Carracci, Annibale, Landscape with Diana and Callisto, circa 1598–1599, Mertoun, Scotland, St. Boswell's, Duke of Scotland
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Jupiter and Callisto, 1613, Kassel, Germany, Kgl. Galerie
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Diana Surprised by Actaeon; Diana Discovering the Pregnancy of Callisto, 1632–1635, Anhot Wasserburg, Germany, Prince Salm-Salm Collection
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Diana and Callisto, 1636–1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Saenredam, Jan, Diana and Callisto, engraving, late seventeenth–early eighteenth century
 Schalcken, Godfried, La Consultation Indiscrète, 1680–1685, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Schalcken, Godfried, La remonstrance inutile, 1685–1690, Salzburg, Austria, Residenzgalerie, Collection Schönborn-Buchheim

Further Reading

- Baxandall, Michael, Painting and Experience in Fifteenth Century Italy, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1972
- Behrman, Thierry, Godfried Schalcken, Paris: Maeght, 1988
- Boime, Albert, Thomas Couture and the Eclectic Vision, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1980
- Chicago, Judy, The Birth Project, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1985
- Comini, Alessandra, The Fantastic Art of Vienna, New York: Knopf, 1978
- Cutler, Charles, Northern Painting from Pucelle to Bruegel, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1973
- Fluegel, Jane, "Chronology," in Pablo Picasso: A Retrospective, edited by William Rubin, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1980
- Gedo, Mary Matthews, Picasso: Art as Autobiography, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1980
- Gerken, Gerhard, Lovis Corinth, 1858–1925, Köln, Germany: Dumont Buchverlag, 1985
- Gilot, Françoise, and Carlton Lake, Life with Picasso, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964; London: Virago, 1964
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, revised edition, New York: Harper, 1979
- Hills, Patricia, Alice Neel, New York: Abrams, 1983
- Hinz, Renate, editor, Käthe Kollwitz: Graphic, Posters and Drawings, New York: Pantheon, 1981
- James, Thomas Garnet Henry, An Introduction to Ancient Egypt, New York: Harper, 1979
- Koslow, Susan, "The Curtain-Sack: A Newly Discovered Incarnation Motif in Rogier van der Weyden's Columba Annunciation," Artibus et Historiae 13:7 (1986)
- Kristeva, Julia, The Kristeva Reader, edited by Toril Moi, New York: Columbia University Press, 1986; Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1986
- Lavin, Marilyn Aronberg, Piero della Francesca, New York: Abrams, 1992; London: Thames and Hudson, 1992
- Lefkowitz, Mary R., and Maureen Fant, editors, Woman's Life in Greece and Rome, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982
- Lehmann, Voler, Die Geburt in der Kunst, Braunschweig, Germany: Braunschweiger Verlansanstalt, 1978
- Musée Municipal de Senlis, Thomas Couture, Senlis, France: Le Sauvegarde de Senlis, 1978
- Nash, Jane, Veiled Images: Titian's Mythological Paintings for Philip II, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Art Alliance Press, 1985; London: Associated University Press, 1985
- Nash, John, Vermeer, London: Scala, 1991; New York: Rizzoli, 1991
- Ovid, Metamorphoses, translated by Rolfe Humphries, London: Heinemann, 1951; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1969
- Palau i Fabre, Josep, Picasso: The Early Years, translated by Kenneth Lyons, New York: Rizzoli, 1981; Oxford: Phaidon, 1981
- Panofsky, Irwin, Problems in Titian: Mostly Iconographic, New York: New York University Press, 1969
- Perry, Gillian, Paula Modersohn-Becker: Her Life and Work, London: Woman's Press, 1979
- Raven, Arlene, "Blood Sisters: Feminist Art and Criticism," in Division of Labor: "Women Work" in Contemporary Art, New York: Bronx Museum of Art, 1995
- Richardson, John, A Life of Picasso, Volume One: 1881–1906, New York: Random House, 1991
- Rodríguez, Antonio, Diego Rivera: Pintura Mural, Mexico City, Mexico: Dundo Editorial de la Plástica Mexicana, 1987
- Seznec, Jean, "Literary Inspiration in Van Gogh," in Van Gogh in Perspective, edited by Bogomila Welsh-Ovcharov, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1974
- Sjöö, Monica, and Barbara Mor, The Great Cosmic Mother: Rediscovering the Religion of the Earth, San Francisco, California: Harper, 1975
- Sorlier, Charles, editor, Chagall by Chagall, translated by John Shepley, New York: Abrams, 1979; London: Thames and Hudson, 1981
- Speert, Harold, Iconographia Gyniatrica: A Pictorial History of Gynecology and Obstetrics, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Davis, 1973
- Vansina, J. Art History of Africa: An Introduction to Method, London and New York: Longman, 1984
- Wall, Kathleen, The Callisto Myth from Ovid to Atwood: Initiation and Rape in Literature, New York and London: Thames and Hudson, 1988
- Warner, Marina, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary, New York: Knopf, 1976

PROTESTANTISM

Christine M. Boeckl

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Protestantism:

SIXTEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Lucas Cranach the Younger, Differences Between Lutheran and Catholic Services (and detail), circa 1545, print, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Kupferstichkabinett, Sammlung der Zeichnungen und Druckgraphik. (Courtesy of the Staatliche Museen, Berlin)

Protestant religious art, works generated by the reformers who had caused the sixteenth-century schism within the Roman Catholic Church, is defined primarily by its scarcity. Although German Reformation leader Martin Luther and the dukes of the German state of Saxony were keen on inventing a new iconography that would distinguish itself from the established tradition, their efforts were short lived. Iconoclasm—first advocated by German theologian Andreas Bodenstein and echoed by Swiss reformer Huldrych Zwingli, French reformer John Calvin, and Henry VIII of England—soon dampened the Protestants' enthusiasm for religious imagery altogether. Total abstention from religious art was promoted after the desecration and destruction of churches in Paris; Basel, Switzerland; Strasbourg, France; and Antwerp, Belgium. Moreover, Muslims who invaded Europe from the East had strong aversions to representational art and further reinforced these iconoclastic tendencies.

Although it is difficult to make a definitive statement about the views on religious imagery that were held by the countless individual sects that were founded in Europe and later in the Americas, they all distinguished themselves from Catholicism through their basic belief in fide sola (that man is ultimately saved through faith) and gratia sola (divine grace), which is believed to operate independently of human merit and good works. Another common concern was the Roman Catholic Church's refusal to grant the chalice to laity in the Eucharistic feast. A meaningful image after the Reformation was that of communio utraque, two men serving the paten and chalice to the congregation, such as in a detail taken from Lucas Cranach the Younger's woodcut Unterscheid zwischender waren Religion Christi und falschen Abgottischenlehr des Antichrists in den furnemsten stucken (circa 1545, Differences Between Lutheran and Catholic Services). The Protestants' most prolific and creative output consisted of kampfbilder (propagandistic prints) aimed at educating the masses and persuading people to join their ranks. Many polemic pamphlets, even catechisms and Bibles, derided Catholicism.

The most important artists known to have been sympathetic to reformatory teachings were Albrecht Dürer, the Cranach family, Hans Holbein the Younger, Jacob Jordaens, and Rembrandt van Rijn. The few biblical subjects commissioned by Protestants usually depicted episodes of Jesus Christ's life, most importantly the Crucifixion and parables such as the Prodigal Son. Depictions of biblical sermons were preferred by Protestants because preaching was an integral part of their liturgical services. Religious subjects, of course, were popular with the Catholics as well as with the reformed churches, and it is remarkable how few paintings (sculpture was even less in demand because of the commandment "Thou shalt not make thee any graven image") can be recognized specifically as Protestant commissions. The biblical stories may have been deliberately treated ambiguously to avoid detection and possibly persecution by intolerant governments. Numerous prints recorded cruel and inhuman treatment administered to Protestants—in the name of faith—or scenes of the Bartholomew Massacre of French Huguenots.

For centuries most European regions were governed by the principle cuius regio eius religio, which meant that the civil ruler determined a given territory's religion. Over the years, a few Protestant countries such as Holland gained religious freedom. Yet, even in Protestant regions where the climate was tolerant, religious subjects remained rare. Secular, moralizing history paintings and landscapes became popular—honoring the "Invisible Creator." Moreover, artists in Protestant countries began producing more portraiture celebrating the individual. Secular post-Reformation art, such as that recording the history of Protestantism, remained scarce until the nineteenth century, at which time budding nationalists, particularly in Germany, chose Reformation events to express current political ideas.

Finally, a distinction must be made between Protestant works and art created within the Catholic Church that referred to different denominations, as they conveyed disparate views and served dissimilar functions. The first group consists of dogmatic art commissioned by Protestant patrons and executed by artists with similar religious convictions. Although sixteenth-century Protestant factions held more or less iconoclastic views about church decoration, they emphasized images on the printed page. Nowhere are the basic differences between the two main Western religious philosophies better illustrated than in Cranach the Younger's aforementioned woodcut Differences Between Lutheran and Catholic Services. The print is a masterpiece that conveys the chasm that opened in the Christian community following Luther's publication of his 95 Theses in Wittenberg, Germany, in 1517. Cranach the Younger's work, divided into two parts, addresses the main issues of both denominations. The right-hand side represents the Catholic Church with all its shortcomings, as seen through the Protestants' eyes. The left-hand side corresponds visually to the right, but the details reveal the dogmatic changes of the Reformation. As the Protestant preacher proclaims the word of God from an open Bible, his right arm points to a banderole that connects him to the Agnus Dei symbol and the kneeling figure of Christ before God the Father, thus giving him direct access to heaven. Since the Protestants recognized only two of the traditional seven sacraments—baptism (in the Lutheran rite by scooping by hand the water from the baptismal font rather than poring it from a liturgical vessel) and the Eucharist—these are the only ones depicted in Cranach the Younger's print. (A variation of the Communion detail appears in a woodcut Luther and Hus Serving Communion in Both Spheres [third quarter of the sixteenth century].) On the right-hand side, the artist directs his biting sarcasm at all traditional teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. The Catholic priest has no visible link with God and a devil is sitting on his shoulder. Cranach the Younger also mocks religious customs such as the cult of the Virgin, and above all attacks the papacy. He hints at the sale of indulgences by filling the foreground with money bags collected by an insatiable pope who rakes in the ill-gotten riches. Other popular Cranach woodcuts represent the pope as Antichrist, most importantly in the 26 plates of Passional Christi und Antichristi (1521).

Apart from polemic rhetoric, the most productive and innovative dogmatic designs that expressed Protestant piety treated the two remaining sacraments that needed redefining in the wake of the Reformation. A few Protestant altar paintings represent the new liturgical practices of baptism and the Eucharist. Otto Wagenfeldt's Baptism (circa 1650) and Communion in Both Species (circa 1650) repeat representations of the Protestant liturgical ceremonies first seen in Cranach the Younger's print.

Last Supper altarpieces were most likely to be displayed in Protestant churches. Lucas Cranach the Elder's altar (1547) for the City Church in Wittenberg, finished a year after Luther's death, updated the traditional subjects by replacing the apostles with important personalities of the Reformation: one of the side panels shows Philipp Melancthon, Protestant scholar and Luther's associate, baptizing an infant. Lucas Cranach the Younger's Last Supper Altar (1565) for the Palace Church in Dessau, Germany, repeats the use of contemporary portraits and gives some of the apostles the likenesses of Luther, Melancthon, and others (Cranach the Younger included himself as a servant serving the wine).

Another influential innovative composition, credited to Cranach the Elder, is the Allegory of the Law and the Gospel (circa 1529), which refers to Luther's proclamation that the harsh mosaic Old Law was doomed in the light of Christ's grace. It is effectively a visual sermon of Lutheran doctrine. Again, Cranach the Elder divided the composition into two halves. The tree in the center has barren branches that reach toward the side, where the Fall of Man is depicted along with a traditional Last Judgment scene where a damned soul is pursued by death and the devil. The other side of the painting displays the tree of life's green branches that point toward a saved man praying before the crucified Christ, the risen Savior blessing a saved soul. Cranach the Elder's pedagogical panel, also referred to as Rechtfertigung des Sunders durch den Glauben (Fall of Man/Salvation), was frequently copied in the graphic arts as well as in painting. The most famous version is attributed to Hans Holbein the Younger. His Allegory of the Law and the Gospel (circa 1535) differs from Cranach's Gotha version in a few details. Latin inscriptions help clarify its meaning, and three figures have been added in the foreground. In the center, a seated man turns his body toward an Old Testament prophet. This half bears the superscript Lex (Law). The man's face, on the other hand, looks at St. John, who points emphatically to the side of the painting labeled Gratia (Gospel [literally Favor]). The allegory is clear: humankind, caught in the age-old dilemma, must decide between good and evil as well as damnation and eternal life.

The Protestant North preferred Christian topics to Old Testament themes. As already mentioned, in the reformers' opinion, the crucified Redeemer, whose sacrifice saved humankind, was one of the most important images (as Good Friday is the most revered day in the Lutheran liturgical year). Generally speaking, in the Protestant repertoire the treatment of Christ on the cross was traditional, although eighteenth-century Protestant Crucifixions may have differed from Catholic depictions in small details. For example, Protestants were instructed in writings such as Huldericus Pulsnicensis's Erbauliche Nachrichten von allerhand Irrtümern deren Mahler, so sie in Entwerffung der Biblischen Geschichte Alten und Neuen Testaments zu begehren pflegen (1723), published in Leipzig, Germany, not to follow tradition but to acknowledge the updated biblical research that suggested that four rather than three nails had pierced the Savior's extremities. (No study has been made to determine whether Protestant artists did indeed follow such suggestions.)

Because of the Cranachs' personal acquaintance with Luther, Cranach the Elder's canonical scenes of the Crucifixion—diagonally placed thieves and a painfully distorted figure of Christ—carried great authority and were frequently quoted by later artists: in the sixteenth century by Protestant sympathizers such as Jörg Breu and Georg Lehmberger, among others; in the nineteenth century by artists such as Eduard Gebhardt. Gebhardt, a German Protestant, refused to follow the fashionable, neo-Byzantine school of the Benedictine Monastery of Beuron, Germany (Crucifixion [circa 1868] after the designs of Peter Lenz in the St. Maurus Chapel near the Monastery of Beuron) and interpreted his Crucifixion (1873) in a novel, veristic style using Cranach's prototype to great advantage. The figures under the cross in Gebhardt's work are not iconic saints but human beings, a realistically conceived crowd that expresses anguish over the Savior's death.

Not all nineteenth-century Protestants painted narrative versions of the Crucifixion; a number created symbolic crosses. New ground was broken by Caspar David Friedrich in his innovative Tetschen Altar (Cross in the Mountains) (1808). The intense luminosity and stillness of his landscape give it a spiritual quality even though it does not display any obvious doctrinaire details. The cross is represented from an unusual vantage point, the view of a bird in flight. Attacked as being too vague and mystical, Friedrich defended his work's symbolism, stating that the setting sun represents the old order before Christ, and the gilded figure on the cross reflects the last sun rays back to Earth. He also mentioned that the rock on which the cross stands symbolizes faith, and the green trees, the color of hope, represent people's confidence in their salvation through Christ. A simpler version by the same artist, Cross on the Baltic Sea (circa 1815), displays similar symbols in a small yet very detailed sketch. A wooden cross perched up on a cliff (faith) overlooks the sea where a boat, visible in the distance, and a large anchor placed in the foreground seem to refer to the traditional symbol of hope (also the symbol of the Christian Church since the days of the catacombs).

Equally impressive is Thomas Cole's Cross at Sunset (1840s). The artist painted this symbolic landscape four years after he was baptized as an Episcopalian, at a time when he decided to cast aside his worldly ambitions and work for the Protestant Church. (Inspired by John Bunyan's Puritan allegory Pilgrim's Progress, 1678, he planned a whole series titled The Cross and the World, which remained unfinished at Cole's untimely death.) Cross at Sunset shows stylized rays similar to those in Friedrich's Tetschen Altar, while the foreground is dominated by a simple cross shape. This canvas is typical of American nineteenth-century landscapes, which emphasize the moral values of the aesthetic experience. Such paintings were intended to be contemplated as God's sensuous image of revelation.

Apart from Crucifixions, the most common biblical narratives used to represent Protestant ideology were Christ and St. John preaching (such as rendered by Cranach the Younger), the Last Judgment, the Pharisee and the Publican, Lazarus and the Rich Man, the Calling of Matthew, the Conversion of Saul, the Raising of Lazarus, and the Prodigal Son. Of course, as already mentioned, none of these themes were exclusively the domain of Protestant artists.

The topos of the Prodigal Son who was exonerated by his change of heart, indicating a personal conversion, had been commented on by both Luther and John Calvin. The narrative, based on the Gospel According to Luke (15:11–32), told the story of a son who demanded his inheritance from his father, left home, caroused, was expelled from an inn, lived in poverty among swine, and finally returned to be greeted by his rejoicing father, who convinced the elder brother to join in the family celebration. The New Testament parable lent itself well to didactic theater performances or sermons that could present to the audience the reason why the son was forgiven. The two Christian factions disagreed on this fundamental issue. Protestant commentators emphasized God's grace and mercy toward poor sinners. Catholics stressed that the Prodigal Son cooperated with God's grace and decided of his own free will to return home. Moreover, the youth atoned for his sins by confession and through penance, thereby actively contributing to his reinstatement in his father's favor. Although the question of which faith the individual paintings of the Prodigal Son were advocating is frequently debated, the findings are seldom conclusive because of the complex theological questions involved. However, by and large the Protestant North developed tendencies toward the secularization of religious subjects, exemplified in the treatment of the different episodes of the Prodigal Son's sinful life. His way stations and debaucheries were given moralizing connotations. The Catholic South, on the other hand, primarily stressed the dramatic finale of the return of the Prodigal Son.

Prints depicting the theme of the filius prodigius were easy to understand because they frequently included explanatory texts. For example, Cornelis Anthonisz's series of six woodcuts expresses sectarian belief by introducing allegorical figures identifiable by captions. The Expulsion of the Prodigal Son (circa 1540) is particularly revealing, because a background figure in "Synagoga Sathanae" (Satan's Synagogue) wears a papal tiara: the woodcut insinuates that the young man is about to depart for Rome. The wayward youth is accosted by two ominous females. This subject plays on a variant of Hercules at the Crossroad with one major difference—Superstitio (Superstition) on his right and Heresia (Heresy) to his left both seem to threaten his spiritual prospects.

Other scenes from the Prodigal Son are masked as genre paintings. Rembrandt's Self-Portrait with Saskia (circa 1634–1636), portraying a toast to the good life, has been interpreted as the subject of the Prodigal Son in the tavern, and Polish Rider (1660s), a work attributed to Rembrandt, as the departure of the Prodigal Son from his parental home. Yet, undeniably the most frequently depicted scene was the Return of the Prodigal Son. Rembrandt treated the subject a number of times in different media. His Return of the Prodigal Son (circa 1668), a masterpiece in the Hermitage, in St. Petersburg, Russia, is most impressive in its simplicity. All descriptive narrative details are suppressed, and the action focuses on the joyous reunion of father and son. It has been said that this reconciliatory meeting dealt not with human love of an earthly father but God's divine love and mercy.

In contrast to Protestant ideology, Catholic images, such as several of Guercino's versions of Return of the Prodigal Son (1651, Diocesan Museum in Włocławek, Poland; circa 1655, Tim Ken Museum in San Diego, California), depict the youth crying visibly into a white handkerchief, revealing his contrite heart. Such pathos was uncommon in Protestant versions. Both faiths, however, generally included the elder brother, who originally objected to the father's acceptance of the erring son.

One of the few biblical subjects that originated as a Protestant topic is Christ blessing the children. Lucas Cranach the Elder invented it in his Christ Blesses the Children (circa 1538), a panel that depicts Christ inundated by a crowd. The Savior holds a child in his arms (a male counterpart to Madonna images) and blesses the rest of the babies. Jesus appears infinitely accessible to the mothers who present their innocent youngsters while his apostles remain at a distance. The reason for choosing this unusual biblical episode may have been the new emphasis on the family in Protestant circles. In contrast to Catholic views, Protestants denied that the celibate clergy had a higher status in the eyes of God. (Luther married a former nun in 1526 and they had a number of children.) Moreover, numerous authors proposed that the continued popularity in the Netherlands of Christ blessing the children, as in works by the circle of Rembrandt and Jacob Jordaens, among others, may have had to do with contemporary anti-Anabaptist sentiments. This militant sect advocated only adult baptisms and was equally unpopular with Calvinists, Lutherans, and Catholics.

The art discussed so far has concerned traditional subjects, yet some painters created new images to voice their very personal beliefs. Albrecht Dürer, perhaps the most gifted artist of the Reformation, donated his The Four Apostles (1529) to his native city of Nuremberg, Germany. The two panels testify to Dürer's early identification with the cause of Protestantism: not only does a lengthy inscription warn against false prophets, but the painting itself displays an innovative iconographic program. Visually, The Four Apostles follows the tradition of the sacra conversazione (sacred conversation), but Dürer demonstrates a deliberate secularization of the theme by the glaring absence of the central image of the Virgin. Peter, the first pope, is shown behind John, Luther's favorite apostle.

Rembrandt was another figure who expressed his faith through art; his relationship to Calvinism has spawned numerous studies. The depiction of a painted, open curtain device, as in the Kassel, Germany, Holy Family (1646), has been quoted as proof that Rembrandt had studied Calvin's Commentaries, in which the curtain had been interpreted as "revelation of the divine." This theory opposes the generally accepted view that the drapery was a mundane feature characteristic of Netherlandish realism. Furthermore, Rembrandt's unusually sympathetic treatment of beggars and cripples has been interpreted as a Protestant simile to Christ's poverty on Earth.

Turning to secular Protestant art, quasi-iconic status must have been granted to posthumous portraits of Luther and other reformers, as these were produced in great quantity over the following centuries. Lucas Cranach the Elder's print Luther as Junker Jorg (circa 1522) is the earliest known portrait after Luther had left his religious order. Later portraits generally rendered Luther dressed in a Protestant preacher's robe, using Cranach the Younger's life-size portrait (1546) as guide. In addition to individual portraits, artists created a number of matched panels representing Luther and his wife.

Other secular Reformation topics were the so-called Confessio paintings, which recorded important milestones in Protestant history. Most notable was Luther presenting his Doctrines to Emperor Charles V in Augsburg, Germany. These venerated Lutheran paintings became the basis for nineteenth-century historicized creations. Luther's cult of personality developed in Germany after 1830 and became most prominent toward the end of the century.

Politics played a decisive role in nineteenth-century re-creations of important events in Protestant history. Germany's nationalist movement tried to rally independent principalities under the Prussian flag, culminating in 1871 with the founding of the Hohenzollern, the Protestant German "empire" in Prussia run by the Hohenzollern family until 1918. Most important were the paintings of Luther's public life. For example, Hermann Wislicenus's wall decorations in the ancient palatine Imperial Residence in Goslar, Germany, included Luther at Worms (circa 1895), in which the reformer once announced his steadfast faith: "Hier stehe ich, Gott helfe mir . . ." (Here I stand, God help me). The cycle celebrated the continuity of Germanic leadership from Charlemagne to Emperor Wilhelm I, with Luther as the "new dawn" after the decline of the medieval (Catholic) Holy Roman Empire.

Similar sentiments are expressed in Wilhelm von Kaulbach's Age of Reformation (1863), a large, tableau-vivant styled mural that decorated the staircase in Berlin's Neue Museum (destroyed in 1945). The grandiose and controversial painting implied that the German Reformation was the most momentous event in modern history. The center of the multi-figural composition is taken up by Luther, brandishing an open Bible and standing in front of a copy of Leonardo da Vinci's Last Supper. Other reformers pictured include John Wycliffe, Jan Hus, John Calvin, Huldrych Zwingli, Elizabeth I of England, and Gustav Adolph of Sweden. Christopher Columbus appears as one of the explorers in the company of the astronomers Nicolaus Copernicus, Galileo, Tycho Brahe, and Johannes Kepler. The arts are represented by Dürer working on his The Four Apostles and von Kaulbach, who portrayed himself as one of the master's assistants. Michelangelo, Leonardo, and Raphael are joined by the most celebrated writers of the ages.

In 1920, Lovis Corinth supplied 40 plates for a commemorative, limited edition of his series Martin Luther. The color lithographs included scenes from the reformer's life such as Luther's parents, his time as monk (Monch Tetzel), posting his propositions (Theses), Luther in Worms, political figures of the Reformation, Luther's Bible of 1534, family scenes such as Magdalen's Deathbed, and the final print Luther's Death (based on a Cranach design). The scenes are expressive and some refer to historic documents.

While the subject of Luther dominated German art, other religious figures unsympathetic to Rome were also honored. For example, Carl Friedrich Lessing's Hussite Sermon (1836) emphasizes the revolutionary aspirations of the fifteenth-century reformer Hus. Lessing renders the controversial chalice held high by one of the Hussites, who seems to remind other members of the sect that Hus had been executed for demanding this sacred rite. Ferdinand Hodler painted The Reformers, or Calvin at the University of Geneva (1884), a canvas that depicts Calvin in academic regalia debating four other colleagues. The style is deliberately austere in its composition and architectural background. Calvinistic teachings are expressed in the scholarly work ethic the students demonstrate.

Hendrik Leys's Publication of the Edicts of Charles V (circa 1861) impartially records an important, local historic incident. The large canvas describes the devastating effect on townspeople as they listen to the emperor's decree that from that day forward Protestantism was punishable by death. First exhibited in his Catholic hometown of Antwerp in 1861, Leys's work was intended to make the people relive the hardships of the Reformation. For added authenticity Leys emulates sixteenth-century styles of artists such as Peter Bruegel the Elder and Hans Holbein the Younger. Although these romantic re-creations of times past were inspired compositions, they never entered the mainstream of European art because they had a limited audience and worked with even more restricted iconographic traditions.

Finally, two additional aspects of this subject are of interest: how Catholics viewed members of the other faiths and the phenomenon of Protestant artists' conversions to Catholicism. During the Counter-Reformation of the sixteenth century, the Roman Catholic Church saw the Protestants as dangerous heretics. Much has been written about the surge of Catholic religious imagery created to combat Protestantism—a number of these works of art attacked the schismatics. On the grandiose St. Ignatius monument in Rome's Il Gesu chapel, the individual heretical branches are identified by their founders' names. Pierre Le Gros the Younger's marble group Religion Overthrowing Heresy (circa 1695) shows a small angel tearing pages from a volume on which the inscription "Hulderic Zwingli" (the name of the Swiss religious reformer) appears. The book under Heresy's foot is labeled "Martin Luther," and in the background another tome shows John Calvin's name as author.

Another example of Roman Catholic iconography is pertinent here, the art of converts such as seventeenth-century Dutch painter Jan Vermeer, who converted to Catholicism (most likely influenced by his mother-in-law). His first known painting, St. Praxedis (1655), inscribed "Meer, 1655" and "[Ver]Meer N[aar] R[ip]o[s]o," has proven to be a copy after a similar painting by the Italian Felice Ficherelli, nicknamed Riposo. The early Christian Praxedis was known to have cared for martyrs, and in Vermeer's work she wrings a blood-soaked sponge over a decorative vessel. Vermeer added a new iconographic meaning to the Italian prototype by adding a small crucifix to the hands of the saint. The Dutch convert Vermeer presents a religious scene where Christ's blood symbolically mixes with that of the martyrs, emphasizing the Catholic doctrine of the communion of saints. Of equal importance is Vermeer's Allegory of Faith (circa 1671–1672) in which he created an innovative pictorial statement (probably for Jesuit neighbors) by deriving semiotics from Cesare Ripa's Iconologia and Dutch emblemata.

Over the centuries the Protestant sects remained critical of religious images, an attitude that restrained artistic output. While it is fairly easy to recognize Catholic topics, the treatment of Protestant religious art is understated and difficult to attribute to a specific religious movement. Apart from the polemic prints, few new images were created until the nineteenth century. At that time, Protestants recognized the propagandistic potential of monumental art (religious as well as secular). However, these paintings were concerned less with religious fervor than with underscoring political tendencies and celebrating freedom from religious oppression.

See also Baptism; Communion; Crucifixion; Judaism; Path/Road/Crossroads; Penitence/Repentance; Sin/Sinning

Selected Works of Art

Sixteenth Century

- Breu, Jörg the Elder, Crucifixion, 1524, Budapest, Museum Anthonisz., Cornelis, The Expulsion of the Prodigal Son, woodcut, circa 1540
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Crucifixion, circa 1501, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Passional Christi und Antichristi, woodcuts, 1521, Wittenberg, Germany
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Luther as Junker Jorg, woodcut, circa 1522
- Lehmberger, Georg, Crucifixion, 1524, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Martin Luther, pendant to Katharina von Boras, 1526, Schwerin, Germany, Staatliches Museum
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Allegory of the Law and the Gospel, 1529, Gotha, Germany, Schlossmuseum
- Dürer, Albrecht, The Four Apostles, 1529, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
- Holbein, Hans, the Younger, Allegory of the Law and the Gospel, circa 1535, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Christ Blesses the Children, circa 1538, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle, Kunstsammlungen, Alte Galerie
- Cranach, Lucas, the Younger, Differences Between Lutheran and Catholic Services, print, circa 1545
- Cranach, Lucas, the Younger, Portrait of Martin Luther, 1546, Schwerin, Germany, Staatliches Museum
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Last Supper, Baptism, Public Confession, 1547, Wittenberg, Germany, City Church
- Cranach, Lucas, the Younger, St. John the Baptist Preaching, 1549, Braunschweig, Germany, Herzog Ulrich Museum
- Cranach, Lucas, the Younger, Last Supper Altar, 1565, Dessau, Germany, Palace Church
- Luther and Hus Serving Communion in Both Spheres*, woodcut, third quarter of sixteenth century

Seventeenth Century

- Herneisen, Andreas, Luther Presenting His Doctrines (Confessio Augustana to Emperor Charles V), circa 1601, Nuremberg, Germany, Mogeessdorf
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait with Saskia, circa 1634–1636, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Jordaens, Jacob, Christ Blesses the Children, circa 1640, Copenhagen, Denmark, National Museum
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Holy Family, 1646, Kassel, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
- Wagenfeldt, Otto, Communion in Both Species; Baptism, circa 1650, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle
- Vermeer, Jan, St. Praxedis, 1655, Barbara Piasecka Johnson Collection
- Maes, Nicolas, Christ Blesses the Children, circa 1659, London, National Gallery
- Rembrandt van Rijn (attributed to), Polish Rider, 1660s, New York, Frick Collection
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Return of the Prodigal Son, circa 1668, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
- Vermeer, Jan, Allegory of Faith, circa 1671–1672, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Friedrich, Caspar David, Tetschen Altar (Cross in the Mountains), 1808, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
- Friedrich, Caspar David, Cross on the Baltic Sea, circa 1815, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz Museum
- Lessing, Carl Friedrich, Hussite Sermon, 1836, Berlin, Germany
- Cole, Thomas, Cross at Sunset, painting, 1840s
- Leys, Hendrik, Publication of the Edicts of Charles V, circa 1861, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
- Kaulbach, Wilhelm von, Age of Reformation, mural, 1863, in Berlin's Neue Museum, destroyed
- Gebhardt, Eduard, Crucifixion, 1873, Hamburg, Germany, Hamburger Kunsthalle
- Hodler, Ferdinand, Calvin at the University of Geneva (The Reformers), 1884, Geneva, Switzerland, Musée d'Art et d'Histoire
- Wislicenus, Hermann, Luther at Worms, wall decoration, circa 1895, Goslar, Germany, Imperial Residence

Twentieth Century

- Corinth, Lovis, Martin Luther Series: Portrait of Martin Luther; Monch Tetzel; Theses; Luther Burns the Papal Bull; Luther in Worms; Luther and Catherina von Bora; Ein Feste Burg; Luther's Bible of 1534; Magdalen's Deathbed; Luther's Death, lithographs, text by Tim Klein, Berlin, Germany, 1920

Further Reading

- Altendorf, Hans Dietrich, and Peter Jezler, editors, Bilderstreit: Kulturwandel in Zwingli's Reformation, Zurich, Switzerland: Theologischer Verlag, 1984

- Baldwin, Robert, "'On Earth We Are Beggars, As Christ Himself Was': The Protestant Background of Rembrandt's Imagery of Poverty, Disability, and Begging," Konsthistorisk tidskrift 54:3 (1985)
- Blanchard, Amos, Book of Martyrs, Cincinnati, Ohio: Robinson and Fairbank, 1831
- Bott, Gerhard, Martin Luther und die Reformation in Deutschland, Nuremberg, Germany: Germanisches Nationalmuseum, 1983
- Christensen, Carl, Art and the Reformation in Germany, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1979
- , Princes and Propaganda: Electoral Saxon Art of the Reformation, Kirksville, Missouri: Sixteenth Century Journal, 1992
- Christin, Olivier, Une révolution symbolique, Paris: Les Éditions de Minuet, 1991
- Corinth, Lovis, Luther Lithographs, Springfield, Ohio: Chantry Music Press, 1968
- Eimer, Gerhard, Zur Dialektik des Glaubens bei Caspar David Friedrich, Frankfurt, Germany: Goethe University Press, 1982
- Ferm, Vergilius, Pictorial History of Protestantism, New York: Philosophical Library, 1957
- Freedberg, David, "The Hidden God: Image and Interdiction in the Netherlands in the Sixteenth Century," Art History 5:2 (June 1982)
- Gonzales-Rodriguez, Pedro, "Los reformadores del siglo XVI y el arte," Goya 191 (March-April 1986)
- Gross, Friedrich, Jesus, Luther und der Papst im Bilderkampf 1871 bis 1918, Marburg, Germany: Jonas, 1989
- Haeger, Barbara, "The Prodigal Son in Sixteenth and Seventeenth Century Netherlandish Art: Depiction of the Parable and the Revolution of a Catholic Image," Simiolus 16 (1986)
- , "Cornelis Anthonisz Representation of the Parable of the Prodigal Son," Nederlands Kunsthistorisch Jaarboek 37 (1986)
- Halewood, William, Six Subjects of Reformation Art: A Preface to Rembrandt, Toronto, Ontario: University of Toronto Press, 1982
- Held, Julius, "A Protestant Source for a Rubens Subject," in Liber amicorum Karel G. Boon, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Swets and Zeitlinger, 1974
- Hofmann, Werner, ed., Luther und die Folgen für die Kunst, Munich, Germany: Prestel-Verlag, 1983
- Klijn, Marc de, De Invloed van het Calvinisme op de Noord-Nederlandse Landschapschilderkunst, Apeldoorn, The Netherlands: Zwijgerstichting, 1982
- Kruse, Joachim, Luthers Leben in Illustrationen, Coburg, Germany: Die Kunstsammlungen, 1980
- Kunst der Reformationszeit*, exhibition catalog, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, Berlin, Henschelverlag Kunst und Gesellschaft, 1983
- Kuspit, Donald, "Dürer and the Lutheran Image," Art in America 64 (1975)
- Larsen, Eric, Calvinist Economy and Seventeenth Century Dutch Art, Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1979
- Michalski, Sergiusz, "Aspekte der Protestantischen Bilderfrage," Idea, Jahrbuch der Hamburger Kunsthalle 3 (1984)
- Moffitt, John, "Rembrandt, Revelation and Calvin's Curtains," Gazette des Beaux-Arts 113 (April 1989)
- Moxey, Keith, Peasants, Warriors, and Wives: Popular Imagery in the Reformation, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989
- Parshall, Linda, Art and the Reformation: An Annotated Bibliography, Boston: Hall, 1986
- Perrig, Alexander, Albrecht Dürer oder die Heimlichkeit der Deutschen Ketzererei, Weinheim, Germany: Acta Humaniora, 1985
- Poletto, Christine, Art et pouvoirs: à l'âge Baroque, Paris: L'Harmattan, 1990
- Schmidt, Philipp, Die Illustration der Lutherbibel, 1522–1700, Basel, Switzerland: Reinhardt, 1962
- Scribner, Robert, For the Sake of the Simple Folk: Popular Propaganda for the German Reformation, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981
- Ullmann, Ernst, Von der Macht der Bilder: Kunst und Reformation, Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1985
- Wencelius, Leon, Calvin et Rembrandt, Paris: Société d'édition "Les Belles Lettres," 1937

READING

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following periods and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Reading:

ANCIENT

HOMER

OLD TESTAMENT

MADONNA READING

SAINTS

HISTORIC

LITERARY

GENRE SCENES

LETTER READING

READING MUSIC

READING A NEWSPAPER

MODERN

John Flaxman, Paolo and Francesca, 1793, illustration to Dante's The Divine Comedy, engraved by Tomaso Pirelli. (Courtesy of the author)

Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man.
(Francis Bacon, Of Studies)

Although reading as a practice has been around a long time, it is one that has always been limited to certain sectors of the population, typically the privileged. The verb to read can be used to refer to a number of different acts. The most obvious form of reading is that which involves the interpretation of some form of writing, a practice that began as early as Egyptian pictograph writing and Sumerian cuneiform tablets. To read, however, can refer to the interpretation of many types of material other than writing.

One of these “other” kinds of reading is the interpretation of symbols. For example, a symbol such as a lion with wings has connotations much the same as written language does. It is the symbol of St. Mark the Evangelist and is usually employed to denote the Gospel of Mark in the New Testament, just as an ox identifies St. Luke, an eagle St. John, and an angel St. Matthew. These symbols appear both in transcribed Gospel illuminations and on the facades of churches, such as the west facade of Chartres Cathedral in France, where the symbols of the authors of the Gospels surround the figure of Jesus Christ. In this form of reading, meaning in a work of art can be determined through a knowledge of its iconography or particular symbolism relative to era, artist, and patron.

Additional types of reading include the reading of lips by the deaf, reading physical signs or signals, reading clues in the manner of a detective, and “reading between the lines,” that is, inferring from a text meaning that is not fully spelled out or directly articulated. To read is also used colloquially, as in “I can read him like a book,” or “her life was an open book,” both of which mean that a person’s character, motives, or maneuvers are clear to an observer.

Some forms of reading, or interpreting what one sees, have been in use since the Paleolithic era (early Stone Age), as evidenced by the elaborate cave pictures (circa 15,000–10,000 B.C.) at such sites as Lascaux in France and Altamira in Spain. Although present-day viewers do not agree on the specific meaning of these paintings, it may be assumed that those who drew and painted them had a specific purpose in mind.

The earliest Egyptian writing was also in the form of pictures, such as the stone relief The Palette of King Narmer (circa 3000 B.C.) in the Egyptian Museum in Cairo. Here the meaning is fairly clear, Narmer portrayed as a conqueror of his enemies. Later Egyptian writing was in the form of pictographs, a writing in existence by at least 2500 B.C. A whole class of professional writers was devoted to the production of pictographs, as can be seen in the Seated Scribe sculpture from Saqqara (circa 2400 B.C.), now in the Louvre in Paris, one of the many representations of scribes as official writers. In Sumerian art, the earliest record of reading can be found in the existence of fragmented tablets (circa 1750 B.C.). The Sumerians used a cuneiform script that was later copied by the Assyrians and Babylonians.

In classical Greece, literature developed out of an oral tradition. The earliest surviving Greek writing is probably that of Homer, an eighth or ninth-century B.C. poet who created (and possibly wrote, according to recent research) the Iliad (circa 750 B.C.) and the Odyssey (circa 720 B.C.), epic poems written at a time when reading and writing were used primarily to supplant memory and the oral tradition in the telling of a tale. Evidence of persons reading in classical art appear to be fairly rare. However, there are representations and references to classical reading in such nineteenth-century works as Lawrence Alma-Tadema’s painting A Reading from Homer (1885) in the Philadelphia Museum of Art in Pennsylvania and the John Keats poem “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer.”

An allegorical interpretation of reading can found in Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres’s The Apotheosis of Homer (1827) in the Louvre, which shows the poet crowned by figures of Victory (Nike) and surrounded by the great artists and writers of the past. This neoclassical painting can be interpreted as a statement on the importance of reading the classics.

Among Christian images of reading, Moses displaying the stone tablets of the Ten Commandments to the people to read (Exodus 20:1–17) is probably the most compelling. This was captured consummately by Rembrandt Van Rijn in Moses (1659) in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin-Dahlem, Germany. Moses holds the Ten Commandments, which are written in Hebrew, over his head to show his followers. Michelangelo’s sculpture Moses (1545) at the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli in Rome has Moses holding the tablets while seated.

Another thematic use of reading in the Old Testament involves the story of Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon, who was warned of his defeat by the appearance of handwriting on a wall (Daniel 5)—the origin of the expression, “I can see the handwriting on the wall.” The prophet Daniel interpreted the mystic words “MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN” to mean that Belshazzar’s days as king were numbered, and his kingdom would be given to the Medes and Persians—events that actually occurred. In Rembrandt’s Belshazzar Sees the Handwriting on the Wall (1630s), Belshazzar can be seen reading handwriting on a wall, written upside down in Hebrew, as if it had been written by God on high.

Other representations of Old Testament figures reading include Michelangelo’s Sistine Chapel fresco Prophets and Sibyls (1511), in which five of the seven prophets hold books and all five sibyls read. (Sibyls were classical figures such as the Delphic Oracle, whose prophesies were thought to foretell Jesus Christ’s coming). Another example of a prophet reading appears in the right background of Parmigianino’s The Madonna with the Long Neck (1534–1540) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, in which a prophet, probably Isaiah, reads a scroll predicting the coming of the Messiah (Isaiah 11:1–9; 40:1–11).

One New Testament example of reading refers to a book from the Old Testament: Christ reading from the Book of the Prophet Isaiah in the synagogue of Nazareth (his hometown). Christ reads, “. . . he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised” (Luke 4:18). After Christ hands the book to a minister and sits down, he says, “This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears” (Luke 4:21).

Although not expressly described in the Bible as having occurred, a great many representations of Mary show her reading. By far the majority of these are scenes of the Annunciation that portray Mary reading the prophecies of the Messiah in the Old Testament. Early examples include medieval manuscript illuminations such as Jean Bourdichon’s “Annunciation” in the Très Grandes Heures d’Anne de Bretagne (before 1521) in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris; one attributed to Jean Colombe in the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York (M. 834, fol. 29); and one in the Hours of Henry VII in the British Library in London (Add. MS 35254). These representations have been cited as an important precedent: at one time scholastics argued about whether or not women in ancient times had read, an argument that was partially settled by citing the Annunciation scenes that portray the Virgin reading.

Sometimes the Madonna is shown reading alone at the Annunciation, as in Giotto’s fresco The Annunciation (1305–1306) in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy. Another example is Antonello da Messina’s painting The Annunciation (fifteenth century) in the Museo Nazionale in Palermo, Italy. Sometimes Mary is portrayed reading in the company of an angel, as in Joos van Cleve’s The Annunciation (early sixteenth century) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, Simone Martini’s panel The Annunciation (1333) in the Uffizi, Fra Filippo Lippi’s panel The Annunciation (circa 1440) in San Lorenzo in Florence, and Botticelli’s Annunciation panel (1489–1490) in the Uffizi.

Mary has also been portrayed reading amid an elaborate interior, as she does in the Annunciation panel of the Merode Altarpiece (circa 1425) by the Master of the Flémalle (Robert Campin?) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Here the painting itself must be “read” to get a sense of its full significance. Mary is seated on the ground, signifying her humility, near a bench decorated with lions at the corners, a reference to the house of David. She holds a cloth around the Bible as a display of reverence. There is a lily on the table, a symbol of her purity, and a candle whose flame has just gone out, a symbol of the light of the divine entering human flesh in the Incarnation. Through the window on the left, a tiny figure flies holding a cross, signifying the future crucifixion of the baby to be born. Additional symbolism can be read in this triptych, but this is a sufficient example of how one can “read” less apparent meanings from a painting’s iconography.

Additional representations of Mary reading include the Virgin being taught to read by her mother Anna, and Mary teaching the Christ Child to read. Peter Paul Rubens secularized the former scene from the Christian setting into the Medici cycle Education of Marie de Medici (1622) in the Louvre, in which Athena, the goddess of wisdom, instructs Marie, and the Graces and Mercury, the messenger god, look on. Saints have also been portrayed reading, as in Filippino Lippi’s Vision of St. Bernard (before 1504) in the Church of the Badia in Florence, in Albrecht Dürer’s St. Jerome in His Study (before 1528) in the National Gallery in London, and many others.

One of the more famous reading scenes involves the adulterous love affair between Francesca da Rimini and her brother-in-law Paolo Malatesta as described by Dante in The Divine Comedy (1472, written 1307–1321). Upon seeing Francesca and Paolo amid a whirlwind of lovers, Dante asks them how they got there:

One day we read for pastime how in thrall
 Lord Lancelot lay to love, who loved the Queen;
 We were alone—we thought no harm at all.
 As we read on, our eyes met now and then,
 And to our cheeks the changing color started
 But just one moment overcame us—when We read of the smile, desired of lips long thwarted,
 Such smile, by such a lover kissed away,
 He that may never more from me be parted Trembling all over, kissed my mouth. I say the book was Galleot . . . we read no more that day.
 (The Inferno V, lines 127–138).

Both souls ended up in hell after they were killed during their lovemaking by Francesca’s husband. They had been reading the Arthurian legend of the knight Lancelot du Lac’s illicit love for Guinevere, which inspired similar activity on their part. John Flaxman’s engraving Paolo and Francesca (1793), which shows the lovers reading, inspired a number of works on this scene that warn of the dangers of reading. Examples include Paolo and Francesca paintings by Ingres (1819) in the Musée Condé in Chantilly, France; Eugène Delacroix (nineteenth century) in the collection of Dr. Peter Nathan in Zurich, Switzerland; and Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1855) in the Tate Gallery in London; as well as William Dyce’s Francesca da Rimini (circa 1837) in the National Gallery of Scotland in Edinburgh.

Many genre scenes of reading exist, such as Jean-Honoré Fragonard’s The Reader (A Young Girl Reading) (circa 1776) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.; Rembrandt’s Old Woman Reading (seventeenth century), Titus Reading (seventeenth century), and The Prophetess Hannah Reading (1631) in, respectively, Drumlanrig Castle in Scotland, the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, and the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, the Netherlands; Berthe Morisot’s The Artist’s Mother and Sister (1869–1870) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.; Vincent van Gogh’s L’Arlesienne (Madame Ginoux) (1888) in New York’s Metropolitan Museum of Art; and Winslow Homer’s The New Novel (nineteenth century) in the Museum of Fine Arts in Springfield, Massachusetts. During the nineteenth century, when literacy among the general population of the Western world improved dramatically, a number of paintings began to show newspaper reading, such as Paul Cézanne’s portrait of his father reading entitled L’Evenement (circa 1859), in the National Gallery in London; Edgar Degas’s The Office of a Cotton Firm (nineteenth century) in a museum in Pau, France; Mary Cassatt’s Reading Le Figaro (1883) in a private collection; and Richard Caton Woodville's War News from Mexico (nineteenth century) in the National Academy of Design in New York.

Letter reading is another specific type of reading that has been depicted over the centuries, such as in Jan Vermeer's Girl Reading a Letter (circa 1657) and The Love Letter (circa 1670). Reading music has also frequently been depicted, such as in Hendrik Terbrugghen's Boy Singing (1620s) in Boston's Museum of Fine Arts, and Vermeer's The Concert (circa 1670), formerly in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston.

A classic example of nonreading, Cézanne's Lady in Blue (before 1906) in the Museum of Western Art in Moscow, Russia, shows a woman holding a closed book. The woman herself looks withdrawn, as if she does not want to face the viewer and has her own distinct rules and ideas. She is sealed off from unwelcome contact with others or from new ideas—"closed book."

See also Kiss/Kissing; Logos/Word

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

The Palette of King Narmer, stone, circa 3000 B.C., Cairo, Egypt, Egyptian Museum

Seated Scribe, sculpture, circa 2400 B.C., originally from Saqqara, Egypt, now in Paris, Louvre

Homer

Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, The Apotheosis of Homer, oil, 1827, Paris, Louvre

Alma-Tadema, Lawrence, A Reading from Homer, oil, 1885, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art

Old Testament

King Solomon Reading the Torah, miniature, from Hebrew Bible and Prayer Book, thirteenth century, London, British Library (Add. MS. 11639, fol. 116a)

Michelangelo, Prophets and Sibyls, fresco, 1511, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Michelangelo, Moses, sculpture, 1545, Rome, Italy, San Pietro in Vincoli

Parmigianino, The Madonna with the Long Neck, oil, 1534–1540, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Rembrandt van Rijn, Belshazzar Sees the Handwriting on the Wall, oil, 1630s, London, National Gallery

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Prophetess Hannah Reading (Rembrandt's Mother), panel, 1631, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Rembrandt van Rijn, Moses, oil, 1659, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie

West, Benjamin, Daniel Interpreting to Belshazzar the Handwriting on the Wall, oil on canvas, 1775, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Berkshire Museum

Allston, Washington, Belshazzar's Feast, oil on canvas, 1817–1843, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Art

Martin, John, Belshazzar's Feast, oil on canvas, 1821, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum

Madonna Reading

Giotto, The Annunciation, fresco, 1305–1306, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Simone Martini, The Annunciation, panel, 1333, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Antonello da Messina, The Annunciation, painting, fifteenth century, Palermo, Italy, Museo Nazionale

St. Anne Teaching the Virgin to Read, illumination, from Burgundy Breviary, French, circa 1415, London, British Library (Harley MS 2897, fol. 340b)

Lippi, Fra Filippo, The Annunciation, panel, circa 1440, Florence, Italy, San Lorenzo

Master of the Flémalle (Robert Campin?), Merode Altarpiece, oil, circa 1425, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Botticelli, Annunciation, panel, 1489–1490, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Cleve, Joos van, The Annunciation, painting, early sixteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Bourdichon, Jean, Annunciation, from Très Grandes Heures d'Anne de Bretagne, before 1521, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

La Tour, Étienne de, The Education of the Virgin, oil, circa 1649–1650, New York, Frick Collection

Colombe, Jean, manuscript, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M. 834, fol. 29)

Hours of Henry VII, illuminated manuscript, London, British Library (Add. MS 35254)

Saints

Bellini, Giovanni, Saint Jerome Reading, oil on panel, circa 1480–1490, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Lippi, Filippino, Vision of St. Bernard, before 1504, Florence, Italy, Church of the Badia

Dürer, Albrecht, St. Jerome in His Study, before 1528, London, National Gallery

La Tour, Georges de, St. Jerome Reading, before 1652, Paris, Louvre

Historic

Rubens, Peter Paul, Education of Marie de Medici, oil, 1622, Paris, Louvre

Barocci, Federico, Quintilia Fischieri, oil on canvas, circa 1600, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Literary

Flaxman, John, Paolo and Francesca, line engraving, 1793, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Ingres, Jean-Auguste-Dominique, Paolo and Francesca, oil, 1819, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé

Delacroix, Eugène, Paolo and Francesca, nineteenth century, Zurich, Switzerland, collection of Dr. Peter Nathan

Dyce, William, Francesca da Rimini, oil on canvas, circa 1837, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Munro, Alexander, Paolo and Francesca, marble sculpture, 1852, Birmingham, England, Museums and Art Gallery

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Paolo and Francesca, watercolor, 1855, London, Tate Gallery

Genre Scenes

- Rembrandt van Rijn, Old Woman Reading, painting, seventeenth century, Scotland, Drumlanrig Castle
- Rembrandt van Rijn, Titus Reading, painting, seventeenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Stubbs, George, A Lady Reading in a Wooded Park, 1768–1770, private collection
- Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, The Reader (A Young Girl Reading), oil on canvas, circa 1776, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Martineau, Robert Braithwaite, The Last Chapter, oil on canvas, 1863, Birmingham, England, Museums and Art Gallery

Letter Reading

- Vermeer, Jan, Girl Reading a Letter, oil, circa 1657, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
- Vermeer, Jan, The Love Letter, oil, circa 1670, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Newman, Robert Loftin, The Letter, oil on canvas, 1880s, Washington, D.C., Phillips Collection
- Picasso, Pablo, The Reading of the Letter, oil, 1913, Paris, Musée Picasso

Reading Music

- Della Robbia, Luca, Cantorio, marble relief, 1431–1438, Florence, Italy, Museo dell'Opera del Duomo
- Terbrugghen, Hendrik, Boy Singing, oil, 1620s, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Vermeer, Jan, The Concert, oil, circa 1670, formerly in Boston, Massachusetts, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum
- Picasso, Pablo, Three Musicians, oil, 1921, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Reading a Newspaper

- Cassatt, Mary, Reading Le Figaro, oil, 1883, private collection
- Woodville, Richard Caton, War News from Mexico, oil, nineteenth century, New York, National Academy of Design
- Cézanne, Paul, L'Evenement (The Painter's Father, Louis Auguste Cézanne), oil, circa 1859, London, National Gallery
- Degas, Edgar, The Office of a Cotton Firm, painting, nineteenth century, Pau, France, Museum
- Picasso, Pablo, Student with Newspaper, oil, 1913, private collection

Modern

- Morisot, Berthe, The Artist's Mother and Sister, oil, 1869–1870, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

- Morisot, Berthe, Reading, oil, 1873, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art
- Homer, Winslow, The New Novel, watercolor, 1877, Springfield, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Gogh, Vincent van, L'Arlesienne (Madame Ginoux), painting, 1888, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
- John, Gwen, Woman Reading at a Window, 1900, New York, Museum of Modern Art
- Cézanne, Paul, Lady in Blue, painting, before 1906, Moscow, Russia, Museum of Western Art
- Matisse, Henri, Marguerite Reading, oil, 1906, Grenoble, France, Museum
- Rauschenberg, Robert, Rebus, 1955, Sweden, private collection
- Rauschenberg, Robert, Small Rebus, 1956, Los Angeles, California, Museum of Contemporary Art

Further Reading

- Bedaux, Jean Baptist, The Reality of Symbols, The Hague, The Netherlands: Schwartz, 1990
- Bindman, David, editor, John Flaxman, R. A., London: Thames and Hudson, 1979
- Carter, John, and Percy Muir, editors, Printing and the Mind of Man, London: Cassell, 1967; New York: Rinehart and Winston, 1967
- Dante Alighieri, The Divine Comedy, translated by Dorothy L. Sayers, Baltimore and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1973
- Dyson, Anthony, Pictures to Print: The Nineteenth Century Engraving Trade, London: Farrand Press, 1984
- Jussim, Estelle, Visual Communication and the Graphic Arts: Photographic Technologies in the Nineteenth Century, New York: Bowker, 1974
- Moran, James, Printing Presses: History and Development from the Fifteenth Century to Modern Times, London: Faber, 1973
- Murray, Linda, Michelangelo, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1980
- Nochlin, Linda, The Politics of Vision: Essays on Nineteenth Century Art and Society, New York: Harper, 1989
- Panofsky, Erwin, Meaning in the Visual Arts, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1955
- Roskill, Mark, The Interpretation of Pictures, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1989
- Scholes, Robert, Semiotics and Interpretation, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1982
- Steinberg, Leo, "Interrupted Reading," First M. Victor Leventritt Lecture at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, December 10, 1985

SACRIFICE

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Sacrifice:

DIANA

IPHIGENIA

ALCESTIS

PERSEUS AND ANDROMEDA

MITHRAS SLAYING A BULL

SACRIFICE OF CAIN AND
ABEL

NOAH

MANOAH

JOACHIM AND ZACHARIAS

ISAAC

LAMB AS SACRIFICE

LAMB IDENTIFYING CHRIST WITH HOLY FAMILY OR
ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST

ADULT ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST IDENTIFYING CHRIST AS LAMB OF GOD

PELICAN

SACRIFICE IN WAR

MISCELLANEOUS

Rembrandt van Rijn, Abraham's Sacrifice,
1655, etching, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Harvey D. Parker Collection.
(Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

The root meaning of sacrifice is “to make sacred,” and its first definition is an offering to a deity as propitiation or homage. It also means that which is sacrificed, a renunciation of something valued for the sake of a more important goal, and a selling or giving up of something at less than its estimated value. The difference between martyrdom and sacrifice is that martyrdom is a willing offering of self for one’s principles, whereas a sacrifice may be an unwilling one, not chosen by the victim. (The offering of the fruits of the land is considered separately in this encyclopedia in the essay Offering.)

In ancient times, sacrifice was seen as restoring the balance of nature: an offering to promote fertility. This sometimes took the form of the ritual sacrifice of the king to bring fertility to the land. The most common type was animal sacrifice. Often a young bull, a goat, or a lamb was sacrificed as a burnt offering to the gods. Animal sacrifice as part of a religious ritual still occurs in parts of India and among voodoo cults. Human sacrifice traditionally was associated with atonement for sins or for the overreaching ambitions and pride of men. Child sacrifice was also practiced in the ancient world, as in the Phoenician sacrifice of children into a fiery furnace to propitiate the god and ensure population control. In the religion of the sun god Mithras, the sacrifice of a bull expressed the desire that the spirit might triumph over animal passions, an example of the idea of sacrificing to transcend the confining pattern of existence and rise to a higher state.

Certain symbols have been associated with sacrifice, such as the lamb, which was an offering at the altar in classical, Old Testament, and New Testament contexts. The lamb as a sacrificial animal is cited as early as Genesis 4:3–4, when Abel’s offering of a lamb, the “firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof,” is approved by God, while Cain’s offering of “the fruit of the ground” is rejected. In the New Testament, the lamb is a symbol of Jesus Christ and also of his followers. Christ is identified as the Lamb of God in such passages as John 1:29: “The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.” Jesus is both lamb and shepherd in John 10:11–18: “I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. . . . I lay down my life for the sheep. . . .” Following the description in Revelation 14:1, Christ as lamb is often shown with a nimbus, standing on a hill from which four streams of water flow.

Christ as Good Shepherd, with a lamb resting on his shoulders, appears in a fresco of the third century A.D. in the catacomb of St. Callixtus in Rome. Similar figures symbolizing Christ also appear in the fourth century in the catacomb of Domitilla and that of SS. Pietro e Marcellino, both in Rome. The Good Shepherd with a lamb on his shoulders is also shown in sculptures of the early Christian period, the most notable being the marble representation from the first half of the fourth century at the Christiano Museum in Rome.

The lamb of God standing for Christ is shown in such works as the manuscript illustration (circa 1180) in the San Pedro de Cardena Burgos Beatus. The lamb with a nimbus stands below the cross in gold, from which the letters alpha and omega (the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet) hang. Two angels flanking the lamb point to it.

The infant Christ is often identified with a lamb in representations of the Holy Family, especially in those including the infant John the Baptist. In Leonardo da Vinci’s painting Madonna and St. Anne (circa 1508–1513) in the Louvre in Paris, Christ appears on the right side as an infant holding a lamb, as if defining his future sacrificial role. The infant St. John offers the lamb to the Christ Child in a number of paintings, such as those by Palma Vecchio and Simon Vouet. In works such as the early sixteenth-century painting by Bernardo Luini in the Ambrosiana in Milan, Italy, the child St. John appears with a lamb; in others, such as Infant Christ and St. John the Baptist by Bartolomé Esteban Murillo in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, a lamb next to Christ foretells his sacrifice.

Sometimes, lambs are associated with the flock of Christ and may be deserted, as in William Holman Hunt’s Hireling Shepherd (1851) and Strayed Sheep (1852). These flocks are at risk because they do not have a faithful shepherd to care for them.

The adult St. John the Baptist is also portrayed with a lamb, which he identifies with Christ, as in the illumination of Pol, Jean, and Herman de Limbourg in Belles Heures de Jean, Duc de Berry, where John the Baptist in the wilderness holds a lamb in his right arm and points to it with his left. The adult St. John the Baptist identifying Christ as the Lamb of God also appears in paintings by Giovanni di Paolo, Guido Reni, and Salvador Rosa.

Christ as the Lamb of God is also involved in the Roman Catholic and Anglican liturgies in the Agnus Dei—“Oh Lamb of God that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us. . . .” In music, this chorus is one of the high points of George Frideric Handel’s Messiah. Some Anglican hymns also, as in the Lenten hymn or the 1940 Hymnal, identify Christ as the Lamb of God: “At the Lamb’s high feast we sing Praise to our victorious King. . . .”

The Lamb of God on the altar, with blood flowing from its breast, appears in Adoration of the Lamb, the central panel of the Ghent Altarpiece (1432) by Jan and Hubert van Eyck. The blood of the lamb symbolizes both sacrifice and the wine of the Mass or Eucharist. The lamb is also associated with innocence, as in the innocence of Christ’s sacrifice and as a more general characterization, such as in William Blake's poem "The Lamb" from Songs of Innocence.

The pelican is another symbol for sacrifice because, according to legend, the pelican pierces its breast to feed its children with its own blood. This action is seen as analogous to Christ's sacrifice on the cross, as he gave his blood for the redemption of humanity, according to Christian belief. Psalm 102 identifies the pelican with suffering, such as that of Christ on the cross:

Hear my prayer, O Lord, and let my cry come unto thee. Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble; incline thine ear unto me: in the day when I call answer me speedily. For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as an hearth. My heart is smitten, and withered like grass; so that I forget to eat my bread. By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin. I am like a pelican of the wilderness. . . ." (Psalm 102: 1-6)

Representations of the pelican occur in church art, as on a nave capital in the church of Ste. Madeleine at Vézelay, France. Pelicans also occur nesting above the cross to emphasize Christ's sacrifice, as in Francesco Pesellino's Crucifixion with St. Jerome and St. Francis (1440-1445) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., and they were used in church decorative art, as in examples by Dante Gabriel Rossetti made for Morris, Marshall, Faulkner and Company, which had many commissions for liturgical art. Rossetti's sketches may have been designed for the sedilia in the Llandaff Cathedral in Wales, where he designed an altarpiece, The Seed of David. Representations of pelicans as symbols of self-sacrifice also appear in ecclesiastical stained glass, as in a pelican roundel (1862) for a window by William Morris for All Saints Church in Selsey, England, or Philip Webb's nineteenth-century drawing of a pelican in a quatrefoil design for stained glass.

The representation of the Indo-Persian god Mithras slaying a bull to ensure continuing fertility provides another symbol of sacrifice. The Mythraic mystery cult, which flourished in Rome and the Roman Empire, was a rival to early Christianity. In late Roman sculpture, Mithras is shown wearing a Phrygian cap, tunic, and leggings, standing over the bull with one knee pressed into its back, holding the bull's nose or horn to pull its head back while plunging a dagger into its neck. Most examples of the sacrifice of the bull, often in a cave, come from Roman sculpture of the second or third century A.D., although reference to Mithras and the bull occur in later art as well. Perhaps the sacrifice of the bull survives in the Iberian tradition of the bullfight.

In classical literature, two plays by Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis and its sequel, Iphigenia in Taurus, recount the sacrifice of Iphigenia, the daughter of Clytemnestra and Agamemnon, to enable the becalmed Greek ships to sail to Troy. In Euripides' version, a deer is sent as a substitute at the moment of sacrifice, and Iphigenia is transported to Taurus to be a priestess of the moon goddess, Artemis, but in the play Agamemnon by Aeschylus (ll. 199-257), Iphigenia becomes a human sacrifice to propitiate the gods. An early representation of the sacrifice of Iphigenia is in a wall painting from Pompeii in the Museo Archaeologico Nazionale in Naples, Italy, which shows her raising her arm entreatingly. Giovanni Battista Tiepolo painted an illusionistic rendering of the scene at the Villa Valmarana in Vicenza, Italy, in 1757.

In an early version of the sacrifice of Iphigenia (circa 490 B.C.) from the ancient Greek city of Selinus in Sicily, Iphigenia is dressed as a bride and is led to the altar by a warrior, sword in his hand, identified as Teukeros. A variant appears on a fourth-century B.C. red-figure vase in the British Museum in London; here, the high priest Calchas holds a knife pointing toward Iphigenia while just behind her appears the deer that will be substituted for the human victim. Tiepolo follows this version in his fresco The Sacrifice of Iphigenia in the entry hall of the Villa Valmarana. Here, the victim is placed centrally at the altar while Calchas looks imploringly to heaven. The deer sent by Artemis arrives airborne on a small cloud on the left and is held by a winged putto. The drama of the story is fully realized because the fresco is at the level of the viewer, who becomes a participant in the scene.

Another popular sacrifice of a beautiful young maiden is the story of Perseus and Andromeda, told by Ovid in Metamorphoses (books 4 and 5) and later in William Morris's poem "The Doom of Acrisius" in his Earthly Paradise saga. Both Sophocles and Euripides wrote plays on the subject, but the story does not appear in Homer or Hesiod. Andromeda was the daughter of King Cepheus and Queen Cassiopeia, who boasted that she was more beautiful than the sea nymphs or Nereids. They complained to Poseidon, the god of the sea, who sent a monster to ravage the land. When the king consulted the oracle, it said that sacrificing Andromeda on a rock by the sea would appease the monster. Accordingly, she was bound to a rock (or stakes in earlier representations) but was saved at the last moment by Perseus, who swooped down on his winged sandals, or winged horse, killed the monster, and then claimed Andromeda as his bride—the male fantasy of rescue, complete with the reward of a beautiful princess. The sacrifice and rescue appear as early as 560 B.C. on a black-figure Corinthian amphora from Cevetri, now in Berlin, with Perseus throwing rocks at a monster. An Attic red-figure hydria (circa 430 B.C.) shows Andromeda held by servants, with others driving stakes to which she will be bound; a mid-fourth-century Campanian red-figure hydria shows Andromeda chained to a rock with Perseus below, attacking an enormous fish with a harpoon or sicklelike sword. A classical Greek relief in the Capitoline Museum in Rome shows Andromeda being helped off her rock by the hero. In all these representations, Perseus is shown naked (the heroic nude) and Andromeda fully dressed.

By the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, Andromeda is the nude figure and Perseus is fully armored, as evidenced in works by Titian and Peter Paul Rubens in the Wallace Collection in London and the Gemäldegalerie in Berlin-Dahlem, respectively. The nudity of Andromeda and the armor of Perseus continue into nineteenth-century representations of the sacrifice of Andromeda, like those by Edward Coley Burne-Jones in a private collection; Frederick Leighton in the Walker Art Gallery in Liverpool, England; and Edward John Poynter, now in a private collection. The naked vulnerability of the victim likely enhanced her appeal to Victorian men with chivalric pretensions.

Alcestis, who offered to die in place of her husband, Admetus, King of Phœria in Thessaly, is another ancient example of sacrifice. At their wedding, Admetus neglected to sacrifice to Artemis and therefore was destined to die. Apollo persuaded the Fates to let Admetus live if someone were willing to die in his place. Only Alcestis would make this sacrifice, but she was spared because Hercules wrestled Death (Thanatos) for her life and restored her to her husband. This legend was told in Euripides' play Alcestis, Plato's Symposium, Apollodorus's Bibliotheca, and Hyginus's Fabulae.

This story of wifely sacrifice is represented on Roman sarcophagi such as Sarcophagus of C. Junius Euhodius (circa A.D. 161–170) in the Museo Chiaramonti in the Vatican and Story of Alcestis Sarcophagus (circa 170–180) in the Villa Albani in Rome. It also occurs in a painting by Jean-François-Pierre Peyron (1785) in the Louvre in Paris.

Sacrifices to various gods and goddesses have also been depicted. In one mid-seventeenth-century example, Eustache Le Sueur's Sacrifice to Diana, a man in profile on the left and a woman on the right sacrifice at a flaming altar before a central sculpture of the huntress goddess. This scene re-created the classical custom of offering incense or sacrificing an animal to propitiate a god or goddess, ask for a favor, or give thanks.

In Christian literature, sacrifice is a continuing theme. It starts as early as the fourth chapter of Genesis in the sacrifice of Cain and Abel: Abel's sacrifice of the lamb is preferred to Cain's offering of the fruits of the earth, and Cain in his jealousy slays his brother. The scene of the sacrifice appears on a Spanish Romanesque capital in the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, with the hand of God coming out of a cloud and pointing to Abel's sacrifice. Another is a nineteenth-century painting by John Everett Millais in the City Art Gallery in Birmingham, England. Still others include the eleventh-century bronze doors of Bishop Bernward at St. Michael's in Hildesheim, Germany, and Titian's oil painting (1542–1543) in the Church of Sta. Maria della Salute in Venice, Italy.

Sacrifice that has received more artistic representation is Abraham's sacrifice of his only son at God's command, told in Genesis 22. Abraham had left Ur of the Chaldees at God's command and, although old, was the father of a young son, Isaac, as God had promised he would be. This promise of posterity was seemingly cut short when God ordered Abraham to take his only son to a high mountain and sacrifice him as a burnt offering. The sacrifice of his only son would be a test of Abraham's faith. The overwhelming feelings of horror and despair that came over Abraham as he was about to cut the boy's throat in sacrifice are mirrored in his face and pose in the etching Abraham's Sacrifice (1655) by Rembrandt van Rijn. Just as Abraham is about to strike, an angel appears behind him and stays Abraham's hand. The amazement and terror of the intervention are obvious on Abraham's face, as he is shown in the engraving not as an imposing Old Testament patriarch but as a very human father. The scene is not a costume piece of a biblical past but an eternal theme that raises questions about a father's relationship to his son. It calls to mind the phrase "The son was sacrificed to his father's ambition" (or his desire for his son to succeed, possibly where the father had not, as an athlete, a lawyer, a wealthy man, and so on).

The sacrifice of Isaac was a popular subject with artists not only as a prefiguration of God's sacrificing His only son in the New Testament but also for the drama and emotions it contained. Early Christians depicted the scene in the Roman catacombs of St. Callixtus and Priscilla. It appears in the thirteenth century in the Upper Church of St. Francis in Assisi, Italy, and was the subject of the competition for the Baptistery doors in Florence, Italy, which included gilt bronze reliefs by both Andrea Ghiberti and Filippo Brunelleschi, now in the Bargello in Florence. Andrea del Sarto painted a dramatic version of the sacrifice, now in the Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art, as did Caravaggio, whose painting, now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, is in grand Baroque style.

Titian painted a spectacular Sacrifice of Isaac on the ceiling of the Church of Sta. Maria della Salute at the same time as his ceiling renditions of Cain Killing Abel and David Killing Goliath. The latter two show heavily muscled figures in violent action organized in a dominant diagonal composition. They are painted to be seen from below, with dramatic foreshortening of the figures and strong dramatic action. Titian's Sacrifice of Isaac is an illusionistic tour de force, combining Roman drawing with Venetian color in a seldom equaled synthesis.

In addition to the Cain and Abel sacrifice and the sacrifice of Abraham, which appear in a number of pictorial and sculptural works, there are many representations of Noah's sacrifice, the sacrifice of Jacob and Laban, Aaron's offerings to the golden calf, Manoah's sacrifice, David's sacrifice, and Solomon's sacrifices to pagan gods. This last subject was especially popular with seventeenth-century Dutch artists and can be seen in paintings by Leonard Bramer, Gerbrand van den Eeckhout, Solomon Koninck, and Willem de Poorter.

The sacrifice of Manoah was an important subject for Rembrandt and his pupils. The story, which comes from Judges 13:2–24, tells of Manoah and his wife sacrificing in thanksgiving for the news brought by an angel that they would have a son, Samson. Pieter Lastman, Rembrandt's teacher, painted the subject in 1627, but Rembrandt's version of 1641 bears little resemblance to his master's. In Lastman's painting, the angel with raised arms stands frontally in the air on the left, the kneeling wife appears frontally with raised arms, and Manoah, in profile, kneels in the right foreground. Lastman presents his version in daylight, Rembrandt at night, showing the couple kneeling in a vast space, while the angel, seen from the back, ascends left. Rembrandt borrowed his composition from a woodcut of the same subject (1563) by Maerten van Heemskerck, and this form, with the angel on the left seen in flight from the rear, appears in similar compositions of Manoah's sacrifice by Rembrandt's pupils Govaert Flinck and Jan Victors.

An unusual depiction of sacrifice occurs in William Holman Hunt's The Scapegoat (1856) in the Lady Lever Art Gallery in Port Sunlight, England, which shows the goat that the Jews used on the Day of Atonement as a surrogate sacrifice for their sins that was to be driven out to die in the wilderness (Leviticus 16). Hunt painted most of the work by the Dead Sea to capture the verisimilitude of its Old Testament site but had difficulties, as the goats, staked out in the intense heat of the salty plain, kept dying on him—a case of sacrifice to art.

The topic of sacrifice runs like a scarlet thread through the Bible, with each mention departing further from human or animal sacrifices as burnt offerings to God. A new concept of sacrifice appears in Psalm 51:16–17: “For thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise”; and in Hosea 6:6: “For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.” Proverbs 21:3 proclaims, “To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice.” Here, the outward form of burnt offerings is changed to an inner sacrifice of contrition and to behavior that pleases God.

Although scenes of sacrifice are less common in the New Testament, there are pictorial representations of Zacharias sacrificing incense at the altar when an angel appears to him to announce the coming birth of John the Baptist. One example is Andrea Sacchi’s mid-seventeenth century Zacharias Sacrificing at the Altar in the Lateran in Rome.

Another similar subject that has been explored by artists is the story of Joachim, the father of the Virgin Mary, whose sacrifice at the altar is refused by the priest Zacharias because Joachim is childless. Sometimes, the sacrifice of both Joachim and his wife, Anna, are refused, and Joachim is driven from the temple. Joachim’s exile from the temple is the subject of works such as those by Agnolo Gaddi in the Cathedral of Prato, Italy, and Taddeo Gaddi in S. Croce in Florence. Domenico Ghirlandaio also shows Joachim’s sacrifice refused in a fresco on the left wall of Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. Several moving representations by Giotto show Joachim’s sacrifice refused and his exile into the wilderness. Of these works by Giotto, all in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy, the first shows Joachim on the far right being pushed out of the temple by an officious bearded priest. In the second, the dejected Joachim is on the left, bending his head in grief as he talks to the shepherds in the center of the fresco, with the sheep and sheepfold on the right.

In the New Testament, Luke (2:23–24) tells of the customary sacrifice of a pair of turtledoves or young pigeons offered for the first male child born and of the prophet Simeon’s recognition of Jesus as the promised Messiah when his parents come to sacrifice: “For mine eyes have seen thy salvation” (Luke 2:29–32).

In his ministry, Jesus echoed Hosea’s definition of sacrifice when he answered the Pharisees’ question about why he ate with publicans and sinners. He said that those who are well do not need a physician, but those who are sick do. “I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance” (Matthew 9:10–13). Christ himself became the ultimate sacrifice, offering up his life in the Crucifixion for the sins of the world: “He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. . . . So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation” (Hebrews 9:26–28). The final Christian ideal of sacrifice is an offering of oneself to God, as Paul wrote in Romans 12:1:

“I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.”

In a modern secular context, sacrifice usually means giving up one’s life for a cause or a principle believed, such as Nathan Hale’s sacrifice of his life for his country in the American Revolution, Lord Byron’s death at Missolonghi in 1824 for the cause of Greek independence from Turkey, or Martin Luther King Jr.’s assassination in the cause of civil rights. Nathan Hale is the subject of a commemorative sculpture by Frederick MacMonnies, who shows Hale, condemned to die as a spy by the British during the American Revolution, striding forward as if uttering his famous words, “I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country.” The deaths and maimings of war provide another context for sacrifice, perhaps best expressed by United States President Abraham Lincoln in the Gettysburg Address on November 19, 1863:

But in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our power to add or to detract. . . . It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion.

Käthe Kollwitz poignantly expressed this concept in her Pietà in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, which portrays a mother holding her dead son in her lap (Kollwitz’s son died in World War I, her grandson in World War II). Ernst Ludwig Kirchner depicted his own sacrifice as a soldier in World War I when he painted a self-portrait in uniform with his right hand amputated—a symbolic statement for his experiences in the war, which were so traumatic that they prevented him from painting for a period and drove him to a nervous breakdown.

Sacrifice was one of the motive forces in Toltec, Mayan, and Aztec civilizations in pre-Columbian Mesoamerica. It was their belief that the gods needed blood sacrifices, especially the sun god, who required still-beating hearts, usually of captives, to sustain him in his journey across the sky. Captain James Cook reported human sacrifice for success in war on his third voyage in the Pacific in 1777. German anthropologist and archaeologist Leo Frobenius wrote of sacrifice for rain in southern Rhodesia. The idea of sacrifice appears to bring out the best and the worst in humanity: the best when we sacrifice ourselves and our selfish goals, the worst when we sacrifice others.

See also Martyrdom; Offering

Selected Works of Art

Diana

Le Sueur, Eustache, Sacrifice to Diana, oil, mid-seventeenth century, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts

Iphigenia

The Sacrifice of Iphigenia, Attic white-ground lekythos, circa 490 B.C., originally from Selinus, Italy, now in Palermo, Italy, Museo Nazionale

The Sacrifice of Iphigenia, red-figure vase, fourth century B.C., London, British Museum

The Sacrifice of Iphigenia, fresco, from the House of the Tragic Muse, Pompeii, circa 50 B.C., Naples, Italy, Museo Archaeologico Nazionale

Steen, Jan, Sacrifice of Iphigenia, 1671, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, The Sacrifice of Iphigenia, fresco, 1757, Vicenza, Italy, Villa Valmarana

Alcestis

Sarcophagus of C. Junius Euhodius, relief sculpture, circa 161–170, Vatican, Museo Chiaramonti

Story of Alcestis Sarcophagus, relief sculpture, circa 170–180, Rome, Villa Albani

Peyron, Jean-François-Pierre, Death of Alcestis, oil, 1785, Paris, Louvre

Delacroix, Eugène, Hercules Bringing Alcestis Back from Hades, oil, 1862, Washington, D.C., Phillips Gallery

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Love Leading Alcestis, watercolor cartoon for a tapestry, 1863, Oxford, England, Ashmolean Museum

Leighton, Frederick, Hercules Wrestling Death for the Soul of Alcestis, oil, 1871, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum

Story, William Wetmore, Alcestis, marble sculpture, after 1874, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum

Perseus and Andromeda

Sacrifice and Rescue of Andromeda, Corinthian black-figure amphora, 560 B.C., from Cevetri, now in Berlin, Antique Museum

Andromeda and Servants, Attic red-figure hydria, circa 430 B.C., London, British Museum

Andromeda Chained to the Rock, Campanian red-figure hydria, mid-fourth century B.C., Berlin, Antique Museum

Perseus Rescuing Andromeda, marble relief, Greek classical period, Rome, Capitoline Museum

Titian, Perseus Rescuing Andromeda, oil, circa 1556, London, Wallace Collection

Vasari, Giorgio, Perseus and Andromeda, oil, 1570–1572, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Vecchio

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Rescue of Andromeda, oil, 1887–1893, private collection

Leighton, Frederick, Perseus and Andromeda, oil, 1891, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery

Mithras Slaying a Bull

Mithras Slaying a Bull, relief fragment, second century, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Mithras Slaying a Bull, relief sculpture, third century, Paris, Louvre

Mithras Slaying a Bull, sculpture, Roman, London, British Museum

Rossellino, Antonio, Mithras Slaying a Bull, relief sculpture, detail from Tomb of the Cardinal of Portugal, Florence, Italy, San Miniato

Mithras, woodcut, from Cartari, Imagini degli dei . . ., 1615, Padua, Italy

Sacrifice of Cain and Abel

Cain and Abel with Offerings, fresco, 320–350, Rome, Via Latina, Catacomb, Cubiculum B

Sacrifice of Abel, Approved by God, bronze relief sculpture on Doors of Bishop Bernward, 1015, Hildesheim, Germany, St. Michael

The Sacrifice of Abel, marble column capital, Spanish Romanesque, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Sacrifices of Cain and Abel, nave capital relief, 1120–1132, Vézelay, France, Ste. Madeleine, North Clerestory

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Sacrifice of Abel Approved by God, gilt bronze relief, on Gates of Paradise, circa 1435, Florence, Italy, San Giovanni, Baptistery, east doors

Albertinelli, Mariotto, Sacrifice of Cain and Abel, circa 1510, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Titian, Cain Killing Abel, oil, 1542–1543, Venice, Italy, Sta. Maria della Salute

Millais, John Everett, The Rejection of Cain's Sacrifice, nineteenth century, Birmingham, England, City Art Gallery

Noah

Uccello, Paolo, Sacrifice of Noah, fresco, circa 1447–1455, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria Novella, Cloister

Michelangelo, Noah's Sacrifice, fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel, ceiling

Palma Vecchio, Noah's Sacrifice, oil, early sixteenth century, Detroit, Michigan, Art Institute

Rubens, Peter Paul, Sacrifice of Noah, oil, early seventeenth century, Oxford, Ashmolean Museum

Castiglione, Giovanni, Noah's Sacrifice After the Deluge, oil on canvas, circa 1650, Los Angeles, County Museum

Bourdon, Sébastien, Sacrifice of Noah, nineteenth century, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin State Museum

Schick, Christian Gottlieb, Sacrifice of Noah, 1805, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Nationalgalerie

Manoah

Lastman, Pieter, The Sacrifice of Manoah, 1627, private collection

Flinck, Govaert, The Sacrifice of Manoah, 1640, London, Marshall Spink

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Sacrifice of Manoah, 1641, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Gemäldegalerie

Post, Frans Jansz., The Sacrifice of Manoah, mid-seventeenth century, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans

Joachim and Zacharias

Giotto, Joachim's Sacrifice Refused, fresco, circa 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Ghirlandaio, Domenico, Joachim's Sacrifice Refused, late fifteenth century, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria Novella
 Sacchi, Andrea, Zacharias Sacrificing at the Altar, mid-seventeenth century, Rome, the Lateran

Isaac

Sacrifice of Isaac, wall painting, early Christian, Rome, Catacomb of St. Callixtus
Sacrifice of Isaac, fresco, 320–350, Rome, Catacomb of Via Latina, Cubiculum C
 Ghiberti, Lorenzo, The Sacrifice of Isaac, bronze gilt relief, 1302, Florence, Italy, Bargello
 Gozzoli, Benozzo, Sacrifice of Isaac, fresco, fifteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santi Tintoretto, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Veronese, Paolo, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, sixteenth century, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Andrea del Sarto, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, 1520s, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art
 Titian, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, circa 1542, Venice, Italy, Sta. Maria della Salute
 Carracci, Ludovico, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, after 1585, Vatican, Vatican Museums
 Domenichino, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, 1602, Fort Worth, Texas, Kimball Art Museum
 Caravaggio, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, 1603, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Allori, Alessandro, Sacrifice of Abraham, oil, before 1607, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Carracci, Annibale, Sacrifice of Abraham, oil, before 1609, Paris, Louvre
 Lastman, Pieter, Abraham's Sacrifice, oil, 1616, Paris, Louvre
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Abraham's Sacrifice, oil, 1635, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Brueghel, Pieter, the Younger, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, before 1638, Montreal, Quebec, Museum of Fine Arts
 Domenichino, Sacrifice of Isaac, oil, before 1641, London, Courtauld Institute of Art
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Abraham's Sacrifice, etching, 1655, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts Tiepolo, Giovanni Battista, Sacrifice of Abraham, oil, seventeenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Lamb as Sacrifice

Good Shepherd with Lamb on Shoulders, fresco, third century, Rome, Catacomb of St. Callixtus
Good Shepherd with Lamb on Shoulders, ceiling fresco, fourth century, Rome, Catacomb of SS. Pietro e Marcellino
Good Shepherd with Lamb on Shoulders, ceiling fresco, fourth century, Rome, Catacomb of Domitilla
Good Shepherd, marble statue, first half of fourth century, Rome, Christiano Museum
Lamb of God Before the Cross, Flanked by Two Angels, manuscript illumination, from San Pedro de Cardena, Burgos Beatus, tempera and gold leaf on parchment, circa 1180, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Eyck, Jan and Hubert van, Adoration of the Lamb, from Ghent Altarpiece, oil on panel, 1432, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo
 Hunt, William Holman, Hireling Shepherd, oil, 1851, Manchester, England, City Art Gallery
 Hunt, William Holman, Strayed Sheep, oil, 1852, London, Tate Gallery

Lamb Identifying Christ with Holy Family or St. John the Baptist

Leonardo da Vinci, Madonna and St. Anne, oil on panel, circa 1508–1513, Paris, Louvre
 Palma Vecchio, Madonna and Child with St. John, early sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Luini, Bernardo, Child St. John the Baptist with a Lamb, early sixteenth century, Milan, Italy, Ambrosiana
 Vouet, Simon, Holy Family with St. John, oil, early seventeenth century, San Francisco, California, Fine Arts Museum
 Murillo, Bartolomé Esteban, Infant Christ and St. John the Baptist, oil, circa 1670, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Adult St. John the Baptist Identifying Christ as Lamb of God

Limbourg Brothers, St. John the Baptist Preaching, manuscript illumination, from the Belles Heures de Jean, Duc de Berry, tempera on gold leaf parchment, circa 1410, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Giovanni di Paolo, Scenes from the Life of John the Baptist, tempera on panel, circa 1450–1460, Chicago, Art Institute
 Reni, Guido, Meeting of Christ and St. John the Baptist, before 1642, Naples, Italy, San Filippo Neri
 Grünewald, Matthias, Crucifixion, from Isenheim Altarpiece, oil on panel, circa 1510–1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden
 Rosa, Salvador, Landscape with St. John the Baptist Pointing Out Christ, oil, seventeenth century, Glasgow, Scotland, Art Gallery

Pelican

Two Pelicans, nave capital relief, 1120–1132, Vézelay, France, Ste. Madeleine, north clerestory
 Pesellino, Francesco, The Crucifixion with St. Jerome and St. Francis, oil on panel, 1440–1445, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Pelican, pen and ink, circa 1860, England, private collection (variant in Birmingham, England, Museum and Art Gallery)
 Morris, William, Pelican Roundel, stained glass, 1862, Selsey, England, All Saints Church
 Webb, Philip, Pelican, pen and ink and graphite, nineteenth century, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Sacrifice in War

Fenton, Roger, Valley of the Shadow of Death, salt print photograph, 1855, Austin, University of Texas, Gernsheim Collection

- O'Sullivan, Timothy H., The Harvest of Death, Gettysburg, albumin print photograph, 1863, Austin, University of Texas, Gernsheim Collection
- Butler, Elizabeth, The Roll Call, oil, 1873–1874, London, Collection of Queen Elizabeth II
- MacMonnies, Frederick, Nathan Hale, bronze, 1889, New York, City Hall Park, Broadway and Murray Street
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Pietà, plaster, 1917, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Kollwitz, Käthe, Killed in Action, lithograph, 1921, New York, Galerie St. Etienne
- Kollwitz, Käthe, The Volunteers, woodcut, 1922–1923, New York, Galerie St. Etienne
- Kirchner, Ernst Ludwig, Self-Portrait as a Soldier, oil, circa 1915, Oberlin, Ohio, Oberlin College, Allen Memorial Museum
- Davie, Alan, Sacrifice, oil, 1956, private collection

Miscellaneous

- Reynolds, Joshua, Lady Sarah Bunbury Sacrificing to the Graces, 1765, Chicago, Art Institute
- Hunt, William Holman, The Scapegoat, oil, 1856, Port Sunlight, England, Lady Lever Art Gallery

Further Reading

- Aeschylus, The Orestian Trilogy, translated by Philip Vellacott, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1981
- Anderson, Gary A., Sacrifices and Offerings in Ancient Israel, Atlanta, Georgia: Scholars Press, 1987
- Bakker, Willem Frederik, The Sacrifice of Abraham, Birmingham, England: University of Birmingham, 1978
- Balmay, Marie, Le sacrifice interdit: Freud et la Bible, Paris: B. Grasset, 1986
- Bober, Phillis Pray, and Ruth Bubenstein, Renaissance Artists and Antique Sculpture, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991
- Campbell, Joseph, A Hero with a Thousand Faces, Princeton, New Jersey, and London: Princeton University Press, 1973
- Carpenter, Thomas, Art and Myth in Ancient Greece, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1991
- Carter, David, Rembrandt and His Pupils, Raleigh: North Carolina Museum of Art, 1956
- Coe, E. T., "Rubens in 1614: The Sacrifice of Isaac," Bulletin of the Nelson Gallery and Atkins Museum 4:7 (1960)
- Durand, Jean-Louis, Sacrifice et labour en Grèce ancienne, Paris: Decouverte, 1986
- Jung, Carl Gustav, Man and His Symbols, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1964; London: Aldus, 1964
- Kestner, Joseph A., Mythology and Misogyny, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989
- Maybaum, I., The Sacrifice of Isaac: A Jewish Commentary, London: Vallentine, Mitchel, 1959
- Munich, Adrienne Auslander, Andromeda's Chains, New York: Columbia University Press, 1989
- Saxl, Fritz, "Rembrandt's Sacrifice of Manoaah," Studies of the Warburg Institute IX (1939)
- Shapiro, M., "The Angel with the Ram in Abraham's Sacrifice: A Parallel in Western and Islamic Art," Ars Islamica 10 (1943)
- Smith, A. Moore, "The Iconography of the Sacrifice of Isaac in Early Christian Art," American Journal of Archaeology 26 (1989)
- Solie, Pierre, Le sacrifice: fondateur de civilisation et d'individuation, Paris: Albin Michel, 1988
- Woerden, I. Speyart van, "The Iconography of the Sacrifice of Isaac," Vigiliae Christianae 15 (1961)

SANCTUARY

Claudia Hill

The following sanctuaries and topics are covered in the discussion of the theme Sanctuary:

SECOND TEMPLE

DOME OF THE ROCK

KAABA

HAGIA SOPHIA

CHARTRES CATHEDRAL

VIOLATION OF SANCTUARY:

ST. THOMAS À BECKET

TEMPLE OF ZEUS

PANTHEON

THE GREAT STUPA

ANGKOR WAT

GREAT ZIMBABWE

TEMPLE OF THE SPHINX

TEOTIHUACÁN

POSSIBLE SANCTUARIES

IDEA OF SANCTUARY

Mecca, Saudi Arabia, Kaaba and Haram, from History of Aleppo Temple (Boston: E. J. Hall, 1915), photographs provided by Newman Travel Talks Co. (Courtesy of the Aga Khan Program, Fine Arts Library, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts)

Sanctuary derives from the Latin word sanctuarium (a holy place). Although sanctuaries have frequently been depicted in works of art, sanctuary is most often exemplified in a specific place. The earliest sanctuaries date from the caves of Paleolithic times (early Stone Age) in which the mysterious rites took place that left magnificent cave art. Soon humans improved upon and further embellished their natural sanctuaries, as at Abu Simbel in Egypt or the Tun-huang caves in China, by enhancing natural configurations and decorating them with effigies and paintings.

Eventually humans built structures to encompass their holy sites. The Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology defines sanctuary as a building for religious worship or part of a church, temple, or shrine immediately surrounding the altar. Although sanctuaries need not have altars, they are often placed within the building or on the sacred precinct. The altar is frequently tied to the concept of the sanctuary as a place of refuge.

A common feature of sanctuaries is the importance placed upon the cardinal points of the compass, perhaps symbolizing the cosmos. East and west are strongly associated with religious belief, and sacred buildings are often aligned along this axis. Sanctuaries are not necessarily enclosed structures but holy spaces separated from profane spaces by man-made demarcations, natural boundaries, or a combination of the two. Both the image and meaning of the word sanctuary are as dependent upon the preservation of records describing the sacred space as on the durable materials and methods of construction.

Second Temple

The Old Testament documents the Israelites' attempts to build a temple to house the sacred Ark of the Covenant, one that would act as a central sanctuary of their state and religion. The First Temple, built by Solomon and destroyed by the Babylonians, left no archaeological traces. A considerable number of speculative and imaginary images of the First Temple and its successor can be found, ranging from early manuscripts to twentieth-century works of art. There are no descriptions of the building of the Second Temple in the Old City of Jerusalem. In the Torah, however, there is mention of the reconstruction of the temple. Archaeological drawings indicate that an altar was placed outside and in front of the temple. The remains of some ancient Jewish stone altars reveal hornlike protrusions at the corners. In the Old Testament (I Kings 1:50–51) the persecuted who were able to seize the horns on the altar were assured of justice if not safety.

The Second Temple was rectangular, with a porch, main hall, and a dark, windowless inner sanctum. These were all oriented along a single, horizontal, east–west axis. The inner sanctum contained the chest known as the Ark of the Covenant, which held the two stone tablets of the Ten Commandments given to Moses by God on Mount Sinai. Worshipers would go in a procession to the temple and then perform ritual sacrifices at the altar along with prayers of thanksgiving.

The only remaining section of the Second Temple is thought to be a stone wall that dates from the first century B.C. This wall, the Western Wall, is the most hallowed spot in the Jewish religion. It is believed that the divine presence resides at that location because of the wall's proximity to the sacred Ark. When the Second Temple became a casualty of war, the Ark of the Covenant disappeared. The mourning that takes place daily by the wall is for Israel's exile from Egypt and the destruction of the Second Temple. The Western Wall, also known as the Wailing Wall, is one of four stone walls surrounding the buildings on the Temple of the Mount.

Dome of the Rock

The Dome of the Rock is one of 100 structures in the enclosed trapezoid of the Temple of the Mount area in Jerusalem. Muslims gather around this building to worship in numerous prayer spots. The octagon-shaped structure was constructed over an enormous rock by the Islamic leader of the Umayyads, Caliph Adb al-Malik, in A.D. 685. Muslims believe that the rock was where the Prophet Muhammad rose to heaven in an event described by the Koran. The rock is also sacred to Jews, who believe it was where Adam was entombed and where Isaac was bound for sacrifice.

The Dome of the Rock has two concentric ambulatories and is crowned by a gilded dome. There are windows at the base of the dome and glazed pottery tiles decorate the exterior of the structure. The shimmering of the multicolored tiles of the geometric designs along with the immense, gold-covered dome produce a magnificent effect. Arabic inscriptions, mosaics of vegetation, precious metals, and colored stones are part of the original seventh-century interior decoration. The Dome of the Rock did not have an altar, as Muslims believe that all prayer should be directed towards the Kaaba, their most holy sanctuary.

Kaaba

According to the Koran, the Kaaba was the Earth's first sanctuary. The Kaaba, considered "the temple or house of God," is in the center of the Haram, or mosque, at Mecca, Saudi Arabia. The Koran specifies that all Muslims must perform a pilgrimage to the Kaaba once in their lifetime. Part of the pilgrimage includes a ritual walk to the Haram, around the Kaaba, and the recitation of prayer. Because a Muslim has a direct relationship with God, there are no priests on Earth nor saints in heaven for intercession, neither are there ritual vessels or vestments. Prayers are said five times a day as the means for worship.

The Black Stone, the central focus of this sanctuary, is touched and kissed by the faithful during a ritual walk. Built into the east corner of the Kaaba, its relation to the Kaaba is not known. For the Muslims, it is the world's axis. In the seventh century A.D., Muhammad is believed to have assisted with the placement of the sacred Black Stone in the sanctuary and to have led the first pilgrimage to the site.

The Kaaba is rectangular, with a flat roof that slopes to the northwest corner, tapering into a mizab (gilt water spout). The existing building is made of mortared layers of a gray-blue stone from the neighboring hills. The four corners of the Kaaba roughly correspond to the points of a compass and its walls are covered with a black curtain. Entry to the Kaaba by appointed caretakers is gained from a side door. Inscriptions cover the interior walls, and marble is set into the floor. There is no altar or other furnishings except for some silver and gold lamps.

The inviolability of the sacred enclosure of the Haram was a guaranteed right. Peace reigned within this space; feuding Arab tribes were forbidden weapons in the mosque. On the Kaaba was a handle that fugitives could grasp and expect mercy, somewhat analogous to the horns on the Jewish altar. Safety was also extended to animals and plants in the Haram. Blood could not be spilled and murder in the sanctuary was seen as a heinous crime.

Hagia Sophia

The basilica was an early prototype of the Christian sanctuary. The Hagia Sophia (A.D. 537), a Byzantine basilica, was built on a high ridge overlooking the city of Constantinople, now Istanbul, Turkey. The architects Anthemius of Tralles and Isidorus of Miletus designed this sanctuary for the Roman emperor Justinian. After the Turkish conquest of Constantinople in 1453, it became a mosque and four minarets were added. In use today as a museum, the Byzantine building is rectangular, with a wide nave or central passageway flanked by aisles with galleries above them.

A great dome caps the center of the Hagia Sophia and rests on four piers that descend into giant arches. The piers are made of stone, and the roof, vaults, and arched masonry ceiling are made of brick and mortar. These materials add to the church's massive and monumental appearance, although the dome itself appears to float above the building. The base of the dome is surrounded by small windows, and four smaller domes extend from each corner of the central dome. The nave lies on an east-west axis with a protruding apse that surrounds the altar at its eastern end. The most sacred space in the building is the area around the altar, which is also referred to as the sanctuary. At the opposite end of the sanctuary apse, to the west, is an inner porch.

As soon as it was consecrated, the Hagia Sophia served as an imperial court as well as a center for Byzantine ritual based on the Bible. The building therefore represented both ecclesiastical and political authority. The clergy, emperor, and the emperor's court processed eastward through the great nave.

The emperor and his court walked to the south aisle and the clergy continued to the chancel around the altar. The remaining aisles and galleries were reserved for the congregation.

The interior walls were originally decorated in gilded mosaics done in colorful and precious materials such as marble, stones, bronze, and other metals. The beauty and sparkle of the walls were further enhanced by the clergy's sumptuous liturgical implements. The mosaics of Christ, the Virgin and Child, other holy figures, and members of Justinian's court were later additions that served to impress and educate a largely illiterate congregation. After the Turkish conquest, the mosaics were covered with plaster and whitewash but were later revealed and restored.

The Hagia Sophia was erected on top of the ruins of a fourth-century church that had been built by the Roman emperor Constantine. Constantine, the first Christian emperor, selected the site for the sanctuary after having a dream. His body was allegedly buried in the center of this early church. By the time the Byzantine emperor Justinian (A.D. 483–565) embarked on the construction of the Hagia Sophia, the sanctity of the area had already been established. The recycling of sanctuary buildings and their sites throughout history is often due to their sacred or convenient location.

Chartres Cathedral

Some 500 years after the building of the Hagia Sophia, the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Chartres was constructed southwest of Paris over a holy relic reputed to be the Virgin's birthing tunic. The structure was originally rectangular, similar to the basilica of the Hagia Sophia. However, fire destroyed all but the sculptured portal on the west facade in the eleventh century.

Influenced by the high Gothic style of the French cathedrals of Notre Dame and Sens, Chartres was rebuilt on the same sacred site by Abbot Suger. The twelfth-century building is made of mortared stone over a wooden framework and has sculptured stone entryways. It is designed with a long nave and short transepts, or arms. A double ambulatory, also known as a walkway, has radiating chapels and encloses the central altar at the east end. The triforium (a narrow second-story gallery) borders the nave, and stained-glass windows along this upper clerestory wall reflect the Cult of the Virgin.

Whereas Hagia Sophia has subdued light because of its enclosed space, Chartres has an abundance of light from a broad expanse of windows. The windows at Chartres give a "cage" effect and are supported by multiple pointed and arched vaults. These vaults have four ribs that transfer the weight of the building to flying buttresses, stone arch supports, on the exterior of the cathedral. Medieval pilgrims to Chartres entered the cathedral from the west portals, which were flanked by two towers. The faithful then walked eastward through the large, horizontal nave toward the sanctuary that contained the altar where priests performed the Christian ceremony.

Violation of Sanctuary: St. Thomas à Becket

Sanctuary as a place of refuge is also recorded in Christian churches. Thomas Becket, the twelfth-century English archbishop, fled to the altar in Canterbury Cathedral when pursued by four of Henry II's knights. He thought that his pursuers would honor the right of sanctuary in the church. Ignoring existing church laws regarding asylum, they decapitated him at the altar in the cathedral. The Roman Catholic world was horrified at this sacrilege: the assassins were dealt with swiftly, and Becket was promptly canonized. Even though he actually vigorously defended himself, depictions of the event usually show Becket in prayer, kneeling before an altar, in order to emphasize the violation of sanctuary. In an illumination from the Hastings Hours (circa 1480) in the British Library in London, for example, not only is the saint kneeling and praying at the altar as he is attacked from the rear, but his tonsured head and the cross on the back of his chasuble are clearly visible to his attackers.

To this day, the quest for asylum in the Roman Catholic Church persists. On December 24, 1989, General Manuel Noriega of Panama pleaded with a diplomatic representative of the Pope for refuge in the nunciature. The former military ruler was fleeing U.S. forces sent to destroy his corrupt regime and install a civilian government in its place. The representative of the Vatican sheltered Noriega as an act of the Church's age-old tradition of providing a safe haven for fugitives. However, fearing that the Vatican would lift diplomatic immunity and he would be turned over to Panamanian authorities, Noriega surrendered to U.S. troops.

Temple of Zeus

Sanctuary as a place of asylum also has roots in Greek mythology. Paris, the son of the Trojan King Priam and his second wife, Hecuba, was abandoned at birth. The child was raised by shepherds and eventually returned to the city of Troy to participate in the annual funeral games. He defeated his royal brothers in the games and angered one of them. Fearing for his life, Paris sought refuge in the Temple of Zeus, king of the gods. Later, he was recognized as the son of Priam and accepted into the royal family. Ironically, Priam's own death at the hands of Neoptolemus during the Trojan War occurred as he clung to an altar of Zeus.

The stone altar at the Greek sanctuary of Zeus at Olympia was apparently located in front of his temple. Both the altar and temple were built in the fifth century B.C. This site was established as a sanctuary in northern Greece at the base of a hill called Cronos. In Greek mythology, Zeus, the son of Cronos, overthrew his father and became the supreme god. The rectangular sacred area around Zeus's temple was bordered by stone walls, only ruins of which exist today. Archaeological remains indicate that some burnt offerings to Zeus dated from the tenth century B.C.

The rectilinear Doric Temple of Zeus at Olympia was made of a local limestone, covered with white stucco, and designed with fluted columns, six across the facades and 13 along the flanks. The front and rear of the temple had a porch, and the cella (central interior chamber) probably housed the image of Zeus and his wife, Hera. The sculptural decoration on the pediment below the roof was made of marble imported because of the need for fine-grained carving stone. The figures along the pediment were a mixture of free-standing and high- and low-relief sculpture.

In Greek society, the statues of the gods were housed in sacred areas apart from the community and appeased through sacrifice. The priest of the cult of Zeus would have faced east toward the god's image in his temple and made burnt offerings at his altar. A procession of the faithful may have followed the priest to the altar and departed once the gifts were made to the god. The Temple of Zeus at Olympia underwent various modifications, and for reasons unknown, was eventually abandoned in the sixth century A.D.

Pantheon

An altar, dedicated to all the Roman gods, may have been placed outside a temple that lies beneath the Pantheon in Rome. However, archaeological evidence supporting the altar's location is inconclusive. The temple was rectangular and roughly followed the Greek model. It burned twice, was rebuilt in concrete and brick, and was newly dedicated in 128–126 B.C. Under Emperor Hadrian's rule (A.D. 111–138) the Romans rebuilt and rededicated the temple. Hadrian's temple, with architectural modifications, is what stands today in Rome.

The Pantheon is designed as a hemispherical dome with a rectangular colonnaded porch at the entrance. Eight unfluted columns support the entablature of the porch. The precedent for the round, rather than rectangular, shape of the temple may stem from ancient funerary and religious structures. Inside the dome are recessed coffers with an oculus (circular opening) in the ceiling. In the seventh century, all "pagan" statues were removed, a central altar was placed in the church's interior apse, and the structure was consecrated as the Christian church Santa Maria ad Martyres. The church was stripped of its gilded bronze roof tiles 50 years later, but the western entry still retains its ancient bronze doors. The Pantheon has frequently been depicted in art, perhaps most memorably in the many versions by Giovanni Paolo Pannini (circa 1730–1735).

The Pantheon, along with the sanctuaries previously mentioned, are all constructed of durable building materials. Sanctuaries built of inorganic materials such as clays, glass, rock, and precious materials such as ivory, silver and gold tend to withstand the test of time, whereas those built of organic materials such as wood or leather do not. Of course there are exceptions, because precious materials are often pillaged, like the bronze coffers of the Pantheon, or subjected to natural and man-made devastation, as exemplified by the burning of Chartres Cathedral and the destruction of the Second Temple.

The Great Stupa

Built of earth, faced with stone, and covered with white and gilded stucco, the Great Stupa is a formidable construction. This sanctuary—one of three stupas (sacred mounds) in Sanchi in north-central India—was erected during the Shunga and Early Andhara periods (before the first century A.D.). It is the first stupa and probably once housed the relics of the founder of Buddhism, Siddhartha Gautama, otherwise known as the Buddha.

The three stupas at Sanchi, built in a similar manner, are symbolic of Siddhartha Gautama and his teachings. The Great Stupa is surmounted with a three-tiered stone "umbrella" that stands for the Buddha, the Buddha's law, and order. An upper protective railing usually surrounded the umbrella, and around the base of the mound was a path. Pilgrims circumambulated this path counterclockwise, which represented the Path of Life around the World Mountains.

There are four stone gateways to the Great Stupa, each with two columns on posts capped with three architraves. The sculptural program on the architraves represented folktales, scenes from the life of the Buddha and symbols associated with Buddhism. Carved on the gateway brackets were the guardian figures called yakshas and yakshis. The carvings on the gateways served to educate pilgrims who were not well versed in the teachings of Buddha but were familiar with local folklore.

Angkor Wat

This temple, possibly the largest in the world, once stretched more than 2.5 miles and soared 200 feet high. Angkor Wat (circa 1120–1150) was built of carved sandstone held together, without mortar, by iron clamps. The Khmer ruler and god king Suryavarman II initiated its construction with the intention of placing his tomb inside. He dedicated the enormous stone temple northwest of Phnom Penh, Cambodia, to the Hindu god Vishnu.

Hinduism is a complex religion of multiple deities—like the pantheon of the Greeks—that developed as early as 800 B.C. in northern India. Hindus embrace an endless cycle of reincarnation of human and animal forms bound by a strict caste system. This succession is called karma and is described in the sacred religious poem the Bhagavad Gita (200 B.C.). Among the three higher gods of orthodox Hindu tradition are Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva: Brahma is the creator of the universe, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva the destroyer.

A metal statue of Vishnu was placed in the entry to the central shrine at Angkor Wat and was approached by ascending steps from the west. Over this central shrine is a massive spire with four smaller spires capping shrines at its corners. Relief sculpture of figures in motion and organic matter related to Hinduism cover the walls of this immense architectural feat. The rectangular symmetrical plan of Angkor Wat represents the cosmos and is aligned along an east–west axis. A large moat around the entire complex once provided water to the temple and inhabitants of the nearby city. The moat surrounding the temple made it an impregnable fortress and provided sanctuary for the Khmer ruler in more ways than one.

Great Zimbabwe

Oral histories from the Shona—Bantu peoples of Zimbabwe and southern Mozambique—point to the existence of a sacred site, the Great Zimbabwe in South Africa. Their folklore tells of the Mbire, their forefathers, traveling to the area of the Great Zimbabwe, where they established a religious center. At this site their supreme god Mwari was worshiped and the spirits of their royal ancestors cared for. Archaeological data from the remnants of this fortified city indicate that the site was first occupied in the fourth century A.D., but the stone walls date from the thirteenth century A.D.

The Great Zimbabwe's massive outer stone wall stands 30 feet high and 20 feet thick. It surrounds a smaller incomplete wall, a conical tower, a smaller tower, and a mass of fallen stonework from other buildings. No altar has been found at the Great Zimbabwe, which does not rule out the possibility that one existed. The Shona believe that a divine king, Monomotapa, reigned in these buildings, which functioned as a royal palace and a temple.

This South African center, like that of the Hagia Sophia, would have been the capital of a kingdom of religious and temporal power. A variety of pottery vessels, clay birdlike figures, and clay bovine figurines, possibly connected to cults in this center, have been excavated through uncontrolled and controlled archaeological digs.

Temple of the Sphinx

Archaeological excavations have uncovered a sanctuary devoted to the sun at Giza, Egypt, immediately in front of the stone sculpture of the Great Sphinx. This sanctuary, also known as the Temple of the Sphinx, is part of a group of temples and pyramids. Through scientific dating and study of Egyptian hieroglyphics, archaeologists have attributed these buildings to the Egyptian kings of the Old Kingdom, Fourth Dynasty (2680–2565 B.C.). One of these kings, Khafra, is credited with building the Temple of the Sphinx as a place of worship to the sun god Ra, the chief deity. The ancient Egyptians may have greeted Ra in the morning in the east, feared the sun god at midday for his intense heat, and honored him as the sun fell below the horizon to the west.

The Temple of the Sphinx is a rectangular structure, its four corners correspondent to the points of the compass. Two entryways from the east lead to the north and south sides of the inner pillared halls of the court. The outer and inner walls of the temple are faced with granite, which is also used for the pillars and roof beams. The complex design of the temple reflected the Egyptian belief in the afterlife associated with the cult of the sun. Since it is to the west that the sun descends at day's end, the death of the king was equated with the sun's disappearance. The cyclical reappearance of the sun was symbolic of the eternal existence of Khafra's spirit, or Ka. Perhaps Khafra, in the form of the Great Sphinx, faced east behind the temple to await his emerging Ka with the rising sun god.

The Temple of the Sphinx was probably linked to the other architectural structures at Giza. These included a valley temple to the south of the Temple of the Sphinx, a covered causeway or raised road, a funerary temple, and a pyramid. In ancient Egypt pyramids served as markers for sacred areas selected for funerary precincts and temples. They contained the tombs of rulers and high officials and were decorated with murals and sculptures depicting the afterlife. Khafra's funeral procession would have entered the valley temple from the Nile Valley to the east and continued along the causeway and through the funerary temple. A passage to the north side of the temple led directly into the pyramid where Khafra's body was entombed.

Teotihuacán

The abandoned monumental "pyramid" temples at Teotihuacán, Mexico, or "birth place of the gods," form Mesoamerican sanctuaries. Myths from the region describe the death of the sun followed by the creation of a new sun, as well as a moon, by gods assembled at Teotihuacán. Dominated by the Temples of the Sun, Moon and Quetzalcoatl—the god of life, wind, and wisdom—this Aztec ceremonial center was constructed on a plateau 20 miles north of Mexico City. The temples were directly off a wide avenue called the Avenue of the Dead, which bisected the gridded center. The center layout, covering 13 miles, coincided with an astronomical plan that served civic, economic, political, and religious functions. It flourished between about 500 B.C. and A.D. 750.

The Temple of the Sun was built over a sacred cave that probably housed an altar. The cave, in the center of the pyramid, was accessed through a natural tunnel that ran from its west side toward the east. The Temple of the Sun was a stepped and truncated pyramid with steep sides, closer in style to the ziggurats of Mesopotamia than the pyramids of Egypt. A stairway provided access to the top platform, where religious ceremonies would have taken place, possibly around an altar of some type. Residue of polychrome suggests that the temples were covered with painted murals. Elaborate carvings of various deities in the form of birds, butterflies, jaguars, and serpents also decorated temples. These designs on the temple walls, along with some pottery and weaving, are the only records of the Teotihuacanos and have yet to be deciphered.

The political sovereigns—the divine rulers, considered descendants of the gods, who served as priests—were the closest entities to the Aztec gods. Worshipers would gather at the bases of the temples, which were only accessible to priests, to pay them homage. The explanation of the sudden demise of this ceremonial center is merely conjectural and may have been the result of climatic changes and war.

Possible Sanctuaries

Places that appear to be sacred but are insufficiently documented as sanctuaries include northeastern Utah, where there are extensive twelfth-century rock engravings; Stonehenge in Salisbury, England; and the site of 600 Polynesian sculptures on Easter Island. Extensive pictographs left by Paleolithic artists in the Apollo II Cave of Namibia as well as those in the caves of Lascaux, France, and Altamira, Spain, suggest that at one time these were also holy places.

See also Communion; Devotion/Piety; Funeral/Burial; Penitence/Repentance

Selected Works of Architecture

Sanctuaries

Haram, Mecca, Saudi Arabia
 Temple of the Sphinx and Pyramid of Khafra (Chefren), circa 2560 B.C., Giza, Egypt
 Temple of Zeus, fifth century B.C., Olympia
 Pyramid of the Sun, 500 B.C.–A.D. 750, Teotihuacán, Mexico
 Pantheon, circa 126 B.C., Rome
 Great Stupa, before first century A.D., Sanchi, India
 Great Zimbabwe, fourth–thirteenth century A.D., South Africa
 Hagia Sophia, A.D. 537, Istanbul, Turkey
 Dome of the Rock, A.D. 685, Temple of the Mount, Jerusalem

Chartres Cathedral, twelfth century, France
 Canterbury Cathedral, twelfth century, England
 Angkor Wat, circa 1120–1150, Cambodia

Possible Sanctuaries

Caves, Altamira, Spain, Paleolithic era
 Caves, Lascaux, France, Paleolithic era
 Apollo II Cave, Paleolithic era, Namibia
 Easter Island, Polynesia
 Stonehenge, Salisbury, England
 Rock Engravings, Utah, twelfth century

Selected Works of Art

Sanctuaries

Temple of Vesta in the Forum of Rome, Roman relief, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Temple Facade, Shekel from Bar Kochba War, 132–135, London, British Museum
Temple Facade, wall paintings from Synagogue of Dura-Europos, central panel above niche for scrolls, 244–245, Damascus, Syria, National Museum
Consecration of the Tabernacle and Its Priests, wall paintings from Assembly Hall of Synagogue of Dura-Europos, 244–245, Damascus, Syria, National Museum
Muhammad Replacing the Black Stone in the Ka'ba, manuscript illumination, from Jami'al-Tawarikh, 1306, Edinburgh, Scotland, University Library (Arabic MS No. 20, fol. 45r)
 Eyck, Herbert van (attributed to), The Three Marys at the Open Sepulchre, early fifteenth century, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Boymans-van Beuningen Museum
 Foucquet, Jean, Conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuzzar-Adan; Entry of Ptolemy; Pompey in the Temple, illuminations from Antiquités Judaïques, circa 1470, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
 Raphael, Healing the Lame at the Beautiful Gate, cartoon for tapestry, circa 1516, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
 Villalpando, Juan Bautista, Holy of Holies, from Ezechielem Explanationes, vol. II, fol. 318, 1594–1608, London, British Library
 Pannini, Giovanni Paolo, Interior of the Pantheon, Rome, painting, circa 1730–1735, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Constable, John, Stonehenge, watercolor, 1835, London, Victoria and Albert Museum
 Bauernfeind, Gustave, Lament of the Faithful at the Wailing Wall, Jerusalem, painting, circa 1904, private collection

Idea of Sanctuary

Ernst, Max, Sanctuary, oil and collage on wood, 1965, New York, collection of the artist

Violation of Sanctuary: St. Thomas à Becket
Martyrdom of St. Thomas Becket, illumination from English manuscript, circa 1180, London, British Library (Cotton Claudius BII, fol. 341)

- Assassination of St. Thomas Becket*, from the St. Thomas Becket Reliquary, inlay and metalwork, twelfth century, Paris, Louvre
- Martyrdom of St. Thomas Becket*, fresco, late twelfth century, Spoleto, Italy, SS. Giovanni e Paolo
- Murder of Thomas Becket*, illumination from English Psalter, circa 1190–1200, London, British Library (MS Harl. 5102, fol. 32)
- Martyrdom of Thomas Becket*, illumination from Ramsey Psalter, circa 1200, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library (M302, fol. 4v)
- Murder of Thomas Becket*, ceiling boss, fourteenth century, Exeter, England, Exeter Cathedral
- Murder of Thomas à Becket*, illumination from Hastings Hours, Flemish, circa 1480, London, British Library (Add. Mss. 54782, fol. 55v)
- Death of St. Thomas à Becket*, illumination from Flemish manuscript, circa 1500, London, British Library (Add. Mss. 17012, fol. 21v)
- Martyrdom of St. Thomas Becket*, illumination from Flemish manuscript, circa 1500, London, British Library (Kings 9, fol. 38v)

Further Reading

- Alcock, Susan, and Robin Osborne, Placing the Gods: Sanctuaries and Sacred Space in Ancient Greece, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994
- Barlow, Frank, Thomas Becket, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1986
- Borenus, Tancred, St. Thomas Becket in Art, London: Methuen, 1932
- Brandon, Samuel George Frederick, Man and God in Art and Ritual, New York: Scribner's, 1975
- Branner, Robert, editor, Chartres Cathedral, New York: Norton, 1969
- Burmingham, David, and Shula Marks, "Southern Africa," in Cambridge History of Africa, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977
- Butler, John, The Quest for Becket's Bones, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1995
- Gibb, Hamilton Alexander Rosskeen, editor, The Encyclopedia of Islam, Leiden, Germany: Brill, 1978
- Gilton, Werner, A Short History of African Art, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1990
- Grabar, Oleg, The Formation of Islamic Art, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1973
- Heyden, Doris, and Paul Gendrop, Pre-Columbian Architecture of Mesoamerica, translated by Judith Stanton, New York: Abrams, 1973
- Honor, Hugh, and John Fleming, The Visual Arts: A History, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1992
- Lee, Sherman, A History of Far Eastern Art, New York: Abrams, 1974
- MacDonald, William, The Pantheon: Design, Meaning, and Progeny, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1976
- Scully, Vincent, The Earth, the Temple, and the Gods: Greek Sacred Architecture, New York: Praeger, 1969
- Smith, Emerson, Hagia Sophia, New York: Columbia University Press, 1940
- Tomlinson, Richard Allan, Greek Sanctuaries, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1976; London: Book Club Associates, 1976

SEASONS

Shane Adler

The following regions and motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Seasons:

CHINA AND JAPAN

THE MOVEMENT OF TIME

ABUNDANCE AND PROSPERITY

AGES OF MAN AND STAGES OF LOVE

SEPARATED SEASONS

Now Phoebus, crowns our Summer dayes Summer Her lovely neck, and breast are bare;
 With stronger heate and brighter rays Whilst her fann doth coole the Ayre.

Wenceslas Hollar, The Four Seasons: Summer, print, 1641. Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art. (Courtesy of the Cleveland Museum of Art)

The seasons provide ample evidence of their own existence. With their continually changing colors and cycles of growth and withering, these periods of the year provide themes for visual and verbal description. The passing of time is celebrated through nature's appearance and endurance in Eastern art. It is the more complex human relationship to the natural world, always in transition itself, that expresses the contradictions and conflict of Western cultures.

The belief that nature is alive and conscious and that all living things, growing or inert, are part of the same eternal cycles of interdependency was the primordial conclusion about the origin of the world, a belief still held among many Native American peoples, like the Hopi of the southwestern United States. The creative process that changed chaos to order also brought seasons—regular, predictable, and providing sustenance. The corn goddess narrative, like that of the Greek goddess of agriculture Demeter and her daughter Persephone, whose annual descent to the underworld explained winter's barrenness and spring's reawakening, is paralleled in the Sumerian story of Tammuz, the shepherd, as well as that of Osiris, husband of the Egyptian nature goddess Isis. According to a legend of the Seneca Indians of the northeastern United States woodlands, Old Winter melts, like snow, when he encounters the warmth of young and vigorous Spring. In ancient myth and mysticism, people, their gods, and the land in which they dwelled were inextricably bound. That spirit and the reverence for nature's providence meant that the physical world was not subordinated to its inhabitants until Western thought defined nature in terms of resources, or products.

The gardens planned and used in medieval China, thereafter to be adapted to Japanese religion and aesthetics, reflected that sense of harmony. From garden to art, the emphasis was on capturing scenes of nature, the fleeting qualities of each season expressing human transience in contrast to nature's permanence. The moods and character of each season were evoked by allusion but not formalized into allegory. The series of picturesque scenes planned as the decoration of the physical environment, a microcosm of the world, were like nature's shifting seasonal changes of perspectives; the preordained path, or Tao, that one took reflected the balance of aesthetics and philosophy.

The seasons were also the beauty of women and the ages of man, the latter summarized in a sixteenth-century poem by Pai Ta-Shun of that title, with human life altered as spring to autumn. Plants within the garden symbolized the seasons through their transformation as well as their inherent traits. For example, the lotus represented summer by the fecundity in its seed as well as purity, as it grew in a murky pond but opened itself in unspotted beauty, thereby linking the season with the quality. Winter was composed of "three friends," combining pine and bamboo, which keep their foliage, with flowering plum (prunus), the first tree to bloom in the new year. Fruit trees in gardens assimilated the cycle of seasons, from blossom to matured fruit, with all the senses and their blessings of fragrance and sweetness in taste.

The garden provided the fullest human experience, with the seasons always the prevalent motif. Japanese artists, painters, and printmakers similarly relied on scenes of nature's seasons. For example, Mt. Fuji, a metaphor in itself, was shown in its variations named by season. Moreover, human activity was affected by the time of year. Whereas the season formed the title, thereby describing the subject, landscape was only suggested because the season was a recognized state of mind. In the epic Tale of Genji, the author, Lady Murasaki Shikibu, has the prince give to his four ladies a special garden, each crafted to evoke her fine qualities through visual beauty in reference to a season: spring's profusion of flowers and their meaning, the symbolism of summer scents and sensuality, the brilliant and dramatic effluence of color in autumn, and the display of winter when clusters of snow glisten on bare branches. In Japan as in China, elegant women frequently connoted the seasons, their beauty like that of flowers and, like flowers, fading with time.

In the primeval beginning of Western civilization was another garden: a perpetual springtime, a paradise like a tropical island of gentle climate and lush vegetation. This land of natural harmony was disrupted by human weakness, and the enduring legacy was the seasons and their travail. In Genesis, two opposing concepts provided a balance of contrasts, not unlike those that marked the way of Tao and the garden path: "seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter" (Genesis 8:22). Divisions of the year into two parts were dependent on observable cycles of sun and moon (noting either the solstices or the equinoxes) and connected to changes in weather conditions.

Throughout the ancient Mediterranean world, an acknowledgment of three seasons appeared in written form in Asia Minor from the seventh century B.C. and were related to the agricultural year. Egyptian tombs decorated in the Old Kingdom had indicated periods of time by the activities of the depicted people in search of food: bird hunting, harvest, or vintage. To the Greeks, the Egyptians gave their three seasons and possibly a name, the Horae, after the god Horus. The Greek three-season system was one of many feminine triads corresponding to the moon's phases: new, full, and old. Like the moon's phases, the Horae were aspects of a single entity and pictorially were undifferentiated. On sixth-century B.C. vases, the Horae were depicted as a unit of overlapping figures in procession, together wrapped in one cloak and wearing fine clothes. Inscriptions identified them, thereby distinguishing the Horae from other groups of feminine powers: the Graces or the Fates. As spirits of weather, the Horae brought a good harvest. Attributes reminiscent of the vegetative year (spring, summer, and autumn) were thereafter carried by each Hora and established the identity of each as a season. With the recognition of the solar year and its interstices (the solstices and equinoxes combined), astronomers established four separate seasons, each with a certain span of time. Each season, in its regularity, order, and repetition, became a symbol of divinity in the heavens.

The various meanings attached to the seasons in antiquity have since recurred, like their periods of blossom, abundance, decay, and renewal. Revolving like the year in which each season in its time returns, themes recur in art: the concept of time itself, defined by its passage and the history it leaves behind, and the fertile seasons, aided by labor and rewarding mankind with wealth and well-being. As a reflection of the human condition, the seasons align with the life of humankind and the yearning for the seasonless perfection of a lost paradise. And, like the cycle they represent, each theme depends on the others—they are interconnected and overlapping, as seasons in a year.

Perhaps originating in the frenzied abandon of the Dionysian sacrificial rites for the god associated with the seasons, or otherwise related to the Hebrews' festive communal dance called the hora, the personified seasons have swayed to the motion of time. Pictorial and theatrical arts have simulated the seasons' rhythmic repeated patterns of movement through the year, changing them and turning back to begin again. Initially, the Horae were part of processions encircling Attic figured vases. Then, in their first definitive portrayal as separate Seasons, Dionysus led them through their light-footed steps on a marble relief (circa 300 B.C.). The same dance was performed, although the seasons were guided by Apollo, in an etching by Claude Lorrain: Amid ancient ruins of times past, the Seasons glide by, imitating their earlier choreography. And, unaccompanied, they danced on other sculpted pieces or on frescoes decorating the walls of Pompeian villas in Italy, with attributes in hand and draperies swirling around them. The cosmic dance of Renaissance court masques represented the arrangements of scientific correspondences that linked the locations of heavenly planets to a destiny wrought below, and the Seasons were part of the ensemble. In his own honor, Louis XIV of France devised pageants whereby the eternal momentum of time was rearranged to revolve around him. The seventeenth century ended with a ballet, Les Saisons, in four acts.

The passage of time was a preoccupation of the Renaissance. This general concern would culminate in the development of landscape painting expressing the visual notations of continual changes; these constant transformations of a moment—variations on the colors and moods of each season—were allegories of time itself. Meanwhile, accuracy in time's measurement by more precise instruments occurred contemporaneously in the seventeenth century with the pendulum clock and the spiral balance spring watch. Also, sentiment shifted from pathos to ethos. Time the Devourer, which, according to Ovid, consumed all things in death and would account for the prevalence of the motif of the Seasons on Roman sarcophagi, reappeared in the sixteenth century's outlook of time as a force of destruction, although the Seasons were not deemed responsible. This perspective gave way to the perception of Time as Revealer, a concept inherited from philosophy of the sixth century B.C., in which the time that elapsed was the vehicle leading to an ultimate truth. Sir Walter Raleigh's monumental History of the World (1608–1614) looked back through time and recognized its judiciousness. In contrast, the engraving The Four Seasons (1607) by Otto van Veen showed the personified figures of the seasons as ages of life and history marching away in single file, from the eager child reaching out toward what lies ahead to the tottering elder moving away from the viewer without so much as a backward glance. However, the cycle of the same title by Nicolas Poussin (1607) united the past with its lesson in a parable of natural redemption: The calamity of Winter's deluge must inevitably yield to the sustenance from another Spring coming in succession.

After the flood, the Lord said to Noah, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Genesis 9:1). Fecund were the mother and the land; as children were the seeds of the future, the Earth's produce was its display of riches. The seasonal crops of nature's rituals—flowers enlivening spring, grain bundled in sheaves from summer's harvest, vintage grapes and other autumn fruits, as well as a brazier to ease the chill of barren winter—remained the attributes from the Greek Horae through medieval illumination, as in the Tacuinum Sanitatis and eventually the elaborate decorative cycles of more recent eras. Recalling each season's specific characteristics, these products also recorded nature's abundant gifts, the basis of wealth in agricultural societies. On the Ara Pacis Augustae in Rome, children walk in procession with their elders, a reminder of the prosperity associated with future generations. The Romans were financially rewarded for having large families, thereby increasing the empire's population, with penalties levied against the childless. This imperial shrine was further decorated with a bounty of fruits and flowers, arrayed as garlands or opulent offerings, as if paradise had returned to the Romans; these same emblems formed of the seasons' symbols appeared on public monuments and in private domestic settings.

Mother Earth, or Tellus, a recumbent figure, also depicted on the Ara Pacis Augustae, was surrounded by her infant children, the Seasons, on sculpted reliefs during the same period. Childlike putti have since flown, like time, as representations of the seasons into the nineteenth century. Roman coins were embossed with legends that proclaimed that the seasons brought prosperity and good fortune: felicitas temporum (happiness of the seasons). While the bucolic life was poetically extolled as love of the land, warfare provided the gain of additional territories, a large land base. The Seasons, formerly female, became male personifications on Roman triumphal arches, where they were set in the spandrels below the figures of military victory. Later, with industrialization, a nation's affluence was measured by its manufactured goods, and the changes in the seasons were shown through costume. A return to female figures also occurred.

Clothing had always helped to indicate the time of year, with garments adjusted to the temperature: lightened and bared, as bathers for summer's warmth, and heavily wrapped against winter's chill, with sandals in spring and sturdy boots for tramping in the autumn fields. In the mid-seventeenth century, seasonal cycles by Wenceslas Hollar in England and Jean Convay in France used fashionable accessories to replace traditional attributes: a fan for summer's heat and a veil to protect the complexion from the sun's harsh rays and a hood and a fur muff for winter. Worn as emblems of refinement, industrial products were dyed with those of the Earth and produced by the laboring classes. Louis XIV revitalized the seasons, establishing strict dress regulations as court etiquette; his edicts appeared as illustrations in Le Mercure Galant, showing the seasonal changes in the luxury fashion trades. The industrial economy of the nineteenth century was reflected in the paintings by the most modern of artists. As allegories of the seasons, fashionably dressed and accessorized, Autumn and Spring by Édouard Manet were the most successful. The series by Alfred Stevens, which distinguished each season by the symbolic color selected for the gown and suitable to the age of the wearer, conveyed the emotional stages of a woman's life.

In the eighteenth century, those emotional stages had been of a man's life, telling of his moods and how they progressed through his personal seasons of growth. The eighteenth-century notion of nature, as a metaphor for human nature, described the changes in man as a circuitous walk through the landscape of his life. Love, a feeling of many states, was portrayed in picturesque settings, from spring's budding rapture through summer's marriage and fertility in family and autumn's wizened understanding, concluding with winter's homey shelter and protection, as indicated in the illustrations to James Thomson's epic poem, or skating on slippery ice, the outcome foreseen by French artists. The seasons were first likened to human ages by Pythagorus and subsequently recounted by Ovid. Engraved cycles made this theme visible as the sequence of physical aging, as in that of Hendrik Goltzius, or in the gradations of maturing into manhood, as in the print cycles of Jacob Matham. As a man's character was delineated by the concordances of the planets, temperaments, elements, ages, and seasons, cycles of these subjects contained interchangeable narratives. A picture of spring was a composite, an example of the youthful and sanguine child of Venus, the goddess of love, as well as a story of love.

The four ages of man, as the seasons, were separate pieces of a whole. The set The Four Ages of Human Life by J. J. Grandville, actually composed of several stages within each division, foretold the nineteenth century's disruption of their unity with its announcement: "Chaque âge a ses plaisirs" (Each age has its pleasures). Despite some modest decorative schemes that retained elements of classicism and feigned a reverence for laboring on the land that was being abandoned (Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, Adolphe-William Bouguereau), the nineteenth century isolated the seasons and disturbed their cyclical rhythm. As in poetry or music, each was an ode to a moment, complete in itself, and savored for its own sake. Although the ancient Greeks individualized each Hora, they remained an unbroken chain.

Spring, like the figure from Stabiae, so called for her solemn walk through a meadow of flowers, would have had sisters. In an attempt to deify all the seasons, Ovid successfully assigned the goddess of flowers to springtime. Flora sometimes introduced medieval lyric poetry because alluding to spring was a way of announcing a beginning. The first painting referring to a single and separate segment of time, Botticelli's Primavera, was the allegory of a concept. Representing not a season but the idea of the Renaissance, a time reawakened after a prolonged slumber, this work heralded a return to pagan human desire. The metamorphosis from the maiden Chloris to the nymph Flora through sexual knowledge paralleled the transformation of love from the spiritual to the sensual.

Renaissance portraits named after Flora (paintings of courtesans or other beloved women) were more mythological disguise than personification of spring. Many nineteenth-century allegories titled Spring, naked like Eve or provocatively postured as if courtesans, recalled the duality of that temptation, with Franz Xaver Winterhalter's Spring modeled after Titian's Flora, although the association of spring with youth and innocence was sometimes a pretense for unclothed female bodies. Sweet Victorian childhood was also thus portrayed in uncultivated outdoor settings, as in Spring by William McTaggart and Spring by Joseph Wilson Forster. In these works, fertility and the future were together suggested as the embodiment of spring alone. Although the golden age from which the spirits of the changing times had evolved was the moment most fervently sought, the luxuriant growth of quiet, sultry summer or the melancholy mood of autumn were also independently expressed as works of art. Frigid winter, not recognized in the vegetative year, was generally absent in the painted Seasons of urban life and its seasonal social events. Art and artifice, not nature, gave them meaning. Cycles of growth and renewal were frozen, hibernating like winter; the year was composed of isolated moods and moods of isolation. The seasons had become mere fragments of time.

See also Abundance; Humors; Months

Selected Works of Art

China and Japan

Lu Kuang, Spring Dawn over the Elixir Terrace, hanging scroll, Yuan Dynasty, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Untitled Painting of the Summer Palace, Beijing, China, Ming Dynasty, now in Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet des Estampes

The Tale of Genji, hand-scroll painting, mid-twelfth century, Nagoya, Japan, Tokugawa Museum

Hiroshige and Toyokuni III, Prince Genji in the Plum Blossom Garden, woodblock triptych, circa 1849–1850, Walton Rawls Collection

Kangaku Shinsuhitsu, Landscape of the Four Seasons, screen, early sixteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Tosa, Mitsuoki, Cherry Blossoms (Spring); Maple Leaves (Autumn), screens, seventeenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Harunobu, Celebrated Poems on the Four Seasons, woodblock print, late 1760s, Japan, Takahashi Collection
 Utamaro, Games of the Four Seasons: Charms of Flowers, woodblock print, circa 1782, London, British Museum
 Tamechika, Raizei, Merriments of Spring and Autumn, hanging scroll, late 1850s, Shizuoka, Japan, Museum of Art

The Movement of Time

Dionysus and Three Horae, black-figure vase, circa 540 B.C., Berlin, Antiquarium (no. F.3989)
Dionysus and Four Dancing Horae, Hellenistic relief, third century B.C.
Dancing Seasons, House of Ganymede, House of the Ancient Hunt, House of the Tragic Poet, Pompeii
Child's Season Sarcophagus, sculpture, circa A.D. 250, Rome, San Lorenzo in Panisperna Season Sarcophagus, sculpture, before A.D. 275, Zurich, Switzerland, Cenetary Rehalp Sarcophagus with Vintaging Seasons from Catacomb of Pretestato, sculpture, fourth century A.D., Rome, Lateran Museum
 Louis XIV Program, included seasons as fountains and statues in Gardens of Versailles; the apartments of Premier at Fontainebleau; the Grand Salon and its adjacent apartment, the small pavilions, and garden sculpture at Marly; embroidered wall hangings by Charles Le Brun
 Coecke van Aelst, Pieter, I (after Raphael cartoon), Border with the Seasons, circa 1532, Rome, Pinacoteca (Inv. no. 3867/A)
 Veen, Otto van, The Four Seasons, 1607, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Library
 Poussin, Nicolas, The Four Seasons, 1660–1664, Paris, Louvre
 Lorrain, Claude, Time, Apollo, and the Seasons, etching, 1662, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
 Chauveau, François, The First Day of the Pleasures of the Enchanted Isle of 1664 with the Parade of Seasons, 1673, London, British Museum

Abundance and Prosperity

Wall paintings from House of Livia, late first century B.C., Rome, Palatine Hill
 Ara Pacis Augustae, 13–9 B.C., Rome
 Arch of Trajan, A.D. 117–120, Benevento, Italy
 Arch of Septimius Severus, A.D. 203, Rome, Roman Forum
Garland Sarcophagus with Putti, sculpture, mid-second century A.D., originally from Capranica, Italy, now in New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art Seasons, fresco, first half of third century A.D., Rome, Catacomb of Pretestato, Crypt of St. Gennaro
Sarcophagus with Earth and the Seasons, sculpture, circa A.D. 250–260, Buffalo, New York, Albright-Knox Art Gallery

Mosaic of Tellus and the Seasons, third century, originally from Sentinum, Italy, now in Munich, Germany, Glyptothek
Mosaic of the Seasons, pavement from Daphne, Antioch, early fourth century, Paris, Louvre
 Heyden, Pieter van der, and Hans Bol (after Pieter Bruegel the Elder), The Four Seasons, 1570, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Velde, Jan van de (after Willem Buytewech), The Four Seasons, circa 1622, Coburg, Germany, Kunstsammlungen der Veste
 Hollar, Wenceslas, The Four Seasons, three-quarter length, 1641, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art; full length, 1643–1644, Paris, Fondation Custodia; half length, 1644, London, British Museum
 Convey, Jean, The Four Seasons, circa 1660, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale Seasons Fountains: Spring, by Philippe Magnier; Summer, by Pierre Hutinot; Autumn, by Thomas Regnaudin; Winter, by François Girardon, 1674, Versailles, France, Chateau gardens
 Gheyn, Guillaume de, and Jeremias Falck (after Charles Le Brun), The Four Seasons, circa 1680, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
 Watteau, Antoine, Crozat Seasons: Summer, circa 1712–1715, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Petrini, Giuseppe Antonio, The Seasons, circa 1740, Lugano, Switzerland, Museo Cantonale di Belle Arti
 Boucher, François, Ceiling Decoration with Putti as Seasons, circa 1750, Fontainebleau, Chateau
 Sauvage, Piat Joseph, The Seasons as Tellus and Children, late eighteenth century, Cincinnati, Ohio, Cincinnati Museum of Art
 Pajou, Augustin, The Four Seasons, sculpture, circa 1770, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art
 Crane, Walter, The Earth and [Child] Spring, 1875
 Stevens, Alfred, The Four Seasons, circa 1876, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute
 Morisot, Berthe, Winter, 1880, Dallas, Texas, Dallas Museum of Art
 Manet, Édouard, Spring, 1881, New York, Mrs. Harry Payne Bingham

Ages of Man and Stages of Love

Galle, Philip (after Maerten van Heemskerck), The Four Seasons, circa 1563, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Matham, Jacob (after Hendrick Goltzius), The Four Seasons, circa 1580, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Matham, Jacob, The Seasons, circa 1585, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Saenredam, Jan (after Hendrick Goltzius), The Four Seasons, circa 1597, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Frisius, Simon Wynouts, and Hendrik Hondius II (after David Vinckeboons), The Four Seasons, 1618, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Bosse, Abraham, The Four Seasons, 1630, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Watteau, Antoine, The Julienne Seasons, circa 1710, private collection

Pater, Jean-Baptiste, The Four Seasons, circa 1721: Spring and Summer, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art; Autumn and Winter, Barcelona, Spain, Coleciùn Cambù

Tardieu, Nicolas (after William Kent), The Seasons, illustrations for The Seasons by James Thomson, 1730, London, British Museum

Bartolozzi, Francesco, and Peltro William Tomkins (after William Hamilton), The Seasons, illustrations for The Seasons by James Thomson, 1793–1794, London, British Library

Boucher, François, The Four Seasons, 1755, New York, Frick Collection

Longueil, Joseph de (after Charles Eisen), The Four Seasons, circa 1785, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Debucourt, Philibert-Louis, Le Printemps ou les Amants and L'Hiver ou le Mari, 1808, Paris, Musée Carnavalet

Separated Seasons

Botticelli, Primavera, circa 1482, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Millais, John Everett, Autumn Leaves, 1856, Manchester, England, City Art Galleries

Bouguereau, Adolphe-William, The Four Seasons, for Hotel Pereire, 1858: Spring, Old Westbury, private collection

Millais, John Everett, Apple Blossoms, Spring, 1859, Collection Viscount Leverhulme

Doré, Gustave, Summer, circa 1860–1870, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

McTaggart, William, Spring, 1864, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, Flora, or Spring, 1868–1884, London, Owen Edgar Gallery

Winterhalter, Franz Xaver, Spring, circa 1870, private collection

Bouvier, Joseph-Laurent-Daniel, Le Printemps, 1870, Paris, Musée des Arts Décoratifs

Tissot, James, L'Été, 1878, Grey, Ontario, Musée Baron Martin

Morisot, Berthe, Summer, 1878, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabré

Cot, Pierre-Auguste, Le Printemps, circa 1880, private collection

Manet, Édouard, Autumn (Mery Laurent), 1881, Nancy, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Bouguereau, Adolphe-William, Spring, 1886, Omaha, Nebraska, Joslyn Art Museum

Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, The Four Seasons, 1892, Paris, Hôtel de Ville

Forster, Joseph Wilson, Spring, 1898, private collection

Benson, Frank, Summer, 1909, Providence, Rhode Island School of Design, Museum of Art

Further Reading

Castriota, David, The Ara Pacis Augustae and the Imagery of Abundance in Later Greek and Early Roman Imperial Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995

Collins, Marie, and Virginia Davis, A Medieval Book of Seasons, New York: Harper Collins, 1992

Davis, Shane Adler, There Is a Season: The Changing Nature of Gardens, Art, and Fashion, (forthcoming)

Dudley, Michael Kioni, Man, Gods, and Nature, Honolulu, Hawaii: Malo Press, 1990

Hanfmann, George Maxim Anossov, The Season Sarcophagus in Dumbarton Oaks, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1951

Held, Julius S., “Flora, Goddess and Courtesan,” in De Artibus Opuscula XL: Essays in Honor of Erwin Panofsky, New York: Johnson, 1971

Hellerstedt, Kahren Jones, Gardens of Earthly Delight: Sixteenth and Seventeenth Century Netherlandish Gardens, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Frick Art Museum, 1986

Pearsall, Derek, and Elizabeth Salter, Landscapes and Seasons of the Medieval World, London: Paul Elek, 1973

Sauerlender, W., “Die Jahreszeiten. Ein Beitrag zur allegorischen Landschaft beim Späten Poussin,” Münchner Jahrbuch der bildenden Kunst VII (1956)

Thacker, Christopher, The History of Gardens, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1979

Veldman, Ilja M., “Seasons, Planets and Temperaments in the Work of Maarten van Heemskerck,” Simiolus 11:3–4 (1980)

Whitrow, Gerald James, Time in History: The Evolution of Our General Awareness of Time and Temporal Perspective, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

Wu, John C. H., The Four Seasons of T'ang Poetry, Rutland, Vermont: Tuttle, 1972

Wu, William Din Yee, “Plants and Poetry in Chinese Gardens,” Pacific Horticulture 51:3 (Fall 1990)

SELF-PORTRAITS I: MEN

Christine M. Boeckl

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Self-Portraits I: Men:

FIFTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

SIXTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Norman Rockwell, Triple Self-Portrait, 1960, for the cover of the February 13, 1960, Saturday Evening Post, Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Norman Rockwell Museum. (Courtesy of the Norman Rockwell Museum, Stockbridge, Massachusetts)

Some scholars have proposed that self-portraits first appeared in Egyptian tomb paintings during the Old Kingdom (3110–2258 B.C.). The Roman writer Pliny and the Greek historian Plutarch both reported that ancient artists created figures in their own image. However, the production of self-portraits in the modern sense of the word can be credited to the rise of humanism in the wake of the Middle Ages.

Artists' self-portraits can be allegorical or realistic. These paintings and sculptures at times take the form of a signature, such as a miniaturist's bust in a prayer book, an architect's portrait on a cathedral, or Lorenzo Ghiberti's famous likeness on the frame of the Gates of Paradise (circa 1450). Many early examples appear in religious settings.

Through the centuries artists' images of themselves became increasingly secular and related to their place in society. Eventually, Baroque artists' self-portraits become coveted collectors' items. Patrons such as the Medici family in Italy and Charles I of England put great store in images of famous painters executed by their own hands. The Galleria degli Autoritratti in the Uffizi in Florence, Italy, for example, holds more than 1,000 such canvases.

Since the beginning of the eighteenth century, most well-known artists, male and female, have recorded their features in some way for posterity. Twentieth-century painters frequently use an analytical approach in autobiographical works and explore their inner lives as well as their environment. Such portraits are by and large less traditional, their results diverse in form and meaning. The inclusion of a mirror is rare but can be seen in works such as Norman Rockwell's Triple Self-Portrait (1960). Because the Allegory of Painting was traditionally represented by a female—thereby excluding male artists from appearing as pittura (paintings)—women's self-portraits are an integral, but separate, part of this discussion (see the essay Self-Portraits II: Women).

One of the most important sources for the development of self-portrait iconography is the legend of St. Luke, which originated in the East. St. Luke was said to have once painted himself painting a true likeness of the Virgin. This Theotokos Hodegetria (Mother of God showing the way) icon was supposed to have miraculously survived the iconoclast controversy (eighth and ninth centuries). After the restitution of orthodoxy in the ninth century, this type of icon became especially venerated. Fourteenth-century writer Nicephorus Kallistos Xanthopoulos reemphasized the authenticity of the sacred Theotokos Hodegetria icons (claiming to have based his text on a sixth-century source). From the fourteenth century onward, renderings of the evangelical Madonna painter St. Luke became an important pictorial tradition in the East and even more so in the West where St. Luke was elevated to the patron saint of art guilds and academies. Because of the association of the evangelist St. Luke with icons, his image became inextricably linked to the defense of holy images as a whole, a popular Catholic theme, particularly after the Protestant Reformation (sixteenth century).

Frequently in Western art, the features of the evangelist St. Luke reveal the face of a painter. This custom started in the circle of Rogier van der Weyden. As art historian Erwin Panofsky explains: "Figuratively speaking, representations of this kind [St. Luke painting] were always self-portraits, and as time went on they tended to become self-portraits in a literal sense also" (Panofsky, Early Netherlandish Painting: Its Origin and Character, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1953, p. 253).

The topos of St. Luke was widespread and long-lived. Due to the lack of comparative material it is difficult to establish if the recorded tradition is correct—it's not totally certain whether artists such as Hinrich Bornemann, Lancelot Blondeel, Frans Floris, and others did in fact model their St. Lukes after their own countenances. There is no doubt, however, that Jacques van Schuppen's features appear on the altarpiece in the imperial church of St. Charles Borromeo in Vienna, Austria. In his St. Luke Painting the Virgin (circa 1735) the cerebral Flemish painter and founder of the Viennese Art Academy refers to St. Luke's three professions: evangelist, physician, and artist. However, van Schuppen refrains from being too obvious in lending St. Luke his own countenance. He changes the color of his eyes and gives St. Luke the customary beard—van Schuppen appears clean shaven in his Self-Portrait (1718).

Raphael altered the time-honored tradition of artistic self-portraiture when he created his St. Luke Painting the Virgin (circa 1511). Here the young painter appears as the inspiring genius behind the evangelist St. Luke, stressing the importance of inventio (inventiveness) in sixteenth-century art. For years Raphael's painting served as the main altar in the Roman church of artists SS. Martina e Luca, and is now located in St. Luke's Academy in the same city. Maerten van Heemskerck's votive panel for Haarlem's St. Luke's guild in The Netherlands (1532) is based on Raphael's idea; he portrays himself as furore dell'arte (fury of art) and his father as the aged evangelist. Pierre Mignard's self-portrait also emerges behind the saint in his St. Luke Painting the Virgin (1695), a work he created after his appointment to the Royal Academy in 1695.

As already noted, artists often indicated what they believed to be their special place in society by including themselves in religious scenes and history paintings. Jan van Eyck's reflection can be found in St. George's shield in his Madonna with Canon George van der Paele (1436). Botticelli, Albrecht Dürer, Caravaggio, and Rembrandt van Rijn, among many others, included themselves in religious scenes. Renaissance master Raphael's portrait and those of many contemporary dignitaries appear as ancient philosophers in his School of Athens (1508–1510), a work that advertises painting's place among the liberal arts.

Artists honored by royal patrons by the gift of a coveted gold chain frequently recorded the event itself. Most famous are the paintings by Titian and Anthony Van Dyck. Diego Velázquez also appears to have indicated his noble status as court painter in his enigmatic masterpiece Las Meninas (1656). Although the painting is purportedly a royal portrait of the charming Infanta Margarita, who stands in the foreground, Velázquez himself appears standing at a large easel, which raises questions about the true subject of his art. The king and queen appear as reflections in a mirror, their images signifying Velázquez's position in a royal household. Luca Giordano spoke of this work as a "theology of Painting." Francisco de Goya followed Velázquez's composition by including himself in the background of his royal portrait Family of Charles IV (1800).

Artists frequently indicated their aspirations to belong to the upper class by the social settings in which they portrayed themselves, their spouses, and/or their circle of family and friends. One of the earliest examples of a double-portrait is Jacob Cornelisz. van Oostsaenen's Self-Portrait Painting His Wife (1530), in which the artist presented himself in the process of rendering his wife, both middle-aged and meticulously dressed. Peter Paul Rubens's Self-Portrait with Isabella Brant (circa 1609) shows the happy and fashionable young couple seated in an idyllic honeysuckle arbor, the painting done in celebration of their wedding. In his Self-Portrait with Helena Fourment (circa 1630), Rubens recorded his second marriage as well. This painting depicts Rubens among worldly success in his palatial, Italianate home, the Rubenshuis, in Antwerp, Belgium. The couple and son Nicolas are captured strolling in the garden among peacocks. The double-portrait tradition was one that endured a long time and was used by artists such as Benjamin West, among countless others, to record their marital bliss. John Singleton Copley's mature self-portrait in The Copley Family (1780) also includes his wife and his family gathered around a large table. Intimate interiors such as this were frequently used as the settings for artists' family portraits in the seventeenth and eighteenth century.

The tradition of the artist rendering himself among his circle of friends has its beginning in Raphael's School of Athens, mentioned above. Rubens's Self-Portrait with Justus Lipsius, Jan Woverius, and His Brother Philip Rubens (circa 1611–1612) refers to the group's intellectual achievements. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when artists' associations were less stringently regulated by academies, it once again became very important to form alliances with colleagues, as in the impressionist Henri Fantin-Latour's Homage to Delacroix (1864), now in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris. Artists, critics, and writers banded together to exchange ideas. The surrealist group had its "class picture" painted by Max Ernst (seated on Fyodor Dostoyevsky's knee), who created All Friends Together in 1922. More revealing is the inclusion of Ernst's self-portrait, along with fellow surrealists André Breton and Paul Eluard, in Virgin Chastising the Infant Jesus (1926). In this work Ernst not only mocks Parmigianino's Virgin-type (Madonna with the Long Neck, circa 1540, in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence) but also refers skeptically to the tradition of the artist's inclusion in religious images.

Male as well as female self-portraits were often the vehicle to convey the artist's credo on art theory. For example, in his

Self-Portrait (circa 1560) Anthonis Mor indicates his intellectual powers by portraying himself in front of a canvas that displays only a Greek poem, a reference both to the process of inspiration and to painting as "mute poetry." The erudite Nicolas Poussin emphasized his role as a scholar over that of a painter in his Self-Portrait (1650) in the Louvre. Poussin, dressed in a black suit, looks directly at the observer. There is no reference to his painting utensils, and all but one of his canvases can be seen turned to face the wall. The crowned head of a classical goddess—after an ancient relief fragment—is prominently displayed at Poussin's left. She represents, according to seventeenth-century scholar, connoisseur, and theorist Giovanni Pietro Bellori, pittura. Modern scholarship has suggested she is an allusion to Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, technical skill, and invention; Poesia; or Perspective. Poussin's head casts a shadow over the explanatory inscription on the right: fifteenth-century architect and theorist Leon Battista Alberti's old paragon between painting and sculpture. Alberti, basing his belief on the Roman rhetorician Quintilian's Institutio oratoria, suggested that painters first traced their own shadows. A year before, Poussin already had expressed analogous art-theoretical ideas in his Berlin Self-Portrait (1649). Similarly, Anton Raphael Mengs's Self-Portrait (1773) in the Uffizi Gallery addresses the viewer like a lecturer ready to expound his theories. Rembrandt's London Self-Portrait (1640) depicts the artist as a Renaissance man. His pose simultaneously refers to Titian's portrait Poet Aristo (1512), now generally called Portrait of a Man, and Raphael's Baldassare Castiglione (circa 1515), a portrait of the Italian author of The Courtier. One of the last important works in the tradition of artists portraying themselves as scholars and scientists is Charles Wilson Peale's Self-Portrait Showing His Natural History Museum (circa 1820) in which the painter lifts a curtain and grants us a glimpse at his impressive collection of animal specimens.

The painter in his studio becomes a topos that depicts artists at work amid the paraphernalia of their profession. Male and female renditions typically stress that they are part of the upper middle class. Well-groomed, they sit at their easels and advertise their specialties: histories, landscapes, miniatures, portraits, genre scenes, or still lifes. An early example of such a work done by a landscape painter is Paul Bril's Self-Portrait (circa 1590), which shows the artist seated in front of a completed canvas as he strums a lute and casually turns to the observer. Bril wears a hat to add to the formal character of his portrayal. Annibale Carracci's famous Self-Portrait on Easel (1605) simply presents his likeness on a canvas propped up for the viewer's perusal. The Artist in His Studio (1864) by James Abbott McNeill Whistler is set in his elegant fin de siècle atelier, which includes two stylish models dressed in white.

Other artists emphasized the intimacy of the studio by donning work clothes, as in Rembrandt's two self-portraits of circa 1660 (in Kenwood House in London and in the Louvre). Painters have also portrayed themselves with maulstick and brushes in hand, presenting their palettes. Scholars have studied these depictions of palettes because they indicate artists' personal preferences as well as availability of colors. In William Hogarth's Self-Portrait with Palette (1758) the artist displays an array of different hues on his palette to emphasize his keen interest in color theory. Francisco de Goya, in his Self-Portrait with Palette (1826), displays his well-organized oils, 12 in all, with the notable omission of green. Paul Cézanne, Vincent van Gogh, and Pablo Picasso continued this tradition into the twentieth century, although the realistic rendering of their features and surroundings become less important to statements about themselves as painters.

A select group of artists described themselves as academicians. Pierre Subleyras's complex and autobiographical The Studio of the Painter (circa 1740) attempts to sum up his entire life: the elderly artist is perched in the foreground holding his youthful portrait. Every object in the large interior is laden with symbolism and significant to his oeuvre: plaster casts of famous classical sculptures and an array of his important commissions such as the prominently displayed portrait of Pope Benedict XIV. This tradition of creating a visual narrative is further enhanced by Gustave Courbet in The Painter's Studio: A Real Allegory Summing up Seven Years of My Life as an Artist (1855). On the left of the enormous canvas (measuring close to 12 feet by 20 feet) Courbet presents his models and subjects, such as the figure of Muse-Truth who stands behind Courbet, and on the right he presents his most important patrons and friends.

The mirror, an age-old implement for artists, typically alludes to the faithful reflection of nature. (Legend explains the origin of painting as the result of artists watching their reflection in water.) Mirrors also symbolize veritas (truth) and self-awareness and were recommended by the Athenian philosopher Socrates, who told his pupils to look into the mirror "to know thyself." It is remarkable that few artists include this essential tool of their trade in their self-portraits—as if purposefully removed, just as the scaffold is dismantled when a structure is completed. In Rockwell's Triple Self-Portrait the mirror is included as a joke. The artist pokes fun at himself as he peeks at his aging, spectacled reflection, translating it into an idealized picture of a suave young man. Pinned to the large canvas are reproductions of some of the most famous self-portraits: Dürer's, Rembrandt's, and van Gogh's, artists clearly in another league. The only precedence for a similar triple image seems to have been Johannes Gump's Self-Portrait with Mirror (1646).

Mirrors, however, may be referred to indirectly or included to lend another pictorial dimension, as in Jan van Eyck's Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami) (1434) in which the artist's reflection in a mirror serves as one of the witnesses to the event. The mirror was also used later by Velázquez in his Las Meninas, noted above. In his Vienna Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1524), mannerist Parmigianino ingeniously captures the look of his reflection from a uniquely curved surface resembling a bull's-eye mirror—which at times were called "magic." He created this narcissistic work in the hope of impressing the pope with his brilliant new concept.

Optical play dominates many postmodern works, stressing the objectivity of the portrayal along with multifaceted illusions of reality. Artists of the second half of the twentieth century have arrived at very different self-realizations from their predecessors. Painstaking self-examination has been found in modern photo-realism since the 1970s. Chuck Close's Self-Portrait (1968) and Richard Estes's Double Self-Portrait (1976)

both work with close-up lenses and complex mirror reflections. The latter creates the illusion that the canvas lets one see in both directions.

Another prop typically available in a painter's workshop is a skull used in life drawings and as a memento mori in still lifes. In Herman van Vollenhoven's Painter in His Studio (circa 1640), for example, the artist is captured in the process of depicting a couple with a skull. Salvatore Rosa's Self-Portrait with a Skull (1659) emphasizes his philosophical nature. Johann Zoffany elaborated on this tradition in Self-Portrait with Skull (1776). In his Self-Portrait (before 1824), the romantic, youthful Théodore Géricault poses in a contemplative mood in his garret studio below a shelf upon which a skull rests.

Other artists' self-portraits refer to the old tradition of the danse macabre (some seventeenth-century versions of the cycle included "death and the artist," a type uncommon in the Middle Ages). In Arnold Böcklin's Self-Portrait with Death (1872) the painter can be seen listening attentively to a seductive tune a grinning skeleton fiddles into his ear. Other artists follow this tradition but give the subject an autobiographical twist. For example, Hans Thoma—who may have known Böcklin's prototype—painted Self-Portrait with Cupid and Death (1875) as an account of Thoma's love for his wife Cella, whom he met that year. Lovis Corinth, in his Self-Portrait with Skeleton (1896), deliberately distances himself from an allegorical interpretation and stresses realism. A skeleton dangles powerlessly from an iron hook, the artist's robust countenance seemingly defying the grim reaper. Artists such as Adolf Hildenbrand continued the tradition of the artist and death well into the twentieth century.

Dürer, Rembrandt, van Gogh, and Picasso systematically recorded their features as they journeyed through life and developed changing senses of self. Dürer first rendered his features in a drawing when he was only 12 years old. Rembrandt also made personal character studies as a very young man, and his expressive face can be recognized in a number of early history paintings. Over the years Rembrandt's exercises become independent artworks, and these penetrating inward looks are among the most treasured examples of his oeuvre. No other painter left as many psychological portraits in print or on canvas as did this Baroque genius. Rembrandt's gaze is expansive even in the darkest hours of his life, as one can observe in the stoically defiant Self-Portrait (1658) in the Frick Collection in New York. It was conceived during his bankruptcy proceedings in the 1650s. Rembrandt is seated as "the philosopher king who does not give in to misfortune" (Kenneth Clark, Rembrandt and the Italian Renaissance, New York, 1966, p. 130). Van Gogh was similarly obsessed with recording his face. Unlike Rembrandt's expansive gaze, Van Gogh's eyes often reflect the pain of a caged animal. This is most pronounced in the work Man with the Bandaged Ear (1889). Picasso's eyes are the most characteristic feature of his face even in his highly abstracted, masklike paintings. We recognize Picasso in his proto-cubist portrait of 1907 by his expressive, enlarged eyes. Although twentieth-century self-portraits are less realistic than their predecessors, Picasso is equally effective in revealing his inner self.

Some of the most successful self-portraits bare strong inner emotion. Caravaggio is credited with being the first to study his own sickly mien in his Bacchus malata (1590s). Experiments in physiognomy were continued by Giovanni Lorenzo Bernini, who was said to have studied his distorted face for the David (circa 1621) in the Borghese Gallery in Rome, aided by none other than his friend Maffeo Barberini and later by Pope Urban the VIII, who personally held the mirror for this endeavor. Facial expressions were later codified by French historical painter Charles Le Brun, and the French Academy dictated studies of physiognomy to all its members. The tradition of certain facial features for anger, surprise, and so on was still influencing Courbet at the time of his Self-Portrait (The Desperate Man) (1843).

Throughout the centuries painters have continually created personal allegories in their self-portraits. These are all idiosyncratic works that rarely effect later artists. Dürer saw himself as an imitator of Jesus Christ. Rembrandt, in his Self-Portrait with Saskia (circa 1634–1636) in Dresden, Germany, chose the format of a morality play. He painted himself in the guise of the Prodigal Son squandering his money, using his first wife's features—not quite convincingly—for the fast woman in a tavern. In one of his last canvases, Self-Portrait, Laughing (circa 1665) in Cologne, Germany, Rembrandt again appears disguised, alluding to the ancient Greek painter Zeuxis, who died laughing over the demands of a vain, old patroness: the canvas in front of the aged Rembrandt reveals a wrinkled female profile.

Jan Steen's frequent inclusion of self-portraits in some of his genre scenes, such as The Dissolute Household (before 1679), has always been recognized as his unique trait. Arnold Houbraken's eighteenth-century biography of Dutch painters De groote schouburgh der Nederlantsche konstschilders en schilderessen provides insight into Steen's efforts to compare his art with theater. In his Self-Portrait as Lutist (before 1679) Steen cast himself as a comedian. Recently it has been established that Steen impersonates a sanguine (or jovial) temperament based on Cesare Ripa's description: "... a jovial, laughing, fleshy young man strumming on a lute ... who is clever at all the arts." Steen's casual pose, along with the musical instrument, notebook, and tankard of beer, conjure up the bacchic reference also mentioned by Ripa.

Courbet reached an important crossroads in his career when he painted The Meeting, or Bonjour M. Courbet (1854). Dressed as a pilgrim or journeyman, Courbet is portrayed meeting his most important art patron near Montpellier, France. The painting describes in realistic terms the differences between the wealthy, bourgeois Jacques-Louis-Alfred Bruyas, his servant, and the young Courbet. The welcome alludes to similar three-figure illustrations of the Wandering Jew Ahasuerus. Courbet was proud of his "Assyrian" beard, which is typical of his appearance during the 1850s.

Paul Gauguin in his Self-Portrait with Halo (1889) also aims at a subjective symbolism. His devilish mask under a halo refers to the fallen angels, and the inclusion of a snake and an apple refers to the Fall of Man. Another enigmatic painter, Henri Rousseau, is less interested in realistically rendering his features than in conveying his private symbolism. The gifted amateur's Myself-Portrait-Landscape (1890) shows a multi-flagged sailing vessel docked behind the painter. It refers to Rousseau's renderings of his imaginary trips into a tropical dream world.

Twentieth-century artists follow Gauguin and Rousseau in their conceptual approach. Marc Chagall's Self-Portrait with Wineglass shows the artist on his wife's shoulders in front of a view of Vitebsk (now in Belarus). An angel (deus ex machina?) flies over the happily cavorting couple and adds to the dreamlike atmosphere. The colors are bright and symbolize Chagall's nostalgic longing for his native city, which he was about to revisit in 1917 when he painted this work.

The role of the "identification portrait" is under investigation by art history scholars. We now know, for example, that Michelangelo rendered himself in disguise, both in the Sistine Chapel ceiling (1508–1512) as the severed head of Holofernes, and in the Last Judgment (1534–1541) on the flayed skin of St. Bartholomew. Similarly, in Caravaggio's David with the Head of Goliath (circa 1606), the artist gave Goliath's head, held by the victorious David, his own features. Contemporary sources tell us that David is a portrait of Caravaggio's young lover, which gives this canvas a personal erotic meaning. On the other hand, Johann Zoffany characterized himself in his Self-Portrait as David with the Head of Goliath (1756) as "David, the Anointed One." Zoffany followed this painting with his Self-Portrait as David, a Giorgione tradition. Although it no longer exists, Wenzel Hollar recorded the association in his seventeenth-century print Giorgione as David Holding the Severed Head of Goliath.

During the seventeenth century, female personifications were chosen by male artists as their inspirational muses. This concept has its origin in classical images that compare painting to its sister art: the depictions of the poet and his muse. David Klocker-Ehrenstrahl's Self-Portrait (1691), shows two female allegorical figures carrying Cesare Ripa's attributes of Painting to assist the artist in his studio. Georg Desmarées personalized his Self-Portrait with Daughter Maria Antonia (1761), with pittura represented by the artist's daughter, Maria Antonia, who hands her father palette and brushes.

Few subjects give artists such free reign to examine and display their outer and inner lives as self-portraits do. In times past, self-portraits were often included in religious works seeking divine protection. Later, increasing emphasis was placed on individuality, from the St. Luke's allegories to the most esoteric and narcissistic modern installations and films. An example, organized by Independent Curators Incorporated (ICI) in New York, was titled Eye for I (1988) and consisted of the video self-portraits of 14 American and European artists. The self-portrait—for both male and female artists—has always been an important means by which to join a higher station in life. Artists of all periods have recorded autobiographical studies that in some way reveal their aspirations, accomplishments, art theories, beliefs, and personal philosophies.

See also Artists/Art; Fame

Selected Works of Art

Fifteenth Century

Eyck, Jan van, Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami), 1434, London, National Gallery

Eyck, Jan van, Madonna with Canon George van Der Paele, 1436, Bruges, Belgium, Groeningemuseum

Ghiberti, Lorenzo, Self-Portrait, on Gates of Paradise, circa 1450, Florence, Italy, Baptistry

Dürer, Albrecht, Self-Portrait as a Boy, circa 1484, drawing, Vienna, Austria, Albertina

Sixteenth Century

- Dürer, Albrecht, Self-Portrait as Christ, 1500, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Michelangelo, Self-Portrait as Head of Holofernes, circa 1508, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Raphael, School of Athens, 1508–1510, Vatican, Stanze della Segnatura
 Raphael, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, circa 1511, Rome, St. Luke's Academy
 Parmigianino, Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, 1524, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Cornelisz. van Oostsaanen, Jacob, Self-Portrait Painting His Wife, 1530, Toledo, Ohio, Toledo Museum of Art
 Heemskerck, Maerten van, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, 1532, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum
 Michelangelo, Self-Portrait as Flayed Skin of St. Bartholomew, Last Judgment, fresco, 1534–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Mor, Anthonis, Self-Portrait, circa 1560, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Titian, Self-Portrait, circa 1560, Berlin, Germany, Kaiser Friedrich Museum
 Bril, Paul, Self-Portrait, circa 1590, Providence, Rhode Island School of Design Caravaggio, Bacchus malata, 1590s, Rome, Borghese Gallery

Seventeenth Century

- Carracci, Annibale, Self-Portrait on Easel, 1605, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Caravaggio, David with the Head of Goliath, circa 1606, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Self-Portrait with Isabella Brant, circa 1609, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Self-Portrait with Justus Lipsius, Jan Woverius, and His Brother Philip Rubens, circa 1611–1612, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Pitti
 Bernini, Giovanni Lorenzo, David, circa 1621, Rome, Borghese Gallery
 Van Dyck, Anthony, Self-Portrait, circa 1621, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Self-Portrait with Helena Fourment, circa 1630, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait with Saskia, circa 1634–1636, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait, 1640, London, National Gallery
 Vollenhoven, Herman van, Painter in His Studio, circa 1640, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
 Gump, Johannes, Self-Portrait with Mirror, 1646, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Poussin, Nicolas, Self-Portrait, 1649, Berlin, Germany, Bode Museum
 Poussin, Nicolas, Self-Portrait, 1650, Paris, Louvre
 Velázquez, Diego, Las Meninas, 1656, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait, 1658, New York, Frick Collection

- Rosa, Salvator, Self-Portrait with Skull, 1659, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait at His Easel, 1660, Paris, Louvre
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait, 1660, London, Kenwood House
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Self-Portrait, Laughing, circa 1665, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz-Museum
 Steen, Jan, The Dissolute Household, before 1679, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Steen, Jan, Self-Portrait as Lutist, before 1679, Madrid, Spain, Thyssen-Bornemisza Collection
 Mignard, Pierre, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, 1695, Troyes, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Eighteenth Century

- Schuppen, Jacques van, Self-Portrait, 1718, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste
 Schuppen, Jacques van, St. Luke Painting the Virgin, circa 1735, Vienna, Austria, Church of St. Charles Borromeo
 Sableyras, Pierre, The Studio of the Painter, circa 1740, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden Künste
 Zoffany, Johann, Self-Portrait as David with the Head of Goliath, 1756, New York, Richard L. Feigen and Company
 Hogarth, William, Self-Portrait with Palette, 1758, London, National Portrait Gallery
 Desmarées, Georg, Self-Portrait with Daughter Maria Antonia, 1761, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 West, Benjamin, Self-Portrait with His Wife, circa 1770, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art
 Mengs, Anton Raphael, Self-Portrait, 1773, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Zoffany, Johann, Self-Portrait with Skull, 1776, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Copley, John Singleton, The Copley Family, 1780, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Goya, Francisco de, Family of Charles IV, 1800, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Goya, Francisco de, Self-Portrait with Dr. Arrieta, 1820, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Art
 Peale, Charles Wilson, Self-Portrait Showing His Natural History Museum, circa 1820, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts
 Goya, Francisco de, Self-Portrait with Palette, 1826, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Géricault, Théodore, Self-Portrait, before 1824, Paris, Louvre
 Courbet, Gustave, Self-Portrait (The Desperate Man), 1843, private collection
 Courbet, Gustave, The Meeting, or Bonjour M. Courbet, 1854, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
 Courbet, Gustave, The Painter's Studio: A Real Allegory Summing up Seven Years of My Life as an Artist, 1855, Paris, Louvre
 Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, The Artist in His Studio, 1864, Chicago, Art Institute
 Böcklin, Arnold, Self-Portrait with Death, 1872, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle

Thoma, Hans, Self-Portrait with Cupid and Death, 1875
 Cézanne, Paul, Self-Portrait with Palette and Easel, circa 1885, Zurich, Switzerland, E. G. Buhrle Collection
 Gogh, Vincent van, Self-Portrait with Easel, 1888, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Vincent van Gogh
 Gogh, Vincent van, Man with the Bandaged Ear, 1889, Chicago, collection of Mr. and Mrs. Leigh B. Block
 Gauguin, Paul, Self-Portrait with Halo, 1889, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Chester Dale Collection
 Rousseau, Henri, Myself-Portrait-Landscape, 1890, Merion, Pennsylvania, Barnes Collection
 Corinth, Lovis, Self-Portrait with Skeleton, 1896, Munich, Germany, Staatliche Galerie im Lenbachhaus

Twentieth Century

Matisse, Henri, Self-Portrait, drawing in charcoal, 1900, Le Cateau, France, Musée Henri Matisse
 Picasso, Pablo, Self-Portrait, 1901, Paris, Musée Picasso
 Picasso, Pablo, Self-Portrait, 1906, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Museum of Art Picasso, Pablo, Self-Portrait, 1907, Prague, Czech Republic, National Gallery
 Chagall, Marc, Self-Portrait with Wineglass, 1917, Paris, Musée National d'Art Moderne
 Ernst, Max, All Friends Together, 1922, Cologne, Germany, Wallraf-Richartz-Museum
 Ernst, Max, Virgin Chastising the Infant Jesus, 1926, Brussels, Belgium, Krebs Collection
 Beckmann, Max, Self-Portrait with Cigarette, 1927, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Busch-Reisinger Museum
 Hildenbrand, Adolf, Self-Portrait with Death, 1930, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle
 Matisse, Henri, Self-Portrait, drawing in charcoal, 1937, Baltimore, Maryland, Museum of Art, Cone Collection
 Rockwell, Norman, Triple Self-Portrait, 1960, for the cover of the February 13, 1960, Saturday Evening Post, Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Norman Rockwell Museum
 Warhol, Andy, A Set of Six Self-Portraits, oil on silk screen on canvas, 1967, San Francisco, California, Museum of Art
 Close, Chuck, Self-Portrait, 1968, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Walker Gallery
 Estes, Richard, Double Self-Portrait, 1976, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Further Reading

Adolphs, Volker, Der Künstler und der Tod: Selbstdarstellungen in der Kunst des 19 und 20 Jahrhunderts, Cologne, Germany: W. König, 1993
 Birren, Faber, History of Color in Painting: With New Principles of Color Expression, New York: Reinhold, 1965

Bock, Catherine C., "Henri Matisse's Self-Portraits: Presentation and Representation," Psychoanalytic Perspectives on Art III (1988)
 Bonafoux, Pascal, Portraits of the Artist: The Self-Portrait in Painting, New York: Rizzoli, 1985
 Brilliant, Richard, Portraiture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990
 Cellini, Pico, "Il S. Luca di Raffaello," Bolletino d'Arte 30 (1958)
 Chapman, Howard Perry, Rembrandt's Self-Portraits: A Study in Seventeenth-Century Identity, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
 ———, "Persona and Myth in Houbraken's Life of Jan Steen," The Art Bulletin 75 (1993)
 Duthy, Robin, "Lucian Freud: A Ruthless Master," Connoisseur 218 (1988)
 Gaus, Joachim, "Ingenium und Ars-das Ehepaarbildnis Lavoisier von David und die Ikonographie der Museninspiration," Wallraf-Richartz Jahrbuch 36 (1974)
 Goldscheider, Ludwig, Five Hundred Self-Portraits from Antique Times to the Present Day, London: Allen, 1937; Wilmington, Delaware: International Academics, 1937
 Grosshans, Rainhold, Maerten van Heemskerck, Berlin: Boettcher, 1980
 Koerner, Joseph Leo, The Moment of Self-Portraiture in German Renaissance Art, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1993
 Lee, Jane, "Derain's The Painter and His Family," Burlington Magazine 128 (1988)
 Makela, Maria, "A Late Self-Portrait by Lovis Corinth," Museum Studies 16 (1990)
 Messina, Marcia Grazia, "The Mask in Paul Gauguin's Self-Portraits," Ricerche di Storia dell'Arte 37 (1989)
 Moffit, John F., "Goya y los Demonios," Goya 163 (1981)
 Paoletti, John, "Michelangelo's Masks," The Art Bulletin 74 (1992)
 Poch-Kalous, Margarethe, Pierre Subleyras: In der Gemaldegalerie der Akademie der Bildenden Künste, Vienna, Austria: Rosenbaum, 1969
 Polleros, Friedrich, "Between Typology and Psychology: The Role of the Identification Portrait in Updating Old Testament Representations," Artibus et Historie 24 (1991)
 Pressly, William, "Genius Unveiled: The Self-Portraits of Johan Zoffany," The Art Bulletin 69 (1987)
 Raupp, Hans-Joachim, Untersuchungen zum Künstlerbildnis und zur Künstlerdarstellung in den Niederlanden, New York: Olms, 1984
 Ray, Man, Self-Portrait, London: Deutsch, 1963; Boston: Little, Brown, 1988
 Richard, Anne, "Denis Laget: The Strategy of Self-Portraiture," Opus International 106 (1988)
 Winner, Matthias, "Poussins Selbstbildnis von 1649," in "Il se rendit en Italie" études offertes a Andre Chastel, Rome and Paris, 1987

SELF-PORTRAITS II: WOMEN

Fredrika Jacobs

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Self-Portraits II: Women:

ANCIENT AND CLASSICAL

NINETEENTH CENTURY

MEDIEVAL

TWENTIETH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

Artemisia Gentileschi, Self-Portrait as the Allegory of Painting, circa 1640, England, Royal Collection. (Courtesy of the Royal Collection, ©1995, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II)

Over the centuries, women have chosen to depict themselves in ways that are not necessarily in agreement with their portrayals by male artists. Relying on a referential system of accoutrements, which is understood regardless of form and style, women often have visually documented the conflicts between gendered expectations and professional demands that they encounter. These have varied from the good mother images seen in Self-Portrait with Daughter by Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun (1789) and Berthe Morisot (1885 and 1887) to the many emotionally charged and politically laden autobiographical images of Frida Kahlo. Women's self-portraits include the reflective Self-Portrait Hesitating Between Painting and Music (circa 1794) by Angelica Kauffmann as well as the aggressive assumption of professional authority in Adélaïde Labille-Guiard's Self-Portrait with Two of Her Students, Gabrielle Capet and Mlle. Carreaux de Rosamond (1785). Women's more recent examinations of self as both private individuals and reflections of society may be seen in the work of Marisol (Marisol Escobar) in the 1960s and Cindy Sherman in the 1970s.

According to the Roman writer Pliny the Elder's history of ancient art, "Women too have been painters" (Natural History, XXXV, 147–148). Although the earliest depictions of women artists, such as a first-century fresco in the Museo di Capodimonte Naples, Italy, and a hydria by the Attic Leningrad Painter in the Torno Collection in Milan, Italy, do not differ significantly from depictions of male artists, later illustrations of ancient women artists imply a likeness between painting one's face with cosmetics and replicating one's physiognomy with paint (Boccaccio, De Claris Mulieribus, circa 1370, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, MS 12420, folio 101v). On the one hand, such images explain a woman's capacity to paint portraits by citing her ability to apply makeup, as Franco Sacchetti's Trecento Novelle (n. 136, circa 1390) states explicitly. On the other hand, makeup as a metaphor appeared in aesthetic debates that involved the derision of artifice as "feminine," such as that between the defenders of drawing (Nicolas Poussin) and partisans of color (Peter Paul Rubens).

During the medieval and early Renaissance periods, self-portraits of women artists most often took the form of a visual "signature." With women's involvement in the arts typically circumscribed by the confining walls of the convent, these signatures, which included either a bust or a full-length image accompanied by either a complete or a partial name, appeared in prayer books, such as the drawing of the scribe "Clarissa" in a late-twelfth-century Psalter in Augsburg, Germany, or the bas-de-page portrait of Sister Maria Ormani in Breviarium cum Calendrium (1483). As women began to assume a more visible place in the arts during the sixteenth century, their self-portraits, like those by their male peers, took a more formal and conventional form.

More than 25 women have been identified as active artists during the Renaissance. A significant number of them produced self-portraits. Initially, these self-portraits emphasized the social status of the artist as a "lady." While her proficiency in music is conveyed, as in Marietta Robusti's (Marietta Tintoretto's) Self-Portrait (circa 1580) in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, and/or her chastity underscored, as in Lavinia Fontana's Self-Portrait with Chaperone (1577) in the Galleria dell' Accademia di San Luca in Rome, the accoutrements of the professional artist (paint, palette, and brushes) are conspicuously absent. Although images such as these accord well with the prescriptive definitions of the noble lady proffered by an ever-increasing number of contemporaneous texts written for and about women, such as Domenico Bruni's Difese della donna (1559) and Lodovico Domenichi's La nobilita delle donne (1551), they deny (through their refusal to acknowledge) woman's involvement in what the humanist Annibale Caro described in 1559 as the "profession of gentlemen." But the reticence of women artists to assert their professional activities was short-lived.

In her portrait of her teacher, Bernardino Campi Painting the Portrait of Sofonisba Anguissola, finished before 1554 and now in the Pinacoteca Nazionale in Siena, Italy, Anguissola places herself firmly in the academic tradition. Not only does she illustrate the reciprocity of her master-pupil relationship with Campi and thereby refute the notion that women learn to paint only to acquire one more attribute of the accomplished lady, but she also asserts the ultimate authority of her gaze over that of Campi. Although Campi was the mentor, it is Anguissola, the student, who is the controlling master in and of this image. Following this precedent, women continue to the present day to portray themselves in a manner that proclaims their mastery of the medium and the model. In her Self-Portrait (1985) in a private collection, Catherine Murphy, using a mirrored image, shows herself standing in front of an easel in the process of painting a nude male—an inversion of the Pygmalion story. But if many women artists asserted their authority of authorship, others, like Kahlo, showed themselves in deference to an artist husband. Thus, in Portrait of Frida and Diego (1931) in the San Francisco Museum of Art in California, it is the capacious Diego Rivera and not the diminutive Kahlo who holds the palette and brushes. Typically, however, Kahlo's self-portraits communicate her cultural and political identity. In images such as Self-Portrait on the Border Between Mexico and the United States (1932), Kahlo's particular form of Mexicanidad expresses her deeply felt nationalism through the inclusion of Aztec imagery: skeletons, hearts, and Coatlicue.

Perhaps the most complete statement of woman's authority of authorship is found in Artemisia Gentileschi's Self-Portrait as the Allegory of Painting (circa 1640) in the Royal Collection in St. James Palace in London. In accordance with literary and visual descriptions of the personification of the art of painting as set forth in works such as Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1593) and in keeping with an association implied but not made explicit in Felice Antonio Casoni's medal commemorating Lavinia Fontana (1611), Gentileschi has presented herself as both muse and inspired artist. As Giovanni Domenico Cerrini's contemporaneous Allegory of Painting with Self-Portrait, from the mid-seventeenth century and now in the Pinacoteca Nazionale in Bologna, Italy, indicates, males could not conflate and then assume this dual role.

Although less pointed in their reference to woman as artist and woman as model, Sherman's untitled film stills (1977) continue to explore this dualism by visually posing the question "Who am I (eye)?" In appropriating the identity of media-generated female stereotypes, her photographs reverse the terms of art and autobiography. By showing the self as an imaginary construct and refusing to reveal her true self, Sherman not only exposes the paradox of the photographic medium but also exhibits her control of it. Like Sherman, Marisol poses the question "Who am I?" In Self-Portrait (1961–1962) in the Museum of Contemporary Art in Chicago, Marisol expands the "I" to include seven different Marisol personalities. Like her sculptures of stereotypic women acting out prescribed female roles, Marisol's Self-Portrait explores the dilemma she and other women face when choosing to accept or reject these roles.

Although women artists have tended for the most part to grapple in varied and personal ways with definitions of "I," the tendency to assert their professional activities visually has been pervasive. Thus, for example, Clara Peeters, known for her bravura handling of reflective metallic surfaces in "breakfast pieces," painted Self-Portrait with Still-Life (circa 1610) (current whereabouts unknown), and Judith Leyster, initially known for her small domestic scenes, advertised her skill in handling these subjects by including a genre painting set on an easel, on which she is supposedly at work, in Self-Portrait (circa 1635) in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.

Despite exhortations by moralists such as Jacob Cats, the declarations of competency put forth by seventeenth-century women in these and similar self-portraits is reflected both in the rolls of guild members (Leyster, for example, was enrolled in the painter's guild in Haarlem, The Netherlands, in 1633) and in inventories that indicate kings, princes, and counts collected and paid impressive sums for works by women. The influence of Enlightenment ideas, combined with an emerging prosperous middle class in pursuit of qualities associated with the "feminine" (artifice, pleasure, and sensation), affected both the number and the status of professional women painters in Europe during the eighteenth century.

Not surprisingly, this shift in society and ideology is reflected in the way women artists presented themselves. Although some, like Vigée-Lebrun, opted to portray themselves in accordance with the ideals of the happy mother typical of rococo family conversation pieces, as in Self-Portrait with Daughter (1789) in the Louvre in Paris, and celebrated by Jean-Jacques Rousseau in Émile (1762), most emphasized their roles as academicians in the world of public art. Thus, for example, beginning at age 13, Kauffmann began to produce self-portraits in which she is either poised with sketchbook in hand, as in her work in the National Portrait Gallery in London, or actively at work, as in the painting in Burlington House in London. In some cases, such as Self-Portrait Hesitating Between Painting and Music (circa 1794) in Nostrell Priory in Yorkshire, England, she uses a popular moralizing subject to commemorate her decision to pursue an artistic rather than musical career. Although not a self-portrait per se, Kauffmann's Zeuxis Selecting Models for His Picture of Helen of Troy (circa 1794) may be understood as such. By following a well-established tradition in which male artists, such as Giorgio Vasari and Peter Paul Rubens, cast themselves as the "New Zeuxis," Kauffmann not only asserts her position as a legitimate heir to the classical tradition established by the fifth century B.C. Greek painter but also gives an interesting twist to a theme that typically epitomizes the role of the woman as the beautiful object scrutinized by the male gaze.

Like Kauffmann, Labille-Guiard and Marie-Victorie Lemoine were concerned with the issue of artistic tradition and legitimacy. Whether or not Lemoine's Interior of the Atelier of a Woman Painter (1796) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York was painted in defense of Vigée-Lebrun, whose husband was then attempting to secure her safe return to France from years in exile, the painting does convey a sense of unity among female artists. Although Vigée-Lebrun's junior by one year, a seated Lemoine studies at the feet of the artist, who in 1783 had won admission to the French Royal Academy. Acknowledging the status of the female academician while asserting solidarity among women artists was no small matter. In opposition to the rules of the French Royal Academy, which limited the number of female members to four, in 1785 Labille-Guiard exhibited her Self-Portrait with Two of Her Students, Gabrielle Capet and Mlle. Carreaux de Rosamond, now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, thereby symbolically circumventing the quota.

During the nineteenth century, women artists continued to define their position in the academic tradition. Frequently, they achieved this by depicting themselves in the studio, as in Adrienne-Marie-Louise Grandpierre-Deverzy's The Studio of Abel Pujol in 1822 (1822), now in the Musée Marmottan in Paris, or in the midst of an art family, as in Suzanne Valadon's Self-Portrait with Her Son Maurice Utrillo, Her Husband Andre Utter, and Grand'mere (1912) in the Musée National d'Art Moderne in Paris. Similarly and concurrently, women artists continued to depict themselves in the company of their children.

Unlike Valadon's family group, in which the professional aspect of the assembled takes precedence over the familial, Morisot's self-portraits with her daughter Julie (1885 and 1887) are more in keeping with traditional scenes of maternity while paralleling the unsentimental concept of modern motherhood exposed by the Third Republic. One of the most compelling images of this kind is Paula Modersohn-Becker's Self-Portrait (1906), in which she depicts herself half-nude and pregnant, even though she was not. In fact, Modersohn-Becker portrayed herself in the very role she had at this time rejected in order to pursue her career. In so doing she lays before the viewer the quintessential dilemma of how to live one's life as a woman and as a serious artist. This personal quandary, in conjunction with new and popular concepts of motherhood put forth in books known to the artist, such as Johann Jakob Bachofen's Das Mutterrecht (1861, reissued 1897), place

Modersohn-Becker's Self-Portrait in the same category as some of those by Vigée-Lebrun and Morisot.

More recently, the role of motherhood or, more properly, womanhood has taken the form of a challenge to the traditional dichotomies of male/female, reason/nature, and artistic production/biological reproduction, as demonstrated in Carolee Schneemann's "Interior Scroll" from the performance of Women Here & Now (1975) at East Hampton, New York. Schneemann's extraction of a scroll from her vagina makes immediately present in a single person the often-conflicting personae of woman and artist. Some, like Lee Krasner, have turned the association of female with nature to their advantage. In her Self-Portrait (circa 1930), Krasner pictures herself, brushes in hand, in a verdant woodland setting rather than in the more traditional interior studio. Painted while Krasner was an art student, her Self-Portrait conflates two traditions of self-portraiture: a proclamation of profession and the association of nature with the female. Thus, this work continues a long-standing tradition: the use of self-portraits by women artists to present the conflicting roles imposed on them by society.

See also Artists/Art; Self-Portraits I: Men

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Classical

- Leningrad Painter, Woman Artist, Attic hydria, fifth century B.C., Milan, Italy, Torno Collection Woman Artist, fresco, first century A.D., Naples, Italy, Museo di Capodimonte

Medieval

- Clarissa, from late twelfth-century Psalter, Augsburg, Germany
 Marisa, from Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Illustriorum, illuminated manuscript, circa 1370, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale Portrait of Sister Maria Ormani, bas-de-page portrait, 1483, in Breviarium cum Calendrium

Renaissance

- Hemessen, Katharina van, Self-Portrait, painting, 1548, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
 Anguissola, Sofonisba, Self-Portrait, painting, 1554, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
 Anguissola, Sofonisba, Bernardino Campi Painting the Portrait of Sofonisba Anguissola, painting, before 1554, Siena, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
 Anguissola, Sofonisba, Self-Portrait with a Spinet, painting, 1561, Naples, Italy, Gallerie Nazionale di Capodimonte
 Fontana, Lavinia, Self-Portrait with Chaperone, painting, 1577, Rome, Galleria dell'Accademia di San Luca
 Robusti, Marietta (Marietta Tintoretto), Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1580, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- Peeters, Clara, Self-Portrait with Still-Life, painting, circa 1610, current whereabouts unknown

- Leyster, Judith, Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1635, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Gentileschi, Artemisia, Self-Portrait as the Allegory of Painting, painting, circa 1640, London, Royal Collection, St. James Palace
 Cantofoli, Ginevra, Self-Portrait in the Act of Painting a Self-Portrait, circa 1656, Milan, Italy, Brera
 Cerrini, Giovanni Domenico, Allegory of Painting with Self-Portrait, painting, mid-seventeenth century, Bologna, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
 Beale, Mary, Self-Portrait, painting, 1666, London, National Portrait Gallery
 Chéron, Élisabeth-Sophie, Portrait of the Artist, oil on canvas, circa 1672, Paris, Louvre
 Waser, Anna, Self-Portrait, painting, 1691, Zurich, Switzerland, Kunsthalle Arcangelo
 Carriera, Rosalba, Self-Portrait, Holding Portrait of Her Sister, 1715, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Lama, Giulia, Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1728, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Fratellini, Giovanni, Self-Portrait, before 1731, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Carriera, Rosalba, Self-Portrait, pastel, before 1757, Rovigo, Italy, Accademia dei Concordi
 Kauffmann, Angelica, Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1770–1775, London, National Portrait Gallery
 Valdestein, Mariana, Marchesa de Santa Cruz, Self-Portrait, painting, 1772, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Labille-Guiard, Adélaïde, Self-Portrait, painting, 1782, Paris, Collection Héritier Monsieur Raymond Flobert
 Labille-Guiard, Adélaïde, Self-Portrait with Two of Her Students, Gabrielle Capet and Mlle. Carreaux de Rosamond, painting, 1785, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Cosway, Maria, Self-Portrait, 1786, present location unknown
 Piattoli, Anna Bacherini, Self-Portrait, painting, before 1788, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Self-Portrait with Daughter, painting, 1789, Paris, Louvre
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1790, Ickworth, England, National Trust
 Kauffmann, Angelica, Self-Portrait Hesitating Between Painting and Music, painting, circa 1794, Yorkshire, England, Nostell Priory, collection of Lord St. Oswald
 Kauffmann, Angelica, Self-Portrait, painting, before 1807, London, Burlington House
 Kauffmann, Angelica, Zeuxis Selecting Models for His Picture of Helen of Troy, painting, circa 1794, Providence, Rhode Island, Brown University, Annmary Brown Memorial Collection
 Lemoine, Marie-Victorie, Interior of the Atelier of a Woman Painter, painting, 1796, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Grandpierre-Deverzy, Adrienne-Marie-Louise, The Studio of Abel Pujol in 1822, 1822, Paris, Musée Marmottan
 Haudebourt-Lescot, Antoinette-Cécile-Hortense, Self-Portrait, 1825, Paris, Louvre

Morisot, Berthe, Self-Portrait with Daughter, oil on canvas, 1885, private collection
 Morisot, Berthe, Self-Portrait with Her Daughter Julie, pencil on paper, 1887, private collection
 Peale, Sarah Miriam, Self-Portrait, painting, circa 1830, Baltimore, Maryland, Peale Museum
 Sharples, Rolinda, Rolinda Sharples and Her Mother, painting, before 1838, Bristol, England, City Museum and Art Gallery

Twentieth Century

John, Gwen, Self-Portrait, 1900, London, Tate Gallery
 Modersohn-Becker, Paula, Self-Portrait, 1906, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
 Valadon, Suzanne, Self-Portrait with Her Son Maurice Utrillo, Her Husband Andre Utter, and Grand'mere, 1912, Paris, Musée National d'Art Modern Brooks, Romaine, Self-Portrait, 1923, Washington, D.C., National Collection of Fine Arts
 Krasner, Lee, Self-Portrait, circa 1930, Lee Krasner Estate, Robert Miller Gallery
 Kahlo, Frida, Portrait of Frida and Diego, 1931, San Francisco, California, San Francisco Museum of Art
 Kahlo, Frida, Self-Portrait on the Border Between Mexico and the United States, 1932, Manuel Reyer Collection
 Kollwitz, Käthe, Self-Portrait, bronze sculpture, 1936, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum
 Carrington, Leonora, Self-Portrait, 1936–1937, private collection
 Kahlo, Frida, Self-Portrait with Cropped Hair, painting, 1940, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Marisol, Self-Portrait, 1961–1962, Chicago, Museum of Contemporary Art
 Schneemann, Carolee, “Interior Scroll,” from performance of Woman Here & Now, 1975, at East Hampton, New York
 Sherman, Cindy, Untitled no. 131, photograph, 1983
 Murphy, Catherine, Self-Portrait, 1985, private collection

Further Reading

Autoritrattati dagli Uffizi da Andrea del Sarto a Chagall, Florence, Italy: Galleria degli Uffizi, 1990
 Bonafoux, Pascal, Portraits of the Artist: The Self-Portrait in Painting, New York: Rizzoli, 1985
 Chadwick, Whitney, Women, Art, and Society, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1990
 Crozier, W. Ray, and Paul Greenhalgh, “Self-Portraits as Presentations of Self,” Leonardo 21 (1988)
 Garrard, Mary DuBose, “Artemisia Gentileschi’s Self-Portrait as the Allegory of Painting,” The Art Bulletin 62 (1980)
 Gaze, Delia, editor, Dictionary of Women Artists, 2 vols., Chicago and London: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1997
 Rose, Barbara, “Self-Portraiture: Theme with a Thousand Faces,” Art in America 63 (1975)
 Simons, Patricia, “Women in Frames: The Gaze, the Eye, and the Profile in Renaissance Portraiture,” History Workshop 25 (1988)
 Walker, John, Portraits, 5000 Years, New York: Abrams, 1983

SERPENT'S BITE

Sarah S. Gibson

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Serpent's Bite:

SERPENT BITING ITS TAIL

DEATH OF EURYDICE

DEATH OF LAOCOÖN

DEATH OF CLEOPATRA

ST. PAUL

MOSES AND THE BRAZEN SERPENT

OTHER SUBJECTS WITH SNAKE BITES

Maerten van Heemskerck, The Brazen Serpent, 1549, oil on panel, transferred to canvas, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, The Art Museum, museum purchase, gift of The Friends of The Art Museum on the occasion of Allen Rosenbaum's tenth anniversary as director. (Courtesy of The Art Museum, Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey)

The serpent has long been a widely used symbol conveying a multiplicity of meanings depending on the context in which it appears. It can be a symbol of life, power, the underworld, death and the dead, sin, or the devil. Snakes are found as attributes of Prudence, one of the Virtues; of Athena (Minerva), the goddess of wisdom; of Asclepius, the god of healing who inspired the present-day emblem of the medical profession; of Ceres, the goddess of agriculture; of Persephone, the daughter of Ceres and goddess of the underworld; and of Apollo, the god of music, medicine, and poetry. In Norse legend a serpent was said to have once coiled around the Earth, lurking beneath the seas. The war god Thor killed the serpent but died, poisoned by its venom.

Perhaps because the mere representation of a snake may be threatening, there are few works of art that actually depict a serpent biting someone or something. Those works that do present a prominent serpent bite are usually works on one of the following themes: the death of Eurydice from a snake bite, the death of Laocoön and his sons, the death of Cleopatra from the bite of an asp, the story of Moses and the Brazen Serpent, and the serpent biting his own tail.

Serpent Biting Its Tail

The serpent biting its own tail is considered a symbol of eternity or perfection and has many manifestations. Known to the gnostics as the ouroboros, the symbol was thought to display the essential ambivalence of the snake: at the same time active and passive, constructive and destructive.

The snake in one form or another was widely adopted by the humanist Renaissance emblematisers and their successors. For example, Andrea Alciati used the coiled serpent wrapped about a triton to signify immortality through literary work. Otto van Veen signified amor aeternus (eternal love) by an image of a cupid seated within the ouroboros, the coiled snake biting its own tail.

After reading the Greek grammarian Horapollo's treatise Hieroglyphics (fourth or fifth century A.D.), the Renaissance humanists developed a notion that they were following the Egyptians in symbolizing eternity or the universe by means of the snake biting its tail or coiled in a circle. The snake biting its own tail was more often represented in northern European art than in Italian and as the symbol of eternity appeared in emblem books, impressions, and was carved on tombstones.

The humanists also thought of Asclepius's snakes as salutary animals and the coiled snake as a circle of perfection. They took from the Greeks the notion of the snake curled in a circle as a companion of Cronus, the Titan who ruled the universe before he was dethroned by his son Zeus. In Roman times, Cronus became Saturn and was associated with Time. Martianus Capella (fourth–fifth century A.D.) refers to the snake that bites its tail as an attribute of Time. In an engraving by Jean Sadeler, after a composition by Friedrich Sustris (circa 1595), Time holds in his hand a great circle formed by a serpent.

Death of Eurydice

The story of the death of Eurydice, wife of the mythological Thracian minstrel Orpheus, is told in both Ovid's Metamorphoses and Virgil's Georgics. In each version she dies from a snake bite: in Ovid's version she is attacked while wandering through a grassy field accompanied by other naiads (nymphs); in Virgil's she is bitten while fleeing the amorous advances of Aristaneus, a bee-keeper and son of Apollo.

There are relatively few renditions of Eurydice's death in the visual arts. Perhaps her thwarted return from the underworld provided more scope for dramatic invention. One notable exception is Titian's Orpheus and Eurydice (circa 1512), now in the Accademia Carrara in Bologna, Italy. Two different scenes in the narrative are shown: in one scene Eurydice flees from the snake (which looks rather like a small dragon), and in the other she is lost to Orpheus as he turns to look at her on their journey from the underworld. The allegorical mind of many sixteenth-century artists no doubt saw in this narrative a symbol for the precariousness of life.

More than a century later Peter Paul Rubens designed The Death of Eurydice for the Torre de la Parada hunting lodge of Philip IV of Spain, a painting actually executed by Erasmus Quellinus in 1636–1638. Rubens invented a completely new scene in which Eurydice, bitten by a snake visible in the left foreground, dies in the arms of Orpheus.

Continuing interest in this theme is revealed by a later seventeenth-century painting by Richard van Orley, Eurydice Bitten by a Serpent in the Grass (1694) in the Museum Fodor in Amsterdam, The Netherlands, and by Arthur B. Davies's painting Viper-Stricken Eurydice (1916) in the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden in Washington, D.C. All of these images concentrate on the pathos and drama of the narrative.

Death of Laocoön

In Greek mythology, Laocoön, a priest of Troy, is killed along with his sons by two huge sea serpents as a consequence of having warned the Trojans against the wooden horse. In the well-known Hellenistic Laocoön Group sculpture (first century A.D.), the Trojan priest and his sons at first appear to be dying because they are crushed in the coils of the great serpents, but a closer investigation reveals that the snakes are also biting their victims. According to Virgil's version of the myth, Laocoön had offended the goddess Athena, so the snakes were sent as a punishment. The snakes, once their destructive work was done, slithered away to her temple and hid beneath her shield. The tale formed part of the repertory of myth and legend from which the Romans drew to decorate the walls of their villas. Examples of Pompeian wall paintings of The Death of Laocoön can be found in Italy in the Museo Nazionale in Naples and in Pompeii itself, in the Casa de Menandro.

Art historian Leopold David Ettlinger proposes that as soon as the statue of Laocoön and his sons was discovered in Rome in 1506, it served as a moral as well as physical exemplum doloris (exemplar of pain).

The creation of the image was one of those inspired acts by which Greek artists gave to the world a psychologically valid formula . . . which assumed ever new significance in changing contexts because the agony of body and soul was here expressed in such a manner that the "topos" could simply be quoted in order to be understood immediately. (Ettlinger, p. 123)

Titian, however, seems not to have been so impressed with the sculpture. Caricature of the Laocoön (mid-sixteenth century), a print by Niccolò Boldrini after a Titian drawing, parodies the famous statue by substituting apes for the priest and his sons. Perhaps Titian meant not so much to mock the sculpture as to indict the contemporary Florentine and Roman artists who overused it. Certainly there were innumerable copies made of it, such as one by Baccio Bandinelli (1520–1525), now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, and a bronze cast made for Francis I, now in the Louvre in Paris. Art historian Horst W. Janson proposes a more likely interpretation, that the drawing may have been a criticism of those who defended Galen, the second-century Greek physician, in the wake of an accusation by Andreas Vesalius, the sixteenth-century Flemish anatomist, that Galen had dissected apes, not humans. The Galenists defensively suggested that people had changed since classical times. Boldrini's print can be read as a rebuttal: this is what classical bodies of antiquity would have had to look like in order to conform to the anatomical specifications of Galen (Janson, pp. 355–364).

Counter-Reformation theologians suggested the Laocoön Group as a model for those making images of the suffering of Jesus Christ, the saints, and martyrs. El Greco painted the death of the priest and his sons in Laocoön (1608–1614), a painting now in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. The open mouth of the snake viciously attacking Laocoön in El Greco's painting adds to the horror of the struggle and may be a Christian allegory of the destructive power of evil as personified by the serpents. It also is possible that the oval shape of the snake on the left alludes to the humanist notion, derived from Alciati, of the circle as a sign of immortality.

Death of Cleopatra

Artists and their patrons found inspiration in the death by snakebite of yet another person, Cleopatra, queen of Egypt and mistress of Julius Caesar and Marc Antony. History and legend mingle in the life of Cleopatra, who is said to have committed suicide by holding a deadly asp to her breast. The dramatic and pathetic possibilities of the narrative attracted the attention of artists from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century. Guido Reni painted the subject at least four times between 1637 and 1642 and at one point substituted a dagger for the tiny asp, thereby using the same composition he used to portray the suicide of Lucretia, the legendary wife of Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus. In The Death of Cleopatra (1653) Jacob Jordaens depicted a flamboyant assemblage of people gathered around the queen moments before her act of self-destruction. Seemingly insouciant, she holds a small dog in her lap and calmly regards the snake around her arm in a painting that combines a Giorgionesque treatment of landscape with echoes of Michelangelo's heroic figure style.

The pathos of the scene seems to have appealed strongly to the Baroque temperament, and nineteenth-century realists and orientalist also responded to the theme. Egypt and the East had great appeal to the French in the wake of Napoleonic forays to that country and the building of the Suez Canal. Jean-André Rixens's La Mort de Cléopâtre (1874), now in the Musée des Augustins in Toulouse, France, attempts to achieve authentic detail in costume and furniture while including the conventional glossary of references to the East, such as the leopard skin on the floor.

Biblical Themes

The snake appears fairly often in Christian imagery, as when the serpent tempts Eve in Paradise or when the Christ Child treads on a snake or cuts off its head with the cross. In each instance the reptile is associated with evil or sin but does not bite. A somewhat enigmatic exception is the painting Eve, the Serpent, and Death (circa 1512) by Hans Baldung Grien, now in the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa, Ontario. Following the tradition of the Dance of Death, Death claims Eve by laying a hand on her arm, reminding the viewer of the unpredictability and transitoriness of life. The presence of the snake corresponds with the conventional disguise of the devil but with an unexpected twist: the serpent is actually biting Death. Art historian Robert A. Koch suggests at least two possible interpretations. Death may represent Adam, and the snake bite may be understood as an effort to restrain Death and protect Eve. Or the scene may be a recondite portrayal of the origin of Death itself (Koch, p. 29).

Another biblical story that involves a snake, but one that found little echo in the visual arts, was that of St. Paul on Malta (Acts 28:3–6). After being shipwrecked, Paul and his companions attempt to light a fire; Paul gathers a bundle of sticks in which a snake is hidden. "There came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand. . . . And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm." Paul Bitten by a Viper when Throwing Wood on the Fire (mid-eighteenth century) by Giovanni Paolo Pannini is now in the Apsley House Collection of the Duke of Wellington in London.

Moses and the Brazen Serpent

By far the most widely occurring depiction of the serpent is to be found in representations of the Old Testament narrative of Moses and the Brazen Serpent (Numbers 21:4–9). The story concerns one of the tribulations visited by God upon the Israelites as they wandered in the desert following the Exodus. The Israelites railed against Moses and God who, as a punishment and a test of their faith, "sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died." The Israelites recognized their sin in doubting God's plan and begged Moses to pray to the Lord to deliver them.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived. (Numbers 21: 8–9)

Beginning in about the twelfth century this Old Testament subject was used pictorially as a typological reference to Christ on the cross, who had himself declared, “And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life” (John 3:14–15). Examples of this typological motif are to be found in versions of the Biblia Pauperum woodcut (circa 1460), in which the image of the Brazen Serpent flanks the Crucifixion, with the sacrifice of Abraham on the other side. The Brazen Serpent also begins to appear on the side panels or shutters of Crucifixion altarpieces sometime before the fifteenth century. As a prefiguration of the Crucifixion, it underscores the theme of deliverance through faith in God’s chosen image; it focuses on the sacrifice of Christ, who promises salvation to believers.

Iconographer Louis Réau suggests that the double entendre—the serpent of the Fall becomes the serpent of redemption—contributed to the long popularity of the subject. Although its use in a typological sense never disappeared, the Brazen Serpent enjoyed a resurgence of popularity in the sixteenth century and in some instances took on new meaning. Both sides of the Reformation controversy interpreted the theme according to their own preferences. By the mid-sixteenth century it was often seen in northern Europe as an independent scene, as in Maerten van Heemskerck’s painting The Brazen Serpent (1549). This particular work seems to retain the Brazen Serpent’s traditional typological meaning, although it is also influenced by Michelangelo’s treatment of the same topic (1511) on the northwest spandrel of the Sistine Chapel, in that it is also an excuse for the virtuoso display of muscular figures.

The Brazen Serpent was used by Martin Luther as a metaphor for justification by faith alone. Catholics, on the other hand, cited the Brazen Serpent as proof of the legitimacy of image making, and Pope Leo X compared the Lutherans to fiery serpents destroying the faithful with poisonous doctrines. Luther made a clear distinction between symbolic revelation and what to him was idolatry. By choosing an image of the same object that afflicted the Israelites, God explicitly shows that faith in his Word will heal. There is no possibility that the object itself will be interpreted as the source of healing power, since it is the exact image of the cause of harm.

Later Flemish artists followed the traditional treatment of the subject but also seemed to mirror the Last Judgment by dividing the scene into the saved on one side and the damned on the other, as in a print by Michiel Coxie (circa 1533–1534). Rubens (circa 1609–1610) and Anthony Van Dyck (circa 1620) used this two-part composition, but according to art historian Egbert Haverkamp-Begemann, Rubens emphasized the suffering of those who questioned God’s plan, while Van Dyck seems to emphasize trust in the serpent, and hence trust in God (Haverkamp-Begemann, pp. 296–297). Both, however, conform to the dictates of the Council of Trent to strive for narrative clarity in the scene.

Between 1540 and 1545, Agnolo Bronzino decorated the chapel of Eleonora di Toledo in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence. Among the scenes was that of Moses and the Brazen Serpent, which art historian Janet Cox-Rearick suggests may have added a political level of meaning to the typological doctrinal program. The Israelites are equated with the Florentines, who will be saved by Duke Cosimo I Medici, a new Moses divinely inspired. The elaborate allegory may also be interpreted as a warning to the Florentines against dissent. Finally, a serpent is again portrayed curling back on its tail, signifying in this instance the eternity of Medici rule (Cox-Rearick, 1993, pp. 250–259).

There is at least one image of a death-dealing snake that has never been satisfactorily explicated. Nicolas Poussin’s Landscape with a Man Killed by a Snake (1648) in the National Gallery in London depicts a large serpent, a dead man, and two horrified onlookers. Whether it is a mythological or allegorical scene, has an obscure devotional purpose, or illustrates a contemporary event is not clear. This kind of ambivalence is unusual for an artist who usually strove for clarity of meaning and form, so we may hope that eventually its meaning will be elucidated. It does, however, suggest the polyvalent nature of the biting snake motif.

See also Death; Love and Death

Selected Works of Art

Death of Eurydice

- Titian, Orpheus and Eurydice, painting, circa 1512, Bologna, Italy, Accademia Carrara
- Quellinus, Erasmus (executed from Peter Paul Rubens’s designs), The Death of Eurydice, painting for Torre de la Parada, 1636–1638, Madrid, Spain, Prado
- Orley, Richard van, Eurydice Bitten by a Serpent in the Grass, painting, 1694, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Fodor
- Scheffer, Ary, Death of Eurydice, oil on canvas, 1814, Blois, France, Château de Blois, Musée des Beaux-Arts
- Roubaud, François-Félix, Death of Eurydice, marble sculpture, 1859–1861, Aix-en-Provence, France, Musée Granet
- Corot, Jean-Baptiste-Camille, Eurydice Wounded, painting, circa 1868–1870, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Minneapolis Institute of Arts
- Davies, Arthur B., Viper-Stricken Eurydice, painting, 1916, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden
- Picasso, Pablo, Eurydice, Stung in the Heel by a Serpent, Dies in the Arms of the Naiads, etching, 1930, illustration for Ovid’s Metamorphoses, 1931

Death of Laocoön

- Laocoön Group*, Roman sculpture after Agesandros, Athenodorus, and Polydorus of Rhodes, first century A.D., Vatican, Vatican Museums
- Bandinelli, Baccio, Copy of the Laocoön Group, sculpture, 1520–1525, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
- Boldrini, Niccolò (after Titian), Caricature of the Laocoön, woodcut, mid-sixteenth century
- El Greco, Laocoön, painting, 1608–1614, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Death of Cleopatra

- Scorel, Jan van, Death of Cleopatra, painting, 1522, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
- Mignon, Jean, Cleopatra Bitten by an Asp, etching, circa 1543–1545
- Fontana, Lavinia, Cleopatra, painting, circa 1593, Cincinnati, Ohio, Cincinnati Art Museum
- Mignard, Pierre, Death of Cleopatra, painting, 1635, England, private collection
- Reni, Guido, Cleopatra, painting, 1637, Potsdam, Germany, Sanssouci Bildergalerie
- Reni, Guido, Cleopatra, painting, 1638–1639, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Pitti
- Reni, Guido, Cleopatra, 1639–1640, London, collection of Denis Mahon
- Rubens, Peter Paul, Death of Cleopatra, painting, circa 1640, Potsdam, Germany, Sanssouci Bildergalerie
- Reni, Guido, Cleopatra, painting, 1640–1642, Rome, Galleria Capitolina
- Jordaens, Jacob, The Death of Cleopatra, painting, 1653, Kassel, Germany, Staatliche Gemäldegalerie
- Lairesse, Gerard de, Death of Cleopatra, painting, 1686, Toronto, Ontario, Art Gallery of Ontario
- Pittoni, Francesco, Cleopatra, painting, circa 1714, Udine, Italy, Collection Walter Mio
- Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, Staffordshire figurines, colored earthenware, late eighteenth–early nineteenth century, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
- Lassalle-Bordes, Gustave, Death of Cleopatra, painting, 1845, Autun, France, Musée Rolin
- Rixens, Jean-André, La Mort de Cléopâtre, painting, 1874, Toulouse, France, Musée des Augustins

St. Paul

- Goltzius, Hendrik (after J. Stradanus), St. Paul Shipwrecked on Malta Bitten by a Viper, engraving by P. Galle, 1582, no. 33 of a set of 36
- Valckenborch, Frederick van, St. Paul Is Bitten by a Viper, painting, circa 1600, Prague, Czech Republic, Hrad, Obrazarna
- Pannini, Giovanni Paolo, Paul Bitten by a Viper when Throwing Wood on the Fire, painting, mid-eighteenth century, London, Duke of Wellington's Apsley House Collection
- West, Benjamin, St. Paul Shaking the Viper from His Hand after the Shipwreck, oil on canvas, 1789, Greenwich, England, Royal Naval College, Chapel of St. Peter and St. Paul

Moses and the Brazen Serpent

- Crucifixion Page*, woodcut, in Biblia Pauperum, circa 1460
- Michelangelo, The Brazen Serpent, fresco, 1511, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Allegory of Law and Grace, painting, 1529, Gotha, Germany, Staatliche Museum
- Coxie, Michiel, The Brazen Serpent, drawing, circa 1533–1534, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, Swarthmore College
- Coxie, Michiel, The Brazen Serpent, engraving, circa 1533–1534
- Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Workshop of, Allegory of Law and Grace, painting, 1539, Prague, Czech Republic, Národní Galerie

- Heemskerck, Maerten van, The Brazen Serpent, engraving, circa 1540
- Heemskerck, Maerten van, The Brazen Serpent, painting, 1549, Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University, Art Museum
- Heemskerck, Maerten van, The Brazen Serpent, painting, 1551, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum
- Cock, Hieronymus (after Frans Floris), The Brazen Serpent, engraving, 1555
- Rubens, Peter Paul, The Brazen Spirit, painting, circa 1609–1610, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries, The Princes Gate Collection
- Van Dyck, Anthony, The Brazen Serpent, painting, circa 1620, Madrid, Prado
- West, Benjamin, Moses Showing the Brazen Serpent to the Israelites, oil on canvas, 1789, Greenville, South Carolina, Bob Jones University
- John, Augustus, Moses and the Brazen Serpent, painting, 1898, London, Slade School of Fine Arts, University College

Other Subjects with Snake Bites

- Baldung Grien, Hans, Eve, the Serpent, and Death, painting, circa 1512, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada
- Poussin, Nicolas, Landscape with a Man Killed by a Snake, painting, 1648, London, National Gallery

Further Reading

- Alpers, Svetlana, The Decoration of the Torre de la Parada, Brussels, Belgium: Arcade Press, 1971
- Buendia-Ismael, Jose Rogelio, "Humanismo y simbología en El Greco: el tema de la serpiente," Studies in the History of Art 13 (1983)
- Cox-Rearick, Janet, Bronzino's Chapel of Eleonora in the Palazzo Vecchio, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993
- , "Bronzino's Crossing of the Red Sea and Moses Appointing Joshua: Prolegomena to the Chapel of Eleonora di Toledo," The Art Bulletin 69 (March 1987)
- Egli, Hans, Das Schlangensymbol: Geschichte, Märchen, Mythos, Olten, Switzerland: Walter-Verlag, 1982
- Ehresmann, Donald, "The Brazen Serpent: A Reformation Motif in the Works of Lucas Cranach the Elder and His Workshop," Marysas 13 (1966–1967)
- Ettlinger, Leopold David, "Exemplum Doloris: Reflections on the Laocoön Group," in De Artibus Opuscula XL: Essays in Honor of Erwin Panofsky, edited by Millard Meiss, New York: New York University Press, 1961
- Faries, Molly, "A Drawing of the Brazen Serpent," Revue Belge d'Archéologie et d'Histoire de l'Art 44 (1975)
- Harrison, Jefferson, "The Brazen Serpent by Maarten van Heemskerck: Aspects of Its Style and Meaning," Record of the Art Museum at Princeton University 49 (1990)
- Haverkamp-Begemann, Egbert, "Van Dyck and the Brazen Serpent," Master Drawings 28 (Autumn 1990)
- Janson, Horst W., Apes and Ape Lore in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, London: Warburg Institute, 1952
- Koch, Robert A., Hans Baldung Grien: Eve, the Serpent, and Death, Ottawa, Ontario: National Gallery of Canada, 1974
- Saunders, Eleanor, "A Commentary on Iconoclasm in Several Print Series by Maarten van Heemskerck," Simiolus 10 (1978–1979)

SHEPHERDS/SHEPHERDESSES

Sarah S. Gibson

The following forms are covered in the discussion of the theme Shepherds/Shepherdesses:

CLASSICAL PASTORAL

RELIGIOUS PASTORAL

SECULAR PASTORAL

Pair of Seated Musicians: Bagpiper, Lute Player, English soft-paste porcelain, Chelsea Porcelain Manufactory, Derby Porcelain Works, circa 1765, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. (Courtesy of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute)

The ancient image of the shepherd originated with the pastoral, nomadic life of early civilizations. The Judeo-Christian tradition incorporates the concept of the faithful shepherd tending his flocks or presenting his animals for sacrifice. In Greek and Roman classical poetry, shepherds and shepherdesses are associated with a rustic world of innocence, inhabiting an idyllic place called Arcadia, in actuality a province in the Peloponnesus, the peninsula forming the southern section of the Greek mainland. Arcadia was older than the moon, according to Ovid, and its inhabitants were there before the Flood. Because in the Metamorphoses his Arcadians recall his description of the golden age—an age of simplicity without care, want, or fear when people lived in harmony in the world—for later generations of writers and artists Arcadia would be viewed as a world sufficiently remote to be peopled by their imaginations.

Shepherds and shepherdesses were an integral part of pastoral literature, which inspired innumerable visual representations. The pastoral mode long retained its popularity, although interpretation of the elements comprising it may have changed. From antiquity on, pastoral literature was designed for an aristocratic taste; indeed, in seventeenth-century France, pastoral was the leading literary genre. In the Renaissance, idealized representations of the ancient shepherd merged with ideals of courtly love. The fact that the real life of a shepherd is a hard and lonely one was usually conveniently ignored. Nostalgia for what is presumed to be a golden past is the prevalent emotion.

The shepherdess, too, had her beginning in pastoral literature. She appeared as a true peasant figure on occasion; at other times, she was not constrained to work but engaged in idealized pursuits of the pastoral life.

In Eclogues (circa 42–37 B.C.), Virgil adapted a set of Greek bucolic tales involving shepherds, singing contests, laments for lovers (usually lost), and similar themes couched in bantering dialogue. In this genre, he followed Theocritus of Syracuse, who had developed these rustic myths into a branch of Greek literature. Tradition later associated them not with Syracuse, on the island of Sicily, but with Arcadia in mainland Greece. The mythical founder of this branch of poetry was said to be the shepherd Daphnis, who was blinded by a nymph (or by Aphrodite, goddess of love) and spent the remainder of his life composing sad songs about his fate. This Daphnis is not to be confused with a later one, the shepherd in Longus's pastoral romance Daphnis and Chloe (second or third century A.D.).

Among the Virgilian shepherds whose names persist through later centuries were Lycidas, Thyrsis, and Corydon, and among the shepherdesses were Phyllis and Amaryllis. For example, Amaryllis reappears in Torquato Tasso's drama

L'Aminta (1573) and in Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido (1590). These works would contribute to a sixteenth-century revival and elaboration of the pastoral mode in both literature and the visual arts, forming the basis for many narrative paintings of events involving these bucolic personages.

Greek and Roman pastoral poetry, as exemplified by Idylls of Theocritus and Eclogues of Virgil, created a world inhabited by herdsmen and herdswomen whose principal activities were caring for their animals, contemplating life, singing or playing musical instruments, and pursuing love and romance. These activities were all to find numerous visual counterparts.

Although the literary form of the pastoral seems to predominate in classical times, some of its elements are visually present in representations of Apollo, whose various functions included the care of flocks and herds. In this capacity, he bore the epithet "Nomius" (of the pastures). Banished as a punishment for killing the Cyclopes who made Zeus's thunderbolts, he was sent to tend the herds of Admetus. In a conflation of this story with a legend from the Homeric Hymn to Hermes, Hermes, messenger of the gods, who was still a child when this event took place, is shown stealing Admetus's cattle while Apollo is supposed to be guarding them. Scenes based on these legends became especially popular in seventeenth-century European art in the general enthusiasm for works based on classical pastoral themes.

Many Roman wall paintings depict sacred groves in which herdsmen and their flocks are scattered among rocks, trees, and springs. It has been suggested that landscape views painted on the walls of numerous villas emphasize the opposition between natural simplicity and artifice, or between an idealized, harmonious world and the actual one of conflict, insecurity, and tension. Scenes of groves, with shepherds functioning as attributes of a specific place, evoke a sense of piety and serve as a reminder of the pleasure experienced in that place. A typical Roman landscape with goatherds in a sacred grove was found on the north wall of Cubiculum 16 (circa 90 B.C.–A.D. 1) in the Villa of Agrippa Postumus in Boscotrecase, Italy, and is now in the Museo Archeologico Nazionale in Naples, Italy. Similar landscapes are described by contemporary writers in terms of their amoenitas (pleasantness), exemplifying Virgil's locus amoenus (pleasant place); this was to become a topos for later generations.

Religious Pastoral

The sheep or calf bearer carrying an animal for sacrifice is an ancient type, dating back to well before the Christian era. Among the best examples is the marble sculpture The Calf Bearer from the Acropolis in Athens, Greece (circa 570 B.C.).

The ancients also thought of the animal bearer in the role of the shepherd tending flocks as a general symbol of faithfulness and caring.

Christians were quick to adopt those pagan art forms that could easily be related to spiritual texts. The shepherd bearing a sheep was an especially popular form with the early Christians with its reference to Jesus Christ as a Good Shepherd; it is found more than 100 times in the catacombs outside Rome, as, for example, in the wall painting dated to the mid-third century in the Catacomb of Domitilla. The appropriate biblical text (Luke 15:4) recounts the parable of the shepherd who searches for his lost sheep. The image also encapsulates the notion of sacrifice, as in the “good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep” (John 10:11). Christ is referred to as a second David with power to preserve his sheep from danger and to uphold them even in death: “And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd” (Ezekiel 34:23); or “He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm” (Isaiah 40:11).

The Mausoleum of Galla Placidia in Ravenna, Italy, contains a fifth-century mosaic showing a youthful Apollo-like Christ with six sheep in a landscape of rocks and bushes, probably a reference to the pastures of the blessed to which the flock has been safely led. The idyllic pastures may hark back to Virgil, but they also recall the Garden of Eden destined to be restored when the time of salvation comes. Another example in Ravenna is found in San Apollinare in Classe, where Christ the Shepherd is surrounded by 12 sheep, clearly representing the apostles, who in turn stand for the general body of the faithful. The Gospel story of the Transfiguration is also depicted in San Apollinare in the apse mosaic, dated to the early sixth century, in which three sheep represent Peter, James, and John.

The figure type of the Good Shepherd seems to have descended directly from the classical figure of Apollo and appears in various media, such as the sculpture Good Shepherd, dated to the third century, now in the Cleveland Museum of Art in Ohio. The motif was a popular choice for decoration on gold-glass goblets and bowls, which were often given as wedding presents in the fifth century. It appears also on engraved gems, sometimes united with the figure of Jonah.

David, the biblical ancestor and antetype of Christ, is sometimes represented as a shepherd boy, as in the illumination from Paris Psalter (circa 960), now in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. In the scene David Composing the Psalms, he is shown surrounded by his animals, seated in a sacred grove reminiscent of Roman wall paintings. This image also has affinities with classical Orpheus figures in which the mythological Thracian minstrel tames the animals with song. Other Old Testament personages, such as Moses or Jacob, are depicted in scenes underscoring their pastoral, nomadic lives. In a Biblia Pauperum dating from about 1460 in the British Library in London, Moses before the burning bush is shown in the guise of a shepherd encircled by woolly lambs and a shaggy dog. As a prefiguration of the New Testament, the sheep can be linked to Christ's sacrifice.

Other occasions for the portrayal of shepherds in a Christian context are the Annunciation to the Shepherds and the Nativity, which form part of the Christmas Gospel. The shepherds pictured in the full-page Annunciation illumination from the Ottonian Gospel Lectionary of Henry II (1002–1024) accept the news with wonder and a certain astonishment; humility and simplicity are the virtues emphasized. Frequently combined with the Nativity image, by the Renaissance the Annunciation had become relegated to the background, as in Stefan Lochner's Nativity (circa 1440–1445), now in Munich, Germany, or Titian's The Holy Family and a Shepherd (circa 1510) in the National Gallery in London. Shepherds were portrayed as simple, rough men of the people; shepherdesses seem not to enter the picture at all until the later fifteenth century.

In Italy, post-thirteenth-century depictions of shepherds at the Nativity were influenced by Franciscan piety with its emphasis on poverty and humility, as seen in the plain men portrayed in a painting attributed to Giorgione, The Adoration of the Shepherds (circa 1505–1510), in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C. Shepherds are shown in attitudes of prayer or adoration, and their offerings are simple ones—a flute, a lamb, and flowers—and their forms are monumental and generalized.

A different type of shepherd came to be favored in Flanders, Belgium, and the northern Netherlands; he is more rustic and tattered—perhaps more realistic but certainly more individualized. Hugo van der Goes's shepherds in the Portinari Altarpiece (central panel) (circa 1476–1478), now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy, are the forerunners of rustic, often boisterous figures who crowd around the Christ Child.

By the sixteenth century, shepherds and shepherdesses were also joined on occasion by a host of undifferentiated common men and women. Rural gifts of produce or fruits are offered to the Christ Child; the scene becomes increasingly secularized and genre-like. It has been suggested that this type of realistic portrayal reflects current trends in Counter-Reformation art. Both Caravaggio and Jacopo Bassano are linked to the growth of interest in rustic settings of biblical subjects, but the influence of the latter is more prevalent. Rembrandt van Rijn's Adoration of the Shepherds (1646) echoes the themes of humility and simplicity, but he imparts a transcendent quality to the scene by bathing the Child in a flowing light, which serves to emphasize the miraculous birth and the wonder of the beholders who are standing in crepuscular gloom.

At the same time, humanistic interest in Virgil's Georgics prompted a revival of the calendar cycles of the seasons and months north of the Alps and around Venice, Italy. Bassano's Sleeping Shepherd (circa 1568) in the Szepmuveszeti Muzeum in Budapest, Hungary, may represent the month of August. Shepherds' chores, if not those of shepherdesses, had always been featured in such scenes, which depicted seasonal tasks with varying degrees of verisimilitude.

Secular Pastoral

Although often present in biblical scenes of the Annunciation and Nativity, shepherds and shepherdesses of a more secular nature rarely appeared in the art of the Middle Ages. Major exceptions are those found in calendar scenes or cycles of the months or seasons presented in manuscript illuminations and tapestries. In no way were these works intended for the people who actually performed the tasks depicted, so they helped perpetuate the notion of an idyllic, bucolic life, similar to that described by the classical poets. A prime example is the calendar scene Shearing Sheep found in the Hours of Jean de Mauléon (1524), now in the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore, Maryland. A young woman in rather fanciful attire is shearing a lamb held lightly on her lap as if it were a small dog; two similarly garbed young men look on, holding shepherd's houlettes (staves with shovel-shaped terminals). One leans in a classically inspired contraposto pose. Clearly, their chore is not onerous and is quite removed from reality. Their pictorial descendants will be pairs of aristocratic young lovers frolicking in well-manicured pastoral landscapes. The courtly society of Europe embraced the shepherd and shepherdess as exemplifying the vita contemplativa (life of tranquillity and ease), as personifying freedom from hardship and worry.

The craze for pastoral literature swept sixteenth-century European princely courts and lasted well into the seventeenth century. Giorgione's Fête Champêtre (also known as the Concert Champêtre) (circa 1505–1510) in the Louvre in Paris is one of the earliest pastoral paintings. Although its meaning remains enigmatic despite numerous attempts at explication, the shepherds appearing in the right middle ground remind the viewer of a lost world of natural innocence as related by the poets. In its wake followed a stream of pastoral pictures: classical myths or legends set in remote, idealized landscapes; actual illustrations of contemporary plays, poems, and romances; portraits of individuals in shepherd's attire; and, especially in The Netherlands, music-making shepherds and wanton shepherdesses.

These highly secularized Dutch shepherds and their consorts appear first in the seventeenth century in Utrecht. Ultimately, they took many guises. Art historian Alison M. Kettering has divided them into several useful categories: the single half-length, nonnarrative multfigured scenes, narrative subjects drawn from poems or dramatic literature, and portraits (Kettering, passim). Paulus Moreelse specialized in half-length compositions in which the shepherd is presented as a smiling and gracious lover; Abraham Bloemaert portrays a contemplative, withdrawn youth. Dirck van Baburen and Gerrit van Honthorst's shepherds are linked to the merry company or tavern scene derived from Caravaggio.

In addition, there were numerous narrative representations of scenes from the pastoral literature, such as Pieter Cornelisz. Hooft's Granida (1615) and Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido (1590). Certain attributes identify the shepherds and shepherdesses, as often they are not accompanied by their sheep or goats. They may carry a simple musical instrument, such as a bagpipe or a recorder, or the tools of their trade: crooks or houlettes. They may wear a mantle of fur draped over a bare shoulder or a straw hat decorated with flowers.

Narrative paintings of scenes from contemporary dramas or poems were as popular in other countries as in The Netherlands. A typical example is Claude Lorrain's Herminia and the Shepherds (circa 1666) in the Holkham Hall Collection of the duke of Leicester in England. Taken from Tasso's La Gerusalemme Liberata (1581), the scene depicts a peaceful interlude in the tale of adventure when Herminia (or Erminia), a pagan princess, having retired from the stress of court life, has gone to live with the shepherds. Whereas a pictorial tradition existed for shepherds, there seems to have been little precedent for the type of wanton shepherdess that gained such popularity in The Netherlands in the seventeenth century (Kettering, p. 48). The attributes of these shepherdesses include straw hats, laced girdles, crooks, houlettes, and flowers. On occasion they offer apples, plums, or pomegranates, all fruits with erotic connotations. Grapes, a fruit with bacchic associations, occasionally are proffered. Their flowers can evoke the sense of smell or suggest a personification of Spring or of the goddess Flora. The linking of sexuality with flowers might suggest a courtesan. All in all, these figures were capable of suggesting multiple meanings to their viewers. Their decorative aspects as well as their relation to literary tradition apparently appealed to a wide audience of aristocrats and urban patricians.

In contrast, Rembrandt's etchings Flute Player (1642) and Sleeping Herdsman (1644) are decidedly earthy. Presenting what appears to be a more realistic view of country life, they are a deliberate departure from the conventions of Dutch pastoral painting. Although the scenes are probably still imaginary, a note of crudeness helps create the illusion that real human relationships are being portrayed.

The pastoral portrait in which the sitters are depicted as idealized shepherds and shepherdesses, or as characters from contemporary literature, achieved widespread popularity throughout Europe. The vogue was especially strong in England, where Gerrit van Honthorst is recorded as having painted King Charles I and Queen Henrietta Maria in shepherds' costumes in 1628. The paintings are now lost. Quick to imitate the sovereign, Philip, Lord Wharton, and Lord George Stuart commissioned portraits from Anthony Van Dyck in 1632 and 1638, respectively, now in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., the Andrew W. Mellon Collection, and the National Portrait Gallery in London. Arrayed in silk and velvet garments, they are set against an idyllic landscape; only the relative simplicity of the garments and the houlettes they hold identify them as kin to more rustic types.

There are a number of charming portraits of children from the same period, such as Dirck Santvoort's Portrait of Clara Alewijn as a Shepherdess and Portrait of Martinus Alewijn in Pastoral Dress (both 1644) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands. Each child is richly attired, holds an houlette, and is accompanied by lambs.

Those commissioning these portraits, when not of the aristocracy or royalty, were certainly of the upper classes; only the wealthy could afford rural retirement and the luxury of leisurely simplicity. By assimilating the pictorial attributes of their social superiors, the rising middle class associated themselves with a mode of life expressing status and rank.

Crispijn van de Passe's book of engraved portraits titled Les Vrais portraits de quelques unes des plus grandes dames de la Chrestienté, déguisées en bergères (1640, The True Portraits of Some of the Greatest Ladies of Christendom Dressed up as Shepherdesses) is perhaps revelatory of the patronage for the "bergerie" type of portrait. It portrays queens, princesses, and other members of the nobility (as well as women from the merchant or professional milieu) all dressed in the costumes and with the attributes of shepherdesses. In contemplating these images, middle-class ladies were thus able to associate themselves vicariously with their social superiors.

In contrast, the perfection of Arcadia came to have a poignant aspect in which its basic unreality is recognized. This attitude is exemplified by the phrase "Et in Arcadia ego" (Even in Arcadia I [Death] am there), which forms the subject of Nicolas Poussin's painting of the same name. Painted around 1655, it is now in the Louvre. This picture has nothing in common with the love scenes and frivolities of the courtly, patrician pastoral tradition. The shepherds focus on the grave, and the mood is tranquil but serious. It expresses an elegiac mood, carrying with it the notion of a lost Arcadia and the inevitable end of life.

The courtly and patrician fascination with the pastoral was to last until the end of the eighteenth century. Dutch shepherds and shepherdesses anticipate the erotic hedonism of François Boucher. The scent of the barnyard comes nowhere near a painting such as Le Bonheur au Village (1735–1737) in the Bayerisches Landesbank, on loan to the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany. In like manner, Boucher's many "bergerie" paintings, such as those in the Wallace Collection in London (e.g., Summer Pastoral and Autumn Pastoral), come from a dream world or from a stage scene. However, they may illustrate the statement by the French statesman Talleyrand that no one knew the sweetness of life (douceur de vie) who had not lived under the ancien régime.

Before the debacle of the French Revolution, Marie Antoinette and her ladies-in-waiting seemed to take the shepherdess role to the ultimate as they played at being milkmaids in the Petit Hameau at Versailles, France. In her search for the simple life, Marie Antoinette had her portrait painted "in rustic costume" by Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun in 1783. She sports a straw hat with plumes and a gossamer dress adorned with flowers and ribbons in what seems a definite throwback to the ladies at play in medieval tapestries. The tradition of the "bergerie" was continued in innumerable porcelain figurines, such as one derived from Boucher's Autumn Pastoral in Vincennes porcelain (circa 1752) in the Musée National de la Céramique in Sèvres, France. Perhaps the ultimate debasement of the genre is the Hummel figure.

The revolutions of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, combined with industrialization and agrarian change, radically altered visual interpretations of shepherds and shepherdesses. The romantic movement endowed the humblest lives with nobility; the result is often the appearance of rustic reality, but a reality that is nonetheless idealized. The eroticized frivolity or artificial simplicity of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries seemed to belong increasingly to an irrelevant past. In spite of its anthropomorphism and sentimentality, a picture such as Edwin Landseer's The Old Shepherd's Chief Mourner (1837) in the Victoria and Albert Museum in London serves to bring the Arcadian shepherd down to Earth. Any notion that Scottish shepherders are like characters from pastoral poetry is negated by the barrenness of the cottage and the paucity of the belongings. Although it was probably not Landseer's primary intention, the picture has affinities with other Victorian depictions of rural poverty.

Jean-François Millet's The Shepherdess: Plains of Barbizon (circa 1862) in the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Massachusetts, strikes a different note. It is typical of many images that underline the dignity of humble labor but do not place undue stress on any of its unpleasant aspects. In this it remains a rural fiction, but the subject of Millet's work is a monumental, if humble, figure. Painted with careful attention to detail, she is light-years away from Honthorst and Boucher's carefree protagonists. Other nineteenth-century painters opted for descriptive scenes in which the shepherd, shepherdess, and their flocks seem to be appurtenances to the landscape, as in Alexandre-Gabriel Decamps's A Shepherd with His Flock on Barren Heath in a Storm (1843) in the Amsterdam Historische Museum or Jozef Israëls's The Shepherd (Their Daily Bread) (1864) in the Toledo Museum of Art in Ohio.

The shepherd is used to convey a rather different message in William Holman Hunt's The Hiring Shepherd (1852) in the Tate Gallery in London. Hunt wanted his painting to serve as a moral critique, with the shepherd seen as a faithless priest and his flock as the laity. He was attacking the English clergy for not providing spiritual guidance to their congregations. Not all contemporary viewers understood this somewhat arcane reading; they criticized the figures as being too rustic and objected to their idleness. Hunt seemed to be deliberately ignoring the conventions of the rustic genre. The idleness of the shepherd conflicted with the contemporary preference for landscape genre scenes in which laborers industriously tilled the land and cared for the animals. This popular mode had roots in the eighteenth-century revival of interest in Virgil's Georgics (the model for rural industry) rather than his Eclogues. Rural poverty and social conflict formed no part of this vision.

For the English urban classes, rural England served as an ideal of retreat from the stresses of city life. Furthermore, images of the countryside were now accessible to all classes of the urban public, not just the rich. Viewers were thus reassured that all was well in spite of agrarian unrest, in a way very reminiscent of the Roman audience for depictions of the locus amoenus almost two millennia before.

In the Americanized Arcadia, similar themes were represented. In synthetic but believable landscapes, innumerable mid-nineteenth-century painters suggest that the pastoral state (with or without sheep) is the happiest one. For example, Thomas Cole makes this explicit in his painting The Pastoral State from his series The Course of Empire (1833–1836) in the Munson-Williams Proctor Institute in Utica, New York. Eventually, American pictures, while retaining the idyllic mood, tended to have more cows than sheep. Perhaps this, too, was a rejection of the notion of idleness, in that the sheep or goat herdsman seems to have less pressing business than the cattleman does.

In spite of the decline in popularity of images of shepherds and shepherdesses except as minor figures for landscapes, they were not altogether abandoned. Paul Gauguin's Breton

Shepherdess with Flock (1886) in the Laing Art Gallery in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, seems to hark back once more to the yearning for bucolic simplicity.

A testimony to the persistence of the shepherd as a theme is the set of woodcuts Aristide Maillol used to illustrate the old story of Daphnis and Chloe. In the illustration of Daphnis and Chloe (as goatherds—the equation of goats and sheep is a venerable tradition in the pastoral), we are once again in the Arcadia of docile animals and innocent men and women. The charm of the pastoral with its nostalgia for the golden age is projected once again by means of the shepherd and shepherdess.

See also Harvesting; Hunting/Hunter/Huntress; Peasantry

Selected Works of Art

Classical Pastoral

- The Calf-Bearer*, marble sculpture, Attic, circa 570 B.C., Athens, Greece, Acropolis Museum
Old Man Carrying a Lamb, marble sculpture, Hellenistic, Rome, Palazzo di Conservatori Sacred Grove, wall painting, originally from Villa of Agrippa Postumus, Boscorecase, Italy, Cubiculum 16, circa 90 B.C.–A.D. 1, now in Naples, Italy, Museo Archeologico Nazionale

Religious Pastoral

- Christ as the Good Shepherd*, wall painting, mid-third century, Rome, Catacomb of Domitilla
Christ as the Good Shepherd, mosaic, 425–450, Ravenna, Italy, Mausoleum of Galla Placidia
Apse Mosaics, 549, Ravenna, Italy, San Apollinare in Classe
David Composing the Psalms, manuscript illumination, Paris Psalter, circa 960, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale
Annunciation to the Shepherds, manuscript illumination, Ottoman Gospel Lectionary of Henry II, 1002–1014, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek
Lochner, Stefan, Nativity, painting, circa 1440–1445, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
Goes, Hugo van der, Nativity, central panel, Portinari Altarpiece, painting, circa 1476–1478, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
Ghirlandaio, Domenico, Adoration of the Shepherds, painting, 1485, Florence, Italy, Santa Trinità
Dürer, Albrecht, Nativity, Paumgartner Altarpiece, painting, 1503, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
Giorgione, The Adoration of the Shepherds, painting, circa 1505–1510, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Samuel H. Kress Collection
Dürer, Albrecht, Adoration of the Shepherds, woodcut, from the Small Passion, 1509
Titian, The Holy Family and a Shepherd, painting, circa 1510, London, National Gallery
Baldung Grien, Hans, Nativity, painting, circa 1520, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

- Bassano, Jacopo, Annunciation to the Shepherds, painting, circa 1555–1560, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Samuel H. Kress Collection
Wtewael, Joachim Anthonisz., Visit and Adoration of the Shepherds, painting, 1598, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum
Rembrandt van Rijn, Adoration of the Shepherds, painting, 1646, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Secular Pastoral

- Giorgione, Fête Champêtre (Concert Champêtre), painting, circa 1505–1510, Paris, Louvre
Shearing Sheep, manuscript illumination, Hours of Jean de Mauléon, 1524, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
Bordone, Paris, Daphnis and Chloe, painting, 1545–1550, London, National Gallery
Titian, Nymph and Shepherd, painting, circa 1570–1575, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
Veronese, Paolo, Shepherd and Sleeping Nymph, painting, 1588, Baron von Hirsch Collection
Guercino, cycle of 12 paintings illustrating Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido, circa 1615–1620, Cento, Italy, Villa Giovannina
Rubens, Peter Paul, A Shepherd and His Flock in a Woody Landscape, painting, circa 1615–1622, London, National Gallery
Boece a Belswert (after Abraham Bloemaert), The Adoration of the Shepherds, engraving, 1618
Honthorst, Gerrit van, Shepherdess, painting, 1622, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum
Baburen, Dirck van, Granida and Dafilo, painting, circa 1623, Brussels, Belgium, Koninklijke Musea voor Schone Kunsten
Domenichino, Landscape with Erminia and the Shepherds, painting, circa 1623–1625, Paris, Louvre
Bloemaert, Abraham, Shepherdess Reading a Poem, painting, circa 1628, Toledo, Ohio, Toledo Museum of Art
Van Dyck, Anthony, Amarillis Crowning Mirtillo, painting, circa 1628–1629, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schonborn Collection
Van Dyck, Anthony, Philip, Lord Wharton, 1632, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Andrew W. Mellon Collection
Rubens, Peter Paul, Shepherds and Shepherdesses in a Rainbow Landscape, painting, circa 1635, Paris, Louvre
Lorrain, Claude, Landscape with a Goatherd and Goats, painting, circa 1636, London, National Gallery, Sir George Blumenthal Gift
Van Dyck, Anthony, Lord George Stuart, painting, circa 1638, London, National Portrait Gallery
Rembrandt van Rijn, Flute Player, etching, 1642
Rembrandt van Rijn, Sleeping Herdsman, etching, 1644
Santvoort, Dirck, Portrait of Clara Alewijn as a Shepherdess, painting, 1644, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Santvoort, Dirck, Portrait of Martinus Alewijn in Pastoral Dress, painting, 1644, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Poussin, Nicolas, Et in Arcadia Ego, painting, circa 1655, Paris, Louvre

Albani, Francesco, Apollo Guarding the Herds of Admetus, painting, 1660, Fontainebleau, France, Château de Fontainebleau

Claude Lorrain, Heminia and the Shepherds, painting, 1666, Holkham Hall, England, Collection of the Duke of Leicester

Boucher, François, Le Bonheur au Village, painting, 1735–1737, Munich, Germany, Bayerisches Landesbank, on loan to the Alte Pinakothek

Boucher, François, Summer Pastoral, painting, 1749, London, Wallace Collection

Boucher, François, Autumn Pastoral, painting, 1749, London, Wallace Collection

Autumn Pastoral, Vincennes porcelain after François Boucher, 1752, Sèvres, France, Musée National de la Céramique

Lute Player, porcelain statuette, circa 1765, Chelsea Porcelain Manufactory, Derby Porcelain Works, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Bagpiper, porcelain statuette, circa 1765, Chelsea Porcelain Manufactory, Derby Porcelain Works, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Boucher, François, The Shepherd's Idyll, painting, 1768, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Gainsborough, Thomas, A Pastoral Landscape: Rocky Mountain Valley with Shepherd, Sheep and Goats, painting, circa 1783, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art, John H. McFadden Collection

Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Queen Marie Antoinette 'en Gaulle', painting, 1783, Wolfsgarten, collection of S. R. H. Ludwig Prinz van Hessen und bei Rhein

Constable, John, The Cornfield, painting, 1826, London, National Gallery

Richmond, George, The Shepherd, engraving, 1828, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale Center for British Art, Paul Mellon Collection

Palmer, Samuel, Riverside Moonlight: A Landscape with Sheep, drawing, circa 1831–1833, London, Tate Gallery

Cole, Thomas, The Pastoral State, painting, from The Course of Empire, 1833–1836, Utica, New York, Munson-Williams Proctor Institute

Landseer, Edwin, The Old Shepherd's Chief Mourner, painting, 1837, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Decamps, Alexandre-Gabriel, A Shepherd with His Flock on a Barren Heath in a Storm, painting, 1843, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Historische Museum

Jacque, Charles, Sheep at a Watering Place, painting, after 1846, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Hunt, William Holman, The Hiring Shepherd, painting, 1852, London, Tate Gallery

Millet, Jean-François, The Shepherdess: Plains of Barbizon, painting, circa 1862, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Millet, Jean-François, Shepherdess, painting, 1862–1864, Paris, Louvre

Corot, Jean-Baptiste-Camille, The Shepherds of Arcadia, painting, circa 1872, Baltimore, Maryland, Baltimore Museum of Art

Homer, Winslow, Shepherdesses of Houghton Farm, watercolor, 1878, Williamstown, Massachusetts, Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute

Israëls, Jozef, The Shepherds (Their Daily Bread), painting, 1864, Toledo, Ohio, Toledo Museum of Art

Gauguin, Paul, Breton Shepherdess with Flock, painting, 1886, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, Laing Art Gallery

Rodin, Auguste, Daphnis and Chloe, plaster sculpture, 1886, Paris, Musée Rodin

Bonnard, Pierre, series of lithographs illustrating Les Pastorales de Longus, ou Daphnis et Chloé, 1902, Paris

Maillol, Aristide, series of woodcuts illustrating Les Pastorales de Longus, ou Daphnis et Chloé, 1938, Paris

Selected Texts

Homeric Hymns, seventh century B.C.

Theocritus, Idylls, third century B.C.

Virgil, Eclogues, circa 42–37 B.C.

Ovid, Metamorphoses, A.D. 7

Longus, Daphnis and Chloe, second or third century A.D.

Sannazaro, Jacopo, Arcadia, 1502

Tasso, Torquato, L'Aminta, 1573

Spenser, Edmund, Shepherd's Calendar, 1579

Tasso, Torquato, La Gerusalemme Liberata, 1581

Guarini, Giovanni Battista, Il pastor fido, 1590

Sidney, Philip, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, 1590

Daniel, Samuel, Queene's Arcadia, 1606

Urfé, Honoré d', L'Astrée, 1607–1619

Hooft, Pieter Cornelisz., Granida, 1615

Further Reading

Alpers, P., "What Is Pastoral?" Critical Inquiry 8 (Spring 1982)

Andrews, Malcolm, The Search for the Picturesque: Landscape Aesthetics and Tourism in Britain, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1989

Banks, Oliver T., Watteau and the North: Studies in the Dutch and Flemish Baroque Influences on French Rococo Painting, New York: Garland, 1977

Barrell, John, The Dark Side of Landscape: The Rural Poor in English Painting, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980

Blankert, Albert, Nederlandse 17e eeuwse Italianiserende Landschapschilders: Dutch Seventeenth Century Italianate Landscape Painters, Soest, The Netherlands: Davaco, 1987

Brink, Peter van den, and Jos de Meyere, editors, Het Gedroomde Land: Pastorale Schilderkunst in de Gouden Eeuw, exhibition catalog, Utrecht, The Netherlands, Centraal Museum, Zwolle, The Netherlands: Waanders Uitgevers, 1993

- Cafritz, Robert, Laurence Gowing, and David Rosand, editors, Places of Delight: The Pastoral Landscape, exhibition catalog, Phillips Collection and National Gallery of Art, New York: Foster, 1988
- Egan, Patricia, "Poesia and the Fête Champêtre," The Art Bulletin 41 (1959)
- Emission, Patricia, "The Concert Champêtre and Gilding the Lily," The Burlington Magazine 133 (March 1991)
- François Boucher, 1703–1770, exhibition catalog, New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1986
- Freedberg, David, Dutch Landscape Prints of the Seventeenth Century, London: British Museum, 1980
- Gudlaugsson, Stúria Jonasson, "Representations of Granida in Dutch Seventeenth Century Painting," The Burlington Magazine 90–91 (1948–1949)
- Held, Julius, "Flora, Goddess and Courtesan," in De Artius Opuscula XL: Essays in Honor of Erwin Panofsky, edited by Millard Meiss, New York: New York University Press, 1960
- Hunt, John Dixon, editor, The Pastoral Landscape, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1992
- Ingamells, John, and Keith Laing, "A Hireling Shepherd in a Painting by Claude," The Burlington Magazine 126 (December 1984)
- Janssen, Paul Huys, Schilders in Utrecht, Utrecht, The Netherlands: Uitgeverij Matrijs, 1990
- Joannides, Paul, "Titian's Daphnis and Chloe: A Search for the Subject of a Familiar Masterpiece," Apollo 133 (June 1991)
- Judson, Jay Richard, Gerrit van Honthorst: A Discussion of His Position in Dutch Art, The Hague, The Netherlands: Nijhoff, 1959
- Kettering, Alison McNeil, The Dutch Arcadia, Totowa, New Jersey: Allanheld and Schram, 1983
- Kriz, Kay Dian, "An English Arcadia Revisited and Reassessed: Holman Hunt's The Hireling Shepherd and the Rural Tradition," Art History 10 (December 1987)
- Laing, Alastair, "Boucher et le Pastorale Peinte," Revue de L'Art 73 (1986)
- Panofsky, Erwin, "Et in Arcadia Ego," in Meaning in the Visual Arts, New York: Doubleday, 1955; Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1970
- Passe, Crispijn van de, Les Vrais portraits de quelques unes des plus grandes dames de la Chrestienté, déguisées en bergères, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: J. Broersz, 1640
- Rodee, Howard David, Scenes of Rural and Urban Poverty in Victorian Painting and Their Development, 1850–1890 (Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1975)
- Rosenthal, Michael, British Landscape Painting, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1982
- , Constable, the Painter and His Landscape, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1983
- Solkin, David, Richard Wilson: The Landscape of Reaction, exhibition catalog, London: The Tate Gallery, 1982
- Troyen, Carol, "Retreat to Arcadia: American Landscape and the American Art-Union," The American Art Journal 23 (1991)
- Van Gelder, J. G., "Pastor fido-voorstellingen in de Nederlandse kunst van de zeventiende eeuw," Our Holland 92 (1978)

SHIPWRECK

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following are covered in the discussion of the theme Shipwreck:

ALLEGORY

CLASSICAL THEMES

CHRISTIAN THEMES

LITERARY THEMES

MODERN SECULAR THEMES

Joseph Mallord William Turner, Slave Ship (Slavers Throwing Overboard the Dead and Dying—Typhoon Coming on), circa 1840, oil on canvas, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Henry Lillie Pierce Fund. (Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

The term shipwreck alludes to a number of different disastrous events other than the actual sinking of a boat at sea. It has, at times, been used to connote a termination or loss, as in “the shipwreck of my hopes” or “the shipwreck of a fortune.” A shipwreck also stands for the triumph of nature over human beings, their plans, their skills, and their illusions of control. The actual wrecking of a ship, usually in a stormy sea, is described in terrifying detail in such early sources as the Old Testament and Homer’s Odyssey (circa 720 B.C.). The height of the waves, the smallness of the ship and its passengers, and the vastness of the sea are vividly evoked in such narratives.

Emblem books, especially Dutch seventeenth-century examples such as those of Jacob Cats, used the symbol of the shipwreck to signify inconstancy, the wreck of hope, or even the frailty of worldly things. As a nation of marine venturers and colonizers, the Dutch were especially aware of the loss of fortune and worldly gain that a shipwreck entailed, as a large part of the capital of the Netherlands was involved in shipping and overseas investments.

In classical mythology, shipwreck was a prime element in tales such as the Odyssey, which tells of Odysseus’s struggle to return over the seas from Troy to his native kingdom on the Greek island of Ithaca. Unfortunately, he had aroused the wrath of Poseidon, the sea god, and was in constant danger of shipwreck. In Book V in the story of Calypso, Odysseus experiences a terrifying shipwreck and is in the sea for several days before he reaches shore. He also experiences a near wreck in a close call between Scylla and Charybdis in Book XII, giving rise to the expression “between Scylla and Charybdis” to describe being between two difficult choices or menaces.

Shipwreck is used allegorically in the poem Das Narrenschiff (1494, The Ship of Fools) by Sebastian Brant. Here the ship is full of life’s fools, with every contemporary type included: drunks, quack doctors, corrupt lawyers, cuckolded husbands, and so on. The original book was illustrated by a series of woodcuts, some of which may have been done by Albrecht Dürer. Ship of Fools (circa 1500), now located in the Louvre in Paris, was painted by Hieronymus Bosch, a specialist on the folly and vice of his time. A twentieth-century rendering of the theme is found in the novel Ship of Fools (1962) by Katherine Anne Porter, which showed the lack of awareness of many Germans on the eve of World War I.

In Christian literature, the Book of Jonah in the Old Testament tells of an averted shipwreck in chapter 1, when Jonah is thrown overboard to keep the ship from sinking and is swallowed by a great fish. Jonah’s three days in the belly of the whale and his escape served as a symbolic statement of Christ’s release from the grave after three days and his Resurrection. Early Christians expressed this symbolism in frescoes in Rome in the Catacomb of St. Callixtus and the Catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter.

In the New Testament, Paul was shipwrecked on several of his journeys in his mission to the Gentiles (or non-Jews of the world). Acts 27 tells of the shipwreck Paul endured when he was taken as a prisoner to Rome. Although the ship foundered off the island of Melita (possibly present day Malta), the crew and prisoners were saved. Paul himself alluded to three shipwrecks he had survived (II Corinthians 11:25), a testimony to the uncertainty of travel in biblical times.

The ship became an important symbol in the early Christian church: the ark of Noah became a vessel on which the faithful found safety and salvation. The first representations of the ship as a Christian symbol appeared in wall paintings in the catacombs in Rome where the outlawed sect met, and on the seals and lamps of early Christians.

Shipwreck was said to be imminent when Jesus Christ awakened in a storm-tossed boat on the Sea of Galilee. The wind, the waves, and the disciples’ fears were finally stilled with Christ’s command, “Peace, be still” (Mark 4:36–41). This scene is rendered in Rembrandt van Rijn’s Christ in the Storm of the Sea of Galilee (1633), in which disciples frantically try to haul down the sails on a foundering ship awash with water. The haloed figure of Christ on the right is being awakened by his terrified followers. The subject of shipwreck was also addressed by Eugène Delacroix in several oil paintings titled Christ on the Lake of Genesareth (1854). The Baltimore, Maryland, version shows disciples hauling in the billowing sails, surrounded by a menacing sky and rough seas, as Christ sleeps on the pitching ship.

Shipwrecks also appear in works based on the lives of the saints, although these are comparatively rare. One example is a Dalmatian School painting, Helsinus Saved from Shipwreck, on a predella panel of the Altarpiece of the Virgin Mary. In the panel, the saint appears in front of a storm-tossed ship while black demons flit around in the sky. Waves in the foreground are represented by a series of abstract circles. The story is taken from Jacobus de Voragine’s Golden Legend, a treasure trove of the miraculous adventures of saints and sinners.

A shipwreck is usually an important element of the plot when it occurs in literature. In William Shakespeare’s The Tempest (1611), for example, the plot hinges on a shipwreck involving Prospero’s brother, who has usurped Prospero’s kingdom. The Merchant of Venice (circa 1596) uses the loss of Antonio’s fortune in a shipwreck as the motivating element of the plot. Because of the shipwreck, Antonio cannot repay his loan on time to the usurer Shylock, and Shylock demands the pound of Antonio’s flesh due him in default. Portia, the wife of Antonio's friend Bassanio, acting as judge, agrees that there is no fault with the contract and that Shylock is entitled to a pound of Antonio's flesh, but he cannot shed one drop of blood in getting the pound of flesh, an obvious impossibility ("A Daniel come to judgement"). Shakespeare's Twelfth Night (circa 1601–1602) begins with a shipwreck that involves Viola and her twin brother Sebastian, which results in a subsequent sorting out of identities and sentiments.

Daniel Defoe's novel Robinson Crusoe is the story of a shipwrecked man on a desert island, and Johan David Wyss's The Swiss Family Robinson uses the same device to strand a whole family on an island. In a similar manner, the plot of Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Enoch Arden depends on the shipwreck of the main character, his subsequent long exile on a desert island, and his eventual rescue. A shipwreck is the subject of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's poem "The Wreck of the Hesperus" and Gerard Manly Hopkins's epic "The Wreck of the Deutschland"

The shipwreck became an extremely popular subject with painters, both for the opportunities it provided to realistically portray dramatic emotions and elements and for its symbolic overtones. Many representations of shipwrecks came from descriptions of contemporary disasters, such as Théodore Géricault's Raft of the Medusa (1819) in the Louvre, which was based on newspaper accounts and court testimony of survivors of the French frigate Medusa, which was bound for Senegal, French West Africa, when she ran into a reef. Because many of the lifeboats were rotten, a makeshift raft was built to be towed by the crew, but the rope to it was cut, and 150 people on it were set adrift with no water or food. When they were finally rescued 10 days later, there were only 15 survivors.

Géricault dramatically portrays the raft angled to the right, the lower left cropped to include the viewers of the painting in the drama, as if they, too, are on the raft. In the left and right foreground, the dead bodies of two naked male figures protrude over the raft, while at the apex of the composition, on the right, a black man dramatically signals a tiny passing ship in the distance. The progression from death to life follows a diagonal line from lower left to upper right, following the thrust of arms and bodies on an upward projectory. Many contemporary viewers identified with the shipwreck victims, and even saw the painting as an allegory of the foundering French state.

Inhumanity is also the subject of Joseph Mallord William Turner's Slave Ship (circa 1840) in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. The full title of the painting was Slavers Throwing Overboard the Dead and Dying—Typhoon Coming on, and as it suggests, the painting dramatizes the account of a ship carrying slaves. The crew is portrayed throwing slaves overboard in the face of an oncoming storm, because insurance would be paid for any cargo jettisoned in order to save the ship. The "cargo" is, of course, human beings, as the foreground of the painting, with manacled arms and legs rising from the waves, makes quite clear. The coloring of the ocean and sky reflect a sunset—on a metaphysical level, the blood of lives lost. As John Ruskin, who once owned the painting, put it,

Between these two ridges [of the sea] the fire of the sunset falls along the trough of the sea, dyeing it with an awful but glorious light, the intense and lurid splendor which burns like gold and bathes it with blood. . . . Purple and blue, the lurid shadows of the hollow breakers are cast upon the midst of night, which gathers cold and low, advancing like the shadow of death upon the guilty ship as it labors amid the lightnings of the sea, its thin masts written upon the sky, in lines of blood, girded with condemnation in the fearful hue which signs the sky with horror, and mixes its flaming flood with the sunlight, and cast far along the desolate heave of the sepulchral waves, incarnadines the multitudinous sea. (Modern Painters, vol. I, part I, sect. V, ch. III)

Here both artist and critic combine the natural setting of the event with its moral dimensions in an unforgettable way.

Turner, a great lover of the sea, painted a number of other shipwrecks: Fire at Sea in the Tate Gallery in London; A Shipwreck, a mezzotint; and The Wreck of the Minotaur in the Tate Gallery, among others. Caspar David Friedrich's The Polar Sea (Wreck of the "Hope") (1824) in the Kunsthalle in Hamburg, Germany, shows a wrecked ship in the Arctic, humankind again defeated by the elements. The eerie calm of the icebound wreck, realistically done in meticulous, cool blues and grays, contrasts greatly with the more lurid reds, oranges, and yellows of Turner's shipwrecks. The shattered wood of Friedrich's ship is painted in distinctly warmer brown, possibly the evidence of humankind's conflict with the inhuman, icy sea. Other paintings of polar shipwrecks can be found in the work of American artist Frederic Edwin Church, such as The Icebergs (before 1915), and of British painter Edwin Landseer. Landseer's Man Proposes, God Disposes (1863–1864) is particularly gruesome, as it shows two huge polar bears munching on the remains of the wreckage.

Several nineteenth-century shipwreck paintings have their origin in literature. Eugène Delacroix's The Shipwreck of Don Juan (1841) in the Louvre, is taken from canto II, stanzas 74 and 75, of Lord Byron's epic poem Don Juan (1819), which vividly describes the shipwreck itself in stanzas 40–51. Ford Madox Brown's painting Haidée Finding Don Juan After the Shipwreck (1873) portrays the aftermath of the shipwreck (canto II, stanzas 110–112), with Don Juan washed up on the beach.

George Morland's painting The Wreckers in the William Coolidge Collection presents a more sinister type of shipwreck: those involving cargo vessels that have been deliberately lured onto the rocks by lanterns so that their cargoes might be pilaged. Winslow Homer's The Gulf Stream (1899), in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, and After the Tornado in the Worcester Art Museum, show a wreckage of boats and humans after the devastation of a storm. In The Gulf Stream, the figure of a black man appears alone on a mastless ship, while sharks circle the crippled boat. After the Tornado, a watercolor set near Homer's residence in the Bahamas, shows a man face down, washed up on the beach, beside a wrecked sailboat. Here, as in earlier paintings, the artist dramatizes the lonely struggle of humans against the dangerous vicissitudes of the sea. The symbol of the shipwreck finally stands as a warning of human limitations and frailty, and as a sign of the mutability of human life and fortunes.

See also Destruction of City; Misfortune

Selected Works of Art

Allegory

Brant, Sebastian, The Ship of Fools, woodcuts, 1494

Bosch, Hieronymus, The Ship of Fools, oil, circa 1500, Paris, Louvre

Classical Themes

A Shipwreck, Geometric vase, eighth century B.C., Ischia, Italy, Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Shipwreck of Aeneas, oil, 1604–1605, Berlin, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Allori, Alessandro, The History of Odysseus, frescoes, circa 1607, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Salviati

Fuseli, Henry, Odysseus Shipwrecked on a Raft, oil, circa 1805, Basel, Switzerland, Richard Dreyfuss Collection

Christian Themes

Jonah and the Whale, wall fresco, third century, Rome, Catacomb of St. Callixtus

Story of Jonah, marble (three pieces), third century, Cleveland, Ohio, Museum of Art

Jonah Sarcophagus, marble relief sculpture, late third century, Vatican, Museo Pio Cristiano

Jonah Thrown to the Whale, fresco, fourth century, Rome, Catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter

Nicholas of Verdun, Jonah and the Whale, from Klosterneuberg Altarpiece, gilt bronze and niello relief, 1181, Klosterneuberg, Austria, Stiftsmuseum

Dalmatian School, Helsinus Saved from Shipwreck, oil on panel, London, National Gallery

Giovanni di Paolo, Shipwreck—Miracle of St. Nicholas of Bari, tempera on panel, circa 1450, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art

Bril, Paul, Jonah and the Whale, oil, before 1626, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux des Beaux-Arts

Ryder, Albert Pinkham, Jonah, oil, before 1917, Washington, D.C., National Collection of Fine Arts

Literary Themes

Delacroix, Eugène, The Shipwreck of Don Juan, oil, 1841, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Brown, Ford Madox, Haidée Finding Don Juan After the Shipwreck, oil, 1873, Paris, Musée d'Orsay

Modern Secular Themes

Vernet, Claude-Joseph, A Storm with a Shipwreck, 1754, London, Wallace Collection

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Shipwreck, oil on canvas, 1805, London, Tate Gallery

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Wreck of a Transport Ship, oil on canvas, circa 1810, Lisbon, Portugal, Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian

Géricault, Théodore, The Raft of the Medusa, oil, 1819, Paris, Louvre

Friedrich, Caspar David, The Polar Sea (Wreck of the "Hope"), oil, 1824, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Slave Ship (Slavers Throwing Overboard the Dead and Dying—Typhoon Coming on), oil, circa 1840, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Landseer, Edwin, Man Proposes, God Disposes, 1863–1864, Egham, Surrey, University of London, Royal Holloway College

Homer, Winslow, The Gulf Stream, oil, 1899, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Church, Frederic Edwin, The Icebergs, oil, before 1915, Dallas, Texas, Dallas Museum of Fine Arts

Ernst, Max, The Sinking of the Titanic, oil, 1912, St. Louis, private collection

Further Reading

Berger, Klaus, and Diane Chalmers Johnson, "Art as Confrontation: The Black Man in the Work of Géricault," The Massachusetts Review 10:2 (Spring 1969)

Boase, Thomas Sherrer Ross, "Shipwrecks in English Romantic Painting," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 22 (1959)

Byron, Lord, Poetical Works, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1946

Carr, Gerald, Frederic Edwin Church: The Icebergs, Dallas, Texas: Dallas Museum of Fine Arts, 1980

Corbin, Alain, The Lure of the Sea: The Discovery of the Seaside in the Western World, translated by Jocelyn Phelps, Oxford: Polity, 1994

Cox, E. G., A Reference Guide to the Literature of Travel, Including Voyages, Geographical Descriptions of Adventures, Shipwrecks and Expeditions, 3 volumes, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1935–1949

Eitner, Lorenz, "The Open Window and the Storm Tossed Boat," Art Bulletin XXXVII (1955)

Goedde, Lawrence Otto, Tempest and Shipwreck in Dutch and Flemish Art, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1989

Gowing, Lawrence, Turner: Imagination and Reality, exhibition catalog, New York, Museum of Modern Art, New York: Doubleday, 1996

Grunfeld, Fredrick, "The Raft of the Medusa," Horizon 15:1 (1973)

Homer, Odyssey, translated by E. V. Rieu, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1970

Huttinger, Edward, "Der Schiffbruch: Deutungen eines bildmotive in 19 Jahrhunderts," in Stil und Ikonographie, edited by Jan Bialostocki, Dresden, Germany: VEB Verlag der Kunst, 1965

- Knowlton, J., "Stylistic Origins of Géricault's Raft of the Medusa," Marsyas 11 (1942)
- Mertens, Sabine, Seesturm und Schiffbruch: eine motivgeschichtliche Studie, Hamburg, Germany: E. Kabel, 1987
- Nicholson, Benedict, "The 'Raft' from the Point of View of Subject Matter," Burlington Magazine XCVI (1954)
- Rosenblum, Robert, "Friedrich and the Divinity of Landscape," in Modern Painting and the Northern Romantic Tradition, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1975
- Ruskin, John, The Lamp of Beauty, edited by Joan Evans, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1980
- Shakespeare, William, Complete Plays and Poems, edited by William Allen Nelson and Charles Jarvis Hall, Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1949
- Vaughan, William, Caspar David Friedrich: Romantic Landscape Painting in Dresden, London: Tate Gallery, 1972
- Jacobus de Voragine, The Golden Legend, translated by William Caxton, London: Dent, 1928

SIN/SINNING

Christine M. Boeckl

The following motifs and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Sin/Sinning:

THE FALL OF MAN

LAST JUDGMENT/HELL

OTHER RELIGIOUS SUBJECTS

SEVEN DEADLY SINS/

TEN COMMANDMENTS

SECULAR WORKS

Albrecht Dürer, Adam and Eve, 1504, engraving. (Courtesy of Foto Marburg/Art Resource, New York)

Albrecht Dürer's engraving Adam and Eve describes the pivotal events surrounding the Fall of Man as described in Genesis 3. The print shows the couple in the Garden of Eden (a metaphor for innocence) under the Tree of Knowledge. It conveys the serpent's promise to Eve that man will be godlike. Eve will succumb to the temptation of the devil and disobey the Lord's command. Dürer represents Eve's acceptance of the fruit from the snake's mouth, and "eating the apple" will cost the primal parents God's gift of immortality. Judeo-Christian theology teaches that all future generations are burdened by this act, the original sin, which explains the corruption of human nature. Joseph Campbell writes that in light of this tradition "every natural impulse is sinful unless it has been circumcised or baptized" (The Power of Myth, p. 47).

In the Christian worldview, human history began with this single, momentous transgression. The most important topics concerning sinners are the Fall and the Last Judgment, which will make people accountable for their earthly lives. These two subjects are the primary focus of this essay. The dramatic theme of the final day of reckoning, rendering the horrors of hell, has inspired some of the greatest artists, from Gislebertus to Auguste Rodin and from Giotto to Michelangelo.

Narrative Scenes

After the Middle Ages, the emphasis on sin is less apparent in Christian art and is replaced by didactic narratives taken from accounts of Christ's life to indicate a more positive philosophy. First, and foremost, his sacrificial death on the cross promises salvation to a sinful humankind: "Who his own self bore our sins in his own body on the tree" (I Peter 2:24). Second, the knowledge that the Redeemer sought the company of sinners affords comfort. The feast in the house of Levi, protecting the adulteress from the self-righteous crowd, and converting Mary Magdalen to a life of virtue are two of the New Testament subjects frequently chosen for portrayal.

The visualization of special human frailties, especially the seven deadly sins, is most memorably recorded in Hieronymus Bosch's oeuvre. A few examples of lust are now treated in greater detail, as are some moralizing genre paintings alluding to sin, the Ten Commandments, and allegories from Cesare Ripa's Iconologia as well as political cartoons. Although the question of what constitutes sinful behavior changes over time and with different cultures, the concept of sin is widespread (heaven and hell also exist in Eastern religions) but is by no means universal.

The interpretation of the Fall of Man depends largely on the individual roles Adam and Eve play in this fateful event. In rabbinical accounts, the command not to eat from the forbidden tree was given to Adam alone (before Eve was created), absolving her from the sin of disobedience. St. Augustine, in contrast to earlier Christian authors who saw Eve as flesh (sense), describes in De Trinitate the relationship of the primal parents as humans equipped with a soul (ratio). Eve represents lower reason, that is, scientia (knowledge) concerning itself with corporalia (the body), and Adam represents higher reason, that is, sapientia, the part of the soul acquainted with spiritualia (transcendent truth). The snake symbolizes animalistic base instincts and pleasure; and, although Adam and Eve, or even Adam alone, appear in limbo among the just, Eve is forever identified with sin.

The sixteenth century reexamined the Genesis story and emphasized free will. By establishing free will, humankind is allowed to influence its own destiny. This interpretation also declared human sexuality the main culprit for the Fall. Therefore, at times Eve is given the entire fault for the corruption of humanity; on the other hand, in some works Adam actively participates in obtaining the forbidden fruit. The hierarchy of the importance of various sins changed frequently. Since Pope Gregory I, the dominant view has been that pride, Lucifer's transgression, was the mother of all sins. Adam and Eve were disobedient, but they also were accused of several or even all the deadly sins, including envy, gluttony, and lust. Because intricate theological debates are difficult to translate into images, it is not easy to specify which author's opinion the artists represented.

A brief history of the different visualizations of the first parents and their eternal guilt will give some insight into the subject's iconology. Early Christian art depicted the Fall in a straightforward manner without much narrative detail. In catacomb paintings and on the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, Adam and Eve, separated by tree and serpent, turn away from each other and cover their bodies in shame. Nudity must have been an important issue in the transition from the pagan era to Christianity. Medieval masterpieces described the events in a very direct narrative. For example, in a panel of the Doors for St. Michel of Hildesheim Cathedral in Germany, God points threateningly at Adam, who immediately passes the guilt on to his wife, while Eve's gesture accuses the snake. The buck stopped there, but paradise was lost. The next panel shows the immediate result of the original sin—Adam tilling the field "by the sweat of his brow" and Eve "bearing her children in pain" (Genesis 3:16–19). The lintel of the penitents' portal of Autun Cathedral in France also refers to the Fall. It represents the first medieval monumental nude—Eve is shown lying down (to accommodate the horizontal design). She holds the forbidden fruit in one hand and raises the other to her cheek in a gesture of shame.

In the fifteenth century, two innovative monumental paintings of Adam and Eve appear almost simultaneously in Italy and in the north, emphasizing that the original sin affected all human endeavors. In Brancacci Chapel in Florence, Italy, Adam and Eve are depicted before and after the Fall. These scenes frame a number of seemingly unrelated stories taken from the Acts of the Apostles and put them into perspective. Just about the same time, Jan Van Eyck includes the first parents in the grandiose altar that was originally called Altar of Adam and Eve or Triumph of the Lamb, better known as the Ghent Altarpiece. The individual panels support a complex iconographic program promising salvation. Important is the inclusion of a deesis, Mary and John interceding for people's sins, Adam and Eve appear on the outside panels of the polyptych, after the Fall, covering their nude bodies with fig leaves: "And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons" (Genesis 3:7). Above Adam, rendered in grisaille, Cain and Abel are seen worshiping; above Eve, the first fratricide takes place.

Although the iconography of the Fall seems well defined and often appears repetitive, an analysis of the relationship of the three proponents (Adam, Eve, and the snake) generates greater understanding of the subject's iconology. For this reason, the most innovative works of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are reviewed here together.

Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel ceiling represents the Temptation, Fall, and Expulsion from paradise in a continuous narrative. The Tree of Life forms the center of the large composition and reflects an analogy to Christ's Crucifixion, which will redeem humanity (sin withered the Tree of Life, which, in turn, is said to have become the wood of the cross). What distinguishes Michelangelo's work from numerous other versions is Adam's willing participation in the Fall. Standing next to the seated Eve, both reach into the branches of the tree. Adam's action has been dubbed felix culpa, indicating the gift of free will and the responsibility of Christians to search for their own redemption (facilitated by grace). Because the Bible explicitly states that Adam had not shown any initiative in getting the fruit, few artists followed Michelangelo's design, and Johannes Fabricius wrote in his treatise Disputatio Theologica qua Historia sacra contra nonnullos pictorum errores vindicatur (1684) that such depictions were erroneous.

Only a stone's throw away from the Sistine Chapel, Raphael worked at the very same time in the Vatican Palace and chose a more literal interpretation of the Bible in his ceiling detail for the Stanza della Segnatura. His Adam and Eve resembles Michelangelo's temptation scene only inasmuch as Raphael also adopted a dynamic style. True to traditional theology, however, it is Eve who energetically plucks the fruit from the branch. Adam is seated on the other side of the tree to indicate his refusal to participate in the act.

In the sixteenth century, artists began to treat Eve as a temptress no man could resist. Raphael manifests this when he gave Eve and the snake the same alluring features. Marcantonio Raimondi's engraving after Raphael's Temptation of Man disseminated the master's composition into the north.

In northern Renaissance art, the Fall was treated innumerable times. In Münster, Germany, Lucas Cranach the Elder adopted a nontraditional pose showing Adam indicating his sexual desire by embracing Eve. He also included the first parents in his Reformation picture Rechtfertigung des Sunders durch den Glauben (Allegory of the Old and the New Law). The symbolic panel (popularized by a woodcut design reversed from the painting) shows a male sinner forced by the devil and Death into the flames of hell. To the back, in a smaller scene, the Fall of Man is shown. Adam and Eve jointly hold the apple in a deliberately symmetrical composition. In a later version of The Old and the New Law, attributed to Hans Holbein the Younger, Eve is faulted for the Fall. Peccatum (Sin) is written above her head, and she stands intimately close to the serpent, from which Adam seems to shy away.

Peter Paul Rubens, too, defined the positions of the first parents very carefully. In an early work (circa 1600), Eve is the temptress and the culprit; she is a sensuous and seductive nude. Coyly she holds the fruit close to her mouth. Clinging to the tree with the reptile (the pose is derived from the Raimondi print), she opposes Adam, who reproaches her vehemently. Adam is propped against another tree, indicating no intentions to disobey God.

Rembrandt van Rijn, generally nonjudgmental, produced a psychologically penetrating etched version of the Fall. In his Fall of Man, the couple are far from being idealized. We are privileged to observe a domestic squabble. Eve holds the apple and wants to share it with her husband. However, Rembrandt's Adam seems painfully aware of the grave consequences: His right hand expresses a warning, and he wants to prevent Eve from eating the fruit with his left. At the end he must have lost the argument. Rembrandt's tempter in the tree has the shape of a dragon (only after the Fall does God command the snake to crawl) and resembles the creature in Dürer's woodcut Christ in Limbo (1510), a scene in which Adam and Eve appear as a "saved" couple, thereby linking the two subjects.

Sole guilt for the Fall is assigned to Eve in a print by Philip Galle (1610), which belongs to a series titled The Fatal Power of Women. The first of the six circular engravings shows a seated Adam passively receiving the fruit from his wife's hand. The other illustrations depict Lot's daughters, Jael killing Sisara, Samson betrayed by Delilah, a pagan princess persuading Solomon to worship idols, and Judith decapitating Holofernes. In Protestant Bibles, the Book of Judith is excluded from the Old Testament, thereby changing her status from heroine to villain. Analogous collections of seductive women who had contributed to the destruction of men had been popular since the sixteenth century. Similar and related subjects endured over the centuries; for example, a beguiling Salome becomes responsible for St. John's death. Gustav Klimt's Salome with the Head of St. John portrays such a femme fatale.

The artists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries made few original statements about the Fall. Yet, a twentieth-century female artist, Judith Lodge, painted a series of large works titled The Walls of Eden. The origin of these paintings was a dream involving the serpent in the earthly paradise. Lodge views the story from a woman's point of view. Large canvases create an environment in which the viewer plays the role of the expelled Eve. The artist envisioned a magnificent closed gate to separate herself from Eden.

A number of artists expanded the iconography of the Fall with erudite symbolism. In Dürer's illustration Adam and Eve (mentioned earlier in this essay), the primal parents are seen before the Fall. They are nude, and only leaved branches cover their genitals, as if by accident. Their poses recall classical statuary, such as Apollo of Belvedere in the Vatican Collection and Venus de Medici in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy. Adam's and Eve's idealized figures stand in contrast to the dense grove of a northern landscape. Some of the engraving's enigmatic features need further explanation. The wooded area is populated by peacefully resting animals: an ox, a cat, a mouse, a rabbit, and an elk. Adam clings to a tree next to the one in the center. A tropical parrot, symbolizing the virgin birth of Christ, is perched on a limb right above Adam's shoulder as an antidote against Satan. Eve stands closer to the centralized hybrid of an apple-fig tree, the habitat of the snake.

The sleeping animals in the foreground can be explained by sixteenth-century northern writings on natural history and represent the four temperaments: sanguine, choleric, phlegmatic, and melancholic. Dürer certainly would have known such books, as he used the temperaments as a subtheme in Four Apostles (1526) in the Alte Pinakothek in Munich, Germany. According to these writings, the curse of the Fall unleashed the imbalance of the humors or temperaments. Hildegard von Bingen explains that if man had remained in paradise, he "would not have had those noxious fluids [humor] loose in his body." The fluids consisted of secretions of the liver: Black gall prompted the vices of despair and avarice, whereas yellow bile caused melancholy, traditionally depicted as an elk. Choleric humor caused pride and wrath, symbolized in Dürer's "aggressive" cat. Phlegm, carried by the lungs, resulted in sloth and gluttony, represented in the phlegmatic ox. Sanguine humor was caused by excessively active blood circulation, as seen in the vice of lust characterized by the fertile rabbit. Until humankind sinned, there was peace in the animal kingdom; cat and mouse coexisted. Also, "the battle of the sexes" has been directly related to the Fall of Man.

Dürer's student Hans Baldung Grien renders a more negative picture. Eve, the Serpent, and Death/Adam is an idiosyncratic variation of the Fall and refers to the debate as to whether sexual intercourse existed before the Fall. De originale peccato—written in 1518 although not published until 1529—claimed that carnal desire for Eve caused Adam's spiritual death. In Baldung Grien's painting, Adam grabs Eve's wrist with obvious sexual intent while the snake strikes his hand. At the same time, Adam's body undergoes a metamorphosis from life to a putrefied corpse (transi). In the inclusion of Death, Baldung Grien's painting follows earlier prototypes.

The Salzburg Missal (1481, Austria) shows a similar figure of Death in the illustration Tree of Death and Life, an allegorical version of the Fall. The tree in the center not only is loaded with fruits but also bears communion wafers. Adam is seated dejectedly on the ground, expressing his shame. His wife, just as in Baldung Grien's painting, is a seductive nude. Lilith, the snake (a convention taken from Hebrew and Mesopotamian sources), holds an apple in her mouth that Eve touches. Simultaneously, the first mother distributes fruits with her other hand to kneeling burghers dressed in fifteenth-century garb, thereby indicating that the original sin is passed on to later generations. Behind the group a grinning Death appears, again not as a skeleton but as a transi. In Baldung Grien's panel, as well as in the Salzburg manuscript, Adam is ensnared by the coils of the serpent and holds in his hand the fruit that caused his spiritual death. In the tree above Eve's head hangs a skull. Opposite her, on the left, Mary, the new Eve, crowned as queen of heaven, serves eucharistic hosts to a kneeling crowd in front of her. Instead of the symbol of death seen on Eve's half,

Mary's tree branches hold the image of the crucified Jesus Christ. The juxtaposition of Eve and Mary indicates their roles in the plan of salvation; Eve's sin will be redeemed by the Virgin through her son, Jesus. (Mary's exemption from the burden of original sin is expressed in the dogma of the Immaculate Conception.)

From the loss of paradise to the Second Coming of Christ, humankind is condemned to act out a more or less pessimistic future. Along with the Fall of Man, depicting Last Judgment scenes gave artists opportunities to render the punishment of sin. The tympanum of Autun Cathedral is a prime example of a medieval Last Judgment scene: Christ is the dominant presence in the relief while next to him St. Michael weighs souls (a concept that can be traced to ancient Egypt). In a frieze below, the saved on Christ's right and the sinners on his left await the outcome of the trial. Devils, and even disembodied claws, pull the unfortunates into hell while the angels lead the blessed to God.

In the twelfth century, scenes of sinners in hell were prevalent not only in Europe but in Asia as well, although their respective spheres of influence have not yet been investigated. In a Cambodian relief titled Heaven and Hell, large demons herd sinners by brute force into hell. The scroll Hell Scene (circa 1200) depicts demons with iron rods bashing the heads of pitifully small figures of monks in a fiery setting. The monks have been herded into the western gate of hell because they are guilty of unkindness to animals—certainly not a reason for Western sinners to be condemned to eternal tortures.

The fifteenth century introduced new psychological insight into the subject of heaven and hell. The novelty in Rogier van der Weyden's Last Judgment Altarpiece, in the otherwise traditional rendering of the final events, is the lack of the sinners' satanic torture. The damned display horrifying grimaces and gestures of despair and "are forced under their own power toward their fate. No demons are needed to pull man into inferno, no angels will rescue him. The damned lead themselves to their destiny, a pessimistic proclamation that in some respects anticipates the negative character of humankind later expressed so vividly by Hieronymus Bosch" (Snyder, p. 133).

In the Last Judgment in Vienna, Austria, Bosch and a collaborator single out a few sins, such as lust, wrath, and gluttony. The triptych, according to at least one author, might have been intended as a warning to a young prince. In the left wing, which traditionally shows the Garden of Eden, God the Father appears in a bright aureole—yet there is trouble in the cosmos from the start. The fall of the proud rebel angels, characterized as dark, insectlike creatures, precedes the creation of Adam. The center of the triptych depicts the Last Judgment. Christ presides over a holocaust that takes up three-quarters of the panel. The humanoid male and female monsters—disfigured by spots and nodules, skin lesions, and other blemishes—populate brothels, taverns, and bathhouses. This has been interpreted as placing great emphasis on the danger of venereal diseases, such as the Spanish pox (syphilis), all of which were associated with lack of chastity. Gigantic war machines appear on the right. The third panel displays hell. God is absent, and the devil reigns supreme. Surprisingly absent also are members of the aristocracy and the clergy, which supports the theory that the commission was intended for Charles, the 15-year-old son of Philip the Fair, on his inspection tour through the Netherlands in 1515.

Humanist ideas had originated in Florence in the fourteenth century and characterize Giotto's Last Judgment in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy. Giotto introduces new ideas along with earlier iconographic traditions by depicting a large Christ in an aureole as the focal point in the events of the day of wrath. Also medieval is the view of the Son of man surrounded by angels and the blessed. To his right, the saved are resurrected from their graves and guided toward heaven. Unprecedented, however, is the inclusion of Enrico Scrovegni, the donor of the church, who aims to atone for his father's sin of usury. On Christ's left, hell occupies a quarter of the wall, distinguished by its fiery red and filled with sadistic devils who torture the damned. The usurers, recognizable by their money bags, were singled out as among the worst sinners. The date (circa 1305) precedes Dante's publication of Inferno, yet it can be assumed that Giotto was acquainted with his compatriot's ideas.

Michelangelo, in his treatment of the Last Judgment in the Sistine Chapel more than 200 years later, retained a hierarchical structure similar to that described in Giotto's fresco. The Renaissance artist also introduced Dantesque themes in his hell. The mythological ferryman Charon drives the damned from his boat with an oar, and Minos, a serpent wrapped around his powerful body, reigns in hell (divergences from the biblical text got Michelangelo in trouble with the Inquisition). The torments have become less physical, yet the sinners' haunting expressions reveal their despair at being severed from their Maker.

Rubens, among many others, emulated Michelangelo's style in his Last Judgment yet remained orthodox in his theology. Rubens also created a variation on the theme in a similar dynamic composition, Fall of the Damned. This subject may have inspired the majestic vault decorations in Rome's Il Gesu, The Expulsion of the Heretics and Unbelievers from the Heavens by Giovanni Battista Baciccio (Il Gaulli). The light in the Baroque fresco seems to generate from the symbols IHS, signifying the name of Jesus, which hurtles the sinners into the world of the spectator.

At the time of the inception of his Gates of Hell, Auguste Rodin was an ardent admirer of Michelangelo. The dynamics of his composition are unthinkable without the Renaissance master's canonical solution. Gates of Hell was commissioned in 1880 but never completed; however, the nineteenth-century sculptor secularized the subject and introduced Dante's Divine Comedy as his theme. Eventually, Rodin even replaced the proposed figure of Dante with the Thinker to ponder the human condition. From the original sinners, only Ugolino and His Sons and Paolo and Francesca remained. Later, Charles Baudelaire's Flowers of Evil replaced Dante as a source of inspiration. Rodin's chaotic design renders the individual figures anonymous and has to be experienced as a metaphor of dark forces governing human lives.

Apart from the depictions of the beginning and the end of time, other biblical narratives from the Old and New Testaments were chosen to render sinners. The most prominent illustration of the first murder from the Old Law is Cain slaying Abel (already mentioned in the Ghent Altarpiece), which is frequently included in larger cycles to show cause and effect. In later centuries, the topic was treated independently. For example, Tintoretto and Rubens gave the subject great drama: Cain brutally attacks Abel, who fights desperately and vainly for his life.

The Old Testament and the Christian Middle Ages considered an act of sacrilege one of the gravest transgressions a human could commit. In the First Book of Samuel, the two sons of the last judge Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were accused of having blasphemed against God when they misappropriated the sacrificial meat of the holocaust. Their sin "was very great before the Lord: for men abhorred the offering of the Lord" (I Samuel 2:16–17). The repercussions were severe; God rebuked the old judge and foretold that his male heirs would be killed. This prophesy came true in the battle at Ebenezer, where not only were Eli's sons slain but the Ark of the Covenant was lost to the Philistines. Representations of the sin of Hophni and Phinehas, depicting two men at the sacrificial cauldron, appear only in some medieval manuscripts. The consequences of their shortcomings are illustrated more frequently, for example, in an illustration in Erhard Altdorfer's Lutheran Bible (1533), The Battle of Ebenezer, Eli and the Messenger, and the Fall of Dagon, which emphasizes the episode's significance in the transfer of leadership from the rule of the judges to that of the kings.

As already indicated, scenes from the New Testament emphasized different sins, yet above all they featured the possibility of redemption. The narratives involving Jesus consorting with sinners repeatedly depict Mary Magdalen. She is frequently found in the proximity of Christ: anointing his feet in Bethany, pleading for her brother's life at the resurrection of Lazarus, under the cross, and (after her Master's resurrection) in noli me tangere (do not touch me) scenes. The reason Jesus is often found in the company of sinners is contained in Christ's answer to the Pharisees, "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick" (Matthew 9:12). The case of Paolo Veronese, who because of Inquisitional interference changed the name of his Last Supper to Feast in the House of Levi, had a happy ending. In the latter subject, the objectionable "buffoons, drunkards, dwarfs, Germans, and similar vulgarities" were quite appropriate.

Throughout the centuries, the scene of Jesus and the adulteress proclaimed the Lord's mercy and made an appeal for tolerance. Rembrandt's Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery deviates from the customary scene of Christ writing illegible words on the ground (as depicted by Pieter Bruegel the Elder, among others) because the artist moved the action indoors. The spectacle is placed in the dark, cavernous interior of a large temple. Christ, surrounded by his apostles and bathed in warm light, stands only a few steps above the contrite woman. He is a commanding figure yet simply clad and barefoot. Rembrandt sees Christ as a spiritual leader about to say, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her" (John 8:7). The group of accusers is dressed in sumptuous robes and hats. In the background, in semidarkness, appear the ceremonious high officials of the temple. The painting transcends the narrative and becomes a pictorial discussion of the merits of the Old versus the New Law. Christ is depicted as very human (possibly seen through the eyes of Mennonite or Socinian sects, whose ideology Rembrandt seemed to have favored). On the other hand, the Orientalist Vasilii Polenov replaced theological concepts with historic accuracy. His Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery (1907) re-creates an authentic setting in front of the temple steps, where Christ is seated among his followers calmly teaching when a furious, unruly crowd drags a young woman to be stoned. The realism makes us relive the event—this is how it could have happened. Emil Nolde's version focuses primarily on the two proponents. Christ puts his arm protectively around the woman's shoulder.

Jesus healing a man suffering from palsy with the words "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee" (Luke 5:20) gave hope where medicine was at a loss. The universal appeal of such themes is the confirmation that God is willing to forgive all penitent sinners. Already in antiquity, disease had been assumed to be a divine punishment.

With the appearance of the modern scourge of AIDS, the concept of sin seems to be reintroduced into the vocabulary of some artists. Because medical science still struggles to find a cure, a regression toward a more medieval sense of guilt characterizes the latest art. For example, a Korean designer compares bubonic plague with AIDS. The Penalty of God is written in the center in bold print, and the words "Pest/AIDS" are placed diagonally in the corners. Alluring lips and rats are juxtaposed; they are to blame for the spread of the afflictions—lips because the virus is sexually transmitted and rodents because they harbor plague-infested fleas. Russian propaganda posters also seem to blame female prostitutes for the spread of the disease by showing a lush, rouged mouth with a taxi meter instead of teeth. This refers to the pecuniary aspects of prostitution and the fact that time is running out. American educational material advocating preventive measures shows a snake coiled around an apple, camouflaged by lush blossoms; the Garden of Eden is lost, and sickness is a reality.

The Seven Deadly Sins and the Ten Commandments

The allegorical prototype for sin appears in Ripa's Iconologia. Peccato is depicted as a dark (impure, without grace), seminude youth (imprudent youths frequently sin) who stands in a rocky landscape. A serpent (symbol of the devil) gnaws on his breast (seat of the soul that has sinned), eating his heart; an even larger snake is wrapped around his waist. In the seventeenth-century editions, sin has his eyes closed; later he is blindfolded, indicating that sin is blind to God's commandments. Ripa also singles out individual sins: Pride, Disobedience, Murder, and so on.

One of the earliest symbols manifesting sin is carved on French cathedrals as 12 Vices (Cathedral of Amiens, among others), later to be superseded by the ever-popular seven deadly sins. Pride, gluttony, lust, wrath, envy, avarice, and sloth are frequently portrayed in late medieval art. According to Pope Gregory I and Thomas Aquinas, they were the roots of all evil. Bosch's panel Table of the Seven Deadly Sins is arranged around the eye of God and divided into seven genre scenes illustrating that daily life is filled with sinful activities. Avarice is represented by a corrupt judge accepting a bribe, gluttony by the usual excesses of food and drink, wrath by a murder, pride by a woman looking into a mirror, and so on. His paintings convey late medieval ethics signifying a current concern, memento mori. Four small circles in the corner refer to the four last things. One circle shows a deathbed scene as a man is given his last rites (as often depicted in ars moriendi), another shows Christ appearing on Judgment Day, and two others illustrate the entrances to heaven and hell. Many of these secular examples were derived from sermões vulgares, which started in the thirteenth century and continued in a strong tradition of type-casting the worldliness of sinners.

Hans Makart painted an orgy that is sometimes called Seven Deadly Sins or Plague in Florence (again sin and an epidemic are closely associated). The painting may have some moralizing aspects, although the subject matter and the racy title seem to have been the main reasons the artist created this canvas.

A modern Seven Deadly Sins (1933) appears in the work of Otto Dix. The date is important because the painting makes a political statement. It displays Death (Sloth) confronting a grotesque procession in which an ugly witch, clutching money (Avarice), leads the group. A gnomelike child whose mask bears Adolf Hitler's features (Envy) rides on her shoulders. Other horrid creatures represent Wrath, Pride, Lust, and Gluttony. The latter reveals its debt to Netherlandish tradition most conclusively: Gluttony is represented by a child wrapped in sausages with a pretzel and a soup kettle that hide his identity (Nazi official Hermann Göring?). The symbols are documented and preserved in Dix's cartoon for this painting in which the names of the sins are written next to the individual figures. On a ruinous wall appears a Friedrich Nietzsche quote: "Die Wüste wächst, Weh dem der Wüsten birgt." (The barren desert groweth, woe unto him, who harbors in himself such a wasteland) (Zarathustra). Soon after this painting was completed, Dix lost his position as an academy professor and was declared one of the "degenerate artists."

Political caricature involving sin has had a time-honored tradition. For example, James Gillray's cartoon Sin, Death, and the Devil shows Queen Charlotte of England as Sin crouching between Prime Minister William Pitt (Death) and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Thurlow (the devil). Gillray satirized William Hogarth's Satan, Sin, and Death, a scene from John Milton's Paradise Lost depicting his "Unholy Trinity."

Human Frailties

Carnal lust (i.e., human sexuality) is by far the most commonly depicted sin. Women were blamed for this evil in the New Testament (Whore of Babylon). A particular form of preoccupation with sex is found in the witches' trials after a celibate priesthood issued an encyclopedia of demonology, Witches Hammer. Such sadistic fantasies may have influenced the depiction of the "devil's brides," which stood for the antithesis of nuns. Hans Baldung Grien, Salvator Rosa, Alessandro Magnasco, and Francisco de Goya, among others, depict their witchcraft, incantations, and orgies. However, it has not yet been established whether the artists believed these satanic rites to be real and sinful. For one, Goya did not depict his fears; the only sin his witches have committed is to prolong narrow-mindedness and delay enlightenment in Spain.

Lust and avarice are characterized in Ill-Matched Lovers by Quentin Massys. The painting represents a "dirty" old man and a young woman who steals his money. The artist emphasized that man corrupted by sin becomes ugly. Massys's caricatures are intended to teach morality much as Bosch does but with a significant difference: Massys considers humans to be capable of righteous conduct. His hideous characters are a warning, and they might deter the viewer from committing similar transgressions (much like Desiderius Erasmus's Praise of Folly).

Didactic pictorial traditions remained strong in the north and resurfaced in a number of seventeenth-century genre scenes. However, by then the treatment of these secular morality lessons had become more subtle. For example, Jan Vermeer's The Concert depicts a man with two charming women making music. The subject of lust is indicated with a sophisticated allusion provided by a picture within the picture: Dirck van Baburen's Procuress hangs above the harpsichord. Thomas Couture's The Romans of the Decadence was exhibited in Paris along with a quote from the historian Juvenal: "Crueler than arms, lust descended upon Rome and avenged the conquered world." The artist insinuated in his epic painting that moral decline and sin had caused the fall of the Roman Empire.

One of the few biblical scenes of the twentieth century concerning lust is Emil Nolde's Mary of Egypt with Sinners (Mary Egyptica had a colorful past, much like her namesake, Mary Magdalen). Nolde's Mary is living it up with her clients. She shows no sign of remorse in this section of the triptych. The German expressionist, who was deeply religious, emphasizes the ugliness of the debauched lifestyle by introducing clashing colors and expressive forms in a moralizing way. Vincent van Gogh also signaled his intention to express "evil" in his Night Cafe (1888, Yale University Art Gallery, New Haven, Connecticut) by disharmony in his brilliant hues.

John Bossy observed that the "Reformation brought to conclusion the process of replacing the Seven Deadly Sins by the Ten Commandments as the system of Christian ethics" (Bossy, p. 116). Yet the Ten Commandments are only occasionally depicted. One of the few examples preserved is the fifteenth-century woodcut The Ten Commandments, which is divided into 10 equal quadrangles. Although there is a distinction between mortal and venial sins, little emphasis is placed on such theological details in the visual arts. Many of the motives originated from the earlier depictions of the seven deadly sins and the danse macabre (dance of death) because they involve characters from all social classes. In all "thou-shalt-not" illustrations, figures of demons hover above the sinners' heads. The first commandment shows Moses before a vision of God holding the tablets of the Law; in the background a heretic prays to a devil. The second scene depicts gamblers at card tables taking the Lord's name in vain; Sunday's desecration is represented by farmers working in the field. To show how to honor parents, two children wash their father's feet. The fifth commandment illustrates a murder, and the command "thou shalt not steal" shows such an infamous act in progress. Lust is symbolized very traditionally as a couple embracing and singing to a lute. The eighth and ninth commandments are represented, respectively, by a man swearing a false oath before a judge and by "lusting for the neighbor's wife," acted out by a charming lady in front of her castle at a clandestine meeting with an equally elegant dandy. The tenth commandment shows envious neighbors next to a man displaying his wealth.

Every religion has different ways to grant absolution from sin. The Protestant view differs from the Mosaic law and Catholic theology. Tashlikh is a symbolic ceremony in which sins are cast into the water during the Jewish New Year celebration. Protestants prefer public confessions. The Catholic sacrament of penance is customarily administered in private. The clerics reserve the right of absolution (the power of the keys—Christ's institution of the papacy). Few depictions of these rites found their way into the mainstream of the visual arts. A unique work by a fifteenth-century master, Mass of St. Giles, depicts the saint holding a service in the presence of Holy Roman Emperor Charlemagne. An angel bearing a scroll miraculously reveals an "unconfessed sin" of the emperor. Most of these works address the power struggle between church and state.

Although many sins can and would be punishable by secular law, they are not identical with it, and they always remain in the realm of religious teachings. Sinfulness and repentance are often closely related to the belief in an afterlife or reincarnation and must be viewed with these moral assumptions in mind. Therefore, with few exceptions, the twentieth century avoided the subject of sin altogether.

See also Avarice; Envy; Evil Eye; Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Humors; Luxury; Penitence/Repentance; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

The Fall of Man

Adam and Eve, fourth century, Rome, Catacomb Sotto la Via Latina

Adam and Eve, sculpture on the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, 359, Vatican, Grottoes of St. Peter

Adam and Eve Passing the Blame Before God, sculpture, 1015, Doors for St. Michel, Hildesheim, Germany, Cathedral

Gislebertus, Eve, sculpture, 1120–1132, Autun, France, Musée Rolin

Masolino, Temptation, circa 1425, Florence, Italy, Brancacci Chapel

Masaccio, Expulsion from Paradise, circa 1425, Florence, Italy, Brancacci Chapel

Van Eyck, Jan, Adam and Eve, 1432, Ghent Altarpiece, Ghent, Belgium, St. Bavo

Furtmeyr, Berthold (workshop of), Tree of Death and Life, 1481, Salzburg Missal, Munich, Germany, Bayerisches Staatsarchiv (Clm 15710 fol. 60v.)

Dürer, Albrecht, Adam and Eve, 1504, engraving

Raphael, Adam and Eve, 1508–1511, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura

Michelangelo, Fall of Man, 1510, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Raimondi, Marcantonio (after Raphael), Adam and Eve, circa 1520, engraving

Baldung Grien, Hans, Eve, the Serpent, and Death/Adam, 1520, Ottawa, Ontario, National Gallery of Canada

Cranach, Lucas, the Elder, Adam and Eve, 1525?, Münster, Germany, Westfälisches Landesmuseum

Cranach, Lucas, the Younger (?), Eve Tempted by the Serpent, circa 1530, Antwerp, Belgium, Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten

Tintoretto, Adam and Eve, circa 1550, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Fall of Man, circa 1600, Antwerp, Belgium, Rubenshuis

Galle, Philip, Fall of Man, 1610, from the engraved series The Fatal Power of Women

Rembrandt van Rijn, Fall of Man, 1638, engraving Lodge, Judith, Eve at the Walls of Eden, 1977, collection of the artist

Last Judgment/Hell

Last Judgment, fresco, eleventh century, Sant' Angelo in Formis
 Gislebertus, Last Judgment, sculpture, 1120–1135, Autun, France, Cathedral
 Heaven and Hell, bas-relief, late twelfth century, Angkor Wat, Cambodia
 Jigoku Zoshi, Hell Scene, scroll, circa 1200, Seattle, Washington, Art Museum
 Giotto, Last Judgment, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Weyden, Rogier van der, Last Judgment Altarpiece, circa 1445, Beaune, France, Musée de Hôtel Dieu
 Bosch, Hieronymus, and collaborator, Last Judgment
Triptych, 1515, Vienna, Austria, Akademie der Bildenden
 Künste
 Michelangelo, Last Judgment, 1536–1541, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Last Judgment, circa 1615, Munich,
 Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Fall of the Damned, 1620s, Munich,
 Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Baciccia, Giovanni Battista (Il Gaulli), The Expulsion of the Heretics and Unbelievers from the Heavens, 1676, Rome,
 Il Gesù
 Rodin, Auguste, Gates of Hell, sculpture, 1880–1917, Paris, Rodin Museum

Other Religious Subjects

Brailes, William de, Hophni's and Phinehas's Sin, manuscript illumination, twelfth century, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery (Ms. 500, fol. 17v.)
 Master of St. Giles, Mass of St. Giles, 1480–1490, London,
 National Gallery
 Altdorfer, Erhard, The Battle of Ebenezer, Eli and the Messenger, and the Fall of Dagon, woodcut, circa 1533, for Lutheran Bible, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Tintoretto, Cain Slaying Abel, circa 1550, Venice, Italy, Accademia
 Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, 1565, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries
 Veronese, Paolo, Feast in the House of Levi, 1573, Venice, Italy, Accademia
 Rubens, Peter Paul, Cain Slaying Abel, circa 1608, London, Courtauld Institute Galleries
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, 1644, London, National Gallery
 Polenov, Vasilii, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, 1907, Williamsburg, Virginia, William and Mary College
 Klimt, Gustav, Salome with the Head of St. John, 1909,
 Venice, Italy, Museo d'Arte Moderna-Ca' Pesaro Nolde, Emil, Mary of Egypt with Sinners, Conversion, Death in the Desert, triptych, 1912, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Nolde, Emil, Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery, 1926,
 Bern, Switzerland, Fehr Collection

Seven Deadly Sins/Ten Commandments

Virtues and Vices, sculpture, twelfth century, Portal of the Savior, Amiens, France, Cathedral
Ten Commandments, single woodcut, 1460–1480, Munich,
 Germany, Graphische Sammlungen (Sch. 1846)
 Bosch, Hieronymus (?), Table of the Seven Deadly Sins, 1480–1485, Madrid, Spain, Prado
 Cranach, Lucas, the Elder (workshop of), Allegory of the Old and the New Law, 1529, Gotha, Germany, Schlossmuseum Holbein, Hans, the Younger (attributed to), Allegory of the Old and the New Law, circa 1535, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
 Ripa, Cesare, Peccato, from Iconologia, 1603, Rome
 Ripa, Cesare, Disobedience (pl. 92), Pride (p. 126), Homicide
 (pl. 168), from Iconologia (Hertel Edition), 1758–1760, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany
 Makart, Hans, Seven Deadly Sins (Plague in Florence), 1868, Schweinfurt, Germany, Collection Georg Schafer
 Dix, Otto, Seven Deadly Sins, 1933, Karlsruhe, Germany, Staatliche Kunsthalle
 Dix, Otto, Seven Deadly Sins, cartoon, 1933, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie

Secular Works

Baldung Grien, Hans, Witches' Sabbath, chiaroscuro woodcut, 1510
 Massys, Quentin, Ill-Matched Lovers, circa 1515,
 Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Vermeer, Jan, The Concert, circa 1660, Boston, Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum
 Rosa, Salvator, Witches, 1646, Althorp House, England, Collection Lord Spencer
 Hogarth, William, Satan, Sin, and Death, 1730s, London, Tate Gallery
 Magnasco, Alessandro, Witches, 1759, Rome, Collection
 Menotti
 Gillray, James, Sin, Death, and the Devil, engraving, 1792
 Goya, Francisco de, Witches, 1794–1795, Madrid, Spain,
 Ministerio de la Gobernacion
 Couture, Thomas, The Romans of the Decadence, 1847,
 Paris, Louvre
AIDS Prevention Poster, 1985, Bethesda, Maryland, Collection of the Medical Library of the National Institutes of Health (25363)
 Hwan Young Gu, Penalty of God, 1989, for AIDS: Images of Survival, by C. M. Helmken, Washington, D.C., 1989
 Kolosov, Andrey, AIDS Poster, circa 1990, Russia, collection of the artist

Further Reading

Barasch, Moshe, "The Mask in European Art: Meaning and Function," in Art, the Ape of Nature: Studies of Honor of
H. W. Janson, New York: Abrams, 1981
 Bax, Dirk, Hieronymus Bosch and Lucas Cranach: Two Last Judgment Triptychs: Description and Exposition, New York: North Holland, 1983
 Bindman, D., "Hogarth's Satan, Sin, and Death and Its Influence," Burlington Magazine 112 (1970)

- Boeckl, Christine M., "A New Reading of Nicolas Poussin's The Miracle of the Ark in the Temple of Dagon," Artibus et Historiae 24 (1991)
- Bossy, John, Christianity in the West, 1400-1700, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968
- Brown, Christopher, Dutch Genre Painting, London: National Gallery, 1976
- Cummings, Sue Wynne, "Satana gastrocefalico," Commentari 29 (1978)
- Dixon, Laurinda, "Giovanni di Paolo's Cosmology," Art Bulletin 67:4 (1985)
- Domenici, Karen, "James Gillray: An English Source for David's Les Sabines," Art Bulletin 65 (1983)
- Hieatt, A. K., "Eve as Reason in a Tradition of Allegorical Interpretation of the Fall," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 43 (1980)
- Hofmann, Werner, Eva und die Zukunft: das Bild der Frau seit der französischen Revolution, exhibition catalog, Hamburg, Germany: Kunsthalle, 1986
- Jaffe, Michael, "Van Dyck Studies II: La Belle & vertueuse Huguenotte," Burlington Magazine 126 (1984)
- Lee, Sherman, A History of Far Eastern Art, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1964
- Levy, Janey, "... Kingdom of Heaven: Ecclesiastical Authority and Hierarchy in the Beaune Altarpiece," Art History 14:1 (1991)
- Mullins, Edwin, The Painted Witch: How Western Artists Have Viewed the Sexuality of Women, New York: Carroll and Graf, 1985; London: Secker and Warburg, 1985
- Pagels, Elaine, Adam and Eve and the Serpent: The Evolution of the Original Sin, New York: Vintage, 1988; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988
- Rule, Jane, "Judith Lodge: Eve at the Walls of Eden," Vanguard 6:2 (1977)
- Snyder, James, Northern Renaissance Art, New York: Praeger, 1985
- Steinberg, Leo, "Eve's Idle Hand," Art Journal 35 (1975-1976)

SLEEP/SLEEPING

Petra ten-Doesschate Chu

The following motifs and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Sleep/Sleeping:

SLEEP AND DEATH

SLEEP AND LOVE

SLEEP AND THE LOSS OF ALERTNESS AND VIRILITY

SLEEP, SLOTH, AND DRUNKENNESS

SLEEP AND DREAMS

SLEEP, REST, MENTAL PEACE, AND INNOCENCE

ANCIENT

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Gustave Courbet, The Sleeping Spinner, 1853, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre.
(Courtesy of Musée Fabre, Montpellier, France)

Sleep is defined as a periodic, temporary condition in humans and animals marked by a diminution of physiological and psychological functions, its purpose being the restoration of bodily and mental powers. Human beings generally sleep during the night, but short periods of daytime slumber (known as siesta, nap, or doze) are common.

In Western culture, sleep carries with it a number of important associations that have determined and shaped its iconography from classical antiquity to the present: death; love; loss of alertness and virility; sloth and drunkenness; dreams and visions; and rest, mental peace, and innocence. The following sections correspond largely to these six categories of association, although it will become clear that there is, at times, considerable overlap among them. This discussion of the iconography of sleep will touch on images of personifications of sleep (gods, allegories, emblems) and on representations of sleeping figures.

Sleep and Death

The association of sleep with death dates to the beginning of Western culture. In Greek mythology (Hesiod's Theogony) Hypnos (Sleep) and Thanatos (Death) are the twin sons of Night. Homer (Iliad) has them remove the dead body of Sarpedon, son of Zeus, king of the gods, from the Trojan battlefield. The scene appears on several Greek red-figure vases, such as Euphronios's calyx krater (circa 590–580 B.C.) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, on which Hypnos and Thanatos are rendered as two identical winged gods, dressed in soldier's garb. In later Greek vase painting, particularly on some fifth-century B.C. white lekythoi, the brothers are more clearly distinguished from one another. On a fifth-century B.C. lekythos in the British Museum in London, for example, Thanatos is painted white, whereas Hypnos is black, no doubt in reference to the darkness of night.

Hypnos and Thanatos survived in Roman times as Somnus and Mors. In Metamorphoses Ovid describes in detail the deeply recessed cave where Somnus dwells in the company of a "host of sons," including Morpheus, Phantasos, and Phobetor. The river Lethe (root of the words lethargy and lethal), flowing from the depths of Somnus's cave, connects it with the house of the dead of Pluto, god of the underworld. Slumbering putti, spirits of sleep, often appear on Roman sarcophagi, as do representations of the sleeping shepherd Endymion (see below, "Sleep and Love").

The association between sleep and death remained powerful in the Christian era when death was seen as a prolonged sleep and resurrection as the final awakening. The early medieval legend of the Seven Sleepers (first known versions are from the sixth century A.D.), which was also incorporated into the Koran, recounts the story of seven young men living in Ephesus, Turkey, at the time of Emperor Decius. Persecuted for their Christian beliefs, they took refuge in a cave. There they fell asleep and did not wake up until 200 years later, when, during the reign of Emperor Theodosius, Christianity had become the state religion of the Roman Empire. The legend, generally interpreted as a metaphor for resurrection, is represented in Byzantine, medieval, and Islamic art. Throughout history the story of the "long sleep" has returned in many variations, both religious and secular. The fairy tale Sleeping Beauty and Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle" (in The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., 1819–1820) are perhaps best known among them.

During the Renaissance the connection of sleep with death seems to have influenced several Renaissance representations of the Madonna with sleeping Christ Child (Giovanni Bellini, Piero della Francesca, Cosima Tura, Parmigianino). Although the meaning of these paintings is often complex, in many instances they seem to allude to a meditation, by the Madonna, on the future death of her son. As a prototype of the dead Christ, the sleeping Christ Child, often with skull and instruments of the Passion, also occurs in Renaissance and Baroque prints and folk art.

Finally, the analogy between sleep and death finds expression in funeral monuments in which the deceased is rendered as if asleep. This mode of representation of the dead first occurs in so-called kline sculptures on Roman sarcophagus lids and sepulchral reliefs. It largely disappears in the Middle Ages and Renaissance but recurs in the nineteenth century, when numerous grave monuments, particularly of women and children, show the deceased lying in bed or on a couch as if in a temporary slumber. Henri Chapu's tomb of the Duchess of Orléans in the Royal Chapel at Dreux, France (1885), is a particularly moving example.

Sleep and Love

The association of sleep with love and lovemaking is a natural one. In English and many other languages the expression "to sleep together" is a euphemism for copulation. The late Hellenistic sculpture of the sleeping Hermaphrodite (circa A.D. 120) in the Museo Nazionale Romano in Rome may be seen as the embodiment of this intimate relation between love and sleep. Also from the Hellenistic period are several sleeping figures of Eros, the god of love, including a well-preserved bronze in the Metropolitan Museum of Art (250–150 B.C.) of a chubby male infant asleep on a rock. According to the scholar Magdalene Söldner, such figures probably served as garden statues and must be read in a Dionysian (erotic) context. In Roman times the meaning of sleeping infants changed: they were incorporated in sepulchral monuments where they seem to have represented the spirit of sleep (see above, "Sleep and Death"). As an allegory of sleep, the slumbering putto returned in Italian Baroque sculpture (Alessandro Algardi), but in seventeenth-century prints—with his head resting on a skull—he also could serve as an image of death. Indeed, the sleeping putto, signifier of Hypnos and Eros as well as Thanatos, is symptomatic of the close connection in Western thought between sleep, love, and death (see also the discussion of Endymion below).

In painting from the Renaissance onward, sleeping female nudes, often in a landscape, alone, or in the presence of a lover, are commonplace. Most often they appear in the context of a erotically charged classical myth or a later derivative thereof: Jupiter, the king of the gods, and the mortal Callisto (Ovid, Metamorphoses); Ariadne on Naxos, with or without the wine god Dionysus (Philostratus, Imagines); Amymone (whose story is told by Hyginus, Pindar, Apollodorus, and others) found in the woods by a satyr; Cimone and Efegenia (Boccaccio, Giornata); Venus asleep; and a nymph uncovered by a satyr.

Although the motif of the sleeping female nude seems to have originated in the late Hellenistic period with such figures as the Sleeping Ariadne in the Vatican Museum (copy of a late Hellenistic original from circa 150 B.C.), it became especially popular in Renaissance and Baroque painting. According to art historian Millard Meiss, the sleeping nude in a landscape had its origin in Venice, Italy, where Giorgione's Sleeping Venus from Dresden, Germany (circa 1510) seems to have served as a source of inspiration for many later renderings of nude female sleepers. Meiss connects the subject of the sleeping Venus (which has neither visual nor literary sources in antiquity) with Francesco Colonna's Hypnerotomachia Poliphili (1499) in Venice, which includes a description of a wonderful fountain with a sleeping nymph at its center. In Giorgione's painting a female nude is represented sleeping outdoors with one arm bent around her head, a gesture of sleep derived from Greco-Roman Art.

In the wake of Giorgione's Dresden Venus, the sleeping nude became popular in Venice and beyond. The subject survived throughout the seventeenth century, in Italian and northern European painting, and well into the eighteenth century, when such rococo painters as François Boucher and Jean-Honoré Fragonard favored it.

As an object of erotic attraction, the sleeping female nude remains an important topos in nineteenth- and twentieth-century art. The work of the French realist painter Gustave Courbet includes several sleeping nudes (both in natural and indoor settings), whose sexual availability and defenselessness make them highly erotic. Sleeping nudes are also found in nineteenth-century popular prints (Achille Devéria and others) and soft-pornography photographs. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries the subject was treated by such well-known artists as Pierre-Auguste Renoir, Pablo Picasso, and Henri Matisse.

Like the sleeping female nude, her male counterpart occurs in art in different narrative contexts, such as Cupid and Psyche (Apuleius, The Golden Ass); Rinaldo and Armida (Torquato Tasso, La Gerusalemme Liberata); Cephalus and Aurora (Ovid, Metamorphoses); Somnus visited by Iris (Ovid, Metamorphoses); and, most importantly, the sleeping shepherd Endymion visited by Diana, the goddess of the hunt, or her alter ego, Selene-Luna (Apollodorus, The Library; Lucian, Dialogues of the Gods; and others). The earliest representations of this theme are found in Roman wall paintings and sarcophagi such as the Endymion sarcophagus in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. As the Romans believed that, after life, the soul traveled to the moon, Endymion visited by Luna during his eternal sleep was a consoling image of death. Together with the sleeping Eros figures discussed at the beginning of this section, Endymion is the classic case of the intersection of sleep, love, and death.

In Renaissance painting, Endymion appears for the first time in a small cassone (coffer) roundel Diana and Endymion (late fourteenth century) by Cima da Conegliano, now in the Galleria Nazionale in Parma, Italy. The subject subsequently became popular in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century painting in Rome, Florence, and Bologna, Italy. It also enjoyed a certain vogue in the Netherlands during the seventeenth century. But it was in France at the end of the eighteenth century that the theme of Endymion found its most striking visualization. Anne-Louis Girodet-Trioson's Sleeping Endymion (1791) features an effeminate, life-size sleeping male nude dramatically illuminated by the pale rays of the moon. More than any previous work it suggests the close connection between sleep, love, and death.

Sleep and the Loss of Alertness and Virility

Sleep makes one vulnerable, as it causes the loss of watchfulness and alertness. In the Bible, Samson (Judges 16:4–22), Sisera (Judges 4:12–24), and Holofernes (Judith 13:1–10) all become victims of women when they fall asleep because of fondling, exhaustion, or drink. Countless examples of the fates of these three sleepers can be found in the pictorial arts, from Medieval manuscripts to nineteenth-century painting. Often they are slumped on the ground or on a bed, overcome by fatigue or in a drunken stupor, helpless against their female assailants. Other examples of endangered sleepers appear in paintings based on classical mythology. The story of the thousand-eyed watchman Argus, lulled asleep and subsequently killed by Mercury, messenger of the gods (Ovid, Metamorphoses), is often depicted in seventeenth-century Dutch painting as a model of the dangers of distraction.

Although the above-mentioned sleeping warriors and watchmen, through their tragic fates, embody a warning against sleeping at one's post, another class of sleeping warriors has a more positive meaning. In paintings of the god of war Mars sleeping in the company of Venus (works by Botticelli, Piero di Cosimo, and Ferdinand Bol), the sleeping god signifies the peace that is brought about by the power of love.

Finally, sleeping warriors may also signify men's inability or unwillingness to see God's greatness. In representations of the Resurrection of Christ, the tomb is often flanked by sleeping soldiers who are oblivious to the miracle that takes place right beside them. The subject has perhaps been treated most poignantly by Piero della Francesca in his fresco Resurrection (early 1450s) in Sansepolcro, Italy.

Sleep, Sloth, and Drunkenness

The association of sleep with sloth and the neglect of religious and civic duty has roots in the Bible. The subject of Christ praying at Gethsemane, in vain begging his three disciples, Peter, James, and John, to stay awake with him (Matthew 26: 36–46; Mark 14: 32–42; Luke 22: 39–46), has frequently been represented in art since the Middle Ages. Some of the most famous examples appear in Italian fifteenth-century paintings by such artists as Andrea Mantegna and Giovanni Bellini.

In the story of Christ at Gethsemane, sleep constitutes a negative force that prevents human beings from performing their highest religious duty, prayer. Representations of the so-called Ladder of Virtue found in Romanesque manuscripts (such as one in the Biblioteca Vaticana in Rome, Cod. gr. 394) often include a sleeping figure, alternately defined as hypnos or acedia, among the many vices that hinder the virtuous person (usually a monk) from ascending toward heaven. The idea is expressed in more down-to-earth form in Hieronymus Bosch's table top with images of the Seven Deadly Sins (1480–1485) in the Prado Museum in Madrid, Spain, in which a monk is caught napping by a nun; as well as in seventeenth-century paintings by Nicolaes Maes showing praying or Bible-reading figures dozing off.

Sleep prevents humans from performing their secular duties as well. In Philip Galle's print Acedia (circa 1600) a sleeping woman signifies apathy. Seventeenth-century Dutch painting is full of figures, mostly female, who are asleep instead of doing their jobs. Jan Vermeer's Sleeping Girl (circa 1657) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Maes's numerous scenes of sleeping kitchen maids serve as examples. Sleeping women as emblems of slothfulness continue to be found in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century art, particularly in moralizing images of sleeping spinners (Courbet), seamstresses, and so forth.

From the discussion above it would appear that sloth is generally represented by sleeping women rather than men. Indeed, men forsaking their duty because of sleep are relatively rare in art. Constantyn Verhout's painting of a student snoozing behind a pile of books, in the National Gallery in Stockholm, Sweden, may serve as the exception confirming the rule.

A special subcategory of slothful sleepers is formed by individuals who are sleeping off the effects of drink, and in this group males tend to predominate over females. Sleeping drunks are not only portrayed as lazy, they are also portrayed as having lost their sense of propriety. The loss of decorum is an important subtext of these lazy sleepers made explicit in the Old Testament story of Noah, whose shameful behavior is topped only by that of his son Ham, who laughs at his own father (Genesis 9:20–27). Images of Noah's drunkenness are common in art from the Middle Ages onward, particularly in series rendering the narrative of Genesis. Michelangelo's fresco of the subject in the Sistine Chapel (1508–1512) is no doubt the most famous among them. Noah is represented lying face down, naked, with his legs parted, a pose that recalls a famous Hellenistic image of a sleeping drunk satyr, the so-called Barberini Faun (circa 220 B.C.) in Munich. It was a pose that would recur frequently in images of drunkenness.

In a secular context, their meaning unchanged, sleeping drunks make their appearance in seventeenth-century Dutch and Flemish genre painting by artists such as Adriaen Brouwer, Adriaen van Ostade, and Jan Steen. A print by Hendrik Bary (1670) after Jan van Mieris makes their meaning explicit: a laughing man who sticks out his tongue places a pot on the head of a sleeping drunk woman. The caption reads, De Wijn is een Spotter (Wine is a mocker).

Sleep and Dreams

In Greek mythology, Hypnos is the friend of the Muses (Pindar), no doubt because sleep causes dreams, which are connected with fantasy and creativity. The Romans also thought of Somnus as the dream dispenser. According to Ovid (Metamorphoses), Somnus's sons, Morpheus, Phobetor, and Phantasos, could take on the shapes of different humans, animals, and inanimate objects that entered into people's dreams. During the fifteenth century, the Neoplatonists developed a concept of sleep as a state of vacatio, an emptiness of the human soul that made it particularly receptive to communication with the divine. Hence, sleep in the Renaissance is often seen as a visionary state, a moment of revelation.

The subject of dreams and visions is discussed in other essays, but a few examples of representations of sleepers who are also dreamers deserve mention here. Although such images appear in medieval manuscripts and architectural sculpture, they occur most frequently in Renaissance art in the guise of a variety of mythological, biblical, and saintly figures. These figures include Hecuba, the mother of Paris, who dreams of giving birth to a torch that sets the city of Troy aflame (Ovid, Heroïde); Jacob, who dreams of a ladder reaching up to heaven with angels ascending and descending (Genesis 28:10–19); Constantine, to whom it is revealed, in the sign of the cross, that he will defeat Maxentius (Eusebius, Life of Constantine); and Ursula, who is told by an angel that she and her virgins will die as martyrs in Cologne, Germany. Representations of these dreamers may be found in works by Giulio Romano, Raphael, Piero della Francesca, and Vittore Carpaccio, respectively.

A special group within the sleep-dream-vision category is constituted by images that show magical "operations" on the body that are performed while the "patient" is asleep. The prime examples of this theme are paintings and reliefs depicting the creation of Eve out of a sleeping Adam's rib (Lorenzo Ghiberti's Gates of Paradise, Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel ceiling). Another example of this theme applied to an unrelated subject is Fra Angelico's Miracle of the Deacon Justinian (1438–1440), which depicts Deacon Justinian's leg replacement during sleep by Saints Cosmas and Damian. These miraculous operations have a counterpart in nineteenth- and twentieth-century paintings and photographs of operations performed by the "saints of modern medicine" during the artificial sleep of narcosis, such as Henri Gervex's Before the Operation (1887) and Thomas Eakins's The Agnew Clinic (1889).

Sleep, Rest, Mental Peace, and Innocence

Sleep as reward for hard work is a notion that appears to be associated in particular with physical toil and the work of farmers and laborers. Drowsy figures are frequently found in paintings of harvesting scenes, such as Pieter Bruegel the Elder's Harvesters in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, or Jules Bastien-Lepage's Haymaking (1878) in the Musée d'Orsay in Paris.

Sleep is also the reward of those who have a clean conscience and faith in God. Christ on the Lake of Gennesaret (Sea of Galilee) (Matthew 8:23–27; Mark 4:36–41; Luke 8:23–25) is often shown asleep, undisturbed by a storm that rocks the boat. The theme was a favorite of Eugène Delacroix, who painted it at least 10 times.

A related theme, particularly popular in romantic art, is the sound sleep of innocents, most often represented by sleeping children. Paul and Virginie sleeping in the forest (for example, the numerous illustrations in nineteenth-century editions of the novel Paul et Virginie by Jacques-Henri Bernardin de Saint-Pierre) or sleeping infants watched by their parents (William Bouguereau, Berthe Morisot) may serve as examples. In this context mention should also be made of the “babes in the wood,” popular in nineteenth-century painting, sculpture, and popular graphics. The subject of an old English ballad, the babes in the wood bring us back to the beginning of this article because, although nineteenth-century representations of the theme, such as Thomas Crawford's The Babes in the Wood (1851), show two toddlers peacefully asleep, they did in fact die in each other's arms: “two pretty babes, til deathe did end their grief, in one another's arms they dyed.”

See also Death; Dreams/Visions; Nightmare

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Euphronios, The Removal of Sarpedon's Dead Body from the Trojan Battlefield by Hypnos and Thanatos, red-figure calyx krater, circa 590–580 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Thanatos Painter, The Removal of Sarpedon's Dead Body from the Trojan Battlefield by Hypnos and Thanatos, white lekythos, fifth century B.C., London, British Museum
Sleeping Eros, bronze, 250–150 B.C., New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Sleeping Satyr (Barberini Faun), marble, circa 220 B.C., Munich, Germany, Staatliche Antikensammlungen und Glyptothek

Sleeping Ariadne, marble, Roman copy after late Hellenistic original of circa 150 B.C., Vatican, Vatican Museums

Sleeping Hermaphrodite, marble, circa 120 A.D., Rome, Museo Nazionale Romano

Medieval

The Dream of St. Marc, relief over the central door, thirteenth century, Venice, Italy, San Marco

Renaissance

Cima da Conegliano, Diana and Endymion, painting, late fourteenth century, Parma, Italy, Galleria Nazionale

Angelico, Fra, Miracle of the Deacon Justinian, predella of San Marco Altarpiece, 1438–1440, Florence, Italy, San Marco Museum

Piero della Francesca, Resurrection, fresco, early 1450s, Sansepolcro, Italy, Pinacoteca

Piero della Francesca, Dream of Constantine, fresco, 1452–1457, Arezzo, Italy, San Francesco

Mantegna, Andrea, Agony in the Garden, painting, circa 1460, London, National Gallery

Bellini, Giovanni, Agony in the Garden, painting, circa 1460, London, National Gallery

Piero della Francesca, Madonna with Sleeping Child and Saints, painting, 1472–1474, Milan, Italy, Brera Gallery

Botticelli, Venus and Mars, painting, circa 1483, London, National Gallery

Carpaccio, Vittore, Dream of St. Ursula, painting, circa 1495, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Piero di Cosimo, Mars and Venus, painting, circa 1500–1505, Berlin, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Michelangelo, Drunkenness of Noah, fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Michelangelo, Creation of Eve, fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Giorgione, Sleeping Venus, painting, circa 1510, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Raphael, Jacob's Dream, fresco, 1511–1514, Vatican, Stanza d'Eliodoro

Titian, Bacchanal of Andrians, painting, circa 1522–1523, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Pamigianino, Madonna with the Long Neck, painting, 1534–1540, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Seventeenth Century

Galle, Philip, Acedia, engraving, from print series Seven Capital Sins, circa 1600

Brouwer, Adriaen, Drinking Peasants, painting, before 1638, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Algardi, Alessandro, Somnus, black marble, before 1654, Rome, Borghese Gallery

Rembrandt van Rijn, Jacob's Dream, etching, 1655 (Bartsch 36)

Vermeer, Jan, Sleeping Girl, painting, circa 1657, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Bol, Ferdinand, Venus and Sleeping Mars, painting, circa 1660, Braunschweig, Germany, Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museum

Guercino (Giovanni Francesco Barbieri), Sleeping Rinaldo in Armida's Chariot, fresco, before 1666, Rome, Palazzo Costaguti

Meyer, Conrad, Memento Mori, engraving, 1667, Hamburg, Germany, Museum für Kunst und Gewerbe

Eighteenth Century

- Girodet-Trioson, Anne-Louis, Sleeping Endymion, painting, 1791, Paris, Louvre
 Schadow, Johann Gottfried, Tomb of Count von der Mark, marble, 1790, Berlin, Germany, Dorotheenstädtische Kirche

Nineteenth Century

- Delacroix, Eugène, Christ on the Lake of Gennesaret, painting, 1850s, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Crawford, Thomas, The Babes in the Wood, marble, 1851, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Courbet, Gustave, The Sleeping Spinner, painting, 1853, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre
 Courbet, Gustave, Two Women Asleep, painting, 1866, Paris, Musée du Petit Palais
 Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Sleeping Princess, 1872–1894, Dublin, Ireland, Municipal Gallery of Modern Art
 Bastien-Lepage, Jules, Haymaking, painting, 1878, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Pissarro, Camille, The Rest, painting, 1882, Bremen, Germany, Kunsthalle
 Chapu, Henri, Tomb of the Duchess of Orléans, marble sculpture, 1885, Dreux, France, Royal Chapel
 Gervex, Henri, Before the Operation, painting, 1887, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Eakins, Thomas, The Agnew Clinic, painting, 1889, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine
 Redon, Odilon, The Sleep of Caliban, circa 1895, Paris, Ari Redon Collection
 Renoir, Pierre-Auguste, La Source, painting, circa 1895, Merion, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation
 Rousseau, Henri, The Sleeping Gipsy, 1897, New York, Museum of Modern Art
 Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Sleep of King Arthur in Avalon, 1898 (unfinished), Ponce, Puerto Rico, Museo de Arte

Twentieth Century

- Picasso, Pablo, Meditation, watercolor and pen, 1904, New York, Collection Bertram Smith
 Dalí, Salvador, Sleep, oil on canvas, 1937, private collection
 Delvaux, Paul, Sleeping Venus, oil on canvas, 1944, London, Tate Gallery
 Warhol, Andy, Sleep, silk-screened plastic, 1966, New York, Leo Castelli

Further Reading

- Covin, Michel, Un Esthétique du sommeil, Paris: Beauchesne, 1990
 Cumont, Franz, Recherches sur le symbolisme funéraire des Romains, Paris, 1942
Du (entire issue devoted to the theme of Sleep) (December 1990)
 Eger, Jean-Claude, Le Sommeil et la mort dans la Grèce antique, Paris: Editions Sicard, 1966
 Firestone, Gizella, "The Sleeping Christ-Child in Italian Renaissance Representations of the Madonna," Marsyas 2 (1942)
 Kultermann, Udo, "Woman Asleep and the Artist," Artibus et Historiae 11:22 (1990)
 Lee, Rensselaer, "Ut Pictura Poesis: The Humanistic Theory of Painting," Art Bulletin 22 (1949)
 Massignon, L., "Les sept Dormants d'Ephèse (Ahl al-Kahf) en Islam et en Chrétienté, recueil documentaire et iconographique," Revue des études islamiques 22 (1954), 23 (1955), 25 (1957), 26 (1958), 27 (1959), 28 (1960), 29 (1961), 30 (1962)
 Meiss, Millard, "Sleep in Venice: Ancient Myths and Renaissance Proclivities," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 110:5 (October 1955)
 Möller, Liselotte, "Schlaf und Tod. Ueberlegungen zu zwei Liegefiguren des 17. Jahrhunderts," in Festschrift Erich Meyer, Hamburg, Germany: Hauswedell, 1959
 Müller, W., "Zur Schlafenden Ariadne des Vatikans," Mitteilungen des Deutsches archäologisches Instituts Rom 53 (1938)
 Pfister-Burkhalter, Margarete, Die Darstellung des Schlafes in der abendländischen Kunst, Basel, Switzerland: Chemische Industrie, 1946
 Pötzsch, Regine, Sleep in Art, Basel, Switzerland: Editiones Roche, 1996
 Salomon, Nanette, Dreamers, Idlers and Other Dozers: Aspects of Sleep in Dutch Art (Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1984)
 Schubring, G., "Schlaf und Tod in der griechischen Vasenmalerei," Festschrift Paul Schubring, Leipzig, Germany, 1929
 Söldner, Magdalene, Untersuchungen zu liegenden Erosen in der hellenistischen und römischen Kunst, New York: Lang, 1986
Tot lering en vermaak, exhibition catalog, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Rijksmuseum, 1976 (Cat. nos. 33, 65, 69)
 Zoepfel, Fr., "Das Schlafende Jesuskind mit Totenkopf und Leidenswerkzeugen," Volk und Volkstum; Jahrbuch für Volkskunde, Munich, Germany, 1936

SPORT

Karen Pinkus

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Sport:

ANCIENT

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Alexander Archipenko, Struggle (La Lutte), also called The Boxers and The Fight, 1914, bronze, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Milwaukee Art Museum, purchase, Virginia Booth Vogel Acquisition Fund. (Courtesy of the Milwaukee Art Museum Collection, Purchase, Milwaukee, Wisconsin)

It is difficult to imagine an aspect of culture that is as universal as the concept of sport, but we should be careful to distinguish this from the game as structurally agonistic. The English word sport is a shortened form of the Middle English disporten, meaning to divert or disport. Etymologically, the word sport sustains the radical duality of serio ludere (sport as jest or pleasantry) and an engagement with a series of repeated physical motions that exercise an individual body and insert that body into a team of exercising bodies. Unlike the game, which figures prominently in various representational practices as a moment of tension between at least two opposing parties, sport can be considered as pure physical motion outside of considerations of intersubjective narrative, political or social conflict, or cultural exchange in general.

The iconography of sport includes representations of the athlete whose only “function” is to express the form or shape of the body engaged in some physical activity. A wide variety of cultures have produced sculptural or painterly representations of figures either in some typical pose (the discus thrower winding up for the throw, the runner in midstride) or holding a typical attribute (the “football” in pre-Columbian statues) that identifies that individual with the particular activity practiced. Generally, then, such figures “represent” a sport in spite of the fact that he or she is necessarily in a static position—a moment of repose or anticipation of the kinetic activity itself.

In addition to its proximity to the category of the game, sport can also be conflated at times with ritual. The famous Minoan wall paintings from the second millennium B.C. discovered at Knossos include a scene of bull dancing, in which a human figure practices what may have been part of a religious rite. Early depictions of the hunt, such as a bas-relief from the Assyrian Palace of Ashurbanipal, might serve a ritualistic function but also express some forms of heroism that serve to bolster the community or strengthen kinship or tribal bonds.

To distinguish sport from the game in a strict sense, however, sport should be defined as an act of pure motion. Yet in many cultures, the practice of various sports is inevitably linked with agon, ritual, or pre- or paramilitary activities (in Greek, agon can refer to an athletic competition or a battle to the death). In ancient narrative, sport is often a convenient device; a catalog of competitors may serve the same kind of function as the Homeric catalog of ships in Iliad, that is, as a way of keeping track of military divisions and their components. Roman mosaics of boxing and fighting discovered near Gafsa in Tunisia exemplify this sort of categorical function. Within these complex narratives, a victor is indicated by a laurel crown, or arbiters hold out a palm to the figure on top in a wrestling contest. Tables filled with prizes to be awarded are depicted in meticulous detail. Whatever else these mosaics accomplish, they serve as records of an actual cycle of games.

The difficulty in identifying the function of ancient sport representations is exemplified by the Hellenistic Wrestling Group, restored in the eighteenth century and now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy. Two naked men are tensely locked in a focused context. Although one figure appears dominant in relation to the other, scholars have struggled to interpret this incomplete sculpture without precise knowledge of the exact original position of the arms and legs. Wrestling Group might simply represent two athletes in the pankration, or it might have been sculpted to commemorate a particular victor. Such figure groups, indicating a struggle in progress (and not a final decision), were often made for exhibition in gymnasiums, where they served primarily decorative functions.

In both visual and verbal language, sport can serve as an elaborate metaphor for other, more socially “useful” activities. In Inuit culture, boys take up sports as a way of preparing themselves for adult male hunting tasks, and in many forms of so-called primitive representation this visual passage from “play” to “reality” should be understood as essential. Unlike games, often dedicated to, for example, a divine being, the nonagonistic sporting practice remains distant from specifically sacrificial activities but might be closely linked with hero worship in that the participants, often (although not exclusively) male and physically strong, embody certain cultural values to an especially high degree. For example, in Iliad (Book 23) the account of funeral games held to honor the dead soldier Patroclus suggests that the human figure being commemorated will enjoy a more “heroic” immortality because of the competitions; but the presence of the gods intervening in the outcome of the games also links this moment with the divine agon. These games appear in various visual contexts, including the Attic black-figure krater known as the François Vase, which includes the hunt of the Calydonian boar as well as the funeral games of Patroclus. The compositional limitations of the krater form dictated that figures in motion (the esprit de corps, so to speak) would essentially stand one behind another along a horizontal band with minimal interaction.

A similar composition can be found in various sculptural representations of sport. In a marble relief of a ball game (circa 510–500 B.C.) in the National Museum in Athens, Greece, male figures are lined up along a horizontal axis, some overlapping others in order to fit in the space. The sculpture is a very low relief and was apparently meant to serve as a base for a conventional kouros. The scenes include athletes practicing, and—something quite rare in Greek art—a team ball game with a player on the left throwing a ball into a playing arena.

It is fitting that this relief should have been intended as decoration for the base of a kouros. Indeed, counterparts to these narratives of games or sports are the many statues and drawn or painted figures of the heroic muscular youth that in some sense define classical aesthetics. The standing male (and especially the kouros) was the most common type of statue in the classical period. Such figures were used principally to represent athletes who had won in major games, even if we do not see these figures engaged in sport. The standard size of such figures was a little less than life-size. Not until the Hellenistic period did Greeks commission private sculptures for various purposes, such as to honor family members in games or athletic competitions (as distinct from cultic statues of deities in similar poses or sculptural styles).

The fifth-century Discobolus, attributed to the sculptor Myron of Eleutherae, perhaps one of the most famous antique statues, not only represents a male body engaging in sport but also is constitutive of an entirely aesthetic category of sculpture that cannot be separated from a certain image of masculinity. Discus Thrower (Discobolus) shows the athlete in a contrapposto position, about to launch his discus but straining in such a way that we see each flexed muscle. Critics have noticed that the athlete appears calm—more posed than in “motion.” Discus Thrower was probably constructed first as a frontal relief so that the back was carved out later. The same procedure was probably followed in the production of a bronze statue (circa 460 B.C.) found off Cape Artemisium, Greece, depicting either a god or an athlete (again, the difficulty in identification results from the widespread popularity of the nude male body). As with Discus Thrower, the Artemisium javelin thrower’s chest displays no muscular response to the action of the arms and could thus belong to a quite static figure.

Another ancient sculpture of importance for a discussion of sport is Apoxyomenos, or “man scraping himself.” The existing work, a marble statue of a life-size nude man with arm extended, is probably a copy of a bronze statue (circa 330 B.C.) attributed to Lysippus. If complete, the figure would have been holding a strigil—a long, thin scoop that athletes used to scrape themselves off after exercise. Thus, although this statue does not represent sport per se, it does provide information about the more mundane attention to the body associated with physical culture in the ancient world.

It is difficult to view these canonical classical bodies without considering the homoeroticism of the entire culture of the gymnasium—the tutelage of young boys by older men that was so central to the organization of social relations in Greece. As the nude male body tends to disappear over time from Western aesthetics, especially with the privileging of oil painting over other forms, the classical body becomes a more problematic and perhaps disturbing theme. The supernatural powers of the athlete are replaced by a more bourgeois conception of leisure time that also finds the reclining, inviting, sexualized female body as the object of a male gaze. In some narratives, sport is also a means of defining and ordering social groups. Only rich, well-born Greeks competed in the early games, setting the cultural paradigm for Western representational practices linking status with physical well-being. Women also participated in sports in antiquity, although they were banned from the Olympic Games. The figure of Atalanta, the mythological virgin huntress, was known for her expert skills as a runner, and she is represented in sculpture, vase painting, and other forms. Nevertheless, the figure of the athlete is most closely associated with masculine values, especially as it is imitated in later, neoclassical art.

Sport can be a social equalizer. In Iliad, even the last-place charioteer receives a prize (not as prestigious as those bestowed to the winners of various events), signifying the importance of sport as a safety valve for social tensions rather than a purely competitive struggle to eliminate individuals. The palio races in medieval and Renaissance Italy that are represented, for example, on the walls of the Schifanoia Palace in Ferrara helped a community come to terms with its various classes and their interactions. Young men of noble distinction always came in first, and the most marginal social groups (prostitutes and Jews in the Ferrarese work) kept to the rear. The frescoes, painted for the d’Este family of Renaissance nobility, could not provide a more seamless account of how an entire community is ranked.

Pre-Columbian society played pelote (similar to jai alai), which was seen by Spanish colonizers as occupying an ambiguous position between ritual and sport, a distinction that would not have surfaced within the indigenous culture in such clearly oppositional terms. Representations of the ball players were often carved in bas-relief or statuary with a full frontal, full-body image holding the ball. A Mayan vase from the Charles W. Bowers Museum in Santa Ana, California, is inscribed with a mythological god playing with a hard rubber ball in the underworld. The focus of the composition is on the body and its musculature and on the playing apparatus itself. No other figures are present, implying the importance of sport for the exercise of the individual body over the element of competition. It is difficult to say whether such a representation constitutes an aesthetic category in the way that the athlete does within Greek culture, and any attempt to define its value as either ritualistic or merely representational would only repeat the binary structures imposed on the culture by its “civilized” observers.

In addition to being a social marker, sport can be a marker of time. During the Middle Ages in the West, pagan traditions from Islam and Rome interacted with events of the Roman Catholic church calendar for periodic games, including jousts, ball games, bearbaiting or bullbaiting, forms of billiards and bowling, and hunting. Tournaments and other events were organized by feudal lords and the clergy, either as aristocratic pastimes or as organized social activities for the general population. But the idea of regularly scheduled calisthenic movement for the masses was still inconceivable until the gradual increase in leisure time brought on by the Industrial Revolution. Thus, throughout the early modern period, the representation of sport (often interchangeable with notions of the game) often takes one of two forms: either a portrait of nobility or a social catalog or, in the case of a distinctive work like Pieter Bruegel the Elder’s Children’s Games, a broad metaphor in which the uselessness of games represents moral decrepitude but within the narratological tradition of the catalog.

During the early modern period, sport was often included as part of the education of a noble boy, and various manuals demonstrate body position or technique. An important fencing manual of the sixteenth century, Federico Ghislieri’s Regole di molti cavagliereschi essercitii, illustrates proper body position against geometric charts, vectors, and angles. Richly illustrated, the treatise follows Aristotelian theoretical principles of movement. Indeed, the tradition of utilizing visual aids for physical combat dates to the wrestlers at Beni Hasan, Egypt (2050 B.C.).

Like fencing or boxing, hunting is important to the self-representation of the elite classes. A princely hunt scene from a Shiraz manuscript of India shows the central figure (the prince) engaged in a duel, wielding his spear from atop a horse. The mul-figured scene is typical of representations from a variety of cultures. In the West, the noble on horseback is a subgenre of portraiture in which both the rider and the horse display common aristocratic stances. The upper class also saw itself mirrored in “leisure” activities of spectatorship: Jean-Léon Gérôme’s Pollice Verso (Thumbs Down), a late-nineteenth-century oil painting, renders a bloody battle of Roman gladiators witnessed by a well-to-do audience in contemporary dress. There is a clear equation made in this work between the “nobility” of upper classes and the antiquity of ancient athletic practices.

With the birth of mass leisure and the rise of the middle classes, sport finally takes on the physiognomy of pastime. To the degree that the bourgeoisie lives as a reflection of (degraded) noble values, this is merely an appropriation of long-standing representational codes by a wide segment of the populace. In particular, gymnastics comes to embody the new body of the middle class. As an aesthetic code, this activity imitates the neo-classical, aristocratic, muscled body, but now its lines are not quite so attenuated, nor is it quite so stiff or perfected in its motions. Then again, this middle-class body, represented in mass culture in various poses (e.g., skiing, swimming, diving, ice-skating, and stretching), will be filtered down into a working-class ideal, thickened at the waist in fascism, and desexualized. A poster for a diving exhibition from the Soviet Union includes images of identical, perfect, degendered bodies in a “totalitarian” formation. But we should add a cautionary note: These forms of sport in art officially commissioned by modern political regimes do not necessarily correspond with working-class practices themselves. Activities such as pub sports, gambling, betting on horses, and bowling are not necessarily part of any artistic canon, nor do they find specific, codified cultural paradigms. On the other hand, contemporary mass culture, especially various forms of advertising, abounds with elements of the sporting body, and this is true over a wide spectrum of ethnic and national boundaries.

In the context of American painting, George Bellows’s striking fight scene Stag at Sharkey’s (1909) takes liberties with realism but captures the savage brutality of the ring. When criticized for his loose attention to anatomy and musculature, Bellows was quoted as saying, “I don’t know anything about boxing. I’m just painting two men trying to kill each other.” Although born in the Midwestern United States, Bellows was trained at the New York School of Art, and this work exemplifies rough-minded realism rather than classical ideals of the body in motion.

In modernism, there seems to be an inevitable link between sports and nationalism that was finally crystallized in fascist and totalitarian physical education policies. For example, in countless representations from the 1920s and 1930s, individual bodies lose their identities to a formation. Nazi propaganda of mass rallies, photography of sporting events, and so on enter the mass cultural vocabulary. We might conclude, finally, that the modernist and totalitarian revival of the classical body in this context produces a new aesthetic but one that inevitably mimics sports from the ancient world and so raises troubling questions about the centrality of athletic activity to any cohesive social group (and thus even to a liberal democracy). In Italy, the futurists were very interested in the “pure motion” of sport. Works such as Umberto Boccioni’s Dynamism of a Cyclist capture the athlete in the midst of his activity.

Alexander Archipenko’s The Boxers, a bronze cubist sculpture, reflects the ancient practice of reducing sport to a representation of ideal, harmonious muscular effort. This piece was sculpted during Archipenko’s “golden section” phase. Along with other cubists, Archipenko belonged to a movement that sought a return to the pure and harmonious measurements of antiquity. As a theme, then, sport transcends the beauty of pure motion and forces the viewer to consider the supremacy of the body in its possible relation with divinity or sublimity.

This notion of sport transcendent is finally codified in the heroization of the demiurgic athlete, such as American basketball star Michael Jordan, with his image emblazoned on a wide variety of media, from T-shirts to billboards, which are so dominant in current visual culture. Called “Air Jordan” for his ability to “float” around the basket, Jordan is routinely deified in print advertisements and commercials that either exaggerate his actual physical capabilities or simply represent his body in motion as an ideal and associated with a product on the market.

See also Hunting/Hunter/Huntress; Naked/Nude

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Lion Hunt, bas-relief, ninth century B.C., Ninevah, Assyria, North Palace of Ashurbanipal

Kleitias, François Vase, Attic black-figure krater, circa 575 B.C., from Chiusi, Italy, now in Florence, Italy, Museo Archeologico

Figure of a Running Girl, bronze, circa 550–520 B.C., from Prisrend, Yugoslavia, now in London, British Museum

Myron, Discus Thrower (Discobolus), bronze sculpture, Roman copy after Greek original, circa 450 B.C., Rome, Museo Nazionale Romano

Apoxyomenos, marble sculpture, Roman copy after Greek original, circa 330 B.C., Vatican

Wrestling Group, Hellenistic sculpture fragment, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Apollonios of Athens, Seated Boxer, bronze, circa 50 B.C., Rome, Museo Nazionale Romano

Mayan Vase, A.D. 550–950, Santa Ana, California, Charles W. Bowers Museum

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Velázquez, Diego, Portrait of Gaspar de Guzman (on horseback), painting, circa 1634, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Nineteenth Century

Katsushita Hokusai, Wrestlers, sketch, 1814–1815

Gérôme, Jean-Léon, Pollice Verso (Thumbs Down), painting, 1872, Phoenix, Arizona, Phoenix Art Museum

Twentieth Century

Luks, George, The Wrestlers, oil on canvas, 1905, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Bellows, George, Stag at Sharkey’s, oil, 1909, Cleveland, Ohio, Cleveland Museum of Art

- Bellows, George, Both Members of This Club, oil on canvas, 1909, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Gleizes, Albert, Football Player, oil on canvas, 1912–1913, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
- Gill, Eric, Boys Boxing, sculpture, 1913, London, Tate Gallery
- Archipenko, Alexander, The Boxers, bronze sculpture, 1914, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Milwaukee Art Museum
- Bellows, George, Dempsey and Firpo, oil on canvas, 1924, New York, Whitney Museum of American Art
- Klutsis, Gustav, Spartakiada Divers, colored paper, collage, photomontage, and gouache on cardboard, Riga, State Art Museum of Latvia
- Young, Mahonri, Middleweight (Enzo Fiermonte), bronze, circa 1929, location unknown
- Shahn, Ben, Handball, tempera on paper, 1939, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Further Reading

- Achenback-Kosse, Marion, “Die Ringergruppe in Florenz,” Antike Kunst 32 (1989)
- Angelo, Sidney, “Sixteenth-Century Italian Drawings in Federico Ghislieri’s Regole di molti cavagliereschi essercitii,” Apollo 140 (November 1994)
- Arts Council of Great Britain, British Sporting Painting: 1650–1850, exhibition catalog, London: Arts Council of Great Britain, 1974
- Baillie-Grohman, William Adolph, Sport in Art: An Iconography of Sport, London: Ballantyne, 1919
- Baker, William J., Sports in the Western World, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988
- Briers, Audrey, Sporting Success in Ancient Greece and Rome, Oxford: Ashmolean Museum, 1995
- Carvallo, Jose Deustua, “Soccer and Social Change in Early Twentieth Century Peru,” Studies in Latin American Popular Culture 3 (1984)
- Decker, Wolfgang, Die physische Leistung Pharaos, Cologne, Germany: Deutschen Sporthochschule Köln, 1971
- Dinhofer, Shelly, The Art of Baseball, New York: Harmony, 1990
- Gennies, Lilo, Kurzweil und Ritterspil, Essen, Germany: Blaue Eule, 1986
- Guttman, Allen, “Faustian Athletes? Sports as a Theme in Modern German Literature,” Modern Fiction Studies 33:1 (Spring 1987)
- , Games and Empires: Modern Sports and Cultural Imperialism, New York: Columbia University Press, 1995
- Kennedy Galleries, New York, American Sports and Sportsmen: Paintings of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, exhibition catalog, New York: Kennedy Galleries, 1968
- Kühn, Peter, Sports: A Cultural History in the Mirror of Art, London: Gordon and Breach, 1996
- Montreuil, Thierry, “Sport et Théâtre: Histoire de Mimétisme?” Avant-Scene Théâtre 824 (February 1988)
- Robinson, Basil William, Persian Paintings in the John Rylands Library, London: Sotheby Parke Bernet, 1980
- Sports et Jeux dans l’art Précolombien du Mexique*, exhibition catalog, Paris: Euros, 1968
- Sport in Art from American Museums*, exhibition catalog, New York, 1990
- Sport in der Kunst*, exhibition catalog, Munich, Germany: Bruckmann, 1972
- Titley, Nora, Sports and Pastimes: Scenes from Turkish, Persian and Mughal Paintings, London: British Library, 1979
- Tyler, Martin, editor, Encyclopaedia of Sports, London and New York: Marshall Cavendish, 1975
- Zingg, Paul J., editor, The Sporting Image: Readings in American Sport History, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1988

SUBLIME

David D. Nolta

The following genres and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Sublime:

LANDSCAPE: RENAISSANCE

LANDSCAPE: SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH
CENTURIES

LANDSCAPE: NINETEENTH CENTURY

FIGURAL WORKS:
RENAISSANCE

FIGURAL WORKS:

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

FIGURAL WORKS:
NINETEENTH CENTURY

Gian Lorenzo Bernini, The Ecstasy of St. Teresa, 1647, sculpture, Rome, S. Maria della Vittoria, Cornaro Chapel. (Courtesy of Alinari/Art Resource, New York)

The term sublime is most commonly used in the adjectival sense to describe natural or man-made wonders of noble or exalted character that arrest the sight of, and inspire awe in, the viewer. However, to determine and explore an iconography of the sublime, it is also helpful to consider the word's more technical, scientific connotation: a verb meaning to purify a solid by heating it to its gaseous state, then recondensing the vapor. The following discussion consequently takes into account not only sublime art—art that is or represents what is powerful and awe-inspiring, a highly subjective topic—but the art of the sublime—art that deals with the confrontation of the physical world, especially the tangible human body, with the spiritual world, with death, and with God, a confrontation that, whether it results in purification or destruction, inevitably leads to a complete human transformation.

The most celebrated discussion of the sublime in ancient times is found in a treatise traditionally ascribed to the Greek rhetorician and philosopher Longinus, whose origins are vague and controversial. Peri Hupsous (early first century A.D., On the Sublime) deals almost exclusively with locating the sublime in literature and identifying those qualities that make the works of Homer and the Greek dramatists worthy of the term. For Longinus, these qualities are summarized as “an eminence and excellence in language,” and an effect of ecstasy rather than persuasion. Although Longinus's On the Sublime does not specifically address the visual arts, the general ideas of his writings were extracted and applied to the visual arts by considerably later European, and especially English, writers during the Enlightenment's revival of ancient critical methods and concerns. It is to these eighteenth-century writers that we owe our modern conception of the sublime in the visual arts, and of sublimity as a criterion for regarding the visible world.

What Longinus is to the classical idea of the sublime in literature, Edmund Burke is to the modern idea of the sublime in art. Like its ancient prototypes, Burke's Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (1757) is a fairly theoretical text. It contains numerous references to classical literature, William Shakespeare, and John Milton. In addition, Burke further isolates and examines individual components of the natural world—for instance, light and color—and their role in producing a sublime vision in the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture. For example, generally speaking, monumentality and shadow increase the sublime element in architecture, as do somber or dark colors and vast perspectives in painting. The result of these numerous, detailed postulates is not, however, a general formula for the creation of sublime works of art, which ultimately depends upon the presence of genius. Nevertheless, in his attempt to elucidate the differences between the sublime and the beautiful, and in associating the former with magnificence, drama, darkness, and terror, Burke at once summarized and shaped much of the eighteenth-century response to the Italian Renaissance and post-Renaissance art so idolized by his countrymen during what was the age of “the grand tour.”

Many of Burke's contemporaries and followers were also interested in issues of the sublime in art, most notable among them being the writer Horace Walpole and the first president of the Royal Academy, Sir Joshua Reynolds. From the writings of these and others arose a concept of artistic sublimity based upon the physical magnitude of the work, the physical magnitude of the subject represented, the grandeur of the artist's conception, the dramatic richness of the representation, and the skill in its execution. For example, the monumental works of Michelangelo, whose virtuosity had long since rendered them divine in the eyes of his commentators, became perfect specimens of the sublime.

Gradually, however, the term sublime came to be used predominantly, if not exclusively, in reference to an unofficial school of landscape painting, the father and most brilliant exponent of which was Salvator Rosa, a seventeenth-century painter from the south of Italy whose name became synonymous with the sublime. In any of a large corpus of landscapes attributed to Rosa, all the properties of the sublime landscape can be seen: dark and threatening skies, windblown and blasted trees, unquiet seas, ruined castles, jagged rocks, and the gaping black jaws of caves. Above all, these scenes evoke an ever-present sense of danger, whether from the storm clouds, from the banditti (bandits) who lurk in the middle ground, or from some source outside the picture frame.

Rosa had a great number of copyists and followers in Italy and abroad, most of whom followed, without significant variation, the master's formulas for the sublime landscape. Rosa also had a profound influence on later landscape artists of the highest originality and merit. The true heir to the genius of Rosa, and the culmination of two centuries of sublime landscape painting, was the nineteenth-century English artist Joseph Mallord William Turner, who in fact considered himself the rival of the great seventeenth-century landscape painters, particularly Claude Lorrain. In works such as The Slave Ship (1840), which depicts the barbarism of sailors on board a ship trapped in a violent storm at sea, Turner captures the inexorable rage of nature. Here again are the elements of the traditional sublime landscape—the dark sky and seas, the wind, and the danger—but utterly transformed into a scene of unprecedented magnitude and drama. In numerous depictions of storms and avalanches, Turner explored the possibilities of the sublime landscape, and he remains the greatest practitioner of the genre in modern times.

Several of Turner's scenes of natural disasters allude, at least nominally, to biblical events such as the Flood. This is also true of the visionary paintings by Turner's fellow Englishman, John Martin. In a work such as Martin's Belshazzar's Feast (1820), the viewer is confronted with a panorama of architecture and nature that functions as an active backdrop to a scene of divine retribution. The Old Testament was especially rich in literary images long considered sublime and therefore worthy of translation into large-scale paintings and sculptures. In particular, Genesis and the Book of Job provided Burke and numerous other writers and artists, most obviously William Blake, with examples of, and inspiration for, visions of the confrontation between human beings and their maker in the infinite spaces of the newly created world. (St. John and John Milton were also natural sources.) Of course, Blake wasn't a landscape painter, but the absorption of the sublime by the landscape genre was very much an incomplete eighteenth-century phenomenon.

The most important feature of the art of the sublime, which is a constant, whether the work is a landscape painting or a monumental figural sculpture is the participation of a divine force. The presence of a Creator, acting through, or interchangeable with, the powerful forces of nature, is assumed in the landscapes of the sublime from Rosa to Turner. The confrontation between human beings and God, whether on a personal or apocalyptic scale, has been one of the great concerns of Western artists since primitive times, particularly those of the late Renaissance and Baroque periods. Examples of the sublime in art prior to the formalization of theories on the subject in the eighteenth century can be found in the works of such masters as Titian and Correggio. Correggio, in his celebrated mythological paintings The Rape of Ganymede and Jupiter and Io (circa 1532), both now in Vienna, Austria, depicted intimate encounters between gods and mortals. In each case, the emotional reaction of the human being is a complex mixture of fear and pleasure. In the expression of Io, especially, the artist has successfully depicted the ecstasy that is, according to Longinus, the effect of a sublime experience.

In the Ovidian tale of Jupiter and Io, the maiden Io is ultimately transformed into a heifer by her union with the king of the gods, Jupiter. When viewed in this sense, as the destruction or transformation of a human being as a result of an encounter with the divine, the sublime experience can be understood as life's climactic experience, irrevocably altering both body and spirit. This is, of course, as much the subject of Turner's The Slave Ship as it is of Correggio's mythologies.

The artist most interested in, and renowned for, depicting such experiences was the Italian Baroque sculptor Gian Lorenzo Bernini. The Ecstasy of St. Teresa (1647), and even more subtly The Death of the Blessed Ludovica Albertoni (1674), combine all the elements of the sublime: from the encounter of a mortal creature with God—present by proxy in the angel of The Ecstasy, and invisible but unmistakable in the facial expression and electrified draperies of the dying Ludovica—to the seeming infinitude of space and time in which the mystical events occur. Bernini's work can be seen as the culmination of the art of the sublime, insofar as it both successfully portrays human beings immersed in sublime experiences and reproduces the sublimity of the vision or interaction for the external observer.

Like Rosa's monumental works of nature, or the paintings of later artists in which natural wonders are represented, the effect of Bernini's sculptures is, to borrow from Longinus on the speeches of the great orators, "like a lightning flash" that reveals "at a stroke and in its entirety" the genius of the artist.

Although the illustration of experiences traditionally identified as sublime decreases throughout the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, it is possible to extend our conception of the sublime in art to include much of the modern art, whether abstract or surreal, that seeks to address and explore the spiritual, the supernatural, and the human relationship to the divine that is the essence of the sublime.

See also Apocalypse; Ecstasy

Selected Works of Art

Landscape: Renaissance

Leonardo da Vinci, Landscape with a Storm in the Alps, drawings, circa 1503

Landscape: Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Rosa, Salvator, Landscape with the Finding of Moses, circa 1650, Cincinnati, Ohio, Art Museum

Poussin, Nicolas, Winter, from the Four Seasons, 1660–1664, Paris, Louvre

Peeters, Bonaventura, A Shipwreck off the American Coast, circa 1648

Ruisdael, Jacob van, The Jewish Cemetery, circa 1670, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Ruisdael, Jacob van, The Portuguese-Jewish Cemetery, St. Oudekerk, 1660–1670, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Art

Rosa, Salvator, Landscape with Soldiers and Hunters, before 1673, Paris, Louvre

Wilson, Richard, The Destruction of Niobe's Children, circa 1760–1761, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Wright, Joseph, of Derby, An Eruption of Mount Vesuvius, Seen from Portici, oil on canvas, 1774–1776, Aberystwyth, University College of Wales

Wright, Joseph, of Derby, Eruption of Mount Vesuvius with the Procession of St. Januarius' Head, circa 1778, Moscow, Russia, Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts

Volaire, Pierre-Jacques, Eruption of Mount Vesuvius in 1771, 1779, Rouen, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Landscape: Nineteenth Century

Vanderlyn, John, View of Niagara Falls, 1803, Albany, New York, Albany Institute of History and Art

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, The Shipwreck, 1805, London, Tate Gallery

Koch, Joseph Anton, Schmamadribach, 1808–1811, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Snow Storm: Hannibal Crossing the Alps, 1812, London, Tate Gallery

Willis, George B., Niagara, 1816, Toronto, Ontario, Royal Ontario Museum

Turner, Joseph Mallord William, The Field of Waterloo, 1818, London, Tate Gallery

Martin, John, Belshazzar's Feast, 1820, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum

Friedrich, Caspar David, Arctic Shipwreck, 1824, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle

- Cole, Thomas, Landscape Composition, Saint John in the Wilderness, 1827, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Atheneum
- Pratt, Henry Cheever, Moses on the Mount, 1828–1829, Shelburne, Vermont, Shelburne Museum
- Cole Thomas, The Subsiding of the Waters of the Deluge, 1829, Washington, D.C., National Museum of American Art
- Turner, Joseph Mallord William, The Slave Ship, 1840, Boston, Massachusetts, Museum of Fine Arts
- Martin, John, The Great Day of His Wrath, 1851–1854, London, Tate Gallery
- Hamilton, James, Last Days of Pompeii, 1864, New York, Brooklyn Museum
- Innes, George, Niagara Falls, 1893, Washington, D.C., Hirshhorn Museum

Figural Works: Renaissance

- Correggio, Jupiter and Io, circa 1532, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum
- Michelangelo, The Last Judgment, 1535–1538, Vatican, Sistine Chapel

Figural Works: Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

- Caravaggio, The Conversion of St. Paul, 1601, Rome, S. Maria del Popolo
- Lanfranco, Giovanni, The Ecstasy of St. Margaret of Cortona, circa 1618–1620, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Pitti
- Rosa, Salvator, The Temptation of St. Anthony, circa 1645–1649, Florence, Italy, Palazzo Pitti
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, The Ecstasy of St. Teresa, sculpture, 1647, Rome, S. Maria della Vittoria, Cornaro Chapel
- Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, The Death of the Blessed Ludovica Albertoni, 1674
- Jones, Thomas, The Bard, 1774, Cardiff, National Museum of Wales
- Loutherbourg, Philip James de, Visitor to an Ancient Churchyard, 1790, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale Center for British Art
- Blake, William, illustrations for Urizen, color printed relief etching, finished in watercolor, 1794–circa 1795

Figural Works: Nineteenth Century

- Blake, William, illustrations for Jerusalem, line engraving, circa 1804–1820

- Blake, William, illustrations for Book of Job, pen and watercolor, circa 1805–1806
- Friedrich, Caspar David, Monk by the Sea, 1809, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Schlösser, Gärten und Seen
- Blake, William, illustrations for Dante's Divine Comedy, chalk, pencil, pen, and watercolor, 1824–1827
- Briullov, Karl Pavlovič, The Last Day of Pompeii, oil on canvas, 1830–1833, St. Petersburg, Russia, Russian Museum
- Brown, Ford Madox, Manfred on the Jungfrau, 1839–1840, Oxford, Ashmolean Museum

Further Reading

- Burke, Edmund, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Crowther, Paul, The Kantian Sublime: From Morality to Art, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989
- de Bolla, Peter, The Discourse of the Sublime: Readings in History, Aesthetics and the Subject, Oxford: Blackwell, 1989
- Manwaring, Elizabeth Wheeler, Italian Landscape in Eighteenth Century England, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1925
- McKinsey, Elizabeth, Niagara Falls: Icon of the American Sublime, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985
- Miller, Angela, The Empire of the Eye, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1993
- Monk, Samuel Holt, The Sublime, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1935
- Paley, Morton D., The Apocalyptic Sublime, New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1986
- Prickard, Arthur Octavius, translator, Longinus on the Sublime, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1930
- Salerno, Luigi, Salvator Rosa, Milan, 1963
- Weiskel, Thomas, The Romantic Sublime, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976
- Wilton, Andrew, Turner and the Sublime, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1980

TEMPTATION

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Temptation:

ODYSSEUS

AENEAS

ADAM AND EVE

DAVID AND BATHSHEBA

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST

TEMPTATION OF
ST. ANTHONY

TEMPTATION TO RICHES

LITERARY THEMES

SECULAR TEMPTATION

Martin Schongauer, St. Anthony Battling with Demons, late fifteenth century, engraving, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Gift of Mrs. W. Scott Fitz and Duplicate Print Fund. (Courtesy Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Temptation is that which tempts or tries a person's desires and character. We see the crux of the matter in the immortal words of Oscar Wilde: "I can resist everything except temptation. . . ." (Lady Windermere's Fan, act II). One person's temptation might be another's salvation. Everyone's temptation is different, but there are major temptations we all share, such as those to power, wealth, acceptance, sensuality, knowledge, control, and pride.

In classical literature, the temptation is often love or ease. The heroes are tempted to give up their larger mission. This, of course, is very male oriented. The battle, the voyage, or the mission is all-important, and this is appropriate for a society dominated by the masculine values that created such sagas as Iliad, Odyssey, and Aeneid. In Odyssey, temptation is presented in the form of the beautiful nymph Calypso, with whom Odysseus dallies until recalled by Athena, the goddess of wisdom, to his mission (Odyssey, Book V). In a similar manner, his men are tempted to a life of slothful ease and pleasure in the land of the lotus-eaters until Odysseus recalls them to their duty (Odyssey, Book IX). Circe as temptress lures men by their sensual appetites and then turns them into swine in Book X of Odyssey, until Odysseus forces her to return them to their rightful forms so they can get on with their voyage. The temptation to give up a mission or take the easy way out was one that a male-dominated society could not tolerate. A similar temptation occurs in Book IV of Virgil's Aeneid when Aeneas wants to stay in Carthage with Dido, but Zeus, the king of the gods, calls him to his duty to found Rome (stanza 35), leaving Dido to immolate herself on a funeral pyre.

The earliest biblical temptation story precedes the Fall of Adam and Eve in Genesis 3. Here Eve is tempted by the serpent to eat the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge (traditionally an apple but not named as such in the account) and to pass the fruit on to Adam. After they have eaten, they realize that they are naked, so they make aprons of leaves and hide when God appears in the garden. Their disobedience is recognized when Adam says that they hid because they were naked, and God replies, "Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?" (Genesis 3:11). Adam then blames Eve, who in turn says that the serpent made her do it, a scene perfectly embodied in early Christian art on the relief of the bronze doors of Bishop Bernward on the Church of St. Michael's in Hildesheim, Germany (1015), where God points accusingly at Adam, who points at Eve, who points down to the serpent.

A twelfth-century relief of Eve by Gislebertus at the Cathedral of Autun in France shows Eve undulating through foliage like a serpent, making her the tempter, not the serpent. The blaming of woman as a symbol of the flesh responsible for the world's ills is not exclusive to Christianity; it occurs also in Buddhism, Hinduism, and other religions. Psychological literature accounts for it as part of the Oedipus complex (the prohibition of the father to the son against annexing the mother) and as a projection of a person's desires onto the object desired, thereby blaming the object as temptation rather than one's own desires.

The temptation in Genesis has provided innumerable artists with an important visual theme, among them Albrecht Dürer in an engraving of Adam and Eve; Michelangelo on the Sistine Chapel ceiling in the Vatican; Lucas Cranach in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston; Titian in the Prado in Madrid, Spain; Peter Paul Rubens in the Mauritshuis in The Hague, The Netherlands; and countless illustrations for the Bible.

In 1504, Dürer made an engraving of the first man and woman in Eden before the Fall. Both were intended to show the acme of God's creation: Adam, standing on the left, modeled after Apollo Belvedere, the most esteemed example of classical male grace from antiquity, and Eve, facing him in profile on the right, intended as an example of perfect female-figure proportions. The serpent, wound around the tree in the center of the composition that divides the pair, gives an apple to Eve while Adam holds a partially eaten fruit. Around the pair four animals—a cat, an elk, a hare, and an ox, symbols of the four humors or temperaments of humanity—indicate that all of Adam and Eve's descendants are implicated in the temptation and Fall. This version of temptation contrasts with Dürer's two oil panels of Adam and Eve, painted four years later. Here, both figures are shown frontally, the serpent and tree on Eve's side on the far right and Adam holding an untouched apple on a branch. This pair indicates a change in Dürer's ideal of perfect human proportions, as they are more slender than the engraved figures, with a ratio of around nine heads to body length instead of the earlier eight. The later Adam and Eve have more Germanic features and coloring and seem to float rather than stand firmly on the ground, as in the earlier engraving. The overall effect seems more Gothic than Italian Renaissance, perhaps even protomannerist. Placing the serpent on Eve's side seems to reflect blame on her for temptation rather than on both, as implied in the earlier version.

Other occasions of temptation in the Old Testament and Apocrypha present women as temptresses, as in the episode of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, painted by Rembrandt van Rijn and other artists. In the account of Susanna and the Elders in the Apocrypha, Susanna, although clearly a victim, represents Temptation, as does Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite, whom David sees bathing on the roof. As told in II Samuel 11 and 12, David, tempted by seeing the unaware Bathsheba, sends for her. When she becomes pregnant by him, he tries to recall her husband Uriah home from the war. However, Uriah does not cohabit with Bathsheba and is returned to the thick of battle, where he is killed. David then takes Bathsheba as one of his many wives.

The tempting figure of Bathsheba bathing appears in various compositions and interpretations. The mannerist painting of Cornelisz. van Haarlem, Bathsheba in the Bath (1694), ignores the text and sets the scene in a landscape. The nude Bathsheba appears in three-quarter view on the right, contrasting with a black female nude next to her and the back view of another nude on the left, all seated at a tiled pool. Here, the biblical story served only as a pretext to show contrasting female nude figures and poses. Rubens's treatment painted in 1636 shows a semidraped blonde woman at a fountain; a Moorish page brings her David's message on the right. In Rembrandt's Bathsheba (1654), the letter is the focal point of the scene. Bathsheba, shown nude in three-quarter view on the right, is having her feet washed by a kneeling maid on the left as she meditates on the letter that has just arrived; her expression is thoughtful and melancholy. At least two of Rembrandt's followers essayed this theme from very different perspectives. Willem Drost's Bathsheba (1654) depicts a half-length, partially draped nude looking out at the viewer with a distinctly seductive gaze. Nicolaes Maes's Bathsheba (circa 1655) shows the woman in a landscape, next to a fountain rather than on a roof (as in the biblical account) and nude from the rear and reading the letter from David. A tree behind appears to bear fruit—a possible reference to the temptation in the Garden of Eden.

Artemisia Gentileschi's David and Bathsheba (circa 1640–1645) presents a completely different pose and setting. Here, the partially draped Bathsheba is shown frontally in three-quarter pose, slightly to the right of center in the foreground, before a balustrade. A kneeling maid on the left holds a silver basin with water as Bathsheba turns to the right to look at the necklace her maid is displaying. In the distant background left, David watches Bathsheba from the balcony of a classical palace while a maid behind and to the left of Bathsheba prepares to hand her his letter. The right background, an elegant park, is the work of Domenico Gargiolo; the background architecture is the work of Viviano Codazzi. Gentileschi reserved her talent for the main figural work. As this is a daytime scene, bright light accentuates the figure of Bathsheba, the back of the kneeling maid, and the figure of the maid on the right, who is dressed in elegant gold and light blue. The figures are more slender than in Gentileschi's early work, with small heads in proportion to body length and more classical restraint of emotions. Here, we see the setting for temptation before Bathsheba is even aware of David's intentions, her seminude body vulnerable as well as beautiful. She is clearly not an obvious temptress but more of a victim of events over which she has no control.

In the New Testament, the account of Christ's temptation in the wilderness appears in Matthew 4:1–11, Mark 1:13, and Luke 4:1–13. Here, the devil presents three classic temptations to Christ, who is fasting 40 days and 40 nights in the desert. First, the devil asked Christ to prove he was really the son of God by transforming stones into bread for food—a real temptation to Jesus, who was hungry. Jesus answers, "It is written, man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matthew 4:4). Second, the devil took him up to the pinnacle of the temple and said, "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone," but Jesus replies, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God" by compelling him to perform a miracle to show his own power (Matthew 4:6–7). Finally, the devil shows Jesus all the kingdoms of the world that will be his if he will worship the devil. Jesus replies, "Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve" (Matthew 4:10).

Luke reverses the last two temptations, which seems a more correct account, as temptation to worldly wealth and power might be less than the temptation to prove divinity. In art, the temptation of Christ appears in the eighth-century Book of Kells in the Trinity College Library in Dublin, Ireland, and in works by Duccio (a totally black devil framed against a gold background in the Frick Collection in New York), Botticelli (Sistine Chapel in the Vatican), and Tintoretto (Scuola di S. Rocco in Venice, Italy), among others. The contrast between the Duccio Temptation and that of Tintoretto is extreme. Duccio's Temptation, part of the Maestà Altarpiece in the Cathedral in Siena, Italy, is in an iconic Sienese style and shows Christ on the right above a stylized landscape, flanked by angels, sternly pointing to a retreating black devil on the left. Tintoretto, on the other hand, playing with extreme lights and darks, shows the devil as a crouching, insidious tempter in the dark shadows.

Another temptation of Christian tradition is the temptation of St. Anthony. Anthony was a rich young Egyptian of the fourth century who gave up his life of wealth and ease to live in the desert as a hermit. Fed by a raven that brought a loaf of bread every day, Anthony resisted multiple temptations by devils. The temptations of a holy man by demons excited artists' imaginations, inspiring them to portray all types of devilish forms. An astounding engraving by Martin Schongauer in the late fifteenth century has the saint being lifted into the sky by grotesque demons who pull his hair, robe, and hands and beat him with cudgels. The demons have strange animal faces, and many have insectlike bodies—the northern imagination represented in its darker aspects. The hallucinatory quality of the saint's ordeal externalizes his inner demons and possibly echoes the reptilian and insect life of the desert.

A similar grotesque rendering of St. Anthony tempted by multiple demons appears on a wing of Matthias Grünewald's Isenheim Altarpiece in the Musée Unterlinden in Colmar, France, with an added element of brilliant, discordant color. The Temptation of St. Anthony that Gustave Flaubert saw at the Palazzo Balbi inspired him to write his Temptation of St. Anthony between 1845 and 1872. In turn, Flaubert's book inspired a number of artists to give their own version of the subject, among them Félicien Rops, in the Bibliothèque Albert 1er in Brussels, Belgium; Fernand Khnopff in a private collection in Brussels; and Odilon Redon, who produced three print cycles. The young Paul Cézanne painted The Temptation of St. Anthony (circa 1870) in the Foundation E. H. Bührle Collection in Zurich, Switzerland, in which the saint in the background is almost invisible among the nude women who tempt him (perhaps more a portrait of Cézanne's temptations than St. Anthony's). By the nineteenth century, temptation by women had replaced the horrific demons of the Gothic imagination.

Another temptation mentioned in the Bible is the temptation of riches. It occurs in the gospels of Matthew (19:20–24) and

Luke (18:21–25), who tell the story of the rich young ruler who could not give up his wealth when Jesus asked him to sell all he had and follow him. George Frederic Watts beautifully realized the story before 1904 in a painting in the Watts Gallery in Compton, England, that shows an opulently dressed young man turning away sorrowfully, “For he had great possessions” (Matthew 19:22). Jesus went on to point out in Matthew 19:23 and Luke 18:25, “It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.”

This theme is continued in I Timothy 6:7–10: “For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil.”

In literature, the theme of temptation has been prominent, from The Confessions of St. Augustine to the present. William Shakespeare made it a motivating force in Measure for Measure, when the Duke’s deputy Angelo is tempted to lust by the pleas of Isabella to save the life of her brother Claudio, imprisoned for fornication. It is especially ironic that the very sin that Angelo condemns in Claudio becomes his own temptation in act II, scene II, and in act II, scene IV, when Isabella returns the next day to plead for her brother’s life. Angelo says he will remit the sentence if Isabella, a novice in a convent, will yield her body to his desires. Here, an element in the nature of temptation is revealed to suggest that we repress consciously or unconsciously in ourselves the temptations we most condemn in others, or as T. S. Eliot, paraphrasing Charles Baudelaire’s preface to Les Fleurs du Mal, puts it in The Wasteland, “You! Hypocrite lecteur!—mon semblable—mon frère!” (l. 76). (You! Hypocrite reader—my mirror image—my brother!). William Holman Hunt’s painting Claudio and Isabella (1850–1853) depicts Claudio’s temptation to save his life at the expense of his sister’s chastity in Measure for Measure. Here, the options and temptations are clearly spelled out. Claudio, in chains on the left, stands before a window opening to a sunny landscape, a symbol of life and freedom. His sister, in nun’s white robes on the right, reacts with grief and horror to his plea to sacrifice herself for his life, her hands on his chest as he moodily fingers his manacles.

Shakespeare uses Othello’s temptation to jealousy by Iago as the motivating element of his play Othello. Succumbing to this temptation, Othello kills Desdemona and then commits suicide, destroyed by suspicion from within and by temptation from without.

Another secular temptation appears in seventeenth-century Dutch art in representations of the procuress, or brothel proprietor. Here, the image of sexual temptation is very clear, as in Dirck van Baburen’s Procuress (1622) in which a jolly and obviously available lady plays a lute on the left as the cavalier in the center looks longingly at her and an old hag on the right holds out her palm, insisting on a fee. Jan Vermeer’s early work The Procuress (1654) is a little more subtle, with a fully clothed and bonneted lady on the right being fondled by an admirer with a hat askew who hands her a coin while the procuress in black on his right looks on eagerly. An elegant gentleman with slashed jacket and lace collar on the far left looks at the viewer knowingly, as if to invite us to enjoy the spectacle. Vermeer’s painting, unlike the quiet interiors of his later scenes, is influenced by the low-life subject matter of the Utrecht School, of which Dirck van Baburen was a member. Vermeer was an art dealer as well as an artist in later life and must have owned the van Baburen Procuress, which appears on the wall in Vermeer’s Concert (circa 1670).

Sexual temptation is the motivating force in Nathaniel Hawthorne’s novel The Scarlet Letter. The temptation lies in the minister’s relationship with Hester Prynne, although it is she who wears the scarlet letter of adultery. The temptation to avarice on the part of the miser dominates George Eliot’s novel Silas Marner. In the twentieth century, Nikos Kazantzakis’s novel The Last Temptation provides a new interpretation of the temptation of Christ. Obviously, there is no end to temptation.

See also Adultery; Choice/Choosing; Sin/Sinning

Selected Works of Art

Odysseus

Lairesse, Gerard de, Odysseus and Calypso, oil, circa 1690, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Böcklin, Arnold, Odysseus and Calypso, oil, 1869, private collection

Aeneas

Siene School, The Story of Dido, oil, fifteenth century, Avignon, France, Musée du Petit Palais
Francesco di Giorgio Martini, The Meeting of Dido and Aeneas, oil, circa 1480, Portland, Oregon, Portland Museum of Art
Claude Lorrain, Dido Showing Aeneas Carthage, oil, 1676, Hamburg, Germany, Kunsthalle
Turner, Joseph Mallord William, Dido and Aeneas, oil, 1814, London, Clore Gallery

Adam and Eve

Adam and Eve, bronze door, 1015, Hildesheim, Germany, Church of St. Michael Gislebertus, Eve, relief, twelfth century, Autun, France, Cathedral
Masolino, Temptation, circa 1425, Florence, Italy, Sta. Maria del Carmine, Brancacci Chapel
Della Quercia, Jacopo, Temptation, marble bas-relief, 1425–1438, Bologna, Italy, S. Petronio
Dürer, Albrecht, Adam and Eve, 1504, engraving
Michelangelo, Temptation and Expulsion, ceiling fresco, 1508–1512, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
Titian, The Fall of Man, oil, 1565–1570, Madrid, Spain, Prado Rubens, Peter Paul, Adam and Eve, oil, circa 1620, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

David and Bathsheba

Rubens, Peter Paul, Bathsheba, 1636, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Gemäldegalerie
Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, circa 1640–1645, Columbus, Ohio, Art Museum

Drost, Willem, Bathsheba, 1654, Paris, Louvre
 Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba, 1654, Paris, Louvre
 Maes, Nicolaes, Bathsheba, circa 1655, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Douves Brothers
 Cornelisz. van Haarlem, Bathsheba in the Bath, 1694, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Temptation of Christ

The Temptation of Christ in the Book of Kells, manuscript illumination, eighth century, Dublin, Ireland, Trinity College Library
 Duccio, The Temptation of Christ, oil and tempera on panel, circa 1308–1311, New York, Frick Collection
 Botticelli, The Temptation of Christ, fresco, 1481–1482, Vatican, Sistine Chapel
 Tintoretto, The Temptation of Christ, oil, 1577–1581, Venice, Italy, Scuola di S. Rocco
 Magnasco, Alessandro (Lissandrino), Christ Tempted by the Devil, oil on canvas, circa 1715
 Kokoschka, Oskar, The Temptation of Christ, oil, 1911–1912, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie

Temptation of St. Anthony

Schongauer, Martin, St. Anthony Battling with Demons, engraving, late fifteenth century, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts
 Grünewald, Matthias, The Temptation of St. Anthony, from Isenheim Altarpiece, oil on panel, circa 1515, Colmar, France, Musée Unterlinden
 Cézanne, Paul, The Temptation of St. Anthony, oil, circa 1870, Zurich, Switzerland, Foundation E. H. Bührle Collection
 Covert, John R., Temptation of St. Anthony, oil on canvas, 1916, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University, Art Gallery
 Ernst, Max, The Temptation of St. Anthony, oil, 1945, Duisburg, Germany, Wilhelm Lehmbruck Museum
 Dalí, Salvador, Temptation of Saint Anthony, oil on canvas, 1946, Brussels, Belgium, Musée Royaux des Beaux-Arts de Belgique

Temptation to Riches

Watts, George Frederic, The Rich Young Ruler or “For He Had Great Possessions,” oil, before 1904, Compton, England, Watts Gallery

Literary Themes

Hunt, William Holman, Claudio and Isabella (from William Shakespeare’s Measure for Measure) oil, 1850–1853, London, Tate Gallery

Secular Temptation

Baburen, Dirck van, The Procuress, 1622, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts Vermeer, Jan, The Procuress, 1654, Dresden, Germany, Staatliche Gemäldegalerie

Further Reading

Baker, Kenneth, “Temptation,” Art Forum 29:2 (October 1990)
 Campbell, Joseph, The Hero with a Thousand Faces, second ed., Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968
 Carter, David, Rembrandt and His Pupils, Raleigh: North Carolina Museum of Art, 1956
 Clark, M., “The Many-Layered Imagery of Max Beckmann’s Temptation Triptych,” Art Quarterly N. S. 1 (1978)
 Comer, C., “David Teniers’ Temptation of St. Anthony Paintings,” Allen Memorial Art Museum Bulletin 33 (1975–1976)
 Daniel, Howard, Encyclopedia of Themes and Subjects in Painting, New York: Abrams, 1974
 Eisenman, Stephen, The Temptation of St. Redon: Biography, Ideology, and Style in the Noirs of Odilon Redon, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1992
 Garrard, Mary DuBose, Artemisia Gentileschi, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989
 Gerson, Horst, The Art of Rembrandt, Boston: Little, Brown, 1966
 Harris, Ann Sutherland, and Linda Nochlin, Women Artists, 1550–1950, New York: Knopf, 1976
 Homer, Odyssey, translated by E. V. Rieu, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1970
 Malraux, André, The Temptation of the West, translated by Robert Hollander, New York: Praeger, 1961
 Oakes, Wayne Edward, Temptation: A Biblical and Psychological Approach, Louisville, Kentucky: Westminster, 1991
 Panofsky, Erwin, The Life and Art of Albrecht Dürer, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1971
 Pierre, José, L’Univers Symboliste, Paris: Somogy, 1991
 Slatkes, Leonard Joseph, Dirck van Baburen, Utrecht, The Netherlands: Haentjens, Dekker and Grumbert, 1965
 ———, Vermeer and His Contemporaries, New York: Abbeville, 1981
 Trapp, Joseph Burney, “The Iconography of the Fall of Man,” in Approaches to “Paradise Lost,” edited by C. A. Patrides, London: Edward Arnold, 1968 de Vries, Ary, and Rene Huyghe, Dans la lumière de Vermeer, Paris: P. Tisne, 1948

TOILET SCENES

Diane Apostolos-Cappadona

The following periods and iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Toilet Scenes:

ANCIENT AND CLASSICAL
RENAISSANCE

SEVENTEENTH AND
EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

NINETEENTH AND
TWENTIETH CENTURIES

BATHSHEBA AT THE BATH
SUSANNA AT THE BATH

Toilet of Queen Kawit, Eighteenth Dynasty, bas-relief from the Queen's Burial Chamber in the Funerary Temple of Monthuhotep-Nebhepaire, Deir el Bahri, Thebes, Egypt, Cairo, Egyptian Museum.
(Courtesy of Max Hirmer)

The topos of the lady's toilet (or toilette), found throughout the history of Western art, derives from the classical theme of the hieros gamos (sacred marriage), which was a common aspect of all world mythologies. The sacred marriage of the primordial earth mother to the sky father, or that between the gods and goddesses of the mythological pantheon, is a prefiguration of the earthly marriage of men and women. The primordial hieros gamos of the earth mother and the sky father explained the creation of the fertility of the Earth and, thereby, its sustenance of human life. The classical prototype of the toilet scene evolved from the Egyptian toilet of Hathor. As the Egyptian goddess of love and joy, Hathor protected women and presided as deity over the bridal toilet.

The common elements found in the topos of toilet scenes in Western iconography are a beautiful young woman, usually partially nude, with long flowing hair (possibly being combed or dressed either by the woman herself or by her maidservant), a mirror, hairdressing implements, ointment jars and perfume bottles, jewelry, cosmetic jars and brushes, flowers and/or fruits, a little dog or cat, and a maidservant. All of the toilet scenes with these elements have a direct relationship to Western cultural interpretations of being female and to the initiation of a virginal young girl into womanhood, especially in the theme of the bridal toilet.

The depiction of a physically beautiful young woman, especially in a state of partial nudity, suggests the female generative powers and the cycle of human procreation. Most often, the young woman is seated either looking at her reflection in the mirror, combing her hair, or arranging her jewels, flowers, or makeup. She is "lost in her thoughts," signifying, if this is a bridal toilet, her preoccupation with her impending initiation into womanhood through sexual intercourse or, if this is simply a woman at her toilet, her anticipations of sexual pleasure and/or the conception of a child.

All of the aforementioned common attributes of the toilet scene have symbolic values, the most significant of which are the mirror and hair. Like all symbols, the mirror has ambiguous properties. It can signify the absolute or "naked" truth, thus leading to the classical adage that the mirror does not lie. In classical Mediterranean mythology, the mirror was an attribute of prudence as a sign of self-knowledge. As an artificial organ of sight, the mirror can be identified with the five human senses; as an instrument of self-absorption, as in the myth of Narcissus, it can signify the vices of pride, vanity, and lust. The mirror is also a universal symbol for the reflection of one's soul, thus leading to the superstition of mirrors as "soul catchers." A common element in the burial chambers of most Egyptians (not simply women) was a mirror placed in close proximity to the head, a sign of solar power, especially in terms of the reproduction of life (the Egyptian word for "mirror" was the same as the word for "life"). By the Middle Kingdom (2000–1786 B.C.), an elaborately decorated mirror was a necessary part of a woman's funeral dowry as a central element in the ritual toilet of Hathor (and thereby of the newly dead woman's initiation, if not preparation, for her new life). In a similar vein, Celtic women prized their personal mirrors and were regularly buried with them.

Hair is a controversial and multivalent symbol. At its most common level, hair signified life force, strength, and energy. Loose, flowing hair on a woman represented virginity and was a common attribute of virgin saints and brides. Throughout the mythologies of world religions (from the Egyptian goddess of procreation and birth Isis, to Cybele the goddess of nature of Asia Minor, to the Hebrew female demon Lilith, to the destructive Hindu earth mother Kali), there are consistent references to the ritual of the binding or unbinding of a goddess's or heroine's hair as an activation of cosmic forces of creation or destruction. Folk traditions have maintained the aura of hair combing or dressing as a way of "making magic"—even attributing it to a control of the weather. The tradition of hair as the repository of the soul supported the lovers' practice of giving a lock of hair as a love token. In Egyptian mythology, Isis's hair restored Osiris to life and protected her children from illness and evil. Similarly, the hair of mother goddesses was believed to be a talisman of protection, resurrection, and/or reincarnation. On the other hand, the disheveled tresses of witches were believed to be a source of magical incantations and negative energies. Thus, a woman's act of combing or dressing her hair before a mirror carries multivalent messages.

The hair-dressing implements refer to the symbolic properties of hair and to the sexual interpretations of this larger topos. In classical Mediterranean culture, courtesans elegantly coiffed their hair into elaborate designs with decorative elements such as jewels, flowers, and gold ornaments. Modest matrons covered their heads in public places, leaving the beauty and texture of their hair for their husband's personal pleasure, while youthful virgins wore their hair loose and flowing. Toilet scenes that present a woman with loose, flowing hair that is about to be (or is in the act of being) combed or dressed curiously combines the categories of virgin and courtesan.

The presence of a variety of jars and bottles for ointments, cosmetics, and perfumes heightens the sexual symbolism, for these varied fluids will presumably cover the woman's body as she caresses it, an implication of the desire for her lover's touch. Following the Egyptian interpretation, the jar as an attribute of Isis—a fountain of living waters—was a fertility symbol. From a Jungian perspective, jars and bottles as receivers and containers signify the feminine sexual nature.

The jewelry that rests on the toilet table or with which the woman is adorning herself, is an embodiment of spiritual qualities. Amulets that ward off evil and illness or aid in sexual pleasure and the conception of a male child might be found among the jewelry of a Mediterranean woman's toilet. Pearl earrings signified Aphrodite, the goddess of love and beauty, whereas coral or turquoise stones warded off evil. The presence of flowers or fruits signified the fecundity of the Earth and, by analogy, the fecundity of woman.

As a symbol of fidelity and a companion of Artemis, a little dog represented fidelity in love and marriage, while a cat as companion to Isis signified goddess worship (and by extension the adoration of woman). The maidservant engaged in the act of assisting her mistress at the toilet may be read as a sign of wealth and social position, a sign of the cultural practice of having a protectress chaperon an unsuspecting virgin, and may signify the role of the procuress, especially in the later, secularized depictions of the toilet of Venus (Aphrodite) or eighteenth-century boudoir scenes. In the most positive of readings of the toilet topos, the natural beauty of woman exceeds the radiance and value of the implements of the toilet—from her cosmetic brushes to her perfume bottles to her jewelry and flowers—the scene becomes a meditation on beauty, woman, sexuality, and fecundity.

The classical mythological paradigm for the topos of the lady's toilet is the toilet of Hathor. A very popular ritual during Egypt's Middle Kingdom, the toilet of Hathor was the source of the theme of a lady's toilet both in daily life and in funerary monuments. Given the popular persistence of the toilet of Hathor in Egyptian culture, it must have had indigenous precedents in folk traditions. The iconography of Aphrodite washing her hair can be read as a Greek variant of the toilet of Hathor and the indigenous folk tradition.

Originally an eastern Mediterranean deity, Aphrodite brought female nudity into Greek art as the visual and physical symbol of the powers of generation and fertility, as well as love and beauty. The sacred prostitute became an integral element in the worship of Aphrodite, and the ritual toilet of the young virgins and holy women was a religious act signifying the sacred power of sexual intercourse as a terrestrial equivalent of the hieros gamos. In her representations as Kore, Aphrodite became one of the three elements of the mother goddess along with Hera, the wife of the king of the gods, and Athena, the goddess of wisdom. In this triumvirate Hera signified motherhood and domesticity and Aphrodite as Kore eternal virginity by means of her ritual baths. As the toilet of Hathor was transformed into the toilet of Aphrodite (or Venus), it became humanized into the ritual of the bridal toilet.

The scriptural prototypes for the toilet are the images of Susanna at the Bath and Bathsheba at the Bath. The innocent matron Susanna is said to have walked one afternoon in what she believed was the privacy of her husband's garden to bathe. Sending her maid for her bathing and toilet items, Susanna contemplated the solitude of the garden. Once her maidservant returned with the necessary accoutrements, Susanna began her bath ritual in the quiet and privacy of the enclosed garden. Suddenly, the unsuspecting Susanna was accosted by two elders who threatened her with an unjust accusation of adultery unless she agreed to have sexual intercourse with them. In many of the artistic interpretations of Susanna at the Bath, such as those by Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese, there is a visual emphasis on her beauty ritual, including the objects of the toilet, such as perfume jars, ointment bottles, jewelry, a mirror, a comb, and flowers. The sexual implications of the toilet are heightened by the symbolism of the garden setting.

Bathsheba, said to have been espied by King David as she bathed, was ostensibly partaking of a mikveh (ritual bath) following the end of her monthly menstrual flow. As the mikveh is also a ritual bath for a bride and signifies her entry into womanhood (and by extension her preparation for the conception of a child), the sexual symbolism of the toilet is clear. Artistic depictions of this scene, including those by Rembrandt van Rijn in the seventeenth century, emphasize the toilet as an enhancement of a woman's natural beauty, such as the dressing of her hair or a pedicure. In these two scriptural themes of Susanna and Bathsheba, the motif of the toilet scene is represented by its identifiable iconographic elements, such as a mirror, perfume bottles, ointment jars, brushes, flowers, etc., and is expanded with the implication of ritual bathing of the body in preparation for sexual intercourse. These ritual baths are a referent to the bathing of Aphrodite by which she restores her youthful beauty and virginity.

A scriptural variant of the toilet scene is the conversion of the Magdalen. In these renderings, the Magdalen is depicted as a beautiful young woman with long, flowing hair who is seated before a mirror and the other iconographic elements of the toilet—including ointment and perfume bottles, jewelry, and hair brushes—scattered on the table and the floor. These traditional iconographic elements are enhanced, however, by the addition of vanitas (vanity) elements such as a skull or book that signifies her recognition of the transitory nature of human existence (and physical beauty) and the salvation afforded by Christianity. Caravaggio's Repentant Magdalene (1590s) is an example of this Christian variant of the toilet.

The medieval transformation of the toilet resulted in the secular representations of the bridal toilet such as Jan van Eyck's lost painting Toilet Scene, which is believed to have been a pendant to his famed Arnolfini Wedding (Portrait of Giovanni Arnolfini and Giovanna Cenami) (1434). From the presence of the necessary implements for the toilet, including the mirror, jugs, maidservant, and small dog, to the modest gesture of the female bather in covering her genitals in the manner of the Venus Pudica, the secularization of the sacred scene is complete.

During the Renaissance, the toilet topos returned to its mythological origins as the toilet of Venus once again became a popular theme. The master of this new Renaissance iconography was Titian, who created a new variant of this theme by adding the previously implied male lover, as in his Venus and the Lute Player (1562–1565). During the Reformation, this motif was included in the iconography of the morality prints of evil seductresses, which included Delilah, who betrayed Samson to the Philistines, and Judith, who saved the Jews by killing Holofernes. In the contemporary Spanish art of Diego Velázquez, however, the Renaissance revival of the toilet of Venus is taken to a new dimension in Toilet of Venus (The Rokeby Venus) (1657–1658) with the innovative use of mirror reflection and Venus's body postures.

In the rococo period, this theme was again transformed into the secular in the boudoir paintings made famous by Jean-Honoré Fragonard. All the necessary iconographic elements are present in these works, from the mirror to the cosmetic implements to the little dog, as a beautiful young woman is "lost in her thoughts." This iconography influenced and helped to popularize similar prints and engravings in antebellum American ladies' magazines and annuals and eventually found its way into the late nineteenth-century American motifs of the languid ladies of leisure and the theme of young love. In the twentieth century, the lady's toilet as a meditation upon female beauty and fecundity is renewed in Pablo Picasso's Girl Before a Mirror (1932).

In the transformations and evolution of the topos of the toilet from its sacred and ritual nature to secularized boudoir and love scenes, the unifying element remained the homage to female beauty. Like one of its central icons, the mirror, this topos has displayed the ambiguity of sacredness and secularity, sexuality and sensuality, reality and illusion, and vanity and contemplation.

See also Bath/Bathing; Female Beauty and Adornment; Hair/Haircutting; Marriage/Betrothal; Mirror/Reflection;
Vanity/Vanitas

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Classical

Toilet of Queen Kawit, bas-relief from the Queen's Burial Chamber, Funerary Temple of Monthuhotep-Nebhepaire, Deir el Bahri, Eighteenth Dynasty, now in Cairo, Egyptian Museum

Mirror of Queen Kawit, silver disk with obsidian handle with gold and electrum fittings, from the Queen's Burial Chamber, Funerary Temple of Monthuhotep-Nebhepaire, Deir el Bahri, Eighteenth Dynasty, now in Cairo, Egyptian Museum

Funerary Chest of Khai and Merit, painted wood chest, from Deir el Medinah, Eighteenth Dynasty, now in Turin, Italy, Museo Egizio

Turin Papyrus, illustration of a young girl with lotus blossom on her head, painting her lips, Twentieth Dynasty, Turin, Italy, Museo Egizio

Aphrodite of Melos, Parian marble, circa 160–140 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Aldobrandini Wedding, fresco, circa 29 B.C.–A.D. 20, Vatican, Biblioteca Apostolica

Bridal Casket of Secundus and Projecta, chased silver, partly gilded, circa A.D. 380, London, British Museum

Renaissance

The Love Spell, oil on wood, northern Renaissance, circa 1450–1500, Leipzig, Germany, Museum der Bildenden Künste

Eyck, Jan van (copy after), Woman at Her Toilet, fifteenth century, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum

Titian, Woman with Mirror, oil on wood, 1512–1515, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Titian, Young Woman at Her Toilet, oil on canvas, 1515, Paris, Louvre

Bellini, Giovanni, Young Woman at Her Toilet, circa 1515, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Titian, Venus of Urbino, oil on canvas, 1538, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Titian, Venus with a Mirror, oil on canvas, circa 1555, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Titian, Venus and the Lute Player, oil on canvas, circa 1562–1565, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
Clouet, François, Diane de Poitiers in Her Bath, oil on wood, circa 1571, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

School of Fontainebleau, The Lady at Her Toilet, circa 1590, Dijon, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

School of Fontainebleau, The Lady at Her Toilet, sixteenth century, Worcester, England, Worcester Art Museum

Caravaggio, Repentant Magdalene, 1590s, Rome, Galleria Doria Pamphili

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Dubreuil, Toussaint, The Lever and Toilet of a Lady, circa 1600, Paris, Louvre

Fontana, Lavinia, Minerva at Her Toilet, oil on canvas, 1613, Rome, Borghese Gallery

Gheyn, Jacob de, the Elder, Vanity, engraving, seventeenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Franco, Giacomo, Courtesan Being Groomed by a Maidservant, engraving, from Habiti delle donne Ventiane, seventeenth century, Venice, Italy, Biblioteca de Civico Museo Correr

Rubens, Peter Paul, Woman with a Mirror, oil on canvas, 1640, Kassel, Germany, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen

Mieris, van, Woman at Her Toilet, oil on wood, seventeenth century, Paris, Louvre

Velázquez, Diego, Toilet of Venus (The Rokeby Venus), oil on canvas, 1657–1658, London, National Gallery

Steen, Jan, The Morning Toilet, before 1679, London, Buckingham Palace

Boucher, François, Toilet of Venus, 1751, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Courbet, Gustave, Portrait of Jo, the Beautiful Irish Girl, oil on canvas, 1865?, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, Lady Lilith, oil on canvas, 1868, Wilmington, Delaware Art Museum

Degas, Edgar, Standing Nude at Her Toilette, lithograph, circa 1890–1892

Picasso, Pablo, Girl Before a Mirror, oil on canvas, March 14, 1932, New York, Museum of Modern Art

Bathsheba at the Bath

Memling, Hans, Bathsheba at the Bath, oil on wood, fifteenth century, Stuttgart, Germany, Staatsgalerie

Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, early 1640s, Columbus, Ohio, Columbus Museum of Art

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Toilet of Bathsheba, oil on wood, 1643, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Rembrandt van Rijn, Bathsheba at the Bath, oil on canvas, 1654, Paris, Louvre

Brülov, Karl, Bathsheba, oil on canvas, 1832, Moscow, Russia, Tetyakov Gallery

Susanna at the Bath

Tintoretto, Susanna, oil on canvas, early 1560s, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Tintoretto, Susanna, oil on canvas, circa 1575, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Jacopo da Empoli (Jacopo Chimenti), Susanna at her Bath, oil on canvas, circa 1600, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Rubens, Peter Paul, Susanna at the Bath, oil on wood, circa 1636–1640, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna at the Bath, oil on panel, 1637, The Hague, The Netherlands, Mauritshuis

Rembrandt van Rijn, Susanna and the Elders, oil on wood, 1647, Berlin-Dahlem, Germany, Gemäldegalerie

Further Reading

Allen, Virginia M., The Femme Fatale: Erotic Icon, Troy, New York: Whitson, 1983

Apostolos-Cappadona, Diane, “‘Susanna went into her husband’s garden to walk’: Reading the Gesture and Pose of the Female Body in Christian Art,” unpublished manuscript presented at the annual meeting of the

Mid-Atlantic Region of the American Academy of Religion, February 1992

Dijkstra, Bram, Idols of Perversity: Fantasies of Feminine Evil in Fin-de-Siecle Culture, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1986

Goodman-Soellner, Elise, “Poetic Interpretations of the ‘Lady at her Toilette’ Theme in Sixteenth-Century Painting,” The Sixteenth Century Journal 14:4 (1983)

Jones, Elizabeth, “Jan van Eyck’s Woman at Her Toilet: Proposals Concerning Its Subject and Context,” Fogg Art Museum Annual Report, 1974–1975, 1975–1976, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1976

Lawner, Lynn, Lives of the Courtesans: Portraits of the Renaissance, New York: Rizzoli, 1987

Moon, Beverly, editor, An Encyclopedia of Archetypal Symbolism, Volume One, Boston and London: Shambhala, 1991

Mullins, Edwin, The Painted Witch: How Western Artists Have Viewed the Sexuality of Women, New York: Carroll and Graf, 1985

Neumann, Erick, The Great Mother, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965

Onians, Richard, The Origins of European Thought, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1954

UPSIDE DOWN

Janice McCulloch

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Upside Down:

MEDIEVAL

NINETEENTH CENTURY

RENAISSANCE

TWENTIETH CENTURY

SEVENTEENTH AND

EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

Marc Chagall, Half Past Three (The Poet), 1911, oil on canvas, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art, the Louise and Walter Arensberg Collection. (Courtesy of the Philadelphia Museum of Art, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

Ours is not a topsy-turvy world. One of the constants we quickly acknowledge in the human experience is that from very early on we are vertically oriented in a gravity-controlled environment. Knowledge about the world is carried into expectations of imagery. The representation of people with their feet down and a ground line has a foothold in the pictorial dimension firmly rooted in the way we perceive. Depictions of an inverted world create a sense of disorientation. To be upside down, an awareness of the represented form as an inverted image must take place. With that recognition, the viewer may incorporate a feeling of disequilibrium. Artists appreciate this basic law of perception and have explored it.

The notion of upside down can be conceived of from various points of view. As a form of inversion, it is a principle found in many contexts. Literary, anthropological, and even musical ideas of the upside down carry meaning parallel to its expression in the visual arts. Upside down is defined here as a retinal disorientation of a top/bottom reversal, a literal inversion, or a rotationally symmetrical inversion of all or part of an image. Visually related themes, such as falling, floating, and acrobats, are linked to this definition of the upside down.

Upside down implies the opposite: right side up. Oppositions are sometimes viewed as reaching the point of contrast at a focal point where they are inverted, like rays of light. The letter X stands as a symbol of the principle of inversion. This structure reflects the process of seeing itself. Historical studies of optical science suggest that, as early as the tenth century, Arab scholars might have recognized that the eye receives an inverted image like that revealed by the camera obscura. Current studies in perception probe the scientific aspect of the process of perception through orientation studies, such as the use of reversing prisms (Dolezal). Upside-down imagery can be understood readily, but expectations require the viewer to first recognize the convention of uprightness and then to visually reorient the information, forcing a deliberate awareness of the process of perception.

Understanding the upside down as negative in connotation may go back farther than the inverted image itself. In ancient Egyptian texts that deal with the passage through death to resurrection, there are spells such as "Spell in order not to go upside down in the realm of the dead" (Zandee, p. 72). Ancient texts suggest that the Egyptian concept of the realm of the dead was as a domain on the underside of the disk of the Earth, where people walked with their feet against the ceiling. Going upside down belongs to the terrors of the West and was part of a whole complex of conceptions, "according to which one has not the normal use of the parts of one's body" (Zandee, p. 74). In contrast to going upside down is going on one's feet. Because this was the positive orientation, upside-down figures were not typically shown in art.

Greek iconography holds few occasions for upside-down imagery. The sea goddess Thetis dips her son Achilles upside down in the River Styx while holding his heel. The Cercopes are slung upside down on a pole and carried away by Hercules. Such figures are inverted within the scene as the narrative required.

More recently, Western European culture has a tradition of the notion of a realm of Antipodes, a region directly opposite the Earth where our world is mirrored. Antipodeans, meaning "opposite footed," were thought to live at the bottom of the world, and they had to walk upside down. Christians generally opposed such a notion as either geographically impossible or theologically unsound. St. Augustine denied that Antipodeans could exist. The revered Lactantius, whom Constantine chose to tutor his son, asked, "Can any one be so foolish, as to believe that there are men whose feet are higher than their heads, or places where things may be hanging downwards, trees growing backwards, or rain falling upwards?" (Boorstin, p. 107). The idea of Antipodeans appears in art and literature.

The topos of Mundus inversus is an ancient and widespread one, found very extensively in popular art and literature throughout Europe from classical times. It was a favorite subject for popular engravings: remarkably similar sets of illustrations of the world upside down appeared in England, France, Italy, Russia, Scandinavia, the Netherlands and elsewhere over a period of many centuries. The most common image in these illustrations is that of a global man, standing precariously on his head, and sometimes attended by a couple of jesters. (Donaldson, pp. 21–22)

This tradition represents role reversals between animals and men, men and women, or adults and children more often than figures that are literally upside down. The theme as expressed in broadsheets has been studied by David Kunzle in "World Upside Down: The Iconography of a European Broadsheet Type." He "examined about sixty distinct broadsheets spanning three centuries, from seven countries, nearly all of them carrying in the title the term World Upside Down, or its equivalent in other languages: Mundus Perversus, Mondo alla Rovescia, Monde à l'envers, Mundo al Revés, Verkehrte Welt, Verkeerde Wereld" (Babcock, pp. 39–94).

In the theatrical tradition, the comic play The Antipodes (1638) by Richard Brome was based on the idea that on the southern side of the globe manners and morals are exactly opposite. This play is considered possibly the first to present this Antipodean world as topsy-turvy. Subsequent examples suggest that Antipodeans not only walk upside down but, as geographic opposites, were also moral opposites (Donaldson). The world upside down often occurs in English tragedy, ballads, complaints, and satire, as in Ben Jonson's Time

Vindicated to Himself and to His Honours, where the revelers proclaim:

Let's have the giddy world turn'd the heeles upward,
And sing a rare blacke Sanctus, on his head,
Of all thing out of order.

Of the 22 principal tarot cards, two relate to the upside-down theme. These cards, whose origins go back to the fourteenth century, display The Hanged Man, a figure upside down, and the Wheel of Fortune. The Wheel of Fortune, the tenth enigma of the tarot pack, expresses the "equilibrium of the contrary forces of contraction and expansion—the principle of polarity. The wheel is set on the ocean of chaos. The two halves symbolize the constructive and destructive forces of existence" (Held). In the Wheel of Fortune, the image suggests that the figure of success is on top, "at the height of his power." The figure of misfortune or poverty is not only on the bottom but also upside down.

In Christian iconography, angels fall from heaven, and the inversion suggests the disorientation of moving from the orderly world of heaven to the chaos of the damned. Rebel angels often fall headlong into hell. Citizens who fall from the towers of a destroyed city or sinners, such as the embodiment of pride, also fall in inverted positions, which indicate their fallen nature. In the late Middle Ages in Italian cities, members of opposing factions were painted "hanging on the gallows or hanging head downwards and to add to the perpetual insult, their coats of arms were turned upside down" (Kris, p. 193). The most notable case of a Christian upside down is the apostle Peter at his crucifixion. He considered himself unworthy of being crucified in the same manner as Jesus Christ. Therefore, at his own request and out of humility, he was crucified upside down. St. Phillip and St. Bartholomew also are sometimes considered to have been crucified upside down.

The upside-down experience can be found ritually enacted during a carnival or at the circus. On such occasions, the rules of the world are inverted and gravity is defied. Fools' festivals and other such sanctioned rituals create an arena where acrobats and clowns become the embodiments of disorder, often comically turning somersaults, hanging, or walking upside down. Art often fulfills the role of visual circus. Edward Lear's Nonsense Botany (1871) presents an image of "Manypeeplia Upsidedownia." The experience of the inverted image is one in which recognition involves mental gymnastics. It takes a moment for the mind to do a somersault and accept the overturned world.

The state of looking at art upside down belongs most firmly to the tradition of modernism. It has developed in parallel with abstraction and as part of the self-referential tendency of modern art. By the early romantic period, critics noted that some paintings of the period had a tenuous relation to any object and that they could just as easily be looked at upside down. Stories of artistic upside downs abound in modern art. At a posthumous auction, Paul Gauguin's Breton Village in the Snow was displayed upside down with the title Niagara Falls and sold for seven francs (Le Pichon, p. 193).

The pedagogical practice of modern art incorporates the notion of the upside-down image. Teachers often turn a painting on its head to distance the student from the subject and force a strict view of the work as a formal composition. The viewer then sees the upside-down painted surface as design rather than subject. This mental distance is a kind of "forgetting" of the representational aspect and a fresh understanding of the painting as an abstraction.

This practice is given historic credence by Wassily Kandinsky's recollection of the development of his own art toward elimination of the object from painting:

I was enchanted on one occasion by an unexpected spectacle that confronted me in my studio. It was the hour when dusk draws in. I returned home with my painting box having finished a study, still dreamy and absorbed in the work I had completed, and suddenly saw an indescribably beautiful picture, pervaded by an inner glow. At first, I stopped short and then quickly approached this mysterious picture, on which I could discern only forms and colors and whose content was incomprehensible. At once, I discovered the key to the puzzle: it was a picture I had painted, standing on its side against the wall. . . . Now I could see clearly that objects harmed my pictures. (Lindsay and Vergo, "Reminiscences," pp. 369–370)

Kandinsky's now nearly mythic moment in the history of modern art underlines the skirting relationship that the state of being upside down has with abstract art. What Kandinsky experienced was a delayed recognition that allowed him to view the painting first as a play of color and form. This experience of gradual identification is similar to the experience he wished to re-create in his paintings of 1911–1912 using "veiled imagery." In his earliest "abstract" works, he often maintained a landscape conception, that is, a defined horizon. It was not until later, during the Bauhaus years (and then relatively rarely) that his nonobjective works might be seen as lacking definite vertical/horizontal orientation. Kandinsky was still often concerned with the meaning of the orientation of the abstract elements. Contemporary artists continue to pursue Kandinsky's exploration of nonobjective form. They seek also to expand the parameters of abstract concepts such as gravitational force and the power of horizontal and vertical orientation in the realm of geometric abstraction.

The generation of German expressionists influenced by Friedrich Nietzsche often saw gravity as an ultimate force to be overcome. Thus, acrobats and dancers were important subjects for those who heeded Nietzsche's invocation against gravity in Thus Spoke Zarathustra:

Lift up your hearts, my brothers, high, higher! And do not forget your legs either. Lift up your legs too, you good dancers; and better yet, stand on your heads!

Paul Klee responded by painting several works around the edges of the frame, for example, Night Flowers (1918), Landscape with Yellow Birds (1923–1932), and Ad Marginium (1930). Figures and forms are shown grounded on all four edges of the image so that some are sideways and those at the top "hang" upside down. In a sense, the composition becomes a mandala. Figures are upside down from a traditional point of view, but Klee plays with the idea of freeing the viewer from the power of gravity and making the viewer aware of the center of the composition as a pivot. Klee saw nature from a metaphysical point of view. These works might be interpreted as an expression of a "yearning to free ourselves from earthly bonds" (Klee, p. 66). In Accident (1939/LM 18), Klee shows the “exchange of the dimensions that govern our natural sense of up and down” (Klee, p. 40).

No discussion of the upside down in modern art can omit the works of Marc Chagall. Chagall’s imaginative paintings, such as The Poet (1911), invite us into a world where levitation and heads put upside down on figures express a joyous immunity from rules. Chagall’s is a fantasy world of gravity conquered, and the artist’s freedom from traditional orientation is suggested by this statement:

If, in a picture, I have cut off a cow’s head and put it on upside down, or occasionally even painted the whole picture topsy-turvy, I have not done so in order to make literature. I want to introduce into my picture a psychic shock, which always operates through pictorial factors, in other words to introduce a fourth dimension. Therefore let people cease talking about fairy tales, of the fantastic, of Chagall the flying painter, when they speak of me. I am a painter who is unconsciously conscious. (My Life, in Sorrell, p. 143)

Although his paintings often depicted traditional subjects, Chagall expressed a modernist attitude when he said, “Recognizable or unrecognizable what does it matter? Let’s have an exhibition where all the pictures are upside down, and then we’ll see.”

After World War I, Dada, as a movement, represents an aesthetic inversion whereby the world was perceived as so irrational that the only way to respond was with an acceptance of the irrational. During this period of drastic social upheaval, chance, irony, black humor, satire, and questioning the meaning of words were all responses to a world turned upside down. From this period, the film Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, with a plot of dreams and psychological reversals, gave birth to “Caligarisme,” meaning the world turned upside down. Artist Max Beckmann inverted figures in numerous works, such as Gallerie Umberto (1925) and Meeting in the Night (1928).

Modern art may seem a world overturned to many, and some artists have played the role of jugglers of the visual realm. M. C. Escher raised the art of visual order as confusion to a high art in his works. Many are visual inversions of a type, and in works such as Autre Monde (1947), the viewer seems to somersault in an attempt to become oriented to the view. One seems to look both up and down at a scene simultaneously. The image itself is not upside down, but our visual orientation to the spatial illusion is inverted as the eye scans the image.

One of the most talented of the neoexpressionist artists is the German Georg Baselitz, who after 1969 painted and presented paintings with the imagery “upside down.” In viewing a Baselitz painting, one’s initial response, on recognizing the subject, is that the work has been hung upside down. Critical comment and personal observation suggest that the fascination with his topsy-turvy world goes beyond the seemingly simple “trick” of representing people on their heads. Baselitz’s presentation of upside-down imagery reminds us that it is artists who often appreciate the disorder of things inverted. The “alienation effect” he said he wanted to achieve is there. Forms and figures hang suspended in brutal disregard of expectation. It is, after all, a painting. The viewer is forced to see the work in a new way. Baselitz reminds the viewer “that the sky at the top and the earth at the bottom is only a convention, but we don’t have to believe it . . .” (George Baselitz, p. 29). Motifs take on a detached distance when they are upside down. The figure is acknowledged abstractly, as the self-consciousness of looking and the self-parody implied with an inversion makes the viewer acutely aware of the “text as text.”

Following Baselitz’s lead, other contemporary artists have explored the power of the upside down. Bruce Nauman’s Perfect Balance (1989) and Bill Viola’s The Arc of Ascent (1992, a video-sound installation) remind us that we walk with our feet on the ground. In Viola’s large-scale video projected in a darkened room, a clothed figure is seen as if in free-fall: The figure is “projected as an inverted image so that descent becomes ascent. The body seems to defy gravity moving upward, when the image on the screen passes up and out of the room” (Documenta IX, p. 577).

Inversions of orientation have been perceived as disorder or freedom, as negative or positive. Until gravity-defying space travel becomes common, the disorientation of the upside down will continue to have power.

See also Artists/Art; Damned Souls; Hanging; Margins/Outsiders

Selected Works of Art

Medieval

Honnecourt, Villard de, Wheel of Fortune, drawing, circa 1240, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Renaissance

Limbouurg Brothers, Fall of the Rebel Angels, illuminated manuscript from Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berr, circa 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé (Ms. 65, fol. 65v)
 Masaccio, The Martyrdom of St. Peter, predella panel, 1426, Berlin, Germany, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
 Eyck, Jan van, Last Judgment, circa 1440, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art Bouts, Dirck, the Elder, Descent into Hell, before 1475, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Raphael, St. Michael Vanquishing the Demon, oil on canvas, 1518, Paris, Louvre
 Perino del Vaga, Fall of the Giants, fresco, circa 1529, Genoa, Italy, Palazzo del Principe
 Michelangelo, Crucifixion of St. Peter, fresco, 1545–1550, Vatican, Pauline Chapel
 Tintoretto, St. Mark Freeing a Christian Slave, oil on canvas, 1548, Venice, Italy, Accademia

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Damned, before 1640, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek
 Lairese, Gerard de, Thetis Dipping the Infant Achilles into the River Styx, before 1711, Potsdam, Germany, Sansouci, Bildegalerie
 Tiepolo, Giovanni Domenico, Scene of Contemporary Life: The Acrobats, drawing, circa 1791, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Nineteenth Century

- Vernet, Horace, Mazeppa, oil on canvas, 1826, Avignon, France, Préfecture, on loan to Musée Calvet
- Lear, Edward, The Complete Nonsense of Edward Lear, collected and introduced by Holbrook Jackson, New York: Dover, 1951
- Lear, Edward, Nonsense Botany, 1871
- Lear, Edward, Manypeeplia Upsidedownia, from Nonsense Songs . . ., London, 1871

Twentieth Century

- Chagall, Marc, Half Past Three (The Poet), oil on canvas, 1911, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Philadelphia Museum of Art, Louise and Walter Arensberg Collection
- Klee, Paul, Night Flowers, 1918, Essen, Germany
- Klee, Paul, Landscape with Yellow Birds, watercolor and gouache on paper, 1923–1932, Switzerland, private collection
- Lachaise, Gaston, Acrobat (Upside Down Figure), bronze sculpture, 1927, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University, Fogg Art Museum
- Beckmann, Max, Meeting in the Night, pastel on black paper, 1928, England, private collection
- Klee, Paul, Ad Marginium, watercolor and ink on card, 1930, Basel, Switzerland, Kunstmuseum
- Klee, Paul, Accident, tempera and crayon on white underpainting, 1939/LM 18
- Escher, M. C., Autre Monde, woodcut, 1947
- Jones, Allen, Figure Falling, oil on canvas, 1964, Cologne, Germany, Collection Ludwig
- Brown, Roger, Silly Savages (We Will Sell No Painting Before It's Dry), oil on canvas, 1983, New York, Malcolm Holzman
- Baselitz, Georg, Churches Right and Left—Jörg (Painters Cycle), 1987, Mary Boone and Michael Werner Gallery
- Baselitz, Georg, Edvard, 1987–1988, Mary Boone and Michael Werner Gallery
- Nauman, Bruce, Perfect Balance, Pink Andrew with plug hanging with T.V., 1989, Frankfurt, Germany, Museum für Moderne Kunst
- Viola, Bill, The Arc of Ascent, video-sound installation for a 3 x 7 meter projection screen, 1992

Further Reading

- Babcock, Barbara A., editor, The Reversible World: Symbolic Inversion in Art and Society, Ithaca, New York, and London: Cornell University Press, 1978
- Boorstin, Daniel, The Discoverers, New York: Vintage, 1983
- Calvocoressi, Richard, "A Source for the Inverted Imagery in Georg Baselitz's Painting," Burlington Magazine 127 (October 1985)
- Chagall, Marc, My Life, translated by Elisabeth Abbott, New York: Orion, 1960
- Documenta IX*, catalog, Stuttgart, Germany: Edition Cantz, 1992
- Donaldson, Ian, The World Upside-Down: Comedy from Jonson to Fielding, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1970
- Dolezal, Hubert, Living in a World Transformed: Perceptual and Performatory Adaptation to Visual Distortion, New York: Academic Press, 1982
- George Baselitz, Cologne, Germany: Benedikt Taschen Verlag, 1990
- Held, Julius S., "Gravity and Art," in Twenty-five Essays in Memory of Milton S. Fox (1904–1971), New York: Abrams, 1975
- Kris, Ernst, Psychoanalytic Explorations in Art, New York and London: International Universities Press, 1952
- Le Pichon, Yann, Gauguin: Life, Art and Inspiration, translated by I. Mark, New York: Abrams, 1987
- Lindsay, Kenneth Clement, and Peter Vergo, Kandinsky: Complete Writings on Art, Boston: Hall, 1982
- Lear, Edward, The Complete Nonsense of Edward Lear, collected and introduced by Holbrook Jackson, New York: Dover, 1951
- Sorrell, Walter, The Duality of Vision, New York: Bobbs-Merrill
- Spiller, Jörg, editor, Ways of Studying Nature in Paul Klee: The Thinking Eye, Notebooks of Paul Klee, London and New York: Lund Humphries, 1961
- Zandee, Jan, Death as an Enemy According to Ancient Egyptian Conceptions, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960

VANITY/VANITAS

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Vanity/Vanitas:

ARS MORIENDI

SKULL OR SKELETON AS VANITAS SYMBOL

BUBBLES AS VANITAS
SYMBOL

FLOWERS AS VANITAS
SYMBOLS

TOILET SCENES AS VANITAS
SYMBOLS

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS AS VANITAS SYMBOLS

PORTRAITS WITH VANITAS
SYMBOLS

STILL-LIFE VANITAS

FAME ACHIEVED THROUGH DEATH

EMBLEMS AND MEDALS
RELATING TO VANITAS

Hendrik Goltzius, Young Man Holding a Skull and a Tulip, drawing, 1614, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library. (Courtesy of the Pierpont Morgan Library)

Over the centuries the ephemeral nature of human experience has been expressed in many different artistic forms through the use of specific iconographic symbols: dance, hair, mirrors, and skulls or skeletons. In visual art, literature, and music, artists have celebrated the momentariness of life and the consequent compelling need to enjoy its pleasures with images, words, and specific musical notations. At the same time, whether fearful or accepting of a hedonistic emphasis on a joie de vivre—a violation of Christian tradition—artists consistently added memento mori (a symbolism with a didactic, moralistic, or damnatory message) to their representations, thereby imbuing them with diaphanous meanings. Centuries later these ambiguous meanings still intrigue viewers, readers, and listeners and contribute to the continued fascination with their study.

Vanitas (emptiness), or vanity, is considered to be a moral vice, one that alludes to the biblical warning omnia vanitas (all is vanity; Ecclesiastes 1:2). Vanity was initially conveyed in art by richness and wealth and through objects such as jewels, gold coins, purses, books, butterflies, exotic animals, flowers, hourglasses, wine glasses or pitchers, candles, crowns or scepters, clocks, swords, terrestrial globes, shells, and figures of death in the form of skeletons or skulls. The educated viewer knows that the sure sign a vanitas theme underlies a still life is the presence of a skull, the memento mori reminding us that we must die.

In medieval and Renaissance art the personification of vanity took on a human form, usually that of a nude woman, seated or recumbent, at her toilet, combing her hair, looking at the mirror, and adorning her hair and body with jewels and flowers. Dutch and Flemish painters of the seventeenth century glorified this subject in their still-life paintings, conveying a specifically Christian meaning through the use of objects, mostly familiar and everyday, as a disguised symbolism.

Medieval allegories representing the hierarchical order of the universe and personifications of philosophical concepts, virtues, the arts, the planets, and the estates or humors of the individual were available to northern European artists through printed books (such as Petrarch's Triumphs, Ovide moralise), emblem books (by artists such as Andrea Alciati, Hadrianus Junius, Roemer Visscher, and Jacob Cats), prints of antiquities (such as those of classical monuments, sculptures, coins), and playing cards (tarot). This medieval encyclopedia of images and meanings was an aspect of the humanist atmosphere of Renaissance art: the literary and scholastic revivals of antiquity provoked a fusion of symbols with various interpretations.

This study will analyze the visual sources and emblematic meanings for the depiction of the skull in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Dutch portraits: group, allegorical, and individual. Among the earliest representations of the skull in art (usually connected to a skeleton) are those known variously as the totentanz (or danse macabre), the ars moriendi, and the Dance of Death, usually seen as a response to the mass death scenes of the Black Death, or bubonic plagues, of the fourteenth century. These illustrations portrayed the medieval idea that all are equal before death. In the Dance of Death, individual skeletons are paired with their victims. The concept of pairing living figures with Death continued throughout the sixteenth century and into the seventeenth century.

There is a clear difference between the ars moriendi and totentanz (danse macabre). Ars moriendi (the art of dying) is related to a medieval collection of texts that were used by clergy attending the dying. The totentanz (danse macabre) differs from both ars moriendi and the Dance of Death described above. During the medieval period it was believed that the dead arose from their tombs at midnight and performed a dance in a graveyard before setting off to claim fresh victims from among the living.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries these themes, ars moriendi, totentanz (danse macabre), and the Dance of Death, along with texts that described contests of angels and demons over the human soul, became fused through the tradition of woodcut illustration. Examples of this fusion include Master S. I.'s Ars moriendi (1464), from a Netherlandish Latin text now in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, and Michael Wolgenut's Dance of Death (1493) from the Nuremberg Chronicle. Hans Holbein the Younger recorded many painted walls of cloisters and graveyards of the later Middle Ages in his engravings with representations of the totentanz (danse macabre). The illustrations usually show a procession marching or dancing to a grave, a row of figures from all social ranks organized in a hierarchical ladder of importance: the pope, the emperor, the cardinals, lesser ecclesiastics, persons of various occupations and ages, and finally peasants, all accompanied by Death.

Additional examples of ars moriendi can be found in sixteenth-century sculpture and emblem books, such as the anonymous northern European ivory sculpture Death (1547) in the Musée des Arts Décoratifs of Paris, in which a seated skeleton rests on its tomb with an hourglass, time having just passed away. Concurrently, Andrea Alciati's emblem Sepulchrum (1550) represents Death with a skull—rather than a skeleton—placed on a sarcophagus (Alciati and Daly).

During the sixteenth century, with few exceptions, complex representations of ars moriendi, totentanz (danse macabre), and the Dance of Death merged and transformed into a single image, the skull. Beginning at this time, the skull began to make solo appearances as a memento mori or vanitas symbol, directing the viewer's thoughts to the end of life and away from its vanities. The skull is an attribute of hermetic or penitent saints such as St. Francis of Assisi, St. Romuald, St. Mary Magdalen, and particularly St. Jerome, a reminder of the transitory nature of this life as opposed to the eternal life of the spirit.

Joos van Cleve produced two paintings of St. Jerome (1521), one which is located in a private collection and the other in the Fogg Art Museum of Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. St. Jerome, one of the four Latin fathers of the Church in the West, was known as Eusebius Hieronymus Sophronius in his early life. Born in about 347 at Stridon in Dalmatia, he was sent to Rome as a child and there studied Greek and Latin and became a reader of ancient literature. In 386 St. Jerome went to the Holy Land and settled in Bethlehem, where he learned Hebrew and translated the Bible into a Latin version known as the Vulgate. He also wrote many biblical commentaries, displaying a scholarship unsurpassed in the Roman Catholic Church, and kept an active correspondence with other Christians. Going to the Holy Land and the desert, he became a hermit. The skull, therefore, alludes to this intellectual and penitential life (Cross, 1984). Its position in the foreground of van Cleve's paintings testifies to St. Jerome's life of penitence, contemplation, and study as a preparation for death and eternal life. In this kind of religious imagery the skull is imbued with great meaning as a receptacle for life and thought. For this reason the skull often appears with books, representing the vehicle for transcendent ideas, from divine omniscience to human thought, and for transmutation of human life.

The pointing gesture of St. Jerome has a similar moralizing meaning. A finger pointing to the skull was viewed in connection with a soap bubble. An inscription on the arch above the niche, homo bulla (man is like a bubble), reinforces the meaning of the pointing gesture and reminds one of the transitoriness of life, as noted in the emblematic tradition. The symbolism of the floating bubbles derives from engravings and emblematic books from this period. Hadrianus Junius's emblem Et Tutto Abbraccio, Et Nulla Stringo (1565, I Embrace Everything, and Hold Nothing) shows many children trying to capture and hold floating bubbles. Hendrik Goltzius's engraving Quis Evadet/Nemo (1594, Who Escapes, No Man) also carries the message that humans are as fragile as a bubble.

A century later, in Gerrit Dou's St. Jerome (1660) in the Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen in Dresden, Germany, the penitent saint contemplates a skull while an hourglass counts down his mortality. In this version the skull is also a symbol of self-denial and contemplation proper to a hermit.

The drama of penitence is also represented by Mary Magdalene as a reformed sinner holding a skull as she ponders death and her past life. Jan de Bray, in The Penitent Magdalene (1670) in a private collection, depicts such a scene in extreme contrasts of light and shadow. The attributes of mortification (the cross, the books) appear with the young and fresh saint as she holds a skull, symbol of age, death, and decay. A large, dark brown area with a few pieces of vine silhouetted against a small section of sky suggests the interior of a cave, where according to legend the Magdalene spent her later life as a hermit.

In the Netherlands, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the representation of a skull not only retained a religious association with saints but also expanded into secular depictions such as portraiture. Individual and group portraits appear with the skull as a memento mori image or vanitas symbol; for example, Dirk Jacobsz's Portrait of Pompeius Occo (1531) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands. In the portrait a wealthy banker holds a carnation, symbol of humility and hope for eternal life, and rests his other hand on a skull, a sign of meditation and a symbol of mortality.

An interesting variation on this theme occurs when the figure holds a book or a scroll, with or without inscriptions, as a memento mori, such as in the portrait Kathryn Berake (circa 1580) in the National Gallery of Wales. Adrien van Cronenburg's Woman and Child (1587) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain, is a group portrait that includes a depiction of a skull and flower along with an Italian inscription in the post of the sepulchral niche, Nascendo/Morendo (Live and Die), reminding us of the ephemeral nature of life and earthly pleasures. The inscription in the niche may also allude to the relationship between mother and daughter: the mother's life continued through the birth of her daughter, a loving bond established until death. The clasped hands of mother and daughter next to the skull allude to love's bonds, marriages, and wedding anniversaries. Dutch marriage medals traditionally contained incisions of a handshake encircled by a heart and skull with a motto alluding to love and faithfulness until death. A Frisian marriage medal from the seventeenth century clearly illustrates this Dutch marital convention. Unfortunately, little is known about this particular commission. Adrien van Cronenburg's painting is inventive, as the depiction of a woman displaying a skull is rare in Dutch paintings, with the exception of religious paintings of Mary Magdalene—probably its derivation. Conventionally, the skull rested most often in male hands. As an aside, in comparing Kathryn Berake and Woman and Child compositionally and stylistically, it could be argued that the portrait Kathryn Berake should be attributed to van Cronenburg.

The skull's memento mori appearance in portraits and still lifes created two special genres called the vanitas portrait and vanitas still life, which were especially popular in seventeenth-century Dutch art. Still life derives from the Dutch word stilleven, which the Dutch began to use in 1650. Before that time they referred to such paintings as stilstaende dingen (still standing objects) or merely labeled their subject as ontbijt (breakfast). This essay will only focus on the vanitas portraits.

While the skull was the most obvious reminder of mortality in vanitas portraits and still lifes, other symbols, such as mirrors, musical instruments, butterflies, flowers, insects, or a snuffed-out candle also testified to the omnipresence of death. Dutch painter and biographer Carel van Mander notes how, in the early seventeenth century, the vanitas portraits became popular with the Amsterdam collectors Jacques Rozet and Reynier Antonisses, patrons of memento mori portraits such as the engraving after Abraham Bloemaert's Death's Dead (1600), now in a private collection, and Jacob de Gheyn II's Vanitas (1603) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Such vanitas portrait include biblical symbols of mortality, derived from Ecclesiastes 1:2, Vanitatum et omnia vanitas (Vanity of vanities; all is vanity). In The Golden Age (1984), art historian Bob Haak demonstrated how this biblical source helps to decipher the clavis interpretandi (key to interpreting) of vanitas painting.

In the middle of the seventeenth century other vanitas symbols joined the skull: crucifixes, clocks, candles, purses, coins, pipes, oil lamps, fruits, and hourglasses. Additional inscriptions expanded the moral messages reminding the viewer of the brevity of life: "Today me, tomorrow you." Along with the memento mori, pipes, skulls, and such emblems of vain folly as shells, timepieces, and the guttering of spent candles signified the transitoriness and emptiness of the material life. These paintings were often painted in somber colors to suggest an apocalyptic message and often incorporated bubbles (suggesting fraud, illusion) and smoking or a pipe (pipe dreams). The presence of insects, specifically flies, together with flowers, in these representations also reinforces the vanitas symbolism. Musical instruments and glassware were also used for emblematic purposes, indicating the brevity of life, as in Roemer Visscher's Sinnepoppen (1614) and Cats's Sinne-en-Minnebeelden (1627, Sense and Love Emblems). Cesare Ripa, in Iconologia (1593), refers to "human's hopes as fragile as glass."

This preoccupation with the meaning of life seen in vanitas portrait paintings was recognized by art historian and iconographer Eric de Jongh as a tendency to moralize, common to seventeenth-century mentality. In using realism, Dutch artists encouraged virtue and reminded the viewer of the transitoriness of life in contrast with death. The combination of the single portrait paired off with the vanitas still life became quite popular with Dutch artists. This theme of vanitas in portraiture parallels that of vanitas in still life painting. As a manifestation of the popularity of this theme, vanitas portraits were as costly as history paintings, about five guilders, whereas vanitas still life paintings varied in price from six to seven guilders (Segal, 1989).

From the early part of the seventeenth century, Dutch sensibilities veered toward an elaboration of the intricate details of objects and accessories. The clavis interpretandi of Dutch portraits in vanitas paintings depends in part on emblematic sources. Dutch seventeenth-century prose, poetry, drama, and emblematic literature were employed in allegorical fashion, where the moralizing meaning was implied, as Gerard Lairese has stated, "to promote virtue and shun evil." Visscher's first sinnepoppen (emblem) was "Nothing is empty or meaningless," emphasizing the symbolic meaning in simple objects or situations. The double entendre of many Dutch paintings can often be interpreted with the help of emblematic sources, particularly Cats's Sinne-en-Minnebeelden, a source of commentaries and moralistic explanations for the contemporary art historian. A Dutch artist could ensure that his audience understood these paintings by adding an explanatory text to the painting, as can be seen in vanitas paintings of the day. Common moralistic inscriptions included, but were not limited to, Vanitas vanitatum (Vanity, vanity, all is vanity), Memento mori, Sic transit gloria mundi (So passes away the glory of the world), and so on.

Another way for artists to clarify the moralistic intentions of their works was to incorporate, in the background of their paintings, the image of another painting with a message they intended. A third way for artists to reveal the clavis interpretandi in their paintings was to include certain objects that served as clues to the "disguised symbolism," as did the skull in Dutch vanitas portraits (Keyszlitz, 1957). Throughout the rise in popularity of Dutch portraiture, no matter what size or compositional mode one looks at, this "disguised symbolism" is present and can be seen in numerous portraits painted in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century, ranging from miniature to life-size, from individual to group portraits, and from indoor to outdoor settings. In sixteenth-century portraiture some symbols of mortality were traditionally added to the composition—a skull, a candle, a carnation, bubbles—as emblems to suggest hope for eternal life. The artist could express this hope by portraying the sitter with skull and objects or by portraying on the verso of the portrait another painting with a skull and other transitory emblems.

In vanitas portrait paintings, still-life objects make didactic points, because the objects were in daily use or were consumed by members of Dutch society. The Netherlands's growing empire, with its constant mercantile navigation to the East and the West Indies, accounts for the frequent presence of exotic seashells, fruits, and flowers in these paintings. Horticulture, particularly the cultivation of tulips, became a national mania. In The Embarrassment of Riches (1987), Simon Schama states that "the incorrigible habits of material self-indulgence that were ingrained into Dutch commercial life prompted all those warning judgments. This moral pulling and pushing might have made for the inconsistency" in the general modus vivendi. Apparently, the vanitas milieu imposed an opposite value system as a desideratum for Dutch society and gave the Dutch artist room to maneuver between the sacred and the profane.

The Haarlem and Leiden schools became very well known for portrait and vanitas paintings. The Haarlem school was renowned for its vanitas still life paintings, namely by William, Heda, and Pieter Claesz. The Leiden school was also known for its vanitas painters, namely David Bailly and Jacob de Gheyn II. In Haarlem, Jan Molenaer, who specialized in genre scenes, was one of the first painters of the new Commonwealth of the United Provinces. His group portrait painting Family Making Music (1660) in the Frans Hals Museum in Haarlem depicts the Molenaer family, his wife Judy Leyster, also a painter, portrayed in front of a virginal. The entire picture is filled with hints of mortality, from the skull seen in the ancestral portrait in the background to the bubbles blown by the boy in the foreground. (The concern for ancestral recognition has been known since Roman times; for example, the sculpture A Roman Patrician with Busts of his Ancestors, late first century B.C., at the Capitoline Museum in Rome.) The boy blowing bubbles in the painting parallels the young boy's action in Adriaen Poirter's engraving Vanitas (1649). In this work the personification Justice, a simulated sculpture standing in the niche behind the boy, contrasts puzzlingly with the lighthearted musical party that he attends. Does Justice refer to the occupational role of the standing militant figure, alluding to the legal turmoils of the family, or does Justice with the scales allude to the harmony of music portrayed in the painting, reinforcing the ideal notion of the harmony of a happy family?

The Leiden school developed a strong tradition of vanitas painting probably because of the theological ideas current at the university. In the Leiden school vanitas paintings, the focus is often on the justice of death. For example, Jacob de Gheyn II's engraving Mors spectra ligonibus aequat shows skeletons surrounded by vanitas symbols. The power of the crown is weighed against the peasant, but, as in the Last Judgment scene, death evens out any inadequacy of material existence; therefore, death is equal to all. Vincent van der Vinne's Vanitas with Portrait of Charles I (1600) in the Louvre in Paris comments on the vulnerability of power and royalty. The inscriptions generally imply "Things can change." Specifically, next to the skull an inscription states "Think about the end."

An interesting transformation takes place in the early seventeenth century, from portraits in which the sitter, holding a skull or surrounded by memento mori, dominates the composition to compositions that eliminate the sitter entirely and substitute only the skull with other vanitas symbols. In the middle and late seventeenth century, the portrait of the sitter returned, included as part of an allegory of vanitas.

Bailly's Vanitas with a Portrait of a Young Painter (1651) in the Municipal Museum de Lakenhal in Leiden, The Netherlands, typifies seventeenth-century Dutch vanitas portraits. This type of portrait (a self-portrait) combines elements derived from group portraiture (with the inclusion of ancestors) with allegorical portraiture and the fusion of vanitas still-life elements. The young artist pays homage to his ancestors by holding a portrait of his father and displays an inventory of vanitas emblems—books, a candle, coins, a mirror, a pipe, wilted flowers, glass objects, an hourglass, jewelry, sculpture, drawings, paintings, and musical instruments—within the composition. The skull at the feet of the statue of the flagellated Christ provides the vanitas motto and three floating bubbles allude to the brevity of life.

The symbolism of the floating bubbles derives from emblematic books and engravings of this period such as Goltzius's Quis Evadet/Nemo (1594, Who Escapes/No Man) and Crispin de Passe's Vanitas (early seventeenth century). Engravings after Maerten de Vos, such as de Passe's Vanitas, also echoed the message that man is as fragile as a bubble. Bailly's particular depiction of the bubbles is similar to a portrayal by Cornelis Ketel in Portrait of a Man (1574) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. The tondo recto of this painting shows a portrait of the sitter holding a pocket watch; on the verso a putto blows bubbles and an inscription in Greek reads "Man is a soap bubble." Similarly, in Bailly's drawing Vanitas (1624) in the Royal Library in The Hague, The Netherlands, a skull is accompanied by an hourglass and a pipe. The skull alludes to the motto "Today me, tomorrow you," and the smoking pipe suggests the "ashes to ashes" of the biblical warning "For my days are consumed like smoke" (Psalm 102:3), as is noted in Visscher's Sinnepoppen.

Flowers are another vanitas symbol included in compositions to attest to the brevity of human existence as defined in Job 14:1–2. Art historian Susan Kuretsky notes that tulips became a favorite emblem of human mortality in vanitas still-life paintings, such as Jacob de Gheyn II's Vanitas (1603) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Vanitas portrait paintings also assimilated the memento mori symbolism of tulips, as illustrated in Goltzius's Young Man Holding a Skull and a Tulip (1614). This reading is supported by the emblematic tradition of Cats's Houwelijk (1658) and Visscher's Sinnepoppen, in which an emblem of a tulip with the motto "A fool and his money are soon parted" uses a typical association of the tulip with worldly folly. Similarly, roses and petals with drops of dew are symbols of short-livedness, also attesting to human frailty, as described by Ripa in his Iconologia under Vita Breve (Brief Life). Ripa's emblem book was a readily available source in the Netherlands in the early seventeenth century, one which proposed that objects represent the ephemeral pleasure of success; only faith, tradition, or ancestorship can provide eternity. Hendrick Hondius's engraving The End Crowns the Work (1626), suggests that even an artist can achieve fame and immortality only through death.

Molenaer's Woman at Her Toilet, or Allegory of Vanity (1633), in the Art Museum in Toledo, Ohio, is yet another example of an allegorical vanitas portrait. The painting shows a young woman gazing into her mirror while a young boy blows bubbles. Innocence, contrasted with the spectrum of worldly knowledge—flirtations, innuendo, ambiguity, and light moral guidance—is reflected in this vanitas painting. An engraving by Adrien Poirters (1649) parallels the young boy's action in Molenaer's painting and recalls Cats's moralizing poem: "Attend to the child that blows bubbles, / And see how much he is amazed, / That so much blown up froth and slobber, / Endures but so brief a phase." In The Embarrassment of Riches Schama associates the floating bubbles with the concept of speculum fallax (the bubble speculation), a philosophical reference to the world's deceit as "the empty reality of the ephemeral orb." In Molenaer's painting, the youth of the child is compared to the beauty of the young woman. Their ephemeral and careless natures are paralleled by the attributes they hold (the scallop-shell bubble catcher and the mirror), and by their actions (the child's levity and the woman's reflection in the mirror). They are surrounded by several objects that symbolize the sin of superbia (pride): the comb, the long hair, the mirror (used similarly in Hieronymus Bosch's Superbia, circa 1500). The reflection of the mirror and the gazing at the mirror by the beautiful woman are narcissistic aspects of youth. The action of combing hair alludes to Visscher's emblem Purgo et Ornat (It Cleans and It Beautifies) and suggests the incorrigible fickleness of youth, as the comb itself reinforces the symbolism of the mirror: vanity. Traditionally, a depiction of unbound hair suggests a woman of easy virtue, which recalls Mary Magdalen. Finally, the musical instruments displayed on the wall allude to the sweetness of music evocative of the sweetness of lovemaking. Cats's moralizing poem and emblem also clearly make this point: the easiness of lovemaking and music playing is as temporary as the nature of beauty and youth.

A more intimate variation on the theme of a woman at her toilet appears in Jan Steen's Morning Toilet (1663) in the Royal Collection in London, signed and dated on the columns it portrays. Mixing the comic with morality, Steen provides a combination of insightful allusions. The richness of the colors and the attractiveness of the young woman are contrasted with the memento mori strewn on the threshold, a disarrayed decor that conveys a message opposite that of Johan de Brune's emblem The Marriage Bed Should Be Unstained from Emblemata of zinnewerk (1614). The brevity of casual love is inherently paralleled by the brevity of youth and beauty. A musical instrument associated with love and musical songs hides a crowned skull. Urs Graf's engraving Vanitas (circa 1525) similarly combines riotous living with musical instruments. A skull placed at the bottom of the scene and surrounded by mottoes reminds the viewer of the transitoriness of life. Like Molenaer's Woman at Her Toilet (Allegory of Vanity), Steen's Morning Toilet is very much a vanitas portrait: a portrayal of a woman in an interior setting, a boudoir, symbolically implying an environment of dubious propriety and providing a moral comment upon domestic life.

However, individual vanitas portraits may or may not be allegorical. Judith Leyster's or Frans Hals's Young Man with a Skull (1626–1628) in the National Gallery in London represents a youthful sitter displaying a skull. Is he a poet or an actor? The identification of the painted man and the attribution of this painting are still under evaluation. The Caravaggesque young man, dramatically gesturing and wearing a red hat with a huge plume, contrasts with the emblem of vanitas, the skull. Goltzius's drawing Young Man Holding a Skull and a Tulip similarly presents an elegantly dressed young man wearing a fanciful hat with plumes. Dutch art in the seventeenth century was saturated with such accessories, attributes or clues to a symbolism that contains profoundly moralistic connotations. Many artists included crowns, seals, documents, leaves, and plumes as ephemeral objects of natural life. Goltzius's figure holds a skull and a tulip to remind viewers of the transitoriness of human existence and the certainty of death. Behind him an hourglass keeps count of the passage of time. Another similar vanitas is Joos van Craesbeeck's A Man Holding a Skull and a Pipe (circa 1630), in a private collection, a painting that alludes to the biblical warning "For my days are consumed like smoke" (Psalm 102:3) and recalls Bailly's vanitas drawing and Visscher's emblem on the same subject.

Another type of portraiture developed in the middle of the seventeenth century: professional portraiture typically depicting a doctor or physician. Such portraits include Pieter Nason's Portrait of a Doctor in Medicine (1665) in the Dulwich Picture Gallery in London. These portraits—also usually including skulls—do not simply depict concepts of vanitas and transitory life but also allude to the profession of the sitter. These artists were likely influenced by several sources: the anatomical engravings of Andreas Vesalius, particularly his skull engravings; the annual anatomy lesson given by the chief surgeon of the Surgeons' Guild, as illustrated in Thomas de Keyser's The Anatomy Lesson of Dr. Sebastiaen Egbertsz de Vrij (1619), in the Historisch Museum in Amsterdam; and the anatomy lesson paintings from the school of Amsterdam. The emblematic moralistic implication of memento mori is in these portraits somewhat overshadowed and metamorphosed by the sitter's profession. Hals's Portrait of a Man (1611), a pendant portrait in The Barber Institute of Fine Arts at the University of Birmingham, England, with its unidentified coat of arms in the upper right flanked by the inscription Ita mori/aetate suae 60, may depict a physician. The attire of the sitter resembles a doctor's outfit from contemporaneous anatomy lesson paintings. Although double family portraits were common in Dutch society, it was rare to commission a pendant vanitas portrait with a wife and husband holding a skull. Does the skull held by Hals's sitter then allude to his medical profession, or is it to be interpreted in the traditional vanitas context?

In summary, the skeleton as a memento mori symbol appeared first in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance associated with figures in northern European representations of the ars moriendi, Dance of Death, or totentanz (danse macabre). In the sixteenth century the depiction of the skeleton as a symbol of death evolved and was reduced to a skull. Individual and group portraits alluding to the concept of memento mori or vanitas were painted displaying the skull. In the seventeenth century the symbolism of the memento mori expanded to include many emblematic objects in addition to the skull. Sometimes a portrait of the deceased was actually replaced by a skull as a new kind of painting emerged: vanitas still life paintings. As this theme expanded, the figure (portrait) reentered vanitas painting, and entire scenes became allegories on the transitoriness of human existence. Simultaneously, however, the image of the skull assumed a dual role: a symbol of occupation defining the professional status of the sitter, and as a traditional vanitas icon with all its attendant symbolism. This twofold meaning of the skull continues to intrigue art historians.

In the nineteenth century, these same symbols of vanity were still used, although in a somewhat sentimentalized form. For example, Lily Martin Spencer's We Both Must Fade (1869) depicts a beautiful young woman in a ball gown, holding a flower, and gazing into a full-length mirror. The fading of the flower may be more suggestive of the fading of beauty than of death, but the underlying vanitas associations are still at work. Arnold Böcklin's Self-Portrait with Death Playing the Fiddle (1872) is a more direct appropriation of the vanitas symbolism: the artist goes about his daily work, but Death is playing the tune.

See also Death; Excess; Pointing/Indicating; Toilet Scenes

Selected Works of Art

Ars Moriendi

Master S. I., Ars Moriendi, woodcut, 1464, from Netherlandish Latin text

Totentanz, woodcut, 1492, printed by J. Meydenback, Heidelberg, Germany

Wolgenut, Michael, Dance of Death, woodcut, 1493, from Nuremberg Chronicle
Death, ivory, 1547, Paris, Musée des Arts Décoratifs

Skull or Skeleton as Vanitas Symbol

Cleve, Joos van, St. Jerome, 1521, private collection

Cleve, Joos van, St. Jerome, 1521, Cambridge, Massachusetts,
Fogg Art Museum

Alciati, Andrea, Sepulchrum, 1550, Emblem CDVII, engraving, from Emblemata

Gheyn, Jacob de, II, Vanitas, oil on panel, 1603, New York,
Metropolitan Museum of Art

Heem, Jan Davidsz. de, Vanitas Still Life, circa 1628, Pommersfelden, Germany, Shönborn Gallery

Rosa, Salvator, Humana Fragilitas, oil on canvas, circa 1650,
Cambridge, Cambridge University, Fitzwilliam Museum

Dou, Gerrit, St. Jerome, 1660, Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie Alte Meister, Staatliche Kunstsammlungen

Bray, Jan de, The Penitent Magdalene, 1670, private collection

Bubbles as Vanitas Symbol

Junius, Hadrianus, Et Tutto Abbraccio, Et Nulla Stringo, 1565, Emblem XVI, engraving, from Emblemata

Goltzius, Hendrik, Quis Evadet/Nemo, engraving, 1594,
Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett, Staatliche Museen
Passe, Crispijn de, Vanitas, engraving after Maerten de Vos, early seventeenth century, private collection
Molenaer, Jan, Woman at Her Toilet (Allegory of Vanity), 1633, Toledo, Ohio, Art Museum
Poirters, Adriaen, Vanitas, engraving, 1649

Flowers as Vanitas Symbols

Goltzius, Hendrik, Young Man Holding a Skull and a Tulip, drawing, 1614, New York, Pierpont Morgan Library
Spencer, Lily Martin, We Both Must Fade, 1869, Washington, D.C., National Collection of Fine Arts

Toilet Scenes as Vanitas Symbols

Steen, Jan, Morning Toilet, 1663, London, Royal Collection

Musical Instruments as Vanitas Symbols

Graf, Urs, Vanitas, engraving, circa 1525

Portraits with Vanitas Symbols

Jacobsz., Dirk, Portrait of Pompeius Occo, 1531, Amsterdam,
The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Ketel, Cornelis, Portrait of a Man, tondo, 1574, Amsterdam,
The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum
Cronenburg, Adrien van (?), Kathryn Berake, circa 1580,
Cardiff, National Gallery of Wales
Cronenburg, Adrien van, Woman and Child, 1587, Madrid,
Spain, Prado
Hals, Frans, Portrait of a Man, 1611, Birmingham, England, University of Birmingham, Barber Institute of Fine Arts
Keyser, Thomas de, *The Anatomy Lesson of Dr. Sebastiaen
Egbertsz de Vrij*, 1619, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Historisch Museum
Leyster, Judith, or Frans Hals, Young Man with a Skull, 1626–1628, London, National Gallery
Craesbeeck, Joos van, A Man Holding a Skull and a Pipe, circa 1630, private collection
Bailly, David, Vanitas with a Portrait of a Young Painter, 1651, Leiden, The Netherlands, Municipal Museum de Lakenhal
Molenaer, Jan, Family Making Music, 1660, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum
Nason, Pieter, Portrait of a Doctor in Medicine, 1665,
London, Dulwich Picture Gallery
Böcklin, Arnold, Self-Portrait with Death Playing the Fiddle, oil on canvas, 1872, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Still-Life Vanitas

Bailly, David, Vanitas, drawing, 1624, The Hague, The Netherlands, Royal Library
Nieuland, Adriaen van, Vanitas Still Life, oil on panel, 1636, Haarlem, The Netherlands, Frans Hals Museum
Steenwyck, Harmen, Vanitas Still Life, oil on panel, before circa 1656, Leiden, The Netherlands, Municipal Museum de Lakenhal
Steenwyck, Harmen, An Allegory of the Vanities of Human Life, oil on panel, before circa 1656, London, National Gallery

Rosa, Salvator, Vanitas, oil on panel, before 1673, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, Haddo House, Collection
Major David Gordon

Fame Achieved Through Death

Goltzius, Hendrik, Fama and Historia, engraving, 1586
Hondius, Hendrick, The End Crowns the Work, engraving, 1626

Emblems and Medals Relating to Vanitas

Marriage Medal, Frisian, seventeenth century, private collection
Visscher, Roemer, Nothing Is Empty or Meaningless, 1614, first emblem from Sinnepoppen
Visscher, Roemer, Man Smoking, 1614, emblem from Sinnepoppen
Visscher, Roemer, Tulip, 1614, emblem from Sinnepoppen
Visscher, Roemer, Purgo et Ornat, 1614, emblem from Sinnepoppen
Brune, Johan de, The Marriage Bed Should Be Unstained, 1614, emblem from Emblemata of zinnewerk, 1614
Cats, Jacob, Widow, 1658, emblem from Houwelijk
Cats, Jacob, Music, 1658, emblem from Houwelijk

Further Reading

Alciati, Andrea (Andreas Alciatus), *The Latin Emblems:
Indexes and Lists*, edited by Peter M. Daly, Toronto,
Ontario: University of Toronto Press, 1985
Alpers, Svetlana, The Art of Describing, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1983
Aries, Philippe, Images of Man and Death, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1985
Bergstrom, Ingvar, Still-Lives of the Golden Ages, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Washington, 1989
Bliss, Douglas Percy, A History of Wood Engraving, London: Spring, 1964
Boase, Thomas Sherrer Ross, *Death in the Middle Ages:
Mortality, Judgment and Remembrance*, New York:
McGraw-Hill, 1972; London: Thames and Hudson, 1972
Boeckl, Christine M., Triumph of Death (Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1991)
Cats, Jacob, Sinne-en-Minnebeelden, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, 1627
Clark, James Midgley, The Dance of Death in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, Glasgow, Scotland: Jackson, 1950
Cross, Frank Leslie, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, Oxford and New York: Oxford
University Press, 1984
Fischer, P., "Music in Painting of the Low Countries in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," *Sonomum
Speculum* 50/51 (1972)
Haak, Bob, The Golden Age, New York: Abrams, 1984
Hind, Arthur, A History of Woodcut, New York: Abrams, 1984

- Hofrichter, Frima Fox, "Games People Play: Judith Leyster's A Game of Trick-Trac," Journal of the Worcester Art Museum 7 (1983)
- _____, Judith Leyster, Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Davco, 1990
- Janson, Horst W., "Putto and Death," Art Bulletin (1937)
- Jongh, Eric de, "Einleitung," Die Sprache der Bilde, Braunschweig, Germany: Aco Druck GMBH, 1978
- Keyszlitz, Robert, De Clavis interpretandi in der holländischen Malerei des 17. Jahrhunderts, Munich, Germany, 1957
- Klessmann, Rudiger, Die Sprache der Bilder, Braunschweig, Germany: Aco Druck GMBH, 1978
- Koozin, Kristine, The Vanitas Still Lifes of Harmen Steenwyck: Metaphoric Realism, Lewiston, England: Mellen, 1990
- Kuretsky, Susan, "D. Hetschilderen van bl'men in de 17 de eeuw," Flora et Pictura, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, 1987
- Marlier, G., "Un Portraitiste Frison du XVIe Siècle: Anna au Adriaen van Cronenburch," Oud Holland 51 (1934)
- Mosby, Dewey, Gods, Saints and Heroes, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1980
- Nash, John Malcolm, The Age of Rembrandt and Vermeer, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1972; Oxford: Phaidon, 1972
- O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988
- Price, J. L., The Dutch Republic During the Seventeenth Century, New York: Scribner's, 1974; London: Batsford, 1974
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, New York and London: Garland, 1976
- Rosenberg, Jakob, et al., Dutch Art and Architecture, Baltimore, Maryland, and Harmondsworth, England: Penguin, 1972
- Schama, Simon, The Embarrassment of Riches, New York: Knopf, 1987
- Segal, Sam, A Prosperous Past: The Sumptuous Still-Life in the Netherlands, 1600-1700, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1989
- Slive, Seymour, Frans Hals, London: Royal Academy of Arts, 1989
- Sluiter, Eric J., "Depiction of Mythological Themes," in Gods, Saints and Heroes: Dutch Painting in the Age of Rembrandt, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1980
- Smith, David R., "Irony and Civility: Notes on the Convergence of Genre and Portraiture in Seventeenth Century Dutch Painting," Art Bulletin (1987)
- Stechow, Wolfgang, "Homo Bulla," Art Bulletin (1938)
- Sutton, Peter, Masters of Seventeenth Century Dutch Genre, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1984
- Veca, Alberto, Vanitas, Bergamo, Italy: Galleria Lorenzelli, 1981
- Visscher, Roemer, Sinnepoppen, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, 1614
- Welu, James, Seventeenth Century Dutch Painting, Worcester: Worcester Art Museum, 1979
- Wright, Christopher, The Dutch Painters, New York: Barron's, 1978

VICES/DEADLY SINS

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Vices/Deadly Sins:

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

MODERN

Hieronymus Bosch, The Seven Capital Sins, tabletop, 1475–1485, Madrid, Spain, Prado.
(Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

Although the concepts of vice and sin have gained their principal elaboration in the theology of Christianity, the roots of the concepts lay in the ancient world. The Mithraic religion of the Romans, looking back to Persian Zoroastrianism, which had embraced the mystical significance of the number seven, imagined the soul rising through seven planetary spheres, each of which was associated with a vice. The sun was associated with pride, the moon with envy, Mars with anger, Mercury with greed, Jupiter with ambition, Venus with lust, and Saturn with sloth. The soul was purified of the accompanying vice as it passed through each sphere (Turner, p. 36).

The medieval world took the idea of seven vices and paired them with an equal number of virtues. The conflict between good and evil, also a heritage from Mithraism, was a popular theme in the medieval period, especially when portrayed as an actual combat between particular virtues and vices. The New Testament's repeated warning and promise that the Christian life is a perpetual conflict waged to gain "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding" (Philippians 4:7), the constant death unto sin, inspired many of the dominant themes in medieval literature and art (O'Reilly).

This conflict between actual characters representing the virtues and vices first appeared in Psychomachia (Battle for the Soul), by the fourth-century Spanish poet Prudentius, and it pervaded Christian imagery during the Middle Ages. In a picturesque form, Prudentius describes a series of combats between personifications of virtues and vices: Faith against Idolatry, Chastity against Lust, Humility against Pride, Patience against Wrath, Charity against Avarice, Hope against Despair, and Harmony against Discord. The work was popular in the Middle Ages; about 20 illuminated copies are extant, dating from the ninth through thirteenth centuries (Woodruff). Illustrations of the vices also appeared in many other manuscript illuminations, such as Somme le Roi (1279, MS 192, Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge, England) and Jean Pucelle's The Belleville Breviary (circa 1325, MS Lat. 10483, Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris). The vices and virtues were depicted on the portals of French Romanesque cathedrals, such as avarice represented by the hanging of Judas on the portal of Ste. Foy in Conques. A didactic program of 12 vices and virtues was initiated on the west facade of Notre Dame in Paris at the beginning of the thirteenth century and copied at Chartres and Amiens.

During the Romanesque period, artists had illustrated the Psychomachia of Prudentius with the opposing virtues and vices in combat. However, in the thirteenth century, the combatants no longer occupy the same space. The vices and virtues are designated in an entirely new style, with virtue depicted in its essence and vice by its effects (Mâle). The virtues, sculpted in bas-relief, are motionless, majestic seated women, and the vices are represented by dramatic scenes of action in roundels beneath each virtue. For example, a husband beating his wife represents discord, and a figure praying before an idol represents unbelief. Although the representations of the vices and virtues had an important place in French Romanesque and Gothic sculpture, these images are rare in Italy before the fourteenth century (Tuve).

Cardinal, or deadly, sins are usually personified in the visual arts by ugly persons; the number, assortment, and attributes of the figures vary, as can be seen in the illustrations of vices and seven deadly sins depicted as demons in Hans Baldung Grien's Pomegranate Book (1511). The most important are the following: Pride, a crowned woman with a bat's wing; Envy, a woman riding a dog with a bone in its mouth; Gluttony, a woman riding a fox with a goose in its mouth; Covetousness (or Avarice or Greed), a man sitting on a money chest, often with a badger; Sloth, a man sleeping on a donkey; Anger, a man tearing his garments or two men dueling with swords; Lust, a woman riding a pig or goat or a Siren holding both of her fishtails in her hands; Unbelief (or Idolatry), a person before an idol; Despair, a man hanging himself, as Judas; Folly, a man biting stones; and Cowardice, a man fleeing a hare. In the Baroque period, Envy (Invidia) was also portrayed as a bare-bosomed woman strangling herself, Blame (or Slander) as the Greek god Momus with a club, and Deceit (Fraus) as a snake with a human head and scorpion tails.

The cardinal and theological virtues as a septimal group came to be set in opposition to the seven vices or deadly sins: impurity or lust, gluttony, avarice, sloth, wrath, envy, and pride (the names sometimes vary). The two traditions of virtues and vices developed independently, however, so their pairing is confusing (O'Reilly; Holtausen).

A new type of Western mythology grew out of the traditional dualism of good and evil, or God and the devil, in Europe during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The Simia Dei, or the devil, depicted in Hieronymus Bosch's paintings expresses this new mythology. The Roman Catholic Church, under the influence of the Dominican friars, aimed at persecuting and controlling heresy and witchcraft. The Dominican friars saw themselves as worshipers of God and their enemies as worshipers of the devil. Thus, the devil became for the Roman Catholic Church the Simia Dei, that is, the ape or the imitator of God (Michelet). The Roman Catholic Church's mission became to root out sin and the worshipers of the devil.

In December 1484, Pope Innocent VIII issued a bull condemning witchcraft in Europe, especially in Germany, and established a committee to destroy this spread of maleficence.

The committee was governed by the two sons of the pope: the Dominican friar and inquisitor Heinrich Institor (Kramer) and Jakob Sprenger. Two years after the papal bull, the inquisitors printed an encyclopedia of demonology, Malleus Maleficarum (The Hammer of Witches):

We may say that the devil can possess a man . . . we may say that since a man is by any mortal sin brought into devil's service . . . the devil provides suggestion of sin either to the senses or to the imagination, to that event the devil is said to inhabit in man. . . . (Malleus Maleficarum)

These two events—the papal bull of 1484 and the publishing of the results of the investigations in 1486—were the sources for a new Western mythology. That is, a systematic demonology was established on the basis of the fusion of social fears, popular superstitious, intellectual cosmology, and tales from folklore (Guazzo).

It is interesting to note that the means employed by the Roman Catholic Church to eliminate heresy and witchcraft contributed to the expansion of witchcraft in Europe. Witchcraft (or “witchcraze”) was used by individuals for personal gain and employed as a political tool to destroy enemies. The witchcraze movement achieved momentum in Spain, the Netherlands, and Germany during Bosch's lifetime in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries.

Owing to a lack of information about Bosch's personal, artistic, and intellectual life, the interpretation of his paintings is both fascinating and problematic for the art historian (Charles de Tolnay, 1966; Walter Gibson, 1973; James Snyder, 1973; Laurinda Dixon, 1980; Wilhelm Fraenger, 1983). In explaining his works, many theorists have suggested such influences as alchemy and astrology, biblical texts, Netherlandish and German folktales and proverbs, secret religious practices (devotio moderna), and of course witchcraft (C. A. Burland, 1968; H. A. Kelly, 1968). The seven deadly sins (anger, avarice, envy, gluttony, lust, pride, and sloth) and the devil, or Simia dei, are clearly illustrated in the right wings of Bosch's triptychs representing hell in the paintings Hay Wain and Garden of Earthly Delights (both 1485–1505) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain; Last Judgment (1490–1510) in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; and the tondo of hell from his Seven Capital Sins tabletop (1475–1485) in the Prado.

Bosch's early representations of hell are closely related to his depiction of vices, namely, the seven deadly sins; the later versions of hell become Bosch's visions of a phantasmagoric inferno. Here, devils or demons control, castigate, torture, and ultimately destroy those who have sinned through superstition and the practice of magic and witchcraft.

Bosch successfully associates hell with human beings' combat with vice and eroticism and with the practices of alchemy and witchcraze. In the paintings, one sees diabolical instruments, devices, musical instruments, tortures, the activities of demons, and the transformation of people into hybrid forms. From these observations, one may assume that Bosch is paralleling in painting the efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to destroy witchcraft. However, Bosch and the Roman Catholic Church, through their respective means—pictorial image and literary manifestos such as Visio Tundali and Malleus Maleficarum—inadvertently encouraged and glorified the fantastic qualities of the witchcraze movement of this period.

These paintings of infernal scenes were commissioned by such wealthy and erudite patrons as Philip the Good, Philip the Handsome of Burgundy, Philip II of Spain, and the Spanish Brotherhood of Our Lady. Therefore, the iconography of these works—that is, the program depicted in these paintings—was probably stated by the patrons and their spiritual advisors. Although the interpretation of these works may puzzle viewers today, surely their meaning was clearly understood by their original audience.

In 1475, Bosch painted a round tabletop. In the corners are four tondos representing the final experience of the soul: death, Last Judgment, paradise, and/or hell. In the center of the tabletop is God's eye with the inscription “Be Aware, For God Sees All.” Seven allegorical scenes surround the eye of God, representing the seven deadly sins: vanity, lust, sloth, anger, gluttony, envy, and covetousness. Above and below these allegories are scrolls containing inscriptions commenting on the predicament of the individual if he or she proceeds in any of these types of sinful life. The inscriptions are taken from the Bible. The scroll at the top reads, “For they are a nation void of counsel, neither is there any understanding in them. O that they are wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!” (Deuteronomy 32:28–29). The bottom scroll states, “I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be” (Deuteronomy 32:20). A moral and didactic message is issued, warning people of the calamities to come if they persist in committing sins.

In the tondo of hell, the inferno is painted as a fantastic landscape with red tonalities. The brown tones of the dry land contrast with a few hills transformed into burning ovens or mouths that spit fumes and flames. The red is especially dramatic in the background. In this infernal land, seven deadly sins receive their punishment: Anger is the man pierced with a sword on the torturer's bench, Avarice is the miser being stewed in a cauldron, and Pride is a devil holding a mirror up to a proud woman. A toad is seated on the lap of the woman (the toad is a symbol of a maleficent spirit). Lust is lovers being held down on a bed while a monster crawls around them, and a giant amphibian sits at the edge of the bed that harbors the adulterers (Frantz). Eventually, the lovers will be dragged into an icy river. The sea, rivers, and water are associated with works of magic. Sloth is an indolent man being hammered on an anvil, Gluttony is a person being served a meal of toads and lizards, and Envy is a man being eaten and torn to pieces by dogs.

Stylistically, the representations of hell in Bosch's paintings follow the traditions of a Netherlandish book of illuminations, contemporary German engravings, and Flemish paintings. In 1484, engravings for the book The Art of Dying (Ars Moriendi of Verard) were published; these prints were linked to the popular Danses Macabres (Dances of Death). The Art of Dying dealt with the relatively new fourteenth-century obsession with dying and the paraphernalia associated with death and dissolution (Boase). As this mania for death persisted, the modern art of healing began to develop, and popular books were written on this topic. These books included information from medical texts and treatises concerning herbal remedies for sickness as well as astrology manuals providing guidance for better living (Arano).

Iconographically, contemporary literary works such as Grand Calendrier des Bergers (1493, Paris) describe a number of punishments for the seven deadly sins, especially lust, sloth, pride, and covetousness. Bosch's infernal paintings were also influenced by the tarot cards (Hamilton), which had become very popular at this time, along with poetry books (Sterfboek), alchemy manuals, medieval bestiaries (Physiologus), folk songs, theatrical settings and the theater, and last but not least Visio Tundali, which during the Middle Ages became an important treatise that explained the forces of the devil and offered a vision of hell. In this text, Satan, who had been depicted as an angel, becomes a type of demon, the Prince of Darkness (i.e., the devil, or Simia Dei), and devours greedy sinners, unchaste clergymen, and unbelievers (Ferguson). Furthermore, this text expounds an organization of hell consisting of three worlds: vegetable, mineral, and animal. Hybrid forms are spirits between the three worlds. The book also explains the coloration of hell and puts forward the idea that it is a forge where individuals end up when they commit one of the seven deadly sins.

Visio Tundali elaborates on the description of the seven deadly sins that lead man to damnation. Three of the deadly sins are emphasized (lust, avarice, and gluttony), and these vices are presented as the main branches of the tree of sin. These sins were especially condemned because they are monastic vices. Visio Tundali was a popular eschatological work of the Middle Ages and was used by the Roman Catholic Church in combating the witchcraze of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The Roman Catholic Church hoped to expose the evil of magic and to debunk superstitions, divine spirits, idolatry, demonic doctrine, and false knowledge so that the followers of witches would be intimidated and return to the true faith: Christianity. Bosch was undoubtedly familiar with Visio Tundali because the Dutch version was published in Antwerp, Belgium, in 1484 and two years later was reprinted in 's Hertogenbosh, The Netherlands, Bosch's hometown. Clearly, Bosch's paintings of hell demonstrate his knowledge of this source.

Bosch's tondo of hell is the prototype for the right-wing triptychs of his middle- and later-period paintings that depict scenes of hell, such as Hay Wain, Garden of Earthly Delights, and Last Judgment. As stated earlier, Bosch's works are didactic and moralistic, although they expose the sins of men in an erotic, torturous, seductive, and fantastic manner. Like the Malleus Maleficarum, the antisatanist book on sexual offenses, his works tend to emphasize the individual's tendency to weakness of flesh and mind. The satanic imagery is influenced by Bosch's knowledge of alchemy and concerns about heresy. Like the judges of the Inquisition, Bosch also judges, using torturous devices to castigate his creations. In Bosch's view, one fears death because of the Last Judgment, as illustrated in the various triptychs. This concept appears in the Hay Wain triptych, where judgment and punishment are imposed for the sin of avarice; in the Garden of Earthly Delights triptych, where lust is condemned; and in the Last Judgment triptych and the tondo of hell, where figures allegorically representing all seven deadly sins are castigated.

Bosch's paintings are an amalgam of two kinds of meaning: iconographic and stylistic. His symbols are visual metaphors that he invented to convey his understanding of the artistic and literary tradition of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Bosch's paintings of hell guide us to the study of iconography, that is, to the study of the attitudes of his society. Bosch establishes in his paintings of hell a dictionary of demonology based, first, on the symbolism of the seven deadly sins; second, on the way in which these sins are committed by individuals through the senses, eroticism, alchemy, and witchcraft; and, finally, on the Roman Catholic Church's punishment for sacrilegious attitudes. Pictorially, Bosch supports the Roman Catholic Church's position and compliments the erudition of his patrons by drawing from contemporary literary sources. Bosch's depictions also continue the ancient tradition of attributing animal characteristics to both gods and demons. The Assyrians and the Babylonians depicted the devil with the head of a lion and the feet of an eagle. Sometimes the Egyptians represented the devil as a baboon. Medieval Christian representations of the devil portray him as a dragon, goat, wolf, cat, owl, or half-human form. Bosch's representations are based on these literary and visual assimilations as well as on images from the Bible expressed in St. Augustine's City of God, Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologia, Visio Tundali, and Malleus Maleficarum. Just as the Inquisition enlarged fifteenth-century concerns with the devil, representations of demons were used to promote religious and political issues. For example, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the devil appeared in literary works and in pictures in human disguise as a monk, a learned professor in robes, or a man with claws, horns, or bat's wings. The devil is a force of evil in the world and rules the underworld. The devil consumes the body or the soul of a person. It demands one's life or virtue, as seen in Bosch's paintings of hell.

According to Matthew and the Book of Enoch, evil is associated with hell and fire deriving from the transformation of fallen angels into devils. The rebel angel Lucifer, whose sin of pride caused his fall from the heavens into the abyss (hell), caused the creation of hell and the underworld. The linking of hell to fire comes from the legend of Vulcan, the god of fire in pagan mythology. The worship of Vulcan and the secret cults of evil powers later become associated with Lucifer and the underworld. Like a pagan god, the devil in hell is ruler of the underworld. The devil is god of hell, the instigator of sin, and then juror and punisher for the sinner's deeds. In Bosch's paintings, the images of hell are associated with fire and water—this association relates to alchemist practices of the time. The musical instruments symbolize eroticism and the sin of lust, whereas torture devices and hybrid forms are used to imply punishment and castigation.

The exterior of the Hay Wain triptych depicts a vagabond or a pilgrim of life and clearly illustrates the infernal punishment for committing one of the deadly sins: avarice. Bosch's vagabond was tempted and has fallen in sin, and he is depicted as a depraved alcoholic. His fall is noted in his attire, glance, and gaze; objects he carries, such as the spoon, allude to the sin of lust, and his torn clothes symbolize unchastity. In the exterior of the triptych, Bosch portrays the vagabond crossing a bridge and walking toward the right of the painting. When the triptych is opened, the viewer sees Bosch's intention regarding the direction the vagabond walks: As he crosses the bridge (exterior panel), he approaches another bridge leading to the gates of hell (interior right panel). Bosch paints the vagabond moving away from paradise, the left panel in the triptych. At the top of the paradise panel, the viewer sees fallen angels; at the bottom of the panels, Adam and Eve occupy the Garden of Eden. In the center of the triptych, the sin of avarice is allegorically depicted. This scene reminds the viewer of the Bible and the Netherlandish proverb "The world is a haystack from which one plucks as much as he can." Therefore, the hay cart is an allegory for perishableness on Earth. Other sins such as greed, sloth, lust, and covetousness are also illustrated in the center of the triptych. Elaboration of the pictorial description of hell, on the right wing, suggests the proper punishment for these and the vagabond's sins. For example, a woman has a toad on her lap (the sin of pride), and dogs (the sin of envy) attack a man. A man being devoured by a monster depicts gluttony. A warrior enters the mouth of hell on an ox, symbol of a sacrilege committed. On the bridge, souls are pushed by the devil into infernal towers or alchemists' ovens. At the top, the devils build more infernal towers.

On the exterior, the triptych Garden of Earthly Delights depicts a world in the state of formation—the separation of the waters and earth is taking place. In the interior, again, a scene from paradise is seen on the left panel. In the center, the sin of lust is allegorically depicted. According to Netherlandish folklore and literature, especially the book of poetry Styevooort, "the world is for plucking of flowers and fruits." This proverb is a euphemism for sexual desires in humans. Incubus and succubus demons descend on humans in the night to perform perverted sexual acts. These demons were identified by Aquinas in Summa Theologia and by St. Augustine in City of God, and condemnation of them is found in Malleus Maleficarum. The incubus devils have male forms and attack females, whereas the succubus demons are female and attack males. In the right wing of the triptych is the depiction of hell. In the book of Revelation of St. John, hell is described as an eschatological world where Satan (Belphegor) is seated on a stool presiding over the underworld (Moeller). In this version of hell, a large number of musical instruments are punishing the individual. The musical instruments symbolize sexual appetites and represent the genitals of men and women. The musical tools are also symbols of the sin of lust. This representation of hell is more fantastic, but never as phantasmagoric, as the depiction of hell from the Last Judgment triptych. It is a continuation of the northern Renaissance tradition in art. The deadly sins and eschatological themes of death, hell, and judgment are clearly combined in the Garden of Earthly Delights triptych. It is a world of folly narrated in biblical texts, parables, and Netherlandish songs and proverbs in which moral implications are allegorically stated. Bosch's imagery in these infernal paintings inculcates a moral system and castigates sin.

The Last Judgment triptych combines the medieval themes with the fantastic elements of the apocalypse, all seen in a chaotic jungle of fires. The Earth, in the central panel, is given over to the infernal monsters. The background is full of horrors, pits, flaming houses, and towers. Hell rushes out angrily, people are burned alive or hanged, millstones of agonies occur, devils fly, and water tortures are seen in the depths of the rivers Erebus and Avernus. Evil is loosed on the world, and the picture of retribution found in the hell in the tondo of Seven Deadly Sins, in the hell of the Hay Wain triptych, or in the hell in Garden of Earthly Delights is tame compared to the Last Judgment triptych. Here, Earth is infested with the power of evil. The seven deadly sins are again depicted, and their punishment is described. Further castigation of individuals for their sins spreads not only on their final day—the day of the Last Judgment—but also continuously through their daily lives, as life on earth is infernal. In these paintings of hell, Bosch, faithful to Visio Tundali and Malleus Maleficarum, has described the powers of Satan and their manifestations: Satan is the architect, creator, and ruler of the underworld just as God is the designer of the world. Satan is the Simia Dei.

As divine wisdom permits certain evil to be done by bad, Angels or men, for the sake of the good that God draws, therefrom, so also the good Angels do not altogether, prevent wicked men or devils from doing evil. (Malleus Maleficarum)

In 1560, Pieter Bruegel the Elder engraved a series depicting both the vices and the virtues. Within the medieval and Renaissance traditions, the vices are represented by jewels (pride, vanity), pronk goblets (pride, avarice), mirrors (pride, vanity), bottles with perfumed water (vanity), money and money boxes (avarice), roasted game (gluttony), mussels (lust), and snails (sloth). These attributes were supplemented by later examples from Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1603).

During the thirteenth century in Italy, Giotto painted a virtue and vice cycle in fresco in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy. Giotto, following the medieval iconographic tradition, focused on the pairing of cardinal and theological virtues with vices. Charity, for example, was paired with envy. Neither Bruegel nor Giotto, in these representations of vice, was led by the impact of witchcraft that is illustrated in Bosch's vices depicted in the Prado tabletop.

The Italian Renaissance, reluctant to give up a medieval pattern of ideas, took up the virtues and vices, although they now assumed the shapes of pagan gods and goddesses, and their message tended to reflect courtly rather than clerical values. The humanists who devised these pictorial programs were following the medieval tradition. Parida da Ceresara, one of the principal humanists and advisers in the court of Isabella d'Este, designed the program for her private rooms in the Ducal Palace at Mantua, Italy. Perugino's Battle of Love and Chastity (1504), now in the Louvre in Paris, and Andrea Mantegna's Wisdom Overcoming Vice (1502), also currently in the Louvre, were painted to illustrate Ceresara's program. Late Baroque sculptural groups often portray the Stations of the Cross as individual scenes in which Jesus Christ atones for specific vices or sins of humanity.

Contemporary artists have largely forgotten the theme of the vices or seven deadly sins. However, there is at least one horrific exception: the Seven Deadly Sins by Paul Cadmus (1945–1949). Seven separate panels—Lust, Pride, Sloth, Anger, Envy, Avarice, and Gluttony—provide bisexual personifications of the venal sins in harsh colors and ugly forms. In fact, they are so genuinely disgusting and repulsive that they are rarely exhibited.

See also Avarice; Damned Souls; Envy; Excess; Sin/Sinning; Virtue/Virtues; Witchcraft/Sorcery

Selected Works of Art

Medieval

Prudentius, Psychomachia (Battle for the Soul), manuscript, fourth century; French, ninth century, Leiden, The Netherlands, Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit (Cod. Vossianus Lat. Oct. 15); South German or Swiss, first half of tenth century, Bern, Switzerland, Stadtbibliothek (Ms. 264); French, tenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. Lat. 8318)

The Vice of Idolatry, relief on central portal, west front, after 1220, Amiens, France, Cathedral

Faith and Idolatry, relief, left inner pier on west side, south transept porch, circa 1220–1230, Chartres, France, Cathedral

Renaissance

Giotto, Virtues and Vices, fresco, after 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Bosch, Hieronymus, The Seven Capital Sins, tabletop, 1475–1485, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Hay Wain, 1485–1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Garden of Earthly Delights, 1485–1505, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Bosch, Hieronymus, Last Judgment, 1490–1510, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Mantegna, Andrea, Wisdom Overcoming Vice, 1502, Paris, Louvre

Perugino, Battle of Love and Chastity, 1504, Paris, Louvre

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Virtues and Vices, series of engravings, 1560

Modern

Cadmus, Paul, The Seven Deadly Sins: Lust, Pride, Sloth, Anger, Envy, Avarice, Gluttony, egg tempera on seven pressed wood panels, 1945–1949, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Further Reading

Arano, Luisa Cogliati, The Medieval Health Handbook, New York: Braziller, 1976

Boase, Thomas Sherrer Rose, Death in the Middle Ages: Morality, Judgment and Remembrance, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972

Burland, Cottie Arthur, The Arts of the Alchemists, New York: Macmillan, 1968; London: Widenfeld and Nicolson, 1968

de Tolnay, Charles, Hieronymus Bosch, New York: Reynal, 1966; London: Methuen, 1966

Dixon, Laurinda, Alchemical Imagery in Bosch's "Garden of Delights" Triptych, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1980

Eliasoph, Philip, "Paul Cadmas at Ninety: The Virtues of Depicting Sin," American Arts Quarterly XII:2 (Spring 1995)

Ferguson, Everett, Demonology of Early Christian World, New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1984

Fraenger, Wilhelm, Hieronymus Bosch, New York: Putnam, 1983

Frantz, David O., Festum Voluptatis: A Study of Renaissance Erotica, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1989

Gibson, Walter S., Hieronymus Bosch, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1973

Guazzo, Francesco Maria, Compendium Maleficarum, Toronto, Ontario: General Publishing, 1988

Hamilton, Jean, Playing Cards, London: Victoria and Albert Museum, 1988

Holtausen, Ferdinand, editor, Book of Vices and Virtues: Being a Soul's Confession of Its Sins, London: N. Trubner, 1888

Jacobowitz, Ellen S., and Stephanie Loeb Stepanek, The Prints of Lucas van Leyden, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1983

Kelly, Henry Ansgar, The Devil, Demonology and Witchcraft, New York: Doubleday, 1968

Mâle, Émile, Religious Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1977

Michelet, Jules, Satanism and Witchcraft: A Study in Medieval Superstition, New York: Citadel, 1970

Moeller, Charles, editor, Satan, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1952

Nordström, F., "Virtue and Vices on the Fourteenth Century Corbels of the Choir of Uppsala Cathedral," Figura 7 (1956)

O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of the Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988

Snyder, James, editor, Bosch in Perspective, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1973

Stettiner, Richard, Die Illustrierten Prudentiushandschriften, Berlin: Grote, 1905

Tuve, Rosemund, "Notes on the Virtues and Vices," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes XXVI (1963); XXVII (1964)

Turner, Alice K., The History of Hell, New York and London: Harcourt, 1993

Woodruff, Helen, The Illustrated Manuscripts of Prudentius, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1930

VIRGIN/VIRGINITY

Diane Apostolos-Cappadona

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Virgin/Virginity:

APHRODITE/VENUS

ATHENA

VIRGIN GODDESSES

VIRGIN MARY

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

VIRGIN SAINTS AND MARTYRS

VIRGIN BIRTH: ATHENA

VIRGIN BIRTH: NATIVITY

ELIZABETH I

Ludovisi Throne (Throne of Venus), Parian marble relief, 480–450 B.C., Rome, Museo Nazionale Romano delle Terme. (Courtesy of Max Hirmer)

Etymologically, neither the word virgin nor the concept of virginity originally referred to a physical state. Although the Latin word virgo and the Greek word parthenos are commonly translated as “maiden” or “virgin,” the root meaning of the words virgo and parthenos is the condition of being unmarried. Virgo can be interpreted as meaning “a woman without a man” and parthenos as “belonging-to-no-man.” Since the changes in sexual conventions during the nineteenth century, virgin and virginity have denoted a state of physical ignorance of the opposite sex. (Throughout this essay, a cautionary division between sex and gender is maintained. Sex is a physical reality and is identified by specific bodily, predominately genital, parts. Gender, on the other hand, is a socially conditioned form of behavior that may or may not be related to sexual identification or preference.)

Virginity was neither sex-specific nor a permanent state of being in the classical, pre-Christian Western world. A transitional or temporary stage in a person's life, virginity could be a temporary state of sexual renunciation, a spiritual cleansing in an effort to incur ritual purity, or simply the stage of life that ended with marriage. In this classical definition of virginity, the virgin was understood to be neither male nor female, but a mediator between the human sexes and between heaven and Earth. Virginity was a state of primordial innocence that implied inviolable purity and thereby a closer and more direct contact with nature. Unspoiled by sexual tension, the virgin belonged to her or himself and was true to nature and to natural instinct. In this state between childhood and adulthood, masculinity and femininity, the virgin existed in ambiguity. Belonging to both the male and the female worlds, the virgin was an intermediary figure capable of mediating between the human and the sacred. Therefore, in preparation for participation in a religious rite, an otherwise sexually mature man or woman would enter into a period of sexual abstinence in order to obtain the ritual purity of the virgin.

In the classical, pre-Christian Western world, then, the concept of virginity and of the virgin indicated both the physical condition of sexual innocence and the social condition of being an unmarried person. Being mature meant that sexuality had been defined through physical experience, ostensibly with a marriage partner, and therefore an individual was identified as being a man or a woman. By implication, one who elected to live in a state of perpetual virginity was considered to be in the same social order as a child. Thus, the original concept of virginity conveyed an identifiable status in the social order, not a state of sexual activity. Even throughout Christian history there is a remnant of this original understanding, especially in the identification of certain saintly or holy women who were widowed or had renounced a previous life of sexual promiscuity as “virgins.” In such cases, such as the woman whom the Western Christian tradition came to identify as Mary Magdalen, the term virgin was applied as an honor that indicated a state of sanctity or ritual purity.

The sacred virgins of the classical world fell into two categories: virgin goddesses or the priestesses (and devotees) of virgin goddesses. Virgin goddesses were women associated with awesome creative power and nature. From earliest human history, virgin goddesses were defined as either maiden or mother. Maidens signified powerful forces of renewal and regeneration, and in this mirrored the cyclical character of nature. Mothers, on the other hand, provided the sustaining and nutrient powers of life, and in this paralleled the enduring power of the Earth. On a secular level, this divine dichotomy of maiden and mother was translated into that of virgin and wife. This translation became a major social distinction with the advent of a patriarchal and patrilineal society in classical culture.

The advent of a patriarchal society most probably paralleled the development of the religious concept of central divinity—from mother goddess to that of father god—as well as the economic movement from country to city. For a patriarchal society to operate, it is necessary to control and protect female sexuality. In the ancient world, women and young girls were restricted in their activities and companions. Sexual activity had to be both monogamous and confined to marriage, and premarital sex was forbidden. Communal as well as familial honor was subject to critique, if not failure, should a bride prove not to be a virgin. Elaborate wedding night rituals were established to ensure the virginity of the bride, such as the bride's mother's public parade of the bridal bed sheet (appropriately stained with blood) on the morning following the wedding night. Such actions certified the paternity of a husband's children, especially his eldest son.

Virgin goddesses, their priestesses, and their female servants, were not subject to such indignities. They were never fully subordinated to either a god or a human. Virgin goddesses were not always innocent of sexuality or sexual experiences. They were virgins simply by virtue of being unmarried, and thereby “one-in-herself.” For these goddesses, and by extension for their priestesses, being virginal signified both limitations and independence within the patriarchal social order. They were granted access to the wilderness—place of animals, nature, and freedom from the restrictions of the city—and by extension granted the right to experience their individual natural and bestial instincts, such as uncontrolled sexual passion. Such activities—from contact with the wildness of nature to experiences of personal passions—were inappropriate in a wife.

In the classical Greek pantheon, there were five goddesses who were defined and respected as virgin goddesses: Hestia, Aphrodite, Athena, Artemis, and Hera. As the goddess of the domestic and communal hearth, Hestia exemplified the virtues of trustworthiness, domesticity, and continuity. Her virginity was deliberately chosen, as she shunned all opportunities for sexual adventures or entanglements. Her cult renewed the ancient matrilineal bonds among women. She symbolized maternal love for all children, especially for orphans. Imagined and revered as an older, previously married woman who had returned to a state of “belonging-to-no-man,” Hestia was distinguished from her Roman counterpart Vesta, who remained a virgin from childhood.

There were three elements (or natures) inherent to the indigenous mother goddess in classical Greek culture: mothering and domestic matriarchy was exhibited by Hera as the mother of Olympus; wisdom was personified by Athena; and eternal virginity was personified by Aphrodite as Kore. Although Aphrodite enjoyed the male privilege of sexual freedom (in this respect, she was the most male [read: free] of all the goddesses) and reveled in her sex adventures, her sexuality was specifically one of transformative power, as opposed to the human experience of sexuality as a matter of possession. As Kore, Aphrodite was revered for her virginity as both a physicality and a mode-of-being. Her regular participation in ritual baths, mimicking her birth from the sea, renewed her virginity, as can be seen in the Ludovisi Throne (or Throne of Venus) marble relief (480–450 B.C.) in Rome. The iconography of the Venus Pudica, or Venus of Modesty, in which the nude goddess attempted to cover her breasts with her right arm and her genitals with her left arm, was an appropriate visual example of both her restored virginity and her sexuality. The pose and gestures of the Venus Pudica call attention to her beautiful body and sexual nature as well as her virginal modesty and shyness, as exemplified by the marble Medici Venus (third century B.C.). Even as Kore, Aphrodite was a virgin only in the sense of being independent of the control of a patriarchal marriage, not as a nonsexual woman.

As the symbol of wisdom and reasoned behavior, Athena was characterized by her descriptives: pallas, meaning “maiden,” and parthenos, meaning “belonging-to-no-man.” She was the goddess of the masculine art of war and the feminine arts of pottery, weaving, and healing. Thus, she stood on the margin between man and woman, masculinity and femininity, destruction and creation. Her virginity, or maidenhood, permitted her the privilege of consorting with men, especially warriors, as an equal, and the privilege of engaging in the masculine pursuit of battle and military victory. At the same time, she was empowered by the feminine ability to heal and to create. For example, as the patroness of weaving, Athena was simultaneously capable of the multiple meanings of weaving: creation of cloth (garments, covers, wall tapestries), gestation of a child, and gestation of an idea. She was singular among goddesses in her association with the city, and thereby a transformer of the feminine alliance with nature (including instinct and intuition), which was signified by her epithet “tamer of horses.” In her symbolic and physical virginity, Athena stood as a mediator between men and women, nature and city, war and civilization, physicality and intellect. Her “virgin” birth as a fully grown woman dressed in peplos, armor, and helmet and holding a spear and shield, from the forehead of her father, Zeus, king of the gods, denoted from her beginning her special status between the sacred and secular worlds. The priestesses of Athena were required to maintain chaste, nonsexual existences. Artistic representations of Athena, such as Phidias’s sculpture Athena Parthenos (fifth century B.C.), emphasized an androgynnous body, posture, gesture, and clothing. For example, the long flowing feminine peplos contrasted with the armor that protected her torso, and the thickening of her body signified not a postmenopausal female form, but the more muscular solidity of a male warrior.

Artemis (the Roman Diana), as goddess of the moon, wild places, childbirth, and women, governed the sacredness of the “margins” from hunting to child-rearing, from confinement to battle. As kourotrophos (rearer of the young), she guided humanity from the embryo to puberty to physical maturity in childbirth and child-rearing. As patroness of these human rites of passage and initiation, Artemis embodied the waxing and waning properties of the moon. In classical art, she was depicted as a masculinized, androgynous huntress clad in a short tunic with a bow and quiver slung over her shoulder and a crescent moon resting in her hair. She was accompanied by her faithful canine companions as she hunted wild animals. Like Athena, this so-called “mistress of the wild beasts” embodied both masculine and feminine traits.

As a mother goddess, Hera was a fully sexual woman who had married, experienced female sexual identity, and borne children. She was the symbol of universal fecundity and the fullness of female experience. Hera served as an example that at all ages a woman belonged primarily to herself—both her virginity and her sexuality were hers, not something she gave to another to control. Her marital (read: sacramental) union with Zeus signified the hieros gamos that brought fertility to the Earth. On a regular basis, Hera took a ritual bath in the spring Canthus (Canathos) in Nauplion to regain her physical virginity as a preparation for her mating with Zeus. This ritual virginity denoted that sexuality was a transformative power, not a matter of physical, emotional, or intellectual possession. Hera signified that the sexually and intellectually mature woman was a virgin in the sense of being independent from patriarchal marriage. As the mother goddess of Olympus, Hera was imagined as a physically mature matron whose body acknowledged her transitions through the full female experience, as well as signified the androgyny of the virgin marginalized between male and female roles.

On the general societal level, virginity was signified either by the dress and hairstyles of individual young women as a mode of public identification that they were unmarried, or by the priestesses (female religious functionaries) of virgin goddesses. Best known among this latter category were the vestal virgins who served the Roman goddess Vesta (the Greek Hestia). These women were consecrated from puberty to a 30-year term of service to the goddess. This term consisted of 10 years of training to become a vestal, 10 years of actual service as a vestal, and 10 years to train new vestals. During this entire 30-year period, however, these women were required to remain sexually inactive and chaste. There were strict and severe civil penalties for those men who “tainted” a vestal. The chief obligations of the vestals were to protect the fire in the Temple of Vesta (thereby protecting the domestic hearths of Rome), to bring water from the sacred spring, and to prepare salt from that sacred water for ritual use. The vestals lived in the in-between world of everyday life: they dressed and had the legal rights of married women but were treated like unmarried brides; they had male characteristics as an aspect of their public androgyny (sexual inactivity) and were thereby ambiguous in their social status (being neither male or female, adult or child). Like brides, they were on the brink between the states of being married and unmarried.

The common visual characteristics associated with virginity in the classical world were long, loose flowing hair; loose flowing white garments; an androgynous body; and any of the following icons: a crescent moon, white flowers, a clear glass jar/bottle, or a companion animal, most frequently a little dog. These elements, found in depictions of both virgin goddesses and virgins of the human order (from vestal virgins to ordinary unmarried young women), influenced both the concept and the iconography of virginity in Christian art and culture.

For the early Roman Catholic Church fathers, the virginal life reduced a woman's special penalties from the Fall and thereby made her holy. The virgin's physical body—a mirror of her spiritual body—was understood to be an image of wholeness (implying both physical wholeness and spiritual holiness): saved from the ravages of sexual lust, sexual intercourse, marriage, pregnancy, and childbirth. Before the fourth century, the majority of virgin martyrs suffered and died for their faith in the Roman arena as a way of protecting the chastity of their physical bodies; the secondary cause of their condemnation to death was their refusal to burn offerings of incense to the Roman emperor. Among these earliest Christian virgin martyrs were Felicitas, Perpetua, Agatha, Apollonia, Catherine of Alexandria, and Euphemia. These Christian virgins were identified as holy women who sought an early form of imitatio Christi as a means of reversing the division of humanity into sexually active men and women after the Fall. They wanted to be “like men,” at least in the physical and spiritual image of their bodies—not like the classical virgin goddesses who sought sexual identity without the restrictions of marriage—and followed the early Christian theology of Jesus Christ as the vehicle (and thereby his male body as the vessel) of salvation. To be saved meant to be male, and there is a corresponding emphasis in early Christian and Byzantine art in the representation of male body forms (genitalia excluded) for these virgin martyrs.

These “Holy Women” taught catechisms, assisted presbyters as deaconesses, and covered their heads (I Corinthians 11). In seeking to overcome sexual differences and to live in a chaste, paradisiacal state, they established the model for the later development of female monasticism. Like the vestal virgins, these holy women officiated at rituals, were models of faith, lived in a chaste community, and existed ambiguously as neither male nor female, married nor unmarried. The classical iconography of virginity—androgynous body shapes, long flowing hair, long flowing white garments, white flowers, a clear glass jar/bottle, and other attributes such as a little animal—were assimilated into the Christian iconography of these virgin martyrs, all of whom became saints. The one consistent additional attribute was the palm of martyrdom.

The fourth century—one of the most pivotal periods in the history of Christianity—saw critical developments in the concepts of virginity and martyrdom, as well as in the role of art in the Church and the iconography of Christian virgins. The Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), which issued the famed Nicene Creed that standardized the definition of who was a Christian and the nature of Jesus as the Christ, also declared, “If therefore a girl wants to be called a virgin, she should resemble Mary.” Thus it was the Nicene Creed that established the spiritual, devotional, and iconographic importance of Mary's virginity as both an ideal and a model for Christian women.

The Roman emperor Constantine's edicts tolerating Christianity, as well as his later declaration of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman empire, helped shift Christian interpretations of virginity far away from the classical ideal of a woman “belonging-to-no-man” to one of a life of self-denial and ascetic renunciation of the flesh aimed at overcoming woman's decadent and depraved nature (as inherited from Eve). Constantine's abolition of the persecution of Christians, especially his ban on crucifixion, resulted in a new definition for Christian martyrdom. As the “red” martyrdom of human blood faded away within a generation, the “white” martyrdom of female virginity and male celibacy became pivotal to the cultural meaning of virginity: now to be virginal was to be ascetic, self-denying, dedicated to God, and a martyr. The Christian virgin subjugated her physical body to the pain and ordeals of ascetic discipline (including starvation and self-flagellation) as a mode of attaining spiritual sanctity. Leading Church fathers of the fourth and early fifth century, wrote lengthy and oftentimes vivid descriptions of the behavior appropriate for a Christian martyrdom. From St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan's Instructions of a Virgin to St. Jerome's famed Letter to Eustochium, young Christian women were advised on modes of dress and hairstyles, proper texts to read, and methods of spiritual meditation as a form of sexual renunciation. These varied documents fused with the devotional and pious legends of the early Christian virgin martyrs. A cultural ethos was created in which the iconography of virginity denoted a state of physical perfection through sexual innocence and chastity. Along with strict ascetic discipline and physical suffering, this became the proper path to salvation for Christian women and girls. A virgin's body would then be categorized as pristine, whole, natural, and integral; probably it would take the form of an androgynous, nonsexual being.

With the additional decree of the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), which declared the Virgin Mary as Theotokos (God-bearer) and outlined the appropriate modes of veneration and iconography for this honor, visual depictions of Christian virgins began to follow an idealized model of Mary's “disembodied” bodiliness. Christian virgins were depicted resembling either St. Thecla (or Tecla) or the Virgin Mary. Depicted like St. Thecla, they would appear nude to reveal an androgynous, if not male, body; or dressed as a man with short cropped hair, like a man's; and show physical signs of suffering. Depicted like the Virgin Mary, they would appear in a loosely flowing garment that revealed less a sense of body than of ephemerality, and with an idealized and sentimentalized face and long flowing hair. As Mariology (including Marian devotions and iconography) increased over the next 10 centuries of Christian history, the scriptural and legendary epithets associated with Mary's perpetual virginity, from Ezekiel's shut gate to Solomon's sealed fountain to the legendary rose without thorns, entered into the iconography of the Virgin Mary and of Christian virgins such as Barbara, Ursula, and Dorothea. Whatever was visually appropriate for the model became necessary for the devotees and practitioners.

Additional iconic motifs reemphasizing Mary's perpetual virginity were established in the medieval and Baroque periods.

Most significant among these were the icons introduced as multiple elements of a single scene, such as the window through which the dove of the Holy Spirit enters Mary's bedroom without shattering the glass in representations of the Annunciation. The introduction of the motif of Mary kneeling before her newborn son in northern medieval depictions of the Nativity eventually resulted in the development of the iconography of the Adoration of the Child. This motif of Mary kneeling was derived from the Revelations of St. Bridget of Sweden (fourteenth century), in which the saint recounted her vision of the Nativity as an affirmation of Mary's perpetual virginity and the Immaculate Conception, for the birth mother suffered no pain as prescribed for the descendants of Eve in the Old Testament. Rather, according to St. Bridget, Mary merely knelt to meditate upon God's mysteries in the stable in Bethlehem, and when she finished her prayers she opened her eyes to find herself fully delivered of a healthy son. According to James's apocryphal Protoevangelium, the midwife Salome doubted the virginity of the birth and tried to examine the Virgin, whereupon she experienced a searing pain in her hand, which shriveled upon her touch. Only when she recanted her doubts and placed her hand on the Child was she cured. According to the modern critic Marina Warner, Robert Campin's The Nativity (before 1444) in Dijon, France, depicts this scene, while others, such as Piero della Francesca's The Nativity (before 1492) in the National Gallery in London, were influenced by St. Bridget's visions. The narrative and imagery was banned by the Council of Trent (1545–1565) and do not appear after that date.

Other medieval legends and devotions of the Virgin Mary led to the initiation of iconographies of the Assumption (declared dogma by Rome in 1950) and the Immaculate Conception (declared dogma by Rome in 1854). These two motifs were further developed by Baroque artists who sought to defend Mary's uniqueness against the attacks of the Protestant reformers. The iconography of the Dormition of Mary (later misidentified in Western Christian art as the Death of the Virgin) developed from the Byzantine iconography of the Koimesis (Falling Asleep), and reached a zenith in Baroque art as a further visual defense of Mary's singularity and perpetual virginity. Just as she was exempt from "the curse of Eve" in childbirth by grace of the Immaculate Conception (which also freed her from the limitation of human lust), so too was Mary freed from "the sting of death." Medieval devotions and devotional images of the Dormition, for example, emphasized both her perpetual virginity and freedom from physical death by including the leitmotif of the dropping of her girdle upon the head of the Apostle Thomas (also known as Thomas the Doubter). Works of art depicting the various stages of the Virgin Mary's life are treated elsewhere in this encyclopedia (see the Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Place and Concepts under Mary/Virgin/Madonna).

By the Renaissance, the traditional iconographic elements of virginity—long flowing hair, long white dress, veil, white flowers, and child attendants (the medieval Christian alternative to little animal companions)—became the symbols of the bride. Such a secularization of the previously sacred iconography and understanding of virginity reflected its complete transformation in Western culture from the initial classical model of a woman "belonging-to-no-man," to the patriarchal cultural requirement for the paternity of children, to Christian martyrdom, to the modes of the Virgin Mary and Christian female monastics, and finally to its socialization as the attributes of the secular bride.

Two variants on the theme of virginity influenced the artistic traditions of Western culture. The first of these variants was the iconography of virginity renewed or reborn, as established in the iconography and mythology of Hera and Aphrodite, both of whom had their virginity renewed through ritual bathing. This classical ritual bathing was paralleled both narratively and iconographically in Western Christian art in representations of newly baptized Christian women such as Mary of Egypt, who previously had led a life of sexual activity (whether as wives, courtesans, or prostitutes) and were now "restored" to physical perfection by a new life in Christ, as well as in representations of Mary Magdalen and the iconographic motif of her tears, which signified her repentance and sorrow and thereby restored her. By the fourth century Mary Magdalen was a conflation of at least five women from the New Testament and was identified by the honorific term virgin in ecclesiastical prayers, hymns, and other texts.

The other variant on the theme of virginity was that of virgin birth. In this case the classical model was the legend and iconography of the birth of Erichthonius, the first king of Athens, Greece. Hephaestus, son of Zeus and Hera and the God of fire, in a thwarted effort to possess the virgin goddess, Athena, watched as his ejaculated sperm fell from her leg and onto the ground (Mother Earth). Mother Earth soon gave birth to Erichthonius, assisted in the delivery by Athena. Visual parallels can easily be drawn between Hellenistic renderings of the spray of Hephaestus's sperm falling from Athena's thigh to the ground and renderings of the rays of light that surround the descent of the dove (the Holy Spirit) onto the Virgin Mary's womb (or ear, head, or heart, depending upon the artistic and theological intent).

The signs and symbols of virginity from both the classical and the Christian world were borrowed self-consciously in the iconography of the sixteenth-century portraits of Elizabeth I, Queen of England. In order to emphasize her independence from foreign entanglements, particularly the courts of France and Spain who sought her hand in marriage, Elizabeth blatantly portrayed her status, in both text and image, as a virgin, a woman "belonging-to-no-man." Queen Elizabeth I (circa 1580) by an unknown, probably Italian school painter, now in the Pinacoteca Nazionale in Siena, Italy, depicts her holding a sieve, said to be her favorite device (Gaunt, p. 40). It refers to Pliny's (the Elder or the Younger?) story of Tuccia, the Roman vestal virgin who proved her chastity by carrying water in a sieve from the Tiber back to the Temple of Vesta (Natural History, 28:12). In the same portrait she also wears a conspicuous brooch with a pendant pearl. The pendant pearl, like the rose—also used by Elizabeth—was a symbol associated with the Virgin, but one that had the advantage of avoiding the implication of Mariolatry in Protestant England, as it had other associations as well. In Queen Elizabeth I (The "Ermine" Portrait) (late sixteenth century) attributed to Nicholas Hilliard, an ermine (a kind of weasel), an animal whose white winter coat was associated with the spotlessness of virginity, adorns her arm. According to legend, an ermine would die if its whiteness were soiled. An attribute of chastity, the ermine also graced the cloaks of virgin saints, particularly St. Ursula, as well as the robes of royalty. By using these and other classical and Christian symbols of virginity, Elizabeth I advertised her all-encompassing chastity and purity among women, as well as her uniqueness as an impenetrable monarch of the English nation.

See also Annunciation; Bath/Bathing; Birth/Childbirth; Hermaphrodite/Androgyne; Margins/Outsiders; Marriage/Betrothal; Whiteness

Selected Works of Art

Aphrodite/Venus

Aphrodite on a Goose, terra-cotta statuette, fifth century B.C., Paris, Louvre

Aphrodite, terra-cotta vessel, 480–470 B.C., London, British Museum

Ludovisi Throne (Throne of Venus), Parian marble relief, 480–450 B.C., Rome, Museo Nazionale Romano delle Terme

Medici Venus, marble, third century B.C., Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery

Athena

Phidias, Athena Parthenos, fifth century B.C., Athens, Greece, Parthenon Museum

Mourning Athena, fifth century B.C., Athens, Greece, Acropolis

Athena, terra-cotta vessel, 480–470 B.C., Munich, Germany, Museum Antiker Kleinkunst

Athena, gilt bronze relief plaque, circa 500 B.C., Athens, Greece, National Archaeological Museum

Athena, Roman copy after Phidias, fourth century B.C., Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Virgin Goddesses

Pandora Rising from the Earth, terra-cotta vessel, 500–475 B.C., Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale

Young Goddess (Demeter Kore or Hecate), relief, fourth century B.C., Athens, Greece, National Art Museum

Kore, terra-cotta vessel, Berlin, Staatliche Museum

Goddess Rising from the Earth, terra-cotta vessel, circa fourth century B.C., Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux d'Art et d'Histoire

Vestal Virgin, bronze statue, circa second century A.D., Paris, Louvre

Neroccio di Bartolomeo de' Landi, and Master of the Griselda Legend, Claudia Quinta, oil on wood, circa 1494, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Virgin Mary

Giotto, Madonna and Child, oil on wood, circa 1320–1330, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Paolo di Giovanni Fei, The Assumption of the Virgin, oil on wood, circa 1385, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Eyck, Jan van, The Annunciation, oil on canvas transferred from wood, circa 1434–1436, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Lippi, Filippo, The Annunciation, oil on wood, after 1440, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
Campin, Robert, follower of, Madonna and Child with Saints in the Enclosed Garden, oil on wood, circa 1440–1460, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Giovanni di Paolo, The Annunciation, oil on wood, circa 1445, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Tura, Cosimo, Allegory of Spring, oil on panel, 1460–1463, London, National Gallery

Master of the St. Lucy Legend, Mary, Queen of Heaven, oil on wood, circa 1485–1500, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Sittow, Michel, The Assumption of the Virgin, oil on wood, circa 1500, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Juan de Flandes, The Annunciation, oil on wood, circa 1510, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Girolamo da Carpi, The Apparition of the Virgin, oil on wood, circa 1530–1540, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Rubens, Peter Paul, The Assumption of the Virgin, oil on wood, circa 1626, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Rubens, Peter Paul, Virgin of the Immaculate Conception, 1628–1629, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Poussin, Nicholas, The Assumption of the Virgin, oil on canvas, circa 1626, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Van Dyck, Anthony, The Assumption of the Virgin, oil on canvas, 1628–1632, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Immaculate Conception

Giotto, Meeting at the Golden Gate, fresco, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel

Tibaldi, Pellegrino, Embrace at the Golden Gate, fresco, before 1596, El Escorial, Spain

Velázquez, Diego, The Immaculate Conception, circa 1618, London, National Gallery

Rubens, Peter Paul, Virgin of the Immaculate Conception, 1628–1629, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Zurbarán, Francisco de, The Blessed Virgin Immaculately Conceived, with Saint Anne and Saint Joachim, circa 1630–1640, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland

Reni, Guido, Virgin of the Immaculate Conception, before 1642, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Murillo, Bartolomé, Virgin of the Immaculate Conception with Six Figures, 1662–1665, Paris, Louvre

Virgin Saints and Martyrs

Roundel of Saint Thecla in the Lion's Den, fifth century, Kansas City, Missouri, Nelson-Atkins Museum

Procession of Virgin Martyrs, mosaic, sixth century, Ravenna, Italy, San Apollinare Nuovo

Saint Barbara, wood statue, tenth century, Ravello, Italy, Cathedral

Reliquary of Saint Foy, tenth century, Conques, Treasury, Cathedral of St. Foy
 Sassetta (attributed to), Saint Apollonia, oil on wood, circa 1435, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Piero della Francesca (workshop of), Saint Apollonia, oil on wood, before 1470, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 El Greco, Madonna and Child with Saint Martina and Saint Agnes, oil on canvas, 1579–1599, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Flandrin, Hippolyte-Jean, Procession of Virgins, fresco, before 1864, Nîmes, France, St. Paul

Virgin Birth: Athena

Birth of Erichthonius, red-figured stamnos, circa 465–460 B.C., Munich, Germany, Museum Antiker Kleinkunst
Birth of Erichthonius, red-figured hydria, circa 460–450 B.C., London, British Museum
 Raphael, The Birth of Erichthonius, fresco, 1516, Vatican, Stufetta del Cardinal Bibbiena Rubens, Peter Paul, The Daughters of Cecrops Discovering Erichthonius, circa 1615, Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Liechtenstein Collection
 Jordaens, Jacob, The Daughters of Cecrops Finding the Child Erichthonius, 1635–1640, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Virgin Birth: Nativity

Duccio di Buoninsegna, Nativity with the Prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, oil on wood, circa 1308–1311, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Martino di Bartolomeo, Five Scenes from the Life of St. Bridget, panels, before 1434, Berlin, Staatliche Museen, Gemäldegalerie
 Campin, Robert, The Nativity, before 1444, Dijon, France, Musée
 Christus, Petrus, The Nativity, oil on wood, circa 1450, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Piero della Francesca, The Nativity, oil on panel, before 1492, London, National Gallery

Elizabeth I

Queen Elizabeth I, probably Italian school, circa 1580, Siena, Italy, Pinacoteca Nazionale
 Hilliard, Nicolas (attributed to), Queen Elizabeth I (The "Ermine" Portrait), late sixteenth century, Hatfield House, Marquis of Salisbury Collection

Further Reading

ARAS Photo Archives, Carl Gustav Jung Center, New York City
 Christ, Carol P. "Virgin Goddesses," Encyclopedia of Religion, edited by Mircea Eliade, New York: Macmillan, 1987; London: Collier, 1987
 Clark, Kenneth, The Nude: A Study in Ideal Form, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1956
 Downing, Christine, Goddess: Mythological Images of the Feminine, New York: Crossroad, 1981
 Drijvers, Hans J. W., "Virginity," Encyclopedia of Religion, edited by Mircea Eliade, New York: Macmillan, 1987; London: Collier, 1987
 Friedrich, Paul, The Meanings of Aphrodite, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973
 Gaunt, William, Court Painting in England from Tudor to Victorian Times, London: Constable, 1980
 Graves, Robert, The White Goddess, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1982
 Hackett, Helen, Virgin Mother, Maiden Queen: Elizabeth I and the Cult of the Virgin Mary, London and New York: Macmillan, 1995
 Hall, Nor, The Moon and the Virgin: Reflections on the Archetypal Feminine, New York: Harper, 1980
 Miles, Margaret Ruth, Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West, New York: Vintage, 1991; Tunbridge Wells, England: Burns and Oates, 1992
 Neumann, Erich, The Great Mother, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1955
 Olsen, Carl, editor, The Book of the Goddess: Past and Present, New York: Crossroad, 1983
 Onians, Richard Broxton, The Origins of European Thought, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1954
 Segal, Muriel, Virgins: Reluctant, Dubious and Avowed, New York: Macmillan, 1977
 Sissa, Guila, Greek Virginity, translated by Arthur Goldhammer, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990
 Stratton, Suzanne L., The Immaculate Conception in Spanish Art, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994
 Strong, Roy Colin, Portraits of Queen Elizabeth I, Oxford: Clarendon, 1963; New York: Thames and Hudson, 1987
 Tannahill, Reay, Sex in History, New York: Stein and Day, 1980
 Warner, Marina, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary, New York: Vintage, 1976

VIRTUE/VIRTUES

Liana De Girolami Cheney

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Virtue/Virtues:

VIRTUES IN SERIES

TEMPERANCE

PRUDENCE (INCLUDING WISDOM)

COURAGE/FORTITUDE

JUSTICE

CHARITY

FAITH (INCLUDING RELIGION)

HOPE

FELICITY

NEOCLASSIC AND GENRE
PAINTING

Giorgio Vasari, Prudence, 1545, fresco painting from the Refectory of Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Naples, Italy. (Courtesy of Foto F. Rigamonti)

The concept of virtue (Latin virtus, meaning “manliness”) parallels the concept of excellence (Greek arete), an ethical signification with implications of strength, courage, and achievement. An honorable individual is a virtuous person who lives in accord with certain moral standards and acts with power, efficacy, and success. Aristotle made the distinction between intellectual and moral virtues, relating the former to the theoretical life and the latter to the practical life. For Aristotle, moral virtue requires the development of habits leading to the choice of the mean between extremes in human conduct.

In the Middle Ages, Christian moralists spoke of the seven virtues, adding the theological virtues (hope, faith, and charity) to St. Ambrose's cardinal virtues (justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance). Their action was based on Plato's classification in the writings of Cicero and on Thomas Aquinas's writings. Since antiquity, the development of the concept of virtue was associated with its opposite: vice. Theological and philosophical analysis of good and evil, right and wrong, and value and disvalue continued in the Middle Ages, culminating with Prudentius's Psychomachia (O'Reilly, 1983).

In Psychomachia, Prudentius classifies the four classical, or cardinal, virtues as justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude (St. Ambrose, in Lucan V, 62, and De paradiso III). Each of the cardinal virtues had a life in art independent of the other three. In antiquity, justice and wisdom (prudence) were most often represented in coinage. In the Middle Ages and Renaissance, certain aspects of temperance, such as pudicitia (chastity) and sobrietas (moderation), were emphasized in iconographic cycles, as seen in the representations of Petrarch's trionfi (triumphs) in Italian hope chests (cassoni). The personification of these virtues in art is the subject of this essay.

Although there were individual examples of the cardinal virtues in late antiquity, their proper iconography is not established until the Carolingian period. A poem by Theodulf of Orleans describing the images on a plaque in the Palace at Aachen sets the stage for the iconography of the moral virtues. The plaque depicts a tree rooted in a globe with branches carrying the personifications of the cardinal virtues as well as the liberal arts. The virtues are portrayed with a set of attributes: Prudence with a book; Fortitude with a dagger, shield, and helmet; Justice with a sword, a palm-branch, a set of balances, and a crown; and Temperance with a bridle and a scourge (O'Reilly).

In the ninth century, the cardinal virtues, with less elaborate attributes, are usually depicted in title pages of Gospel books or other liturgical texts. They decorate the four corners of the page, usually enclosed in medallion form, while the center of the page represents a Frankish king or biblical ruler, often King David. The association of the cardinal virtues with the ruler implies that good government or a good ruler must be gifted with these moral virtues or must aspire to achieve them to reign well. For example, the Vivian Bible (843–851) depicts all four virtues as half-figures (two male and two female) holding palm branches and extending their hands toward the central figure, King David. During the ninth century, the portrayal of the cardinal virtues is static, contrasting with the fifth-century representations based on Prudentius's Psychomachia, which are portrayed in combat with vices. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, changes occurred that led to the cardinal virtues being illustrated in devotional and theological treatises, deluxe Gospel books, sacramentaries, and lectionaries as well as on small objects of devotion, such as portable altars, shrines, reliquaries, fonts, and candlesticks (Katzenellenbogen, 1964). During the Gothic period, the cardinal virtues are accompanied not only by their traditional attributes but also by specific animals associated with their personifications. For example, Prudence is accompanied by a serpent or dove, Fortitude tears apart the jaws of a lion, Justice carries a plumb line or a set square while holding a sword, and Temperance holds flowers or a sheathed sword and most often two vessels in which she mixes water and wine, a symbol of moderation. In the proto-Renaissance period, Giotto revived and popularized the moral virtues and vices in the fresco cycle of the Scrovegni or Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy (1305).

The literary tradition from antiquity to the Middle Ages greatly influenced the interest, development, and emblematic interpretation of the moral virtues in the Renaissance and Baroque periods. To the Platonic virtues (justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance) and the Pauline virtues (faith, hope, and charity), Vincent of Beauvais's Speculum morale and Aquinas's Summa Theologia added Augustinian gift virtues of the Holy Spirit in the twelfth century.

The most influential book during the thirteenth century was Somme le Roi, commissioned by King Philip of France in 1295. This profusely illustrated manuscript depicted Temperance as a woman at a table refusing an offered goblet of wine. The visual tradition in French manuscripts is to represent Temperance as a woman with a pitcher from which she pours water into a bowl. With the impact of Prudentius's Psychomachia in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, numerous reliefs appeared on the portals of French Gothic cathedrals, such as those in Amiens, Chartres, Paris, and Reims (Katzenellenbogen, 1964). Mosaic decorations in Italy also reflected this influence. The mosaic pavements in Pavia and Cremona; the choir mosaics of San Savino in Piacenza (1107), where Temperance is represented in a scene of festivity; and the mosaics in the Cupola of the Ascension in St. Mark's (1200) in Venice are examples from the Italian Romanesque period. The implication of the symbolism of Temperance varies according to the placement in the iconographic cycle. Sometimes the personification of chastity substitutes for Temperance according to the Ciceronian tradition (Tuve, 1963). At other times, as in the proto-Renaissance period, Giotto represents the virtue of Temperance as Moderation, with an unusual attribute of the sheathed sword. Temperance is contrasted with the vice of Wrath tearing her garments in the Scrovegni or Arena Chapel in Padua (1305) as well as in the north porch of Notre Dame Cathedral at Chartres. The impact of Giotto's art gave the cardinal virtues a new expression in Italian art of the fourteenth century. Examples may be seen in the iconographic decoration of Andrea da Firenze in the fresco of the Triumph of St. Thomas in the Spanish Chapel in Santa Maria Novella in Florence as well as in Andrea Pisano's pulpits in Pisa, Pistoria, and Siena; the baptisteries of Florence, Bergamo, and Pisa; Giotto's bell tower in Florence with Pisano's representations of the virtues, along with the liberal arts, mechanical arts, and sacraments; the tabernacles of Or San Michele in Florence; and the tombs of St. Peter Martyr in Milan and St. Augustine in Pavia.

During the Italian Renaissance, the symbolism of the cardinal virtues as secular and civic examples of humanism was revived from the classical concept of aretai politikai (Norton, 1973). This classical revival occurred in Florence, as this Medicean city-state aimed to emulate the prosperous city-state of Athens, Greece, during the fifth century B.C. In Florence, for example, the decoration in the Loggia dei Lanzi, the seven panels painted by Antonio Pollaiuolo and Botticelli for the Mercanzia (now in the Uffizi Gallery), and Giotto's frescoes of the personification of the Commune in the Palace of the Podestà reflected this revival. In Venice, the columns of the Doges' Palace and the Porta della Carta, with the flanked statues of Fortitude, Temperance, Justice, and Charity, and in Perugia, the Collegio del Cambio, represented the cardinal virtues in a secular environment. In Siena, in the Palazzo Pubblico, the Lorenzetti brothers represented Good and Bad Government with these Virtues; it is important to note that in the Good Government fresco, Temperance holds an hourglass (a pun on tempus), as in the earliest tradition.

In the northern Renaissance, the cardinal virtues had maintained the traditional iconography of the Middle Ages, although fewer examples were seen in France and England. In the Low Countries, the emphasis was on the depictions of Fortitude, Prudence, and Temperance with changeable attributes while Justice maintained the traditional motif. For example, the column of Samson as a symbol of strength is associated with Fortitude; Prudence holds a mirror with a coiled serpent and Janus head to denote past and future or three heads to imply the wisdom of experience—past, present, and future; and Temperance is portrayed with a bridle, a sheathed sword, or an hourglass. The personification of Temperance experiences the greatest mutability. At times, she alludes to chastity, and therefore the ancient Venus Pudica is represented, as in the Giovanni Pisano pulpit (1301) in the Duomo of Pisa, or at other times to Diana, as in the tomb of Pope Pius II (1473) in San Andrea della Valle in Rome.

In the sixteenth century, French artists, under the influence of Italian painters and sculptors, began to incorporate the cardinal virtues in their funerary art, as seen in Michel Colombe's tombs of the Duke of Brittany in Nantes (1507) and the cardinals d'Amboise in Rouen (1515). However, some variations occur in their attributes of the personifications, such as the addition of a compass and mirror to Prudence, a tower and dragon to Fortitude, scales and swords to Justice, and a clock and bridle to Temperance (Tuve, 1963).

In antiquity, mythical and historical figures were linked to a particular virtue, and this tradition continued into the Middle Ages as well as the Renaissance. For example, Samson was identified as Fortitude and Judith, Susanna, or Joseph as Chastity or Temperance; Epicurus is defeated by Temperance; and Prudence may triumph over Sardanapalus, Justice over Nero, and Fortitude over Holofernes. The Christian paganism of these cardinal virtues in the Renaissance was due to the fusion of historical ascription with the civic humanistic implication producing their secularization. Further examples are clearly represented in Francesco Pesellino's panels (1460), now in Birmingham, Alabama, showing Solon, Solomon, Samson, and Scipio Africanus sitting at the feet of the personifications of Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance, respectively (Norton, 1973). In the Collegio del Cambio in Perugia, Italy, Perugino depicted a complex iconography correlating Greek and Roman rulers with the moral virtues: Justice is associated with Camillus, Pittacus, and Trajan; Prudence with Quintus Fabius Maximus, Socrates, and Numa Pompilius; Fortitude with Lucius, Scipinnus, Leonidas, and Horatius Cocles; and Temperance with Scipio Africanus, Pericles, and Cincinnatus.

Inspired by the ancient tradition (Aristotle, the Neoplatonists, Plutarch, Pliny the Elder) medieval and Renaissance artists and writers included and associated animals with the personifications of virtues and vices in treatises such as the Bestiary, Physiologus, and Somme le Roi. A dove, for example, accompanied Chastity, Peace, or Temperance; a serpent, Prudence; and a lion, Fortitude.

The heraldic and emblematic tradition of the sixteenth through the eighteenth centuries augmented and further elaborated on the iconography of the cardinal virtues. A collection of books and compendia of emblems that gave impetus to a new and complex visual iconology in art appeared in the press in Venice during the early sixteenth century. The earliest and most translated emblem book of the sixteenth century was Andrea Alciati's Emblematum libellus cum commentariis (1531), influenced by the epigrams of the Greek Anthology, Francesco Colonna's Hypnertomachia Poliphili (The Dream of Poliphilo or The Soul of Love), printed in Venice in 1499, and Horapollo's Hieroglyphica, first published in Venice in 1505. Alciati was followed by Piero Valeriano's Hieroglyphica sive De sacris Aegyptorum, first published in 1556, and Vincenzo Cartari's Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, printed in Venice in 1557. Attesting to the impact of this emblematic tradition are the following: the decorative cycles executed between 1518 and 1519 by Correggio in the Camera di San Paolo in Parma, Italy (Panofsky, 1951), and by Giorgio Vasari for his houses in Arezzo, Italy (1542–1548), and Florence (1562–1564); for the Sala dei Cento Giorni in the Palazzo della Cancelleria (1546) in Rome; and, as the culmination, the decoration of the Palazzo Vecchio (1565–1572) in Florence. This encyclopedic emblematic approach culminated in the publication of Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1593). This work first appeared without illustrations and later was published in Rome (1603) with over 400 woodcuts by Giuseppe Cesari, also known as Cavalier d'Arpino, illustrating the text (Mandowsky, 1934). Under the proliferation of meanings, the cardinal virtues also expand their repertoire of attributes: An ostrich is associated with Justice because of its even feathers, a deer is paired with Prudence because it ponders like a sage, a diamond is paired with Fortitude for its hardness, and a pair of red-hot tongs and bowl of water are paired with Temperance for moderation. In the visual arts, Ripa's Iconologia has assisted artists in the creation of personifications since its conception.

Neoclassical artists of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries and genre painters of the nineteenth century were greatly concerned with issues of virtue and morality. However, instead of using personifications of the virtues (as described in this essay), these artists tended to depict exemplary virtuous actions. These were taken from antiquity and history in the case of neoclassical paintings and from instances of everyday life in the case of genre painting (Rosenblum, chap. 2; Wood).

In the canon of the cardinal virtues, Temperance (Greek Sophrosyne, Latin temperantia) alluded to moderation, self-knowledge, and self-restraint. According to Cicero, the word sophrosyne derives from the Homeric adjective sophron, meaning of sound mind and describing a person or deity who acts appropriately and according to the laws of nature. The Delphic code—"Know thyself," "Nothing in excess," and "Think moral thoughts"—expresses the implications of temperance.

Temperance is the classical virtue of moderation, self-restraint, and control of one's appetites. Most representations depict a figure pouring liquid from one container into another, suggesting proportion. The flowing liquid is the water of life, pouring into the container of each separate physical body. Sometimes Temperance is the Angel of Time because the balancing of one liquid with another alludes to the flowing or passing of time from past to future. Time, like Temperance, is an equalizer of life and death.

Pieter Bruegel the Elder's print Temperance (1560) depicts a central figure holding a rein in his mouth, meaning to restrain. Behind him, people are using measuring instruments; to the right, a bookkeeper is busy counting. An inscription states, "We must see to it that we do not give ourselves over to a life of lust, extravagance and waste, and that we not, because of miserly greed, behave despicable or meanly." The inscription alludes to the group of actors and musicians who stand behind Temperance.

In 1614 Torrentius, also known as Johannes van der Beeck, painted Temperance, now in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands. It alludes to Erasmus's motto "Not too much," which was later appropriated in Roemer Visscher's and Jacob Cats's proverbs "Too much is unhealthy," "Not how much but how noble," and "Whoever exceeds the measure is lost." All these proverbs obviously allude to moderation in the areas of drinking, eating, talking, and lovemaking. In the seventeenth century, the virtue of temperance was contrasted with vanitas (vanity), the vice of pride (Segal, p. 36).

The moral virtue Prudence symbolized wise conduct. In Christian art, this personification is usually depicted as a woman with a double or triple head and holding a mirror, serpent, or sieve with Solomon at her feet. Sometimes Prudence is portrayed carrying a compass as a sign of her measured judgment or a book alluding to the Scriptures. She is occasionally accompanied by a stag to suggest the elusion of evil pursuers; sometimes a dragon is substituted for the serpent. Her Janus head suggests her ability to see at once past and present and alludes to her perspicacity. Proto-Renaissance examples of Prudence can be found in the Scrovegni or Arena Chapel in Padua, where Giotto portrays Prudence with two heads (1305), and in the pulpit of the Baptistery in Pisa by Nicola Pisano (1310).

Of all the virtues, prudence was the dearest to the Renaissance humanists, so much so that Alciati included 10 emblems on this virtue in his book Emblematum liber (Lyons, France, 1549). Emblem 18, Prudentes, describes the pictura (image) in the epigram as follows:

Janus, you who have been provided with two faces, you know the past and the future; and since you see what is offered to you, you can mock what has happened. Why have you been depicted with so many faces? Is it perhaps because a strong and wise man should be such that at the same time can see the present and the future?

Titian's painting Prudence, with its three human and three animal heads facing in different directions, clearly illustrates Alciati's emblem. Alciati's Emblem 19, Prudens magis quam loquax (The prudent man without eloquence), describes the pictura in the epigram as follows:

For its arms Athens has an owl depicted, which loved by Athena (Pallas) as the most prudent of birds signifies the man who is wise but not eloquent. It happened that it supplanted the insolent and garrulous crow. And it shows that knowledge of men does not consist of fine speeches.

Alciati's Emblem 20, Maturandum (The wise decisions should be implemented at the right time), is explained in the epigram as follows:

That in all our undertakings we should be quick to work and slow to talk. The fish wrapped around the arrow indicates that it can stop a ship in very strong winds. May these increase our prudence, oh you who are keen on examining closely. The one is slow, the other is swift. Thus things that are deliberated with such maturity will be well dealt with.

The Renaissance popularity of this emblem—an anchor and a dolphin coupled with the motto Festina lente (Make haste slowly)—was linked to the writings and descriptions of hieroglyphics by Colonna in Hypnerotomachi Poliphili (1499), a book published by the Venetian printer Aldus Manutius, who in turn used this motto as a seal for his press. In antiquity, this motto had also been praised and used by the Roman emperor Octavian, and the emblem had appeared on coins in the reign of Titus. Alciati's Emblem 22, Custodiendas virgines (Virgins must be protected well), is explained in the epigram as follows:

What you see here is the image of unwed Athena (Pallas); and this depicted dragon is hers; and because to it is given the guard and protection of things, it makes its dwelling the woods and temples. Here it shows us that because bold Eros (Amor) sets his snares to catch virgins, one must place great protection over them. The shield with the head of the Medusa and the dragon allude to defense and protection.

According to Macrobius's Saturnalia (I, Chap. XX, Lyon 1556) and Pausanias's Graeciae descriptio (I, 24, 7), Phidias carved a dragon as a symbol of vigilance and protection at the feet of Pallas Athena. Another aspect of prudent behavior is recorded in Alciati's Emblem 23, Vino prudentiam augeri (Prudence augments with wine), and the epigram reads as follows:

Athena (Pallas) and Bacchus, learned offspring of Jupiter, share this sacred altar. He came into the world from the thigh and she was born from the head. Athena found the olive, Bacchus wine. Therefore, they are joined here together to show that he who abstains completely from wine will never find favor with the goddess. The emblem depicts both gods in a temple because both gods are personifications of divine gifts, Pallas Athena as the goddess of arts and sciences represents the prudent intellect, as the inventor of the olive tree, provides the light for the intellect, whereas Bacchus as the creator of wine restores and stimulates the intellect.

Under the influence of the emblematic tradition, sixteenth-century painters incorporated in their paintings new images and meanings that provided enigmas for the learned viewer. Vasari's image of Prudence is a stylistic fusion of the two images of Prudence and Providence in the Refectory of Monteoliveto in Naples, Italy, and the figure of Providence in the Sala dei Cento Giorni in Rome. Vasari described the invenzione of Prudence as "to hold serpents and the keys of Janus." In his Aretine Prudence, missing are the serpent, relating to Matthew 10:16, "Be prudentes (wise) as serpents," and the mirror, an Italian Renaissance conception, whereas they are present in the Neapolitan image. Instead, the Aretine allegorical figure has a Janus head and holds the key to the Janus temple. The Janus head implies that Prudence must look to the past as well as the future before making a decision Prevedere e Provvedere, and her key is a symbol of peace (Alciati, Emblemata XVIII, Prudentes Problema, 1577). Stephenus (1976) described Janus as the most ancient king of Italy, supposedly the wisest of all the monarchs of his age, knowing the past and foreseeing the future, which is why he is shown with two faces. When he died, he was put among the gods and had a temple at Rome that was opened in times of war and closed in times of peace.

Iconographically, Vasari's Aretine Prudence combines attributes from the Prudentia and Providenza. As stated, the Aretine figure can be identified as Prudence because she has not only the attribute of the key but also the head of Janus. Also, she can be identified as Providence and good Fortune because she holds a cornucopia and rests her foot on a globe. Comparing the Aretine image of Prudence with Providence in the Sala dei Cento Giorni reveals a globe at her feet. The Aretine image of the globe is unclear because of heavy restoration. The cornucopia is a symbol of plenitude, the globe that of ubiquity.

When the attribute of the key is seen to be associated with Providence, it expresses a relation to the attribute of Cybele, the Earth goddess. Then the key symbolizes the guidance needed to open the door to success and thereby rise above the difficulties of life. Vasari represented this image, with its dual nature, to emphasize the difficulties encountered by a person in this Earth's trials. Human beings must be prudent to achieve success in life.

The Monteolivetan Prudence, surrounded with all her attributes of practical and speculative wisdom—mirror, serpent, key, and Janus head—attends to her toilet. Her engaging attitude denotes her existence in the present. A superb drawing by Vasari on the allegory of Prudence can be found in the Collection F. Lugt of the Institut Neerlandais in Paris (inv. 7777); another drawing of Prudence (13650F) is at the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. Vasari's disegno differs from his painted image. The drawing illustrates an elaborate holder for the mirror and includes objects (e.g., vanity table, comb, and brush) not seen in the painting; it also includes the serpent as a caution and a dispenser of wisdom. Alciati, in Emblematum libellus (1542), also incorporates these two attributes—Emblem 18 on the Janus head and Emblem 22 on the serpent: "The serpent protects the virgins." The word serpent derives from the Latin serpens "because the animal creeps by secret approaches and not by open steps."

The personification of Fortitude alludes to two aspects of courage: physical and mental. In Christian art, this personification refers to the pagan goddess Athena (Minerva) and is usually depicted as a woman warrior, wearing a helmet and armor and holding a shield, spear, or sword. In Gothic sculpture, her opposing vice is Cowardice (Ignavia), a knight who flees in terror from a hare; in the Renaissance, she is more often opposed by Inconstancy, who loses her balance on a wheel. Some attributes of Fortitude in the Renaissance and later are derived from the heroes of the Bible and myth. From Samson she has a pillar, perhaps broken, whereas in Baroque painting she may be carried by putti. A club and a lion's skin are taken from Hercules. The lion, itself a symbol of courage, is a common attribute. Fortitude may fight a lion, forcing its jaws apart, which is the archetypal image of the god or hero performing a feat of strength and courage, as seen in Renaissance tarot cards.

Although the image in Vasari's Aretine house is unclear, comparison with a similar painting from the Refectory reveals its proper attributes and identification as Fortitude (Courage). The Aretine Fortitude is depicted as an armed woman with a Herculean body who wears a helmet and carries a sword and a shield. Later, Ripa's Iconologia described this type of figure as an armed woman with a helmet, a sword, and a shield and with a lion's head. However, Vasari's shield shows the head of the Medusa with lionlike qualities. The attributes of Fortitude symbolize bodily strength and the generosity of the soul. She represents a Christian, cardinal virtue. In the treatment of this figure, Vasari was probably concerned to illustrate Valeriano's saying Fortezza d'animo, e di corpo (Fortitude of soul and body).

Perhaps Fortitude also personifies Sagacity or Reason. The implication of the symbolism of Fortitude varies according to its placement in the iconographic cycle. Sometimes the personification of Courage substitutes Sagacity according to the Ciceronian tradition (Tuve, 1963). Vasari described Sagacity (Sagacita) as a "Pallas with a shield with a Medusa and a lance." Vasari may also be referring to Alciati's Emblem 22, Custodiendas vergines. The depiction of the book at the feet of Fortitude in the Aretine imagery and in the Monteoliveto counterpart is a symbol of the mental effort necessary for the acquisition of knowledge. The horn seen in the Monteoliveto figure is no longer recognizable in the Aretine image. Perhaps Fortitude symbolized for Vasari the moral, mental, and physical efforts required of a person to live a good life.

Plato and Aristotle best explain the meaning and implication of the word justice, from the Latin jus (right or law). Plato held justice to be of two kinds: natural and conventional. In an ideal city, justice regulates the actions of the citizens with the other cardinal virtues (Republic 4:427 ff). Aristotle also held justice to be of two kinds: distributive and retributive. During the Middle Ages, Aquinas integrated the ancient analyses on justice by considering two aspects of justice: natural and rational, both discernible through the exercise of reason. In the medieval and Renaissance periods, Justice, the leader of the cardinal virtues, is represented in public buildings wherever the law is administered (Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, Italy). Macrobius's Commentary on Cicero's Somnium scipionis and Petrarch's Africa, texts concerned with the concept of justice, assumed that justice was a primary virtue that ought to accompany the life of a hero. The emblems associated with justice are the sword (symbol of power) and the scales. The scales of justice represent balance, equality, and harmony. The symbol of the scale is of ancient origin. The Greek Themis used it as a symbol of law, order, and truth, and the Romans employed it as a symbol of impartiality (Cooper, p. 145). In Renaissance art, Justice is often depicted blindfolded, alluding to her fairness and honesty. In representations of the Last Judgment, Justice may have an angel in each scale pan, one crowning the virtuous and the other executing a malefactor (Hall, p. 183). The scale, as an attribute of impartiality, is also the emblem of the Archangel Michael. In the seventeenth century, artists replaced the scales with fasces, the Roman symbol of authority. Other attributes associated with Justice are the globe, a symbol of power, and set squares, compasses, and other measuring instruments, symbols of impartiality. The zodiacal sign of Libra holds the scales as a symbol of Justice. During the Silver Age, in the Ages of the World, Justice ruled.

In his Vita, Vasari describes his invenzione of Justice for cardinal Alessandro Farnese:

(In 1543) It was shown by (Paolo) Giovio and Bindo (Altovito) to cardinal Farnese. For this prelate I did a painting eight braccia by four, of Justice embracing an ostrich laden with the twelve tables, holding a scepter with a swan at the end and wearing a helmet of iron and gold with three feathers of divers colors, the device of the just judge. She was naked from the middle upwards. At her girdle were the seven Vices in golden chains, Corruption, Ignorance, Cruelty, Fear; Treason, Falsehood, and Slander. They carry on their bare backs a naked Truth, offered to Time by Justice, with two doves, representing Innocence. Justice is putting an oaken crown, representing Fortitude, on the head of Truth. I put all my powers into this work. (Frey, I, pp. 121–122)

Obviously, the discrepancies between Vasari's description of the invenzione and the finished painting suggest that the description refers to an early conception or a preparatory drawing for the painting. At this point, one may ask the following questions: What are the sources for Vasari's complex iconography? How did he assimilate them? and What are the connections between the text (word) and the image for the creation of the conceit of Justice?

Vasari emphasizes in his writings, especially in the prefaces of Vite, that an allegory (emblem) must assimilate, visually and verbally, its ancient sources. Such emblematic sources provided Vasari with an extensive repertoire of images that he collected and used in the iconography of his early paintings, such as Justice (1543) in the Neapolitan Museum of Capodimonte. He repeated many of these images while expanding his visual repertoire in such later commissions as the paintings of the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence (Vasari and Milanesi, VIII, pp. 102–124; Draper).

Inspired by ancient myths recounted in Ovid's Metamorphoses (1.150), Hesiod's Theogony (901), and Hyginus's Poetic Astronomy (2.25), Vasari's Justice can be seen as a portrayal of Astraea, The Starry Maiden—the Roman goddess of justice. Under her protection thrives all that is noble, beautiful, and good. According to Eratosthenes, Aratus, and Hyginus, she was one of the nebulous heavenly beings who coexisted on Earth with mortals and was the last god/goddess to leave the Earth. She was supposed to have lived on Earth during the Golden Age, retired to the mountains in the Silver Age, and finally, during the corruption, wickedness, and impiety of humankind during the Bronze and Iron Ages and the end of innocence, was driven to heaven, where she was placed among the constellations of the zodiac under the name Virgo, or Starry Maiden. Astraea's Roman myth parallels and in part is assimilated by the Greek myth of Dike (Dice), the goddess of justice, which she protected and wisely administered. She was an attendant and counselor of her father, Zeus, and one of the three Horae (Hours/Seasons), the other two being Eirene (Irene), goddess of peace, and Eunomia, goddess of wise legislation and order. Dike's assistant was Poena, the personification of retaliation, and her daughter Hesychia personified tranquillity. As goddesses of the seasons, they produced order in both nature and society. They were the daughters of Zeus and Themis (Apollonius, Iliad 5; Pausanias 5.18.2; Pindar, Pythian Odes, 8.1) or of Astraeus and Eos (Eratosthenes, Star Placements, 9).

The depiction of Justice is associated by some with Liberality to emphasize the generous aspect of imparting order, law, and good behavior. Cesari painted The Allegory of Justice and The Allegory of Liberality (both 1595–1600) using oils on copper. From a comparative analysis of their composition, these two paintings appear to be companion pieces. Both compositions represent three allegorical figures with attributes in a pyramidal space. Also, the central figure in both is portrayed as an enthroned woman with the same physiognomy. The difference is in the type of background: The Allegory of Liberality is placed in an exterior setting and The Allegory of Justice in an interior setting. This complementary space structure supports their complementary purpose. Iconographically, the central figure represents a virtue or an allegory of positive behavior, and the two figures framing her in the foreground symbolize vices or allegories of negative behavior. When compared with each other, these vices manifest corresponding attitudes of the same negative human dimensions.

Using Ripa's figurazioni (emblems) from Iconologia to identify these allegorical figures, with their respective attributes, will aid in understanding the meaning of the painting and elucidate the visual collaboration of both artists in the images of the Iconologia. When analyzing The Allegory of Justice, one observes that the central figure is an enthroned female holding a pair of balanced scales, branches of palms, and gathered flowers. A crown adorns her hair, and a medallion with a painted eye decorates the neckline of her robe. Under a royal canopy, the enthroned figure sits erect and looks at the viewer kindly with wide-open eyes. The visual imagery of Cesari's figure parallels Ripa's description of the figurazione of Justice (or Impartiality or Equality). In the description of Justice, Ripa comments on Plato's views on this virtue: "Justice sees everything." For this reason, the ancient priests called her Seer of All Things.

At the feet of Justice, the figure of Injustice (or Partiality) sits on the ground with her eyes partially closed and her attributes of the unbalanced scales, a resting sword, a closed book, and a sheep or lamb at her feet. Injustice's general disposition of carelessness and passivity contrasts strongly with the violent expression of the arduous and ferocious standing male figure next to her who represents Impetus (or Terror). His attributes are an avenging sword and a violent animal, such as a boar or wolf. When comparing these foreground allegorical figures in terms of action and attributes, especially the associated animal and handling of the sword, it is obvious that an opposite image of human dimension is represented. Sluggish Injustice sits with the lamb or sheep beside her and the sword resting on her lap. Impetus energetically draws his sword while the accompanying animal parallels his master's aggressive behavior. Ripa comments on the depiction of Mars as Terror in Ovid moralise (Bruges, Belgium, 1480), where the figure of an angered Mars is traditionally accompanied by a wolf, a symbol of terrible force. The visage of Impetus suggests the reaction of an angry lion.

According to Ripa, Impetus and Injustice are figurazioni of vices, or negative aspects of the human dimension. They are manifestations of weak characters and negative responses in human behavior; they cannot govern or rule because they lack vitality, impartiality, equality, and balance. Justice is the opposite of these vices, and it represents a type of virtue in a human dimension. She also symbolizes an ultimate good to be emulated by all human beings. Thus, The Allegory of Justice combines an example of a good human dimension (Justice) with negative human dimensions (Injustice and Impetus), with a quality of judgment, a natural phenomenon that rules the universe. In The Allegory of Justice, Cesari has visually quoted Ripa's verbal descriptions for these figures and assimilated his didactic and ethical spirit.

Throughout the Middle Ages, Christian moralists such as Aquinas spoke of the seven virtues: the cardinal virtues of temperance, prudence, fortitude, and justice (previously discussed) and the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity, and love. Paul the Apostle had proclaimed these latter virtues as central to the Christian life.

The Latin word caritas (Greek agape) means love, according to Aquinas in Summa Theologia (IIa., IIae, Q XXIIIa.5). For the Greeks there were two types of love: eros and agape. According to Plato, eros meant the love or desire of the individual for the divine, whereas agape referred to contemplation for the attainment of the Good (Plato, Symposium 210A-E). In the New Testament, the two Platonic aspects of love were fused into one agape, which means God's love, His generous love (I John 4:8). Charity is the greatest of the three theological virtues—faith, hope, and charity—but their connection is still problematic for many scholars. For St. Paul, charity represented the highest virtue one could attain, a Christian attitude toward one's neighbor, and (rarely) the love of God (Romans 8:28; 1 Corinthians 2:9, 8:3, and 13: "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three: but the greatest of these is charity"). However, from the time of St. Augustine, charity has signified God's love of human beings as well as their love of God. Ultimately, the church taught that charity was both love of God, amor dei, and love of one's neighbor, amor proximi, and that the second was of no real worth without the first. Charity is directed primarily toward God but is also owed to us and our neighbors as the objects of God's love. Its antithesis is hatred (envy, cruelty, or avarice), which may also take the negative form of indifference. Because brotherly love could be expressed through the relief of distress, charity acquired the meaning of "almsgiving" or "clothing the naked," one of the works of mercy (see, e.g., the Baroque painter Caravaggio's Works of Mercy, 1605, for the church of Pio Monte della Misericordia in Naples).

The term caritas is applied also to the common religious meal that was used in the early church in conjunction with the Eucharist (I Corinthians 11:17–34). In Christian art, Charity is depicted as a woman either surrounded by children or, more commonly, nursing a child or suckling it. Sometimes Charity is standing, holding, or nursing one child while the others surround her, as seen in the paintings of Andrea del Sarto, Francesco Salviati, and Vasari. In other instances, Charity is seated and nursing her children, as in the paintings of Abraham Bloemaert, Guercino (in Dayton, Ohio), and Guido Reni. In Roman times, Valerius Maximus, in De pietate in parentes (4:4), tells us of Pera, a young mother who had nursed her aged father, Cimon, at her breast while he was in prison awaiting execution, thus saving him from dying of thirst. Her act was referred to as Caritas humana or Caritas romana (Biedermann). In antiquity, this type of charity alluded to filial piety (James Hall, p. 64). This subject was popularized by Italian and Netherlandish painters in the sixteenth through the eighteenth centuries, as seen in Caravaggio's Works of Mercy. Other symbols of Charity's love are the flaming heart that she holds in one hand or a bowl with fruit. She may carry an open purse and clothes to distribute alms to the poor. Further attributes associated with Charity include such animals as the dove, lamb, or pelican feeding its young from its own blood.

During the Middle Ages, love of one's neighbor, or amor proximi, was often depicted as a person receiving or nursing children or represented by Christ's seamless robe. In Gothic art especially, it is represented by the figure of a woman performing the six works of mercy (Matthew 25:35–37): tending the hungry, the thirsty, the stranger, the naked, the sick, and the imprisoned. These became abbreviated into the representation of one act only: clothing the naked (e.g., a beggar putting a shirt over his head beside the figure of Charity, who perhaps holds a bundle of clothes). In the thirteenth century, St. Bonaventura developed the concept of the love of God into that of light or fire, a rhetorical metaphor readily depicted in visual terms.

Henceforward in Italian art, the figure of Charity came to be represented either with a flame, customarily emerging from some type of vase that she holds in her hand, or with a candle. From the fourteenth century, she may hold a flaming heart as if she were offering it to God. This sometimes came to be combined with attributes suggesting earthly charity, such as the cornucopia or bowl of fruit. In Giotto's fresco cycle at Padua (1305), the cardinal and theological virtues face their contraries on the opposite wall of the Scrovegni or Arena Chapel. There, Giotto's representation of Charity is a young, garlanded woman demonstrating the twofold nature of her love—that is, the love of God and the love of her neighbors—by offering up her heart and holding a basket or bowl of fruit and flowers, a sack of corn, and coins at her feet, ready for distribution to the needy. The vice opposed to Charity in the Middle Ages was Avarice, depicted with money bags, a purse, or a filled coffer. A Renaissance tradition derived from Giotto substituted Envy (Invidia) for Avarice. This vice was shown gnawing a heart and perhaps embraced by a snake. In Italy in the first half of the fourteenth century, there appears a new type of Charity, possibly derived from the earlier image of the Virgo lactans, a woman suckling two infants (see Tino da Camaino's marble statue Charity, 1320, in the Museo Bardini in Florence). At first combined with the older motifs of the flaming heart (suggesting the utmost religious fervor) and the candle, it gradually predominated until, by the sixteenth century, it became the standard type of representation in European art. The opposing vice for this type of Charity, sometimes represented in fourteenth-century Italian painting, is Cruelty (Crudelitas), shown attacking a child. In later versions, three or four infants cluster around the mother figure. One of these infants is customarily at the breast, thus paralleling the motif of the pelican feeding its young with its own blood. These various aspects of Charity are frequently portrayed in art.

In the sixteenth century, Vasari's Charity became the paradigm for the visual depiction and meaning of Charity. According to Liana Cheney, in the Chamber of Fortune (his study) of his house in Arezzo, Italy, Vasari painted a bare-breasted, standing, and statuesque Charity who holds a nursing child in one arm while two other children stand next to her. The three children symbolize the three aspects of charity, that is, the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love (charity).

The female figure represents union of these three virtues in Ripa's Iconologia (1603). The figure of Charity personifies religion because she symbolizes the three theological virtues given to human beings by the love of God (amor dei). Her qualities of generosity and love for humankind, which are emulated by good Christians (amor proximi), are also important to her role as the personification of religion. Stylistically, the Aretine Charity represents a visual derivation from Vasari's early depiction of Charity in the Refectory of Monteoliveto. Vasari made a fine preparatory drawing for this image, now located in the Pinacoteca of Bologna, Italy. Thematically, Vasari used a similar image in the Sala dei Cento Giorni. In Iconologia, Ripa assimilates Vasari's image into an emblem of Charity as Virgo lactans and has transformed the strands of her hair into a flaming fire symbolizing Christ's love. Furthermore, Ripa employs the image of flaming fire for his representation of religion's emblem, which shows a veiled woman holding flames of fire, symbolic of ardent and continuous love, in her left hand.

Although the Counter-Reformation continued to uphold the dual aspect of amor, this strictly human image of Charity remained the accepted form. For example, the Baroque Bolognese painter Guido Reni, in his Charity (1630), depicts a beautiful, statuesque woman with three infants surrounding her for nourishment, personifying Virgo lactans. Reni employs gradations of pink to represent the degree of nourishment consumed by the three children of love, who represent the incorporated virtues of faith, hope, and love. In addition to the aforementioned works of art, various depictions of Charity can be seen in the paintings of Andrea Del Sarto (Charity, 1518, at the Louvre in Paris) and Cosimo Tura (Charity, 1490, in the Museo Poldi Pezzoli in Milan) and the sculptures of Giambologna (Charity, 1585, in the Grimaldi Chapel in Genoa, Italy) and Pietro Bernini (Charity, 1600, in the church of Monte di Pietà in Naples).

Faith (Greek pistis, Latin fides, meaning "to trust") is one of the three theological virtues (the others hope and charity) and is distinct from the natural, or cardinal, virtues of prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice. Faith is usually represented as a woman with her respective attributes of chalice, cross, candle, and font. Sometimes she wears a helmet and has the Decalogue at her feet. The open book of the Decalogue represents the Old and New Testaments, the source of learning and maintaining faith. The helmet that Faith wears protects her head, indicating that her mind is protected against the injuries and dangers of false doctrines. The lighted candle alludes to the illumination of the mind brought about by Faith. According to St. Paul (I Corinthians 13:13), who extolled the theological virtues, the two main elements of Christian faith are the belief in Christ crucified and the miracle of the sacraments, which are symbolized by the attributes of the cross and the chalice with or without the host.

Faith, Hope, and Charity are also saints. During the second century, these three Roman martyrs were the daughters of Sophia (Greek for wisdom). Their Greek names were Pistis (Faith), Elpis (Hope), and Agape (Charity). All four women were put to death during the reign of Emperor Hadrian (117–138) and buried on the Aurelian Way. Similarly, four martyrs with similar Latin names—Sapientia (Wisdom), Spes (Hope), Fides (Faith), and Caritas (Charity)—were buried on the Appian Way in the catacomb of St. Callistus.

In the biblical writings of the Old and New Testaments, the concept of faith was interrelated with hope and charity and focused on the Platonic concept of love (Symposium 210A–E). Recognizing this fusion, St. Paul explained the concept of faith in terms of the individual response to God (Romans 8:28; I Corinthians 2:9, 8:3; Ephesians 6:24). In the writings of the church fathers and in the Middle Ages (St. Ambrose in Abraham, cap II, Vol. II; St. Augustine in Enchiridion, Chap. cxvii, 3; and Aquinas in Summa Theologia, II-II, q. 2, a. 1), faith is a will to believe in God. Credo ut intelligam (I believe in order to understand) is a principle stated by St. Augustine and then accepted by St. Anselm. Faith is a virtue of the intellect given as a gift of grace by God to an individual who responds to God. This attitude of belief goes beyond the available evidence and is essential for eternal salvation. During the Middle Ages, Faith is represented in a place of honor next to Christ.

Following the medieval theories, Alciati also places great emphasis on the virtue of faith; however, he moves away from the medieval discussion of the theological and cardinal virtues to focus on the classical interpretation of arete or virtus. In Emblematum liber (Paris, 1536), Alciati interprets faith in the spirit of Renaissance humanism. For Alciati, faith is the first virtue and a symbol of fidelity, as seen in Emblem 1X, Fidei symbolum. The epigram explains the pictura (image) as follows:

Let Honor, dressed in purple cloak, hold hands with naked Truth (Veritas). In the middle stands Eros (Amor), holy and sincere, his locks enwreathed in a garland of roses. This is Faith (Fidelity) who sustains Honor and gives birth to Truth, and nurtures Love.

For Alciati, honor is that quality acquired freely and voluntarily; an individual received this merit by his virtue. Alciati's presentation of Truth (Veritas) as nuda veritas derives from his readings of Horace (Odes I, 24, 7) on the subject as a symbol of simplicity, sincerity, and essence of life.

By contrast with Alciati, Ripa focuses on the symbolism of faith as a divine gift rather than a human attainment. He differentiated several types of faith in Iconologia: Christian faith, Catholic faith, friendship faith, and marital faith. The first two types of faith are religious and represented with similar attributes: a young woman dressed in white, wearing a helmet and carrying a heart or a candle and a book or Decalogue. Ripa refers to Protagoras's and Virgil's commentary: Blindness is the unfaithfulness and illumination of faith. Other types of faith are secular and associated with fidelity. For example, friendship faith is represented by a veiled, older woman with extended arms. Old age symbolizes wisdom and experience. In marital faith, the emblem is represented by a young woman dressed in white and holding a ring, symbol of matrimony. G. Ronchetti, in Dictionary of Symbols (1922), explains that the ring was used by men in antiquity as a sign of freedom. Moreover, to convalidate a legal document, the seal of a ring was required to witness the contract as an act of faith.

Faith is a personification that is frequently used by Vasari. Her attributes combine the personification of religion as well as faith: cross, chalice, and the Host. Redemption and salvation can be achieved through acts of faith. Vasari had employed this idea in his earlier decorative cycles, especially the ceiling of the Cornaro Palace (Venice, 1540–1542), the Chambers of Abraham and Fortune in his house (Arezzo, 1542–1548), the Refectory of Monteoliveto (Naples, 1545), the Sala dei Cento Giorni in the Palazzo della Cancelleria (Rome, 1546), and the rooms of the Palazzo Vecchio (Florence, 1565–1572). In some of these cycles, Vasari depicts the emblem or the image of faith with all the pertinent attributes, as in the Cornaro Palace and Refectory of Monteoliveto. At other times, Vasari represents the expression of having faith, as in the Chamber of Abraham. In this room, Vasari painted many personal conceits assembled by assimilating numerous literary and stylistic sources. The theme of this ceiling draws on the story of Abraham and Isaac; in contrast with traditional quattrocento and cinquecento depictions of the sacrifice of Isaac, Vasari, in the tondo, portrays God the Father blessing the seed of Abraham. This blessing occurs after God has tested Abraham's willingness to sacrifice Isaac. (God is described in Genesis 22:17 as saying, "I will bless you abundantly and greatly multiply your descendants until they are numerous as the stars in the sky and the grains of sand on the seashore.") This theme is a Vasarian invention. Vasari's depiction of Isaac is most unusual. He is shown as an infant, and his innocence is exposed by a look of candidness. As he is blessed by God, Isaac demonstrates his astonishment and his acceptance of God's will by pointing to himself.

Among the works of Vasari's predecessors, Giulio Romano's ceiling of the Vatican Loggia and Baldassare Peruzzi's ceiling in the Stanza di Eliodoro most resemble the ceiling of the Chamber of Abraham. In the Albertina of Vienna, Austria, there is a drawing attributed to Raphael and Perino del Vaga for the fresco painting by Romano in the Vatican Loggia, God Appearing to Isaac or God Blessing Isaac. Marcantonio Raimondi also engraved a print after the drawing. However, Giulio's scene depicts God blessing only Isaac, who is portrayed not as an infant but as a young boy. Rather than pointing to himself, Isaac indicates his father, who sits apart from him. Peruzzi's representation emphasizes Abraham's closeness to Isaac by having them embrace as a floating figure of God, who extends His arms, appears before Sarah and the group. Instead of portraying the complete sacrificial scene, Vasari suggests it by portraying bucrania, garlands, and mask motifs around the tondo scene. These motifs and other stylistic qualities found in the tondo scene are quotations from Michelangelo's and Titian's works. In the Old Testament, Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac is one of the great examples of faith as enumerated in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11:17) and elaborated by St. James (2:21–3). Prudentius, in Psychomachia, describes the image of Abraham as the faithful patriarch who first showed the way of believing and whose faith was justified and made perfect by his works.

Another example of the application of Christian faith is Vasari's drawing Abraham and the Three Angels, in which the background includes a rustic, wooden home, and the supper is taking place outdoors. The figures, dressed in simple garments, gesticulate in a profound manner. The faithful Abraham immediately responds to the miraculous intervention by kneeling and receiving the divine messengers with open arms; Sarah, however, seated against the door, skeptically observes the visitors while Hagar, carrying Ishmael in her arms, curiously rushes with the other servants out of the house to see the divine apparition. The presence of divine intervention is experienced in the Old Testament scene with the apparition of the angels to Abraham and Abraham's forthright response. The scene alludes to the acceptance of the covenant made with God at Mamre and the theological virtue of faith. Abraham's faith implies a hope to achieve a covenant with God, and it is by virtue of Abraham's charitable offering of a meal to the three angels that God grants the covenant to Abraham and his people.

The depiction of religion in art is strongly interrelated with the theological virtue of faith. During the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, the attributes of faith are similar to religion, usually represented as a woman with her respective attributes of chalice, cross, candle, and font. Sometimes she also wears a helmet and has the Decalogue at her feet.

In 1545, Vasari painted the personification of Religion on the ceiling near the altar of the Refectory of Monteoliveto in Naples. She floats on a bundle of wheat with her attributes: the keys of St. Peter, the four gospels, and the veil. She dramatically turns her head to receive divine inspiration from the Holy Spirit. A rose bush with thorns behind her recalls the sacrificial redemption. Religion represents the Christianization of the classical tradition (Ripa, 1611).

According to Aquinas (Summa Theologia, II, part II, quest LXXII, art. VII and quest. LXXXIV, art. II), religion is that moral virtue through which Christians dedicate all their honor to God with all their heart, soul, and body. Aristotle differentiates humans from beasts in nature for their ability to reason, which enables them to reach and comprehend the divine. Ripa's figurazione (image of Religion) is veiled, reflecting St. Paul's statement per speculum in aenigmate (for a dark mirror), which alludes to the mysteriousness of rites, ceremonies, and religious events. Other attributes accompanying religion are a book, a fire, and a cross. The book alludes to the Holy Scriptures, revelations, and religious conventions. The fire that she holds on her hand suggests pure and sincere devotion to God. The cross symbolizes Christ and his Christian doctrine. Sometimes an elephant guards her, alluding to Pliny's explanation about the good nature of this animal (Natural History, Book VII, chap. I). Pliny tells us that this animal is prudent, charitable, and a lover of equanimity. In Hieroglyphica, Valeriano recounts how the elephant is depicted in the hieroglyphics, and for this reason Pliny explains that the elephant worships the sun and the stars and kneels in front of the moon for reverence. On a full moon, he seeks water to bathe his body in preparation for worshipping the moon, expressing his qualities of prudence, justice, and humility.

Other illustrations of Religion in Ripa's Iconologia focus on her clothing, with white linen alluding to her purity and chastity. According to Plutarch's book on the Egyptian gods Isis and Osiris, the religious customs of the Egyptians were such that no wool object could be found inside the temples or tombs; this is why the deceased was mummified in linen garments. In Ripa's emblem on the institutionalization of religion, the personification portrays Religion as a woman covered by a veil and accompanied by a dove, symbol of the Holy Spirit. The woman sits on a square stone bench, symbol of a sacrificial altar as well as the foundation of the church by Christ in Peter (stone). Next to the personification of Religion stands a young boy with Moses' tablets, alluding to the Old Testament law. The keys held by Religion symbolize the New Testament, as does the depiction of the four evangelists. The whole composition emphasizes divine intervention through the Holy Spirit or religion with charity, faith, and hope.

Hope (Latin spes) forms part of the theological virtue three-some (Daly, pp. 209–212). Hope's attributes imply safety, security, steadfastness, and good luck. Her most conventional attributes of the hourglass and anchor represent safety and security. The hourglass, usually an attribute of Temperance, symbolizes the passage of life as well as the recurrence of life and death, the heavens, and the Earth (Ferguson, pp. 45, 50). The depiction of the anchor recalls St. Paul's comments in Hebrews (6:18–19): "Hope is like an anchor for our lives . . . it enters in through the veil" (Hall, p. 156; Cheney, pp. 92–98). The symbolism of the anchor, together with the dolphin—the anchor is slowness, and the dolphin alludes to speed—refers to the motto of the happy medium, "Hasten slowly," or "festina lente." In Christianity, it is a true symbol of salvation and faith. In early Christian art, the anchor was used as a disguised form of the cross as hope—a symbol of Christ on the Cross (the dolphin and the anchor). The anchor is also the emblem of SS. Clement and Nicholas of Myra. In Gothic imagery, Hope is depicted gazing up into the heavens and reaching out for a crown, the hope of future glory. This allusion suggests that hope is considered a spiritual as well as a secular virtue. Examples of Hope with the representations of the theological virtues can be found in fourteenth-century paintings such as Ambrogio Lorenzetti's Maestà (circa 1330), in which Hope holds lilies and a church tower and gazes up to the crown. Bartolomeo di Bartoli's manuscript in Chantilly, France, La canzone delle virtù e delle scienze, shows Hope (Spes) sitting enthroned over Judas desperatus with his hangrope. Giotto's fresco cycle for the Arena Chapel in Padua (1305) dramatically represents the contrast between the hanging figure of Despair and the winged, ascending figure of Hope.

Other virtues cherished during the Middle Ages and expanded in the Renaissance were those associated with the Holy Spirit. During the Middle Ages, they even surpassed the popularity of the seven virtues. These virtues are grouped in two categories: the gifts of the Holy Spirit (wisdom, understanding, counsel, strength, knowledge, piety, and fear of the Lord) and the fruits of the Holy Spirit (charity, joy, peace, patience, benignity, goodness, longanimity, mildness, faith, modesty, continence, and chastity). The gifts of the Holy Spirit were ascribed to Isaiah's prophecy (11:1–2), and in medieval iconography they are associated with the Incarnation and the Passion (O'Reilly and Tuve). In the Middle Ages, they were considered the antidotes to the Deadly Sins. In art of this period, the formal wheel diagrams showed the seven beatitudes, gift virtues, and gifts and petitions of the Pater Noster opposed to the seven deadly sins. The seven gift virtues were associated also with medicinal powers; the seven beatitudes were medicinal preparations, whereas the seven gift virtues restored health. These seven virtues also were associated with the seven works of corporal and spiritual mercy, the seven joys and sorrows of the Virgin, the seven last words, and the seven penitential psalms as discussed in the Somme le Roi and Psychomachia (O'Reilly and Tuve). In his commentary of Peter Lombard's Sententiae, St. Bonaventure associated the gift virtues with the cardinal and theological virtues because in Isaiah's text the Tree of Jesse contained the gifts of the Holy Spirit, as illustrated in the late medieval Biblia Pauperum.

The fruits of the Holy Spirit were discussed in a very influential twelfth-century manuscript, De fructibus, by pseudo-Hugo (O'Reilly), in which the Tree of Jesse is replaced by the Tree of Virtues. They were also depicted in another popular manuscript from the end of the Middle Ages, Tree and Twelve Frutes of the Holy Goost (Fitzwilliam ms. McClean 132). Vasari represented this subject in 1545 in the Refectory of Monteoliveto in the Church of Santa Anna dei Lambert in Naples (Cheney).

Knowledge, counsel, and understanding are all aspects of wisdom, the meaning of which derives from the Greek term sophia, which originally referred to the practical arts and then to knowledge and reason. Plato understood wisdom to be one of the four chief virtues. Wisdom was the faculty required for both scientific knowledge and practical experience. Aristotle distinguished between speculative and practical wisdom, that is, between sophia (wisdom) and phronesis (prudence). Whereas practical wisdom relates to the conduct of life, behavior, and moral conduct, speculative wisdom requires elements of intuitive reason and rigorous knowledge, as needed in theology, philosophy, and metaphysics. Aquinas followed Aristotle's distinction between speculative and practical wisdom while finding speculative wisdom not in metaphysics but in sacred doctrine or revealed theology. Nicholas de Cusa defined wisdom as "learned ignorance." Later discussions on wisdom during the Renaissance and Baroque periods, such as those by the philosopher Baruch Spinoza, distinguish between ratio, or reason, interpreted as knowledge of scientific law, and scientia intuitiva, or intuitive knowledge, by which one sees the universal in all the particulars of existence. The virtue Wisdom, then, is identified with the latter and interpreted as living under the aspect of eternity or divine laws.

In antiquity, the image of Athena or Minerva, with her attribute of the olive branch or tree, alluded to the personification of wisdom. The legend of her birth from the head of Zeus or Jupiter referred to her ability to understand and advise the gods and humans on the mysteries of life. Usually dressed in a helmet and cuirass, Athena or Minerva alludes to her sagacity and intellectual strength. The shield with the head of the Medusa symbolizes the ability to distinguish between bad and good habits, actions, and behaviors that wisdom provides to individuals. Wisdom teaches people to distinguish between ignorance and knowledge and to learn through experience. According to Virgil, the olive branch is a symbol of interior and exterior peace that can be acquired or learned only through knowledge or wisdom. This plant was carried by the Trojan leader Aeneas when he visited the Elysian camps, alluding to his search for peace through wisdom.

The Renaissance, assimilating the ideas of antiquity, represented the fusion of the personification of wisdom with the medieval personification of prudence in art. A case in point is the well-known painting by Botticelli, Minerva and the Centaur (1480), at the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, representing the personification of wisdom in a mythological setting. According to some scholars, the subject matter of the painting has political, poetic, and moral-philosophical meanings. Although an element of symbolism is encountered in the painting, it is overshadowed by the painting's connotations. Most interpretations focus on Lorenzo de' Medici's triumph over the Neapolitan court intrigues or over the conspiracy of the Piazze and other domestic enemies. The figures in the painting may symbolize the way Lorenzo achieved a balance of power in the Florentine government and used his diplomatic skills in fostering peace after the Piazze rebellion. In addition, as an illustration of one of Angelo Poliziano's poems, it emphasizes Lorenzo's wisdom and his desire for good government (Cheney, 1993; Wittkower, 1977).

Other interpretations emphasize the philosophical significance of the painting. That is, Minerva and the Centaur represents two moral allegories. First, it symbolizes Marsilio Ficino's Neoplatonic concept of reason (Minerva) through wisdom (Mens intellectus) controlling ignorance (centaur). Therefore, Lorenzo (Minerva), through his intellect, resolves the struggles of political diplomacy by subjugating foolishness (centaur). The painting can also be viewed in the light of quattrocento Neoplatonism, representing a person's physical and metaphysical realms. Because a person's human soul is made up of instinct and reason (natural world/centaur) and wisdom is part of the intellect (supernatural world/Minerva/Mens), the painting suggests that Lorenzo is trying to subjugate his basic instincts (centaur) through reason to obtain wisdom. The reconciliation of wisdom and instinct is achieved within Lorenzo's human soul. That is, in politics, Lorenzo must control his own ambitions for the benefit of his beloved Firenze and good government.

In the Renaissance, the fusion between the personifications of prudence and wisdom is common. However, in the Chamber of Fortune of his house in Arezzo (1548), Vasari portrays the personifications of wisdom and prudence separately. Under the spell of the emblematic tradition of Alciati and Valeriano, for Vasari Wisdom (Sapienza) is an iconographic fusion of Cognizione and Intelligenza. The Aretine wisdom anticipates iconographically Ripa's Cognizione and Intelligenza, who is winged, as a symbol of solicitude, and holds a burning torch, a sphere, and a book. The book suggests her quest for knowledge. The flame of the torch signifies the mind's ability to see the light of reason and to understand intellectual matters. The sphere alludes to Wisdom's attempt to comprehend in human terms the abstract laws of the universe. This is also why one of her feet is suspended in midair, a suggestion of detachment in her intellectual pursuits from earthly goods. Wisdom rests comfortably and stably in her niche. Wisdom appears to be sitting on a cube, whereas Felicity or Fortune rests on a circular form, the wheel in Cartari's depiction of Bonus Eventus (felicity) and Ripa's depiction of Cognizione.

Here, perhaps, Vasari has suggested that the acquisition of knowledge and the desire to comprehend the laws of nature (wisdom), contrasting with the given laws of nature usually depicted by Artemis of Ephesus as a personification of nature, are both significant aspects in a person's life. Knowledge, similar to patience, justice, and fortitude, requires perseverance, strength, and stability, whereas felicity, prudence (providence), and liberality vacillate according to the wheel of fortune.

In the Renaissance, the tendency to Christianize pagan iconography creates two levels of meaning in the interpretation of the personifications. The personification of virtue is complex because it may combine both religious and secular ideas. If it is religious, the allusion to virtue is associated with chastity (Latin castitas, meaning "purity of spirit"), with attributes such as a veil (symbol of modesty), a palm (martyrdom), or a shield with a phoenix (spiritual search). If the allusion is secular, the virtue of chastity focuses on the abstention from sexual relations as one of the Christian virtues (the others poverty and obedience) that are associated with monastic vows of religious orders. This association is seen in Franciscan art, such as Giotto's fresco cycle in the Lower Church of Assisi, Italy. In this instance, the virtue of chastity is symbolized by a woman praying in a tower. The symbolism of the tower also alludes to the legends of St. Barbara and Danaë (Hall). Another aspect of the secular allusion to chastity as purity of the flesh is the relation to love. Mythological references to the goddess Diana or the nymph Daphne and their transformations involve the yearning for chastity in the face of desire. Other myths associated with chastity and physical love are the blindness of Cupid, the combat of Love, the Lady of the Unicorn, and the Three Graces (Castitas, Pulchritudo, Amor or Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, respectively, as described in Seneca's De Beneficiis 1.3:2).

In the Chamber of Abraham at his house in Arezzo, Vasari portrayed Virtue with her companions Peace, Modesty, and Concord (1548). It appears that, following in the Renaissance Neoplatonic tradition, he fused pagan symbols with Christian motifs in his religious symbolism. For example, Virtue is portrayed with objects (rose, lily, myrtle, and vase) with different associations in the classical and Christian cultures.

The dual reference in the allegorical rendering of Virtue, evidenced by the diversity of attributes she holds, seems to denote the Renaissance Neoplatonic conception of the Venus/Virgo or Love/Chastity. This dual conception is based on Virgil's Aeneid and was applied by the Renaissance Neoplatonists to the Christian doctrine of chastity and love. Virgil relates that Venus disguised herself as Diana, a virgin goddess, to appear as a "devotee of chastity." The medal of Giovanna degli Albizzi, with the Latin inscription from Virgil, for example, alludes to the Venus/Virgo concept: Virginis os habitumque gerens et virginis arma (Virgil I, 315). According to Jean Seznec, the sixteenth century also adopted the Ciceronian parallel between Diana and the Virgin Mary. In Vasari's Chastity, one sees, on the breastplate of her dress, a female figure standing (perhaps) on a shell and holding a bow and arrow. She may be Diana, a personification of chastity, or Diana disguised as Venus standing on a shell, a personification of love. The lack of detail in the painting makes a more precise identification impossible. Vasari's Chastity also displays other Christian and pagan motifs associated with the Venus/Virgo or Love/Chastity. She holds a classical vase with its base designed in the shape of a scallop shell, which is commonly associated with the birth of Venus, as seen in Botticelli's Birth of Venus (1485) at the Uffizi Gallery (Cheney, 1993; Lightbown); it was also used in Christian art as a symbol of the resurrection and of pilgrimage, as in the depictions of SS. James and Roch.

In both the quattrocento and the cinquecento, several writers, including Alciati in Emblematum libellus cum commentariis (1531), Vincenzo Cartari in Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi (1557), Piero Valeriano in Hieroglyphica sive De sacris Aegyptiorum (1556), and Ripa in Iconologia (1603), associated Venus with chastity or virginity. Vasari's allegorical figure of Chastity likewise has attributes associated with chastity and virginity, as she holds in one hand wilted white roses. In ancient Rome, the rose was a traditional symbol of victory, pride, and love. It was the flower of Venus, goddess of love. In Christian symbolism, the white rose is a symbol of purity. According to St. Ambrose's legend, the Virgin Mary is called the "rose without thorns" because she was exempt from original sin (d'Ancona and Réau). The lily is also a symbol of purity, and in scenes of the Annunciation it is a Christian attribute of the virginity of Mary (Réau, 1955–1959, I; Panofsky, 1961). According to the Bible, flowers are a signal of spring, and because of their fragrance and beauty they are a sign of the Messianic kingdom (Isaiah 35:1). The death of flowers is symbolic of the transitoriness of life (Jacob 14:1; James 1:10) (Haig; Koch). In Roman mythology, myrtle was considered sacred to Venus and a symbol of grace, sanity, victory (Valeriano, 1602), and love (Cicero, Somnium Scipionis), whereas in Christian iconography myrtle alludes to the Gentiles who were converted by Christ (Zachariah 1:8). In Christian iconography, the vase or vessel is associated with one of the seven virtues: temperance. Stylistically, Vasari's vase refers to the cinquecento interpretation of antique vases, as it is decorated with garlands, a mask, and a skull motif. Furthermore, this vase contains myrtle leaves. In the Renaissance, a vase containing plants or flowers was emblematic of virtue or grace (Wind, 1968). Therefore, all these attributes may attest to the goddess of love, Venus, or to a Christian virtue, perhaps chastity (purity or virginity), as ascribed to the Virgin Mary.

Benignity and joy are components of felicity. The word felicity alludes to the Greek term eudaimonia, meaning good luck or to be prosperous, well off, or happy. Aristotle's view of happiness is associated with the evaluation of fulfillment of the individual's life, the sum of pleasures needed to be. Aquinas elaborates on this theory by defining happiness in terms of pleasure with prudence, thus adding a theological dimension. In the Renaissance, the personification of felicity fuses the ancient and medieval views of happiness and joy as one of the Holy Spirit's gifts of virtues (O'Reilly, 1983).

The ancient Greeks and Romans believed that people were accompanied from birth by daemones or genii (invisible counselors) who assisted them through all the stages of life with advice and comfort. To these spirits they offered wine, incense, and garlands on their birthdays. In antiquity Nemesis, Tyche, and Agathodaemon were considered as one invisible counselor. These three deities were incorporated in the goddess of equality, who watched over the equilibrium of moral universality and saw that happiness and misfortune were allotted to humans according to their merits. The Romans differentiated among them. Nemesis was a kindly and gentle goddess, who dispensed what is just. In Roman art, she usually is portrayed as a young woman of grave and thoughtful aspect, holding in her hand the instruments of measurement, such as the cubit, bridle, and rudder. As the stern judge of human crimes, she appears with wings in a chariot drawn by griffins and with a sword or whip in her hand (Bianchi). According to common accounts, the Roman Tyche, the goddess of good fortune, was the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. Tyche, as the author of evil as well as good fortune, was regarded as the source of all that is unexpected in human life. Servius Tullius was said to have introduced into Rome the worship of Fortuna. He erected a temple to her under the name of Fors Fortuna and made June 24 the common festival of the goddess. Later, her worship became still more extensive. Under various surnames, some of which referred to the state of Fortuna populi Romani and others to every description of private affairs, she had a great number of temples (chapels) erected in her honor in Antium and Praeneste. Ancient artists endowed this goddess with various attributes, the most important of which was the rudder, which she held in her hand as a symbol of her power to control the fortunes of human beings. She also carried a scepter for the same purpose and a horn of plenty as the giver of good fortune. The later conception of an impartial goddess of fate is apparent in those monuments that depict her standing on a globe, ball, or circle. In the Vatican, the statue Tyche, by Eutychides of Sicyon (formerly exhibited in Antioch, Turkey) (Bianchi, 1877), shows the goddess wearing a laurel crown on her head as the tutelary deity of towns and holding a sheaf of corn in her right hand. Besides Tyche or Fortuna, the Romans honored a deity called Felicitas (Felicity) as the goddess of positive good fortune. Lucullus is said to have erected a temple to her in Rome that was adorned with the works brought by Mummius from the spoils of Corinth, Greece (Bianchi, 1877).

The emblematic tradition of the Renaissance and Baroque periods focused on the Roman conception of Tyche. Ripa's Iconologia describes three types of felicity: eternal (or divine), ephemeral (or human), and public. Eternal felicity is personified by a nude young woman with golden tresses and a laurel crown. She is seated in the heavenly stars, and her beauty radiates as she holds a palm and flaming torch. The personification of eternal felicity holds attributes similar to those of eternal happiness, health, and well-being. She is depicted nude because there is no need to hide her earthly goods or her spiritual gifts. Her golden tresses allude to the period that the ancient poets called the Golden Age, meaning a period of peace and joy when laws were not corrupted or contaminated by human actions. The heavenly sky with stars suggests that only in the heavens can happiness or felicity be achieved because there are no human and astral interferences. The crown of laurel with the palm refers to St. Paul's statement that individual coronation can occur only after valiant and sufficient struggles. The flaming torch symbolizes the love for God. Only through this love can eternal and complete joy, happiness, or felicity be achieved (Ripa, 1611).

Ripa's Human Felicity or Brief or Ephemeral Felicity alludes to Alciati's Emblem 124, In momentaneum felicitatem (brief felicity), in his Emblematum libellus cum commentariis (1551). The epigram explains the pictura (image) in which a gourd grew to such a height that it surpassed the tip of a pine tree. As it entwined its branches this way and that, proudly above all valuation, the pine tree laughed at the gourd and spoke:

Your glory is brief, because as soon the winter comes, accompanied by snow and ice all your vigor will be completely extinguished. This comment also applies to those arrogant, vain, and superficial individuals who focus their happiness on the vanities of life.

Ripa's Public Felicity alludes to Cartari's Bonus Eventus in Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi (1557), thus including all aspects of felicity, happiness, and joy, as illustrated in Julia Mamea's medal with the inscription Foelicitas Publica. A young woman is seated on a throne, holding a caduceus as a symbol of peace and wisdom and a cornucopia with fruits and flowers, alluding to the fruitful achievements after hard work and labor. The flowers in particular imply happiness; the caduceus symbolizes virtue and the cornucopia richness. These elements allude to temporal and spiritual wealth and abundance, which can be achieved only through physical and mental labor.

Felicity (Felicitas Publica), or Bonus Eventus, sits on a wheel holding a caduceus and a cornucopia in Vasari's house in Arezzo (1548). In this depiction, Vasari illustrated Vincenzo Cartari's Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi description of the image of Felicity, or Bonus Eventus (de Tervarent, 1944 and Ripa, 1611). Vasari described this image as "Felicitas, a clothed woman with a horn of plenty held with the left hand and the caduceus of Mercury on the right." The caduceus and the cornucopia are attributes symbolizing the elements needed for happiness, as the caduceus is a symbol of peace and industry, and the cornucopia contains the products of hard work. Felicity sits precariously on the wheel of fortune, a symbol of authority and good fortune (Ripa, 1611). For the Romans as well as for Vasari, Felicity was a personification of happiness, as she "symbolized a fortunate event and the happy issue of an enterprise" (de Tervarent). Another interpretation of Felicity is as an early Christian martyr who died in A.D. 165. She is one of seven martyrs named in the Depositio Martyrum of the Liberian Catalogue on July 10. Her legend derives from the story of seven Jewish brothers (II Maccabees 7) that describes her as a wealthy Roman matron with seven Christian children. She witnessed the execution of her children because of their faith and herself was beheaded or thrown into boiling oil (Hall, p. 121). In Italian Renaissance painting, she is depicted with her seven sons holding palms for their martyrdom. A second St. Felicity was an African martyr who died in A.D. 203. This saint is usually accompanied by St. Perpetua, with whom she was martyred. Her feast day is March 7.

See also Abundance; Honor/Honoring; Vices/Deadly Sins

Selected Works of Art

Virtues in Series

Thee and Twelve Fautes of the Holy Goost (Fitzwilliam Ms. McCleary, 132)

Virtue and Vices, stone reliefs, circa 1210, Paris, Notre Dame, west facade

Seven Trees of Virtue with the Seven Streams of the Gifts of the Holy Spirit, manuscript, Somme le Roi, fifteenth century, Oxford, Bodleian Library (Ms. 283, f. 99v.)

Nicolò da Bologna, The Virtues and the Arts, from Giovanni Andrea's Novella super libros Decretalium, illuminated manuscript, fourteenth century, Milan, Italy: Ambrosiana (MS B. 42 inf., fol. 1)

Martino di Bartolommeo, Virtues, ceiling fresco, circa 1330, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico, Sala di Balia

Pisano, Andrea, Cardinal Virtues, reliefs, 1336, Florence, Italy, Baptistry, South Door

Lorenzetti, Ambrogio, Good Government, fresco, 1338–1339, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico

Perugino, Pietro, Uomini famosi and Virtues, fresco, 1470–1475, Perugia, Italy, Collegio del Cambio

Lucas van Leyden, and Jacob Cornelisz. van Oostsanen, Sibyls (with Virtues and Vices), woodcuts in series, 1528–1530, Veste Coburg, Germany, Kunstsammlungender

Vasari, Giorgio, The Fruits of the Holy Spirit (Virtues), fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto

Temperance

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, Temperance, print, 1560, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans

Visscher, Roemer, Nothing Is Empty or Meaningless, first emblem from Sinnepoppen, 1614

Torrentius, Jan Symoonisz (Johannes Symoonisz. van der Beeck), Temperance, painting, 1614, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Prudence (Including Wisdom)

Pisano, Giovanni, Prudence, sculpture from the Pisa Pulpit, 1300s, Pisa, Italy, Duomo

Vasari, Giorgio, Prudence, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto

Vasari, Giorgio, Prudence, drawing, 1545, Paris, Institut Neerlandais, Collection F. Lugt (Inv. 7777)

Vasari, Giorgio, Wisdom, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto

Perino del Vaga, Prudence, drawing, 1546, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Vasari, Giorgio, Wisdom, oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

Vasari, Giorgio, Prudence, oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

Titian, Allegory of Wisdom, 1559, Venice, Italy, Biblioteca Sansovino

Titian, An Allegory of Prudence, oil on canvas, before 1576, London, National Gallery

Sacchi, Andrea, Divina Sapienza (Allegory of Divine Wisdom), fresco, 1629–1631, Rome, Galleria Nazionale d'Arte Antica

Van Dyck, Anthony, Lady Digby as Prudence, 1633, London, National Portrait Gallery

Courage/Fortitude

Pucelle, Jean, Fortitude, 1325, illuminated manuscript page from The Belleville Breviary, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. Lat. 10483)

Vasari, Giorgio, Fortitude, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto

Vasari, Giorgio, Fortitude, fresco painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

Vellani, Francesco, Fortitude, painting, before 1768, Modena, Italy, Palazzo Galliani

Justice

- Giotto, Justice, fresco, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Raphael, Justice, ceiling fresco, 1510, Vatican, Stanza della Segnatura
 Beccafumi, Domenico, Justice, panel, circa 1540, Lille, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Beccafumi, Domenico, Justice, fresco, circa 1540, Siena, Italy, Palazzo Pubblico, Sala del Consistoro
 Vasari, Giorgio, Justice, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto
 Salviati, Francesco, Justice, fresco, 1545–1550, Florence, Italy, Museo Nazionale
 Vasari, Giorgio, Justice, fresco painting, 1546, Rome, Palazzo della Cancelleria, Sala dei Cento Giorni
 Vasari, Giorgio, Justice, oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
 Zuccari, Federico, Allegory of Justice, drawing, circa 1585, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery, Gabinetto Disegni e Stampe
 Cesare, Giuseppe (Cavalier d'Arpino), Allegory of Justice, panel, 1595–1600, Brescia, Italy, Brescia Museum, Collection of Tosio-Martinengo
 Cesare, Giuseppe (Cavalier d'Arpino), Allegory of Liberty, panel, 1595–1600, Brescia, Italy, Brescia Museum, Collection of Tosio-Martinengo

Charity

- Giotto, Charity, Fresco, 1305, Padua, Italy, Arena Chapel
 Tino da Camaino, Charity, sculpture, 1320, Florence, Italy, Museo Bardini
 Tura, Cosimo, Charity, painting, 1490, Milan, Italy, Museo Poldi Pezzoli
 Andrea del Sarto, Charity, fresco painting, 1515, Florence, Italy, Chiostro dello Scalzo
 Andrea del Sarto, Charity, painting, 1518, Paris, Musée du Louvre
 Vasari, Giorgio, Charity, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna Dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto
 Vasari, Giorgio, Charity, fresco painting, 1546, Rome, Palazzo della Cancelleria, Sala dei Cento Giorni
 Vasari, Giorgio, Charity, fresco painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
 Morandi, Francesco (Il Poppi), Charity, panel, 1584, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery
 Giambologna, Charity, sculpture, 1585, Genoa, Italy, Grimaldi Chapel
 Bernini, Pietro, Charity, sculpture, 1600, Naples, Italy, Church of Monte di Pietà
 Caravaggio, Works of Mercy, 1605, Naples, Italy, Pio Monte della Misericordia
 Guercino, Charity, oil painting, 1625, Dayton, Ohio, Dayton Art Museum
 Reni, Guido, Charity, oil painting, 1630, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art Faith (Including Religion)

- Faith*, from an illustrated Psychomachia, early eleventh century, Leiden, The Netherlands, Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit (Ms. Voss. Lat. Oct 15, ff. 37–43)
 Vasari, Giorgio, Faith, fresco painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari

- Vasari, Giorgio, Religion, fresco painting, 1545, Naples, Italy, Sant' Anna dei Lombardi, Refectory of Monteoliveto
 Ripa, Cesare, Religion, woodcut emblem from Iconologia, 1603

Hope

- Hope*, from an illustrated Psychomachia, early eleventh century, Leiden, The Netherlands, Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit
 Watts, George Frederic, Hope, oil on canvas, 1886, London, Tate Gallery

Felicity

- Cartari, Vincenzo, Bonus Eventus, engraving, from Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, Vienna, Austria, 1556
 Vasari, Giorgio, Bonus Eventus (Felicity), oil painting, 1548, Arezzo, Italy, Casa Vasari
 Ripa, Cesare, Felicity, woodcut emblem from Iconologia, Rome, 1603

Neoclassic and Genre Painting

- Vien, Joseph Marie, Marcus Aurelius Distributing Food and Medicine, before 1765, Amiens, France, Musée de Picardie
 Hallé, Noël, Justice of Trajan, before 1765, Marseilles, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Banks, Thomas, Death of Germanicus, bas-relief, 1774, Norfolk, England, Holkham Hall
 Durameau, Louis, Continence of Bayard, 1777, Grenoble, France, Musée de Peinture et de Sculpture
 Brenet, Nicolas Guy, Death of Du Gueselin, painting, 1778, Dunkirk, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Wheatley, Francis, Mr. Howard Offering Relief to Prisoners, 1788, Collection of the Earl of Harrowby
 Gauffier, Louis, Generosity of Roman Women, before 1791, Poitiers, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts
 Millais, John Everett, The Widow's Mite, painting, 1870, Birmingham, England, City Art Gallery
 Fildes, Luke, Applicants for Admission to a Casual Ward, 1874, Egham, England, Royal Holloway College
 Herkomer, Hubert von, Eventide (Workhouse), 1878, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery
 Faed, Thomas, They Had Been Boys Together, 1885, Durban, South Africa, Durban Museum

Further Reading

- Alciati, Andrea, Emblematum libellus cum commentariis, Paris, 1531; Paris, 1536; Paris, 1542; Lyon, France, 1549; Lyon, France, 1551
 Aquinas, Thomas, Summa Theologica, IIa., IIae, Q XXIIIa.5
 Baccheschi, Edi, The Complete Paintings of Giotto, London: Widenfeld and Nicolson, 1969; New York: Abrams, 1969
 Bloomfield, Morton Wilfred, The Seven Deadly Sins, East Lansing: Michigan State College Press, 1952
 Cartari, Vincenzo, Imagini delli dei degl' Antichi, Venice, Italy, 1557
 Cheney, Liana De Girolami, Botticelli's Neoplatonic Images, Potomac, Maryland: Scripta Humanistica, 1993

- _____, "Giorgio Vasari's Chamber of Abraham: A Religious Ceiling in the Aretine House," Sixteenth Century Journal 18 (Fall 1987)
- _____, The Paintings of the Casa Vasari, New York: Garland, 1985
- _____, "Vasari and Naples: The Monteoliveto Order," Papers in Art History V (1994)
- Colonna, Francesco, Hypnertomachin Poliphili, Venice, Italy, 1499
- Cornell, Henrik, editor, Biblia Pauperum, Stockholm, Sweden: Thule-tryck, 1925
- Corti, Laura, et al., Principi, Letterati e artisti nelle carte di Giorgio Vasari, Florence, Italy: Edam, 1982
- Cox-Rearick, Janet, Dynasty and Destiny in Medici Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
- Daly, Mary, "Faith, Hope, and Charity," in Dictionary of the History of Ideas, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- del Vita, Alessandro, editor, Lo Zibaldone di Giorgio Vasari, Rome: Istituto Archaeologico e Storico dell'Arte, 1938
- Dorez, L., editor, La canzone delle virtù e delle scienze di Bartolomeo di Bartoli, Bergamo, Italy: 1904
- Draper, Jed R., Vasari's Decorations in the Palazzo Vecchio: The Ragionamenti (Ph.D. diss., University of North Carolina, 1973)
- Frey, Karl, Giorgio Vasari's der Literarische nachlass, two volumes, New York: Georg Olms Verlag, 1982
- Freyan, Richard, "Evolution of the Caritas Figure," Journal of the Warburg Courtauld Institutes XI (1948)
- Haig, Elizabeth, The Floral Symbolism of the Great Masters, London: Thames and Hudson, 1913
- Hall, James, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art, revised edition, New York: Harper, 1979
- Horapollon, Hieroglyphica, Venice, Italy, 1505
- Holtausen, Ferdinand, editor, Book of Vices and Virtues, London: N. Trubner, 1888
- Katzenellenbogen, Adolf Edmund Max, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices, London: Warburg Institute, 1939; New York: Harper, 1962
- Koch, R., "Flower Symbolism in the Portinari Altarpiece," Art Bulletin 46 (1964)
- Künstle, Karl, Ikongraphie der christlichen Kunst, Freiburg, Germany, 1928
- Lightbown, Ronald, Botticelli, New York: Abbeville, 1990
- Mâle, Émile, L'art religieux de la fin du Moyen Âge en France (Paris, 1949)
- Millar, Eric, An Illuminated Manuscript of the Somme le Roy, Paris: Roxburghe Club, 1953
- Monbeig-Goguel, J. C., "Giorgio Vasari et son temps," Revue de l'Art XIV (1971)
- Monbeig-Goguel, J. C., and W. Vitzthum, "Dessins inédits de Giorgio Vasari," Revue de l'Art II (1968)
- North, Helen F., "The Iconography of the Cardinal Virtues," Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by Gregory Bruce Clancy, New York: Scribner's, 1968
- Nygren, Anders, Agape and Eros, London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1938; New York: Macmillan, 1941
- O'Reilly, Jennifer, Studies in the Iconography of the Virtues and Vices in the Middle Ages, New York: Garland, 1988
- Panofsky, Erwin, Renaissance and Renascences in Western Art, New York: Harper, 1960; London: Paladin, 1970
- _____, The Iconography of Coreggio's Camera di San Paolo, London: Warburg Institute, 1961
- _____, Studies in Iconology, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1939
- _____, Problems with Titian Mostly Iconographic, New York: New York University Press, 1969
- Piobb, Pierre Vicenti, Clef universelle des sciences secrètes, Paris, 1950
- Réau, Louis, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, eight volumes, Paris: Presses Universitaire de France, 1955-1959
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, Rome, 1603; Padua, Italy, 1611
- Ripa, Cesare, Iconologia, New York and London: Garland, 1976
- Ronchetti, Giuseppe, Dizionario Illustrato de Simboli, Milan, Italy: Ulrico Hoepli, 1922
- Rosenblum, Robert, Transformations in Late Eighteenth Century Art, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1967
- Rowley, George, Ambrogio Lorenzetti, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1958
- Segal, Sam, A Prosperous Past, The Hague, The Netherlands: SDU, 1988
- Shapiro, M. L., "Virtues and Vices in Ambrogio Lorenzetti's Franciscan Martyrdom," Art Bulletin XLVI (1964)
- Sebastian, Santiago, Alciato Emblemas, Madrid, Spain: Akal/Arte y Estetica, 1993
- Seznec, Jean, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, New York: Harper, 1961
- Sherman, Claire Richter, Imaging Aristotle: Verbal and Visual Representation in Fourteenth Century France, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1995
- Stone, David M., Guercino, Florence, Italy: Cantini, 1991
- Tervarent, Guy de, Attributs et symboles dans l'art profane, Geneva, Switzerland: E. Droz, 1958
- Tuve, Rosamond, "Some Notes on the Virtues and Vices," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 26 (1963), 27 (1964)
- _____, Allegorical Imagery: Some Medieval Books and Their Posterity, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966
- Valeriano, Piero, Hieroglyphica sive de Sacris Aegyptorum, 1521
- Watson, Arthur, The Early Iconography of the Tree of Jesse, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1934
- Watson, P. S., Agape and Eros, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 1953
- Wind, Edgar, "Charity, the Case History of a Pattern," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 3 (1940)
- _____, Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance, New York: Norton, 1968
- Wittkower, Rudolf, Allegory and the Migration of Symbols, London: Thames and Hudson, 1977
- Wood, Christopher, Victorian Panorama: Paintings of Victorian Life, London: Faber and Faber, 1976

VISITING/VISITATION

Alicia Craig Faxon

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Visiting/Visitation:

VISITATION OF THREE ANGELS TO ABRAHAM

VISIT OF THE QUEEN OF SHEBA TO SOLOMON

MARY AND ELIZABETH

GENRE PAINTINGS

Albrecht Dürer, Visitation, from The Life of the Virgin, circa 1511, woodcut (B84), Boston, Museum of Fine Arts, Harvey D. Parker Collection. (Courtesy of Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Because the subject of visiting and visitation is so broad, it will be covered here mainly in its most common iconographic context, that of biblical images, and in regards to scenes typically given the title Visit or Visitation.

The first major Old Testament visitation scene is that of Abraham visited by three angels (Genesis 18:1–16). During the visit, the angels tell Abraham and his wife Sarah that though they are old, they will have a son and fulfill God's earlier promise that Abraham's descendants will multiply and become as many as the stars in the sky. This was a scene particularly popular in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century, because the country, newly freed from the rule of Spain, saw itself as a new Israel, and the Dutch believed that the stories of the Old Testament applied to them as the fulfillment of God's promises. Pieter Lastman, Rembrandt van Rijn's teacher, painted Visitation of Three Angels to Abraham on this subject, now in a private collection, as did Rembrandt's pupils Ferdinand Bol, whose Abraham Entertaining Three Angels (circa 1640s) is now in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, the Netherlands, and Aert de Gelder, whose work is in the Boymans Museum in Rotterdam, the Netherlands. Rembrandt himself may also have painted this subject in a work now in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, the Netherlands. The subject was also portrayed by Raphael and his assistants in The Visitation to Abraham fresco (circa 1518) in the Loggia of the Vatican, and by Peter Paul Rubens in Abraham's Visitation (circa 1628–1629) in the Seville Cathedral in Spain. The visitation of the three angels to Abraham and Sarah is sometimes seen as a prefiguration of the Annunciation in the New Testament, when the angel Gabriel comes to ask Mary if she will be the Mother of Christ.

Another famous Old Testament visit is that of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon (I Kings 10:1–13; II Chronicles 9:1–9). The queen had heard of Solomon's wealth and wisdom, but when she came to see him and ask difficult questions, she found that he was both wiser and richer than she had been told. She returned home rejoicing, leaving as many gifts as she had brought. The biblical description of this visit and the queen's exotic retinue, complete with camels, spices, and precious stones, fascinated artists. The scene appears in many paintings, including Livinia Fontana's The Visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon (late sixteenth century) in the National Gallery in Dublin, Ireland; Benozzo Gozzoli's fresco The Queen of Sheba's Visit to Solomon (fifteenth century) in the Campo Santo in Pisa, Italy; a painting by Peter Paul Rubens in the Courtauld Institute in London; a painting by Raphael in the Loggia of the Vatican; a painting by Jacopo Robusti Tintoretto in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, Austria; a painting by Giovanni Battista Pittoni in the Walker Art Gallery in Liverpool, England; and Claude Lorrain's The Embarkation of the Queen of Sheba (1640s) in the National Gallery in London.

The visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon was secularized into the medieval Legend of the True Cross by Piero della Francesca in his The Meeting of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba (circa 1452–1457), part of a fresco cycle in the Church of San Francesco in Arezzo, Italy. Here the stately queen and her female retinue enter a pillared room from the right, and she bends forward in profile toward the left, clasping Solomon's hand. His courtiers, all male, stand on the left in elegant Renaissance dress. Everything in Francesca's painting is symmetrical and stately, framed by fluted columns and rectangular panels, while the participants seem to move to solemn music.

A very different picture is presented in Fontana's Visit of the Queen of Sheba. In this painting, Solomon's father King David, crowned and in an ermine-trimmed robe, sits on a raised throne on the far left, while a very knowing and beautifully dressed Queen of Sheba kneels gracefully on the steps before the throne. She gestures toward an attendant on the far right who is entering with a tray of gold vessels and ornaments. Behind her on the right is a retinue of richly clad ladies with ruffs, while in the right foreground a dwarf in red gestures toward the golden gifts. The participants in Fontana's painting are reputed to be portrayals of the Duke and Duchess of Mantua, Italy, Vincenzo Gonzaga and his wife Leonora de' Medici, as well as their court. The idea for this painting may have come from the Gonzagas' art collection, which included an onyx vessel believed to come from the Temple of Solomon. Presumably, Fontana's patrons would have identified strongly with Solomon as a noble predecessor.

The most commonly represented visit is the Visitation: the New Testament story of Mary's visit to her cousin Elizabeth when both women are pregnant, Mary with Jesus and Elizabeth with John the Baptist (Luke 1:39–56). The situation was different for each of the women: Elizabeth was married to Zacharias and had been barren for many years, while Mary was unmarried though betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph. When Mary entered the house, Elizabeth felt her child leap in her womb, and she recognized this as a sign of the special child Mary was bearing. Mary responded to this recognition in the words of the Magnificat: "My soul doth magnify the Lord and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior. . .," her cousin's response reinforcing the words of the angel Gabriel in the Annunciation. Mary stayed with Elizabeth for three months, a testimony to Elizabeth's welcoming spirit and motherly qualities.

The Visitation is one of the scenes traditionally represented in the Life of the Virgin cycles in early Christian and Byzantine art. In the fourteenth century, it became a more independent subject, following the establishment of a separate Marian feast day under the influence of St. Bonaventura. The Visitation can be seen on the south portal (eleventh century) of the Church of St. Pierre in Moissac, France. The Romanesque work shows two elongated figures who bow to each other, adjacent to an Annunciation scene. The figures are heavier and more classic in The Visitation (circa 1225–1245) on the west portal of the Cathedral of Reims, France. This Gothic work contrasts the perfect beauty and serenity of Mary's face with the older, lined countenance of Elizabeth.

In the Middle Ages, the two infants Jesus Christ and John the Baptist were sometimes displayed in the wombs, as if visible through X-ray vision, and even greeted one another. Sometimes a plaque or platytera was hung over the figures, representing the infants, a practice proscribed by the Council of Trent (1545–1565). In the fifteenth century, with an increased number of paintings being used for personal devotion, Elizabeth is sometimes shown kneeling before her cousin Mary, or kneeling before the Christ Child in Mary's womb, as in Visitation (before 1727) by Giuseppe Maria Crespi (lo Spagnuolo) in the Kress Collection in the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.

In the sixteenth century, Albrecht Dürer included The Visitation in his woodcut series The Life of the Virgin (1510–1515). Here the embracing women are featured prominently in the foreground, both wearing flowing robes, and both obviously “with child.” The figure of Mary on the left has a tall fir tree behind her, a possible symbol of faith, while a typical mountainous landscape rises in the background. The figures are given great solidity and weight, and the entire scene is concentrated on them. The Visitation is also shown in a number of other paintings, sometimes with Joseph or Zacharias, but most often with the two women alone. It can be seen in an illuminated manuscript by the Master of the Boucicalt Hours in the Musée Jacquemart-André in Paris. One of the reasons for the great number of representations of this meeting was that it was a traditional scene in the Book of Hours of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a book of prayers for the different hours throughout the day. The theme later appears in paintings by Albrecht Altdorfer in the Museum of Art in Cleveland; Giotto in the Arena Chapel in Padua, Italy; Palma Vecchio in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna; Fra Angelico in San Marco Museum in Florence, Italy; Taddeo Gaddi in the Baroncelli Chapel in San Croce in Florence; Tintoretto in the Scuola di San Rocco in Venice, Italy; Pietro Vannucci Perugino in the Academia in Florence; and Rembrandt van Rijn's The Visitation (1640) in the Detroit Art Institute in Michigan. Although the figures of Mary and Elizabeth usually embrace or shake hands, occasionally one figure bows to one another, as in Ghirlandaio's Visitation (fifteenth century) in the Louvre in Paris.

Rembrandt's The Visitation is one of the most unusual representations. The scene takes place within a large darkened landscape that dwarfs the figures. The entrance of the house on the left, from which the elderly Zacharias emerges, is large and elegant, with a pillared doorway. Mary and Elizabeth are spotlighted in the center of the composition, standing on a circular entrance platform. A black servant removes Mary's cloak as Elizabeth embraces her tall young relation. Neither of the women are conventionally beautiful, but the reality of their presence in gesture and pose expresses the awe and wonder of the situation. This is Rembrandt at his most restrained and classical; every detail contributes to the immediacy of the meeting.

These are not elegantly clad noblewomen, as in Renaissance precedents, but humble, homely, and convincing people.

Käthe Kollwitz's monumental woodcut Mary and Elizabeth (1938) shows only the bulky bodies of the two women, enclosed within an arched black space. Elizabeth, on the left, is shown kissing her young relative as her hand touches Mary's swelling waist. Mary looks downward tenderly and shyly. The starkness of the composition and the use of enclosed figures indicates the mutuality of their experience of pregnancy. Through the starkness of outline and pose, Kollwitz makes the two women symbolic of every woman who has awaited birth and who has been supported by another woman. In its simplification of planes and detail and its expressive use of pose and gesture, the woodcut emanates a twentieth-century approach and sensibility.

Although the primary scene of the Visitation is the greeting between the two women, Mary is also shown journeying to meet Elizabeth, as in Alessandro Allori's ceiling painting Mary on Her Way to Judah (before 1607) in Capella della Visitazione in Florence. Mary taking leave of Elizabeth is depicted in Lorenzo d'Alessandro da San Severino's Virgin Taking Leave of Zacharias and Elizabeth (before 1503) in San Giovanni in Urbino, Italy.

There are occasional references to God's visitation to his people in the New Testament, such as in the Song of Simeon (Luke 1:68): “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people.” Jesus Christ refers to God's visitation when he foresees the destruction of Jerusalem (Luke 19:44): “and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knowest not the time of thy visitation,” that is, they did not recognize Jesus as Messiah. Jesus also told his followers of their obligation, and how he recognized those who helped him: “Naked and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me; I was in prison and ye came unto me” (Matthew 25:36). When they asked, “When did we do this?” he replied, “Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me” (Matthew 25:40).

In terms of genre representations, visiting became a nineteenth-century institution complete with cartes de visites (visiting cards). Jane Austen described Mrs. Bennet in the first chapter of Pride and Prejudice (1813) in this fashion: “The business of her life was to get her daughters married; its solace was visiting and news.” Mary Cassatt perfectly captured the niceties of the etiquette of visiting in the painting Five O'Clock Tea (1880) at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, and in the color etching and aquatint The Visit. In both of these works, well-dressed ladies drink tea and talk in an elegant interior, exemplifying the social codes of the upper-class lady of leisure. The most conscientious of these ladies would also visit the poor, as depicted in Frank Stone's Charity (before 1859), in the Warrington Museum and Art Gallery. Here two elegantly dressed women enter the cottage of a poor mother whose four children cling to her. The visitors' servant uncovers a basket of food as two of the children approach him with widening eyes.

Luke Fildes's The Doctor's Visit (1891) in the Tate Gallery in London reveals a more serious side of nineteenth century society, with its frequent illnesses and high mortality rate, especially among children. In Alfred Rankley's Old Schoolfellows (1854), a friend visits his ill, perhaps dying, former companion at school. The clergy also made rounds, visiting ill or incapacitated tated parishioners, as in William Crosby's The Pastor's Visit (before 1873). In general, however, modern representations of visiting and visitation tend to show genre scenes of social custom, rather than scenes of a spiritual or biblical nature.

In several paintings and etchings, Edgar Degas portrayed a new kind of visit: a visit to a museum. For common people, this was a distinctly nineteenth-century experience as museums had not been accessible to them until Napoleon opened the former royal collections of the Louvre to the general population. The National Gallery in London also opened its doors in the nineteenth century. Degas painted more than one representation of museum visits, among them several elegant etchings of the painter Mary Cassatt and her sister visiting the Etruscan Gallery and other sites of the Louvre. His oil painting A Visit to the Museum (1876) in Boston is another rendering of Cassatt and her sister. On the surface, the work details an acceptable social practice of the time: visiting works of art in a cultured setting. Yet there may be a touch of wicked wit in Degas's depiction: the fashionable standing figure of the elegant Cassatt looks at the art while her sister studiously reads from a guide book. There may also be a pointed reference to the two women's unmarried status. They are looking at the sarcophagus of an Etruscan married couple and Paolo Veronese's The Marriage Feast at Cana (1562) is in the background. Perhaps Degas, single himself, implies that regarding marriage from a safe distance in a museum is an escape from life's greater commitments—that it is experiencing passion at arm's length. This kind of visit may simply be a piece of reportage on current social customs, but it may also be about art as a substitute for life. A visit to a museum is one during which the visited cannot talk back to the visitors, nor can the visitors truly communicate with the representations they see. Degas's A Visit to the Museum is art about viewing art: immediate formal concerns appear to dominate human ones, yet beneath the surface stir a number of perplexing questions about art and life.

See also Journey/Flight

Selected Works of Art

Visitation of Three Angels to Abraham

Raphael and assistants, The Visitation to Abraham, fresco, circa 1518, Vatican, Loggia

Rubens, Peter Paul, Abraham's Visitation, oil, circa 1628–1929, Seville, Spain, Cathedral

Lastman, Pieter, Visitation of Three Angels to Abraham, oil, private collection

Bol, Ferdinand, Abraham Entertaining Three Angels, oil, circa 1640s, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon

Gozzoli, Benozzo, Queen of Sheba's Visit to Solomon, fresco, fifteenth century, Pisa, Italy, Campo Santo

Piero della Francesca, The Meeting of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, fresco, circa 1452–1457, Arezzo, Italy, Church of S. Francesco

Fontana, Lavinia, The Visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon, oil, late sixteenth century, Dublin, National Gallery of Ireland

Claude Lorrain, The Embarkation of the Queen of Sheba, oil, 1640s, London, National Gallery

Mary and Elizabeth

The Visitation, sculpture, circa 1230, Chartres, France, Cathedral, north portal

Mary and Elizabeth, stone, circa 1225, Reims, France, Cathedral, central portal, west front

Bertram von Minden (Master Bertram), Visitation, second quarter of fourteenth century, Paris, Musée des Arts Décoratifs

Piero di Cosimo, The Visitation with Saint Nicholas and Saint Anthony Abbot, oil on panel, circa 1490, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art

Ghirlandaio, Domenico, Visitation, fresco, 1486–1490, Rome, S. Maria Novella

Ghirlandaio, Domenico, The Visitation, oil, fifteenth century, Paris, Louvre

Allori, Alessandro, Mary on Her Way to Judah, before 1607, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata, Capella della Visitazione, ceiling

Lorenzo d' Alessandro da San Severino I, Virgin Taking Leave of Zacharias and Elizabeth, before 1503, Urbino, Italy, S. Giovanni

Reichlich, Marx, Visitation, circa 1500, Vienna, Austria, Österreichische Galerie

Master E. S., Visitation, 1506, Budapest, Hungary, Szepmuveszeti Museum

Dürer, Albrecht, The Visitation, woodcut, 1510–1515, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Pontormo, Jacopo Carucci da, The Visitation, fresco, 1514, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata Church

Allori, Alessandro, Mary on Her Way to Judah, before 1607, Florence, Italy, SS. Annunziata, Capella della Visitazione, ceiling

Rembrandt van Rijn, The Visitation, oil, 1640, Detroit, Michigan, Art Institute

Crespi, Giuseppe Maria (lo Spagnuolo), Visitation, before 1727, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art, Kress Collection

Kollwitz, Käthe, Mary and Elizabeth, woodcut, 1938, Berlin, Käthe Kollwitz Museum

Denis, Maurice, Mary Visits Elizabeth, 1894, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Genre Paintings

Steen, Jan, The Doctor's Visit, before 1679, London, Apsley House, Wellington Collection

Rankley, Alfred, Old Schoolfellows, 1854, private collection

Stone, Frank, Charity, before 1859, Warrington, England, Museum and Art Gallery

Crosby, William, The Pastor's Visit, before 1873, private collection

Degas, Edgar, A Visit to the Museum, oil, 1876, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts

Cassatt, Mary, Five O'Clock Tea, oil, 1880, Boston, Museum of Fine Arts.
 Fildes, Luke, The Doctor's Visit, oil, 1891, London, Tate Gallery
 Picasso, Pablo, The Visit (Two Sisters), oil on canvas, 1902, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage

Further Reading

Daniel, Howard, Encyclopedia of Themes and Subjects in Painting, New York: Abrams, 1974

Giese, Lucretia, "A Visit to the Museum," Bulletin of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston 76 (1978)
 Hartt, Frederick, History of Italian Renaissance Art, second edition, New York: Abrams, 1979
 Tufts, Eleanor, "Lavinia Fontana," in Our Hidden Heritage: Five Centuries of Women Artists, London: Paddington, 1974
 Valentiner, V. R., "The Visitation by Rembrandt," Bulletin of the Detroit Institute of Art 8 (1926-1927)
 Verheyen, Ernst, "An Iconographic Note on Altdorfer's Visitation in the Cleveland Museum of Art," Art Bulletin 46 (1964)

VOYEURISM

Eugene Dwyer

The following periods and cultures are covered in the discussion of the theme Voyeurism:

ANCIENT

ISLAMIC

JAPANESE

RENAISSANCE

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Khusraw Sees Shirin Bathing in a Pool, leaf from a Khamsah of Nizami, illustration from Khusraw u Shirin, Persian, mid-sixteenth century, Safavid period, opaque color, gold, and silver on paper, Washington, D.C., Freer Gallery of Art (08.262). (Courtesy of the Freer Gallery of Art, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C.)

Modern societies usually understand voyeurism to mean the viewing by one or more persons of the intimate state or behavior of another person or persons. Such viewing is usually done without the consent or awareness of the person or persons viewed and thus entails a relationship of inequality in which the voyeur commands a superior position over the vulnerable “target.” The viewer’s motive is assumed to be pleasure, whence the term scopophilia to describe voyeurism in its erotic aspect. To understand why voyeurism is almost universally condemned, the practice of seeing what is not properly seen must be understood in the context of social attitudes toward envy and envy avoidance. “There is no curious man that is not also malevolent” (Francis Bacon). As Gyges said to Candaules, “Let each man look upon his own” (Herodotus). Thus, to condone voyeurism is to encourage behavior that is harmful to society.

While voyeurism has usually been universally regarded as dangerous to the individual and harmful to society, artists have often been called on to execute works of a very private nature, not intended for the public, like François Boucher’s portrait of a royal mistress, Mlle. O’Murphy. (The story is told in Giovanni Casanova’s Memoires.) The artist’s and the patron’s inability to restrict the subsequent viewing audience of a given work of art potentially affords the process of artistic representation a role in any subsequent act of voyeurism. Thus, artistic representation, like voyeurism, has often been condemned as harmful to society. The invention of photography and its popularization posed even greater challenges to traditional ideas of visual appropriation.

Aside from humorous ephemera, voyeurism per se rarely appears as a primary subject in the visual arts. Indeed, it was that very ephemeral quality of subjects that characterized the new Ukiyo-e of Hishikawa Moronobu, whose Woman Surprised in Bath is taken from the second illustrated edition of Ihara Saikaku’s The Man Who Spent His Life in Love (1682, 1686), “a long, eventful account of a rake’s progress . . . from precocious childhood to lecherous old age” (Hibbett, pp. 36, 42, 78). According to Hibbett, Moronobu’s print shows the hero “Yonosuke, at the age of nine. He is occupied by what has been cited as ‘an early Japanese use of a European invention’: observing by telescope a large naked woman in her wooden bath-tub . . .” (p. 78). At the top of Moronobu’s picture is a condensed version of the novel’s text: “Suddenly she noticed him. Speechless with embarrassment, she clasped her hands imploringly. But he only leered all the more, pointed at her, and laughed. . . .” Hibbett noted here “a disrespectful allusion to a scene in the third chapter of Lady Murasaki’s Tale of Genji, recalling the more discreet spying of the young Prince Genji, between screens and sliding doors, when he glimpses a pair of charming ladies in deshabille (‘This peep at everyday life was a most exciting novelty’). Instead of bathing, they are playing the aristocratic game of go” (p. 78).

Saikaku’s novel and Moronobu’s adaptation of text and illustration emphasize a sadistic element in voyeurism. Even here the subject (inspired by a David and Bathsheba?) is a pretext for a graphic study of the female nude, suggesting the identification of artist/viewer with the voyeur rather than his target. Artists of the Hellenistic period first exploited the identification of viewer and voyeur by extending the spatial envelope about a work of sculpture to include the viewer’s station. Praxiteles’ Knidian Aphrodite (circa 350 B.C.) became celebrated in antiquity through numerous anecdotes of viewer involvement. The artist’s choice of the vulnerable moment of the goddess’s emergence from the bath has stimulated the largely modern debate over her awareness of the viewer. Some scholars have argued against the interpretation of the work as a surprised woman attempting to cover herself, arguing that such a characterization is beneath the dignity of the goddess as conceived by Praxiteles but allowing it for the works of inferior followers of the Athenian master (Bieber, p. 20). This argument concedes that whatever Praxiteles’ original intent was, some of his contemporaries understood the motif on a more human level. Other freestanding works, such as Barberini Faun and Sleeping Hermaphrodite, are clearly intended to shock the viewer through the dramatic exposure of the subjects’ genitalia. In each of these works, vulnerability, the sine qua non of the voyeuristic target, has been achieved through the action of sleep (for Renaissance artists’ use of the device of the sleeping figure, see Meiss). Similarly, the sleeping Ariadne, the mythological daughter of King Minos of Crete and countless other nymphs, appear in classical art as the subjects of voyeurism and rape. (Compare Pompeian marble sculptures of a sleeping slave boy with exposed genitalia.)

Although voyeurs or onlookers abound in classical art, their roles are usually not vicious or voyeuristic as we now understand that activity. Servants or assistants frequently appear as bystanders in Pompeian wall paintings of erotic couples, although their presence more likely results from the artists’ attempts to create settings (i.e., by means of staffage) or to frame narratives than from efforts to create dramatic involvement (Michel). A Roman silver cup, formerly in the Warren Collection, depicts two scenes of male-to-male coupling, one of them witnessed by a boy standing in a doorway (Clarke). Here, the boy might be analogous to figures in wall paintings or have the more significant role of an epoptes, that is, one admitted to the mysteries, a figuration of the viewer. (Art historian Edgar Wind proposed just such an interpretation for the figure of a young man who stares at the principal figures in Albrecht Dürer’s Men’s Bath from outside the enclosure.)

Other artistic spheres outside the Greco-Roman have institutionalized voyeurism. A favorite subject in Persian miniature painting is the scene of Prince Khusraw observing the lovely maiden Shirin as she bathes in a mountain stream. The episode comes from the epic poem Khusraw and Shirin by Nizami. Shirin has been traveling alone, disguised as a young prince. Having stopped to bathe (and in the act of wringing or combing her hair), she is discovered by Khusraw. The latter's surprise is indicated by his gesture of placing his index finger to his lips. At the approach of Khusraw, Shirin's horse Shabdiz alerts his mistress, thus enabling her to withdraw. The elements of the scene as it was treated in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Timurid miniatures are the bathing maiden, her clothing piled by the stream (or hanging from a tree), her horse Shabdiz, and the beholder Khusraw. The arrangement of figures follows the traditional placement of subjects in Timurid painting, with principals toward the bottom of the picture and observers at the top behind a coulisse of trees, mountains, or architecture. In earlier versions, a respectable distance and the barrier of the coulisse separate Khusraw from Shirin; in later versions, the observed and the observer are moved closer together, suggesting greater intimacy (Guest).

The so-called Shiraz canon that governs the placement of the subjects implies a certain decorum, restricting (but also institutionalizing) voyeurism to the top edge of the composition. In the illustration Iskandar Watching the Water Maidens at Play, from Iskandar-nama, or "Alexander Romance," the world conqueror is obliged by the conventions of the canon to act as a voyeur, peeping down at a large stream filled with cavorting maidens. Voyeuristic onlookers are also found in Timurid paintings in which they are entirely irrelevant to the action, such as scenes of meetings in the desert (Guest, pl. 42A) and courtly entertainments (Guest, pl. 43B).

A number of subjects in classical mythology involve the dramatic portrayal of voyeurism. The hunter Actaeon is stereotypical in that his fate involves the sight of a nude female, Artemis. Accidental discovery is more to the point in Actaeon's story than pleasure, and his fate was to be transformed into a stag (i.e., to be appropriated by the goddess of nature) and devoured by his own dogs. This subject thus involves a reversal of the normal target. On the other hand, the beautiful youth Narcissus derived pleasure from beholding his own image in water. Here, the voyeur is identical with the target. Pleasure is similarly absent as a motive in works depicting the judgment of Paris, although the subject was employed by later artists, such as Peter Paul Rubens, to display the voluptuous female body. In several Pompeian frescoes, the shepherd-god Pan reveals the sleeping Ariadne to Dionysus, god of wine, recalling scenes of nymphs uncovered by satyrs.

Several biblical episodes involve voyeurism as an essential feature of the narrative and are so represented in art. Certainly the most celebrated episode of voyeurism is that of David and Bathsheba (II Samuel 11:2–4). After seeing the latter in her bath as he walked on the roof of his palace, David appropriated Bathsheba, as Gyges did the wife of Candaules. High-Gothic miniaturists naturally seized on the subject of the beautiful nude bather and the watchful king, although Erasmus and others objected to the use of the subject in church decoration (Knipping, p. 203). The story of Susanna (Daniel 13) represents the vindication of the target against the ill will of her voyeur/oppressors, yet the artistically invasive treatment of Susanna as a sensual nude involves the artist/viewer in the crime of the lascivious elders (Meiss, p. 225; Knipping, p. 203): "Few artistic themes have offered so satisfying an opportunity for legitimized voyeurism" (Garrard, p. 191). The stories of both Bathsheba and Susanna reached new levels of psychological intensity in the works of Artemesia Gentileschi. Whereas the episodes of Bathsheba and Susanna follow the conventional pattern of bathing female and peeping male, the story of Noah and his son Ham follows another pattern. Here Noah, drunk with the fruits of his viticulture (and presumably lying in an attitude of abandon à la Barberini Faun), is irreverently seen by his youngest son (Genesis 9:22–24). Although the Bible itself offers no explanation as to the precise nature of Ham's sin, Jewish legend told of the son's assault on the father's manhood (Ginzberg I, 166–173, strikingly reminiscent of the assault on Cronos by Zeus, king of the gods). The episode is rarely depicted outside of Genesis cycles (e.g., a ceiling mosaic in the narthex of St. Mark's in Venice, Italy). However, Giovanni Bellini attempted a single panel on this subject in which Ham is depicted as shamelessly inquisitive while his brothers display the requisite modesty.

Among genre painters, J. H. Fragonard produced one of the most memorable treatments of voyeurism in art in his painting The Swing (1767). Here, the swinging woman, espied by her voyeur/lover concealed in the bushes, is fully aware of her situation; the elderly man who assists her in swinging, presumably her unwitting husband, is the dupe.

Unlikely as it may have seemed at the time, Fragonard's painting is one of the last icons of voyeurism. Among later painters, Jean-Léon Gérôme offered up numerous idealized females to the hostile and profane stares of a vulgar crowd of exclusively male viewers. In King Candaules or Queen Rodophe Observed by Gyges (1859), Gérôme continued the subject of dramatic voyeurism, illustrating Herodotus's tale as retold by Théophile Gautier in Le Roi Candule (1844), emphasizing the sensuous oriental setting and Gyges' dramatic exit. In this work, as in his studies of nude female slaves exposed to lecherous male audiences, the identification of the implied viewer with the textual observer (Gyges) signals the advent of a more modern tradition. With the advent of photography and the objective beholder characteristic of the realist style of painting, the identification of painter and viewer emerged as an explicit theme. Most painters sought more authorial presence than was consistent with the viewer/voyeur paradigm. In his Nude with White Stockings (circa 1861), Gustave Courbet arranged his model to present the viewer with a near view of her most intimate parts, as if the sight were incidental to a tryst. In The Origin of the World (1877), the vantage point from which the faceless nude is presented is so intimate as to appear clinical. Close vantage points similarly characterize Edgar Degas's many studies of unselfconscious nudes. Yet, the more objective and matter-of-fact the connection between the observer and the observed (i.e., the voyeur and his target), the less the relationship can be described as voyeurism. Although unselfconscious, Degas's nudes do not in their positivism suggest vulnerability, nor can the viewer any longer pretend to the detachment of a voyeur, the "invisibility" previously accorded to servants by their masters.

Rather than furtively enjoying someone else's treasure, the viewer is now in possession. The artistic treatment of the subject of voyeurism historically parallels social attitudes toward sexual voyeurism.

See also Bath/Bathing; Gaze; Naked/Nude

Selected Works of Art

Ancient

Praxiteles, Knidian Aphrodite, circa 350 B.C., original lost, many copies

Sleeping Ariadne, marble, Hellenistic period, Vatican, Vatican Museums

Barberini Faun, marble, Hellenistic period, Munich, Germany, Glyptothek

Warren Cup, silver, first century A.D., private collection

Islamic

School of Shiraz, Khusraw Discovers Shirin Bathing in a Pool, illustration to Nizami, Khusraw and Shirin, sixteenth century, Washington, D.C., Freer Gallery of Art (08. 262)

Japanese

Hishikawa Moronobu, Woman Surprised in Bath, woodcut from The Man Who Spent His Life in Love (Koshoku ichidai otoko), illustration to Ihara Saikaku, illustrated edition, 1686

Renaissance

Bellini, Giovanni, The Drunkenness of Noah, oil on panel, 1514, Besançon, France, Musée

Gentileschi, Artemisia, Susanna and the Elders, oil on canvas, 1610, Pommersfelden, Germany, Schloss Weissenstein

Gentileschi, Artemisia, David and Bathsheba, oil on canvas, circa 1640, Columbus, Ohio, Museum of Art

Eighteenth Century

Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, The Swing, oil on canvas, 1767, London, Wallace Collection

Nineteenth Century

Courbet, Gustave, Nude with White Stockings, oil on canvas, circa 1861, Merion, Pennsylvania, Barnes Foundation

Courbet, Gustave, The Origin of the World, oil on canvas, 1866, private collection

Etty, William, Candaules King of Lydia Showing His Wife to Gyges, oil painting, London, Tate Gallery

Gérôme, Jean-Léon, King Candaules (Queen Rodophe Observed by Gyges), oil on canvas, 1859, Ponce, Puerto Rico, Museo de Arte

Twentieth Century

Ernst, Max, Susanna Bathing, oil on canvas, 1950,

Darmstadt, Germany, collection of Karl Ströher

Michals, Duane, The Voyeur's Pleasure Becomes Pain, sequence of six photographs, 1961

Further Reading

Bacon, Francis, "Of Envy," from Essays, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1930

Clark, J., "The Warren Cup and the Contexts for Representations of Male-to-Male Lovemaking in Augustan and Early Julio-Claudian Art," Art Bulletin LXXV (1993)

Fried, Michael, Courbet's Realism, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1990

Fuchs, Eduard, Illustrierte Sittengeschichte, Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany: Fischer Taschenbuch Verlag, 1909

Garrard, Mary DuBose, Artemisia Gentileschi, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1989

Guest, Grace Dunham, Shiraz Painting in the Sixteenth Century, Washington D.C.: Smithsonian Institution, 1949

Hibbett, Howard, The Floating World in Japanese Fiction, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1959

Kunoth-Leifels, Elisabeth, Über die Darstellungen der "Bathsheba im Bade": Studien zur Geschichte des Bildthemas 4 bis 17 Jahrhundert, Essen, Germany: R. Bacht, 1962

Meiss, Millard, "Sleep in Venice," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society CX (1699); reprinted in The Painter's Choice, New York: Harper, 1976

Michel, D., "Bemerkungen über Zuschauerfiguren in pompejanischen sogenannten Tafelbildern, in La regione sotterrata dal Vesuvio: Studi e prospettive (Nov. 11-15, 1979)

Posner, D., "The Swinging Women of Watteau and Fragonard," The Art Bulletin, LXIV (1982)

Wind, Edgar, "Dürer's Männerbad: A Dionysian Mystery," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 2 (1938-1939)

WHITENESS

Shane Adler

The following periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Whiteness:

RENAISSANCE

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

NINETEENTH CENTURY

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Frank Benson, Sunlight, 1909, oil on canvas, Indianapolis, Indiana, Indianapolis Museum of Art, John Herron Fund.
(Courtesy of the Indianapolis Museum of Art, Indianapolis, Indiana)

Whiteness is a visual perception, a quality of color that exists in various tones and materials in the natural world. Yet from earliest times, in unconnected cultures, the color white garnered similar meanings that migrated outwardly from token to belief and then back again. More than any hue, white has had consistent and lasting associations with particular values and their emotions. As the color closest to capturing the radiant effect of light, its meaning was initially spiritual. Eventually, the quality called whiteness took on strong moral overtones while maintaining the seemingly natural union with the divine. Each additional layer of attributed meaning depended on previous connotations so that, over time, the ideas linked to whiteness became intensified, as if immutable. White represented, and became inextricably bound with, truth.

Many ancient civilizations used color in their systems of order. The Chinese, Tibetans, islanders of the Southeast Pacific, early Irish, and the indigenous tribes of North America located the points of the compass according to the sun's rise and descent, and designated colors for directions, among them white. The physical world of day and night, of darkness and light, was a sign of the supremacy of the sun, the moon, and the spirits believed to dwell in these heavenly bodies. The moon's nightly glow inspired a faith that was transmuted to the Egyptian Horus, the white god, born of the coupling of the sun and the moon. Horus, who ruled the south, governed time and oversaw the span of human existence.

In several cultures the period of worship of a particular deity was illustrated by wearing the corresponding color. The Chinese emperor dressed in white when he honored the moon. To symbolize a personal affinity with all that was sacred, the ritual wearing of white was adopted by the Chinese philosopher and scholar Confucius, the Arab prophet Muhammad, and the Brahmins of India. For the Greeks of antiquity, the body itself was virtuous, and therefore was seen as white, especially for the gods who took human form. The poets Homer and Hesiod both referred to Hera as the goddess of the white arms; white was thought to enhance the complexion, a belief mentioned by Aristophanes and Socrates alike. When Ovid described the Roman gods in Metamorphoses (early first century A.D.), he too spoke of their "fair white limbs" and "snowy whiteness" of skin, the latter applied to both the female Io, the maiden loved by Zeus, and the beautiful male Narcissus. Ovid also spoke of the "snowy white" garments worn by married women at the festival to honor Ceres, Roman goddess of food plants; sexual abstinence was required of all participants in the festival's sacred rites. The white apparel specifically corresponded to the worship of Ceres, in that it represented fruitfulness. The period of abstention, or the denial of fertility, was an initiation into the dormant cycle of winter, when the Earth rested. Christian liturgy eventually associated a state of sexual innocence and lack of knowledge with whiteness and the white robe.

Similarly, the taboo on some sexual practices described in Leviticus in the Acharei Mot (Codes of Law) declared that relationships considered unclean by the Hebrews were wrong because they were violations of the soul of another, not because they involved the sin of sex. Theologians reinterpreted biblical cleanliness and redefined sin so that female chasteness was associated with the purest qualities of the untouched Virgin Mother. Red and white were her colors, signifying blood and milk: the red rose of love and the spotless white lily were said to have surrounded Mary in the hortus conclusus (the enclosed garden of virginal splendor). According to the Dialogues of Gregory the Great (sixth century), white was worn by all who attained Paradise, a field of sweet flowers.

Whiteness began to signify all that was good. The popular tale of Tondal, in which a knight's quest leads him through hell, purgatory, and heaven, was narrated by David Aubert in its only illuminated version, Simon Marmion's Les Visions du Chevalier Tondal (1474). Aubert, scribe to Philippe the Good of Burgundy, characterized the saints, male and female: "Clothed in white robes, they were very handsome, without blemish and without any imperfection." The courtly nobles living under the rule of Philippe the Good were themselves painted as they celebrated his betrothal to Isabella of Portugal in the fifteenth century. Because they lived by his beneficence, the earthly lords and ladies were all portrayed as resplendent in white, capped head to toe, their bodies rendered long and pointed.

However, over the centuries, whiteness came to be most closely identified with the supposed state of the womanly soul. "The untouched Lilly" praised by Anthony Stafford (1635) was the inspirational and chaste fair lady of his desire, an ideal created by man. Elizabeth I of England (1533–1603), the eternal virgin queen, declared her personal colors to be white for purity and black for constancy, and wore them for portraits and in public procession.

More abstract and complex than concepts that can be represented by either emblematic objects or descriptive actions, whiteness, as a testimony to character, has usually been conveyed through clothing. From the early eighteenth century, white gowns were seen in paintings as evidence of femininity, as they were thought to alter the outer form of imperfection and transform an ordinary woman into a flawless vision. Because of its frequent appearance in portraiture, it has been presumed that the white clothing was the wearer's own. However, unembellished gowns of costly, unpatterned white silk were exceedingly rare until late in the century. Charles Jervas painted Martha and Theresa Blount (1716), together called "nymphs" by the artist, in an informal but elegant levite of glossy white satin. In the following decades, William Hogarth immortalized the gentrified English family in group portraits such as The Jones Family (circa 1730–1731). In many of these conversation pieces, it was the mother, in white satin shimmering with highlights, to whom the attention was accordingly drawn. Portraitists like Bartholomew Dandridge and Francis Hayman were among those who similarly outfitted sitters in gleaming white to attest to their feminine virtues.

Considered by many to be the first novel of sentiment, Samuel Richardson's Pamela (1740) was narrated in 12 engravings by Joseph Highmore and published as a set in 1745. The heroine, a lady's maid, was rewarded with an aristocratic marriage after staunchly defending her virtue and chastity from the advances of her master. In Highmore's renderings, Pamela has a large wardrobe, including a variety of gowns that are predominantly white and in the same fashion as those worn by the aristocracy in portraits. Pamela's own descriptions of the silk she wore while in service did not specify color, except in the case of the "sad-coloured stuff" that replaced her "grey russet" for her anticipated return home. This was painted as brown, with a crisp and spotless white apron and fichu covering the front.

In French art, too, white connoted goodness from which came love and presumably marriage. In The Declaration of Love (1731) by Jean François de Troy, a young woman seated at the center of the painting is courted by a plaintive suitor kneeling by her side. She wears a richly brocaded open robe and petticoat that flow out gracefully, an expanse of pure whiteness. As the eighteenth century progressed, gowns of white proliferated in portraits by artists such as Alexandre Roslin and in genre paintings, such as A Musical Party (circa 1734) by Louis Roland Trinquesse. Whiteness gained another dimension in the works of Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Vigée-Lebrun and Jacques-Louis David, who created the prototype of the model draped à l'antique (in the ancient).

Alluding to an ideological valor residing in the virtues of the ancients, the moral lessons of neoclassicism were clothed in Roman costume. With the French Revolution (1789), history paintings, portraits and allegories, all saw women dressed in fine white draperies. At the same time, fashion participated by providing similar suggestions. White gowns that were said to imitate Grecian draperies proposed that to wear such a costume was to become a classical goddess and a work of art, and were universally worn by women of the middle- and upper-classes throughout the Western world. Writer Louis-Sebastien Mercier, writing in the 1790s, considered the shop girl in an athénienne (an Athenian-like dress) the equal of Venus, Roman goddess of love, and the writer Duchesse d'Abrantès referred to a friend dressed in the antique manner as "more beautiful than the work of Phidias." The belief that this trend achieved perfection in dress was proposed by the dandy and finicky fashion buff Beau Brummel in a manuscript dated 1822. He lauded the "pure models of Greece and Rome" and the present styles that replicated them.

Although white was worn in Japanese marriage ceremonies, the tradition actually derived from the color's association with mourning: the bride wore white as she departed from her family. In Europe whiteness was ritualized for religious celebration, weddings, and communion as art and dress eventually diverged from reference to the antique. White's former relationship to the Virgin Mary was reinforced by middle-class morality. Whereas Emma Hart, flamboyant mistress of Sir William Hamilton, could be "drest all in virgin white" [sic] and be publicly admired in the late eighteenth century, those who wore white in the nineteenth century were subject to closer scrutiny. No longer a state of mind, virginal "whiteness" was defined by the dictates of bourgeois righteousness and subject to its judgment. Promoted by fashion magazines as the appropriate choice for young unmarried ladies at social occasions, white began to signify youth, simplicity, and the innocent, feminine, middle-class soul. It was in this context that James Abbott McNeill Whistler produced his three harmonies of whiteness, beginning with Symphony in White No. 1: The White Girl (1861–1862). The model, Whistler's mistress Jo, holds a downcast wilted white lily, using the symbol of the Virgin to announce her fall. The hostility generated among Whistler's audience by this strangely passive yet sexual woman was to be surpassed by the outrage provoked by Édouard Manet and his painting Le Repos (1871) a decade later. The criticism audiences voiced at the rendering of the troubled young woman seated on a sofa was based on assumptions of her sexual knowledge and directed toward her impropriety in wearing white.

The Impressionists realized Whistler's technical intention to create a harmony of brilliant white in filtered light. The subject of Pierre-Auguste Renoir's Lise (1867) stood outdoors, and the effect of the sun shining on the white of her dress was called "delicious." Light's reflection of all colors interested Marie Braquemond and Berthe Morisot, who conformed to bourgeois moral codes by painting their female sitters in white long after its mid-century fashionable life had expired. So too did Claude Monet, who depicted his stepdaughters in white as "dreams" of his wife who had died while still young. In this regard his work approached the theories of the symbolist artists who reinvested the woman in white with private emotions, as a personal spirit. As if to find his way, Maurice Denis placed flattened female figures in floating, shapeless sheaths along a path receding into the distance, recalling the haunting muse guiding people toward self-knowledge described by the novelist Joseph Conrad as she who "emerges like a white figure from a dark confused sea." Pierre Puvis de Chavannes called his vision Hope (1872).

Yet again, the gown of white took on another dimension as the twentieth century emerged and European and American artists explored Impressionism and then went beyond it. Women were once again dressing in white, this time during the summer months. Made of gossamer, light, and fragile fabrics, the white dress became a summer one, and summer pervaded in painting in a seemingly never-ending languorous feminine reverie. The inner world of a woman who was settled in an intimate and quiet interior near a light-filled windowed outlook was a theme of the 1890s. When they moved outside as subjects, women were portrayed as part of nature itself, from the shadowed world of the fin de siècle to bright sun-drenched settings of colorful abundance in the new century. The statuesque and proud beauty who fills the frame of Frank Benson's Sunlight (1909) stands with one hand at her hip and the other shadowing her eyes from the dazzling light as she looks out toward the horizon and the future with American optimism. Significantly, such summer idylls were located in remote places where untamed nature luxuriated and dark urban realities never intruded. Yet the actual events that were occurring in cities relied on real women purposefully wearing white. The leaders of women's suffrage established a uniform code of dress to promote unity and group identity. The adoption of white was an affirmation that they were fashionably correct ladies, feminine and respectable—their cause was therefore virtuous.

Most recently whiteness has been used to simplistically divide “good” and “bad.” The mythic hero of a mid-twentieth century American generation, the cowboy in white duds, favorite of television and movies, claimed great territories in the name of the good guys. And the female figure clothed in an aura of whiteness, a seemingly eternal symbol of the purest of ideals, is available now as nostalgia, in books or on note cards imprinted with Edwardian ladies of elegance. The confident and full-bodied beauties in these depictions now evoke longing for the supposed serenity of the past.

See also Dawn/Dawning; Female Beauty and Adornment;
Light II: Divine, Natural, and Neon; Virgin/Virginity

Selected Works of Art

Renaissance

- The Master of the Harvard Hannibal, Annunciation, 1420s, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery
 Lippi, Filippino, Adoration of the Christ Child, mid-1480s, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Marmion, Simon, Les Visions du Chevalier Tondal, 1474, Los Angeles, California, J. P. Getty Museum (Ms. 30)
 Botticelli, Three Miracles of Saint Zenobius, circa 1510, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art; London, National Gallery; Dresden, Germany, Gemäldegalerie
 School of Jan van Eyck (copy after), Celebration at the Court of Burgundy, sixteenth century, Versailles, France, Chateau de Versailles Gheeraerts, Marcus, the Younger, The Ditchley Portrait of Queen Elizabeth I, circa 1592–1594, London, National Portrait Gallery
Queen Elizabeth I Carried in Procession, circa 1600, Dorset, England, Sherborne Castle

Eighteenth Century

- Jervas, Charles, Martha and Theresa Blount, 1716, England, private collection
 Hogarth, William, The Jones Family, circa 1730–1731, Fonnmon Castle, England, Collection Ann Lady Boothby
 Troy, Jean-François de, The Declaration of Love, 1731, Berlin, Staatliche Schlösser und Gärten
 Hamilton, Gawen, Edward Harley, Third Earl of Oxford and His Family, 1736, Collection Edward Harley
 Devis, Arthur, William Atherton and His Wife Lucy, circa 1743–1744, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery
 Hayman, Francis, Jonathan Tyers with His Daughter Elizabeth and Her Husband John Wood, circa 1750, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale Center for British Art

- Highmore, Joseph, Scenes from “Pamela,” 1744, engraved by L. Truchy and A. Benoist 1745, London, Tate Gallery; Cambridge, Fitzwilliam Museum; Melbourne, Australia, National Gallery of Victoria
 Nonotte, Donatien, Monsieur et Madame de Corcelles Faisant de la Musique, 1761, private collection
 Trinquesse, Louis Roland, A Musical Party, circa 1784, private collection on extended loan to the Alte Pinakothek, Munich, Germany
 Hoin, Claude, Interior with Portrait of a Young Lady, 1788, Chicago, Art Institute
 Reynolds, Joshua, The Ladies Waldegrave, 1780–1781, Edinburgh, National Gallery of Scotland
 Gainsborough, Thomas, The Morning Walk, 1785, London, National Gallery
 Boilly, Louis-Leopold, La Famille Gohin, 1787, Paris, Musée des Arts Décoratifs
 Fragonard, Jean-Honoré, The Stolen Kiss, circa 1790, St. Petersburg, Russia, Hermitage
 Vigée-Lebrun, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth, Comtesse de la Châtre, 1789, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art
 Desoria, Jean-Baptiste-François, Portrait of Elisabeth Dunoyer, 1797, Chicago, Art Institute
 David, Jacques-Louis, Mme. De Verninac, née Henriette Delacroix, 1799, Paris, Louvre

Nineteenth Century

- Lawrence, Thomas, Lady Templetown and Her Son, circa 1801, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Charpentier, Constance-Marie, Le Mélancolie, 1801, Amiens, France, Musée de Picardie
 Prud'hon, Pierre-Paul, Between Love and Riches, 1804, Chicago, Art Institute
 Peale, James, Madame Dubocq and Her Children, 1807, Louisville, Kentucky, J. B. Speed Art Museum
 Sully, Thomas, Lady with a Harp, 1818, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Vernet, Horace, Portrait of a Woman, 1831, Toledo, Ohio, Toledo Museum of Art
 Winterhalter, Franz Xavier, Mélanie de Bussière, Comtesse Edmond de Pourtalès, 1857, Collection du Comte de Pourtalès Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, Symphony in White No. 1: The White Girl, 1861–1862, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art.
 Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, Symphony in White No. 2: The Little White Girl, 1864, London, Tate Gallery
 Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, Symphony in White No. 3, 1867, Birmingham, England, University of Birmingham, Barber Institute of Fine Arts
 Manet, Édouard, Le Repos, 1871, Providence, Rhode Island School of Design
 Renoir, Pierre-Auguste, Lise, 1867, Essen, Germany, Folkwang Museum
 Morisot, Berthe, The Artist's Sister at the Window, 1869, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Gonzalès, Eva, La Femme sur la Falaise, circa 1868, private collection
 Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, Hope, 1872, Baltimore, Maryland, Walters Art Gallery

Monet, Claude, Woman with a Parasol, 1875, Washington, D.C., National Gallery of Art
 Braque, Marie, Woman in White, 1880, Cambrai, France, Musée de la Ville de Cambrai
 Monet, Claude, Femme à l'ombrelle tournée vers la gauche, 1886, Paris, Musée d'Orsay
 Weir, J. Alden, The Windowseat, 1889, private collection
 Denis, Maurice, April, 1891, Otterlo, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum Kröller-Müller
 Guthrie, James, Midsummer, 1892, Edinburgh, Scotland, Royal Scottish Academy
 Beaux, Cecilia, New England Woman (Mrs. Jedediah H. Richards), 1895, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts.
 Chase, William Merritt, Near the Beach, Shinnecock, 1895, Toledo, Ohio, Toledo Museum of Art
 Knopff, Fernand, Memories, 1899, Brussels, Belgium, Musées Royaux de Beaux-Arts

Twentieth Century

Reid, Robert, The White Parasol, circa 1900, Washington, D.C., Smithsonian Institution, National Museum of American Art

Curran, Charles, On the Heights, 1909, Brooklyn, New York, Brooklyn Museum Benson, Frank, Sunlight, oil on canvas, 1909, Indianapolis, Indiana, Indianapolis Museum of Art

Further Reading

Arnold, Janet, Queen Elizabeth's Wardrobe Unlock'd, Leeds, England: Mancy, 1988
 Davis, Shane Adler, "Without Repose: Manet's Portrait of Berthe Morisot," Women's Studies 18:4 (1991)
 Ockman, Carol, "'Two Large Eyebrows à l'Orientale': Ethnic Stereotyping in Ingres's Baronne de Rothschild," Art History 14:4 (December 1991)
 Rolley, Katrina, "Fashion, Femininity and the Fight for the Vote," Art History 13:1 (March 1990)
 Stefaniak, Regina, "Raphael's Santa Cecilia: A Fine and Private Vision of Virginity," Art History 14:3 (September 1991)
 Taylor, Hilary, James McNeill Whistler, New York: Putnam, 1978

WIDOWHOOD

Karen Pinkus

The following motifs are covered in the discussion of the theme Widowhood:

ALLEGORY

THE GOOD WIDOW

THE BAD WIDOW

Peter Paul Rubens, Marie de' Medici, 1622, oil on canvas, Madrid, Spain, Prado.
(Courtesy of the Museo del Prado, Madrid, Spain)

Although both men and women suffer at the loss of human life, in many cultures and during many historical periods mourning is constructed as a gendered activity and assigned to the women of a community. Often, the sexuality of a woman was tied up with her husband, and when he died she became a societal burden, a figure of ambivalent status. Widows were ritually murdered in ancient Egypt and China, in parts of Europe, and in Africa, India, and Malaysia, or they were inhibited by strict taboos, subjected to wearing specific clothes, and forced to crop their hair. Two themes dominate the iconography and cultural paradigms of widowhood: women as surrogate mourners for a community and “the good and bad widow.” Many cultures display a marked ambivalence toward overly expressive mourning rituals, perhaps because they seem to belie a sense of despair in the face of death or a fundamental lack of faith in a divinity. Roman law, to give just one example, allowed greater license to women than to men in the expression of grief, although the Twelve Tables specifically prohibit women from tearing at their cheeks with their nails, a practice common throughout Western antiquity. Later philosophical works, especially in the Stoic tradition, urge both genders to refrain from excessive mourning. Finally, widowhood is not so much a condition of particular loss as it is a ritual posture that is more economically feasible for women because it requires time and a cessation of all labor.

In addition, there is a persistent cultural attempt to divide feminine behavior into the two Manichean extremes of good and bad, a paradigm that is imposed on real social conditions of loss as a means of controlling and defining female sexuality. The good widow, represented in art from a wide variety of centuries and cultures, stands for the reining in of the female libido. This figure also represents the fulfillment of the wish that a wife, as economic and sexual property, would not be transferable; rather, her affections would be naturally bound to a single male for life. However, this cultural ideal is violated by real communal needs, especially when a woman is widowed during her procreative years. In various representations of widowhood from the West, the older woman is transformed into a “female masochist” who gives up her own identity with the loss of her spouse. Cesare Ripa’s canonical Iconologia (Hertel edition, 1758–1760) made use of the widow in the emblem of “alms.” Veiled, an old widow dispenses her last few coins to some children in front of a church. Her veil symbolizes her status as mourner, a figure marked as socially “different,” while allowing her charity to remain an anonymous gesture.

In any case, the widow carries the mark of her deceased husband until such time as she is transferred to another. As in ancient China and Egypt, funerals in Europe became ritual displays of wealth and status, and the iconography of widowhood is bound up with notions of public spectacle and class. In Purgatory (Cantos 8 and 13), Dante describes a bad widow and a good widow, and the acts of mourning performed for Nino Visconti and Forese Donati by their surviving wives influence the disposition of their souls on the mountain and in the afterlife. By the nineteenth century, widowhood as a retroactive tribute to the status of the absent male spread to the middle and then the working class. Widows frequently had their portraits painted, surrounded by the worldly goods left to them by their husbands or fathers.

Although Sigmund Freud, in his seminal essay “Mourning and Melancholia” (1917), does not assign a gender to the condition of melancholia, he clearly marks it as unproductive and even pathological because of the inhibition of activity it implies. The economics of mourning are similar to those of melancholy, except that the object of loss is recognizable and the process over after a certain period of time (six months, Freud posited, is average). The Western tradition of mourning as woman’s work is epitomized in the psychoanalytic account of libidinal cathexis and decathexis, reflecting long-standing moral constrictions on female bodies and behavior.

In Exodus 22:22–24, widows and orphans are offered special protection in the Commandments; they are assigned as property to the elders of a community. In I Timothy 5:3–16, Paul states that widows deserve to be honored by the community and by their own children. The widow should remain pious and uphold the mourning ritual after the death of her husband, but Paul distinguishes between old widows (at least 60 years of age, who should be cared for by the community or relatives) and young widows (who should not be thus supported because they will tend to want to remarry). These young widows are portrayed as idle wanderers, gossips, and busybodies, so they should be encouraged to remarry, bear children, and find a legitimate place in society.

In Lamentations, Jerusalem is personified as a widowed female. Abandoned by friends and lovers, she sits mourning the fall of the city (her own violation) and the Temple to the Babylonians in 587 B.C. Associated with miasma and ritual pollution, the widow of the Bible is alienated from daily life and compared to a menstruating woman who waits for a fixed period of time until her reintegration. Although the Bible does not express a single, unified moral or juridical notion of widowhood, the statement made by Jesus Christ in I Corinthians 7:8 has been taken as exemplary: “To the unmarried and to widows I say this: it is a good thing if they stay as I am myself [i.e., chaste], but if they cannot control themselves, they should marry.”

During the Christian Middle Ages, following the Lamentations text, various cities were represented as widows mourning, having experienced not an actual death but rather some historical loss in a more general sense. In Purgatory 6, Dante echoes the biblical language of Jerusalem with these words: "Come see your Rome who weeps, / Widowed and alone, and day and night calls out: / 'My Caesar, why have you abandoned me?'" (112–114). The specific reference to Julius Caesar here reflects Dante's pessimism over the seizure of temporal powers by the clergy and the greed of the emperor, who was concentrating on increasing his holdings of German territories. In particular, Rome was portrayed as a widow by Petrarch and his ally Cola di Rienzo during the withdrawal of the papacy to Avignon, France. Often, Rome was shown as a depressed female in rags, seated within a representation of the walled city, drawing on a complex iconographic history that linked the city walls with some tutelary goddess such as Tyche or Fortuna, goddess of fortune, in Hellenistic and Greco-Roman art. The goddess with a "turreted crown" came to be conflated with the visual trope of the virgin protected by the walls of a city, an equally ancient motif traced to the biblical Song of Songs, in which the bride sings, "A garden enclosed is my sister" (4:12) and "I am a wall and my breasts are like towers" (7:10). In a miniature from the medieval travel epic Il Dittamundo, we see Rome represented as a disheveled widow. Her hair loosened and her hands tearing at her breasts, this Rome takes up the burden of mourning historical change that would have been too dangerous for the male politician to express directly.

Artemisia, queen of Caria in Asia Minor during the fourth century B.C., was often cited as an example of the "good widow" during the Middle Ages and Renaissance. After the death of her husband Mausolos, she is said to have built the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. The extreme qualities of this monument were taken as signs of her total devotion to her dead husband, and it easy to see how this narrative appealed to a later culture of humanists obsessed with ideas of familial authority, nobility, and antiquities.

Surprisingly, another figure from ancient narratives who was sometimes labeled a "good widow" was Dido, the mythological founder and first queen of the north African city of Carthage. According to Boccaccio in De Claris Mulieribus, Dido's suicide is explained as a defense against any potential seduction by the Trojan leader Aeneas, a gesture proving that she had in fact maintained her vow to remain faithful to her dead husband. In this reading of the Virgilian epic, Dido, as paragon of widowhood, never actually becomes Aeneas's lover; this may also explain a reference to the good widow Dido in William Shakespeare's Tempest (II, i).

Petronius's narrative of the Lady of Ephesus (Satyricon, Chaps. 111–112) gave rise to many literary and visual imitations. This widow is so faithful that she demands to be entombed with her newly deceased husband until one of the guardians at the burial site tempts her away with food. After a good meal, the guard persuades her to live, and she allows herself to be seduced. During this tryst, the guard neglects his watch, and a crucified corpse is stolen for burial from a nearby cross. To help the guard escape punishment, the Lady of Ephesus agrees to let her own husband be hung up, replacing the corpse. The guard is saved, and they marry. The narrative bears a strong resemblance to parables of the young widow already mentioned. Her actions are both prudent and morally sanctioned as she finds a legitimate place in society after the incident. This is carried to comic extremes in the ribald novel tradition of the Middle Ages, epitomized by Geoffrey Chaucer's life-affirming Wife of Bath.

In pictorial representations, mourning quickly becomes codified as a series of gestures and motifs related to dress. Throughout antiquity, widows often tore their nails or cheeks and rended their garments, but such extreme practices were not always tolerated. At other times, we find the image of a woman drawing her veiled hand to her eye, obscuring her face. Another common posture for a mourning woman was a full frontal portrait with hands fully extended upward, pointing toward heaven as a prayer for the departed soul and an expression of extreme grief. All these gestures appear in later iconography for the Lamentation, the Entombment, and the Crucifixion. Although this iconography of mourning is rather general and not necessarily restricted to widows, it is almost always women who mourn in the Passion scenes, and their dress, such as widows' weeds, is related to clothing worn by religious women. The reason for this connection is obvious: Many women did in fact join convents during their widowhood. Headpieces, such as habits or large veils, helped to hide their hair (making for a more barren look) and to distinguish them from other women of the lay community.

In Peter Paul Rubens's portrait of Maria de' Medici (1622), the subject wears the "widow's peak," a section of her hood drawn just over the forehead, later mutated into an analogous condition of coiffeur that the superstitious continue to associate with a prediction of widowhood. From antiquity onward, black (but also white) was associated with widowhood. Catherine de' Medici, for example, is always depicted in black after the death of her husband Henri II. By the nineteenth century, black had become increasingly fashionable in general, with many precise social nuances attached to each shade. At this point, black mourning clothes lost their particular distinction, giving rise to the return of the widow's peak and to a number of other symbols such as special headgear, armbands for men, and crepe drapery.

In P. A. Fedotov's mid-nineteenth-century portrait of a good (or young) widow, the subject stands piously before a framed portrait of her deceased husband, her modest black cape reaching the floor. Ironically, although the portrait does present the widow as a faithful and devout woman, she seems to offer herself up to a gaze, her half-closed eyes demurely pointing to the floor in a gesture of obvious coquetry. This style of portraiture becomes quite common: The woman is represented with attributes of her virtue, but in the context of oil painting these are recodified as commodities for a potential new suitor. The comic reverse of this—the theme of a man courting a rich (but undesirable) widow—figures in a number of important narratives, including The Rake's Progress, illustrated with prints by William Hogarth (1735). Widows assume a comic valence in the British novelistic tradition in works such as Charles Dickens's The Pickwick Papers.

Although the widows discussed here are primarily examples from Western culture, many of the structural principles of marginality, masochism, and “difference” can be found in various societal contexts. Portraits of widows from the East often focus on the symbolic elements of mourning dress, which may include familiar items such as the veil, ornamental headgear, or even items of jewelry such as a brooch. Widows from non-Western representational art often assume postures of piety and acceptance, such as the kneeling Hindu woman in G. T. Seton’s Yes, Lady Sahad. A widow appears in an advertisement for a Scottish insurance company from the 1970s. Like many of the painted widows, she sits with her eyes downcast and her hands folded over a stack of unpaid bills. This widow has become a burden to the state because her husband neglected to provide life insurance, and as a cultural symptom she suggests that fears of state responsibility for the widow have not progressed far beyond the earlier representations. Each culture marks the widow through outward visual signs; her very representability suggests that her “good” behavior flatters the culture at large and helps to ease the idea of death itself.

See also Death; Devotion/Piety; Funeral/Burial; Grieving/Lamentation; Melancholy

Selected Works of Art

Allegory

Rome as a Widow, based on a lost mural commissioned by Cola di Rienzo in the late fourteenth century, London, British Museum (Royal Ms. 6 E. IX, llv)

Rome as a Widow, from an anonymous manuscript of 1447, but considered to be a copy of a fourteenth century miniature

The Good Widow

Memling, Hans, Paris Triptych of St. Anne and St. William, before 1494, Kahn Collection

Caron, Antoine, Artemesia and Lygdamis View the Completed Mausoleum, pen and ink with wash, before 1599, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Estampes, Res. Ad 105, f. 43)

Mary Queen of Scots, 1610, after a miniature by Nicholas Hilliard of 1578, London, National Portrait Gallery

Rubens, Peter Paul, Marie de’Medici, oil on canvas, 1622, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Hogarth, William, Portrait of Mrs. Anne Hogarth, 1735, Canyon, Texas, Panhandle-Plains Historical Museum

Greuze, Jean-Baptiste, Inconsolable Widow, circa 1763, London, Wallace Collection

West, Benjamin, Agrippina with the Ashes of Germanicus, 1768, Northamptonshire, England, Burghley House

David, Jacques-Louis, Andromache Mourning Hector, 1783, Paris, École des Beaux-Arts

Wright, Joseph, of Derby, Indian Widow, 1785, Derby, England, Museum and Art Gallery

Harvey, Elisabeth, Malvina Mourning Oscar, circa 1806, Paris, Musée des Arts Décoratifs,

Graefle, Albert, Queen Victoria as a Widow, 1864, London, Collection of Her Majesty

Millais, John Everett, The Widow’s Mite, 1870, Birmingham, England, City Art Gallery

Perugini, Charles Edward, Faithful, late nineteenth–early twentieth century, Liverpool, England, Walker Art Gallery

Hindu Widow, in Yes, Lady Sahad, by G. T. Seton, circa 1925

The Bad Widow

Hogarth, William, Marriage to an Old Maid, circa 1735, London, British Library

Redgrave, Richard, Throwing off Her Weeds, 1846, London, Victoria and Albert Museum

Fedotov, Pavel Andreevic, The Little Widow, 1851

Further Reading

Barasch, Moshe, Gestures of Despair in Medieval and Early Renaissance Art, New York: New York University Press, 1976

Covey, Herbert, Images of Older People in Western Art and Society, New York: Praeger, 1991

Fedele, Pio, “Vedovanza e Seconde Nozze,” in Il matrimonio nell’altomedioevo, Spoleto, Italy, 1977

Folliott, Sheila, “Catherine de’Medici as Artemesia: Figuring the Powerful Widow,” in Rewriting the Renaissance: The Discourse of Sexual Difference in Early Modern Europe, edited by Margaret Ferguson, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1986

Hollander, Anne, Seeing Through Clothes, Berkeley and London: University of California Press, 1978

Rickels, Laurence, Aberrations of Mourning: Writing on German Crypts, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1988

Taylor, Irmgard, Das Bild der Witwe in der deutschen Literatur, Darmstadt, Germany: Gesellschaft Hessischer Literaturfreunde, 1980

Taylor, Lou, Mourning Dress: A Costume and Social History, London: Allen, 1983; Boston: Unwin, 1983

Vickers, Nancy, “Widowed Words: Dante Petrarch and the Metaphors of Mourning,” in Discourses of Authority in Medieval and Renaissance Literature, edited by Kevin Brownlee and Walter Stevens, Dartmouth, New Hampshire, and London: Dartmouth College Press, 1989

WITCHCRAFT/SORCERY

Yona Pinson

The following iconographic narratives are covered in the discussion of the theme Witchcraft/Sorcery:

MOSES AND AARON BEFORE PHARAOH

THE WITCH OF ENDOR

CIRCE

MEDEA

SATURN

SIMON MAGUS

ST. JAMES AND THE MAGICIAN HERMOGENES

WITCHES' SABBATH:
PREPARATIONS FOR THE SABBATH

WITCHES' SABBATH: THE DEPARTURE FOR THE SABBATH

WITCHES' SABBATH:
WITCHES' ASSEMBLY

SCENES OF WITCHCRAFT

THE CULT OF THE DEVIL INCORPORATION OF WITCHCRAFT MOTIFS

THE NIGHTMARE

ILLUSTRATIONS OF LITERARY WORKS

WITCH TRIALS

Hans Baldung Grien, Witches' Sabbath, 1510, chiaroscuro woodcut, from Devils, Demons, Death and Damnation by E. and J. Lehner (New York: Dover, 1971). (Courtesy of Dover Publications, Inc.)

Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live. (Exodus 22:18)

Sorcery has haunted the human imagination from very remote times. In Judeo-Christian thought it has generally been related to idolatry and heresy. During the Middle Ages, however, attitudes to sorcery were not always unanimous. The Roman Catholic Church's official attitude was a total rejection of belief in maleficium (malefice, black magic), condemned as equivalent to idolatry, and therefore a heresy (Canon Episcopi 314, as cited later in the writings of Burchard, Bishop of Worms, 1006–1025; Burchardi Wormacienensis Decretum, Pl. CXI, Col. 831). St. Augustine adopted a different view. He held that the maleficium was created by God's enemies (Sermons, 15th sermon; De Haeresibus, 46; Faustum, XV, 7; XX, 11, 30; The City of God, X, 9) and was followed to some extent by St. Thomas Aquinas, who established the official belief in demonology (Questiones Disputatum, questio 6, art. X) and traced the main lines of later witchcraft mythology. This was fully expressed by the Dominicans Heinrich Kramer and Jacob Sprenger in their Malleus Maleficarum (1486). They taught that God's anger at mankind's depravity permitted the devil to found the "Secte" of sorcerers and witches, who since then have menaced both the deity and his creation—man.

The terror that invaded Europe in the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance was based on already deeply rooted beliefs in a conspiracy of the devil against God, foreshadowed in the thirteenth century as part of the violent struggle against all forms of heresy. Witchcraft is condemned for the first time as heresy in an official ecclesiastical document, the papal bull of 1233. But juridically and theologically, sorcery and witchcraft were first defined in the bull of Pope Innocent VIII, Summis desideratus affectibus (1484). This document effectively summed up the belief current during the Middle Ages, especially in northern Europe, that . . . many persons of both sexes, unmindful of their own salvation and straying from the Catholic Faith have abandoned themselves to devils, incubi and succubi . . . and by their incantations, spells, conjurations . . . other accursed charms and crafts . . . they blasphemously renounce the Faith . . . [and] outrage the Divine Majesty. . . .

This bull gave the official cachet to the Great Witch Hunt that shook Europe, and with the publication of the Malleus Maleficarum, the iconography of witchcraft was established and spread all over Europe, first verbally and then visually.

Sorcery in the Old Testament

Although biblical references to sorcery are rather laconic, there are many signs indicating that a belief in magical powers of evil existed at a very early period, arousing fear and signifying heretical attitudes.

The pharaoh's priests (Exodus 7:11, 7:22) are the first sorcerers to be mentioned in the Western history of witchcraft. However, the first magical events mentioned in the Bible are attributed to God's envoy Moses and seen as miraculous signs: his shepherd's crook turned into a snake, his hand whitened as if afflicted by leprosy, etc. (Exodus 4:1–9). These signs were used to persuade people to believe that God's voice was speaking through his mouthpiece.

Moses and Aaron came to the pharaoh's court (Exodus 5:1–7) in accordance with the divine will and pleaded with the pharaoh to release the people of Israel. When the pharaoh refused, God's representatives struggled with the forces of evil alliance, the pharaoh's magicians, and turned their rods into serpents, which Aaron's serpent overcame and devoured. Later demonologists would interpret this passage as a proof of the inferiority of devilish powers once they are confronted with a divine intermediary who represents the priesthood (Pierre de Lancre, Tableau del'inconstances des mauvaises anges . . . , Paris, 1613, p. 227).

This scene became an important iconographic motif in the decoration of episcopal and abbatial crosses. The duel between the Lord's messenger and the pharaoh's magicians prefigures the struggle of St. Peter against Simon the "Devil's Apostle," and as such may be considered a prototype of the Roman Catholic Church's fight against witchcraft.

References to the Witch of Endor are found in the Baalat H'ov and in I Samuel 28. The evocation of ghosts and the practice of necromancy placed high in the sorcerer's repertoire. Saul, rejected by God, looked for help from the Witch of Endor, asking her to call up the spirit of the prophet Samuel. She thus became a prototype of the late medieval necromancer. Since the word Ov (sorceress) was translated as Python, she came to be known as the Domina Pythonis (i.e., the devil's ally). This scene of necromancy, present to the minds of sixteenth-century demonologists, was rarely illustrated.

Jacob Cornelisz. van Oostanen's Saul Visiting the Witch of Endor (1526) in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, The Netherlands, represents the witch accompanied by her apprentices, demonstrating her craft, as King Saul appears with his retinue at the entrance of her dwelling and Samuel's phantom is called up from the grave. Other sorceries are performed in the air above: a naked witch rides a goat while another follows astride a horse skull. The theme of the Witch of Endor attracted later artists to the witchcraft motif, such as the seventeenth-century painters Jacob de Gheyn II in a drawing (circa 1600) in the Louvre in Paris and Salvator Rosa in a painting (1688) also in the Louvre; and later Johan Heinrich Fuseli, whose drawing of the subject is in a Zurich, Switzerland, private collection, and Benjamin West, whose painting (1777) is in the Wadsworth Athenaeum in Hartford, Connecticut.

Sorcery in Greco-Latin Sources

The European "mythology of witchcraft" inherited memories of the art of maleficence from classical Greek sources—this resurfaced later as the Christian imagery of sorcery. Classical sources provided themes that were eventually developed in the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Ovid depicts an old vampire witch called Dispas, who was known for her magical potions. Anointing her body with a magic ointment, she could change herself into a giant bird and fly screaming through the air at night. Ovid attributes other forms of maleficium to her as well: she could call up the dead, transform men into wild beasts, and was also accused of sacrificing babies (Ovid, Fasti, I, 131, 141–142, and 150; Amores, I, 1–18, cf.; Apuleius, Golden Ass, I, 10 and II, 22).

In classical times, lunar goddesses were associated with the underworld, magic, and sorcery. Hecate was originally a protective goddess associated with fertility (Hesiod, Theogony, 41 ff.), then degenerated into a terrifying figure, goddess of the night and the crossroads, queen of the realm of ghosts and the demons' emissary. Presiding over sorcerers' assemblies while grasping a flaming torch (Theocritus, Idylls, II, 12), Hecate foreshadowed the modern witch.

Circe, expert sorceress and devil's messenger, Great Goddess of the Wild, was known for her magic philters (Odyssey, X, 394). Together with the sorceress Medea, she employed erotically seductive powers to achieve evil (Odyssey, X, 391–394), chiefly known for her skill in turning men into wild beasts (Apuleius, Golden Ass, III, 24 and Apologia, Sive pro se de Magia Liber, 31, Odyssey, X). By the time St. Augustine wrote The City of God, Circe was already regarded as an archetypal witch. In the section of the Malleus Maleficarum dealing with transmutations (Part I, Quest. 10) Kramer and Sprenger refer to Augustine's remark that a certain sorceress named Circe changed the companions of Odysseus into beasts. On Greek vases and lekythoi she typically appears preparing a magic beverage, using her magic stick, and transforming Odysseus's companions into pigs and other animals. Sometimes she is shown raising her arms in an incantatory gesture amidst the already transformed brutes as they lie on the floor of her enchanted palace. Similarly, in literary sources Circe's enchanted palace was said to be surrounded by terrible wild beasts, lions, wolves, pigs, and innocent travelers whom she has metamorphosed (Odyssey, X, 212–219). Odysseus's companions are usually depicted with human bodies and beasts' heads: bewitched men "leaping up" are only transformed into "heraldic animals."

Circe's companion Medea is another prototype of the modern sorceress. Moon goddess and queen, she was Hecate's devoted priestess and disciple (Euripides, Medea, 395–398). After falling in love with Jason, Medea used her charms and spells to help Jason overcome mortal dangers and win the Golden Fleece. She also provided him with a magic ointment to protect him against the guardian dragon's flaming mouth. But once betrayed, she would turn into a furious devilish figure and exercise her maleficent science. She gave fatal gifts to Jason's beloved princess Creüsa, Creon's daughter: a poisoned crown and mantle that caused her to die a dreadful death (Euripides, Medea, 784 ff and 947 ff). This scene was depicted on Greek vases inspired by Euripides' tragedy and also on Medea sarcophagi. On an Apulian volute krater by the Underworld Painter (circa 330–320 B.C.), no. 3926 in the Museum Antiker Kleinkunst in Munich, Germany, Creüsa is shown collapsing in the presence of her horrified father and dropping her jewelry box. On the same krater Medea rides on her chariot, which is drawn by serpents (or dragons) whom she has conjured up (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 7, 350, 398). Shown naked, holding a torch (like her mistress and goddess, Hecate, and with some analogy to Persephone, goddess of the underworld), Medea prefigures late medieval and Renaissance sorceress. The theme was particularly favored by artists working at Fontainebleau, France, for it enabled them to treat classical subjects and witchcraft motifs at the same time. It inspired Leonard Thiry's illustrations for Jacques Gohory's Livre de la conquête de la Toison d'Or par le Prince Jason de Thessalie (1563, Paris), followed by Renée Boyvin's series of engravings Historia Jasonis (sixteenth century) in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet des Estampes in Paris. In Boyvin's Medea Invoking the Night Goddesses (1563) Medea conjures the gods in order to obtain the dragon's chariot (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 7, 350, 398). Medea is portrayed as disheveled in a stormy, deserted, nocturnal landscape in which she invokes the divinities of the night. Behind her are her attributes: a jar and a magic stick. The demonic chariot descends to take her to remote regions where she will pick her magic drugs.

Ovid dwells on Medea's rejuvenation spells. The rejuvenation of her aged father-in-law Aeson (Metamorphoses, 7, 164–294) is the subject of some Greek vase decorations. She is often shown standing by a steaming cauldron boiling a ram, as on an Archaic red-figure vase, no. E442 in the British Museum in London. This "miracle" served her against Pelias, Jason's uncle, as she demonstrated to his daughters how they could produce this "magic" by drawing off their father's blood, leaving them with the corpse. Medea is sometimes shown demonstrating this magical rejuvenation to Pelias's daughters, cutting up a ram and boiling it, as in a white-figure lekythos by the Beldam Painter (fifth century B.C.), no. 599 in the National Museum in Athens, Greece.

Boyvin's Medea Preparing her Philter for Aeson shows her before an altar performing a sacrifice to her patroness Hecate:

Ah by the Queen of Night, whom I revere
Above all, and for fellow-worker chose,
Hecate dweller by mine hearth's dark shrine.
(Euripides, Medea, 395–398)

Medea is represented here according to the already crystallized motif of the Witch's Kitchen, foreshadowed in late antiquity in the Latin grammarian Macrobius's description of her cutting roots with a bronze sickle and collecting their juices in bronze jars. "She was naked, shrieking and wild eyed" (Macrobius, Saturnales, V, 19:10). Medea, the terrible archetypal sorceress motivated by evil and erotic impulses (Euripides, Medea, 401–405), announces the new type of witch, one able to control the course of nature, cause tempests, destroy fields, and even alter the moon's movements (Euripides, Medea, 398; Horace, Epodes, 5, 45–46; 62). Priestess of Hecate, the crossroads' moon goddess, Medea even introduces the crossroad as a favorite place for witches' ceremonies.

Mythological Figures Incorporated in Late Medieval and Renaissance Witchcraft

The first recognition of pagan prefiguration of sorcery types appears in the eleventh-century Canon Episcopi (PL, CXL, 831–833). It attacks the belief that certain women ride out at night accompanied by Diana, the Roman virgin goddess of the moon, assimilated to the Greek Artemis, the terrifying Holda in Germanic lands, and at times with Hecate (Virgil, Aeneid, VII, 516). This might have been regarded as heritage of the worship of Diana that was sometimes carried out at night by women carrying torches.

In ancient Greece the image of the Satyr—a spirit of the woods and mountains with goatlike features—was adopted as an archetypal diabolic image. Its unrestrained sexual appetite prefigures the devil and he often appeared in witches assemblies. A demon-satyr raping a witch-nymph appears in sixteenth-century popular illustrations, such as Olaus Magnus's Historia de gentibus septentrionalibus (1555) in Rome. Saturn, the Roman god of agriculture, was annexed to the demonic and the infernal in the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance and became associated with maleficium. In his relationship to the underworld Saturn also became the patron of miners. The mythological tale of Saturn devouring his own offspring prefigured the devil in what became the new witchcraft mythology. In popular imagery Saturn became the patron of witches. In Renaissance depictions, such as Crispijn de Passe's engraving after Maarten de Vos's Saturn, the Witch's Patron (late sixteenth century) in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet des Estampes in Paris, he is shown in his dragon-drawn chariot accompanied by an infernal black dog. His astrological sign, Capricorn (billy goat), in this context became a distinctive attribute of sorcery. In this work Saturn's figure dominates the whole composition which in itself is a kind of anthology of witchcraft.

Sorcery in Christian Sources

The topos of the Devil's Grain has a Biblical association. "The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one" (Matthew 13:38). The tare, a weed of the grainfields, was interpreted as the Devil's weapon in his contest with God and mankind. An engraving by Bartholomaeus de Momper, The Haywain (1559), shows Satan sowing the tare, as it turns into various vices. The motif was rarely depicted; a drawing by Gheyn II (now destroyed, formerly in the Berlin Kupferstichkabinet) depicted the devil sowing tares that turned into witches riding goats.

The fall of Simon Magus, a Samaritan magician whose attempts at imparting the Holy Ghost angered Peter, occupies a central place in Jacobus de Voragine's account of the Acts of St. Peter. The sorcerer first appears in Samaria as God's adversary, challenging the apostle with his "miracles" (Acts 8:9–24). The Golden Legend's apocryphal version stresses the Roman Catholic Church's struggle against sorcery as heresy (foretelling the Inquisition). Pretending to be the "True Son of God," Simon Magus is a kind of Antichrist; practicing the maleficium, he also prefigures also a new type of sorcerer, one able to fly through the air aided by "Satan's angels" as the devil's apostle (Simoni deo Sancto; according to Eusebius of Caesarea, lib. II C. XVIII). In Rome he gained the favor of Emperor Nero (A.D. 37–68), who erected Simon Magus's image as it became an object of a false cult, venerated as Simon Deo. The devil's messenger Simon was said to have challenged St. Peter, accompanied by St. Paul, in a test of his "miraculous" skills. After he failed to restore life to the dead, the final trial came: Simon leapt from the top of a tower in Nero's presence and flew in the air supported by "Satan's angels." But St. Peter, with God's help, adjured the demons to release their hold and the magician fell to his death. This episode was popular in the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and survived into the Counter-Reformation, stressing the triumph of the Roman Catholic Church over heresy.

The legend of St. James the Greater, one of the twelve Apostles, and the magician Hermogenes, as related by Voragine, is another version of a confrontation between God's apostles and pagan heretic menace, one that haunted early Christianity and appeared again in the waning Middle Ages, when fear of the Devil's triumphs over faith infested Europe. In Judea, Hermogenes, supported by the Pharisees, summoned up the demons against St. James. But, as related in the Golden Legend, the saint finally overcame the sorcerer's spells, invoking the divine powers to release the demons and instructing them to bring the sorcerer before him. In the end the Apostle overcame the forces of evil and the defeated sorcerer was converted and baptized. Pieter Bruegel the Elder's St. James and the Magician Hermogenes (1565) is a very interesting interpretation and a significant deviation. Here it is the saint who is magically led to the sorcerer, as the Latin caption declares: Divus iacobus diabolis praestigio ante magnum sis titur (The divine James by devilish arts is placed before the magician). This inversion illuminates the artist's attitude. The composition is an important source for the study of the iconography of sorcery. The enthroned Hermogenes, holding a book of spells, is surrounded by demons, monsters, and attended by the devil. In the dark sky naked witches ride dragons and a billy goat to their assembly, raising a storm. A witch flies a broomstick through a chimney, another is already perched on top of the chimney, and a third prepares to fly, tracing a "magic circle." In the middle of the composition a magic potion is boiling in a huge cauldron, causing ships to sink. Toads, apes, and a cat, emblems of evil and witchcraft, are sitting before the fire. Meanwhile, a hellish performance has broken loose in the chamber, illustrating the devil's "antimass." Bruegel's "witchcraft anthology" parody shows his satirical intentions, which are more directly expressed in his second illustration The Fall of the Magician (1564). This is apparently a version of the devil's revenge on Hermogenes. The caption is Idem impetravit a Deo ut magus a demonibus discerperetur (God granted the saint's prayer that the magician should be torn apart by the demons). The punishment of the heretic wizard takes place in a topsy-turvy world. The context of a kermis spectacle, where heresy and witchcraft are represented in the guise of performers, such as jugglers, acrobats, a puppeteer, and fools, underlines a new conception of the contemporary witchcraft mania. Bruegel satirizes this traditional "moral lesson." He seems to consider it another aspect of human folly, foreshadowing the satire of William Hogarth and Francisco de Goya's modernism.

Witches' Sabbath or Satan's Synagogue

The nocturnal Witches' Assembly was considered the principal event in Satanic devotion. First mentioned in the Inquisition's registers concerning heresy around 1330, it is based on an imaginative mixture of bacchanal orgies and heretic cults. The "Office" opens with the sorceresses' confessio declaring their absolute loyalty to their master, followed by an antimass, the Adoration of the Devil, and the affirmation of their pact with the devil (Malleus, Part II, Quest. 1, ch. II). The antimass is celebrated with spoiled wine and the sacrifice of unbaptized babies. Following a banquet that culminates with copulation with the devil in the form of incubi or succubi (Malleus, Part I, Quest. 6; Part II, Quest. 1, ch. IV), the celebration finally turns into a wild bacchanal orgy with dances in honor of the devil (or with him).

The Preparation for the Witches' Sabbath

For witches, the ritual of the Sabbath was preceded by various preparations. A magic potion (or ointment) had to be boiled and smeared on the body so that the witch would be able to fly and change her shape.

The newly established iconography adopted a visual form only toward the end of the fifteenth century, when the first illustrated "manuals" were published. Witches Brewing up a Hailstorm, the title page of Ulrich Molitor's De Lanijs et phitonicis mulieribus (1489), is the first known representation of witches brewing the magic potion, one composed of snakes and cocks. Its vapors cause stormy weather. ("For they raise hailstorms and hurtful tempest and lightnings," Malleus, Part I, Quest. 1, ch. II.)

This operation takes place in the Witches' Kitchen or in a wild nocturnal landscape, such as in Hans Baldung Grien's Witches' Sabbath (1510). In Grien's single-leaf woodcut three naked witches are seated in a triangle of forked devil's sticks. One holds a vessel with pseudo-Hebraic lettering (a cabalistic spell?) spouting a great cloud of vapor that produces stormy weather, sweeping a hag aloft. Another is already riding backward on a billy goat toward Satan's synagogue.

The hellish kitchen motif recurs toward the end of the sixteenth century and the first decades of the seventeenth century. Gheyn II made versions of both open-air and interior kitchens. His The Witches' Kitchen (circa 1660), an exceptionally large engraving, depicts the preparation of the ointment. Witches consult their recipe books while a strewn corpse and bones hint at the ingredients. Cats, frogs, and a lizard also inhabit the scene (Malleus, Part II, Quest. 1, ch. II). The effects of the potion are shown above, where a hag riding on a broomstick soars aloft on magic vapors, others sitting astride a demonic mount, creating thunderbolts and volcanic eruptions. A winged Eros, the Greek god of love, mounted on a monster is a clear reference to the erotic character attributed to witches by demonologists, who declared "All witchcraft comes from carnal lust which is in women insatiable" (Malleus, Part I, Quest. 6). In a drawing depicting an interior kitchen, formerly in the Staatliches Kunstgewerbemuseum in Berlin, Gheyn II established a new iconographic motif—the witch flying up the chimney. Demonologists considered the kitchen fire a means of making offerings to the Prince of Evil; in popular imagination the smoke was seen as a means of "devilish transport," already occurring in Bruegel's St. James and the Magician Hermogenes and repeated in David Teniers the Younger's many versions of the subject, such as Preparations for the Sabbath (circa 1650).

The Departure for the Sabbath (Malleus Part II, Quest. 1, Ch. III)

Witchcraft's sexual connotations are emphasized in sixteenth-century German works, especially in Grien's interpretations. The moment of departure depicted in his drawing Witches' Sabbath (1514) in the Albertina in Vienna, Austria, shows the effects of the magic ointment. In a dreamy and ecstatic state, shrouded in enchanted vapors, one of the witches is already flying, mounted on the devil's fork and taking up a young witch with her. As in many other versions of Hexen, the woman's long hair blows wildly: according to tradition a witch's hair was endowed with demonic powers. The presence of a putto trying to ride a goat reminds one of the sorceress's association with carnal temptations.

Albrecht Dürer, the first artist to assimilate the teachings of the demonologists in his work, produced the earliest independent compositions on the subject and formulated new iconographic patterns. In the engraving Witch Riding Backwards on a Goat (circa 1500–1502), he illustrates the very moment of departure for the Sabbath. A naked old hag with sagging breasts is mounted backward on a dark goat, facing into the storm, flying aggressively toward the devil's Sabbath. She is holding a spindle and distaff, probably associated with the Fates. Dürer's depiction of the witch riding backward conforms to the belief that in the Satanic realm all was reversed and that "the (devil) transports the witches on animals which are not true animals but devils in that form . . ." (Malleus Part I, Quest. 6 and Part II, Quest. 21). The winged putti attending the witch and holding her utensils also hints at the lascivious character of the demonic cult.

The departure was sometimes said to be followed by shape-changing, attributed to the witch's demonic power. This iconographic motif appeared for the first time in Molitor's illustrated manual Preparation for Sabbath (see above). Italian Renaissance representations of sorcery are rather rare. Marcantonio Raimondi's La Carcase lo Stregozzo (sixteenth century) is formulated as a bacchic trionfi. A witch rides an enormous animal skeleton, holds a steaming cauldron, and carries babies and little children to be sacrificed to Satan (Malleus, Part II, Quest. 1, ch. II and ch. XIII). She is accompanied by demons mounted on monstrous skeletons and goats. The pageant passes through a marshy landscape that, together with the reeds, may refer to a cult of Diana.

The Cult of Satan

Sorcery was considered an "antireligion" menacing God and humankind. The Church of Satan was supposed to have its own cult: its magic rites, worship of the devil, and antimass (or Black Mass) were regarded as offensive manifestations of the Antichurch of Satan. Although this motif does not appear before the end of the fifteenth century, it is foreshadowed in the thirteenth, mainly in illuminated *Bible Moralisée*s, in which Jews, as the devil's agents, appear worshipping Satan in some illustrations of the Adoration of the Golden Calf. Jews are also shown sacrificing before the devil (Bible Moralisée, circa 1250–1270, Österreichisches nationalbibliothek, Vienna, Codex 2554, fol. 29[d]; Bible Moralisée de Jean le Bon, circa 1349–1352, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, fa. 167, fol. 27[b] and va [b]). The first representation of the cult of Satan appears in tracts against heresy at the end of the fifteenth century, in which the devil usually appears in the form of a goat adored by his adepts, who kneel in prayer before him. In Renaissance and Baroque representations, the goat is sometimes replaced by a cat, an ape, or by an enthroned Satan himself.

Incorporation of Witchcraft Motifs in Northern Renaissance Art

A growth of belief in sorcery affected the Netherlands especially after the Vauderie d'Arras (1461), which set off a mass hysteria. A terrifying idea, propagated through St. Thomas Aquinas's writings, that the world might be ruled by the devil, assisted by his agents, was disseminated. These credences took such profound root that it is not surprising that motifs were borrowed from witchcraft iconography and incorporated into other themes, especially when the power of evil was shown in conflict with the divine.

Hieronymus Bosch used the Witches' Sabbath as a motivating factor in his The Temptation of Saint Anthony (circa 1505–1506) in Lisbon, Portugal. He adopted the motif of the Departure for the Sabbath in representing men and women on monstrous mounts riding through the air. The antimass celebration takes place in the central panel and is opposed to the true Mass celebrated by Jesus Christ. Other motifs are also incorporated, creating a new iconographic pattern: the gathering on the banks of a pond (reminiscent of Diana's cult), and a Black Mass read by a demon priest with a pig's head, are borrowed from the recently established witchcraft iconography.

The new iconography of St. Anthony's temptations, filled with witchcraft motifs, continued into the sixteenth century (in the works of artists such as Pieter Huys and Pieter Verbeek) and influenced seventeenth-century works such as those by Pieter Brueghel the Younger and his son Jan Brueghel the Elder, and especially Tenier the Younger's many versions of the saint's temptations (circa 1640), which show the air filled with flying monsters and witches on broomsticks. Sometimes the Queen Devil tempting the saint is accompanied by hideous witches, as in the Anonymous German Master's Temptation of St. Anthony (circa 1516–1520) in the Prado in Madrid, Spain.

Bosch confronts the divine miracle with demonic magic in his Marriage at Cana (1475–1480). In the background, a magician is performing an antioffice in a "chapel" before an "altar," turning the cherubim that decorate the capitals into demons and bewitching the food. In contrasting the true faith with heretical manifestations, Bosch might be illustrating the Pauline verse: "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils" (I Corinthians 10:21).

Bosch also incorporates witchcraft motifs in his infernal scenes. In the Hell panel from the Garden of Earthly Delights (1485–1505) a damned personage is being seduced by a demon-succuba in the figure of a pig-nun tempting him to sign a pact with the devil. Images of the Witches' Kitchen are repeated in the central panel of the Last Judgment (1490–1510) in Vienna.

The Erotic Nightmare

Erotic fantasies play an important role in sorcery mythology. Nightmares were also etymologically ascribed to sorceresses. (" . . . Au pays de Valois et de Picardie il y a une sorte de sorciere qu'ils appellent coche-mare . . . " Jean Bodin, De la demonomanie de sorciers . . . [1587, II, 7, Paris]). It was believed, especially in German-speaking areas, that nachtmars (nightmares) were evocations of night-demons or night-hags tormenting sleepers and riding on their chests. These dreams were also considered the devil's instruments for what was called "interior temptation" (Malleus, Part I, Quest. 7).

Erotic-demonic iconography is expressed in the sixteenth century drawing by Taddeo Zuccaro The Nightmare or Allegory of Dreams, which depicts a young maiden lying on her back dreaming. A mixture of frightening demonic apparitions and erotic images fills the air. The dreaming girl holds a magic staff and a sprig of opium poppies, a traditional ingredient of the "magic ointment." Behind her pillow lurks a toad-devil, inciting her to dream. This theme obsessed a representative figure of early Romanticism, the eighteenth-century Anglo-Swiss painter Henry Fuseli, in work such as his Nightmare (1781) in the Detroit Institute of Art. A dreaming maiden lies on her back in an agonized erotic pose as an incubus-demon squats on her chest. Behind the bed, a grinning bewitched horse hints at the nightmare's connection to sorcery. On her night table are ointment jars and a "magical" mirror, accessories traditionally related to the sorceress's demonic practices. The mirror, Venus-Luxuria's attribute, was considered a devilish tool of seduction, especially of young virgins and innocent boys who might fall into the hands of the devil's agents (Malleus, Part II, Quest. 1, ch. XIII, p. 142).

By the end of the seventeenth century the fear of witchcraft had subsided and the furious persecutions of demons and their allies began to calm down. But the dying mythology still nourished the artistic imagination and elicited some response to the macabre and the morbid, as reflected especially in Salvator Rosa's many versions of the theme, which along with Fuseli's paved the road for early Romanticism.

With the new era of the Enlightenment, the formerly official belief in diabolic powers was criticized and satirized (Voltaire, Dictionnaire philosophique, IV, Paris, 1821, 343–344 B; Benito Jeronimo Feijoo, Cantas Erudiatas y Curiosas en quepar la Mayor Parte se Continúa del designio del Theatro Critico Universal, vol. IV, Letter XX, Madrid, 1774), and sorcery scenes began to reflect this satirical approach. Hogarth's engraving Credulity, Superstition and Fanaticism (1762) is a satire directed against crazed frenzied fanaticism, especially that of the Methodists, and against superstitious beliefs about ghosts and demons, rumors that were still prevalent in his time. The caricature shows a preacher on his pulpit holding figures of a witch riding a broomstick and a devil, evoking panicked reactions in his audience.

Goya used a very large repertoire of witchcraft iconography in his series Los Sueños (1757, Dreams); in Los Caprichos (1797–1798); in Six Paintings of Witchcraft (1797–1798) initially acquired by the Duke and Duchess of Osuna, his greatest patrons; and in the series La Quinta del Sordo (1821–1823, Black Paintings). These demonic appearances constitute a symbolism reflective of the real forces of evil that affected both Goya's society and his own life.

In these series Goya acts as a moralist preaching against the vices and social abuses of his age. In Los Caprichos he expresses his own anguish and satirizes the prejudices, superstitions, hypocrisy, and follies of unenlightened Spanish society. His satirical approach again clearly appears in the series Six Paintings of Witchcraft, formerly in the Osuna Collection, in which he translates the satirical images conveyed in the plays of the seventeenth-century Spanish author Antonio de Zamora (reedited in 1795). Here Goya's moralistic criticism initially seems to convey an optimistic attitude; he portrays these hideous creatures in the hope of influencing his audience. But his hopes collapse in front of reality, which becomes more frightening than his own didactic nightmares. In the series La Quinta del Sordo Goya responds to the atrocity of actuality. The terrifying images of Saturn devouring his own children, witches celebrating the Black Mass and sacrificing babies, and alarming flying monsters symbolize the real political and ecclesiastical injustices of his time, and at the same time refer to his own fears and pessimism.

The works of Goya had an immense influence on Eugène Delacroix, whose illustrations for Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Faust (1828) similarly expressed his own melancholy. The old philosopher Faust and the devil-figure Mephistopheles are conceived as the embodiment of an internal conflict between evil and good in the human soul, manifesting itself in the Middle Ages through the Theophilus, reemerging in the Renaissance with the German folk legend of Faust popularized in Christopher Marlowe's version (1604), and reaching final form in the late eighteenth century with Goethe's great work.

Delacroix gave an extraordinary expression to Goethe's view that Faust and Mephistopheles reflect an inner human conflict. Goethe saw in Delacroix's illustrations the work of an artist "of great talent who found in Faust his proper aliment . . ." and gave expression to his own experience. He also observed that in these drawings the artist not only assimilated the gloom inherent in Faust, but tinted his depictions with his own moods (Conversations of Goethe with Eckermann and Soret 1822–1833, November 29, 1826). Preoccupied as he was by the presence of evil, Delacroix also found interest in Macbeth's encounter with the witches (William Shakespeare, Macbeth, Act I; 1 and 3), again a theme in accordance with the romantic approach, which he represented in Macbeth and the Witches (1825).

Sorcery has troubled humankind from the beginnings of Western civilization. In the Judeo-Christian tradition it was related to heresy and the forces of evil opposing the deity; this belief reemerged with violence during the waning Middle Ages and the Renaissance. The late European "mythology" of witchcraft can be traced back to classical sources: Hecate, Circe, and Medea can be considered prototypes of the "modern" archetypal witch. The new "mythology" spread over Europe after the publication of the Malleus Maleficarum (1486), especially through a large number of engravings. The growth of a belief in sorcery, and in the terrifying idea that the world might be ruled by the devil assisted by his "agents," had a great influence on artists in northern Europe, especially Bosch.

Although the witchcraze died down, "witchcraft mythology" still inspired modern artists, mostly as a means of expressing their own anguish and fear, such as in Salvator Rosa's work, which paved the road for the Romantics (Fuseli, and later Delacroix). Goya revived the iconography of witchcraft in the form of a bitter satire reflecting his own anguish.

See also Bacchanalia/Orgy; Nightmare; Path/Road/Crossroads

Selected Works of Art

Moses and Aaron Before Pharaoh

Wooden Doors, sixth century, Rome, S. Sabine

Flemish Tapestry, from Tournai, early sixteenth century, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Woeriot, Pierre, Moses and Aaron Before Pharaoh and his Magicians, engraving, 1580, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet Estampes (Res. ed. 5c petit in folio)

West, Benjamin, Moses and Aaron Before Pharaoh, oil on canvas, 1796, Greenville, South Carolina, Bob Jones University

The Witch of Endor

Cornelisz. van Oostanen, Jacob, Saul Visiting the Witch of Endor, oil on canvas, 1526, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Gheyn, Jacob de, II, The Witch of Endor Invoking the Prophet's Spirit, drawing, circa 1600, Paris, Louvre
Rosa, Salvator, The Witch of Endor, oil on canvas, 1688, Paris, Louvre

Fuseli, Henry, The Witch of Endor, drawing. Zurich, Switzerland, private collection

West, Benjamin, The Witch of Endor, oil on canvas, 1777, Hartford, Connecticut, Wadsworth Athenaeum

Blake, William, The Witch of Endor Raising the Spirit of Samuel, pen and watercolor, 1783, New York, New York Public Library, Prints Division

Allston, Washington, Saul and the Witch of Endor, oil on canvas, 1820–1821, Amherst, Massachusetts, Amherst College, Mead Art Museum

Circe

The Daybreak Painter, Circe and Ulysses' Metamorphosed Companions, lekythos, late sixth century B.C., Taranto, Italy, Taranto Museum (9125)

Parmigianino, Circe Gives the Magic Potion to Ulysses' Companions, drawing, mid-sixteenth century, Florence, Italy, Uffizi Gallery; Fantuzzi, engraving after Parmigianino, 1542

Burne-Jones, Edward Coley, The Wine of Circe, watercolor, 1863–1869, private collection

Medea

The Underworld Painter, Medea Throwing a Spell over Jason's Arms, The Rejuvenation of Aeson, The Death of Creusa, Medea on Her Snake's Chariot, Apulian volute krater, circa 330–320 B.C., Munich, Germany, Museum Antiker Kleinkunst

Medea Sarcophagus, Basel, Switzerland, Antikenmuseum
(Inv. 135, 203)

Boyvin, René (after Leonard Thiry), Medea Invoking the Night Goddesses and Medea Preparing Her Philter for Aeson, engraving 1563, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet des Estampes (Ed. Z in folio)

Sandys, Frederick, Medea, oil on panel, 1866–1868, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museums and Art Gallery

Saturn

Passe, Crispijn de (after Maarten de Vos), Saturn, the Witch's Patron, engraving, late sixteenth century, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, Cabinet des Estampes (sa 1 in-folio)

Simon Magus

Simon Magus, capital, twelfth century, Autun, France, Cathedral

Bourdon, Sébastien, St. Peter and Simon the Magician, oil on canvas, seventeenth century, Montpellier, France, Musée Fabre

St. James and the Magician Hermogenes

Gaddi, Agnolo, Hermogenes Is Brought Before the Saint, predella, circa 1380, Paris, Louvre

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, St. James and the Magician Hermogenes, engraving, 1565

Bruegel, Pieter, the Elder, The Fall of the Magician, drawing, 1564, Amsterdam, The Netherlands, Rijksmuseum

Witches' Sabbath: Preparations for the Sabbath

Witches Brewing up a Hailstorm, from the title page of Ulrich Molitor's De Lanijs et Phitonicis Malieribus, Cologne, Germany, 1489

Baldung Grien, Hans, Witches' Sabbath, chiaroscuro woodcut, 1510

Baldung Grien, Hans, Witches' Sabbath, pen on green tinted paper, 1514, Paris, Louvre

Gheyn, Jacob de, II, The Witches' Kitchen, engraving, circa 1600

Teniers, David, the Younger, Preparations for the Sabbath, oil on canvas, circa 1650, New York, Historical Society

Witches' Sabbath: The Departure for the Sabbath

Vaudoise on a Broomstick, illustration for Martin Lefranc, Le Champion des Dames, circa 1451, Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Ms. 1276, fol. 104v)

Dürer, Albrecht, Witch Riding Backwards on a Goat, engraving, circa 1500–1502

Altdorfer, Albrecht, Witches' Sabbath, pen on pale brown paper, 1506, Paris, Louvre

Baldung Grien, Hans, Witches' Sabbath, pen on red tinted paper, 1514, Vienna, Austria, Albertina

Raimondi, Marcantonio, La Carcase lo Stregozzo, engraving, sixteenth century

Witches' Sabbath: Witches' Assembly

Francken, Frans, II, Witches' Assembly, 1607, Vienna, Austria, Kunsthistorisches Museum

Bramer, Leonard, Witches' Sabbath, oil on copper, circa 1630–1635, Bordeaux, France, Musée des Beaux-Arts

Scenes of Witchcraft

Rosa, Salvator, Scene of Witches, oil on canvas, early 1640s, collection of Tommaso Corsini

Rosa, Salvator, Scene of Witches, oil on canvas, circa 1646, Althorp House, collection of Earl Spencer

Ernst, Max, The Witch, oil on canvas, 1941–1942, New York, collection of Alfred Barr

The Cult of the Devil

Adoration of the Devil, illustration for Johanis Tinctoris's Contra Secatum Voldemsum, circa 1460, Brussels, Belgium (Bibl. Roy., Ms. 11209, fol. 3r)

Callot, Jacques, The Cult of the Demon, engraving, 1627

Rijckaert, David, III, The Diabolic Dance, oil on wood, circa 1650, Clermont-Ferrand, France, Musée Bargoin

Incorporation of Witchcraft Motifs

Bosch, Hieronymus, The Marriage of Cana, oil on wood, circa 1475–1480, Rotterdam, The Netherlands, Museum Boymans-Van Beuningen

Bosch, Hieronymus, The Temptation of St. Anthony, oil on wood, circa 1505–1506, Lisbon, Portugal, Museu Nacional

Teniers, David, the Younger, Temptation of St. Anthony, oil on copper, circa 1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Teniers, David, the Younger, Temptation of St. Anthony with Seven Deadly Sins, oil on copper, circa 1640, Madrid, Spain, Prado

The Nightmare

Zuccaro, Taddeo, The Nightmare (Allegory of Dreams), drawing, sixteenth century, Paris, Louvre

Fuseli, Henry, The Nightmare, oil on canvas, 1781, Detroit, Michigan, Detroit Institute of Arts

Goya, Francisco de, Dream of the Witches, drawing, 1797–1798, Madrid, Spain, Prado

Goya, Francisco de, The Dream of Reason, engraving, Capricho 43, 1797–1798, also Caprichos 45, 47, 60, 62, 66, 68, 70

Goya, Francisco de, Six Paintings of Witchcraft, 1797–1798, London, National Gallery; Madrid, Spain, Museo Lázaro Galdiano; Madrid, Spain, Ministerio de la Gobernación; Mexico, Pani Collection.

Goya, Francisco de, Saturn Devouring His Offspring, The Witches' Sabbath, Asmodea, "Black Painting" series, 1822–1823, Madrid, Prado

Illustrations of Literary Works

Fuseli, Henry, Macbeth, Banquo and the Witches on the Heath, oil on canvas, 1793–1794, Petworth, England, National Trust, Egremont Collection

Delacroix, Eugène, Lithograph Illustrations for Goethe's Faust, printed by Goyer Hermet, Paris, 1828

Delacroix, Eugène, Mephistopheles Appears Before Faust, oil on canvas, 1826–1827, London, Wallace Collection

Delacroix, Eugène, Macbeth and the Witches, lithographs, 1825

Sandys, Frederick, Morgan le Fay, oil on panel, 1864, Birmingham, England, Birmingham Museums and Art Gallery

Witch Trials

Fuller, George, The Trial of the Salem Witches, oil on canvas, circa 1883, Chicago, Art Institute

Fuller, George, And She Was a Witch, oil on canvas, circa 1883, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Further Reading

Baroja, Caro Julio, The World of Witches, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964

Cohn, Norman, Europe's Inner Demons: An Inquiry Inspired by the Great Witch-Hunt, New York: Basic, 1975

Davidson, Jane, The Witch in Northern European Art, 1470–1750, Freren, Germany: Lucas Verlag, 1987

Delacroix, Eugène, Theme und Variationen, Arbeiten auf Papier, exhibition catalog, Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Stadlische Galerie im Stadelleschen Kunstinstitut, 1988

Europe in Torment, exhibition catalog, Providence, Rhode Island, Brown University, 1974

Faraone, Christopher, and Dirk Obbink, editors, Magika Hiera: Ancient Greek Magic and Religion, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992

Givry, Grillot de, Le Musée des Sorciers, Paris: Claud Tchou, 1966

Goya and the Spirit of Enlightenment, exhibition catalogue, by Alfonso E. Prez Sanchez and Eleanor A. Sayer, Madrid, Spain, Prado; Boston, Museum of Fine Arts; New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1989

Hecks, Frank Irving, Supernatural Themes in the Art of Francesco Goya, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990

Hulst, Linda C., "Hans Baldung Grien's 'Weather Witches'," Pantheon 40 (1982)

Huyghe, Rene, Delacroix, London: Thames and Hudson, 1964

Janson, Horst Woldemar, "Fuseli's Nightmare" in 16 Studies, New York: Abrams, 1973

Kerenyi, Karl, Goddess of the Sun and Moon, translated by Murray Stein, Dallas, Texas: Spring, 1973

Kramer, Heinrich, and James Sprenger, The Malleus Maleficarum, translated by Montague Summers, New York: Dover, 1971

Lehner, Ernst, and Johanna Lehner, Devils, Demons, Death and Damnation, New York: Dover, 1971

Marrow, James, and Alan Shertack, Hans Baldung Grien, Prints and Drawings, exhibition catalog, Washington, D.C.: National Gallery of Art, 1981

Moffitt, John, "Malleus Maleficarum: A Literary Context for Fuseli's Nightmare," Gazette des Beaux Arts 115 (1990)

Neave, Dorina, "The Witch in Early Sixteenth Century German Art," Woman's Art Journal 9 (1988)

Preaud, Maxime, Les Sorcières, exhibition catalog, Paris: Bibliothèque National, 1973

Russel, Jeffery, A History of Witchcraft, Sorcerers, Heretics and Pagans, London and New York: Thames and Hudson, 1980

ZODIAC

Paul Grimley Kuntz

The following motifs and periods are covered in the discussion of the theme Zodiac:

FORMS AND USES OF THE
ZODIAC

FORMS OF THE ZODIAC: THE GLOBE

FORMS OF THE ZODIAC:
PLANISPHERE

FORMS OF THE ZODIAC: THE CIRCLE

FORMS OF THE ZODIAC: THE RING

USES AND FORMS OF THE ZODIAC: THE ARCH

FORMS OF THE ZODIAC: THE BAND OR FRIEZE

USES OF THE ZODIAC: THE HOROSCOPE

USES OF THE ZODIAC: SEASONS, MONTHS, AND LABORS OF THE MONTHS

USES OF THE ZODIAC:
ZODIACAL MAN

USES OF THE ZODIAC: GODS AND GODDESSES

USES OF THE ZODIAC: OTHER GROUPS OF 12

USES OF THE ZODIAC: THE OCCULT

OTHER VARIATIONS

ANCIENT AND NON-WESTERN

MEDIEVAL

RENAISSANCE

Limbourg Brothers, October: Planting,
Chateau du Louvre, from Très Riches
Heures du Duc de Berry, manuscript illumination, before 1415, Chantilly, France, Musée Condé. (Courtesy of Giraudon/Art Resource, New York)

To understand the important iconography of the zodiac, it is wise to begin with an ancient text. All the iconographic elements developed by later artists were thought out philosophically 2,000 years ago by poets. There is Aratus's Phaenomena (circa 276 B.C.), a Greek poem that often appeared in one of three Latin versions with paintings in the early Middle Ages. There is Firmicus Maternus's Mathesis (circa A.D. 336), eight books partly derived from the Astronomica of Manilius, a long didactic poem written at the time of Jesus Christ, in the reigns of the Roman emperors Augustus and Tiberius. These texts are helpful in understanding the iconography that we encounter exclusively as astrology (which was then astronomy), for the distinction has been sharp only in the last two centuries. Into the seventeenth century, those who studied the heavens, such as Johannes Kepler and even Sir Isaac Newton, cast horoscopes, unlike modern astronomers. The Babylonians began to interpret certain movements in the sky as omens for good and ill, and by the time the science of astrology was developed by the Greeks, horoscopes for their leaders were cast and predictions about specific events made. Astrology, based on intense observations over time and complicated calculations, amounted to a science in the ancient world, and although astrology is a larger subject than the zodiac, it did use zodiacal names and symbols and reflected the continuing belief that what happened in the sky influenced events on Earth.

According to Manilius, the universe is an interrelated whole in which nothing happens by chance because all is designed by divine reason. Manilius believed that civilization arrived when the ancients discerned the influence of the starry heavens on human destiny (Manilius, I. 25–112). Wise men from the east taught the Greeks and Romans. These were Babylonians and Egyptians and also apparently Zoroaster, the prophet of the ancient Aryans in Persia (Manilius, I. 42), who divined how the patterns of the constellations repeat themselves endlessly year after year. This accounts for the seasons, “why days varied in duration and the period of darkness fluctuated” (Manilius, I. 69–71).

The zodiac, a “slating girdle [of] the heavens,” is the path of “the Sun and the other planets” of the celestial sphere. What in general is its meaning? That “a divine spirit . . . by sacred dispensation brings harmony and governs with hidden purpose, arranging mutual bonds between all parts, so that each may furnish and receive another's strength and the whole may stand fast in kinship despite its variety of forms” (Manilius, I. 250–264).

The procession of 12 symbols is now well known to us: “Resplendent in his golden fleece the Ram (Aries) leads the way and looks back with wonder at the backward rising of the Bull (Taurus) who with lowered face and brow summons the Twins (Gemini); then the Crab (Cancer) follows, the Lion (Leo) the Crab, and the Virgin (Virgo) the Lion. Then the balance (Libra), having matched daylight with the length of night, draws on the Scorpion (Scorpio), ablaze with his glittering constellation, the man with the body of a horse (Sagittarius) aims with taut bow a winged shaft, ever in the act to shoot. Next comes Capricorn (Capricornus), curled up with his cramped space [not quite thirty degrees], and after him from urn upturned the Waterman (Aquarius) pours forth the wonted stream for the Fishes (Pisces) which swim eagerly into it; and these as they bring up the rear of the signs are joined by the Ram” (Manilius, I. 265–274). The cycle thus endlessly repeats itself.

I have inserted into the English translation the Latin names in the nominative case. These names are as well known to the contemporary person of Western culture as to the person of the Roman empire 2,000 years ago. This continuity is all the more remarkable because the symbols of the zodiac of the ancient world are so similar to most of those in contemporary visual culture that an ancient, opening our daily newspaper or weekly magazine, would recognize the 12 signs that draw the eye to horoscopes.

Even more remarkable is the fact that zodiacs of Islamic culture are in part derived from the Babylonians, going back beyond our Western tradition another 2,000 years. And the cycle of 12 animals in Far Eastern cultures applies not only to each year but to each cycle of 12 years: Rat (Aries), Ox (Taurus), Tiger (Gemini), Hare (Cancer), Dragon (Leo), Serpent (Virgo), Horse (Libra), Sheep (Scorpio), Monkey (Sagittarius), Cock (Capricorn), Dog (Aquarius), and Boar (Pisces). We have added to the 12 Chinese animals our 12, not because there is a correspondence but to mark the divergence of East from West. In a series of studies, Franz Cumont found astrology to be the universal religion of the ancient world, and at the end of the twentieth century he would find evidence that this is again the case worldwide. Given a continuous history with many variations throughout humankind, the art of the zodiac calls for comparative study of its iconography. Jews and Christians adopted the zodiac from Greco-Roman sources, and Babylonian iconography survives among Moslems. Much of ancient astronomy was advanced in Islamic cultures, and in returning to Europe many stars still bear Arabic names.

The iconographer of zodiacs M. A. Clarke suggests that we could go around the world and find parallels on every continent. “It is curious to find the same sequence of symbols employed for the same decorative purposes in India as in Europe. A perfect set of signs was copied in 1764 from a pagoda in Verdapettah near Cape Comorin, and one equally complete existed at the same period on the ceiling of a temple near Mindurah" (Clarke).

The first and most evident elements of zodiacal iconography are the circle and the sphere. Their origin is evident: We see our universe as the dome of heaven and in the dark expanse of night pick out patterns of stars that we call constellations. The tradition of the Hindus does this—but again in a very different way. Most evident now as in the time of Manilius, we learn to identify the "Pole Star" in the constellations of "the shining Bears, which from the summit of the sky look down on all the stars and know no setting and shifting of their opposed stations" (Manilius, I. 275–276). The sky and stars rotate, and, like a wheel, the universe turns as on an axis, from the north "through the very globe of the earth, stands fixed," itself without motion (Manilius, I. 280–282). There is, then, a still center that can symbolize eternity in contrast to the ceaseless circular motion of time. Seven planets turn in the middle space between the pole and the Earth. Why is this symbolism of circle and sphere significant? There is "nothing . . . more wonderful than its design and the credence of all to an immutable law. Nowhere does confusion do harm; nothing in any of its parts moves randomly . . ." (Manilius, I. 478–482). Manilius, on the basis of observable uniformity, affirms as an indubitable argument that the universe "is indeed the manifestation of God . . ." (Manilius, I. 483–486).

The iconography of the zodiac is not independent of belief. In many illustrations, graphic and sculptural, the artist shows nature dependent on the divine. In one, the hand of God holds the axis. The text is "the heavens declare the glory of God, a demonstration of Psalm 19" (Heninger).

The center has various functions. An empty circle may signify eternity. An Eastern alternative is the circle divided by an S-curved line: the opposites yang-yin, the light and the dark, the male and the female. Western iconography more commonly uses the sun. This may be read impersonally as the Pythagorean central fire or personified as the Creator who commands "Let there be light" or as a crowned figure, Jesus Christ the King. We will encounter many other alternatives, such as the shepherd-god Pan, the God of Time, and even physical Earth itself.

Thus, the iconography of the zodiac is profoundly ambiguous. We may recognize, as do scholars who have studied Babylonian mythology, that as many as seven of our signs derive from Mesopotamian polytheism, yet the unity of the harmonious whole points toward monotheism.

The universe of the zodiac may be polytheistic, for the stars and planets, especially the sun, are living spirits. Yet Manilius, in sympathy with Stoic natural theology, speaks of one ultimate divinity characterized by reason. In Chinese zodiacs, the center may appear empty because eternity cannot be represented by a temporal being. However, the principle is of eternal change, as illustrated in the eightfold permutation and combination of three broken and three unbroken lines.

The most famous Egyptian planisphere, from a ceiling at Dendera, shows the world order upheld by four pairs of kneeling deities at the north, south, east, and west sides of the square room. At the northeast, southeast, southwest, and northwest corners are standing female deities also supporting the heavenly circle. Although built during the reign of the Ptolemies, with Greco-Roman borrowings (Aries and Libra), we are aware of a different tradition of mythology. Ursa Major is the god of the Celestial Cow, Ursa Minor is a Jackal dedicated to the Goddess Set, and Draco is the Hippopotamus. It is of great iconographic importance that the circle of animals is within a square. Manilius writes that "Earth, poised squarely in the centre, with a sphere of stars . . . by fixed laws . . . united . . . into a single body, [the first Cause and Guardian of All Things] ordaining that air and earth and fire and flowing water should each for the other provide mutual sustenance in order that harmony might prevail over so many elements at variance . . ." (III. 48–54, cf. I. 49f). The variance of the elements is developed in many texts as contrasted qualities of dry and wet, hot and cold. Life is possible for the universe and for humans only if balance restrains the cosmic body and human body from extremes, thus the basis for the parallelism of microcosm to macrocosm: "We perceive our creator, of whom we are part, and rise to the stars, whose children we are. Can one doubt that a divinity dwells within our breasts and that our souls return to the heavens whence they came?" (IV. 885–888). The most famous representation of the analogy between the divinely ruled cosmos and the divinely ruled person is in Leonardo da Vinci's Homo, proportioned to the cosmic circle and square.

What, then, are the twelve signs of the zodiac? The way God divided the world into portions [and] distributed it among the individual signs. To each guardian power he has given a special region of the world to rule. And just as the human fate is apportioned among the signs, and the protection they afford, though collectively extending over the limbs allocated among them (the Ram is attached to the head, the Bull to the neck; the arms reckoned as under the Twins' domain, the breast under the Crab's; the shoulders appeal to you Nemian [Lion], and to you Maiden [Virgo], the belly; the Balance attends the loins, and the Scorpion is lord of the groin; the Archer has bestowed his love upon the thighs, Capricorn upon his knees, whilst the Youth [water-man] is protector of the shanks and the Fish[es] of the feet), so in like manner do different signs lay claim to different lands. (Manilius, IV. 701–710)

Of these ideas, it is the Chinese zodiac that names the 12 tribes of humankind under the signs. There are many medical zodiacs, dating from early times into the eighteenth century. The symbols are the significant influences tied to the bodily parts or rays of light or by lines connected to the signs.

Many of the more than 4,000 lines of Manilius's verses are devoted to devising horoscopes, and there are innumerable calculations of lots that our birth date makes likely or inevitable. We are told which combinations of signs are unlikely to be harmonious and which days (102) of the year are unlucky. All this is more clearly communicated in charts. But the basic scheme of the starry heaven with the procession of the signs is visual and an invitation to painter and sculptor. For the most part, we must recognize that the pictures reflect beliefs about the cosmos and human destiny, yet we must set them aside to concentrate on the iconography. The way in which we select patterns and express them visually to some extent explains the beliefs. All books on astrology more or less depend on their illustrations for significance. Let us set side by side the most famous Egyptian painting of the starry heavens and a sculpture from third-century Rome.

When the ceiling of the temple at Dendera was first studied at the end of the eighteenth century, it led the French scholar Charles-François Dupuis to claim, in a series of books (1781, 1794, and later), that the zodiac was universal and revealed the origin of all varieties of worship. Dupuis's drawing calls attention to the presence of the same 12 signs described by Manilius in his procession. However, there are Egyptian peculiarities. The sun god Ra was a personification of the solar disk, and the moon was sometimes called the left eye of Horus. Egyptians who plied the Nile River pictured sun and moon crossing the sky by boat. The solar boat during the night returned by a lower sky.

In the Roman sculpture, the divine planets included Horus, "the bull of the sky" (Saturn), "the goddess of the morning" (Venus), "the jewel of the sky" (Jupiter), and "the star of the east" or "Horus the red" (Mars). The departed pharaoh joined this astral company ("Astronomy and Astrology," Col. 45). Rather than the 12 gods of Egypt who uphold the heavens in a famous Roman sculpture, it is Atlas whose shoulders bear the zodiacal ring. In the center sits the chief of the gods, Jupiter. Another noted example of Atlas holding up the sphere of heaven, with zodiac, is Atlas Farnese (second century A.D.) in Naples, Italy.

In contrast to the anthropomorphic Egyptian and our classical Greco-Roman systems is the impersonal principle of heaven, or yang-yin, at the center of Chinese zodiacs. Here, we have a completely different set of 12 animals (Becker; Cycle).

In thinking of the variations between zodiacs that illustrate different belief systems, art history also reminds us of their practical application in everyday life. The zodiac is a calendar, a way of keeping track of the days of each twelfth segment of the yearly cycle. In the graffiti calendar of A.D. 354, found on the Equiline Hill of Rome, there are holes for each of 30 days; each day a peg is moved one step further. Also, there are the seven gods, after whom the days of the week are named, and the 12 signs, each with a midpoint (Cutler, p. 231).

Representation of many deities was the reprehensible idolatry prohibited by Moses and the prophets. Jeremiah in particular denounced foretelling the future from the planets and stars (Jeremiah 10:2, etc.). Yet the zodiac had great appeal to Jews of the ancient world, and most significant is the zodiac in the mosaic floor of the synagogue at Beth Alpha in Israel (also Na'Arán and Hammath Tiberias, which are not as well preserved). The 12 signs may iconographically represent the 12 sons of Jacob or the 12 tribes of Israel. YHWH may not be represented as a deity at the center, but the sun can symbolize the work of the Creator. Just as the signs from Aries to Pisces can be shown in procession across the sky, so too can the animal symbols of the 12 tribes ("Zodiac," cols. 191-192); Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 7, p. 972).

Christian teachers, who were originally all Jews, similarly condemned astrology. But the zodiac had spiritual worth. The best brief account of how the zodiac was adopted into Christian iconography is the article "Zodiakus" (Holl).

Because the 12 signs had been related to the 12 patriarchs, it was fitting to take the zodiac as symbolic of the 12 apostles. However, more significant than numerological correspondence was to consider Aries a lamb and Taurus a gentle calf. Virgo meant the Blessed Virgin Mary, and Libra meant the justice that Jesus Christ brought to the world. The theologians who condemned the determinism or fatalism of astrological prognostications did not also condemn the zodiac. Because the Orphics put Phanes in the central divine place, and the Mithraic cult reserved it for Mithras, Christ as a crowned sun could take central place and the whole zodiac became a symbol of Christ's mission.

Some of the earliest evidence of how Christians used biblical metaphor to make the zodiac at home in the church is from Hippolytus of Rome (circa A.D. 170-235):

Christ the Sun, once he had risen from the womb of the earth, showed the twelve Apostles to be, as it were, twelve hours. . . . Once they were gathered together, the twelve Apostles, like twelve months, proclaimed the perfect year, Christ. . . . Because the prophet refers to Christ as day, sun, and year [Isaiah 61:2] the Apostles must be called hours and months. (Bened. Myosis, Patrologia Graeca 27:171, from Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 14, p. 869)

Christian interpretation casts Christ as the sun and the 12 zodiacal signs as the 12 apostles and the 12 minor prophets (from Schmid's "Musterbuch"; Becker).

Among the most interesting parallels to what Jews and Christians did are the noted examples that show at the center Phanes or Aion, god of time, and the Mithras slaying the bull. Mithras overcame the sun and made friends with him. By slaughtering the bull, he conferred fertility on Earth, as vegetation springs from the blood. Witnessing salvation, part of a cult that appeared to soldiers of Roman armies are a dog, a serpent, a scorpion, a cup, and a crow, among the constellations. The serpent symbolizes Earth, the cup water, the crow air, and the lion fire—once again, the four elements (Gleadon, Origin, p. 120, and fig. 8). The zodiacs of Babylon present the violent struggle between gods and between gods and monsters. Salvation in Mithraism, as in Christianity, does not come without blood. An Orphic stone relief of the second century A.D. in the Galleria Estense in Modena, Italy, presents us with the zodiac circle as an oval mandorla. In the center, emerging from the cosmic egg, is an angelic winged God of Time. Although entwined by a serpent, he triumphs (Gundel and Gundel, p. 166). The Christian version replaces Phanes with Christ; sometimes, because the birthday of light is December 25, the scene is of the birth of Jesus.

Christian Europe did not destroy the achievement of pagan astronomy; rather, it transmitted texts such as that of Aratus. His poem Phaenomena appeared in three Latin translations. In the age of Charlemagne's revived Roman Empire, with its court at Aachen, Germany (Aix la Chapelle), numerous manuscripts were illustrated with paintings copied from ancient artists who represented the signs of the zodiac. A score or two of these illuminated manuscripts survive in various libraries (listed with shelfmarks in Encyclopedia of World Art, vol. 3, Cols. 57-59).

The best known, the Leiden Aratea, shows the signs, such as Sagittarius, with squares of gold to represent the stars of its constellation. The small book is made up of 99 parchment leaves. In the painting of each sign and other constellations, the painter was little concerned with the astronomical number, position, or brightness of the stars. In presenting the universe, the painter represents Earth by a circle in the center. In spheres around Earth, the seven “wandering stars”—not only Mars, Venus, Mercury, Jupiter, and Saturn but the sun and the moon as well—revolve around Earth in their cycles. Each sign is also in a circle and interspersed with the figures of the months, also in circles. The oddity is that the signs read counterclockwise and the months clockwise! The copyist followed the heavenly configuration, now calculated to have been March 28, 579, so that the book is useless as either calendar or astronomy. The Leiden Aratea presented the four seasons: four human heads in corners of the squarish field. Twelve signs group easily into four threes. “Spring wears a garland of flowers; Summer is crowned with wheat; Fall sports a wreath made of vine leaves; and Winter covers her head with a warm cloak” (Katzenstein and Savage-Smith, p. 35). The figures of the zodiacal signs are beautiful and convey noble messages. The twin sons of Leda and Jupiter, Castor and Pollux (the Gemini), are balanced. One carries a club and the other a lyre. The gods’ lives must combine the virtues of an athlete with those of an artist (learned in both Gymnastiké and Mousiké, which teach Plato’s Republic). In this regard, the sign has moral significance. According to the myth of brotherly loyalty, when Castor was killed in battle, Pollux begged his father to exchange his life for that of the dead brother. Jupiter rewarded the brothers’ devotion by placing them among the stars. In an age of chivalry, the distinction between pagan and Christian virtues vanished.

During the Middle Ages, the language of the 12 symbols was enriched with 12 corresponding abstract signs. Renaissance scholars provide us with explanations of the derivation of each sign from its original symbol. Sometimes the symbol accompanies the sign, and sometimes another circle is provided to make the association meaningful and memorable (Becker).

Name	Sign	Explanation
Aries	♈	Ram’s head
Taurus	♉	Ox’s head
Gemini	♊	Two people, arms and legs tied
Cancer	♋	Claws of a crab
Leo	♌	Tail of a lion
Virgo	♍	Wings of a virgin
Libra	♎	Balance beams
Scorpio	♏	Scorpion with raised tail
Sagittarius	♐	Arrow resting on a bowstring
Capricorn	♑	Wound tail of a goat-fish
Aquarius	♒	Stream of water
Pisces	♓	Two fishes

We should not be surprised to find Christ represented as the sun. The Roman Catholic Church chose December 25 as the day of his birth because on that day, birthday of the sun, the amount of daylight increases. Each Lord’s Day (Dies Domenica) is Sun-Day.

Astrology blended with revelation in such a way that it shocked no one at the time. The great authority on religious art of medieval France, Émile Mâle, found no protest against such blending of pagan and Christian, even when the iconography was used in church sculpture. Why? Because the zodiacal creation reinforced biblical faith that “man is the center of the universe. It was for man that God set the planets in their orbits to turn round the earth; they were there not only for the enjoyment of his eyes, but to teach him the rules of health.”

Astrology’s premise—that nature limits human freedom—can be accepted by Christian theology.

The newly born is like virgin wax, ready to receive any imprint. The planet reigning in the sky at the moment imprints an indelible stamp on his being. At the moment, the child’s character and destiny are inscribed within him . . . he can only become what he is. A formidable fatalism, but one which the Church as a whole could accept . . . freedom is only the power to accept or reject grace. It is by grace alone that we escape . . . nature, that is, fatality. . . . Our temperament and character [are] predestined. . . . All temperaments can participate in redemption: St. Peter was of a sanguine temperament, St. Paul was choleric, St. John was melanchol[ic], St. Mark was phlegmatic: all four sit at the right hand of God. That is what Albrecht Dürer meant to convey when he represented the four temperaments as the four apostles. (Mâle)

In Romanesque and medieval cathedrals, the zodiac occurs in the tympanum of the western entrance. In many shrines, such as at Vézelay, France, Christ sits in judgment, and the procession of the symbols arches the sky above. There are 30 circles carved in the 180 degrees of the round arch that show how early medieval sculptors represented Cancer (the Crab), which has the head of a fish, the tail of an octopus, the claws of a lobster, and three pairs of frog legs. We cannot complain that they merely copied ancient models or nature and that they lacked imagination.

Zodiacal symbolism became conspicuous in medieval art. Nearly all the French cathedrals of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries exhibit on their portals a species of rural calendar in which each month and sign has its corresponding labor. The zodiac of Notre Dame of Paris, opening with Aquarius, is a noted example. A similar series, in which sculptured figures of Christ and the apostles are associated with the signs, can be seen in perfect preservation on the chief doorway of the abbey church at Vézelay. The cathedrals of Amiens, Sens, and Rheims are decorated in the same way. In Italy, the signs and works survive fragmentarily in the baptistery at Parma, completely on the porch of the cathedral of Cremona, and on the west doorway of St. Mark’s at Venice. They are less common in England, but St. Margaret’s in York and the church of Iffley in Oxfordshire offer good specimens. In the zodiac of Merton College in Oxford, Libra is represented by a judge in his robes and Pisces by the dolphin of Fitzjames, warden of the college (1482–1507). The great rose windows of the early Gothic period were frequently painted with zodiacal emblems. Some frescoes in the cathedral of Cologne, Germany, contain the signs, each with an attendant angel, just as they were depicted on the vault of the church at Mount Athos in Greece.

Forms and Uses of the Zodiac

Although the symbols for the zodiac (both the animal and the human figures and another set of more abstract signs developed in the medieval period) were frequently used in casting horoscopes and other astrological activities, the fact that they were well known made them useful in a number of ways. Furthermore, the forms in which they were used in art fall into a number of familiar groupings. Some of these are discussed below. In some cases, the symbols are found without a clear purpose, as in an early potsherd, or ostrakon, found in Egypt that lists the zodiacal signs and the planets and has been dated to circa 250 B.C. Later Egyptian examples of zodiacal signs include several painted sarcophagi that show the goddess of the sky Nut stretched across the starry sky, surrounded by the symbols of the zodiac. Although the Egyptians contributed to the development of the zodiac, their interests were in the calendar rather than astronomy.

Forms of the Zodiac: The Globe

One of the most direct ways to represent the zodiac was to depict the celestial globe with the zodiac band around it, the symbols on the band echoing the placement of the constellations. A Roman example, probably from the second century, can be seen in the Hall of the Busts in the Vatican. A round ball, covered by stars, it has a narrow band around its circumference that bears the symbols of the zodiac. Often this globe is worked into a larger composition, as in a fresco painting from the Villa Diomede in Pompeii, Italy. Urania, the muse of astronomy, stands in front of the globe holding a pointer as if she were giving an art history lecture about it. In the Roman bas-relief Apotheosis of Antoninus and Faustina on the base of the Antoninus Column in the Cortile della Pigna in the Vatican, the central winged figure of Genius or Aion, a personification of Time, carries a zodiacal globe in his hand. In a variation on this theme, the figure of the first century B.C. Atlas Farnese in Naples holds up on his back a large globe covered with the symbols of the zodiac. In this case, they are not in a band but distributed all over the globe.

Another form of a zodiacal globe shows it with two bands crossing it, one representing the zodiac and the other the equator. For example, in a Pompeian wall painting from the Villa dell'Argenteria, a representation of Helios holds a crossed globe in his outstretched hand. A sixth-century ivory plaque in the Staatliche Museen in Berlin shows the Virgin and Child with two angels, one of them holding a globe with crossed bands.

Forms of the Zodiac: Planisphere

The constellations were also depicted as a flat sphere or plane passing through a polar circle. The Ptolemaic ceiling planisphere in the Hathor Temple at Dendera (circa 30 B.C.) shows an elaborate circular disk with signs of the zodiac indicating the position of the heavenly bodies.

A painted planisphere can be seen in the ceiling of the caldarium of a palace bath house in Quasayr 'Amra, Jordan (circa A.D. 700). The planisphere can also be found in medieval manuscripts, as in one of the ninth century in the Staatsbibliothek in Munich, Germany, and in Renaissance prints, as in a woodcut by Albrecht Dürer (1515). In the latter print, the four corners of the sphere are taken up with figures of astrologers, Aratus, Ptolemy, and Manilius among them. In each case, this map of the heavens uses the zodiacal figures to indicate the location of the constellations.

Forms of the Zodiac: The Circle

Many zodiacs are found in the form of a circle of the 12 signs surrounding a central scene or figure. The circle, the most common representation of the zodiac, can be seen in such examples as the mosaics in the Synagogue at Beth Alpha, Israel (sixth century A.D.). Helios, the sun god, is in the center of the circle in his quadriga, with stars and the moon in the background, while surrounding him and making a larger circle are 12 wedge shapes, each containing a figure or figures symbolic of one symbol of the zodiac. A similar composition is represented by a more realistic depiction in a Roman mosaic of the third century, now in the Landesmuseum in Bonn, Germany. At the center, Helios, in his chariot with four rearing horses, dominates the composition, with the encircling band of the 12 symbols of the zodiac clearly depicted, although of smaller scale. Similar compositions commonly appear as sculpture. For example, in a second-century relief in the Villa Albani in Rome, Atlas holds up a circle of the zodiac symbols in the center on which an enthroned Jupiter is seated.

Forms of the Zodiac: The Ring

The zodiac is also pictured as a figure, often as Aion, the personification of Time, holding a large band or ring on which the signs can be seen while he is standing inside it. Examples of the open band or ring variety include the mosaic from Sentinum, Italy, and the silver plaque depicting the Phrygian mother-goddess Cybele and her young consort Attis from Parabiago, Italy. The zodiacal symbols follow one another around the circle in their usual order. In the Renaissance, Giovanni di Paolo's The Expulsion from Paradise (circa 1445) in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York shows Earth as mountains and rivers surrounded by colored rings, with the outermost blue ring containing the 12 signs of the zodiac.

Uses and Forms of the Zodiac: The Arch

At times, the zodiacal symbols, instead of forming a full circle around a figure, were deployed in an arch above the central figure or surrounding it on three sides. This form seemed to be especially popular on Mithraic zodiacs, as in a third-century relief from the ancient Mesopotamian town of Dura-Europos, now in the Gallery of Fine Arts at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. Mithra is sacrificing a bull while surrounding figures watch. The composition is framed by columns with the zodiacal symbols arching above them. The arch bearing the zodiacal symbols surrounds the bust of Mithra in a horseshoe shape in a sculpture from Housesteads, England, near Hadrian's Wall of about the same time, now in the University of Durham in England. In a Gnostic relief of the same time in the British Museum in London, the bust of the goddess of the sky with a lunar crescent on her head is backed by seven star forms and surrounded by an arch bearing the zodiacal symbols, which continue across the base.

Forms of the Zodiac: The Band or Frieze

The symbols of the zodiac were often fitted into a long rectangular space, as on the surface of a baldric or sash usually worn by a god or goddess or on the archivolt of a building. For example, the fragment of the torso of the so-called Apollo with the Goose (Helios) in the Vatican wears a sash over his left shoulder that falls down to his waist on the right side. It is ornamented with the symbols of the zodiac. A Hellenistic frieze embedded in the archivolt of the Hagios Eleutherios in Athens, Greece, is another example of the zodiac arranged in a lateral band, in this case mingled with personifications of the months, or labors.

Uses of the Zodiac: The Horoscope

The horoscope, which shows the configuration of the stars, planets, and constellations of the zodiac on a particular date, is usually cast with the intent of foretelling events in the future. The horoscope appeared in classical times, when it was first used to determine the influence of the stars on an individual at his or her birth or some other occasion. In Greece and Rome, astrologers often forecast the most propitious moment for the coronation of a ruler. The earliest such horoscope found is that plotted for the Hellenistic ruler Antiochus I of Commagene, a district of ancient Syria, in 62 B.C. Placed on his tomb high on the Taurus Mountains in Turkey, it shows the conjunction of the planets Mars, Mercury, and Jupiter among the stars in Leo, represented as a massive lion, on Antiochus's coronation date of July 7, 62 B.C.

With a similar motive in the Renaissance, Agostino Chigi, a banker in Siena, Italy, in building the Villa Farnesina in Rome, reproduced the heavenly configurations in the sky the night of December 1, 1466, his birth date. These panels in the Sala di Galatea, the same room that housed Raphael's Triumph of Galatea, thus represented his horoscope and reminded him and his guests of his promise of greatness.

The modern horoscope that spawned the current popularity in newspapers and magazines was apparently the horoscope in London's Sunday Express in 1930 on the occasion of the birth of Princess Margaret (Barton, p. 1). Whereas the horoscope of ancient times was usually meant to predict the date of death or to show the prospects for a ruler's success or failure, the modern horoscope, although using the same zodiacal symbols, is more like a counseling service that deals with personal relations, dating, and financial transactions.

Although the scientific community and most "men of good sense" have turned their backs on astrologers, there are still reports that prominent figures, including Ronald Reagan and

Georges Papandreou, have consulted them, even arranging events according to their predictions.

Uses of the Zodiac: Seasons, Months, and Labors of the Months

The zodiac's 12 symbols linking heavenly and earthly life are nowhere more vivid than in medieval and Renaissance visualizations of the yearly cycle of agricultural life, as on the portals of cathedrals that displayed the labors of the months and manuscripts such as Aratea in Leiden, the Netherlands, and Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry in Chantilly, France. There are many variations on the agricultural cycle: Plowing must precede sowing, growth of flowers precedes the fruiting of plants, and harvesting proceeds in states. The sun may occupy the center, and the corners may show figures holding flowers or a sheaf of wheat; harvesting may be symbolized by a sickle. The weather is important, and the four winds may occupy the corners. The "zodiac of labors" was replaced in the French castles and hotels by a "zodiac of pleasures" in which hunting, hawking, fishing, and dancing were substituted for hoeing, planting, reaping, and plowing.

Let us now turn to the most celebrated of all illuminated manuscripts. Umberto Eco, now famous for his studies of medieval aesthetics as well as for The Name of the Rose, first fell in love with the medieval imagination when he was about 20 years old. What he encountered was the 12 months from Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry. If we take the month of October from this work as an example, we see not only the detail with which the scenes of planting and sowing are depicted—with a flock of blackbirds, unafraid of the scarecrow archer in the background, stealing the seed—but also the semi-circular arch above the calendar miniatures. This month and those that complete the cycle of the year reveal that the medieval zodiac consisted of precise astrological references belonging to both an elaborate system devised by experts and customary discourse. Each of the 12 arches is of 30 degrees, and each shows the transition from one zodiacal sign to another. October is between Libra and Scorpio, golden stars shine from a deep blue sky, and in the center the sun is in his chariot. For each day, we can read the length of the day from sunrise to sunset and for each night the phase of the moon. On the facing page, a calendar shows the feasts and fasts and the saint commemorated (Cazelles and Rathofer, pp. 7, 12–13).

Uses of the Zodiac: Zodiacal Man

What is extraordinary in Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, the most beautiful of all calendars and prayer books, is the complete cycle of the zodiac in a mandorla, an oval cosmic frame in which stand two beautiful nudes, facing us: Woman and, immediately at her back, Man (or is it the converse?). The zodiacal symbols form an oval surrounding the figures, but they also are placed down along the front of the foremost figure, each symbol placed near the organ or part of the body it affects. The iconographic idea became famous in the Renaissance in the astronomical thought of Robert Fludd and Athanasius Kircher. This manuscript clearly depicts the relation of human to the cosmos, microcosmos to macrocosmos, the little world to the great world (Cazelles and Rathofer, pp. 12–13; Longnon and Cazelles, p. 11). Renaissance illustrations develop the idea of the Homo Zodiacus, corresponding the 12 signs to 12 body parts, as in the fifteenth-century manuscript Codex Urbin. lat 1398 in the Vatican. This manuscript shows a human body in a U-shaped position in the center of a ring of zodiacal signs with lines extending from each part of the body to the sign associated with it.

Uses of the Zodiac: Gods and Goddesses

The principal Greek gods and goddesses are frequently paired, male and female, in a group of 12. Sometimes these 12 are associated with the months, at other times with the zodiac. In the so-called “Altar” of Gabii (A.D. 117–138), a Roman marble relief disk, the heads of the 12 main Olympian divinities are arranged around the circle of the disk. These divinities include Venus, goddess of love; Mars, god of war; Diana, goddess of wild things; Apollo, god of youth; Vesta, goddess of the hearth; Mercury, god of merchants; Ceres, goddess of food plants; Neptune, god of the sea; Minerva, goddess of arts and crafts; Vulcan, god of fire; Juno, goddess of marriage; and Jupiter, king of the gods. On the bank around the sides of the disk, the 12 zodiacal signs are matched with an attribute of one of the Olympians. Slots for mounting a metal plaque in the center of the disk have led some to identify the disk as a sundial, but its original function is unknown. A similar association between Roman gods and goddesses and zodiacal signs can be found in a carpet mosaic from Hellin, Spain, now in the Archaeological Museum in Madrid, Spain, and in a marble candelabrum base, now in the Louvre in Paris.

Humanists at the court of the Este in fifteenth-century Ferrara, Italy, used the zodiacal signs in conjunction with the paintings of Triumph of the Gods of Antiquity. Here is a very different theology from that in the great Très Riches Heures, where we saw the sun in every month but did not think of Apollo; rather, we thought of the Creator and His command “Let there be light” or Christ as the “Light of the World.” On the other hand, Francesco del Cossa paints Minerva, Venus, Apollo, and others in March to September in what remains of Triumph of the Gods of Antiquity (five months have been lost) in the great hall of the Palazzo Schifanoia in Ferrara. The division is by months, over which gods and goddesses preside; however, not only are there signs of the zodiac (even the 10-day third parts of a 30-degree segment), but the decans are personified. Minerva might be morally acceptable as a symbol of chastity and wisdom. Her chariot is drawn by white unicorns, and the Wise Virgins, busy at their weaving, sewing, or embroidery, flank the goddess. There is also a group of teachers and students from the University of Ferrara. But the Triumph of Venus shows that goddess of love on a barge drawn by swans while on the banks amorous couples wander among flowery groves. A Girolamo Savonarola would have suspected that paganism displays an all-too-alluring yielding to temptation.

The symbols of the zodiac are also used with images of single gods (Aion, Jupiter, Helios, and Apollo have already been mentioned). There are also many examples of the zodiac associated with Diana of Ephesus, an ancient Ionian city of Asia Minor. A statue of her in the Ephesus Museum displays the zodiacal symbols encircling her throat just above her multiple breasts.

Uses of the Zodiac: Other Groups of 12

In Jewish iconography of the zodiac, the 12 signs could also stand for the Twelve Tribes of Israel. The hours and the months are associated with zodiacal symbols in a ninth-century manuscript in the Vatican (Cod. Vat. Gr. 1291, fol. 9 recto). The outer ring of a circular composition contains the symbols of the zodiac, and two inner rings contain figures representing the 12 months and 12 hours of the day. In the center, Helios, the sun god, drives his chariot through a blue circle of sky. In the Christian era, the number of apostles (12) made them candidates for association with zodiacal symbols. For example, in an ivory relief on a reliquary of the tenth century, each apostle is placed between columns. Above each apostle, in an arched frame, is a symbol of the zodiac.

Uses of the Zodiac: The Occult

The largest marble zodiac in a medieval church, in the nave of San Miniato al Monte in Florence, Italy, is in the form of a large circle with the 12 zodiacal figures: silhouettes embedded in an ornate arabesque background and radiating from a solar center. The whole church, according to Fred Gettings, art historian and student of astrology and the occult, is a web of symbols emanating from this zodiac and its accompanying inscription. With symbols (not only Christian symbols but others more esoteric and obscure as well), Gettings sees the church and its zodiac as an important key to medieval life and thought.

Other Variations

Giotto’s zodiac at Padua, Italy, was remarkable (in its undisturbed condition) in that the signs were arranged so that each was struck in turn, during its corresponding month, by the sun’s rays. Some iconographies mix the usual forms of the zodiac. For example, the west entrance to St. Mark’s Basilica in Venice displays a frieze around the doorway. The January figure carries wood, as Aquarius carries water. The February figure has cold feet, as the Fishes (Pisces) are cold. March is as Mars, ready for a fight, and Aries (the Ram) is ready, too. April suggests the Easter feast, for he carries a lamb on his neck and shoulders, but Taurus (the Bull) is not gentle, and Spring is a contest of opposites, Winter and Summer. May is being crowned by two maidens, corresponding to Gemini (the Twins) (Demus). There is, in repeating the zodiac, much subtle symbolic thought.

We of the twentieth century live in another period of revived interest in the zodiac. This is surprising because it comes after several centuries of attack on ways of thinking rejected by those who consider scientific methods alone worthy of praise. It is all the more remarkable because modern artists often reject traditional iconographic symbols. The wonder, then, is that a Roman reader of Manilius's poem, shown a horoscope column in one of our daily newspapers, would in some cases recognize every sign of the zodiac, presented visually to lure the eye to the advice proffered. This, too, would appear familiar.

See also Fortune; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Order/Chaos

Selected Works of Art

Ancient and Non-Western

Apollo with the Goose (Helius with a Baldrick), fragmentary torso, marble, original fifth century B.C., copy in Vatican, Museo Chiaramonti

Signs of the Zodiac, ceiling painting, 170–71 B.C., New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University, Art Gallery

Calendar Frieze, archivolte bas-relief, marble, circa second or first century B.C., Panhagia Gorgoepikoos, Athens, Greece, now embedded in the facade of the Hagios Eleutherios, Athens

Coronation Horoscope of Antiochus I of Commagene, bas-relief, 62 B.C., Nimrud Dag, Turkey, tomb complex, western terrace, cast in Vorderasiatisches Museum, Berlin

Planisphere, Egyptian sandstone ceiling relief, from the Hathor Temple, Dendera, circa 30 B.C., Paris, Louvre

Atlas Farnese Supporting the World Ring Carved with the Signs of the Zodiac, sculpture, Roman copy, first century B.C., Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale

Uranus and Minerva with Globe, Roman wall painting, circa A.D. 79, Pompeii, Italy, Villa di Diomede, Room K

Helius with a Crossed Globe, Roman wall painting, circa A.D. 79, Pompeii, Italy, Villa dell'Argenteria, VI, 7, 20, Naples, Italy, Museo Nazionale (Inv. 8819)

Nut, Goddess of the Heavens and Zodiac, painting on wood, Sarcophagus of Petemenophis, Egyptian, from Luxor, A.D. 116, Paris, Louvre

"Altar" of Gabii, Roman, marble relief cylinder, from Gabii, A.D. 117–138, Paris, Louvre

Globe with Zodiac Ring, Roman, marble sculpture, circa second century A.D., Vatican, Sala dei Busti (No. 341)

Birth of a God in Oval Zodiac Ring, marble relief, second century A.D., Modena, Italy, Galleria Estense

Zodiac Circle with Jupiter Upheld by Atlas, relief, second century A.D., Rome, Villa Albani

Zodiacal Globe in the Hand of Genius, detail of the Apotheosis of Antoninus Pius and Faustina, Roman, marble bas-relief, circa A.D. 160, Vatican, Courtile della Pigna, base of Antonius column

Gnostic Relief with Zodiacal Signs Around the Goddess of the Sky, marble bas-relief, from Argos, second–third century A.D., London, British Museum

Zodiac Around Helius, Roman mosaic, mid–third century A.D., Bonn, Germany, Landesmuseum

Ring Zodiac, Roman mosaic, from Sentinum (Sassoferrato), third century A.D., Munich, Germany, Glyptothek

Wahid, Abd al-, Zodiac, Persian ceramic plate, 1563–1564, Berlin, Staatliche Museen

Medieval

Helius in Chariot Surrounded by the Zodiac, mosaic floor, fifth or sixth century, Hefzibah, Israel, excavated synagogue

Virgin and Child with Two Angels, One with a Crossed Globe, Byzantine ivory plaque, sixth century, Berlin, Staatliche Museum

Zodiac Ring with Helius, Months, and Hours, illuminated manuscript, 813–820, Vatican (Cod. Vat. Gr. 1291, Fol. 9 recto)

Planisphere, illuminated manuscript, 818, Munich, Germany, Staatsbibliothek (Cod. Monac. lat. 219, Fol. 113v)

Zodiac Signs with the Apostles, ivory relief on reliquary, tenth century, Munich, Germany, Bayerische Nationalmuseum

Zodiac Signs, stained-glass windows, thirteenth century, Chartres, France, Cathedral

Zodiac Signs and Seasonal Tasks, bas-reliefs, mid–thirteenth century, Amiens, France, Cathedral

Zodiac, portal sculpture, twelfth century, Paris, Notre Dame

Zodiac, portal sculpture, twelfth century, Vézelay, France, Le Madeleine

Zodiac, porch sculpture, Cremona, Italy, Cathedral

Zodiac, portal sculpture, twelfth century, Venice, Italy, St. Mark's, west portal

Zodiac, marble, 1207, Florence, Italy, San Miniato al Monte

Renaissance

Limbouurg Brothers, Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, manuscript illumination, before 1415, Chantilly France, Musée Condé (Fol. 14 verso)

Circle with Zodiacal Man, manuscript illumination, fifteenth century, Vatican (Cod. Urb. lat. 1398, Fol. 10 verso)

Dürer, Albrecht, Four Apostles, oil painting, Munich, Germany, Alte Pinakothek

Giovanni di Paolo, The Expulsion from Paradise, tempera and gold on panel, circa 1445, New York, Metropolitan Museum of Art

Cossa, Francesco del, Triumphs of the Gods, fresco, 1469–1470, Ferrara, Italy, Palazzo Schifanoia, Great Hall

Horoscope of Agostino Chigi, ceiling painting, 1508–1511, Rome, Villa Farnesina

Dürer, Albrecht, Imagines coeli septentrionales cum duodecim imaginibus zodiac, woodcut, 1515

Zodiac, ceiling fresco, 1575, Caparola, Italy, Villa Farnese, Sala dei Mappamondo

Further Reading

- "Astronomy and Astrology," Encyclopedia of World Art, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1967
- Barasch, Mosche, "Jewish Iconography," Encyclopedia of Religion
- Barton, Tamsyn, Ancient Astrology, London and New York: Routledge, 1994
- Beck, R., "Interpreting the Ponza Zodiac," Journal of Mithraic Studies 1 (1976), 2 (1978)
- Becker, Ubo, "Astrology," and "Zodiac," in The Continuum Encyclopedia of Symbols, translated by Lance W. Warner, New York: Continuum, 1994
- Boas, George, "Macrocosm and Microcosm," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by P. P. Wiener, New York: Scribner's, 1973
- Bober, Harry, "The Zodiacal Miniature of the Très Riches Heures of the Duke du Berry, Its Sources and Meaning," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 11 (1948)
- Cazelles, Raymond, and Johannes Rathofer, Illuminations of Heaven and Earth: The Glories of the Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry, translated by Theodore Swift Faunce and I. Mark Paris, New York: Abrams, 1988
- Cirlot, Juan Eduardo, A Dictionary of Symbols, second edition, translated by Jack Sage, New York: Philosophical Library, 1971
- Clarke, Agnes Mary, "Zodiac," in Encyclopaedia Britannica, eleventh edition, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1911
- Cumont, Franz, Astrology and Religion Among the Greeks and Romans, New York: Putnam, 1912
- _____, The Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism, Chicago: Open Court, 1911
- Cutler, Anthony, "Stalking the Beast: Art History as Asymptotic Exercise," Word and Image 7:3 (July–September 1991)
- The Cycle of Twelve*, New York: New York Times, 1971
- Dobin, Rabbi Joel C., To Rule Both Day and Night: Astrology in the Bible, New York: Innertraditions International, 1977
- Firmicus, Maternus, Mathesis, Leipzig, The Netherlands, 1913; English translation by J. Rhys Bram, Ancient Astrology: Theory and Practice, New Jersey, 1975
- Garin, Eugenio, Astrology in the Renaissance: The Zodiac of Life, translated by Carolyn Jackson, Jane Allen, and Clare Robertson, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1983
- Gettings, Fred, The Secret Zodiac: Hidden Art in Medieval Astrology, London: Arkana, 1987
- Gleadon, Rupert, The Origin of the Zodiac, London: Johnathan Cape, 1968
- _____, Your Character in the Zodiac, London: Phoenix House, 1968
- Glueck, Nelson, Deities and Dolphins: The Story of the Nabataeans, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1965
- Gundel, Hans Georg, Zodiakos: Tierkreisbilder im Altertum, Mainz, Germany: Verlag Philipp von Zabern, 1992
- Gundel, Wilhelm, and Hans Georg Gundel, Astrologumena: Die astrologische Literatur in der Antike und ihre Geschichte, Wiesbaden, Germany: Franz Steiner, n.d.
- Hachlili, R., "The Zodiac in Ancient Jewish Art: Representation and Significance," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 228 (1977)
- Heninger, S. K., Jr., The Cosmographical Glass: Renaissance Diagrams of the Universe, San Marino, California: Huntington Library, 1987
- Holl, O., "Zodiakus," in Lexicon der Christlichen Ikonographie, edited by Engelbert Kirschbaum, Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder, 1968
- Jung, Carl Gustav, Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969
- Katzenstein, Renée, and Emilie Savage-Smith, The Leiden Aratea: Ancient Constellations in Medieval Manuscripts, Los Angeles: J. Paul Getty Museum, 1988
- Kitsch, Anabella, editor, History and Astrology, London: Unwin, 1989
- Lloyd-Jones, Hugh, Myths of the Zodiac: Sculptures by Marcelle Quinton, New York: St. Martin's, 1972
- Long, Charlotte R., The Twelve Gods of Greece and Rome, Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1987
- Lorgnon, Jean, and Raymond Cazelles, The "Très Riches Heures" of Jean, Duke of Berry, Musée Condé, Chantilly, translated by Victoria Benedict, New York: Braziller, 1969
- Mâle, Émile, Religious Art in France: The Late Middle Ages: A Study in Medieval Iconography and Its Sources, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
- Manilius, Astronomica, edited by G. P. Goold, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and London: Harvard University Press, 1940
- Mirandola, Giovanni Pico della, Disputationes Adversus Astrologiam Divinatricem, two volumes, edited by Eugenio Garin, Florence, Italy: Vallecchi, 1946
- Moore, Thomas, The Planets Within: Marsilio Ficino's Astrological Psychology, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1982
- Pogon, Edmond, Les Très Riches Heures du Duc du Berry, translated by David Macrae, New York: Crescent, 1987
- Réau, Louis, "Le Symbolisme Humain: Occupations des Mois," in Iconographie de l'Art Chrétien, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1955–1959
- Sesti, Giuseppe Maria, The Glorious Constellations: History and Mythology, translated by Karin H. Ford, New York: Abrams, 1991
- Spencer, Edmund, Faerie Queene, Variorum Edition, Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins Press, 1936
- Tester, S. J., A History of Western Astrology, Woodbridge, England: Boydell, 1987; New York: Ballantine, 1989
- Tuzet, Hélène, "Cosmic Images," in The Dictionary of the History of Ideas, edited by P. P. Wiener, New York: Scribner's, 1973

Webster, James Carson, The Labors of the Months in Antique and Medieval Art to the End of the Twelfth Century, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1938

West, John Anthony, and Jan Gerhard Toonder, The Case for Astrology, New York: Coward-McCann, 1970
“Zodiac,” Encyclopedia Judaica, New York: Macmillan, 1971

NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

Shane Adler is an independent scholar with recent articles published in Art Journal and Women's Studies. She is currently writing A Visual Perfume, the Progress and Revolution of the Seasons in Society, a study of French and English social history in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Essays: Months; Seasons; Whiteness

Diane Apostolos-Cappadona, Professorial Lecturer in Art, Religion and Gender Studies at Georgetown University, has published many books and articles on various aspects of religion and the arts, including the Encyclopedia of Women in Religious Art (1966), Dictionary of Christian Art (1994), and The Spirit and the Vision: The Influence of Christian Romanticism on 19th Century American Art (1995). She has also edited many works, including Women, Creativity, and the Arts (1995), Art, Creativity, and the Sacred (1984/1995), and the publications Theologians on Art: Documents and Sources in the History of Christian Art (1998) and Then They Knew They Were Naked: The Nude in Western Art (1998). Essays: Beheading/Decapitation; Toilet Scenes; Virgin/Virginity

Andrew Stephen Arbury is an Associate Professor of Art History at Radford University in Virginia. As a graduate student at Rutgers University, he was a founding editor of the Rutgers Art Review, a scholarly journal of art history. He has presented professional papers at numerous conferences and has published articles on Spanish catafalques and slide computerization. Essays: Abduction/Rape; Judgment; Laughter

Priscilla Baumann, Instructor in Medieval Art and Architecture in the Radcliffe Seminars, Radcliffe College, has published The Profane Arts of the Middle Ages (1996), articles on Romanesque sculpture in Church History (1990, 1991) and La Revue Mabillon (1994), and articles on the history of Auvergne in the Dictionnaire encyclopédique du Moyen Age chrétien. She is currently completing a book on Romanesque sculpted capitals of Auvergne. Essays: Avarice; Labyrinth/Maze; Margins/Outsiders

Rudolf M. Bisanz, Professor of Art History at Northern Illinois University, has written more than 100 professional publications, including German Romanticism and Philipp Otto Runge, a Study in Nineteenth-Century Art Theory and Iconography and The René von Schleinitz Collection of the Milwaukee Art Museum. Essays: Dawn/Dawning; Devotion/Piety

Christine M. Boeckl, Associate Professor at the University of Nebraska at Kearney, has published on the subject of the plague, including "A New Reading of Nicolas Poussin's The Miracle of the Ark in the Temple of Dagon" in Artibus et Historiae 24 (1991); "Vienna's Pestsäule: The Analysis of a Seicento Plague Monument" in Wiener Jahrbuch für Kunstgeschichte 49 (1996); "Plague Imagery as Metaphor for Heresy in Rubens's The Miracles of St. Francis Xavier" in The Sixteenth Century Journal 27:4 (1996); and "The Pisan Triumph of Death and the Papal Constitution Benedictus Deus" in Artibus et Historiae. Her book Plague Imagery in the Renaissance and Reformation: Iconography and Iconology is in preparation for the series 16th Century Studies. Essays: Path/Road/Crossroads; Penitence/Repentance; Plague/Pestilence; Protestantism; Self-Portraits I: Men; Sin/Sinning

Lee Braver, a student of Søren Kierkegaard's use of pseudonyms, is pursuing a Ph.D. in Philosophy at Emory University. Essays: Ascent/Descent; Fortune; Order/Chaos

Liana De Girolami Cheney, Professor of Art History and Art History Coordinator at the University of Massachusetts Lowell, is the author of Quattrocento Neoplatonism and Medici Humanism in Botticelli's Mythological Paintings, Botticelli's Neoplatonic Images, The Paintings of the Casa Vasari, Religious Architecture of Lowell, and Readings in Italian Mannerism, and is the coauthor or editor of Piero della Francesca's Treatise on Painting, The Symbols of Vanitas in the Arts, Literature and Music, Pre-Raphaelitism and Medievalism in the Arts, and Self Portraits of Women Painters. Her major articles include studies on mannerist female painters, Italian and Dutch emblems, Rodin, Whistler and the Italian symbolist Giovanni Segantini. She is currently preparing manuscripts on Giorgio Vasari and on Edward Coley Burne-Jones's mythological paintings. Essays: Abundance; Fame; Fortune; Honor/Honoring; Imagination/Creativity; Love and Death; Peace; Vanity/Vanitas; Vices/Deadly Sins; Virtue/The Virtues

Petra ten-Doesschate Chu has taught at Princeton University and at Seton Hall University, where she is currently Chair of the Department of Art and Music. Her specialization is in nineteenth-century French and seventeenth-century Dutch art. Among her book-length publications are French Realism and the Dutch Masters (1974), Courbet in Perspective (1977), Im Lichte Hollands (exhibition catalog, 1987, with contributions by other authors), The Letters of Gustave Courbet (1987), and The Popularization of Images: Visual Culture Under the July Monarchy (1994, coedited with Gabriel Weisberg). Essays: Nightmare; Sleep/Sleeping

Julie F. Codell, the Director of the School of Art at Arizona State University, has published numerous articles and book reviews on nineteenth-century British art and has edited the Journal of Pre-Raphaelite Studies (1991–1994). She is currently preparing a book-length study on artists' careers and the image of the artist in England in 1870–1914 as well as coediting (with Dianne Macleod) Colonialism Transposed, a collection on the influences of the colonies on Britain. Essays: Artists/Art

Erica Cruikshank-Dodd, Professor of Byzantine and Islamic Art at American University of Beirut and the University of Victoria, British Columbia (retired), has published Byzantine Silver Stamps (1962), Byzantine Silver (1973), and The Image of the Word (1982). She is currently publishing a volume on The Frescoes of Mar Musa al-Habashi, near Nebek, Syria, is working on a publication about the medieval frescoes in Lebanon, and is working on inscriptions of the Wazir Khan of Lahore, Pakistan. Essays: Light I: The Lamp in the Niche; Logos/Word; Offering

Don Denny, Professor in the Department of Art History and Archaeology at the University of Maryland, College Park, is the author of The Annunciation from the Right and various articles in such periodicals as Art Bulletin and Gazette des Beaux-Arts. Essays: Annunciation; Apocalypse; Baptism

Eugene Dwyer, Professor of Art History at Kenyon College, is a classical archaeologist who has written on Roman sculpture and architecture and on the classical tradition. His works include Pompeian Domestic Sculpture (1982), articles in European and American journals, and collections of essays. Essays: Destruction of City; Envy; Evil Eye; Excess; Gaze; Luxury; Voyeurism

Alicia Craig Faxon, Professor of Art History and Chair of the Department of Art and Music, Simmons College, Emerita, is the author of Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1989) and A Catalogue Raisonné of the Prints of Jean Louis Forain (1982). She is also the coeditor of and a contributor to Pre-Raphaelite Art in Its European Context (1994) and Pilgrims and Pioneers: New England Women in the Arts (1987). She has also published articles in such periodicals as Art Bulletin, Master Drawings, Journal of Pre-Raphaelite Studies, Visual Resources, and History of Photography. She is working with colleagues Liana Cheney and Kathleen Russo on a book, Self-Portraits of Women Painters. Essays: Bath/Bathing; Crucifixion; Damned Souls; Dance/Dancers/Dancing; Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale; Hair/Haircutting; Journey/Flight; Kiss/Kissing; Martyrdom; Metamorphosis; Reading; Sacrifice; Shipwreck; Temptation; Visiting/Visitation

Zirka Zaremba Filipczak is the Massachusetts Professor of Art History at Williams College. She is the author of Picturing Art in Antwerp, 1550–1700 (1987) and of articles on sixteenth- and seventeenth-century topics for journals and exhibitions. She guest curated Hot Dry Men, Cold Wet Women, the Theory of Humors and Depictions of Men and Women in Western European Art of the 1600s for the Williams College Museum and for the American Federation of Arts. Essay: Humors

Nancy Frazier is a writer and editor whose published books include Sexism in School and Society (1973), Special Museums of the Northeast (1985), Louis Sullivan and the Chicago School (1991), and Jewish Museums of North America (1992). She is enrolled in the University of Massachusetts American Studies Ph.D. program. Essays: Crucifixion; Judaism

Beth S. Gersh-Nešić is an art historian who wrote The Early Criticism of André Salmon: A Study of His Thoughts on Cubism (1991). She is currently translating Salmon's 1912 work La jeune peinture française and his 1919 La jeune sculpture française from French into English. Essays: Birth/Childbirth; Drunkenness/Intoxication; Pregnancy

Sarah S. Gibson, retired Librarian of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Massachusetts, has published widely on iconography, scientific institutions, and library science. Her most recent publication, with Susan Roeper and Dustin Wees, is Book Illustration from Six Centuries in the Library of the Sterling & Francine Clark Art Institute Library (1990). Essays: Adultery; Bacchanalia/Orgy; Expulsion; Hunting/Hunter/Huntress; Journey/Flight; Serpent's Bite; Shepherds/Shepherdesses

Elise Goodman is Professor of Art History at the University of Cincinnati and General Editor of the series Studies in Eighteenth-Century Art and Culture. She is the author of Rubens: The Garden of Love as Conversatie à la mode (1992), and numerous articles. She has recently completed the book The Portraits of Mme de Pompadour: Celebrating the Femme Savante. Essay: Female Beauty and Adornment

Dimitri Hazzikostas, Professor of Art History at Pratt Institute, New York, is currently preparing a book on Images of Sleep in Greek Art. Essays: Arms Raised; Grieving/Lamentation

Kathryn Moore Heleniak, Associate Professor of Art History at Fordham University, is the author of William Mulready (1980) and articles in Art Bulletin and Acts of the XXVII International Congress of the History of Art (1992) and in other periodicals. She is preparing a book on the nude in nineteenth-century British art. Essay: Naked/Nude

Claudia Hill has been an editor for the Getty Art History Information Program's Art and Architecture Thesaurus in Williamstown, Massachusetts, and is currently an architecture cataloger for Avery and Butler Libraries at Columbia University. Essay: Sanctuary

Fredrika Jacobs is an Associate Professor of Art History, with an affiliation with the Department of Women's Studies, at the Virginia Commonwealth University. She has published articles on Italian Renaissance art, critical theory, and women artists in Art Bulletin, Artibus et Historiae, Studies in Iconography, Word & Image, Renaissance Quarterly, and other periodicals. She wrote the book Defining the Renaissance Virtuosa (1997). Essay: Self-Portraits II: Women

Paul Grimley Kuntz, a philosopher interested in iconography, has taught at Smith College, Grinnell College, and Emory University. Among his books are studies of George Santayana, Alfred North Whitehead, and Bertrand Russell. With Marion Leathens Kuntz he has written Jacob's Ladder and the Tree of Life: Concepts of Hierarchy and the Great Chain of Being (1987) and is preparing another volume on the concept of order. He has also published many articles on metaphysics, aesthetics, and the philosophy of religion. His next book is on the Ten Commandments, with attention to the iconography of Moses, Mount Sinai, and the Tablets of the Law. Essays: Ascent/Descent; Expulsion; Fortune; Order/Chaos; Zodiac

Stephen Lamia is Assistant Professor and Chairman of the Department of Visual Arts at Dowling College. As Director of the Sarah Lawrence College Art Gallery, he curated the exhibition "Egypt: The Source and the Legacy." He is currently developing a multimedia installation at Dowling College's Giordano Art Gallery. He is also on the Editorial Board of Mediterranean Studies, an annual volume of essays published in conjunction with Dowling's interdisciplinary Mediterranean Conference. Essays: Funeral/Burial; Labor/Trades/Occupations; Night

Fritz Laupichler since 1981 has been a collaborator in the Bildarchiv Foto Marburg—Deutsches Dokumentationszentrum für Kunstgeschichte (German Documentation Center for Art History) in Marburg, Germany, and staff member of DISKUS, the database of art and architecture in Germany. He is the coauthor of ICONCLASS Indexes—Italian Prints (1987–) and the author of ICONCLASS Indexes—German Prints (1995–) and of essays on the history of Bildarchiv Foto Marburg. Essays: Madness; Misfortune; Pointing/Indicating

Claire Lindgren, Professor of Art History and Humanities at Hofstra University, is the author of Classical Art Forms and Celtic Mutations (1980) and has been associated with the publication of The Age of Spirituality (1979) and The Society of Independent Artists: The Exhibition Record (1984). She has also written reviews and delivered papers and is working on a book on the art of personal adornment. Essays: Apotheosis/Deification; Calumny; Patronage

Corinne Mandel, an Associate Professor of Art History at the University of Western Ontario, is the author of Sixtus V and the Lateran Palace (1994) and of numerous articles on Italian Renaissance art. She is completing a book on the Vatican Library facade program and carrying out research on the scrittoio of Francesco I in Florence. Essay: Melancholy

Janice McCullogh is an Associate Professor of Art History at Baylor University. She is the author of articles on German expressionism, August Macke, and contemporary topics in Art Bulletin, Arts Magazine, Ceramics Monthly, German-American Cultural Review, and other periodicals and books. Essays: Hanging; Upside Down

David D. Nolta has taught art history and literature at Yale University and at the Massachusetts College of Art, where he is currently Assistant Professor of Critical Studies. His published work includes articles on Christina Rossetti, seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Italian painting, and eighteenth- and nineteenth-century British art. Essay: Sublime

Edward J. Nygren is Director of the Art Collections at the Huntington Library, Art Collections and Botanical Gardens in San Marino, California. He has written on British and American art of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Essay: Money

Valerie (Hutchinson) Pennanen, an independent scholar, has published on the cult of Bacchus, including Bacchus in Roman Britain: The Evidence for His Cult (1986). She has also published the Instructor's Manual to accompany the third edition of Frederick Hartt's Art: A History of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture (1989). In addition to her work in Greek and Roman Art, she is also interested in sacred and spiritual themes in world art. Essays: Communion; Ecstasy

Karen Pinkus, Assistant Professor of French and Italian and of Comparative Literature at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, is the author of Daily Regimes: Italian Advertising Under Fascism (1995) and Picturing Silence: Emblem, Language, Counter-Reformation Materiality (1996). She has also written on various topics in cultural studies, psychoanalysis, race, and gender studies. Essays: Automata; Sport; Widowhood

Yona Pinson has taught Northern European Painting at Tel Aviv University since 1975. An expert on late medieval and Northern Renaissance painting and on iconography, she has published in Artibus et Historiae, Gazette des Beaux-Arts, Source, Corpus of Illuminated Manuscripts, Assaf, and other periodicals. Her current research includes iconographic issues in Hieronymus Bosch's and Pieter Bruegel the Elder's works, iconographic aspects of marginalia of late medieval illuminated manuscripts, and human folly in Northern Renaissance art. Essays: Music; Witchcraft/Sorcery

Elizabeth Powers, a Ph.D. in German literature from the City University of New York, is the author of two novels and the coeditor of Pilgrim Souls: An Anthology of Spiritual Autobiography. She contributes regularly on literary subjects to Commentary and other publications. Essay: Choice/Choosing

Helene E. Roberts is the Editor of Visual Resources: An International Journal of Documentation and of the book series Documenting the Image. She has compiled two iconographic indexes of Old and New Testament subjects in works of art and has published articles on visual imagery and on nineteenth-century British art and art criticism. Essays: Abandonment; Light II: Divine, Natural, and Neon

Elaine Shefer, Chair of the Art History Department at Haifa University, is an expert in Pre-Raphaelite Art. She has published the book Birds, Cages and Women in Victorian and Pre-Raphaelite Art (1990) and many articles in Journal of Pre-Raphaelite Studies, Art Bulletin, Women's Art Journal, Journal of the History of Sexuality, and others. She is working on the Pre-Raphaelites and the fairy tale, Édouard Manet, Jan Vermeer, and American artists at Kibbutz ein Herod in Israel. Essays: Death; Dreams/Visions; Masks/Personae; Mirror/Reflection

M. Ann Simmons is a practicing psychotherapist in New York City, specializing in women's issues and eating disorders. She has contributed to various seminars and projects and was the Editor of New York Pulse, an electronic publishing project of the New York Times. Her dissertation for a Ph.D. in comparative literature at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York is entitled "Fictions of Femininity: Hysteria in the Fin-de-Siècle." Her current project is investigating the narratives of multiple personality and their relationship to postmodernism. Essay: Hermaphrodite/Androgyny

Gina Strumwasser, Professor of Art History at California State University at Fresno, is a specialist in Renaissance and Baroque art. She has presented papers and published articles on Jan van Eyck, Leonardo da Vinci, and heroic women from the Old Testament, as well as on problems of gender in art, humor, popular culture, and advertising. Essays: Betrayal; Justice

Margaret A. Sullivan, an independent scholar of the Northern Renaissance, has published Bruegel's Peasants: Art and Audience in the Northern Renaissance (1994). She also has published articles in Art Bulletin, Artibus et Historiae, and other periodicals. She is preparing a manuscript on satire for publication. Essays: Caricature/Cartoon; Fools/Folly; Peasantry; Physiognomy

Barry Wind, Professor of Art History at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, is the author of books on Diego Velázquez's bodegones, on seventeenth-century genre painting, and on the depiction of deformity in seventeenth-century art. His long and abiding interest in things risible, ranging from works by Caravaggio to William Hogarth, is manifest in articles in such periodicals as Art Bulletin, Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes, Storia dell'Arte, Paragone, and Arte Lombarda. Essay: Comic

BruCIA Witthoft, Professor of Art History, Emerita, Framingham State College, is author of Fine Arts Etchings of James David Smillie (1992) and the exhibition catalog American Artists in Düsseldorf 1840-1865, Danforth Museum of Art (1982). She has also published on the Tacuinum Sanitatis and other medieval and Renaissance topics in Gesta and Artibus et Historiae. Her most recent publication is "Riti Nuziali e loro Iconografia," a chapter in Storia dei Matrimonio, edited by M. De Giorgio and C. Klapisch-Zuber (the third volume in the series Storia delle Donne in Italia). Essays: Harvesting; Marriage/Betrothal

INDEX OF ANCIENT MYTHOLOGICAL AND HISTORICAL PERSONAGES, PLACES, AND CONCEPTS

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index or to other indexes where primary information can be found. See also citations refer the reader to other terms within the index or to other indexes where additional information can be found.

- ABU, Mesopotamian god, Gaze
ACHELOUS (AKELOOS), god of the river of the same name, Abundance
ACHILLES, Greek hero of the Trojan War, Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Dawn/Dawning, Destruction of City, Fame, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Madness, Upside Down
ACRISIUS, king of Argos and father of Danaë, Adultery, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice
ACROPOLIS of Athens, elevated, fortified walled area, Ascent/Descent, Patronage
ACTAEON, a hunter seeing Artemis bathing, was transformed into a stag and torn to pieces by his own dogs, Gaze, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Metamorphosis, Pregnancy, Voyeurism
ADMETUS, king of Phrae, married to Alcestis, he would be spared from death only if someone would be willing to die in his place, Love and Death, Shepherd/Shepherdesses
ADONIS, beautiful youth beloved by Aphrodite, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Metamorphosis
AEGISTHUS, the paramour of Clytemnestra, killed by her son Orestes, Adultery, Bath/Bathing
AENEAS, the founder of Rome, fought in the Trojan War, then was shipwrecked on the coast of Carthage where he met Dido, only to leave her when the gods recalled him to his destiny to found Rome, Abandonment, Betrayal, Damned Souls, Expulsion, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Light I, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Pointing/Indicating, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
AESCHYLUS (525–456 B.C.), the first and perhaps greatest of the tragic poets, he wrote about 90 plays of which only seven survive, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
AESON, father of Jason, Witchcraft/Sorcery
AFRICANAS, Sextus Julius (flourished A.D. 221), historian, Dreams/Visions
AGAMEMNON, king of Mycenae, husband of Clytemnestra, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Sacrifice
AGATHODAEMON see TYCHE/FORTUNA/FATE
AGAVE, the mother of King Pentheus, killed her own son during a Bacchanalian orgy, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Ecstasy
AGENOR, king of Tyre, father of Europa, Adultery
AGLAIA see GRACES
AGLAUROS, Herse's sister, jealous of her beauty, Envy
AHMES, Queen of Egypt, Birth/Childbirth
AION see PHANES

- AJAX, Greek hero of the Trojan War, known for his great strength, Arms Raised, Destruction of City, Madness, Metamorphosis
- AKELOOS see ACHELOUS
- AKHENATON (ruled 1379–1362 B.C.), Egyptian pharaoh, Eighteenth Dynasty, established a monotheistic religion worshipping the sun god, Aton, Light I, Light II
- AKKO, terrifying female character in ancient drama, Masks/Personae
- ALARIC (A.D. 370–410), Visigothic king who sacked Rome in A.D. 410, Destruction of City
- ALCESTIS, wife of Admetus, was willing to die for him, but was rescued from Thanatos, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Sacrifice
- ALCINOUS, king of Phaeacian and savior of shipwrecked sailors, Luxury
- ALEXANDER THE GREAT (356–323 B.C.), through his military victories spread his rule from Greece to India, and is responsible for introducing Hellenism over this area, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Fame, Gaze, Judgment, Light I, Luxury, Peace
- ALEXANDER OF MACEDONIA see ALEXANDER THE GREAT
- ALEXANDRIA, city on the western extreme of the Nile, founded by Alexander the Great, Patronage
- ALPHITO, terrifying female character in ancient drama, Masks/Personae
- ALTHEA, mother of Meleager, who caused his death, Abundance
- AMALTHEA, the goat that suckled the infant Zeus, Abundance, Fortune
- AMARYLLIS, a Virgilian shepherdess, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- AMASIS II (died 525 B.C.), king of Egypt, Fortune
- AMAZONS, a legendary tribe of warrior women, Abduction/Rape, Naked/Nude
- AMMON, Egyptian deity, originally god of Thebes, he is represented as a ram or a ram-headed man, Apotheosis/Deification
- AMOR see CUPID
- AMPHISSA, ancient Greek city on the site of the modern city Salona, Bacchanalia/Orgy
- AMULIUS, brother of Numitor, drove him from power and killed his heirs, Love and Death
- AMUN, Egyptian creation deity, Devotion/Piety, Light II
- AMYMONE, daughter of Danaë, seduced by Poseidon, Abduction/Rape, Sleep/Sleeping
- ANCHISES, father of Aeneas who carried him on his back escaping from the Trojan War, Comic, Damned Souls, Journey/Flight
- ANDROMACHE, Hector's wife, awarded to Neoptolemus after the Trojan War, Death, Destruction of City, Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight
- ANDROMEDA, chained to a rock by her father to appease a sea monster, she was rescued by Perseus, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Sacrifice
- ANNA PERENNA, an old crone in a bridal dress who fooled Mars, Laughter
- ANTENEOR, advised the return of Helen to Menelaus, became known as a traitor to Troy, Betrayal
- ANTICLEIA, Odysseus's mother, Journey/Flight
- ANTIGONE, daughter of Oedipus, defied Creon, Destruction of City
- ANTINOUS, companion to Emperor Hadrian, Apotheosis/Deification
- ANTIOCHUS I, King of Commagene, Zodiac
- ANTIOPE, Amazon Queen, abducted by Theseus, Abduction/Rape
- ANTIPHILLOS see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- ANTIPODES, peoples and places diametrically opposite, Upside Down
- ANTISSA, area of Lesbos, Beheading/Decapitation
- ANTIUM, ancient Roman city on the present day site of Anzio, Virtue/Virtues
- ANTONINUS PIUS (A.D. 86–161), Roman emperor whose reign enjoyed peace and prosperity, Apotheosis/Deification
- ANUBIS, Egyptian jackal-headed god who conducted the dead to judgment, Funeral/Burial, Judgment
- APELLES (flourished 4th century B.C.), the most celebrated painter in Greece, but now only known through reputation, as none of his works are extant, see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- APHRODITE (VENUS), goddess of erotic love and beauty, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Baptism, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions, Evil Eye, Excess, Expulsion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- APOLLO, one of the major Olympian deities; he personifies beauty, clarity, and music; he is often associated with reason in opposition to Dionysian ecstasy, Abduction/Rape, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Light I, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Music, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Zodiac
- APPIAN WAY, main road from Rome to Greece and the east, Virtue/Virtues
- APPIUS CLAUDIUS (471–451 B.C.), severe and corrupt Roman decemvir, Judgment
- APULEIUS see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales

- ARACHNE, earned Athena's rage by besting her in a weaving contest, and hanged herself when the goddess punished her, Hanging, Metamorphosis
- ARCADIA, mountainous interior region of the Peloponnesus, Pregnancy, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- ARCAS, son of Zeus and Callisto and king of Arcadia, Pregnancy
- ARCHELAUS of Priene (2nd century B.C.), Greek sculptor, see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- ARES (MARS), the god of war, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Excess, Humors, Justice, Laughter, Logos/Word, Love and Death, Months, Peace, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
- ARGOLIS, area of land in the Peloponnesus, more commonly called Argos, Madness
- ARGONAUTS, 50 Greek heroes who sailed with Jason in search of the Golden Fleece, Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight
- ARGOS see ARGOLIS
- ARGUS (ARGUS PANOPTES), man with many eyes, often used as a watchman, Sleep/Sleeping
- ARIADNE, daughter of King Minos of Crete, helped Theseus to kill the Minotaur; he then abandoned her on the island of Naxos; Dionysus rescued her and married her, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Journey/Flight, Labyrinth/Maze, Love and Death, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism
- ARISTANEUS (ARISTIAEUS), a beekeeper and son of Apollo, Serpent's Bite
- ARISTIPPUS (circa 325–circa 300 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Choice/Choosing
- ARISTOTLE see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- ARSINOE II, wife and sister of Ptolemy II, Apotheosis/Deification, Excess
- ARTEMIDORUS (flourished A.D. 140), Roman soothsayer, Dreams/Visions
- ARTEMIS (DIANA), chaste goddess of hunting and of childbirth, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Birth/Childbirth, Expulsion, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Offering, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- ASCANIUS (IULUS), son of Aeneas and Creusa; also the name of a river, Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight, Love and Death
- ASCLEPIUS, god of healing, Arms Raised, Birth/Childbirth, Plague/Pestilence, Serpent's Bite
- ASHURBANIPAL III (died 860? B.C.), king of ancient Assyria, 884–860? B.C., Dreams/Visions, Sport
- ASTARTE, Phoenician goddess of fertility, beauty, and love, Hair/Haircutting
- ASTRAEUS, the father of the Winds, Virtue/Virtues
- ASTREA see DIKE
- ASTYANAX, son of Hector and Andromache; the child was flung from the walls of Troy, Destruction of City, Journey/Flight
- ATALANTA, a famous maiden hunter and warrior, involved in many adventures, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Sport
- ATELLAN FARCE, Roman farce developed from plays of rustic life, Comic, Masks/Personae
- ATHAMAS, king of Orchomenus, driven mad by Hera, killed his own son, Learchus, Madness
- ATHENA (MINERVA), virgin warrior goddess of reason and wisdom, and patron of Athens, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Destruction of City, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Envy, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Judgment, Laughter, Madness, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- ATHENIANS, citizens of Athens, Judgment
- ATHENS, major Greek city-state of the ancient world, Patronage, Virtue/Virtues
- ATLAS, one of the Titans, so strong he supported the heavens, Zodiac
- ATON/ATUN/ATUM, Egyptian sun god, Devotion/Piety
- ATROPOS, one of the Moirai, represents the fate that cannot be avoided (i.e., death), Choice/Choosing
- ATTALUS I (died 107 B.C.), king of Pergamon, Patronage
- ATTIS, Phrygian youth associated with Cybele; he went mad when she killed his beloved, Bath/Bathing, Devotion/Piety, Madness, Zodiac
- ATUM, one of the names for the Egyptian sun god, Light II
- AUGUSTUS (63 B.C.–A.D. 14), first Roman emperor who patronized the arts and letters and established the Pax Romana, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Luxury, Virtue/Virtues
- AURA, personification of the breeze, Love and Death
- AURELIAN WAY, ancient road along the west coast of Italy, Virtue/Virtues
- AURORA see EOS
- AVERUS, a lake near Naples, regarded by the Romans as an entrance to the underworld, Damned Souls, Vices/Deadly Sins
- BABYLON, ancient city of Mesopotamia, Abduction/Rape, Destruction of City, Grieving/Lamentation, Luxury, Widowhood
- BACCHANALIA/ORGY, or ceremonies in the worship of the cult of Dionysus, characterized by drunkenness, wild frenzy, ecstasy, and the dismemberment of animals, Abandonment, Automata
- BACCHANTS see MAENADS
- BACCHUS see DIONYSUS
- BAUBO, caused people to laugh by lifting her clothes to expose her buttocks, Laughter
- BES, Egyptian god of recreation, depicted as a dwarf with a large head, Dreams/Visions, Fools/Folly, Laughter, Pointing/Indicating
- BOREAS, the god of the north wind, Abduction/Rape
- BRISEIS, the favorite slave of Achilles, Abduction/Rape, Grieving/Lamentation

- BRUTUS, LUCIUS JUNIUS (circa 509 B.C.), Roman consul who sentenced his two traitorous sons to death, Judgment
- BRUTUS, MARCUS JUNIUS (85–42 B.C.), principle assassin of Julius Caesar, Death, Martyrdom
- CADMUS, founder of Thebes, Birth/Childbirth, Comic
- CAECINA, German general, excited envy and disapproval through his dress, Envy
- CAESAR, JULIUS (102?–44 B.C.), the great Roman statesman and general, Widowhood
- CALCHAS, a high priest in some versions of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, Sacrifice
- CALCHUS, a seer with the Greeks who made important predictions about the Trojan War, Honor/Honoring
- CALIGULA (A.D. 12–41), a cruel and ruthless Roman emperor, Envy
- CALLIOPE, the Muse of Epic Poetry, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death
- CALLISTO, a nymph seduced by Zeus in the form of Artemis, Adultery, Expulsion, Pregnancy, Sleep/Sleeping
- CALYDONIAN BOAR, a savage beast sent by Artemis to ravage Calydon; killed in the famous Calydonian Boar Hunt, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Sport
- CALYPSO, detained Odysseus for seven years, Abandonment, Journey/Flight, Shipwreck, Temptation
- CAMBYSES (6th century B.C.), king of the Medes and Persians, Judgment
- CAMILLUS, MARCUS FURIUS (365–403 B.C.), a Roman general and censor, Betrayal, Judgment, Virtue/Virtues
- CAMPUS MARTIUS, Rome, site of funeral pyres and consecration ceremonies, Apotheosis/Deification
- CANDAULES, Lydian king, so proud of his wife's beauty, he reveals her to his bodyguard Gyges, Envy, Gaze, Voyeurism
- CANTHUS (CANATHOS), a spring in Nauplion, Virgin/Virginity
- CARTHAGE, ancient city on the northern coast of Africa, Destruction of City, Luxury, Temptation
- CARYATIDS, sculptured female figures supporting an entablature, Envy, Luxury
- CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was endowed with the gift of making prophecies, which, although always true, were never believed, Adultery, Destruction of City
- CASSIOPIA, queen of Ethiopia, mother of Andromeda, Sacrifice
- CASTOR see DIOSCURI
- CATO, the Elder (234–149 B.C.), Roman statesman and moralist, Luxury
- CEBES, student of Socrates, Ascent/Descent
- CECROPS, a king of Attica, father of Aglauros and Herse, Birth/Childbirth, Envy
- CENTAUR, creatures that are half horse, half human, Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Music, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- CEPHALUS, loved by Eos, he mistakenly killed his wife Procris, Abduction/Rape, Dawn/Dawning, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Love and Death, Sleep/Sleeping
- CERASUS, modern name, Kerasund, on the north coast of Turkey, Luxury
- CERBERUS, the three-headed dog of the underworld, Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight
- CERCOPE, Lydian ruffians and thieves captured by Hercules, Upside Down
- CERES see DEMETER
- CHALCHAS, a winged old man, Mirror/Reflection
- CHARON, old man who ferried dead souls across the river Styx to the underworld, Damned Souls, Light I, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning
- CHARUN, Etruscan demon of the underworld, Damned Souls
- CHARYBDIS see SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS
- CHEPHREN see KHAFA
- CHIMERA, a Lydian monster, part lion, goat, and serpent, Fame
- CHLORIS (FLORA), the only surviving daughter of Niobe, goddess of flowers, spring, and love, Birth/Childbirth, Seasons
- CHRONOS see CRONUS
- CHRYSEIS, daughter of Chryses, abducted by Agamemnon, Abduction/Rape, Plague/Pestilence
- CHRYSES, a priest of Apollo Smintheus, Arms Raised
- CICONIAN WOMEN, Maenads who killed Orpheus, Abandonment
- CIMON, old man in prison, saved by his daughter's own milk, Virtue/Virtues
- CINCINNATUS (5th century B.C.), legendary Roman patriot, Virtue/Virtues
- CINYRUS, the father of Adonis through an incestuous union with his daughter Myrrha, Birth/Childbirth
- CIRCE, a sorceress who turned men into beasts, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis, Temptation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CIRCUS MAXIMUS, Roman arena for chariot races and contests, Martyrdom
- CLAUDIUS, APPIUS see APPIUS CLAUDIUS
- CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt, Birth/Childbirth, Excess, Love and Death, Luxury, Serpent's Bite
- CLYTEMNESTRA, wife and betrayer of Agamemnon, Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Hair/Haircutting, Sacrifice
- CLYTIE, loved Apollo, and was transformed into a sunflower, Abandonment, Metamorphosis
- COLCHIS, land on the Black Sea, Journey/Flight
- COLOSSEUM, ancient Roman amphitheater, Destruction of City, Martyrdom
- COLOSSUS of Thebes, mythical speaking statue, Automata
- COMMODUS (A.D. 161–192), Roman emperor, licentious and brutal, who sought to be worshiped under the name of Hercules Romanus, Apotheosis/Deification
- COMUS, Roman god of mirth and revelry, Laughter
- CORINTH, ancient rival city of Athens, Destruction of City, Virtue/Virtues
- CORYBANTES, male dancers and attendants of Cybele, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Ecstasy
- CORYDON, a Virgilian shepherd, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- CRATO, Greek philosopher, baptized by Christ, Annunciation

- CREON, king of Corinth, father of Creüsa,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CREÜSA, wife of Aeneas, presumably died in the Trojan War, Journey/Flight
- CREÜSA (GLAUCE), bride of Jason, killed by the jealous Medea, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CROCUS, beloved of Smilax, Metamorphosis
- CROESUS, king of Lydia, Abundance, Money, Pointing/Indicating
- CRONUS (CHRONOS, KRONUS, SATURN), a Titan, father of Zeus, god of the harvest, and site of his temple at Olympia, Abundance, Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Melancholy, Sanctuary, Serpent's Bite, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- CRUMISSA, the island where Poseidon took Theophane to hide her, Abduction/Rape
- CUPID (EROS, AMOR), the Greek god of love associated with Aphrodite; he often engaged in amorous adventures, as with Psyche, sometimes being punished for his behavior, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal, Love and Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fame, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Luxury, Music, Penitence/Repentance, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CURETES, Cretan mountain nymphs and diviners, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- CYBELE (OPS), goddess of wild nature, mountains, and fertility; also called Great Mother or Magna Mater, Bath/Bathing, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Judaism, Madness, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- CYCLOPES, monsters with one eye in the middle of their foreheads, Excess, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- CYRUS, the Great (died 529 B.C.), king of Persia, conqueror of Lycia and founder of the Persian Empire, Abandonment, Abundance, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Excess
- CYTHERA, Greek island, center of the cult of Aphrodite, Journey/Flight
- DACIANS, ancient peoples of southeastern Europe, Devotion/Piety
- DAEDALUS, master craftsman who devised lifelike statues, the Labyrinth, and wings for flying, Automata, Labyrinth/Maze, Path/Road/Crossroads
- DAEMONES (GENII), a large number of supernatural beings acting as guardian spirits, not usually individually named or personified, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues
- DANAË, although sequestered in a tower by her father, she was seduced by Zeus in the form of a shower of gold, Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Money, Pointing/Indicating
- DAPHNE, a nymph who, to escape Apollo, was turned into a laurel tree, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Metamorphosis, Virtue/Virtues
- DAPHNIS, a blind shepherd, composer of sad songs, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- DARIUS (549–485? B.C.), king of ancient Persia, Dawn/Dawning
- DECIUS (A.D. 201–251), Roman emperor, Martyrdom
- DEIANEIRA, the wife of Hercules, Abduction/Rape
- DELPHIC ORACLE, the much revered seat of the Pythia and her prophecies, Pregnancy
- DEMETER/CERES, goddess of corn and agriculture, was particularly associated with the search for her daughter, Persephone, abducted by Hades to the underworld, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Birth/Childbirth, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Laughter, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Whiteness, Zodiac
- DEMOCRITUS (460–370 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Melancholy
- DIANA see ARTEMIS
- DIDO, queen of Carthage, was beloved by the shipwrecked Aeneas, who abandoned her when called to fulfill his destiny to found Rome, Abandonment, Arms Raised, Betrayal, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Temptation, Widowhood
- DIKE (ASTREA, DICE, IUSTITIA), personification or goddess of justice, one of the Horae, Dawn/Dawning, Justice, Virtue/Virtues
- DIOCLETIAN (A.D. 245–313), Roman emperor, Madness, Martyrdom
- DIOGENES (circa 412–323 B.C.), Greek Cynic philosopher, Light I
- DIONE, a Titan or Oceanid, the mother of Aphrodite, Birth/Childbirth
- DIONYSUS (BACCHUS), the god of wine and mystic ecstasy, usually represents the irrational in contrast to Apollo; he rescued Ariadne from the island of Naxos, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Apotheosis/Deification, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Excess, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Light I, Love and Death, Madness, Masks/Personae, Music, Naked/Nude, Offering, Peasantry, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism, Virtue/Virtues
- DIOSCURI (CASTOR and POLLUX), twin sons of Leda and brothers of Helen of Troy, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Birth/Childbirth, Journey/Flight, Zodiac
- DISPAS, vampire mentioned by Ovid, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DORIAN MODE, musical style that is firm, grave, and severe, Imagination/Creativity
- DRAGON OF COLCHIS, guardian of the Golden Fleece, Music
- DRYADS, tree nymphs, Naked/Nude
- DUMUZI, Sumerian god, abducted by demons to spend half the year in the underworld, Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight
- ECHO, a nymph, punished by Hera, was able to repeat only the words of others, Laughter
- EILEITHYIAE, Greek goddess of childbirth, Arms Raised, Birth/Childbirth
- EIRENE, personification of peace, one of the Horae, Dawn/Dawning, Virtue/Virtues
- ELECTRA, the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, sister of Orestes, Hair/Haircutting

- ELYSIAN FIELDS, land of humans immortalized by the gods, Virtue/Virtues
 EMPEDOCLES (495–435 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Melancholy
 ENDYMION, beloved by Artemis (or Selene), he chose everlasting sleep, Funeral/Burial, Love and Death, Night, Sleep/Sleeping
 ENKI, Sumerian water god, Damned Souls, Journey/Flight
 ENKIDU, Gilgamesh's companion, Journey/Flight
 EOS (AURORA), goddess of the dawn, Abduction/Rape, Dawn/Dawning, Love and Death, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
 EOSPHORUS (LUCIFER), the morning star, Love and Death
 EPHIALTES (GIANT) see OTUS and EPHIALTES
 EPHIALTES (INCUBUS), a demon causing nightmares, Nightmare
 EPICURIANS, Roman cult devoted to the pursuit of pleasure, Excess
 EPICURUS (341–270 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Virtue/Virtues
 EREBUS, darkness of the underworld, Vices/Deadly Sins
 ERECHTHEUS, a king of Athens, Abduction/Rape
 ERECTHEUM, porch of the Acropolis, consisting of caryatids, Envy
 ERESHKIGAL, Sumerian queen of the underworld, Damned Souls
 ERICHTHONIUS, born of Hephaestus's semen, fallen to the ground when he tried to rape Athena, Birth/Childbirth, Envy, Virgin/Virginity
 ERINYES (FURIES), avenging spirits, especially of blood acts against kin, Abduction/Rape, Hair/Haircutting, Madness
 ERIS, the goddess of discord, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing
 EROS see CUPID
 ETNA, volcano whose eruption destroyed Pompeii and Herculaneum, Abduction/Rape
 EUMENES II (died 160 or 159 B.C.), king of Pergamon, Patronage
 EUNOMIA, personification of order, one of the Horae, Dawn/Dawning, Virtue/Virtues
 EUPHROSYNE see GRACES
 EUROPA, seduced by Zeus in the form of a white bull, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Imagination/Creativity
 EURYDICE (EURIDICE), killed by a snakebite, and brought back from Hades by her husband Orpheus, who breaks the prohibition to look at her, Abandonment, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Music, Serpent's Bite
 EURYSTHEUS, king of Tiryns and Mycenae, exacted the labors of Hercules, Abduction/Rape
 EURYTUS, the Centaur who tried to abduct Hippodamia, and began the battle between the Lapiths and the Centaurs, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 FALERII, Etruscan town, Judgment
 FATES see MOIRAI
 FAUN see SATYR
 FAUSTINA (circa A.D. 104–141), Roman empress, wife of Antonius Pius, Apotheosis/Deification
 FAUSTULUS, the shepherd who found Romulus and Remus, Love and Death
 FELICITAS, Roman goddess of good fortune, Virtue/Virtues
 FLORA, Roman goddess of flowering plants and fertility, Dawn/Dawning, Metamorphosis, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 FORTUNA see TYCHE/FORTUNA/FATE
 FURIES see ERINYES
 GAIA (GE), personification of the Earth, Abundance, Birth/Childbirth, Offering, Seasons
 GALATEA, modern name for the statue created by Pygmalion, Metamorphosis GAMYMEDE, a beautiful youth abducted by Zeus, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Comic GAULS, ancient Celtic peoples of France and northern Italy, Destruction of City, Gaze, Patronage
 GE see GAIA
 GENII see DAEMONES
 GERMANICUS CAESAR (15 B.C.–A.D. 19), Roman general, presumably poisoned by rivals, Death, Grieving/Lamentation
 GIANTS, 24 monstrous offspring of Gaia and Uranus who waged war on Olympus and were eventually defeated with the help of Hercules, Dawn/Dawning, Fame
 GIGANTOMACHY, war of the giants with the gods of Olympus, Patronage
 GILGAMESH, hero of a Babylonian epic legend, Journey/Flight, Light I GIZA (GIZEH), site of Great Pyramids and the Sphinx, opposite the Nile from Cairo, Sanctuary
 GOLDEN FLEECE, the fleece of the magical ram, the goal of the Argonauts, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Music, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 GORGONS (STHENO, EURYALE, and MEDUSA), women with brazen hands, gold wings, and serpents as hair, who could turn men to stone by their gaze, Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Metamorphosis
 GRACES (AGLAIA, EUPHROSYNE, THALIA) handmaids of Venus, personifications of beauty, charm, and grace, Choice/Choosing, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues
 GREAT GODDESS OF THE WILD, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 GREAT MOTHER GODDESS, Abundance, Bath/Bathing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Pregnancy, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
 GRILLOS, antique satirical character, Comic GULA, Near Eastern goddess, Arms Raised
 GYGES, the bodyguard of King Candaules, who shows off his naked wife to Gyges, Envy, Luxury, Voyeurism
 HADES (PLUTO), the god of the underworld and the place that is the home of the dead, Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Love and Death, Madness, Music, Order/Chaos, Serpent's Bite, Sleep/Sleeping
 HADRIAN (A.D. 76–138), Roman emperor, Apotheosis/Deification, Luxury, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues

- HALICARNASSUS, ancient city of Caria in Asia Minor, Widowhood
- HAMMURABI (flourished 2100 B.C.), king of Babylonia, Arms Raised, Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Justice
- HARPIES, female monsters in the form of birds, Abduction/Rape, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- HATHOR, Egyptian goddess, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Toilet Scenes
- HECATE TRIVIA (HECATE TRIODITS, HECATE ENODIA), goddess protecting roads and fertility, Path/Road/Crossroads, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- HECTOR (HEKTOR), Trojan hero, son of Priam, husband of Andromache, killed in the Trojan War, Arms Raised, Death, Destruction of City, Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight
- HECUBA, wife of Priam and queen of Troy, Adultery, Betrayal, Grieving/Lamentation, Nightmare, Sanctuary, Sleep/Sleeping
- HELEN, the wife of Menelaus, renowned for her beauty; her abduction by Paris caused the Trojan War, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing
- HELIUS (HELIO, HELIOS), the sun god before Apollo, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Zodiac
- HEMERA, goddess of the day, Dawn/Dawning
- HEPHAESTUS (VULCAN), the lame god of fire and metalworking, Adultery, Artists/Art, Automata, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Excess, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Logos/Word, Misfortune, Pointing/Indicating, Virgin/Virginity, Zodiac
- HERA (JUNO), goddess and the jealous wife of Zeus, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Excess, Expulsion, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Love and Death, Luxury, Madness, Peace, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness, Zodiac
- HERACLES see HERCULES
- HERAEA, races in honor of Hera, Peace
- HERCULANEUM, ancient city buried by the eruption of Mount Vesuvius, Adultery, Destruction of City, Evil Eye, Journey/Flight
- HERCULES (HERAKLES, HERACLES), one of the major Greek heroes with a diverse and complicated list of adventures, Abduction/Rape, Apotheosis/Deification, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Melancholy, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues
- HERMAPHRODITE/ANDROGYNE, beautiful son of Hermes and Aphrodite, loved by the nymph Salmacis, who prayed their bodies might be united, thus producing one body with both male and female characteristics, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Sleep/Sleeping
- HERMES (MERCURY), a half-brother of Apollo, he plays many varied roles in Greek mythology; he is best known as the messenger of the gods; he is recognized by his winged hat and sandals and the caduceus he carries, Abandonment, Arms Raised, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Envy, Fame, Gaze, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Reading, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- HERO, a priestess of Aphrodite, beloved of Leander, Journey/Flight
- HERSE, beloved by Mercury, but hindered by her envious sister Aglauros, Envy
- HESPERIDES, nymphs who guarded the famous garden of golden apples, Choice/Choosing
- HESTIA (VESTA), goddess of the hearth, Birth/Childbirth, Virgin/Virginity, Zodiac
- HESYCHIA, personification of tranquility, Virtue/Virtues
- HILAERA, one of the daughters of Leucippus, abducted by the Dioscuri, Abduction/Rape
- HIPPODAMIA, abducted at her wedding to the King of the Lapiths, thus beginning the battle of the Lapiths and the Centaurs, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Marriage/Betrothal
- HIPPOLYTUS, cursed by his father Theseus when he was falsely accused of rape, and dragged to death by his horses, Hair/Haircutting
- HOMER, semi-legendary blind Greek poet, the author of the Iliad and the Odyssey, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- HORAE (DIKE, EIRENE EUNOMIA), or Seasons, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Dawn/Dawning, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues
- HORATIUS COCLES, Roman legendary hero, Virtue/Virtues
- HORMAKHU, Egyptian god, Dreams/Visions
- HORUS, Egyptian god, son of Isis and Osiris, personified by a hawk or falcon, Baptism, Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Judgment, Seasons, Whiteness, Zodiac
- HYACINTH, beautiful youth, first to be loved by another man, was accidentally killed by Apollo, Metamorphosis
- HYDRA OF LERNA, a monster with many heads, killed by Hercules, Beheading/Decapitation, Misfortune
- HYLAS, a beautiful youth, loved by Hercules and the water nymph Pagea, Abduction/Rape
- HYPNOS (SOMNUS), god of sleep, Love and Death, Pointing/Indicating, Sleep/Sleeping
- HYPOLIDIAN MODE, musical style that fills the soul with joy, Imagination/Creativity
- IAMBE, induced the goddess Demeter to smile during her grief over Persephone, Laughter
- ICELOS see PROBETOR
- IKHNATON see AKHENATON
- ILISSUS, a river near Athens, Abduction/Rape
- IMHOTEP, Egyptian god of healing; known to the Greeks as Imouthes, Dreams/Visions
- IMOUTHES see IMHOTEP

- INANNA, Sumerian queen of heaven and goddess of love,
Abduction/Rape, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis
INCUBUS see EPHIALTES
INO, driven mad by Hera, destroyed her own son, Melicertes, transformed into Leucothea, Madness
IO, fled Zeus in the form of a cow, but was eventually seduced by him, Adultery, Ecstasy, Sublime
IOLAUS, charioteer and faithful companion of his uncle,
Hercules, Beheading/Decapitation
ION, the son of Creusa and Apollo, he was abandoned to die in a grotto on the Acropolis by his mother who feared the wrath of her father; Ion was rescued by Hermes, at the request of Apollo, Abandonment
IONIC MODE, musical style representing dances, bacchanals, and feasts, Imagination/Creativity IPHIGENIA, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, was sacrificed by her father to gain advantage in the Trojan War, Adultery, Arms Raised, Martyrdom, Sacrifice
IRIS, the rainbow, a messenger of the gods, Sleep/Sleeping
ISHTAR, Babylonian and Assyrian goddess of fertility,
Abduction/Rape, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
Journey/Flight
ISIS, nature goddess of ancient Egypt, Seasons, Toilet Scenes,
Virtue/Virtues
ISSUS, ancient town of Asia Minor, scene of three historic battles, Dawn/Dawning
ITHACA, an island, the home of Odysseus, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Shipwreck
IUSTITIA see DIKE
IXION, punished for his excesses by Zeus, who chained him to a winged fiery wheel, Excess, Misfortune

JANUS, the god of doors, gates, and beginnings, represented as facing two ways, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fortune,
Virtue/Virtues
JASON, the leader of the Argonauts in the quest for the Golden Fleece, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Witchcraft/Sorcery
JOCASTA, the mother and wife of Oedipus, Hanging JULIAN the Apostate, Roman emperor A.D. 361–363,
Arms Raised
JULIUS CAESAR, Roman statesman and general, Birth/Childbirth, Serpent's Bite
JUNO see HERA
JUPITER see ZEUS

KA, Egyptian spirit or personality, residing in the burial statue after death, Gaze
KERASUND see CERASUS
KHAFRA (CHEPHREN) (flourished circa 2869 B.C.), king of the Fourth Dynasty in Egypt, Sanctuary KORE, a name for Persephone, indicating the seasonal changes, Birth/Childbirth, Seasons, Toilet Scenes,
Virgin/Virginity
KRATES, Eumenes' librarian at Pergamon, Patronage
KRONUS see CRONUS

LAE LAPS, an infallible hound who always caught his prey,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

LAGYNOPHORIA, rustic Alexandrian festival,
Drunkenness/Intoxication
LAOCOÖN, Trojan priest who offended Apollo, who sent serpents to kill him and his sons, Serpent's Bite LAODOMIA, wife of Protesilaus, she mourned at his death until she killed herself, Love and Death LAPITHS, people from Thessaly famous for their battle with the Centaurs, Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess
LATONA see LETO
LEANDER, drowned swimming the Hellespont to meet his love Hero, Journey/Flight LEARCHUS, killed by his father, Athamas, in a fit of madness, Madness
LEDA, seduced by Zeus in the form of a swan, Adultery,
Birth/Childbirth, Light I, Pregnancy, Zodiac LEONIDAS (died 480 B.C.), king of Sparta, defended the pass at Thermopylea, Virtue/Virtues
LESBOS, island off the west coast of Asia Minor,
Beheading/Decapitation
LETHE, underworld river of forgetfulness,
Beheading/Decapitation
LETO (LATONA), mother of Apollo and Artemis,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
LEUCIPPUS, his daughters, Phoebe and Hilaera, were abducted by the Dioscuri, Abduction/Rape LEUCOTHEA, sea goddess, transformed from Ino, gave her magic veil to Odysseus, Journey/Flight
LICINIUS (died A.D. 325), Roman emperor, Martyrdom
LOCRI, Greek colony in southern Italy, Judgment LOTOS-EATERS (LOTOPHAGI), a vegetarian people who eat the addictive lotus, Journey/Flight, Temptation
LUCIFER see EOSPHORUS
LUCIUS VERUS, co-ruler with Marcus Aurelius, A.D.
161–169, Virtue/Virtues
LUCRETIA, wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, raped by Sextus, stabbed herself in disgrace, Abduction/Rape, Adultery,
Betrayal, Judgment, Serpent's Bite
LUCRETIUS see Index of Authors, Literary Texts,
Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
LUCULLUS (circa 110–56 B.C.), Roman general, who defeated Mithridates, Fortune, Luxury, Virtue/Virtues
LUNA see SELENE
LYCAON, king of Arcadia, father of Callisto, Pregnancy
LYCIDIAS, a Virgilian shepherd, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
LYCURGUS (7th century B.C.), king of Sparta and reformer of their constitution, Laughter, Madness
LYDIA, an area in western Asia Minor, Pointing/Indicating LYDIAN MODE, musical style used for mournful subjects,
Imagination/Creativity
LYSIMACHOS of Magnesia (circa 355–281 B.C.), Apotheosis/Deification

MACCUS, clownish yokel in Atellan farce, Comic MAENADS, female votaries of the cult of Dionysus,
Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Ecstasy, Naked/Nude
MAISON, comic cook, symbol of gluttony in ancient drama, Masks/Personae

- MANLIUS TORQUATUS, Roman general and consul, 4th century B.C., Judgment
- MARC ANTONY (circa 83–30 B.C.), Roman politician, soldier, and lover of Cleopatra, Excess, Serpent's Bite
- MARIKAS, clown character in ancient drama, Masks/Personae
- MARS see ARES
- MARSYAS, a satyr skilled at flute playing who entered a contest with Apollo, lost, and was flayed alive, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Music
- MASSINISEA (circa 238–149 B.C.), king of Numidia, Dreams/Visions
- MAUSOLOS (circa 376–353 B.C.), satrap of Caria, whose wife Artemisia erected the famous Mausoleum of Hallicarnassus as his tomb, Luxury, Widowhood
- MAXENTIUS (died A.D. 312), Roman emperor, Dreams/Visions, Martyrdom, Sleep/Sleeping
- MEDEA, a sorceress, wife of Jason, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MEDES, inhabitants of the ancient country of Media in western Asia, Reading
- MEDIA, ancient country in western Asia, Journey/Flight
- MEDICASTE, one of the Trojan Women, Destruction of City
- MEDUSA, one of the three snake-headed gorgons, decapitated by Perseus, Beheading/Decapitation, Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Metamorphosis, Virtue/Virtues
- MEGARA, daughter of Creon and wife of Hercules, Madness
- MEIDAS PAINTER see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- MELAMPUS, one of the great Greek seers, Madness
- MELEAGER, one of the major Greek heroes who took part in the Argonauts' voyage and the Calydonian Boar Hunt, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Love and Death
- MELICERTES, killed by his mother, Ino, in a fit of madness, Madness
- MELIŠIPAK, Neo-Assyrian king, Devotion/Piety
- MELISSEUS, king of Crete, reputed to have nurtured the infant Zeus, Abundance
- MELITUS, ancient Greek seaport colony in Asia Minor, sacked by the Persians in 494 B.C., Destruction of City
- MENEDEMUS, character in New Comedy, Masks/Personae
- MENELAUS, king of Sparta and husband of Helen of Troy, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Justice
- MENTUHOTEP II, Egyptian pharaoh, Devotion/Piety
- MERCURY see HERMES
- MERIT, wife of Sennofer, Baptism
- METIS, swallowed by Zeus, she still gave birth to Athena, Birth/Childbirth
- MIDAS, mythical king of Phrygia who, winning a favor from Apollo, asked for everything he touched to be turned to gold, Automata, Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Calumny, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Judgment, Luxury, Money, Penitence/Repentance
- MINERVA see ATHENA
- MINOS, king of Crete who ordered the building of the Labyrinth to contain the Minotaur, Adultery, Judgment, Labyrinth/Maze
- MINOTAUR, a monster with the body of a man and the head of a bull, he was imprisoned in the legendary Labyrinth of Crete; he exacted a yearly tribute of Athenian youth until he was killed by Theseus, aided by Ariadne, Abandonment, Arms Raised, Automata, Artists/Art, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Journey/Flight, Labyrinth/Maze
- MITHRA(S), god of Persia and India, whose worship, as Mithraism, spread over the ancient world, Evil Eye, Gaze, Judgment, Sacrifice, Zodiac
- MITHRIDATES (circa 131–63 B.C.), king of Persia, Luxury
- MNEMOSYNE (MEMORY), a titaness and mother of the nine Muses, Imagination/Creativity
- MOIRAI (FATES, PARCAE), personifications of destiny (see also Atropos), Choice/Choosing, Love and Death, Night, Seasons, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MOMUS, god of satire, mockery, and ridicule, Laughter, Vices/Deadly Sins
- MORMO, terrifying female character in ancient drama, Masks/Personae
- MORPHEUS, son of Somnus, appears in human form during dreams, Sleep/Sleeping
- MORS see THANATOS (MORS)
- MOTHER EARTH see GAIA (GE)
- MOTHER GODDESS see GREAT MOTHER GODDESS
- MOUNT HELICON, haunt of the Muses, Imagination/Creativity, Music
- MOUNT OLYMPUS, home of the gods, Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Envy, Excess, Fame, Journey/Flight, Months, Virgin/Virginity
- MOUNT PARNASSUS, site of the Delphic Oracle and favorite place of Apollo and the Muses, Imagination/Creativity, Music
- MUMMIUS, LUCIUS (2nd century B.C.), Roman statesman and general, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues
- MUSES, the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne (Memory), they were the goddesses of epic poetry (Calliope), lyric poetry and flute playing (Euterpe), love poetry and lyre playing (Erato), sacred music and pantomime (Polyhymnia), tragedy (Melpomene), comedy (Thalia), history (Clio), dance (Terpsichore), and astronomy (Urania) (see also Individual Names), Apotheosis/Deification, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fame, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Masks/Personae, Music, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping
- MYNES, the husband of Briseis, killed by Achilles, Abduction/Rape
- MYRRHA, the mother of Adonis through her incestuous union with her father, Birth/Childbirth
- MYRSINE, murdered by the Athenian women for her beauty, Envy
- NAIADS, nymphs of lakes, brooks, and springs, Serpent's Bite
- NARCISSUS, handsome youth who fell in love with his own reflection in a pool, Comic, Gaze, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism, Whiteness
- NARMER, early ruler in predynastic Egypt, Reading
- NAUPLION (NAUPLIA), a seaport near the gulf of Argolis on the east coast of the Peloponnesus, Virgin/Virginity

NAUSICAA, daughter of King Alcinous, aided Odysseus, Journey/Flight
 NAXOS, island in the Aegean off Greece, Sleep/Sleeping
 NEBUCHADNEZZAR (died 562 B.C.), king of Babylon, Excess
 NEFERTITI (14th century B.C.), wife of Akhenaton, Egyptian pharaoh, Eighteenth Dynasty, Light II
 NEMESIS, goddess of retribution for evil deeds or undeserved good fortune, Evil Eye, Fortune, Night, Virtue/Virtues
 NEOPTOLEMUS see PYRRHUS
 NEPTUNE see POSEIDON
 NEREIDS, sea nymphs, Naked/Nude, Sacrifice
 NERO (A.D. 37–68), Roman emperor, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Luxury, Martyrdom, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 NESSUS, a centaur killed by Hercules, Abduction/Rape
 NIKE, Greek goddess who presided over contests and wars, Apotheosis/Deification, Honor/Honoring, Reading NILE, major river of Egypt, Grieving/Lamentation, Luxury, Sanctuary, Zodiac
 NIMROD, mighty hunter and descendant of Cush, mentioned in Genesis, I Chronicles, Ascent/Descent
 NINEVEH, ancient Assyrian city, Destruction of City, Excess, Luxury
 NIOBE, inordinately proud mother, offended the gods, who killed her children, Plague/Pestilence
 NU, Egyptian name for primitive darkness, Light II
 NUMA POMPILIUS, second king of Rome, Birth/Childbirth, Months, Virtue/Virtues
 NUMITOR, king of Alba Longa, father of Rhea Silvia, Love and Death
 NUT, Egyptian sun goddess of heaven, Arms Raised, Dawn/Dawning, Zodiac
 NYMPHS, young and beautiful spirits of nature, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Nightmare, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism, Whiteness
 NYMPHS of Nysa, nurtured the young Dionysus, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 OCEANIDS, the 3,000 daughters of Oceanus, Fortune
 OCEANUS, the god of the river Oceanus, Fortune, Love and Death, Pregnancy, Virtue/Virtues
 OCTAVIAN see AUGUSTUS
 ODYSSEUS (ULYSSES), the hero of Homer's Odyssey, Betrayal, Comic, Damned Souls, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Madness, Metamorphosis, Shipwreck, Temptation
 OEDIPUS, in response to a prophecy was abandoned on a mountaintop, unknowingly returned to his home to kill his father and marry his mother; he became king of Thebes, but his secret was discovered when the plague attacked his city, Abandonment, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hanging
 OENONE, a nymph, married to Paris, Adultery
 OLYMPIA, mother of Alexander the Great, Fame
 OLYMPIA, sanctuary, site of the Olympic Games, Sanctuary

OMPHALE, queen of Lydia, to whom Hercules was bound as a slave, Choice/Choosing, Comic ORESTES, son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, avenged his father's murder, Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Hair/Haircutting, Madness
 ORION, a giant hunter with many adventures, changed by Zeus into the constellation bearing his name, Excess
 ORITHYIA, a daughter of Erechtheus, abducted by Boreas, the north wind, Abduction/Rape
 ORPHEUS, legendary musician and worshiper of Dionysus, most famous for his trip to the underworld to rescue his wife Eurydice, Automata, Beheading/Decapitation, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Light I, Love and Death, Music, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 ORPHISM, Greek mystic cult founded by Orpheus, Zodiac
 OSIRIS, the first-born of ancient gods, becomes ruler of Egypt, then of the underworld, Baptism, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Seasons, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues
 OSTIA, ancient Roman city at the mouth of the Tiber, Evil Eye
 OTUS and EPHIALTES, twin giants who earned the anger of the gods by piling mountains on top of each other and other rambunctuous deeds, Ascent/Descent
 PALATINE, the central hill of ancient Rome, Luxury
 PALLAS, ancient goddess of wisdom, Justice, Peace, Virtue/Virtues
 PAN (FAUNUS), god of shepherds, half man, half goat, Artists/Art, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Judgment, Laughter, Love and Death, Music, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 PANATHENAEA, festival honoring Athena, Patronage
 PANATHENAIIC PROCESSION, Devotion/Piety
 PANDAREOS, a king of Miletus, Abduction/Rape
 PANDORA, the first woman, opened a jar in her care, releasing evils onto the world, Order/Chaos
 PANTHEON, an altar or temple dedicated to all the gods, Sanctuary
 PAPPUS, priapic character in Atellan farce, Comic PARCAE (FATES) see MOIRAI
 PARIS, a Trojan prince abandoned at birth; was asked to choose between Aphrodite, Athena, and Hera; choosing Aphrodite he won Helen of Troy, the most beautiful woman in the world, as his wife, thereby starting the Trojan War, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Excess, Judgment, Nightmare, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism
 PARTHENON, temple on the Acropolis, Athens, dedicated to Athena, Ascent/Descent
 PASIPHAE, wife of King Minos, developed a passion for a bull, with whom she mated to produce the Minotaur, Automata
 PATROCLUS, Achilles' squire, beloved by him, Beheading/Decapitation, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Pointing/Indicating, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport
 PAX ROMANA, the reign of peace established over much of Europe by Augustus in the 1st century A.D., Light I

- PEGASUS, winged horse, offspring of Poseidon and Medusa, Choice/Choosing, Fame, Metamorphosis, Path/Road/Crossroads
- PEIRITHOUS see PIRITHOUS
- PELEUS, besieged by misfortune, married Thetis and was the father of Achilles, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Marriage/Betrothal
- PELIAS, Jason's uncle, who sent Jason in search of the Golden Fleece, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- PENEIUS, a river god of Thessaly, Metamorphosis
- PENELOPE, faithful wife of Odysseus, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing
- PENTHESILEA, queen of the Amazons, fought on the side of the Trojans against the Greeks and was killed by Achilles, Gaze
- PENTHEUS, king of Thebes, denied the divinity of Dionysus, who lured him to spy on the Bacchantes, including his mother, who discovered him and tore him to pieces, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Ecstasy
- PERA, young mother who saved her father's life in prison by nursing him with her own milk, Virtue/Virtues
- PERGAMON (PERGAMUM), ancient Greek kingdom in Asia Minor, Patronage
- PERICLES (circa 495–429 B.C.), Athenian statesman, Patronage, Virtue/Virtues
- PERSEPHONE (PROSEPINE, PROSERPINA), daughter of Zeus and Demeter, spends winter in the underworld as the wife of Hades, Abduction/Rape, Dreams/Visions, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Music, Serpent's Bite, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- PERSEPNEI, Etruscan queen of the underworld, Damned Souls
- PERSEUS, the son of Zeus and Danaë, killed Medusa and rescued Andromeda, Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Sacrifice
- PERSIANS, ancient enemy of the Greeks against whom they waged war 500–449 B.C., Destruction of City, Luxury, Reading
- PHAETON, the son of Helios, destroyed by his wish to drive his father's chariot of the sun, Dawn/Dawning
- PHANES (AION), lord of Time in Orphism, Apotheosis/Deification, Zodiac
- PHANTASOS, son of Somnus, appears as inanimate objects during dreams, Sleep/Sleeping
- PHARAOH, title of ruler of Egypt, Destruction of City
- PHARAOH at Memphis, Apotheosis/Deification
- PHIDIAS (circa 500–circa 432 B.C.), Greek sculptor, considered the finest artist in the ancient world, see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- PHILIP, THE ARABIAN (MARCUS JULIUS PHILIPPUS) (A.D. 204?–249), Roman emperor, Offering
- PHOBETOR (ICELOS), son of Somnos, appears in beast forms during dreams, Sleep/Sleeping
- PHOCION, Greek hero executed as a traitor, Betrayal, Judgment
- PHOEBE, one of the daughters of Leucippus, abducted by the Dioscuri, Abduction/Rape
- PHOEBUS APOLLO see APOLLO
- PHOENICIANS, inhabitants of city-states along the eastern Mediterranean, Sacrifice
- PHRYGIAN MODE, musical style for vehemence, fury, and battles, Imagination/Creativity
- PHYLLIS, a Virgilian shepherdess, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- PINDAR (518–circa 438 B.C.), generally regarded as the greatest Greek lyric poet, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- PIRITHOUS (PEIROTHOÛS), king of the Lapiths, whose wedding was the cause of the famous battle between the Lapiths and the Centaurs, ended his days a prisoner of Hades in the underworld, Abduction/Rape, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess
- PITTACUS (circa 679–circa 650 B.C.), Greek statesman, poet, and military leader, Virtue/Virtues
- PLATO (427?–347? B.C.), Greek philosopher, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- PLUTO see HADES
- PLUTUS, the god of wealth, Fortune
- POENA, personification of Retaliation, Virtue/Virtues
- POLLUX see DIOSCURI
- POLYCRATES (died circa 522 B.C.), Tyrant of Samos, Crucifixion, Fortune
- POLYDEKES, king of the island Seriphus, Beheading/Decapitation
- POLYDEUCES see DIOSCURI
- POLYPHEMUS, a Cyclops who imprisoned Odysseus, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Journey/Flight
- POLYXENA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, sacrificed on Achilles tomb after the Trojan War, Destruction of City
- POMPEII, ancient Roman city destroyed by the eruption of Vesuvius, Adultery, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Destruction of City, Evil Eye, Logos/Word, Luxury, Misfortune, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Voyeurism
- PONTIFEX, highly placed representative of Roman religious structure, Devotion/Piety
- POSEIDON (NEPTUNE), god of earthquakes, water, and the sea, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Fame, Hair/Haircutting, Sacrifice, Shipwreck, Zodiac
- PRAENESTE, ancient Roman city on the present-day site of Palestrina, Virtue/Virtues
- PRAEDICAE, goddess, extractor of justice, Justice
- PRIAM, king of Troy during the Trojan War, Adultery, Arms Raised, Destruction of City, Judgment, Sanctuary
- PRIAPUS, originally a fertility god, he ruled over plants and animals as well as childbearing women; his main attribute was a very large penis, Abundance, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye
- PROCRIS, mistakenly killed by her husband, Cephalus, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Love and Death
- PROËTUS, king of Tiryn, Madness
- PROMETHEUS, a Titan who championed mankind against the gods, Artists/Art, Automata, Misfortune
- PROSEPINE (PROSERPINA) see PERSEPHONE
- PROTESILAUS, knowing it would cause his death, he led the first attack on Troy, thus leaving his mourning wife, Laodamia, to die, Love and Death

PSYCHE, a beautiful young maiden of whom Aphrodite was jealous, and Cupid beloved; she broke Cupid's command to look at him, and embarked on a brave and dangerous journey to effect a reconciliation with him, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal, Journey/Flight, Luxury, Penitence/Repentance, Sleep/Sleeping
 PTAH, an Egyptian sun god, Light II
 PTOLEMY I (died 283 B.C.), first king of Macedonian dynasty ruling Egypt, Calumny
 PTOLEMY II (circa 308–246 B.C.), king of Egypt, reformer and patron of the arts, Apotheosis/Deification, Excess
 PTOLEMY (CLAUDIUS PTOLEMAEUS) (flourished A.D. 127–141/151), Greco-Roman mathematician, astronomer, and geographer in Alexandria, Egypt, Zodiac
 PURRHUS (NEOPTOLOMUS), Achilles' son, Destruction of City
 PYGMALION, king of Cyprus, sculpted his ideal woman and fell in love with her, Artists/Art, Automata, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Self-Portraits II
 PYRAMUS, courted Thisbe through a wall, and killed himself, through a mistake, at their first meeting, Love and Death
 PYRRHIC DANCE, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 PYRRHUS (NEOPTOLEMUS), son of Achilles, Sanctuary
 PYTHAGORAS (circa 582–507 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads

 QUINTUS FABIVS MAXIMUS (died 623 B.C.), opponent of Hannibal, Virtue/Virtues

 RA/RE, the Egyptian sun god, Birth/Childbirth, Devotion/Piety, Funeral/Burial, Light II, Sanctuary, Zodiac
 RAMOSE, Egyptian vizier, Thebes, Baptism
 RAMSES, Egyptian pharaoh, Devotion/Piety
 REMUS see ROMULUS AND REMUS
 RHADAMANTHUS, a Cretan lawgiver who was made a judge of the dead in Hades, Damned Souls, Judgment
 RHEA, a Titan, wife of Cronus, and mother of the gods, Abundance, Dawn/Dawning
 RHEA SILVIA, a Vestal Virgin seduced by Ares; she gave birth to Romulus and Remus, Abundance, Love and Death
 RITHO, Egyptian goddess, Birth/Childbirth
 ROMA, tutelary goddess of the city of Rome, Apotheosis/Deification
 ROMAN EMPIRE, Sin/Sinning
 ROMANS, Destruction of City
 ROME, major city of the Roman Empire, Abundance, Comic, Destruction of City, Fame, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Luxury, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 ROMULUS AND REMUS, abandoned by their mother, they were brought up by a wolf and lived to become the founders of Rome, Abandonment, Abundance, Birth/Childbirth, Destruction of City, Love and Death

 SABINA, empress, wife of Hadrian, Apotheosis/Deification
 SABINE WOMEN, invited to a festival by Romulus and abducted by the young men of Rome, Abduction/Rape

SAGARITIS, beloved by Attis, Madness
 SALMACIS, nymph who loved Hermaphroditus, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 SALONINA, wife of Caecina, envied for her dress, Envy
 SAPPHO (early 6th century B.C.), the greatest of the early lyric poets, Imagination/Creativity
 SARDANAPALUS, Assyrian monarch at the fall of Ninevah, Destruction of City, Excess, Luxury, Virtue/Virtues
 SARGON (flourished circa 2800 B.C.), king of Accede in Mesopotamia, the dynasty he founded lasted two centuries and controlled much of the ancient Near East, Abandonment, Gaze
 SARPEDON, Zeus's son, whose body is removed from the battleground of Troy by Hypnos and Thanatos, Pointing/Indicating, Sleep/Sleeping
 SATURN see CRONUS
 SATURNALIA, Roman festival with obscene singing and dancing celebrated in December, Fools/Folly
 SATYR (FAUN), spirit of wildness and licentiousness, companions of Dionysus, Abduction/Rape, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Gaze, Music, Peasantry, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 SCIPIO AFRICANUS (234–183 B.C.), Roman general in the Punic Wars, Virtue/Virtues
 SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS, a monster and a whirlpool on each side of a narrow passage in the Strait of Messina, Journey/Flight, Shipwreck
 SEA NYMPHS see NYMPHS
 SELENE (LUNA), goddess of the moon, Dawn/Dawning, Night, Sleep/Sleeping
 SELEUCUS see ZALEUCUS
 SEM, Egyptian priest involved with burial rites, Funeral/Burial
 SEMELE, seduced by Zeus, she became the mother of Dionysus, Abduction/Rape, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Birth/Childbirth, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Madness
 SENECA (circa 35 B.C.–A.D. 65), Roman philosopher, dramatist and statesman, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
 SENNOFER (15th century B.C.), mayor of Thebes, Baptism
 SERAPIS, Egyptian god connected with Apis, the Bull, Arms Raised
 SERVIUS TULLIUS (578–534 B.C.), sixth legendary king of Rome, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues SET, Egyptian god of chaos and confusion, Baptism, Zodiac
 SHAMASH, Babylonian sun god, Arms Raised, Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Justice
 SICINNIUS, an exemplar of fortitude, Virtue/Virtues
 SILENS, half-human, half-beast creatures symbolizing drunkenness and lust, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 SILENUS, old and wise companion of Dionysus, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 SILVANUS, ancient pastoral god of fertility, Apotheosis/Deification, Honor/Honoring SIRENS, bird-women who lured sailors with their songs, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Music, Naked/Nude

- SISAMNES, corrupt judge flayed by Cambyzes, Judgment
- SISYPHUS, condemned to Hades, where he eternally rolled a huge stone up to the top of a hill, only to have it roll down again, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Misfortune
- SMILAX, beloved of Crocus, Metamorphosis
- SOCRATES (469–399 B.C.), Greek philosopher, Artists/Art, Choice/Choosing, Death, Excess, Melancholy, Self-Portraits I, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- SOL INVICTUR, Syrian sun god, Arms Raised
- OLON (circa 639–559 B.C.), early Athenian poet and statesman, known as a reformer and law-giver, Abundance, Grieving/Lamentation, Pointing/Indicating, Virtue/Virtues
- SOMNUS see HYPNOS
- SOPHOCLES see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- SPARTACUS (died 71 B.C.), leader of a slave revolt, Crucifixion
- SPHINX, in Egypt, a symbol of vigilance with a lion's body and a human head; in Greece, a symbol of wisdom with the head and breasts of a woman, Dreams/Visions, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Sanctuary
- STABIAE, favorite resort of the Romans, buried by the eruption of Mount Vesuvius, Seasons
- STOICISM, Greek school of philosophy founded by Zeno or Critium in 3rd century B.C., Artists/Art, Death, Logos/Word, Widowhood, Zodiac
- STYX, river leading to the underworld, Bath/Bathing, Light I, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Upside Down
- TAMMUZ, beloved of Inanna, Damned Souls, Seasons
- TANTALUS, immersed in a pool in Hades where the water receded when he tried to slake his thirst and the fruit was just out of reach above his head, Damned Souls, Misfortune
- TANUATH-AMEN, Ethiopian conqueror of Egypt, Dreams/Visions
- TARQUINIUS COLLATINUS, husband of Lucretia, Adultery
- TARQUINIUS SEXTUS, son of Tarquinius Superbus and raper of Lucretia, Adultery, Judgment, Betrayal
- TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS, last king of Rome, Adultery, Judgment
- TARTARUS, the dark underworld, the part of Hades where the worst punishments took place, and the personification of it, Damned Souls
- TA-URT/TAWERET/THOERUS, Egyptian goddess protecting women in childbirth, Pregnancy
- TAURUS, a peninsula on the coast of the Black Sea, now called Crimea, Sacrifice
- TELAMONS, sculptured male figures supporting an entablature, Luxury
- TELEPHUS, exposed on a mountain top by his grandfather, was rescued by a shepherd and suckled by a doe; he eventually became a hero in the Trojan War, Abandonment
- TELLUS (TERRA) see GAIA
- TERMINUS, god of boundaries, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- TERRA see GAIA
- TETHYS, a Titan, mother of the Oceanids, Fortune, Pregnancy, Virtue/Virtues
- TEUKROS, a warrior shown in some versions of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, Sacrifice
- THALIA, the muse of comedy, Laughter
- THALIA see GRACES
- THANATOS (MORS), death, or the personification of death, Love and Death, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping
- THEANO, Antenor's wife, and priestess of Athena, Betrayal
- THEBES, Egyptian city, Destruction of City
- THEIODAMAS, king of Dryopes, father of Hylas, killed by Hercules for his son, Abduction/Rape
- THEMIS, goddess of law and order, second wife of Zeus, Justice, Virtue/Virtues
- THEODOSIUS I, THE GREAT (A.D. 346?–395), Roman emperor of the East, Martyrdom
- THEOPANE, changed into a ewe by her abductor Poseidon, Abduction/Rape
- THESEUS, the great hero of Athens, slew the Minotaur, fleeing with Ariadne whom he abandoned on Naxos; he battled the Amazons and married their queen Hippolyta; he was also involved with the battle of the Lapiths and the Centaurs, as well as other adventures, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Excess, Journey/Flight, Labyrinth/Maze
- THETIS, a Nereid, was fated to bear a son that would become more powerful than his father; Zeus, although attracted to her, ordained she should marry a mortal, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Fame, Journey/Flight, Justice, Marriage/Betrothal, Upside Down
- THISBE, courted through a wall by Pyramus, killed herself at finding Pyramus dead, Love and Death
- THOTH, Egyptian scribe to the gods, Pointing/Indicating
- THUTMOSE IV, king of Egypt, reigned circa 1420–circa 1411 B.C., Dreams/Visions
- THYRSIS, a Virgilian shepherd, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- TIBER, river in central Italy, flowing past Rome, Virgin/Virginity
- TIBERIUS (42 B.C.–A.D. 37), second Roman emperor; although he made financial reforms, he was very unpopular, Apotheosis/Deification
- TIBERIUS, son of Brutus, killed by him, Judgment
- TIGRIS, river flowing through Mesopotamia, now Iraq, into the Euphrates, Journey/Flight
- TIRESIAS, the blind seer of Thebes, who had lived as both a man and a woman, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis
- TISIPHONE, one of the Erinyes, Madness
- TITANS, ancient dieties, ruled by Cronus, the father of Zeus, Abduction/Rape, Order/Chaos
- TITHONUS, beloved of Eos, Dawn/Dawning
- TITUS (circa A.D. 40–81), Roman emperor, Honor/Honoring, Virtue/Virtues
- TITUS, son of Brutus, killed by him, Judgment
- TITYUS, a giant, exiled to Hades, where a snake or a vulture daily ate his liver, Damned Souls, Gaze, Misfortune

- TMOLUS, a mountain god who judged the contest between Pan and Apollo, Judgment
- TOMYRIS, queen who overcame Cyrus the Great, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Fame, Justice
- TRAJAN (A.D. 53–114), Roman emperor, Devotion/Piety, Honor/Honoring, Justice, Virtue/Virtues
- TRITONS, minor sea gods with monstrous attributes, Fame, Light I, Serpent's Bite
- TROEZENIAN WOMEN, who cut off their hair before marriage, dedicating it to Hippolytus, Hair/Haircutting
- TROILUS, son of Hecuba and Priam or Apollo, killed in the Trojan War, Beheading/Decapitation, Destruction of City
- TROJAN HORSE, the hollow horse, filled with Greek warriors, by which entrance was gained into Troy, Automata
- TROJAN WAR, described in the Iliad and waged between the Greek cities and Troy over the abduction of Helen by Paris, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing, Destruction of City, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Madness, Sanctuary
- TROY (ILIUM), a Phrygian city, destroyed in the Trojan War, Adultery, Destruction of City, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Labyrinth/Maze, Nightmare, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping
- TUCCIA, Vestal Virgin who proved her chastity by carrying water in a sieve, Virgin/Virginity
- TUTANKHAMUN (flourished circa 1355 B.C.), pharaoh of the Eighteenth Dynasty in Egypt, Funeral/Burial, Light II
- TYCHE/FORTUNA/FATE, the goddess of luck or fortune, Abundance, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
- TYNDAREUS, king of Sparta and husband of Leda, Adultery, Birth/Childbirth, Pointing/Indicating
- TYRE, ancient city of Phoenicia, Destruction of City
- TYRRHENIAN PIRATES, Etruscans, Drunkenness/Intoxication
- ULYSSES see ODYSSEUS
- UNDERWORLD see HADES
- UR OF THE CHALDEES, ancient city of Sumer in Mesopotamia, Sacrifice
- URANIA, the Muse of Astronomy, Zodiac
- URANUS, god of the sky, Birth/Childbirth, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hair/Haircutting
- VEII, ancient city of Vitruvia, north of Rome, Luxury
- VENUS see APHRODITE
- VESPASIAN (A.D. 9–79), Roman emperor, founder of the Flavian dynasty, Luxury
- VESTA see HESTIA
- VESTAL VIRGINS, priestesses of Hestia, the goddess of the hearth, Honor/Honoring, Virgin/Virginity
- VESUVIUS, ancient volcano that destroyed the cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum in A.D. 79, Destruction of City, Evil Eye
- VETURIA, the mother of Coriolanus, who persuaded him not to march into Rome, Betrayal
- VIRGIL see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- VIRGILLUS, Abduction/Rape
- VIRGINIA, daughter of Virgilinius, killed by her father to save her honor, Betrayal, Judgment
- VIRGINIUS, Roman centurion, killed his daughter to save her honor, Judgment
- VULCAN see HEPHAESTUS
- XENOPHON see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- XERXES (circa 465–419 B.C.), king of Persia, Luxury
- ZALEUCUS, lawgiver in Locris, had his own eye plucked out to satisfy his judgment against his son, Judgment, Justice
- ZEPHYR, god of the west wind, Abduction/Rape, Birth/Childbirth
- ZEUS (JUPITER), the most powerful of the Olympian gods, particularly known for his sexual exploits, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Dawn/Dawning, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Fame, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Love and Death, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Money, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Zodiac
- ZEUXIS see Index of Artists and Works of Art
- ZIUSUDRA, Sumerian king who built a boat to escape a deluge, Journey/Flight
- ZODIAC, originating with the Babylonians, is a band across the sky formed by the orbits of the sun, moon, and five planets known to the ancients; it contains the 12 constellations, see Index of Other Names and Terms
- ZOROASTER, religious teacher of ancient Persia, Abandonment, Order/Chaos
- ZOZER, second king of the Third Dynasty of Egypt, Gaze

INDEX OF JUDEO-CHRISTIAN PERSONAGES, PLACES, AND CONCEPTS

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index or to other indexes where primary information can be found. See also citations refer the reader to other terms within the index or to other indexes where additional information can be found.

AARON, Ascent/Descent, Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 ABBOT(S), Dreams/Visions
 ABEL, Communion, Envy, Expulsion, Fortune, Harvesting, Offering, Order/Chaos, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning
 ABIGAIL, Abduction/Rape, Judgment
 ABRA, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 ABRAHAM, Abduction/Rape, Annunciation,
 Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation, Communion,
 Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Laughter,
 Martyrdom, Music, Naked/Nude, Offering, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
 ABSALOM, Hair/Haircutting
 ADAM, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Beheading/Decapitation, Communion, Crucifixion, Expulsion, Fame,
 Journey/Flight, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Melancholy,
 Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance,
 Pointing/Indicating, Sanctuary, Serpent's Bite,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
 ADAM AND EVE, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Damned
 Souls, Expulsion, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Justice,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Margins/Outsiders,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Sin/Sinning, Temptation,
 Vices/Deadly Sins
 ADORATION OF THE CHILD, Pointing/Indicating,
 Virgin/Virginity

ADORATION OF THE LAMB, Apocalypse
 ADORATION OF THE MAGI (KINGS), Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Money, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating
 ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS, Devotion/Piety, Night
 AGNUS DEI see LAMB OF GOD
 AGONY IN THE GARDEN, Betrayal, Dawn/Dawning
 AHADAB, Penitence/Repentance
 AHASVERUS (WANDERING JEW), Journey/Flight,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Self-Portraits I
 AHAZIAH, Abduction/Rape
 AHINOAM, Abduction/Rape
 AMALEKITES, Abduction/Rape
 ANGEL(S), Annunciation, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent,
 Baptism, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions, Death,
 Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Funeral/Burial,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring,
 Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judaism,
 Judgment, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light II,
 Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom,
 Music, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
 Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Reading,
 Self-Portraits I, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping,
 Sublime, Temptation, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas,

Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation,
Zodiac
ANGELIC COLLOQUY, Pregnancy
ANGELIC MISSION, Pregnancy
ANGELIC SALUTATION, Annunciation, Pregnancy
ANGELUS, Devotion/Piety
ANGLICAN PRAYER BOOK, Marriage/Betrothal
ANNA, Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Kiss/Kissing, Reading, Sacrifice
ANNUNCIATION TO MARY see Index of Other Names and Terms
ANNUNCIATION TO THE SHEPHERDS, Annunciation, Arms Raised, Light II, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses
ANTI-ANABAPTIST, Protestantism
ANTICHRIST, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon,
Protestantism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
APOCALYPSE see Index of Other Names and Terms APOCALYPTIC BEASTS, Fame, Honor/Honoring,
Judgment
APOSTLES (see also SAINTS; Index of Other Names and Terms), Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Communion,
Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Light II,
Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Protestantism,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Zodiac
APOSTLES CREED, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls
APOSTOLIC FATHERS, Devotion/Piety
ARCHANGELS, Order/Chaos
GABRIEL, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent,
Birth/Childbirth, Justice, Offering,
Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Visiting/Visitation
MICHAEL, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Fame,
Journey/Flight, Justice, Plague/Pestilence,
Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
ARCHBISHOPS, Death
MAXIMIANUS, Patronage
ARK (NOAH'S ARK), Journey/Flight, Shipwreck
ARK FOR A TORAH, Judaism, Light I
ARK OF THE COVENANT, Light I, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning
ARTHEMIA, Madness
ASCENSION, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised,
Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Path/Road/Crossroads
ASPERGILLUM, Funeral/Burial
ASSUMPTION, Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent, Funeral/Burial
ASTYAGES, KING, Laughter
ATHALIAH, Abduction/Rape
AUREOLE see Index of Other Names and Terms

BAAL, Ascent/Descent, Kiss/Kissing
BALDACHIN, Plague/Pestilence BAPTISM see JESUS CHRIST: BAPTISM (see also Index of Other Names and Terms)
BARNABITE ORDER, Devotion/Piety
BARUCH, Abduction/Rape
BATHSHEBA, Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal,
Honor/Honoring, Humors, Naked/Nude, Temptation,
Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism

BEATITUDES, Virtue/Virtues
BEHEMOTH, Masks/Personae
BEL, Laughter
BELISARIUS, Patronage
BENEDICTINE ORDER, Protestantism
BENJAMINITES, Abduction/Rape
BETHANY, Hair/Haircutting, Sin/Sinning
BETHEL, Ascent/Descent
BETHLEHEM, Birth/Childbirth, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity
BETHULIA, Justice
BILDAD, Laughter
BISHOPS (see also SAINTS), Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Dreams/Visions, Penitence/Repentance
ECCLESIIUS, Patronage
VICTOR, Patronage
BODENSTEIN, ANDREAS RODOLF, see KARLSTADT
BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, Marriage/Betrothal
BRAZEN SERPENT, Serpent's Bite
BROTHERHOOD OF OUR LADY (Spain), Vices/Deadly Sins
BURNING BUSH, Judaism

CAIAPHAS, Pointing/Indicating CAIN, Envy, Expulsion, Fortune, Harvesting,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Offering, Order/Chaos,
Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning
CALVIN, JOHN/CALVINIST(S)/CALVINISM,
Caricature/Cartoon, Music, Protestantism
CAMILLIANS (nursing order), Plague/Pestilence
CANAAN (promised land), Baptism, Journey/Flight
CANAAN (son of Ham), Drunkenness/Intoxication
CANON EPISCOPI 314, Witchcraft/Sorcery
CAPUCHINE ORDER, Devotion/Piety
CARDINAL(S), Crucifixion, Death, Vanity/Vanitas
CARLSTADT see KARLSTADT
CARMELITES, Ascent/Descent
CATECHISM, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity
CATHOLIC(S) see ROMAN CATHOLIC(S)
CENSER, Funeral/Burial, Plague/Pestilence
CHASUBLE(S), Funeral/Burial, Sanctuary
CHERUBIM, Witchcraft/Sorcery
CHRIST (see also JESUS CHRIST; MARY/VIRGIN/MADONNA: MADONNA AND CHILD)
CHRIST AS FIRST FRUIT OF THE VIRGIN,
Abundance
CHRIST AS JUDGE, Choice/Choosing, Judgment, Justice, Zodiac
CHRIST AS KING, Zodiac
CHRIST AS MESSIAH, Ascent/Descent,
Dawn/Dawning, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
CHRIST ENTHRONED, Communion, Judgment
CHRIST IN MAJESTY, Apocalypse, Fame, Light I
CHRIST PANTOCRATOR, Arms Raised, Light I,
Light II
CHURCH FATHERS, Arms Raised, Devotion/Piety,
Light I, Logos/Word, Luxury, Music, Vanity/Vanitas,
Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
CIBORIUM, Plague/Pestilence
CISTERCIAN MONKS, Labor/Trades/Occupations

CITY OF GOD, Devotion/Piety, Justice
CLEOPAS, Path/Road/Crossroads
CLOVIS (King of the Franks), Baptism
COMMUNION see Index of Other Names and Terms
CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, Communion, Crucifixion, Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Logos/Word, Martyrdom, Night, Sanctuary, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down,
Virgin/Virginity
CONSTANTIUS II, Gaze
CORNELIUS THE CENTURIAN, Baptism, Crucifixion
COUNCIL OF EPHESUS (431), Virgin/Virginity
COUNCIL OF NICAIA (325), Virgin/Virginity
COUNCIL OF NICAIA (787), Martyrdom
COUNCIL OF TRENT (1562–1563), Abduction/Rape, Devotion/Piety, Marriage/Betrothal, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Serpent's Bite,
Virgin/Virginity
COUNTER-REFORMATION, Apocalypse, Arms Raised,
Communion, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy,
Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring, Justice, Martyrdom,
Music, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance,
Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
COVENANT(S), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent,
Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions, Judaism, Justice, Virtue/Virtues
CREATION (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Ascent/Descent, Order/Chaos, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins
CROSS see CRUCIFIX; JESUS CHRIST: CRUCIFIXION;
Index of Other Names and Terms
CROSSING (PARTING) OF THE RED SEA, Baptism,
Journey/Flight
CROWN OF THORNS, Grieving/Lamentation, Judaism
CRUCIFIX, Arms Raised, Crucifixion,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Protestantism, Vanity/Vanitas CRUCIFIXION see JESUS CHRIST: CRUCIFIXION
(see also Index of Other Names and Terms)
DALMATIAN(S), Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring
DAMASCUS, Penitence/Repentance
DANIEL, Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Calumny,
Communion, Dreams/Visions, Justice, Laughter,
Madness, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Reading,
Shipwreck
DAVID, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent,
Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal,
Envy, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting,
Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment,
Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light I, Madness,
Melancholy, Music, Penitence/Repentance,
Plague/Pestilence, Reading, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Temptation,
Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Visiting/Visitation,
Voyeurism
DAY OF ATONEMENT, Sacrifice
DAY OF WRATH, Fame
DAYS OF AWE, Judgment
DEACON(S)/DEACONESS(ES), Honor/Honoring

DELILAH, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale,
Hair/Haircutting, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes
DELUGE/FLOOD, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Judgment, Martyrdom, Misfortune, Seasons,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sublime
DESIDERIUS, ABBOT, see POPE VICTOR III DEVIL(S) (see also LUCIFER; SATAN; Index of Other Names and Terms), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Damned
Souls, Death, Fools/Folly, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Justice, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal,
Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude,
Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning,
Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DIASPORA, Judaism
DIOCLETIAN, Communion
DIOSCORUS, Betrayal
DISCIPLE(S), Abandonment, Choice/Choosing,
Dreams/Visions, Order/Chaos, Shipwreck
DISPENSATION(S), Annunciation
DIVES AND LAZARUS see PARABLES: DIVES AND LAZARUS
DIVINE JUDGMENT, Arms Raised
DIVINE REVELATION, Light I, Logos/Word
DIVINE WILL, Grieving/Lamentation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DOMINICAN(S), Calumny, Comic, Peasantry,
Penitence/Repentance, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
EASTER, Martyrdom
EBENEZER, Sin/Sinning
ECCE AGNUS DEI see LAMB OF GOD
ECCE HOMO see JESUS CHRIST: ECCE HOMO
ELDERS, Apocalypse, Bath/Bathing, Dreams/Visions, Fame,
Justice, Margins/Outsiders, Music, Toilet Scenes,
Voyeurism, Widowhood
ELECT, Order/Chaos
ELI, Sin/Sinning
ELIJAH, Ascent/Descent, Metamorphosis,
Path/Road/Crossroads
ELIPHAZ, Laughter
ELIZABETH, Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Pregnancy,
Visiting/Visitation
EMMAUS, Path/Road/Crossroads
ENOCH, Ascent/Descent
EPIPHANY, Ascent/Descent
EPISCOPALIAN(S), Protestantism
ESAU, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
ESTHER, Betrayal, Fame, Marriage/Betrothal
ETIMASIA (HETOIMASIA), Judgment
EUCHARIST, Baptism, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Communion, Crucifixion, Ecstasy, Fame, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring,
Light I, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
EULOGIA, Plague/Pestilence
EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS SOPHRONIUS see SAINTS:
JEROME
EVANGELISTS, Apocalypse, Ecstasy, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Margins/Outsiders, Virtue/Virtues

JOHN, Baptism, Betrayal, Communion, Crucifixion, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Imagination/Creativity, Light I, Metamorphosis, Nightmare, Protestantism, Reading, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Zodiac

LUKE, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Communion, Imagination/Creativity, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Plague/Pestilence, Reading, Self-Portraits I

MATTHEW, Ascent/Descent, Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Money, Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Reading, Zodiac

MARK, Imagination/Creativity, Plague/Pestilence, Reading

EVE (see also ADAM AND EVE), Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Expulsion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Judaism, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity

EXODUS, Journey/Flight, Misfortune

EXPULSION FROM EDEN, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning

EZEKIEL, Fortune, Virgin/Virginity

FALL, Abundance, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Expulsion, Fortune, Humors, Justice, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Temptation

FEAST IN THE HOUSE OF LEVI, Sin/Sinning

FEAST OF THE ANNUNCIATION, Annunciation

FEAST OF THE EPIPHANY, Peace

FEAST OF THE NATIVITY, Annunciation

FEAST OF SUKKOTH (THE TABERNACLE), Offering

FIERY FURNACE, Martyrdom

FLIGHT INTO EGYPT, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating

FLOOD see DELUGE/FLOOD

FOUR HORSEMEN, Apocalypse, Order/Chaos

FOUR LAST THINGS, Sin/Sinning

FOX, GEORGE, Expulsion

FRANCISCAN ORDER, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virtue/Virtues

GACIUS, Martyrdom

GALILEE, Birth/Childbirth

GARDEN OF EDEN (PARADISE), Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Expulsion, Harvesting, Humors, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Offering, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE, Choice/Choosing

GATE OF THE LORD, Judaism

GATH, KING OF, Madness

GENEZARETH, SEA OF, Madness

GENTILES, Expulsion, Shipwreck, Virtue/Virtues

GERASA, Madness

GLORIA DEI, Music

GOD THE FATHER (see also HAND OF GOD; GRACE OF GOD; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAMB OF GOD; THRONE OF GOD; YAHWEH), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Ecstasy, Envy, Expulsion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Light I, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Music, Offering, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

GODHEAD, Melancholy

GOLDEN CALF, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Journey/Flight, Money, Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery

GOLEM, Ascent/Descent, Automata

GOLGOTHA, Ascent/Descent, Crucifixion, Light I, Path/Road/Crossroads

GOLIATH, Beheading/Decapitation, Honor/Honoring, Music, Naked/Nude, Self-Portraits I

GOOD FRIDAY, Protestantism

GOOD SHEPHERD, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Light I, Martyrdom, Music, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

GOOD THIEF (see also THIEVES), Penitence/Repentance

GRACE OF GOD (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Abundance, Light I

HABAKKUK, Communion

HAGAR, Expulsion, Pointing/Indicating, Virtue/Virtues

HALO see Index of Other Names and Terms

HAM, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism

HAMAN, Hanging

HAND OF GOD, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Imagination/Creativity, Order/Chaos, Sacrifice

HANNAH, Reading

HANNUKAH, Betrayal, Light I

HARROWING OF HELL, Damned Souls

HEAVEN (see also PARADISE; Index of Other Names and Terms), Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Expulsion, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins

HEAVENLY BRIDEGROOM, Communion

HEAVENLY JERUSALEM, Apocalypse

HEAVENLY KINGDOM, Light I

HEBREW(S) see Index of Other Names and Terms

HELIODORUS, Expulsion

- HELL, Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Comic, Communion, Damned Souls, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins
 HERMOGENES, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HEROD, Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight
 HERODIAS, Beheading/Decapitation, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Path/Road/Crossroads
 HEZEKIAH, Laughter
 HOLOFERNES, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Justice, Naked/Nude, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
 HOLY FAMILY, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Patronage, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice
 HOLY GRAIL, Light I
 HOLY SPIRIT/HOLY GHOST, Abundance, Annunciation, Baptism, Communion, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 HOLY WATER, Funeral/Burial
 HOLY WOMEN, Death, Funeral/Burial
 HOPHNI, Sin/Sinning
 HORTUS CONCLUSUS, Annunciation, Whiteness
 HOSEA, Marriage/Betrothal, Sacrifice
 HOST, Betrayal, Communion, Fools/Folly, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Virtue/Virtues
 HUGUENOTS, Protestantism
 HUNT OF THE UNICORN, Annunciation
 HUS (HUSS), JOHN, Protestantism
 HYMNS see Index of Other Names and Terms

 IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, Adultery, Apocalypse, Ecstasy, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Virgin/Virginity
 INCARNATION, Arms Raised, Crucifixion, Grieving/Lamentation, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Reading, Virtue/Virtues
 INQUISITION, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery INSTRUMENTS OF THE PASSION, Judgment, Sleep/Sleeping
 ISAAC, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Crucifixion, Expulsion, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judaism, Laughter, Light I, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Offering, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues
 ISAIAH, Music, Reading
 ISHMAEL, Expulsion, Pointing/Indicating, Virtue/Virtues
 ISRAEL/ISRAELITES (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Abduction/Rape, Dawn/Dawning, Destruction of City, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Laughter, Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Serpent's Bite, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

 JACOB, Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Fortune, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Offering, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Shepherd/Shepherdesses, Zodiac
 JACOB'S LADDER (Jacob's Dream), Ascent/Descent, Dreams/Visions, Night, Sleep/Sleeping
 JACOB WRESTLING WITH AN ANGEL, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions
 JAEEL, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Justice, Sin/Sinning
 JAHWAH see YAHWEH
 JANSENISTS, Devotion/Piety, Penitence/Repentance
 JAPHETH, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 JEHOSEBA, Abduction/Rape
 JEHOVAH (see also GOD; YAHWEH), Penitence/Repentance
 JEPHTAH AND HIS DAUGHTER, Beheading/Decapitation
 JEREMIAH, Abduction/Rape, Destruction of City, Zodiac
 JERUSALEM (see also HEAVENLY JERUSALEM; JESUS CHRIST: ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM; Index of Other Names and Terms), Ascent/Descent, Destruction of City, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Laughter, Light I, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood
 JESSE, Ascent/Descent
 JESUITS see SOCIETY OF JESUS
 JESUS CHRIST (see also CHRIST IN MAJESTY; CHRIST AS MESSIAH; CHRIST AS KING; CHRIST PANTOCRATOR), Abandonment, Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherd/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 BIRTH OR NATIVITY OF JESUS, Annunciation, Baptism, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Melancholy, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Shepherd/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity
 BAPTISM OF JESUS, Baptism, Naked/Nude, Peace
 TEMPTATION, Ascent/Descent, Path/Road/Crossroads, Temptation
 JESUS IN THE CARPENTER'S SHOP, Light II
 JESUS AT THE TEMPLE, Ascent/Descent, Expulsion, Money
 MARRIAGE AT CANA, Marriage/Betrothal

- TRANSFIGURATION, Metamorphosis,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses
ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM, Honor/Honoring,
Margins/Outsiders, Path/Road/Crossroads
ARREST OF JESUS CHRIST, Night,
Path/Road/Crossroads
MOCKING OF JESUS CHRIST,
Drunkenness/Intoxication
FLAGELLATION OF JESUS CHRIST, Vanity/Vanitas
ECCE HOMO, Pointing/Indicating PASSION, Arms Raised, Betrayal, Death,
Devotion/Piety, Grieving/Lamentation,
Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Justice,
Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night,
Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Virtue/Virtues
CARRYING THE CROSS (ROAD TO CALVARY),
Journey/Flight, Margins/Outsiders
CRUCIFIXION (CHRIST ON THE CROSS)
(see also Index of Other Names and Terms),
Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent,
Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing,
Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls,
Dawn/Dawning, Death, Funeral/Burial,
Judaism, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection,
Naked/Nude, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite,
Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
DEPOSITION, Death, Grieving/Lamentation
ENTOMBMENT, Arms Raised, Crucifixion,
Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation,
Journey/Flight, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude RESURRECTION, Abundance,
Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised,
Ascent/Descent, Crucifixion, Damned Souls,
Dawn/Dawning, Funeral/Burial,
Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring,
Journey/Flight, Light II, Martyrdom,
Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Offering,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance,
Protestantism, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping
JOURNEY TO EMMAUS, Path/Road/Crossroads MAN OF SORROWS, Melancholy
HUMAN NATURE OF CHRIST, Abundance
JESUITS see SOCIETY OF JESUS
JOAB, Hair/Haircutting
JOACHIM (husband of Anna), Annunciation,
Birth/Childbirth, Kiss/Kissing, Sacrifice
JOACHIM (husband of Susanna), Adultery
JOASH, Abduction/Rape
JOB, Envy, Laughter, Misfortune
JOBIA, Madness
JOEL, Betrayal
JOHANAN, Abduction/Rape
JOHN THE BAPTIST see SAINTS
JONAH, Arms Raised, Crucifixion,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck
JONATHAN, Grieving/Lamentation, Kiss/Kissing
JOSEPH (Old Testament), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent,
Betrayal, Dreams/Visions, Envy, Harvesting, Offering,
Pointing/Indicating, Virtue/Virtues
JOSEPH AND POTIPHAR'S WIFE, Adultery,
Betrayal, Calumny, Judgment, Offering,
Temptation
JOSEPH (New Testament), Birth/Childbirth, Fortune, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Pregnancy, Visiting/Visitation
JOSEPH OF ARIMATHAEA, Crucifixion, Death,
Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation
JUDAH, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal, Laughter
JUDAS ISCARIOT, Betrayal, Communion, Evil Eye,
Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Kiss/Kissing,
Margins/Outsiders, Money, Penitence/Repentance,
Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
JUDEA, Peace, Witchcraft/Sorcery
JUDITH, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal,
Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Justice, Naked/Nude, Night, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes,
Virtue/Virtues
JULIANUS ARGENTARIUS, Patronage
JUSTINIAN (Byzantine emperor), Abduction/Rape, Light I, Patronage, Sanctuary
JUSTINIAN, DEACON, Sleep/Sleeping
KARLSTADT (ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN),
Protestantism
KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN, Fortune, Light II
KOIMESIS, Virgin/Virginity
LABAN, Betrayal, Sacrifice
LACRANTIUS, Upside Down
LAKE OF GENESARETH, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping
LAMB OF GOD/ECCE AGNUS DEI, Communion,
Devotion/Piety, Grieving/Lamentation, Judgment, Martyrdom, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism,
Sacrifice
LAMENTATION (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Arms Raised, Betrayal, Death,
Grieving/Lamentation, Night
LAST JUDGMENT, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent,
Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Fame, Hanging, Harvesting, Judgment, Justice, Light I, Naked/Nude,
Night, Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas,
Vices/Deadly Sins
LAST SUPPER, Arms Raised, Betrayal, Communion,
Devotion/Piety, Grieving/Lamentation,
Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Night,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Protestantism
LAZARUS (brother of Martha and Mary), Arms Raised, Hair/Haircutting, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning
LAZARUS (leper) see PARABLES: DIVES AND LAZARUS
LEAH, Envy, Mirror/Reflection
LENT, Crucifixion
LENTEN HYMNS, Sacrifice
LENTEN PROCESSIONS, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Penitence/Repentance
LEVIATHAN, Masks/Personae

LILITH, Expulsion, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Zodiac
 LIMBO, Damned Souls, Journey/Flight, Margins/Outsiders,
 Sin/Sinning
 LION OF JUDAH, Judaism
 LITURGY, Death, Sacrifice
 LORD'S PRAYER, Virtue/Virtues
 LOT, Abduction/Rape, Pointing/Indicating LOT AND HIS DAUGHTERS, Betrayal, Sin/Sinning
 LUCIFER (see also DEVIL[S]; SATAN), Expulsion, Masks/Personae, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins
 LULAB, Light I, Offering
 LUTHER, MARTIN/LUTHERAN(S)/LUTHERANISM,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Crucifixion, Order/Chaos,
 Protestantism, Serpent's Bite

MACCABAEUS, SIMON, Offering

MADONNA AND CHILD see

MARY/VIRGIN/MADONNA

MAGEN (MOGEN) DAVID see STAR OF DAVID

MAGI (see also ADORATION), Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Kiss/Kissing, Journey/Flight, Money,
 Path/Road/Crossroads

MALCHUS, Betrayal

MANDYLION OF EDESSA, Beheading/Decapitation

MANOAH, Annunciation, Sacrifice

MARIOLATRY/MARIOLOGY, Devotion/Piety, Music,
 Virgin/Virginity

MARME, Virtue/Virtues

MARTYRDOM see Index of Other Names and Terms

MARY/VIRGIN/MADONNA, Communion, Crucifixion,
 Death, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Funeral/Burial,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight,
 Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I,
 Mirror/Reflection, Money, Order/Chaos,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy,
 Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I,
 Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Zodiac

BIRTH OF MARY, Birth/Childbirth, Music

MARY AT THE TEMPLE, Ascent/Descent

MARRIAGE TO JOSEPH, Marriage/Betrothal

ANNUNCIATION see Index of Other Names and Terms

MADONNA AND CHILD (VIRGIN AND CHILD),
 Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art,
 Betrayal, Fame, Imagination/Creativity,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection,
 Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity

CHRIST AS FIRST FRUIT OF THE VIRGIN,
 Abundance

PIETÀ, Death, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Madness, Naked/Nude, Peace

MATER DOLOROSA, Honor/Honoring

DEATH/DORMITION OF THE VIRGIN,
 Annunciation, Grieving/Lamentation, Music,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Virgin/Virginity

ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN,
 Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Music, Virgin/Virginity

CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN,

Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Light II

REGINA COELI (QUEEN OF HEAVEN),

Honor/Honoring, Light I, Light II, Sin/Sinning

VIRGIN IMMACULATA, Annunciation,

Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent,

Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity

MASS, Annunciation, Betrayal, Fools/Folly,

Imagination/Creativity, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery

MASSACRE OF THE INNOCENT, Path/Road/Crossroads

MEDIA see Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts

MELANCHTHON, PHILIP, Melancholy, Protestantism

MELCHIZEDEK, Communion

MELITA, Shipwreck

MENNONITE(S), Sin/Sinning

MENORAH, Betrayal, Judaism, Light I, Logos/Word, Offering

MERTON, THOMAS, Ascent/Descent

MESSIAH (see also CHRIST AS MESSIAH), Judgment,
 Reading

METHODISTS, Ecstasy, Witchcraft/Sorcery

MIRIAM, Ascent/Descent, Dance/Dancers/Dancing

MITRE(S), Caricature/Cartoon

MITZVAH, Judaism

MOAB/MOABITES, Destruction of City

MOGEN (MAGEN) DAVID see STAR OF DAVID

MONK(S) see Index of Other Names and Terms

MONSTRANCE(S), Communion, Path/Road/Crossroads

MORMONS, Dreams/Visions

MOSES, Abandonment, Ascent/Descent, Baptism,

Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Humors,

Journey/Flight, Judaism, Justice,

Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Logos/Word,

Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Money, Order/Chaos,

Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Sanctuary, Serpent's

Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning,

Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

MOUNT ARARAT, Ascent/Descent, Journey/Flight

MOUNT CARMEL, Ascent/Descent

MOUNT MORIAH, Music

MOUNT OF OLIVES, Honor/Honoring, Mirror/Reflection

MOUNT SINAI, Ascent/Descent, Judaism, Sanctuary

MOUNT ZION, Ascent/Descent

NAAMAN, Bath/Bathing

NABAL, Judgment

NAME (OF THE LORD), Light I

NATHAN, Adultery

NATIONAL COVENANT (1638), Martyrdom

NATIVITY see JESUS CHRIST: BIRTH OR NATIVITY OF JESUS

NAZARETH, Reading

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, Madness

NICODEMUS, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation

NIMROD, Ascent/Descent, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

NOAH, Ascent/Descent, Drunkenness/Intoxication,

Journey/Flight, Light II, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom,

Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Peace, Sacrifice, Seasons,

Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism

NOLI ME TANGERE, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sin/Sinning
 NUN(S) see Index of Other Names and Terms
 NUNCIATURE, Sanctuary

OLIVETANS (nursing order), Plague/Pestilence
 ONIAS, Expulsion
 ORIGINAL SIN, Fall
 OUR LADY OF CARMEL, Ascent/Descent

PALM SUNDAY, Honor/Honoring
 PAPAL BULL OF 1233, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 PAPAL BULL OF 1484, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 PARABLE OF THE RICH MAN see PARABLES: DIVES
 AND LAZARUS
 PARABLES (see also Index of Other Names and Terms),
 Protestantism
 DIVES AND LAZARUS, Avarice, Damned Souls, Margins/Outsiders, Order/Chaos,
 Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism
 PRODIGAL SON, Damned Souls, Journey/Flight, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism,
 Self-Portraits I

PARADISE (see also GARDEN OF EDEN; HEAVEN; Index of Other Names and Terms), Ascent/Descent,
 Betrayal, Crucifixion, Expulsion, Light I, Logos/Word, Marriage/Betrothal, Pointing/Indicating, Vices/Deadly Sins

PARALYTIC(S), Sin/Sinning
 PARAMENT(S), Plague/Pestilence
 PASCHAL LAMB, Betrayal, Communion, Martyrdom
 PASCHASIUS, Betrayal
 PASSION see JESUS CHRIST: PASSION
 PASSOVER, Betrayal, Communion
 PATER NOSTRE see LORD'S PRAYER
 PATRIARCHS, Journey/Flight, Zodiac
 PEACEABLE KINGDOM, Logos/Word, Order/Chaos
 PENTECOST, Devotion/Piety, Path/Road/Crossroads PHARAOH (see also Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts), Adultery, Abandonment, Apotheosis/Deification, Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Misfortune, Offering, Pointing/Indicating,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery

PHARISEE(S), Adultery, Hair/Haircutting, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 PHILISTINE(S), Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning
 PHINEHAS, Sin/Sinning
 PIETISM, Devotion/Piety
 PONTIUS PILATE, Death, Pointing/Indicating POOL OF BETHSEDA, Bath/Bathing
 POPE(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Crucifixion,
 Death, Devotion/Piety, Fools/Folly, Kiss/Kissing, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas
 BENEDICT XIV, Self-Portraits I
 CLEMENT IX, Honor/Honoring
 CYRIACUS, Baptism, Madness
 GREGORY, Plague/Pestilence
 GREGORY I (THE GREAT) (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Masks/Personae, Sin/Sinning

GREGORY VII, Penitence/Repentance
 HONORIUS, Martyrdom
 INNOCENT III, Abduction/Rape
 INNOCENT VIII, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 INNOCENT X, Physiognomy
 JOAN, Birth/Childbirth
 JOHN VIII, Birth/Childbirth
 JULIUS II, Caricature/Cartoon, Expulsion, Hair/Haircutting, Luxury, Patronage
 LEO X, Peace, Serpent's Bite
 PAUL III, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance
 PAUL IV, Pointing/Indicating SIMPLICIUS, Martyrdom
 URBAN VIII, Self-Portraits I
 VICTOR III, Patronage
 POPERY, Marriage/Betrothal
 POTIPHAR'S WIFE see JOSEPH AND POTIPHAR'S WIFE
 PRESBYTER(S), Virgin/Virginity
 PRINCE OF DARKNESS see DEVIL(S); LUCIFER; SATAN
 PRODIGAL SON see PARABLES: PRODIGAL SON
 PROMISED LAND, Journey/Flight
 PROPHETS, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Fortune, Harvesting, Journey/Flight,
 Light I, Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Reading, Zodiac
 PROTESTANT(S), Apocalypse, Artists/Art,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Crucifixion, Death,
 Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment,
 Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom,
 Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
 Protestantism, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning,
 Virgin/Virginity
 PROTHESIS, Funeral/Burial
 PUBLICAN(S), Protestantism
 PURGATORY, Ascent/Descent, Death,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Whiteness
 QUAKER(S), Expulsion
 QUINTIAN, Martyrdom
 QUINTILIUS VARUS, Crucifixion

RACHEL, Betrayal, Envy, Grieving/Lamentation,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection
 REBECCA, Birth/Childbirth, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 REBEL ANGELS, Expulsion, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins
 REDEMPTION (see also Index of Other Names and Terms),
 Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Fame,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight,
 Margins/Outsiders, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning
 REFORMATION, Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon,
 Communion, Crucifixion, Death, Fools/Folly,
 Margins/Outsiders, Patronage, Peasantry,
 Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's
 Bite, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
 REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, Martyrdom
 RESURRECTION (see also JESUS CHRIST: RESURRECTION; Index of Other Names and Terms),
 Grieving/Lamentation, Night

ROMAN CATHOLIC(S)/ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH,
 Apocalypse, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion,
 Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Fools/Folly,
 Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism,
 Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning,
 Vices/Deadly Sins

ROSH HASHANAH, Judgment

RUTH, Harvesting

SACRA CONVERSAZIONE, Devotion/Piety, Protestantism

SACRAMENTS (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Communion, Honor/Honoring,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Penitence/Repentance

SAINTS (see also APOSTLES; EVANGELISTS; Index of Other Names and Terms), Choice/Choosing, Devotion/Piety, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Light I, Logos/Word, Madness, Martyrdom, Months, Music, Nightmare,
 Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
 Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas, Zodiac

ADELBERT, Funeral/Burial

AGATHA, Beheading/Decapitation, Martyrdom,
 Virgin/Virginity

AGNES, Martyrdom, Hair/Haircutting

AMBROSE (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Adultery,
 Music

ANDREW, Crucifixion, Martyrdom,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating

ANNE, Apocalypse

ANSELM, Virtue/Virtues

ANTHONY OF FLORENCE, Plague/Pestilence

ANTHONY OF PADUA, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Nightmare, Plague/Pestilence,
 Temptation, Witchcraft/Sorcery

APOLLONIA, Virgin/Virginity

AUGUSTINE (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Devotion/Piety, Funeral/Burial, Upside Down

BARBARA, Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Betrayal, Martyrdom, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues

BARTHOLOMEW, Artists/Art, Damned Souls,
 Judgment, Martyrdom, Self-Portraits I, Upside Down

BENEDICT, Ascent/Descent, Devotion/Piety,
 Funeral/Burial, Labor/Trades/Occupations

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Devotion/Piety, Reading

BERNWARD/BERWARD, Pointing/Indicating

BONAVENTURA/BONAVENTURE (see also
 Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Devotion/Piety, Light
 II, Mirror/Reflection, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Virtue/Virtues

BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and

Folktales), Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth,
 Dreams/Visions, Light II, Virgin/Virginity

CALLISTUS, Virtue/Virtues

CAMILLUS, Plague/Pestilence

CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA, Fortune,

Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Virgin/Virginity

CATHERINE OF SIENA, Choice/Choosing,
 Dreams/Visions

CECILIA, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Music

CHARLES BORROMEO, Devotion/Piety,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence

CHRISTOPHORUS (CHRISTOPHER),
 Path/Road/Crossroads

CHRYSOSTOM, Fools/Folly

CLAIRE, Hair/Haircutting

CLEMENT, Virtue/Virtues

COSMAS AND DAMIAN, Sleep/Sleeping

DENIS, Beheading/Decapitation

DOROTHEA, Virgin/Virginity

ELIZABETH, Betrayal

EUPHEMIA, Virgin/Virginity

EUSTACE, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

FELICITAS, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues

FRANCIS OF ASSISI (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Apotheosis/Deification, Death,
 Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy,
 Funeral/Burial, Hair/Haircutting,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
 Vanity/Vanitas

FRANCIS OF SALES (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Devotion/Piety

GEORGE, Beheading/Decapitation, Gaze,
 Imagination/Creativity, Self-Portraits I

GILES, Sin/Sinning

GREGORY I (THE GREAT) see POPES

HELEN, Betrayal

HELSINUS, Shipwreck

HILARY, Funeral/Burial

HUBERT OF LIÈGE, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

HYACINTH, Dreams/Visions, Humors

IGNATIUS LOYOLA (see also Index of Authors,
 Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions,
 Protestantism

IRENE, Martyrdom

JAMES THE GREATER, Journey/Flight,
 Metamorphosis, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping,
 Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery

JEROME (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales),
 Destruction of City, Dreams/Visions, Martyrdom,
 Masks/Personae, Penitence/Repentance,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Vanity/Vanitas

JOHN THE BAPTIST, Annunciation,
 Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent, Baptism,
 Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion,

- Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Journey/Flight, Light I, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Visiting/Visitation
- JOHN THE CARPENTER, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- JOHN CHRYSOSTOMOS (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Penitence/Repentance
- JOHN CLIMACOS (CLIMAX, SCHOLASTICUS) see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- JOHN OF THE CROSS (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Ascent/Descent
- JOHN THE EVANGELIST see EVANGELISTS
- LUCILLA OF ROME, Baptism
- LUCY, Apotheosis/Deification, Betrayal, Funeral/Burial
- LUKE see EVANGELISTS
- MACARIUS, Plague/Pestilence
- MARGARET OF ANTIOCH, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Pregnancy
- MARK see EVANGELISTS
- MARTINI, Ascent/Descent, Martyrdom
- MARY OF EGYPT, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity
- MARY MAGDALENE, Ascent/Descent, Communion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Madness, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity
- MICHAEL see ARCHANGELS
- NEMESIUS, Baptism
- NICHOLAS OF MYRA, Abduction/Rape, Virtue/Virtues
- ONUPHRIUS, Penitence/Repentance
- PAUL (SAUL), Beheading/Decapitation, Communion, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- PERPETUA, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
- PETER, Apocalypse, Avarice, Baptism, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Night, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- PETER MARTYR, Martyrdom
- PETRONILLA, Funeral/Burial
- PHILIP, Upside Down
- PRAXEDIS, Protestantism
- REGIS, Plague/Pestilence
- REMI (Bishop of Reims), Baptism
- ROCH, Evil Eye, Journey/Flight, Plague/Pestilence, Virtue/Virtues
- ROMUALD, Ascent/Descent, Vanity/Vanitas
- SEBASTIAN, Evil Eye, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence
- STEPHEN, Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom
- TERESA OF AVILA (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Ascent/Descent, Ecstasy
- THECLA, Virgin/Virginity
- THEODORE, Gaze
- THOMAS THE APOSTLE, Virgin/Virginity
- THOMAS AQUINAS (see also Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales), Automata, Sin/Sinning
- THOMAS BECKET, Funeral/Burial, Sanctuary
- URSULA, Journey/Flight, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity
- VALENTINE, Baptism
- ZENOBIUS, Apotheosis/Deification
- SALOME (daughter of Herodias), Beheading/Decapitation, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Sin/Sinning
- SALOME (midwife), Birth/Childbirth, Virgin/Virginity
- SAMARIA, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- SAMSON, Annunciation, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
- SAMUEL, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- SARA/SARAH (bride of Tobias), Comic, Journey/Flight
- SARAH, Annunciation, Expulsion, Laughter, Offering, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
- SATAN (see also DEVIL[S]; LUCIFER), Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- SAUL (Old Testament), Envy, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Madness, Melancholy, Music, Penitence/Repentance
- SAUL (New Testament) see ST. PAUL
- SAVONAROLA, Calumny, Death, Luxury, Penitence/Repentance, Zodiac
- SCHISMATICS, Protestantism
- SCOTTISH COVENANTERS, Martyrdom
- SEA OF GALILEE, Shipwreck
- SECOND COMING, Apocalypse, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning
- SECOND TEMPLE, Sanctuary

- SEDER, Betrayal
 SELEUCUS IV PHILOPATER, King of Syria, Expulsion
 SERPENT see Index of Other Names and Terms
 SEVEN ACTS OF MERCY, Plague/Pestilence
 SEVEN BEATITUDES, Virtue/Virtues
 SEVEN DEADLY SINS, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
 SEVEN GIFT VIRTUES, Virtue/Virtues
 SEVEN-HEADED BEAST, Apocalypse, Order/Chaos
 SEVEN LAST WORDS, Crucifixion, Virtue/Virtues
 SEVEN SEALS (Opening of the Apocalypse), Order/Chaos
 SHAKERS, Ecstasy
 SHEBA, QUEEN OF, Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Visiting/Visitation
 SHEM, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 SHILOH, Abduction/Rape
 SIBYL(S), Destruction of City, Devotion/Piety, Fame, Fortune, Harvesting, Order/Chaos, Reading
 SIMEA DEL, Vices/Deadly Sins
 SIMEON, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
 SIMON MAGUS, Avarice, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 SIMON THE PHARISEE, Hair/Haircutting
 SINAI, Ascent/Descent
 SISERA, Betrayal, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping
 SOCIETY OF JESUS, Devotion/Piety, Martyrdom, Months, Penitence/Repentance
 SOCINION SECTS, Sin/Sinning
 SODOM AND GOMORRAH, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal, Destruction of City, Judgment, Misfortune, Pointing/Indicating SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT (1643), Martyrdom
 SOLOMON, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Fortune, Judgment, Justice, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
 STAR OF DAVID, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Judaism
 STATIONS OF THE CROSS, Devotion/Piety, Path/Road/Crossroads, Vices/Deadly Sins
 SUGER (Abbot of St. Denis), Communion, Funeral/Burial, Light II, Sanctuary
 SUSANNA (SUSANNAH), Adultery, Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Calumny, Dreams/Visions, Humors, Justice, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
 SYBIL(S) see SIBYL(S)
 SYNAGOGUE (see also Index of Other Names and Terms), Judaism

 TABLETS OF THE LAW see TEN COMMANDMENTS
 TALLIT, Judaism
 TAMAR, Abduction/Rape, Betrayal
 TASHLIKH, Sin/Sinning
 TEFILLIN, Judaism
 TEMPTATION see FALL; JESUS CHRIST: TEMPTATION; Index of Other Names and Terms
 TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM, Ascent/Descent, Judaism
 TEMPLE OF THE MOUNT, Sanctuary
 TEMPLE OF SOLOMON, Baptism, Visiting/Visitation
 TEMPTER see DEVIL(S); LUCIFER; SATAN

 TEN COMMANDMENTS, Ascent/Descent, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Reading, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
 THEATINE ORDER, Devotion/Piety
 THEODORA (Byzantine empress), Patronage
 THEODORIC (Byzantine emperor), Patronage
 THEOTOKOS (Mother of God), Ascent/Descent, Virgin/Virginity
 THIEVES (see also GOOD THIEF), Protestantism
 THREE CHILDREN IN THE FIERY FURNACE, Arms Raised THREE MARYS, Arms Raised, Grieving/Lamentation THRONE OF GOD, Martyrdom
 TIGRIS see Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts
 TOBIAS, Comic, Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal
 TOBIT, Journey/Flight
 TONSURE, Hair/Haircutting, Sanctuary
 TOPHET, Ascent/Descent
 TORAH, Judaism, Light I
 TOWER OF BABEL (BABYLON), Ascent/Descent, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Order/Chaos
 TRANSUBSTANTIATION, Communion, Crucifixion
 TREE OF JESSE, Ascent/Descent, Virtue/Virtues
 TREE OF KNOWLEDGE, Abundance, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Expulsion, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 TREE OF LIFE, Abundance, Ascent/Descent, Judaism, Order/Chaos, Protestantism TREE OF PASSION, Abundance
 TREE OF SIN, Vices/Deadly Sins
 TRIBE OF JUDAH, Judaism
 TRINITY, Annunciation, Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Peace, Plague/Pestilence
 TWELVE TRIBES OF ISRAEL, Judaism, Zodiac
 TWO NATURES OF CHRIST, Arms Raised
 TWO WITNESSES, Apocalypse

 UR OF THE CHALDEES, Ascent/Descent, Journey/Flight
 URIAH, ADULTERY, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Temptation

 VALLEY OF HINOM, Ascent/Descent
 VATICAN, Patronage, Sanctuary
 VATICAN COUNCIL, SECOND (1962–1965), Devotion/Piety, Path/Road/Crossroads
 VEIL OF VERONICA, Beheading/Decapitation
 VESPER, Grieving/Lamentation
 VIRGIN AND CHILD see MARY/VIRGIN/MADONNA: MADONNA AND CHILD
 VIRGIN IMMACULATE see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION
 VISION OF THE MYSTIC LAMB, Music
 VISITATION see Index of Other Names and Terms

 WANDERING JEW see AHASVERUS
 WHORE OF BABYLON, Apocalypse, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning
 WISE AND FOOLISH VIRGINS, Judgment, Zodiac

WISE MEN see MAGI

WITCH OF ENDOR, Fortune, Witchcraft/Sorcery

WOMAN CLOTHED IN THE SUN, Apocalypse

WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY, Adultery

WORD OF GOD, Logos/Word, Protestantism

WORKS OF MERCY, Virtue/Virtues

WYCLIF (WYCLIFFE), JOHN, Protestantism

YAHWEH (see also GOD; JEHOVAH), Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Sin/Sinning, Zodiac

YHWH see YAHWEH

YOM KIPPUR, Judgment

ZACCHAEUS, Penitence/Repentance

ZACHARIAS, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent,

Birth/Childbirth, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation

ZIKLAG, Abduction/Rape

ZION, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning

ZULEIKA see JOSEPH: JOSEPH AND POTIPHAR'S WIFE

ZWINGLI, HULDERIC, Protestantism

INDEX OF REFERENCES TO THE BIBLE AND OTHER SACRED BOOKS

The titles after the reference refer to the essays in which the reference is found.

BIBLE: OLD TESTAMENT

GENESIS

1	Order/Chaos, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime	4:11-12	Labor/Trades/Occupations
1-2	Ascent/Descent	4:17	Ascent/Descent
1-2:4	Expulsion	7:1-17	Journey/Flight
1:3	Order/Chaos	7:6-24	Judgment
1:3-5	Light I	8:11	Peace
1:4	Ascent/Descent	8:22	Harvesting
1:8-17	Ascent/Descent	9:1	Seasons
1:16	Birth/Childbirth	9:7	Drunkenness/Intoxication
2-3	Ascent/Descent, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning	9:20-23	Drunkenness/Intoxication
2:7	Order/Chaos	9:22-24	Voyeurism
2:8-25	Ascent/Descent	10:10	Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
2:21-24	Hermaphrodite/Androgyne	11	Ascent/Descent
3	Temptation	11:1-9	Ascent/Descent
3:1-7	Melancholy	12:1-8	Journey/Flight
3:4-23	Ascent/Descent	14:12-16	Abduction/Rape
3:7	Naked/Nude, Sin/Sinning	14:16-20	Communion
3:15-25	Journey/Flight	15:15	Peace
3:16-19	Sin/Sinning	17:15-17	Laughter
3:19	Labor/Trades/Occupations	18	Annunciation, Communion
4	Communion, Envy, Sacrifice	18:1-16	Visiting/Visitation
4:3-4	Sacrifice	18:1-19	Laughter
		19:24-29	Judgment
		21:6	Laughter
		22	Communion, Sacrifice
		22:17	Virtue/Virtues
		25:29-31	Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
		28:10-19	Sleep/Sleeping

- 28:10-22 Ascent/Descent, Dreams/Visions
 30 Envy
 32:22-32 Dawn/Dawning
 32:24-32 Ascent/Descent
 37 Envy
 37:23-28 Abduction/Rape
 37:34 Grieving/Lamentation
 39:7-20 Adultery
 39:10-20 Judgment
 43:27 Peace
 50:10 Grieving/Lamentation
- EXODUS
 3:8 Abundance
 4:1-9 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 5:1-7 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 7:11, 22 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 12:40-41 Journey/Flight
 14 Baptism
 14:8 Arms Raised
 14-40 Journey/Flight
 15:20-21 Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 16:4-36 Communion
 17:5-7 Communion
 18:7 Peace
 20:1-17 Reading
 20:4-5 Kiss/Kissing
 20:14 Adultery
 20:17 Envy
 21:16 Abduction/Rape
 21:23-25 Justice
 22:18 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 22:22-24 Widowhood
 23:15-16 Harvesting
 25:31 Judaism
 32:1-20 Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 32:1-35 Automata
 33:3 Abundance
 36 Communion
- LEVITICUS
 16 Sacrifice
 16:20-22 Margins/Outsiders
 20:10 Adultery
 23:40 Offering
- NUMBERS
 2:4-9 (Douai) Serpent's Bite
 13 Baptism
 21:6-9 Crucifixion
 23:24 Judaism
- DEUTERONOMY
 5:18 Judaism
 5:21 Adultery
 13:1-3 Envy
 21:22 Dreams/Visions
 22:22 Crucifixion
 24:7 Adultery
 32:20 Abduction/Rape
 32:28-29 Vices/Deadly Sins
 32:28-29 Vices/Deadly Sins
- 34 Ascent/Descent
 34:8 Grieving/Lamentation
- JOSHUA
 10:21 Peace
- JUDGES
 4:12-24 Sleep/Sleeping
 4:17 Peace
 9:8-9 Peace
 11:4-39 Beheading/Decapitation
 13 Annunciation
 13:2-24 Sacrifice
 13-16 Hair/Haircutting
 16 Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 16:4-22 Sleep/Sleeping
 16:19 Hair/Haircutting
 21:20-23 Abduction/Rape
- I SAMUEL
 2:16-17 Sin/Sinning
 6:13 Harvesting
 16 Music
 16:23 Madness, Music
 18 Envy
 18:6-7 Honor/Honoring, Music
 20:41-42 Kiss/Kissing
 25:20-35 Judgment
 28 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 30:5-20 Abduction/Rape
- II SAMUEL
 1:17-27 Grieving/Lamentation
 3:31 Grieving/Lamentation
 4-7 Plague/Pestilence
 11 Adultery, Bath/Bathing
 11:2-4 Voyeurism
 11-12 Temptation
 11:2-17 Honor/Honoring
 17:10 Judaism
 18:9 Hair/Haircutting
 18:33 Hair/Haircutting
- I KINGS
 3:16-28 Judgment
 2:33 Peace
 10 Marriage/Betrothal
 10:1-13 Visiting/Visitation
 16:23 Melancholy
 18:20-40 Ascent/Descent
 19:13-18 Kiss/Kissing
 22:17 Peace
- II KINGS
 1:50-51 Sanctuary
 2:1-14 Ascent/Descent
 2:33 Peace
 5 Bath/Bathing
 5:26 Peace
 9-13 Honor/Honoring
 11:1-12 Abduction/Rape
 23:10 Ascent/Descent

I CHRONICLES

7:22 Grieving/Lamentation
15:16ff Music
16:7-24 Music

II CHRONICLES

5 Music
7:19-22 Judgment
9:1-9 Visiting/Visitation
12-13 Music
30:10 Laughter
35:25 Grieving/Lamentation
36:15-17 Judgment

ESTHER

7:10 Hanging

JOB

5:22 Laughter
5:23 Peace
8:21 Laughter
14:1-2 Vanity/Vanitas
31:3 Envy
38:31 Order/Chaos

PSALMS

4:8 Peace
8:5 Ascent/Descent
9:7 Order/Chaos
9:8-9 Order/Chaos
18 Labor/Trades/Occupations
19 Zodiac
23 Ascent/Descent
29:3 Logos/Word
22:11 Peace
38:3 Peace
40:12 Hair/Haircutting
41:9 Communion
42:1-2 Ecstasy
51:16-17 Sacrifice
53 Fools/Folly
59:8 Laughter
65:5-6 Logos/Word
69:4 Hair/Haircutting
73 Envy
85:10 Kiss/Kissing
86:1-3 Logos/Word
92 Labor/Trades/Occupations
102:3 Vanity/Vanitas
106:19-23 Automata
110:4 Communion
118-25 Honor/Honoring
118:20 Light I
119:105 Light I
119:164 Music
121:1 Ascent/Descent
121:8 Logos/Word
126 Labor/Trades/Occupations
126:2 Laughter
139:8-10 Ascent/Descent
149:1 Music

PROVERBS

1:26 Laughter
3:2 Peace
3:18 Ascent/Descent
14:13 Laughter
16:18 Ascent/Descent
21:13 Sacrifice
26:19 Laughter
29:23 Ascent/Descent
30:19 Marriage/Betrothal

ECCLESIASTES

1:2 Death, Fools/Folly,
3:4 Grieving/Lamentation, Music
7:6 Vanity/Vanitas
9:11 Laughter
Laughter
Fortune

SONG OF SOLOMON

4:12 Love and Death
6:10 Widowhood
8:10 Dawn/Dawning
Widowhood

ISAIAH

6:9-10 Judgment
11:1-9 Reading
11:6 Order/Chaos, Peace
11:6-9 Logos/Word, Music
14:12-21 Expulsion
28:24-29 Kiss/Kissing
30:33 Ascent/Descent
35:1 Virtue/Virtues
38:17 Peace
40:1-11 Reading
40:11 (Douai) Shepherds/Shepherdesses
45:7 Peace
48:18 Peace
58:8 Dawn/Dawning
60:1-3 Dawn/Dawning
60:17 Peace
60:19 Light I
62:8 Arms Raised

JEREMIAH

7 Judgment
7:29 Hair/Haircutting
7:31-33 Ascent/Descent
9:20 Grieving/Lamentation
10:2 Zodiac
12:1 Envy
31:15 Grieving/Lamentation
43:1-8 Abduction/Rape

LAMENTATIONS

1:2ff Destruction of City, Widowhood
Grieving/Lamentation

EZEKIEL

1:1-28 Fortune
1:5-14 Apocalypse
1:28 Light II
21:21 Automata
34:23 (Douai) Shepherds/Shepherdesses

DANIEL

5	Reading
5:17	Order/Chaos
6:32-34	Madness
7-12	Apocalypse
7:14	Order/Chaos
12:2	Order/Chaos
12:3	Order/Chaos
13	Voyeurism

HOSEA

3:2	Marriage/Betrothal
6:6	Sacrifice
8:5-6	Automata
13:2	Kiss/Kissing

AMOS

8:10	Grieving/Lamentation
------	----------------------

JONAH

Shipwreck

HABAKKUK

1	Envy
---	------

MALACHI

3:11	Judgment
------	----------

DECALOGUE

Virtue/Virtues

BIBLE: APOCRYPHAASCENSION

OF ISAIAH Music

BEL (Daniel 14)

1:7	Laughter
-----	----------

DANIEL

Adultery, Calumny, Temptation

33-39	Communion
-------	-----------

ENOCH

Expulsion

PROTOEVANGELIUM OF JAMES Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Light II, Virgin/Virginity

JUDITH

Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Justice

13:1-10	Sleep/Sleeping
---------	----------------

II MACCABEES

3:7-26	Expulsion
7	Virtue/Virtues
22-26	Expulsion

GOSPEL OFPSEUDO-*MATTHEW

Birth/Childbirth

GOSPEL OFNICODEMUS

Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight

SIRACH (Ecclesiastes)

21:20	Laughter
-------	----------

TOBIT

8:4-5	Journey/Flight
	Marriage/Betrothal

PSEUDEPIGRAPHIABOOK OF*ENOCH

Vices/Deadly Sins

BIBLE: NEW TESTAMENTMATTHEW

1:18-19	Vices/Deadly Sins
2:1-2	Marriage/Betrothal
2:1-12	Dawn/Dawning
2:1-66	Journey/Flight
2:11	Journey/Flight
2:18	Birth/Childbirth
3:13-17	Grieving/Lamentation
3:16	Baptism
4:1-11	Peace
7:1-5	Temptation
7:13	Judgment
8:22	Path/Road/Crossroads
8:23-27	Grieving/Lamentation
9:10-13	Sleep/Sleeping
9:12	Sacrifice
10:16	Sin/Sinning
13:3-8	Mirror/Reflection, Virtue/Virtues
13:38	Harvesting
13:38-39	Witchcraft/Sorcery
14:6-11	Harvesting
17:1-6	Dance/Dancers/Dancing
17:1-13	Metamorphosis
19:16	Ascent/Descent
19:22-23	Temptation
21:1-21	Temptation
21:12	Honor/Honoring
24:29-30	Expulsion
24:38	Order/Chaos
25:36	Marriage/Betrothal
26:21-26	Visiting/Visitation
26:23	Betrayal
26:26-29	Communion
26:36-46	Communion
27	Sleep/Sleeping
27:3-5	Crucifixion
27:33-56	Hanging
27:34	Grieving/Lamentation
27:46	Crucifixion
27:57-58	Abandonment
28:1	Grieving/Lamentation
28:19	Dawn/Dawning
	Communion

MARK

1:9-11	Baptism
1:13	Temptation
4:36-41	Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping
6:21-28	Dance/Dancers/Dancing
9:2-4	Metamorphosis
9:2-10	Ascent/Descent
11:1-10	Honor/Honoring
11:15-17	Expulsion

14:18-21	Betrayal	1:29	Sacrifice
14:22-24	Communion	2:14-15	Expulsion
14:30-31	Betrayal	3:14-15	Serpent's Bite
14:32-42	Sleep/Sleeping	3:15	Crucifixion
15	Crucifixion	3:16-17	Crucifixion
15:22-41	Grieving/Lamentation	4:10	Music
15:34	Abandonment	5:1-17	Bath/Bathing
15:39	Crucifixion	6	Communion
15:42-46	Grieving/Lamentation	6:31-33	Communion
25:31-46	Choice/Choosing	6:49-51	Communion
LUKE		7:12	Light I
1:15	Annunciation	7:24	Physiognomy
1:26-38	Annunciation	8:3-11	Adultery
1:27	Marriage/Betrothal	8:7-8	Sin/Sinning
1:39-56	Visiting/Visitation	8:12	Dawn/Dawning, Light II
1:68	Visiting/Visitation	10:9	Light I
1:78	Dawn/Dawning	10:11 (Douai)	Shepherds/Shepherdesses
2:6-7	Birth/Childbirth	10:11-18	Sacrifice
2:8-14	Annunciation	11:2	Hair/Haircutting
2:9	Arms Raised	12:1-8	Hair/Haircutting
2:21-50	Ascent/Descent	12:12-13	Honor/Honoring
2:23-24	Sacrifice	12:46	Light I
2:41-50	Ascent/Descent	13:21-30	Betrayal
3:21-22	Baptism	13:27	Communion
4:1-13	Temptation	14:6	Path/Road/Crossroads
4:16-20	Reading	16:20	Grieving/Lamentation
5:20	Sin/Sinning	19	Crucifixion
6:25	Laughter	19:17-37	Grieving/Lamentation
7:36-50	Bath/Bathing, Penitence/Repentance	19:19-22	Crucifixion
7:37-50	Hair/Haircutting	19:25-27	Grieving/Lamentation
7:38	Penitence/Repentance	19:26-27	Crucifixion
8:23-25	Sleep/Sleeping	19:28	Crucifixion
9:29-36	Ascent/Descent	19:30	Crucifixion
12:16-21	Judgment	19:37	Death
12:57	Judgment	19:38-40	Grieving/Lamentation
15:4 (Douai)	Shepherds/Shepherdesses	20:17	Ascent/Descent
15:11-32	Journey/Flight, Protestantism	ACTS
16:19-31	Avarice, Damned Souls, Judgment	1:8	Sin/Sinning
18:23	Temptation	1:9	Martyrdom
18:25	Temptation	1:18	Ascent/Descent
19:29-38	Honor/Honoring	1:22	Hanging
19:44	Visiting/Visitation	2:1-4	Martyrdom
19:45-46	Expulsion	7:41	Ecstasy
20:46-47	Devotion/Piety	7:54-60	Automata
22:14-23	Communion	8:9-24	Martyrdom
22:21-23	Betrayal	10-11	Witchcraft/Sorcery
22:39-46	Sleep/Sleeping	27	Baptism
22:61	Dawn/Dawning	ROMANS
23	Crucifixion	6:6-8	Crucifixion
23:33-49	Grieving/Lamentation	8:13	Grieving/Lamentation
23:34	Crucifixion	8:22	Virtue/Virtues
23:37	Grieving/Lamentation	8:28	Virtue/Virtues
23:43	Crucifixion	11:24	Peace
23:46	Crucifixion	12:1-2	Sacrifice
23:47	Crucifixion	I CORINTHIANS
23:50-54	Grieving/Lamentation	2:2	Crucifixion
JOHN		2:9	Virtue/Virtues
1:1	Logos/Word	3:16-17	Kiss/Kissing

- | | | | |
|--|---|-------------------------------------|--|
| 6:19 | Kiss/Kissing | 6:1-8 (Four Horsemen) | Apocalypse |
| 7:8 | Widowhood | 6:9 (Martyrs) | Martyrdom |
| 8:3 | Virtue/Virtues | 7:14-17 (White Robes of Martyrs) | Martyrdom |
| 9:10 | Labor/Trades/Occupations | 7:9-17 (Adoration of the Lamb) | Apocalypse |
| 10:3 | Communion | 11 (Two Witnesses) | Apocalypse |
| 10:4-5 | Communion | 12:7-9 (Fall of the Rebel Angels) | Expulsion |
| 10:21 | Witchcraft/Sorcery | 12:1-2 (Woman Clothed with the Sun) | Apocalypse |
| 11:5-6 | Hair/Haircutting | 12:1-13 (Maria in Sole) | Music |
| 11:17-34 | Virtue/Virtues | 12:7-9 (Fall of the Rebel Angels) | Journey/Flight |
| 11:23-26 | Communion, Devotion/Piety | 12-13 (Seven Headed Beast) | Apocalypse |
| 11:29 | Communion | 14:1 (Christ as Lamb) | Sacrifice |
| 13 | Virtue/Virtues | 15 (Celestial Choir of Angels) | Music |
| 13:12 | Mirror/Reflection | 15:2-4 (Victory over the Beast) | Music |
| 13:13 | Virtue/Virtues | 17 (Whore of Babylon) | Apocalypse |
| 15:42-49 | Metamorphosis | 20:12-15 | Damned Souls |
| 25:35-37 | Virtue/Virtues | 21 (Heavenly Jerusalem) | Apocalypse |
| II CORINTHIANS | | 21:8 | Damned Souls |
| 7:10 | Melancholy | 22:16 | Dawn/Dawning |
| 11:25 | Shipwreck | BOOK OF WISDOM | |
| GALATIANS | | 7:26 | Mirror/Reflection |
| 5:24 | Crucifixion | ISLAMIC TEXTS | |
| 6:14 | Crucifixion | KORAN | |
| EPHESIANS | | IV:170-172 | Judgment, Light I, Logos/Word, Sanctuary |
| 6:24 | Virtue/Virtues | XIV:32 | Logos/Word |
| PHILIPPIANS | | XVII | Light I |
| 1:9 | Judgment | XXIV:36-37 | Ascent/Descent |
| 4:7 | Vices/Deadly Sins | Surat an-Nur | Light I, Logos/Word |
| I TIMOTHY | | Surat ar-Rahman | Light I |
| 5:3-16 | Widowhood | OTHER RELIGIOUS TEXTS | |
| 6:7-10 | Temptation | BHAGAVAD GITA | |
| 6:10 | Avarice, Money | (Hindu) | Sanctuary |
| HEBREWS | | TANAKH (Jewish) | |
| 6:18-19 | Virtue/Virtues | Judaism | |
| 7 | Communion | | |
| 9:26 | Sacrifice | | |
| 11:17 | Virtue/Virtues | | |
| 12:15-16 | Sacrifice | | |
| JAMES | | | |
| 1:10 | Virtue/Virtues | | |
| 11:17 | Virtue/Virtues | | |
| II PETER | | | |
| 1:19 | Dawn/Dawning | | |
| I JOHN | | | |
| 4:8 | Virtue/Virtues | | |
| REVELATION | | | |
| | Apocalypse, Birth/Childbirth, Patronage, Plague/Pestilence, Vices/Deadly Sins | | |
| 2:28 | Dawn/Dawning | | |
| 4:3 | Light II | | |
| 5-8 (Opening of the Seven Seals) | Apocalypse, Music | | |
| 5:11 (Angels Singing the Lord's Glory) | Music | | |

INDEX OF OTHER CULTURES, RELIGIONS, AND MYTHOLOGIES

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index or to other indexes where primary information can be found. See also citations refer the reader to other terms within the index or to other indexes where additional information can be found.

ABD AL-MALIK, Caliph (MUSLIM), Sanctuary
 ABRAHAM (ISLAM), Offering
 ADKA (Feast of the Sacrifice, ISLAM), Offering AEI, PLAIN OF (CELTIC), Judgment
 AHRIMAN (ZOROASTRIANISM), Expulsion
 AMAIRGEN (CELTIC), Judgment
 AMATERASU (JAPANESE), Laughter
 AME-NO-UZUME (JAPANESE), Laughter
 AMESHAS (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment
 AMINA (ISLAM), Birth/Childbirth
 ANGKOR WAT (CAMBODIA), Sanctuary
 ASGARD (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
 AVALOKITESHVARA-PADAMAPANI (BUDDHIST),
 Grieving/Lamentation
 AVENUE OF THE DEAD (AZTEC), Sanctuary

BHAGAVAD GITA (HINDU), Sanctuary
 BHAKTI (BUDDHIST), Gaze
 BLUE JAY (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 BRAHMA/BRAHMAN(S) (HINDU), Sanctuary, Whiteness
 BRICRIU NEMTHENGA (CELTIC), Judgment
 BUDDHA, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Gaze, Journey/Flight
 BUDDHISM, Annunciation, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent,
 Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Ecstasy, Gaze,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Laughter,
 Sanctuary, Temptation

BURQA (ISLAM), Ascent/Descent

CELTIC, Toilet Scenes
 CENTÉOTI (AZTEC), Birth/Childbirth
 CESOK-BUDDAH (BUDDHIST), Ecstasy
 CHINVAT BRIDGE (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment
 COATLICUE (AZTEC), Self-Portraits II
 CONFUCIUS, Whiteness
 CONNACHT (CELTIC), Judgment
 COYOTE (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 CUAILGNE (CELTIC), Judgment

DAO see TAO
 DEVAS (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment
 DODOTH (AFRICAN), Ecstasy
 DRUIDS, Judgment, Light II
 DUSAHK (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment

EASTER ISLAND (POLYNESIAN), Sanctuary
 EREMON (CELTIC), Judgment
 ESKIMO see INUIT
 EVENKI (INUIT), Ecstasy

FORSETI (NORSE GOD OF JUSTICE), Judgment

GA WREE-WRE (AFRICAN: DAN), Judgment
 GEHENNA (ISLAM), Ascent/Descent

GNOSTICISM, Serpent's Bite
 GOBBO (FOLK), Evil Eye
 GREAT SPIRIT (NATIVE AMERICAN), Dawn/Dawning
 GREAT ZIMBABWE (SHONA), Sanctuary

HARAM (ISLAM), Sanctuary
 HINA-NUI-TE-PO (POLYNESIAN), Laughter
 HINDUISM, Ascent/Descent, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Ecstasy, Sanctuary, Temptation, Widowhood,
 Zodiac
 HOLDA (GERMANIC LEGEND), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HOPI (NATIVE AMERICAN), Seasons
 HOTEI (JAPANESE), Laughter

IATIKU/IYATIKU (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 IDUNN (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
 INUIT, Sport
 ISLAM/ISLAMIC, Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Judaism,
 Judgment, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word, Melancholy, Offering, Sanctuary, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Voyeurism,
 Zodiac

JAIN, Ascent/Descent
 JERUSALEM, MOSQUE OF, Ascent/Descent

KAABA/KA'ABA/KA'BA (ISLAM), Offering, Sanctuary
 KAGURA (JAPANESE), Laughter
 KALI (HINDU), Toilet Scenes
 KAMBUTSU (JAPANESE RITUAL), Baptism
 KARMA (HINDU), Sanctuary
 KORAN see Index of References to the Bible and Other Sacred Books
 KOSHARE (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 KUDALINI (TANTRISM), Ecstasy
 KUKAI (JAPANESE BUDDHISM), Journey/Flight

LANKA (HINDU), Abduction/Rape
 LARA (SPANISH FOLK TALE), Birth/Childbirth
 LEYEK (BALI), Birth/Childbirth
 LOKI (NORSE), Abduction/Rape, Laughter

MAHOMET see MUHAMMAD
 MAHAYANA BUDDHA (BUDDHIST),
 Grieving/Lamentation
 MANICEAN, Widowhood
 MANU (HINDU), Dawn/Dawning
 MARA/MAERE (TEUTONIC), Nightmare
 MAUI/MOWEE (POLYNESIAN), Laughter
 MAYA, QUEEN (BUDDHIST), Annunciation, Baptism,
 Birth/Childbirth
 MBIRE (SHONA), Sanctuary
 MECCA (ISLAM), Ascent/Descent, Light I
 MESHA (ZOROASTRIANISM), Expulsion
 MESHYAMA (ZOROASTRIANISM), Expulsion
 MICHABO, GREAT HARE (NATIVE AMERICAN),
 Dawn/Dawning
 MIDRASH TANHUNA (ISLAM), Offering MIHRAB (ISLAM), Light I
 MINK (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter

MITHRA(S) (MITHRAISM; ZOROASTRIANISM), see Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts
 MITHRAISM, Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
 MITHUNA (HINDU), Kiss/Kissing
 MIZAB (ISLAM), Sanctuary
 MOHAMMED see MUHAMMAD
 MONOMOTAPA (SHONA), Sanctuary
 MOUNT FUJI (JAPANESE BUDDHISM), Ascent/Descent,
 Seasons
 MOUNT MERU (BUDDHIST, HINDU, JAIN),
 Ascent/Descent
 MUKAI (JAPANESE BUDDHISM), Journey/Flight
 MUHAMMAD (MAHOMET; MOHAMMED) (ISLAM), Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Judgment, Sanctuary,
 Whiteness
 MUKARNAS (ISLAM), Light I
 MULLA NASRUDDIN (ISLAM), Laughter MUSLIM see ISLAM/ISLAMIC MWARI (SHONA), Sanctuary

NATIVE AMERICAN CHURCH, Ecstasy
 NIAV/NIAMH (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
 NIRVANA (BUDDHIST), Grieving/Lamentation

ODIN (NORSE), Hanging
 OSSIAN/OISIN (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
 OUROBOROS (GNOSTIC), Serpent's Bite

PEYOTE CEREMONIES (NATIVE AMERICAN), Ecstasy
 PHNOM PENH (CAMBODIA), Sanctuary
 PROPHET (ISLAM), Light I, Offering

QIBLA (ISLAM), Light I
 QUETZALCOATL (AZTEC), Sanctuary

RABBIT (AFRICAN; NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 RAGNAROK (NORSE), Judgment
 RAMA (HINDU), Abduction/Rape
 RASHNU (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment
 RAVANA (HINDU), Abduction/Rape
 RAVEN (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
 RIG-VEDA (HINDU), Order/Chaos
 RUDABE, QUEEN (PERSIAN), Birth/Childbirth
 RUSTAND (PERSIAN), Birth/Childbirth

SALAS (SPANISH FOLK TALE), Birth/Childbirth
 SENECA (NATIVE AMERICAN), Seasons
 SEPHIROTH TREE, Ascent/Descent
 SHAKTI (HINDU), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 SHICHI FUKUIN (JAPANESE BUDDHISM), Laughter
 SHIKOKU (JAPANESE BUDDHISM), Journey/Flight
 SHIVA (HINDU) (see also SIVA MAHADEVA),
 Abduction/Rape, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Sanctuary
 SHIVA NATARAJA (HINDU), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 SIDDHARTHA GAUTAMA (BUDDHIST), Birth/Childbirth, Sanctuary
 SILBURY HILL, Pregnancy
 SITA (HINDU), Abduction/Rape
 SIVA see SHIVA

SIVA MAHADEVA (HINDU), Ecstasy
SKADI (NORSE), Laughter
SKANDA (HINDU), Abduction/Rape
SPIDER (AFRICAN: ANANSI), Laughter
SRAOSHA (ZOROASTRIANISM), Judgment
STONEHENGE, Sanctuary
STUPA (BUDDHIST), Sanctuary
SUDDHODHANA, KING (BUDDHIST), Baptism,
 Birth/Childbirth
SUN DANCE (NATIVE AMERICAN), Ecstasy
SURAH (ISLAM), Offering
SURYA (HINDU), Dawn/Dawning
SURYAVARMA II (CAMBODIA), Sanctuary

TANTRISM, Ecstasy
TAO (TAOIST), Order/Chaos, Seasons
TAO-TE CHING (TAOIST), Order/Chaos
TARA (DIVINE COMPASSION) (BUDDHIST),
 Grieving/Lamentation
TAUROCTONY (MITHRAISM), Evil Eye
TENOCHTITLÁN (AZTEC), Zodiac
TEOTIHUACÁN (AZTEC), Sanctuary
THIAZI (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
THRYMHEIM (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
TIR NAN OG (CELTIC), Abduction/Rape
TLALOC (AZTEC), Pregnancy

TLAZOLTÉOTI (AZTEC), Birth/Childbirth
TUVWOTS (NATIVE AMERICAN: UTE), Laughter

UPANISHADS (HINDU), Ascent/Descent
URETSETE/UTSHTSITI (NATIVE AMERICAN), Laughter
USHAS (HINDU SUN GODDESS), Dawn/Dawning

VISHNU (HINDU), Sanctuary
VISION QUEST (NATIVE AMERICAN), Ecstasy
VIVASVAT (HINDU RISING SUN), Dawn/Dawning
VOODOO CULTS, Sacrifice

WAKDJUNKAGA (NATIVE AMERICAN: WINNEBAGO),
 Laughter

XOLOTI (AZTEC), Laughter

YAKSHAS/YAKSHIS, Sanctuary
YAKUB/JACOB (ISLAM), Offering
YGGDRASIL (NORSE), Ascent/Descent
YIN/YANG (CHINESE), Zodiac
YOMA (HINDU LORD OF DEATH), Damned Souls
YOMI, LAND OF GLOOM (JAPANESE), Bath/Bathing
YUSUF/JOSEPH (ISLAM), Offering

ZOROASTRIANISM, Expulsion, Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
ZUHRA FAMILY (ISLAM), Birth/Childbirth

INDEX OF ARTISTS AND WORKS OF ART

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index where primary information can be found.

ANONYMOUS ART

African architecture, Sanctuary
African masks, sculpture, and reliefs, Birth/Childbirth, Ecstasy, Judgment, Masks/Personae,
Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy
Assyrian clay tablets, Dreams/Visions
Assyrian sculpture and reliefs, Ascent/Descent,
Death, Destruction of City, Devotion/Piety,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Sport
Australian Aborigine painting, Birth/Childbirth
Aztec architecture, Sanctuary
Aztec codices, Path/Road/Crossroads
Aztec sculpture and reliefs, Birth/Childbirth, Zodiac Babylonian sculpture and reliefs, Devotion/Piety, Gaze,
Justice
Balinese sculpture and reliefs, Birth/Childbirth
Baroque prints, Sleep/Sleeping
Baroque sculpture, Penitence/Repentance
Buddhist architecture, India, Sanctuary
Buddhist sculpture, China, Arms Raised
Buddhist sculpture, India, Annunciation, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Gaze
Buddhist sculpture, Japan, Birth/Childbirth
Buddhist sculpture, Korea, Arms Raised
Buddhist sculpture, Nepal, Arms Raised,
Birth/Childbirth, Kiss/Kissing

Byzantine ivories, Crucifixion, Death,
Grieving/Lamentation
Byzantine manuscript illumination, Communion,
Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation,
Journey/Flight, Months
Byzantine metalwork, Communion
Byzantine mosaics, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent,
Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth,
Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Death,
Drunkenness/Intoxication, Grieving/Lamentation,
Judgment, Light I, Light II, Martyrdom,
Order/Chaos, Patronage, Sanctuary,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virgin/Virginity
Byzantine panel painting, Crucifixion, Gaze, Light I,
Path/Road/Crossroads
Byzantine sculpture and reliefs, Devotion/Piety,
Pregnancy
Byzantine wall painting, Grieving/Lamentation,
Offering
Cambodian sculpture and relief, Sin/Sinning
Canaanite metalwork, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
Carolingian manuscripts, Labor/Trades/Occupations
Carolingian-Ottonian sculpture and reliefs,
Devotion/Piety
Celtic metalwork, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Toilet Scenes
Chinese bamboo carving, Laughter
Chinese landscape gardening, Seasons

- Chinese painting, Communion, Seasons
 Chinese pottery, Laughter
 Cretan sculpture and reliefs, Adultery, Zodiac
 Cycladic figurines, Naked/Nude Dutch prints, Birth/Childbirth
 Dutch sculpture, Birth/Childbirth
 Early Christian ivories, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Death
 Early Christian lamps, Shipwreck
 Early Christian manuscript illumination, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Virtue/Virtues
 Early Christian metalwork, Light I, Toilet Scenes
 Early Christian mosaics and inlay, Abduction/Rape, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Light I, Logos/Word, Martyrdom, Offering, Seasons
 Early Christian pottery, Light I
 Early Christian sculpture and reliefs, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Communion, Crucifixion, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Light I, Logos/Word, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Shipwreck, Virgin/Virginity, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Early Christian seals, Crucifixion, Shipwreck
 Early Christian terra-cottas, Judgment
 Early Christian wall painting, Adultery, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Sanctuary, Sacrifice, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning
 Egyptian architecture, Sanctuary, Zodiac
 Egyptian coins, Labyrinth/Maze
 Egyptian gems, Labyrinth/Maze
 Egyptian hieroglyphics, Caricature/Cartoon
 Egyptian ivories, Pregnancy
 Egyptian metalwork, Toilet Scenes
 Egyptian painting, Toilet Scenes
 Egyptian papyrus, Arms Raised, Damned Souls, Dreams/Visions, Funeral/Burial, Judgment, Toilet Scenes
 Egyptian pottery, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 Egyptian sculpture and reliefs, Apotheosis/Deification, Baptism, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Dawn/Dawning, Destruction of City, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Luxury, Melancholy, Misfortune, Night, Peasantry, Reading, Toilet Scenes, Zodiac
 Egyptian wall painting, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Self-Portraits I, Zodiac
 Eighteenth-century metalwork, Communion
 Eighteenth-century pottery/porcelain, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 Eighteenth-century prints, Months
 Eighteenth-century sculpture, Pregnancy
 Ethiopian manuscripts, Birth/Childbirth
 Etruscan metalwork, Pregnancy
 Etruscan sculpture and reliefs, Abandonment, Arms Raised, Gaze, Kiss/Kissing, Visiting/Visitation
 Etruscan vase painting, Abandonment, Journey/Flight
 Etruscan wall paintings, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Evil Eye
 Flemish prints, Hanging
 French prints, Birth/Childbirth
 French tapestries, Journey/Flight
 German prints, Birth/Childbirth, Judgment Gothic see Medieval Greek architecture, Sanctuary
 Greek coins, Apotheosis/Deification, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Labyrinth/Maze
 Greek gems, Labyrinth/Maze, Melancholy
 Greek ivories, Choice/Choosing
 Greek metalwork, Adultery, Evil Eye, Light I, Luxury, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection
 Greek mosaics, Comic, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Music
 Greek sculpture and reliefs, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Excess, Fatal Woman/ Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Harvesting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Love and Death, Luxury, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Months, Naked/Nude, Offering, Patronage, Peasantry, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 Greek terra-cottas, Abduction/Rape, Beheading/Decapitation, Comic, Evil Eye, Grieving/Lamentation, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Masks/Personae, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity
 Greek vase painting, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Funeral/Burial, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Night, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Greek wall painting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Music
 Hindu architecture, Cambodia, Sanctuary
 Hindu manuscript illumination, Abduction/Rape
 Hindu sculpture (India), Damned Souls,

- Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning, Ecstasy, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Kiss/Kissing, Light I,
 Naked/Nude
 Huichol painting (Mexico), Birth/Childbirth
 Iberian sculpture and reliefs, Kiss/Kissing
 Indian architecture, Zodiac
 Indian sculpture and reliefs, Zodiac
 Indian textiles, Offering
 Islamic architecture, Light I, Logos/Word, Luxury, Offering, Sanctuary
 Islamic art, Offering
 Islamic glass, Light I
 Islamic manuscripts, Birth/Childbirth, Hunting/Hunter/
 Huntress, Judaism, Sanctuary, Sport
 Islamic metalwork, Judaism
 Islamic mosaics, tilework, and inlay, Light I,
 Logos/Word, Offering
 Islamic textiles, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judaism
 Italian mosaics, Birth/Childbirth
 Italian pottery, Love and Death, Zodiac
 Italian prints, Birth/Childbirth
 Italian wall paintings, Birth/Childbirth
 Japanese fan painting, Pregnancy
 Japanese landscape gardening, Seasons
 Japanese painting, Destruction of City, Seasons
 Japanese prints, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy
 Jewish art, Judaism, Light I, Offering, Sanctuary, Zodiac
 Korean paintings, Ecstasy
 Luristan metalwork, Birth/Childbirth
 Mayan pottery, Sport
 Medieval architecture, Martyrdom, Patronage,
 Sanctuary, Zodiac
 Medieval drawings, Birth/Childbirth
 Medieval embroideries, Margins/Outsiders
 Medieval ivories, Adultery, Apocalypse,
 Choice/Choosing, Funeral/Burial,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Madness, Melancholy,
 Pregnancy, Zodiac
 Medieval manuscript illumination, Abandonment,
 Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Annunciation,
 Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Avarice,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Communion,
 Dawn/Dawning, Death, Dreams/Visions,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Fools/Folly,
 Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation,
 Harvesting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Honor/Honoring, Humors,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity,
 Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Justice,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze,
 Laughter, Light I, Madness, Margins/Outsiders,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Melancholy,
 Money, Months, Music, Night, Nightmare,
 Order/Chaos, Patronage, Peasantry, Pregnancy,
 Reading, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning,
 Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism,
 Zodiac
 Medieval metalwork, Communion, Crucifixion,
 Naked/Nude, Offering, Sanctuary, Virgin/Virginity
 Medieval mosaics, Annunciation, Baptism,
 Birth/Childbirth, Communion, Damned Souls,
 Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Order/Chaos, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 Medieval panel painting, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Communion
 Medieval sculpture and reliefs, Abduction/Rape,
 Adultery, Baptism, Apocalypse, Avarice, Betrayal,
 Choice/Choosing, Communion, Crucifixion,
 Damned Souls, Death, Expulsion, Fools/Folly,
 Funeral/Burial, Hanging, Harvesting,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring,
 Journey/Flight, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Months, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos,
 Peasantry, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Sacrifice,
 Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation,
 Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Visiting/Visitation, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 Medieval stained glass, Avarice, Ecstasy, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring, Justice,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Zodiac
 Medieval stone engraving, Labyrinth/Maze
 Medieval tapestries, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 Medieval wall painting, Avarice, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Grieving/Lamentation,
 Honor/Honoring, Humors,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Margins/Outsiders, Pregnancy, Sanctuary
 Medieval wood carving, Comic, Crucifixion,
 Labyrinth/Maze
 Medieval woodcuts, Betrayal, Death, Months,
 Order/Chaos
 Mesopotamian seals, Damned Souls
 Mesopotamian terra-cottas, Damned Souls
 Minoan sculpture and reliefs, Arms Raised Minoan vase painting, Laughter
 Minoan wall painting, Sport
 Mycenaean terra-cottas, Grieving/Lamentation
 Mycenaean paintings, Grieving/Lamentation
 Native American masks and sculpture,
 Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude
 Neolithic architecture, Light II
 Neolithic sculpture and reliefs, Birth/Childbirth,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Pregnancy, Sanctuary
 New Guinea pottery, Laughter
 Nineteenth-century glass, Adultery, Labyrinth/Maze Nineteenth-century prints and graphics, Judgment,
 Months, Pregnancy
 Paleolithic sculpture and reliefs, Abundance,
 Birth/Childbirth, Gaze, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy
 Paleolithic cave painting, Death,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Reading, Sanctuary
 Persian manuscript illumination, Ascent/Descent,
 Birth/Childbirth, Voyeurism
 Philistine terra-cottas, Grieving/Lamentation
 Phoenician terra-cottas, Laughter
 Polynesian art, Naked/Nude, Sanctuary

- Portuguese prints, Communion
 Pre-Columbian sculpture, Sport
 Renaissance architecture, Abandonment, Luxury, Martyrdom
 Renaissance Cassone panels, Adultery, Marriage/Betrothal
 Renaissance drawings, Pregnancy
 Renaissance embroidery, Communion
 Renaissance gardens, Automata
 Renaissance ivories, Vanity/Vanitas
 Renaissance majolica, Adultery, Birth/Childbirth
 Renaissance manuscript illumination, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Birth/Childbirth, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Fools/Folly, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Peasantry, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Zodiac
 Renaissance metalwork, Adultery
 Renaissance oil and panel painting, Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Plague/Pestilence, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness Renaissance playing cards, Fools/Folly, Judgment, Peasantry, Virtue/Virtues Renaissance prints, Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Judgment, Mirror/Reflection, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 Renaissance sculpture and reliefs, Grieving/Lamentation, Humors, Pregnancy Renaissance tapestries, Apocalypse, Fame, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peace, Peasantry, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Renaissance wall paintings, Death, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Marriage/Betrothal, Zodiac Renaissance wood carving, Birth/Childbirth, Margins/Outsiders
 Renaissance woodcuts, Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Death, Dreams/Visions, Humors, Madness, Months, Music, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Zodiac
 Roman architecture, Honor/Honoring, Patronage, Sanctuary
 Roman cameos, Apotheosis/Deification
 Roman graffiti, Caricature/Cartoon
 Roman glass, Ecstasy
 Roman ivories, Birth/Childbirth
 Roman metalwork, Automata, Luxury, Voyeurism
 Roman mosaics, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Madness, Months, Music, Offering, Seasons, Zodiac
 Roman sculpture and reliefs, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Love and Death, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Serpent's Bite, Seasons, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 Roman wall painting, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Journey/Flight, Light I, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Music, Offering, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 Romanesque manuscript illumination, Apocalypse, Ecstasy, Envy, Funeral/Burial, Madness, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
 Romanesque sculpture and reliefs, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Damned Souls, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Fame, Funeral/Burial, Margins/Outsiders, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
 Romanesque wall painting, Ascent/Descent, Margins/Outsiders, Night, Offering Seventeenth-century engraving, Ascent/Descent, Sleep/Sleeping
 Seventeenth-century metalwork, Communion, Destruction of City
 Seventeenth-century painting, Communion
 Seventeenth-century sculpture, Avarice, Pregnancy
 Seventeenth-century tapestry, Journey/Flight
 South Italian vase painting, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 Sumerian clay tablets, Reading
 Swabian wood carving, Birth/Childbirth
 Syrio-Palestinian ivories, Devotion/Piety
 Timurid miniatures, Voyeurism
 Twentieth-century film, Artists/Art, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 Twentieth-century mural painting, Ascent/Descent
 Twentieth-century posters, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning, Sport
 Twentieth-century printing, Ascent/Descent, Months
 Twentieth-century sculpture, Labyrinth/Maze
 Twentieth-century theater, Automata
 Twentieth-century woodworking, Communion
- AACHEN, HANS VAN (German painter, 1552–1615), Judgment
 ABBATE, NICCOLÒ DELL' (Italian painter, circa 1512–1571), Abduction/Rape
 ACHELOUS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 6th century B.C.), Damned Souls
 ACHILLES PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 450–420 B.C.), Abandonment, Music

- AELST, PIETER VAN see COECKE VAN AELST, PIETER I
AERTSEN, PIETER (Early Netherlandish painter, 1508–1575), Excess, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Peasantry
AGESANDROS OF RHODES (Greek sculptor, late 2nd–early 1st century B.C.), Journey/Flight
AGOSTINO DI DUCCIO (Italian sculptor, architect, 1418–1481?), Imagination/Creativity
AGOSTINO VENEZIANO see MUSI, AGOSTINO
AKONADORUS (Greek sculptor, late 2nd–early 1st century B.C.), Journey/Flight
ALAUZ, JEAN (LE ROMAIN) (French painter, 1786–1864), Imagination/Creativity
ALBANI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1578–1660), Abduction/Rape, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Metamorphosis, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
ALBERTINELLI, MARIOTTO (Italian painter, 1474–1515), Offering, Sacrifice
ALCIATI, ANDREAS see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
ALDEGREVER, HEINRICH (German painter, draftsman, designer, printmaker, goldsmith, 1502–circa 1560), Bath/Bathing, Betrayal
ALGARDI, ALESSANDRO (Italian sculptor, architect, 1595/1601–1654), Sleep/Sleeping
ALKEN, HENRY (British artist, 1774–1815), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
ALLAR, ANDRÉ-JOSEPH (French sculptor, 1845–1926), Love and Death, Madness
ALLORI, ALESSANDRO (Italian painter, 1535–1607), Adultery, Honor/Honoring, Sacrifice, Shipwreck, Visiting/Visitation
ALLORI, CRISTOFANO (Italian painter, 1577–1621), Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
ALLSTON, WASHINGTON (American painter, 1779–1843), Night, Reading, Witchcraft/Sorcery
ALMA-TADEMA, LAWRENCE (Dutch painter in Great Britain, 1831–1912), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Reading
ALSLOOT, DENIS VAN (Flemish painter, active 1599–1628), Humors
ALT, JAKOB (German painter, draftsman, 1789–1872), Mirror/Reflection
ALTDORFER, ALBRECHT (German painter, printmaker, circa 1480–1538), Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Dawn/Dawning, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Night, Visiting/Visitation
ALTFORFER, ERHARD (German painter, architect, printmaker, circa 1485–circa 1562), Sin/Sinning
AMAN-JEAN, EDMOND-FRANÇOIS (French painter, 1858–1936), Imagination/Creativity
AMASIS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 560–515 B.C.), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Labor/Trades/Occupations
AMBERGER, CHRISTOPH (German painter, circa 1505–1561/62), Peasantry
AM ENDE, HAND (German painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1864–1918), Dawn/Dawning
AMIENS SCHOOL (French painters, mid-15th century), Pregnancy
AMMAN, JOST (Swiss painter, printmaker, in Germany, 1539–1591), Fools/Folly, Months
AMSTEL, JAN VAN (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1500–before 1544), Journey/Flight
AMULIUS (FAMULUS) (Roman painter, early first century A.D.), Gaze
ANDERSON, SOPHIE (British artist, 1823–circa 1898), Abandonment
ANDREA DA FIRENZE (Italian artist, active circa 1427–1447), Fame, Virtue/Virtues
ANDREA DEL SARTO (Italian painter, 1486–1538), Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Fame, Hanging, Judgment, Justice, Sacrifice, Virtue/Virtues
ANDREA DI BARTOLO (Italian painter, active 1389, died 1428), Annunciation
ANDREA DI BONAIUTO (ANDREA DA FIRENZE) (Italian painter, active 1343, died circa 1388), Journey/Flight
ANGELI, HEINRICH VON (Austrian painter, 1840–1925), Penitence/Repentance
ANGELICO, FRA (Italian painter, 1387–1455), Abduction/Rape, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Martyrdom, Music, Pregnancy, Sleep/Sleeping, Visiting/Visitation
ANGUISSOLA, SOFONISBA (Italian painter, circa 1527/32–1625/26), Self-Portraits II
ANSCHUTZ, THOMAS POLLACK (American painter, 1851–1912), Labor/Trades/Occupations
ANTHEMIUS OF TRALLES (Carian architect, 6th century), Sanctuary
ANTHONISZ., CORNELISZ (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, cartographer, circa 1499–1553), Journey/Flight, Misfortune, Protestantism
ANTICO (PIER JACOPO ALARI BONACOLSI) (Italian sculptor, medalist, circa 1460–1528), Naked/Nude ANTIPILOS (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Calumny, Comic ANTONAKOS, STEPHEN (American sculptor, born 1926), Light II
ANTONELLO DA MESSINA (Italian painter, circa 1430–circa 1479), Pregnancy, Reading
ANTONIANOS OF APHORDISIAS (Greek sculptor, 2nd century B.C., 2nd quarter), Apotheosis/Deification
ANTONIO VENEZIANO (Italian painter, active 1369–circa 1419), Bath/Bathing
APELLES (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Comic, Envy, Fame, Imagination/Creativity, Peace, Physiognomy
APOLLODOROS OF DAMASCUS (Syrian architect, engineer, in Rome, circa A.D. 50–130), Honor/Honoring APOLLODORUS (Greek painter, flourished circa 415 B.C.), Artists/Art
APOLLONIO DI GIOVANNI DI TOMMASO (Italian illuminator, painter, 1415/17–1465), Abduction/Rape,

- Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal
 APOLLONIOS OF ATHENS (Greek sculptor, 1st century B.C.), Sport
 ARCHELAOS OF PRIENE (Greek sculptor, 2nd century B.C.), Apotheosis/Deification, Devotion/Piety
 ARCHIPENKO, ALEXANDRO (Russian sculptor, painter in the United States, 1887–1964), Sport
 ARCIMBOLDI, GIUSEPPE (Italian artist, 1527?–1593), Caricature/Cartoon, Laughter
 ARISTIDES OF THEBES (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Destruction of City
 ARMSTRONG, THOMAS (British painter, 1835–1911), Mirror/Reflection
 ARNTZ, GERD (German artist, 20th century), Hanging
 ARP, JEAN (HANS) (French sculptor, painter, printmaker, poet, 1887–1966), Order/Chaos
 ARPINO, CAVALIER D' see CESARE, GIUSEPPE (CAVALIER D'ARPINO)
 ASPERTINI, AMICO (Italian painter, circa 1475–1552), Love and Death
 ASTEAS (Greek vase painter, 3rd century B.C.), Comic ATGET, JEAN-EUGÈNE-AUGUSTE (French photographer, 1856–1927), Automata
 AUDRAN, BENOIT, THE ELDER (French artist, 1661–1721), Pointing/Indicating AURORA PAINTER (Etruscan, Faliscan vase painter, active circa 340), Dawn/Dawning
 AVED, JACQUES-ANDRÉ-JOSEPH-CAMELOT (French painter, 1702–1766), Female Beauty and Adornment
 AVERLINO, ANTONIO see FILARETE
 BABUREN, DIRCK VAN (Dutch painter, 1590/95–1624), Misfortune, Music, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 BACICCIO see GAULLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (BACICCIO)
 BACKER, JACOB ADRIAENSZ. (Dutch painter, 1608–1651), Betrayal
 BACON, FRANCIS (British painter, 1909–1992), Crucifixion
 BACON, JOHN HENRY FREDERICK (British painter, 1868–1914), Marriage/Betrothal
 BACON, JOHN II (British sculptor, 1777–1859), Funeral/Burial
 BADALOCCHIO, SISTO (Italian painter, printmaker, 1581/85–1647), Calumny
 BAILLY, DAVID (Dutch painter, draftsman, 1584–1657), Vanity/Vanitas
 BALDOVINETTI, ALESSO (Italian painter, 1425–1499), Pregnancy
 BALDUNG, HANS (HANS BALDUNG GRIEN) (German painter, printmaker, 1484/85–1545), Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Nightmare, Physiognomy, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 BALLA, GIACOMO (Italian painter, 1871/74–1958), Pointing/Indicating BAMBOCCianti (painters of scenes of everyday life in Rome, 17th century), Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry
 BANDINELLI, BACCIO (Italian sculptor, 1493–1560), Serpent's Bite
 BANKS, THOMAS (British sculptor, 1735–1805), Grieving/Lamentation, Virtue/Virtues
 BARBIERE, DOMENICO DEL see DOMENICO FIORENTINO (DOMENICO RICOVERI)
 BARLACH, ERNST (German painter, printmaker, 1870–1938), Devotion/Piety, Madness, Peasantry
 BARNA DA SIENA (Italian painter, active circa 1350–1355), Betrayal
 BAROCCI, FEDERICO (Italian painter, printmaker, circa 1535–1612), Journey/Flight, Reading
 BARRY, JAMES (Irish painter, 1741–1806), Love and Death, Patronage
 BARTOLOMEO DI BARTOLI (Italian scribe, active 1374), Virtue/Virtues
 BARTOLOMEO, FRA (Italian painter, 1472–1517), Dreams/Visions
 BARTOLOZZI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, printmaker, circa 1727–1815), Seasons
 BARY, HENDRICK (Dutch artist, 1640–1707), Sleep/Sleeping
 BARYE, ANTOINE-LOUIS (French sculptor, painter, goldsmith, 1796–1875), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 BASELITZ, GEORG (German painter, printmaker, born 1938), Upside Down
 BASKIN, LEONARD (American sculptor, printmaker, born 1922), Hanging, Judaism
 BASSANO, FRANCESCO I (FRANCESCO I DA PONTE) (Italian painter, 1470/75–circa 1541), Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing
 BASSANO, FRANCESCO II (FRANCESCO II DA PONTE) (Italian painter, 1549–1592), Hair/Haircutting, Imagination/Creativity, Peasantry
 BASSANO, JACOPO (JACOPO DA PONTE) (Italian painter, 1510–1592), Adultery, Annunciation, Baptism, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 BASTIEN-LEPAGE, JULES (French painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1848–1884), Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping
 BATONI, POMPEO (Italian painter, 1708–1787), Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance
 BAUERNFEIND, GUSTAV (German painter, draftsman, 1848–1904), Sanctuary
 BAZILLE, FRÉDÉRIC (French painter, 1841–1870), Apotheosis/Deification, Bath/Bathing, Imagination/Creativity
 BAZIOTES, WILLIAM (American painter, 1912–1963), Night
 BEAL, JACK (American painter, born 1931), Labor/Trades/Occupations
 BEALE, MARY (English painter, 1632–1699), Self-Portraits II
 BEARDEN, ROMARE HOWARD (American painter, 1914–1988), Baptism, Destruction of City
 BEARDSLEY, AUBREY VINCENT (British illustrator, author, 1877–1898), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Laughter, Masks/Personae

- BEATUS OF LIEBANA (Spanish illuminator, 8th century),
Apocalypse
- BEAUX, CECILIA (American painter, 1855–1942),
Whiteness
- BECCAFUMI, DOMENICO (Italian painter, sculptor, draftsman, designer, 1486–1551), Communion, Justice,
Virtue/Virtues
- BECKMANN, MAX (German painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1884–1950), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Dreams/Visions,
Expulsion, Funeral/Burial, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Margins/Outsiders, Misfortune, Night, Order/Chaos,
Self-Portraits I
- BEDFORD MASTER see MASTER OF THE DUKE OF BEDFORD
- BEHAM, HANS SEBALD (German painter, printmaker, 1500–1558), Fools/Folly, Melancholy, Misfortune,
Peasantry
- BEHRENS, PETER (German architect, painter, designer, 1868–1940), Kiss/Kissing
- BELDAM PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 500–450 B.C.),
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BELL, VANESSA (British painter, 1874–1961), Artists/Art
- BELLINI, GENTILE (Italian painter, 1430/35–1507),
Love and Death
- BELLINI, GIOVANNI (Italian painter, circa 1430–1516), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Death, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Journey/Flight, Love and Death,
Metamorphosis, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading,
Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism
- BELLINI, JACOPO (Italian painter, circa 1400–1478),
Hanging
- BELLIS, ANTONIO DE (Italian painter, 1621/23–1656),
Penitence/Repentance
- BELLMER, HANS (German painter, draftsman, photographer, 1902–1975), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- BELLOWS, GEORGE WESLEY (American painter, printmaker, 1882–1925), Bath/Bathing, Hanging, Madness, Sport
- BELLY, LÉON-ADOLPHE-AUGUSTE (French painter, 1827–1877), Journey/Flight
- BENEŠ, BARTON LIDICE (American sculptor, painter, born 1942), Money
- BENING, SIMON (Early Netherlandish painter, illuminator, circa 1483–1561), Months, Peasantry
- BENOIST, MARIE-GUILHELMINE (née DE LAVILLE-LEROUX) (French artist, 1768–1826),
Choice/Choosing
- BENSON, FRANK WESTON (American painter, 1862–1951), Seasons, Whiteness
- BENTON, THOMAS HART (American painter, 1889–1975), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dreams/Visions, Hanging, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- BENTVUEGHELS (Northern expatriate artists painting scenes of peasant life, 17th century), Peasantry
- BÉRAUD, JEAN (French painter, 1849–1935),
Penitence/Repentance
- BERCHEM, NICOLAS (Dutch painter, printmaker,
1620–1683, Abduction/Rape
- BERGMAN, INGMAR (Swedish film director, 20th century), Plague/Pestilence
- BERLIN PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 500–475 B.C.), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- BERNARD, EMILE (French painter, printmaker, critic, 1868–1941), Dreams/Visions, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- BERNINI, GIAN LORENZO (Italian sculptor, architect, 1598–1680), Abduction/Rape, Abundance,
Beheading/Decapitation, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic,
Damned Souls, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Fatal
Woman/Femme Fatale, Humors, Journey/Flight,
Martyrdom, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude,
Self-Portraits I, Sublime
- BERNINI, PIETRO (Italian sculptor, 1562–1629),
Virtue/Virtues
- BERRETTINO, PIETRO (Italian artist, 18th century),
Pregnancy
- BERTHÉLEMY, JEAN-SIMON (French painter, 1743–1811), Pointing/Indicating
- BERTINI, GIOVANNI (Italian painter, 1825–1898),
Artists/Art
- BERTOLDO DI GIOVANNI (Italian sculptor, medalist, circa 1420–1491), Music
- BERTRAM VON MINDEN (German painter, sculptor, circa 1345–circa 1415), Visiting/Visitation
- BERTUCCI, JACOPO or GIACOMO (IACOPANE DA FAENZA) (Italian painter, circa 1500–circa 1579),
Laughter
- BEURON SCHOOL (German school of religious artists, 19th century), Devotion/Piety, Protestantism
- BEYER, EUGENE (French painter, printmaker, 1817–1893),
Plague/Pestilence
- BIBIENA, FRANCESCO GALLI (Italian painter, architect, sceneographer, 1659–1737), Baptism
- BIDDLE, GEORGE (American painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1885–1973), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- BINGHAM, GEORGE CALEB, American painter, 1811–1879), Dreams/Visions, Light II
- BLAKE, WILLIAM (British printmaker, illustrator, painter, poet, 1757–1827), Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Order/Chaos,
Plague/Pestilence, Sublime, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BLAKELOCK, RALPH ALBERT (American painter, 1847–1919), Night
- BLECHEN, KARL (German painter, printmaker,
1798–1840), Dawn/Dawning
- BLOCH, ALBERT (American painter, 1882–1961),
Hanging
- BLOCKLAND, ANTONI VAN, Pointing/Indicating
- BLOEMAERT, ABRAHAM (Dutch painter, 1564–1651),
Beheading/Decapitation, Destruction of City, Misfortune, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
- BLOEMAERT, FREDERICK (Dutch draftsman, circa 1610–circa 1669), Months
- BLONDEEL, LANCELOT (Early Netherlandish painter, architect, circa 1495–circa 1561), Self-Portraits I
- BOCCIONI, UMBERTO (Italian painter, sculptor, 1882–1916), Laughter, Metamorphosis, Sport

- BÖCKLIN, ARNOLD (Swiss painter, 1827–1901), Apocalypse, Imagination/Creativity, Nightmare, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas
- BOECE A BELSWERT (Dutch printmaker, 17th century), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- BOECKHORST, JAN (Dutch painter, 1605–1668), Abduction/Rape
- BOGGS, J. S. G. (artist, 20th century), Money
- BOHROD, ASHROD (artist, 20th century), Laughter
- BOILLY, LOUIS-LÉOPOLD (French painter, 1761–1845), Imagination/Creativity, Whiteness
- BOISSARD DE BOISDENIER, JOSEPH FERNAND French painter, author, musician, 1813–1866), Journey/Flight
- BOL, FERDINAND (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1616–1688), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Pointing/Indicating, Visiting/Visitation
- BOL, HANS (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, 1634–1593), Months, Seasons, Sleep/Sleeping
- BOLDRINI, NICCOLO (Italian printmaker, painter, active 1556), Serpent's Bite
- BOLLER, JOHANN ADAM, Judaism
- BONAIUTO, ANDREA DI see ANDREA DA FIRENZE
- BONASONE, GIULIO (Italian printmaker, active 1531–1574), Abduction/Rape
- BONHEUR, ROSA (French painter, 1822–1899), Artists/Art, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peasantry
- BONIFACIO VERONESE (BONIFACIO DE' PITATI) (Italian painter, 1487–1553), Annunciation
- BONNARD, PIERRE (French painter, 1867–1947), Bath/Bathing, Dawn/Dawning, Female Beauty and Adornment, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- BONNART, NICOLAS (French printmaker, 1636–1712), Months
- BONNART, ROBERT (French artist, 1652–circa 1719), Months
- BONNAT, LÉON (French painter, 1833–1922), Crucifixion
- BONVIN, FRANÇOIS (French painter, printmaker, 1817–1887), Devotion/Piety
- BONZI, PIETRO PAOLO (GOBBO DEI CARRACCI) (Italian painter, circa 1573/84–circa 1633/44), Laughter
- BOONS, P. VAN (Dutch artist, active circa 1627), Misfortune
- BORCHT, PETER VAN DER IV (Flemish printmaker, active circa 1600), Months
- BORDONE, PARIS (Italian painter, 1500–1571), Baptism, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- BORGIANI, ORAZIO (Italian painter, circa 1578–1616), Plague/Pestilence
- BORGLUM, JOHN GUTZON (American painter, sculptor, author, 1871–1941), Path/Road/Crossroads
- BORNEMANN, HINRICH, THE YOUNGER (German painter, circa 1450–after 1499), Imagination/Creativity, Self-Portraits I
- BORROMINI, FRANCESCO (Italian architect, 1599–1667), Ecstasy, Martyrdom
- BOS, CORNELIS (Dutch printmaker, circa 1506/10–circa 1564), Journey/Flight
- BOSCH, HIERONYMUS (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1450–1516), Avarice, Comic, Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Expulsion, Fools/Folly, Harvesting, Judgment, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Music, Night, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BOSCOLI, ANDREA (Italian painter, 1550–1606), Honor/Honoring
- BOSMAN, RICHARD (American painter, printmaker, born 1944), Night
- BOSSE, ABRAHAM (French printmaker, 1602–1676), Birth/Childbirth, Female Beauty and Adornment, Months, Seasons
- BOTTICELLI (ALESSANDRO DI MARIANO FILIPEPI) (Italian painter, 1444/45–1510), Adultery, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Comic, Damned Souls, Death, Devotion/Piety, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Reading, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- BOTTICINI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1446–1497), Journey/Flight, Penitence/Repentance
- BOUCHER, FRANÇOIS (French painter, printmaker, 1703–1770), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Naked/Nude, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism
- BOUCICAUT MASTER (French illuminator, active circa 1405–1420), Night, Visiting/Visitation
- BOUDIN, EUGÈNE-LOUIS (French painter, 1874–1898), Dawn/Dawning
- BOUGUEREAU, ADOLPHE-WILLIAM (French painter, 1825–1905), Abduction/Rape, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Peasantry, Seasons, Sleep/Sleeping
- BOUGUEREAU, ELIZABETH JANE GARDNER (American painter in France, 1837–1922), Judaism
- BOULLONGE, LOUIS DE (French painter, printmaker, 1654–1733), Journey/Flight
- BOURDICHON, JEAN (French painter, illuminator, circa 1457–1521), Reading
- BOURDON, SÉBASTIEN (French painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1808–1879), Abandonment, Judgment, Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BOURGEOIS, LOUISE (American sculptor, born 1911), Martyrdom
- BOUTS, DIRCK, THE ELDER (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1415–1475), Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Justice, Martyrdom, Pregnancy, Upside Down
- BOUVIER, JOSEPH-LAURENT-DANIEL (French painter, 1841–1901), Seasons
- BOWLER, HENRY ALEXANDER (British artist, 1824–1903), Death
- BOYVIN, RENÉ (French printmaker, circa 1515–circa 1598), Witchcraft/Sorcery

- BRAMANTE, DONATO (Italian architect, painter, 1444?–1514), Laughter, Patronage
- BRAMER, LEONARD (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1596–1694), Sacrifice
- BRANCUSI, CONSTANTIN (Romanian sculptor, painter, in France, 1876–1957), Kiss/Kissing
- BRANDON, ÉDOUARD (French painter, 1831–1903), Judaism
- BRANT, SEBASTIAN, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- BRAQUE, GEORGES (French painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1882–1963), Order/Chaos, Patronage
- BRAQUEMOND, MARIE (French painter, printmaker, ceramist, 1841–1916), Whiteness
- BRAY, JAN DE (Dutch painter, 1627–1697), Abandonment, Vanity/Vanitas
- BREENBERGH, BARTHOLOMEUS (Dutch painter, 1599/1600–1657), Love and Death
- BRENET, NICOLAS-GUY (French painter, printmaker, 1728–1792), Virtue/Virtues
- BRESLIN, RODOLPH (French printmaker, 1822/25–1885), Death
- BRETON, ANDRÉ (French artist, 1896–1966), Automata, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- BRETON, JULES-ADOLPHE-AIMÉ-LOUIS (French painter, 1927–1906), Devotion/Piety, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry
- BREU, JÖRG, THE ELDER (German painter, circa 1475–1537), Protestantism
- BRIL, PAUL (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1554–1626), Expulsion, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck
- BRITTON, EDGAR (American muralist, sculptor, born 1901), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- BRIULLOV, KARL (Russian painter, 1799–1852), Destruction of City, Toilet Scenes
- BROEDERLAM, MELCHIOR (Early Netherlandish painter, active 1381–1409), Journey/Flight
- BRONZINO, AGNOLO (Italian painter, 1503–1572), Adultery, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Serpent's Bite
- BROOKS, ROMAINE (American painter, 1874–1970), Self-Portraits II
- BROUWER, ADRIAEN (Flemish painter, 1605/06–1638), Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Laughter, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping
- BROWN, FORD MADDOX (British painter, 1821–1893), Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Comic, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection, Shipwreck, Sublime
- BROWN, ROGER (American painter, born 1941), Upside Down
- BROWN & BIGELOW (American printers, 19th–20th century), Months
- BROWNLOW, EMMA B. (British painter, flourished 1852–1873), Abandonment
- BROZIK, WENZEL VON (Czechoslovakian painter, 1851–1901), Metamorphosis
- BRUEGHEL, PIETER, THE ELDER (Flemish painter, 1525/30–1569), Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Excess, Expulsion, Fools/Folly, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Months, Nightmare, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Protestantism, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BRUEGHEL, JAN, THE ELDER (BRUEGHEL DE VELOURS) (Flemish painter, draftsman, 1568–1625), Ascent/Descent, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BRUEGHEL, PIETER, THE YOUNGER (Flemish painter, circa 1564–circa 1638), Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BRUNELLESCHI, FILIPPO (Italian architect, sculptor, 1377–1446), Abandonment, Artists/Art, Crucifixion, Sacrifice
- BRUYN, BARTHOLOMÄUS, THE ELDER (German painter, 1493–1555), Madness
- BRY, THEODOR DE (Early Netherlandish printmaker, publisher in Germany, 1528–1598), Fools/Folly
- BRYGOS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 500–475 B.C.), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy
- BRIULLOV, KARL PAVLOVIC (Russian painter, 1799–1852), Sublime
- BUONTELENTI, BERNARDO (Italian painter, sculptor, architect, 1531–1608), Justice
- BURDEN, CHRIS (American conceptual artist, sculptor, born 1946), Money
- BURCKMAIR, HANS, THE ELDER (German painter, illuminator, 1473–1531), Betrayal, Crucifixion
- BURLIUK, DAVID DAVIDOVICH (Russian painter in the United States, 1882–1967), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- BURNE-JONES, EDWARD COLEY (British painter, 1833–1896), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Light II, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Sacrifice, Seasons, Sleep/Sleeping, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BURRA, EDWARD JOHN (British painter, 1905–1976), Hanging
- BUSCH, WILHELM (German painter, poet, 1832–1908), Caricature/Cartoon
- BUTLER, ELIZABETH SOUTHERDEN THOMPSON, LADY (British painter, 1844/46–1933), Sacrifice
- BUYTEWECH, WILLEM PIETERSZ. (Dutch printmaker, painter, 1591/92–1624), Seasons
- CABANEL, ALEXANDRE (French painter, 1823–1889), Birth/Childbirth
- CADMUS, PAUL (American painter, printmaker, 1904–1983), Bath/Bathing, Envy, Excess, Vices/Deadly Sins
- CAILLEBOTTE, GUSTAVE (French painter, 1848–1984), Labor/Trades/Occupations

- CALDERON, PHILIP HERMOGENES (British painter, 1833–1898), Abandonment
- CALLOT, JACQUES (French printmaker, 1592–1635), Comic, Destruction of City, Envy, Funeral/Burial, Hanging, Masks/Personae, Months, Path/Road/Crossroads, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CAMASSEI, ANDREA (Italian painter, 1602–1649), Baptism
- CAMBIASO, LUCA (Italian painter, 1527–1585), Journey/Flight
- CAMERON, J. (American artist, active circa 1866), Harvesting
- CAMERON, JULIA MARGARET (British photographer, 1815–1879), Adultery
- CAMPAGNOLA, GIULIO (Italian painter, sculptor, 1482–1515), Melancholy
- CAMPEN, JACOB VAN (Dutch painter, architect, 1595–1657), Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight
- CAMPI, BERNARDINO (Italian painter, 1522–1595), Self-Portraits II
- CAMPIN, ROBERT (MASTER OF FLEMALLE) (Early Netherlandish painter, draftsman, circa 1375–1444), Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Funeral/Burial, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Patronage, Reading, Virgin/Virginity
- CANAVESIO, GIOVANNI (Italian artist, active 1458–1500), Hanging
- CANO, ALONSO (Spanish painter, sculptor, architect, 1601–1667), Crucifixion
- CANOVA, ANTONIO (Italian sculptor, painter, 1757–1822), Beheading/Decapitation, Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labyrinth/Maze, Love and Death, Madness, Naked/Nude
- CANTOFOLI, GINEVRA (Italian painter, 1608–1672), Self-Portraits II
- CARAVAGGIO, MICHELANGELO MERISI DA (Italian painter, 1573–1610), Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Envy, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Music, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sublime, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
- CARESME, PHILIPPE (French artist, 1734–1796), Metamorphosis
- CARON, ANTOINE (French painter, circa 1521–1599), Widowhood
- CARPACCIO, VITTORE (Italian painter, 1455/65–1525/26), Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Music, Sleep/Sleeping
- CARPEAUX, JEAN BAPTISTE (French sculptor, painter, printmaker, 1827–1875), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- CARRÀ, CARLO (Italian painter, 1881–1966), Automata, Funeral/Burial
- CARRACCI, AGOSTINO (Italian painter, 1557–1602), Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Envy
- CARRACCI, ANNIBALE (Italian painter, 1560–1609), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Fame, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I
- CARRACCI, LODOVICO (Italian painter, 1555–1619), Adultery, Calumny, Devotion/Piety, Madness, Night, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice
- CARRACCI CIRCLE, Calumny
- CARRIERA, ROSALBA (Italian painter, 1675–1757), Artists/Art, Self-Portraits II
- CARRINGTON, LEONORA (British painter, author, in Mexico, born 1917), Artists/Art, Hanging, Self-Portraits II
- CARSTENS, ASMUS JAKOB (German painter, 1754–1798), Night
- CARUS, CARL GUSTAV (German painter, philosopher, physician, 1789–1869), Dawn/Dawning, Journey/Flight, Night
- CASONI, FELICE ANTONIO (Italian architect, sculptor, medalist, 1559–1634), Self-Portraits II
- CASSINESE SCHOOL, Honor/Honoring
- CASSATT, MARY (American painter in France, 1844–1926), Bath/Bathing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Reading, Visiting/Visitation
- CASTAGNO, ANDREA DEL (Italian painter, 1423–1457), Betrayal, Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Fame, Hanging, Honor/Honoring
- CASTIGLIONE, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, died 1716), Journey/Flight
- CASTIGLIONE, GIOVANNI BENEDETTO (IL GRECHETTO) (Italian painter, printmaker, circa 1610–circa 1665), Journey/Flight, Sacrifice
- CASTILLO Y SAAVEDRA, ANTONIO DEL (Spanish painter, 1616–1668), Adultery
- CAVACEPP, PAOLO (Italian sculptor, restorer, 1723–1804), Path/Road/Crossroads
- CAVALLI, GIAN MARCO (Italian sculpture, goldsmith, born 1454, active 1495), Honor/Honoring
- CAVALLINI, PIETRO (Italian painter, circa 1250–circa 1330), Birth/Childbirth, Grieving/Lamentation
- CAVALLINO, BERNARDO (Italian painter, 1616–1654), Expulsion
- CAVE, PETER DE (British artist, active circa 1735–1810), Abandonment
- CAVEDONE, GIACOMO (Italian painter, 1577–1660), Martyrdom
- CELLINI, BENVENUTO (Italian sculptor, goldsmith, author, 1500–1571), Beheading/Decapitation, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- CERRINI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO (CAVALIER PERUGINO) (Italian painter, 1609–1681), Self-Portraits II
- CESARE, GIUSEPPE (CAVALIER D'ARPINO) (Italian painter, 1568–1640), Virtue/Virtues

- CESARE DE SESTO (Italian painter, 1477–1521),
Birth/Childbirth
- CÉZANNE, PAUL (French painter, 1839–1906),
Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification,
Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Hanging, Masks/Personae,
Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance,
Reading, Self-Portraits I, Temptation
- CHAGALL, MARC (Russian painter, printmaker in France, 1887–1985), Abduction/Rape, Annunciation,
Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/
Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Judaism, Laughter, Marriage/Betrothal, Order/Chaos, Peasantry,
Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Upside Down
- CHAMPAIGNE, PHILIPPE DE (French painter, 1602–1674),
Devotion/Piety
- CHAPMAN, JOHN GADSBY (American painter, printmaker, illustrator, 1808–1889), Baptism
- CHAPU, HENRI-MICHEL-ANTOINE (French sculptor, medalist, 1833–1891), Abduction/Rape, Sleep/Sleeping
- CHARDIN, JEAN-BAPTISTE-SIMÉON (French painter, 1699–1779), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Imagination/Creativity, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- CHARLES, JAMES (British artist, 1851–1906),
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal
- CHARPENTIER, CONSTANCE-MARIE (French painter, 1767–1849), Melancholy, Whiteness
- CHASE, WILLIAM MERRITT (American painter, 1849–1916), Whiteness
- CHASSÉRIAU, THÉODORE (French painter, 1819–1856),
Abandonment, Adultery
- CHAUVEAU, FRANÇOIS (French miniaturist, printmaker, 1613–1676), Seasons
- CHELSEA PORCELAIN MANUFACTORY (English,
1745–1782), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- CHÉRON, ELISABETH-SOPHIE (French artist, 1648–1711), Self-Portraits II
- CHÉRON, LOUIS (French painter, 1660–circa 1725),
Adultery, Laughter
- CHIA, SANDRO (Italian painter, sculptor, born 1946),
Drunkenness/Intoxication
- CHICAGO, JUDY (American painter, printmaker, sculptor, born 1939), Birth/Childbirth, Pregnancy
- CHIGOT, ALPHONSE (French painter, 19th century),
Avarice
- CHIRICO, GIORGIO DE (Italian painter, 1888–1978),
Automata, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight,
Judgment, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos
- CHODOWIECKI, DANIEL NIKOLAUS (German painter, printmaker, 1726–1801), Comic, Madness, Months
- CHOKI, EISHOSAI (Japanese painter, printmaker, active 1760–1800), Dawn/Dawning
- CHRISTUS, PETRUS (Early Netherlandish painter, active 1440, died 1472/73), Betrayal, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
Mirror/Reflection, Money, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity
- CHRYSSA, VARDEA (American sculptor, born 1933),
Light II
- CHURCH, FREDEROC EDWIN (American painter, 1826–1908), Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Shipwreck
- CIBBER, CAJUS GABRIEL (Danish sculptor, architect, in Britain, 1630–1700), Destruction of City
- CIGNANI, CARLO (Italian painter, 1628–1719), Adultery, Calumny
- CIGNAROLI, GIAMBETTINO (Italian painter, 1706–1770),
Birth/Childbirth
- CIGOLI, LUDOVICO CARDI (Italian painter, architect, 1559–1613), Envy, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom
- CIMA DA CONEGLIANO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA
(Italian painter, circa 1459–circa 1517), Love and Death, Penitence/Repentance, Sleep/Sleeping
- CIMABUE (CENNI DI PEPE) (Italian painter, circa 1240–circa 1301), Artists/Art, Crucifixion
- CIRY, MICHEL (French painter, printmaker, born 1919),
Martyrdom
- CLAESZ, PIETER (Dutch painter, 17th century),
Abundance, Vanity/Vanitas
- CLARKE, JOHN CLEM (American painter, born 1937),
Bacchanalia/Orgy
- CLARISSA (Scribe, 12th century), Self-Portraits II
- CLARKE, MARTHA (American artist, director, 20th century), Damned Souls
- CLAUDE LORRAIN (French painter, 1600–1682), Betrayal,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Metamorphosis, Seasons,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sublime, Temptation,
Visiting/Visitation
- CLAUDEL, CAMILLE (French sculptor, 1864–1943),
Artists/Art
- CLERCK, HENDRICK DE (Flemish painter, 1570–1629),
Expulsion, Humors
- CLEVE, JOOS VAN (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1485–circa 1540), Crucifixion, Reading, Vanity/Vanitas
- CLODION, CLAUDE-MICHEL (French painter, 1738–1814), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- CLOSE, CHUCK (American painter, born 1940), Artists/Art,
Self-Portraits I
- CLOUET, FRANÇOIS (French painter, before 1522–1572),
Toilet Scenes
- COCK, HIERONYMUS (Early Netherlandish printmaker, publisher, circa 1510–1570), Serpent's Bite
- CODAZZI, VIVIANO (Italian painter, circa 1603–1670),
Temptation
- COECKE VAN AELST, PIETER I (Early Netherlandish painter, sculptor, architect, author, 1502–1550), Adultery, Betrayal, Journey/Flight, Seasons
- COLE, THOMAS (American painter, 1801–1848),
Ascent/Descent, Destruction of City, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads, Protestantism,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- COLLAERT, ADRIAEN (Flemish printmaker, circa 1560–1618), Months
- COLLANTES, FRANCESCO (Spanish painter, 1599–1656),
Destruction of City
- COLLIER, EVERT see COLYER, EDWAERT
- COLLIER, JOHN (British painter, 1850–1934),
Journey/Flight
- COLLINSON, JAMES (British painter, 1825?–1881),
Expulsion
- COLOGNE SCHOOL (German artists, 14th–15th century), Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy

- COLOMBE, JEAN (French illuminator, circa 1430–1493),
Funeral/Burial, Order/Chaos, Reading
- COLOMBE, MICHEL (French sculptor, 1430–1512),
Virtue/Virtues
- COLYER, EDWAERT (Dutch painter, active 1673–1782),
Music
- CONNELLY, ARCH (American artist, born 1950), Money
- CONSTABLE, JOHN (British painter, 1776–1837),
Dawn/Dawning, Ecstasy, Harvesting, Light II,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- CONVAY, JEAN (French artist, 17th century), Seasons
- COORNHERT, DIRCK VOLCKERTSZ. (Netherlandish humanist, printmaker, 1522–1590), Misfortune
- COPLANS, JOHN (British photographer in the United States, born 1920), Naked/Nude
- COPLEY, JOHN SINGLETON (American painter, circa 1738–1815), Self-Portraits I
- CORBUSIER, LE (CHARLES-EDOUARD JEANNERET)
(French architect, painter, 1887–1965), Arms Raised,
Light II
- CORINTH, LOVIS (German painter, printmaker, 1858–1925), Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation,
Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety,
Drunkennes/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme
Fatale, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Laughter,
Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Protestantism,
Self-Portraits I
- CORNELISZ. VAN AMSTERDAM, JACOB see
CORNELISZ. VAN OOSTSANEN, JACOB
- CORNELISZ. VAN HAARLEM, CORNELIS (Dutch painter, 1562–1638), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Laughter, Misfortune, Temptation
- CORNELISZ. VAN OOSTSANEN, JACOB (Netherlandish painter, printmaker, circa 1470–1533), Self-Portraits I,
Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CORNELIUS, PETER (German painter, 1783–1867),
Destruction of City, Madness
- CORNELL, JOSEPH (American sculptor, 1903–1972),
Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- COROT, JEAN-BAPTISTE-CAMILLE (French painter, 1796–1875), Journey/Flight, Laughter, Melancholy, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- CORREGGIO (ANTONIO ALLEGRI) (Italian painter, circa 1489/94–1534), Adultery, Abduction/Rape, Apotheosis/Deification, Ecstasy, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Justice, Light II, Money, Night, Pregnancy, Sublime,
Virtue/Virtues
- CORTE, JOSSE DE (Flemish sculptor in Italy, 1627–1678),
Plague/Pestilence
- CORTESE, GUGLIELMO (Italian artist, 17th century),
Martyrdom
- COSSA, FRANCESCO DEL (Italian painter, circa 1435–circa 1477), Betrayal, Justice, Zodiac
- COSWAY, MARIA HADFIELD (British painter, printmaker, 1759–1838), Self-Portraits II
- COT, PIERRE-AUGUST (French painter, 1837–1883),
Seasons
- COTER, COLIJN DE (Netherlandish painter, circa 1455–circa 1538), Imagination/Creativity
- COTMAN, JOHN SELL (British painter, 1781–1842),
Judgment
- COURBET, GUSTAVE (French painter, 1819–1877),
Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Death, Funeral/Burial,
Grieving/Lamentation, Imagination/Creativity,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Margins/Outsiders,
Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Self-
Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism
- COURTEYS, PIERRE I (French painter, enamalist, circa 1520–circa 1586), Abduction/Rape, Judgment
- COUSIN, JEAN, THE ELDER (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, circa 1490–circa 1560), Fortune
- COUTURE, THOMAS (French painter, 1815–1879),
Bacchanalia/Orgy, Excess, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning
- COVERT, JOHN (American painter, 1882–1960),
Temptation
- COWPER, FRANK CODOGAN (British artist, 1877–1958),
Hair/Haircutting, Martyrdom
- COX, JAN (Dutch/Belgium painter, 1919–1980), Love and Death
- COXIE, MICHIEL, THE ELDER (Early Netherlandish painter, 1499–1592), Adultery, Serpent's Bite
- COYPEL, ANTOINE (French painter, 1661–1722),
Calumny, Journey/Flight, Laughter
- COYPEL, NÔEL-NICOLAS (French painter, 1690–1734),
Abduction/Rape, Love and Death
- COZENS, ALEXANDER (British painter, 1717–1786),
Dawn/Dawning
- CRAESBEECK, JOOS VAN (Flemish painter, circa 1605–1654/61), Vanity/Vanitas
- CRANACH, LUCAS, THE ELDER (German painter, draftsman, printmaker, 1472–1553), Adultery,
Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation,
Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Choice/Choosing,
Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Expulsion,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Love and Death,
Madness, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos,
Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
- CRANACH, LUCAS, THE YOUNGER (German painter, draftsman, printmaker, 1515–1586), Ascent/Descent, Communion, Crucifixion, Protestantism
- CRANE, WALTER (British painter, illustrator, designer, 1845–1915), Seasons
- CRAWFORD, THOMAS (American sculptor, 1814–1857),
Sleep/Sleeping
- CREMER, FRITZ (German sculptor, printmaker, painter, born 1906), Hanging
- CRESPI, DANIELE (Italian painter, 1590–1630), Baptism
- CRESPI, GIUSEPPE MARIA (LO SPAGNUOLO) (Italian painter, printmaker, 1665–1747), Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Visiting/Visitation
- CRESTI, DOMENICO (PASSIGNANO) (Italian painter, 1559–1638), Pointing/Indicating
- CRIVELLI, CARLO (Italian painter, 1430/35–1495),
Annunciation, Crucifixion, Death
- CRONENBURG, ADRIEN VAN (Netherlandish painter, circa 1525–circa 1604), Vanity/Vanitas
- CROSBY, WILLIAM (British artist, 1830–1910),
Visiting/Visitation

- CROWE, EYRE (British painter, 1824–1910),
Labor/Trades/Occupations
- CRUIKSHANK, GEORGE (British illustrator, painter, 1791–1878), Caricature/Cartoon, Comic,
Margins/Outsiders
- CRUIKSHANK, ISAAC (British caricaturist, painter, 1764–1810/11), Comic
- CUNNINGHAM, IMOGEN (American photographer,
1883–1976), Naked/Nude
- CURRAN, CHARLES COURTNEY (American painter, 1861–1942), Whiteness
- CURRIER & IVES (American artists Nathaniel Currier [1813–1888] and James Merritt Ives, [1824–1895]),
Harvesting
- CURRY, JOHN STEUART (American painter, 1897–1946),
Baptism, Death, Dreams/Visions, Hanging,
Masks/Personae
- DADD, RICHARD (British painter, 1817–1886), Madness
- DADDI, BERNARDO (Italian painter, 14th century),
Crucifixion
- DAGLEY, RICHARD (British painter, printmaker, 1765–1841), Death
- DAGNAN-BOUVERET, PASCAL-ADOLPHE-JEAN (French painter, printmaker, 1852–1929/31), Love and Death
- DAHL, JOHANN CHRISTIAN CLAUSEN (Norwegian painter in Germany, 1788–1857), Dawn/Dawning
- DALAKAY, VEDAT (Turkish architect, 20th century), Light I
- DALÍ, SALVADOR (Spanish painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1904–1989), Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent,
Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Madness, Metamorphosis,
Order/Chaos, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
- DALMATION SCHOOL, Shipwreck
- DALOU, JULES (French sculptor, 1838–1902),
Drunkenness/Intoxication, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- DANBY, FRANCIS (British painter, 1793–1861),
Misfortune
- DANDRIDGE, BARTHOLOMEW (British painter, 1691–circa 1754), Whiteness
- DANTON, FERDINAND, JR. (American artist, 19th century), Money
- DANUBE SCHOOL, Penitence/Repentance
- D'ARCANGELO, ALAN (American painter, born 1930),
Path/Road/Crossroads
- DARIUS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, late 4th century B.C.), Funeral/Burial
- DAUMIER, HONORÉ (French painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1808–1879), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Avarice, Bath/Bathing, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Death,
Drunkenness/Intoxication, Grieving/Lamentation,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders,
Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Misfortune,
Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy
- DAVID, GERARD (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1450/60–1523), Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Light II
- DAVID, JACQUES-LOUIS (French artist, 1748–1825), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Arms Raised,
Bath/Bathing, Calumny, Comic, Death, Funeral/Burial,
Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Judgment,
Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Whiteness, Widowhood
- DAVIE, ALAN (British painter, born 1920), Sacrifice
- DAVIES, ARTHUR BOWEN (American painter, 1862–1928), Abduction/Rape, Serpent's Bite
- DAYBREAK PAINTER (Greek vase painter, late 6th century B.C.), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DE ANDREA, JOHN LOUIS (American sculptor, born 1941), Hair/Haircutting, Naked/Nude
- DEBUCOURT, PHILIBERT-LOUIS (French painter, printmaker, 1755–1832), Seasons
- DECAMP (French artisan, 20th century), Automata
- DECAMPS, ALEXANDRE-GABRIEL (French painter, printmaker, 1803–1860), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- DEGAS, EDGAR (French painter, sculptor, 1769–1825),
Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness,
Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude,
Reading, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism
- DELACROIX, EUGÈNE (French painter, 1798–1863),
Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Death,
Destruction of City, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale,
Female Beauty and Adornment, Grieving/Lamentation,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity,
Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Luxury,
Marriage/Betrothal, Order/Chaos, Reading, Sacrifice, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DELAROCHE, PAUL (French painter, 1797–1856),
Beheading/Decapitation, Martyrdom
- DELAUNAY, JULES-ELIE (French painter, 1828–1891), Misfortune, Plague/Pestilence
- DELAUNAY, NICOLAS, THE ELDER (French printmaker, 1739–1792), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- DELLA BELLA, STEFANO (Italian printmaker, 1610–1664),
Destruction of City
- DELLA QUERCIA, JACOPO (Italian sculptor, circa 1372–1438), Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Temptation
- DELLA ROBBIA, ANDREA (Italian sculptor, ceramist, 1435–1525/28), Abandonment
- DELLA ROBBIA, LUCA (Italian sculptor, ceramist, painter, 1400–1482), Mirror/Reflection, Reading
- DELVAUX, PAUL (Belgian painter, printmaker, illustrator, born 1897), Arms Raised, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Night, Sleep/Sleeping
- DELVILLE, JEAN (Belgian painter, 1867–1953),
Beheading/Decapitation, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Nightmare
- DE MORGAN, EVELYN (British artist, 1850/55–1919), Abandonment, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- DENIS, MAURICE (French painter, author, 1870–1943),
Annunciation, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning,
Devotion/Piety, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness
- DERAIN, ANDRÉ (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1880–1954), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Masks/Personae

- DERUTA, CASTEL (Italian majolica designer, active circa 1530), Love and Death
- DESBOUTIN, MARCELLIN-GILBERT (French painter, 1823–1902), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- DES GRANGES, DAVID (English miniaturist, printmaker, painter, circa 1611–circa 1675), Birth/Childbirth
- DESIDEREO DE SETTIGNANO (Italian sculptor, 1428–1464), Honor/Honoring
- DESMARÉES, GEORG (Swedish painter, 1697–1776), Self-Portraits I
- DESNOS, FERDINAND (French artist, active circa 1934), Devotion/Piety
- DÉSORIA, JEAN-BAPTISTE-FRANÇOIS (French painter, 1758–1832), Whiteness
- DEVERELL, WALTER HOWELL (British painter, 1827–1854), Expulsion
- DEVÉRIA, ACHILLE (French painter, printmaker, draftsman, 1800–1857), Sleep/Sleeping
- DEVÉRIA, EUGÈNE-FRANÇOIS-MARIE-JOSEPH (French artist, 1805–1865), Birth/Childbirth
- DEVIS, ARTHUR (British painter, circa 1708–1787), Whiteness
- DE WINT, PETER (British painter, 1784–1849), Harvesting
- DICKINSON, WILLIAM (British artist, 1746–1823), Madness
- DIDIER, JULES (French artist, 1831–after 1880), Caricature/Cartoon
- DIEPRAEM, ABRAHAM (Dutch painter, 1622–1670), Laughter
- DIRCK, PHILIPPE VAN (Netherlandish painter, 17th century), Music
- DIX, OTTO (German painter, printmaker, 1891–1969), Madness, Melancholy, Night, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning
- DIXON, ALFRED (British artist, 1842–1919), Abandonment
- DIZIANI, GASPARE (Italian painter, 1689–1767), Abduction/Rape
- DOKIMASIA PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 500–475 B.C.), Bath/Bathing
- DOLCI, CARLO (Italian painter, 1616–1686), Bath/Bathing, Imagination/Creativity
- DOMENICHINO (DOMENICO ZAMPIERI) (Italian painter, 1481–1641), Betrayal, Communion, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Envy, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Martyrdom, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- DOMENICO FIORENTINO (DOMENICO RICOVERI) (Italian sculptor, stucco artist, painter, printmaker in France, circa 1506–1570/75), Fame
- DOMENICO VENEZIANO (DOMENICO DI BARTOLOMEO DA VENEZIA) (Italian painter, circa 1400–1461), Apotheosis/Deification, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Hanging, Path/Road/Crossroads
- DONATELLO (DONATO DI NICCOLÒ DI BETTO BARDI) (Italian sculptor, circa 1386–1466), Arms Raised, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Death, Devotion/Piety, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance
- DONGEN, KEES VAN (Dutch painter, 1877–1968), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- DONNER, GEORG RAPHAEL (Austrian sculptor, 1693–1741), Judgment
- DORÉ, GUSTAVE (French artist, 1832–1883), Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Seasons
- DORNSEIF, FRANK (German painter, sculptor, 20th century), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- DOSSI, DOSSO (GIOVANNI DE LUTERO) (Italian painter, circa 1490–1541), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Fame, Journey/Flight, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter
- DOU, GERRIT (Dutch painter, 1613–1675), Betrayal, Music, Penitence/Repentance, Vanity/Vanitas
- DOVE, ARTHUR GARFIELD (American painter, 1880–1946), Night
- DRAPER, HERBERT JAMES (British artist, 1963/64–1920), Abandonment
- DRESDEN SCHOOL, Devotion/Piety
- DROST, WILLEM (Dutch painter, 1630–1688), Temptation
- DROUAIS, FRANÇOIS-HUBERT (French painter, 1727–1775), Imagination/Creativity
- DRYANDER, JOHANNES (JOHANN FRIEDRICH) (German painter, 1756–1812), Pregnancy
- DUBREUIL, TOUSSAINT (French painter, 1561–1602), Toilet Scenes
- DUBREUIL, VICTOR (American artist, active 1888–1900), Money
- DUBUFFET, JEAN (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1901–1985), Madness
- DUCCIO DI BUONINSEGNA (Italian painter, circa 1225–before 1319), Abandonment, Annunciation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity
- DUCHAMP, MARCEL (French artist, 1887–1968), Artists/Art, Comic, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Order/Chaos
- DUCHAMP-VILLON, RAYMOND (French sculptor, 1876–1918), Metamorphosis
- DUKE, LODOVICO (Italian printmaker, 16th century), Pregnancy
- DUMON, PIERRE (French tapestry weaver, 17th century), Journey/Flight
- DUNTHORN, JAMES (British painter, 18th century), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- DUPAIN, MAX (Australian artist, 20th century), Night
- DUQUESNOY, JERÔME (Flemish sculptor, circa 1570–1641), Penitence/Repentance
- DURAMEAU, LOUIS-JEAN-JACQUES (French painter, 1733–1796), Virtue/Virtues
- DURAND, ASHER BROWN (American painter, printmaker, 1796–1886), Ecstasy
- DURANTE, CASTEL (Italian painter of majolica, 16th century), Love and Death
- DÜRER, ALBRECHT (German painter, printmaker, 1471–1520), Adultery, Abduction/Rape, Apocalypse, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Funeral/Burial, Gaze,

- Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- DUSART, CORNELIS (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1660–1704), Harvesting, Months
- DUVENECK, FRANK (American painter, printmaker, 1848–1919), Laughter
- DUVET, JEAN (French printmaker, goldsmith, 1485–1570?), Apocalypse
- DYCE, WILLIAM (British painter, 1806–1864), Artists/Art, Reading
- DYCK, ANTHONY VAN (Flemish artist, 1599–1641), Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Melancholy, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virgin/Virginity
- EADWINE (English scribe, 12th century), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- EAKINS, THOMAS (American painter, sculptor, 1844–1916), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Naked/Nude, Sleep/Sleeping
- EASTLAKE, CHARLES LOCK (British painter, art historian, 1793–1865), Journey/Flight
- EECKHOUT, GERBRAND VAN DEN (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1621–1674), Calumny, Sacrifice
- EGG, AUGUSTUS LEOPOLD (British painter, 1816–1863), Adultery, Mirror/Reflection
- EHRENSTRAHL, DAVID KLÖCKER (Swedish painter, art historian, 1628–1698), Self-Portraits I
- EISEN, CHARLES-JOSEPH-DOMINIQUE (French painter, printmaker, 1720–1778), Seasons
- ELHAFEN, IGNAZ (German ivory carver, 1685–1725), Abduction/Rape
- ELKAN, BENNO (German sculptor, painter, author, 1877–1960), Judaism
- ELLENRIEDER, MARIE (German painter, 1791–1863, Baptism
- ELSHEIMER, ADAM (German painter, 1578–1610), Destruction of City, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Martyrdom
- EMBRIACHI WORKSHOP (Family of Italian carvers, 15th century), Judgment
- EMPOLI, JACOPO DA see JACOPO DA EMPOLI (JACOPO CHIMENTI)
- EMS, RUDOLF VON (Austrian illuminator, circa 1200–1254), Ascent/Descent
- ENDE, HANS AM see AM ENDE, HANS
- ENGEL, JOSEF (Hungarian sculptor, 1815–1891), Journey/Flight
- ENSOR, JAMES (Belgium painter, printmaker, 1860–1949), Death, Hanging, Masks/Personae, Nightmare, Path/Road/Crossroads
- ERETRIA PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 450–420 B.C.), Ecstasy
- ERNST, MAX (German painter, collagist, author, 1891–1976), Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Night, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Temptation, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- ESCHER, MAURITS CORNELIS (Dutch printmaker, 1898–1972), Ascent/Descent, Expulsion, Order/Chaos, Upside Down
- ESCOULA, JEAN (French sculptor, 1851–1911), Love and Death
- ESTES, RICHARD (American painter, born 1932), Mirror/Reflection
- ESTIENNE, CHARLES (French artist, 16th century), Pregnancy
- ETTY, WILLIAM (British painter, 1787–1849), Fortune, Journey/Flight, Voyeurism
- EUPHRONIUS (Greek vase painter, active circa 510–490 B.C.), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Pointing/Indicating
- EUTHYMIDES (Greek vase painter, 530–500 B.C.), Abduction/Rape
- EUTYCHIDES OF SICYON (Greek sculptor, active circa 318 B.C.), Fortune, Virtue/Virtues
- EVERDINGEN, CAESAR BOETIUS VAN (Dutch painter, 1606–1678), Female Beauty and Adornment, Harvesting
- EVERGOOD, PHILIP (American painter, printmaker, 1901–1973), Laughter
- EWANOKI, MARY (American embroiderer, 20th century), Pregnancy
- EXEKIAS (Greek vase painter, circa 545–530 B.C.), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Madness
- EYCK, JAN VAN (Netherlandish painter, circa 1390–1441), Betrayal, Communion, Damned Souls, Devotion/Piety, Funeral/Burial, Gaze, Judgment, Justice, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Offering, Patronage, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness
- EYCK, HUBERT (Early Netherlandish painter, 1366–1426), Communion, Damned Souls, Devotion/Piety, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Offering, Peace, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Whiteness
- FABRITIUS, CAREL (Dutch painter, 1622–1654), Beheading/Decapitation
- FAED, THOMAS (British painter, 1826–1900), Expulsion, Virtue/Virtues
- FALCK, JEREMIAS (Dutch printmaker, circa 1619–1677), Months, Seasons
- FALCONET, ETIENNE-MAURICE (French sculptor, 1716–1791), Naked/Nude
- FAMULUS see AMULIUS
- FANTIN-LATOURE, HENRI (French painter, printmaker, 1836–1904), Apotheosis/Deification, Dawn/Dawning, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Night, Self-Portraits I
- FAVRAY, ANTOINE DE (French painter, 1706–circa 1791), Pointing/Indicating

- FEDI, PIO (Italian sculptor, 1816–1892), Madness
- FEDOTOV, PAVEL ANDREEVIC (Russian painter, poet, 1815–1852), Widowhood
- FENTON, ROGER (British photographer, 1819–1869), Sacrifice
- FERNANDEZ, EGAI (Philippine artist, 20th century), Order/Chaos
- FERRARI, GAUDENZIO (Italian painter, sculptor, 1470/80–1546), Annunciation
- FERRARI, GIOVANNI ANDREA DE (Italian painter, 1598–1669), Betrayal
- FERRATA, ERCOLE (Italian sculptor, 1610–1686), Martyrdom
- FERRI, CIRO (Italian painter, sculptor, 1634–1689), Communion
- FERRISS, HUGH (American artist, architect, 1889–1962), Dreams/Visions
- FERRUCCI, ROMOLO DI FRANCESCO (Italian sculptor, died 1621), Madness
- FETTI, DOMENICO (Italian painter, circa 1589–1624), Beheading/Decapitation, Melancholy
- FEUERBACH, ANSELF FREDERICK (German painter, 1829–1880), Imagination/Creativity
- FICHERELLI, FELICE (FELICE RIPOSO) (Italian painter, 1605–1669?), Protestantism
- FILARETE (ANTONIO AVERLINO) (Italian sculptor, architect, draftsman, circa 1400–1469), Abduction/Rape, Fame, Journey/Flight, Love and Death
- FILDES, LUKE (British painter, 1844–1927), Margins/Outsiders, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
- FINI, LÉONOR (Italian painter, scenographer in France, born 1908), Nightmare
- FINIGUERRA, MASO (Italian goldsmith, sculptor, printmaker, 1426–1464), Labyrinth/Maze
- FINLEY, KAREN (American performance artist, active 1990s), Naked/Nude
- FISCHL, ERIC (American artist, born 1948), Naked/Nude
- FLAGG, JAMES MONTGOMERY (American illustrator, painter, author, 1877–1960), Pointing/Indicating
- FLAMAND, PIERRE LA (French metalworker), Adultery
- FLANDRIN, HIPPOLYTE-JEAN (French painter, 1809–1864), Crucifixion, Virgin/Virginity
- FLAVIN, DAN (American artist, author, born 1933), Light II
- FLAXMAN, JOHN (British sculptor, designer, 1755–1826), Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Madness, Reading
- FLEISHNER, RICHARD (American artist, 20th century), Labyrinth/Maze
- FLEMISH SCHOOL, Martyrdom
- FLETCHER, WILLIAM TEULON BLANFORD (British painter, 1858–1936), Expulsion
- FLINCK, GOVAERT (Dutch painter, 1615–1660), Betrayal, Sacrifice
- FLORIS, FRANS, THE ELDER (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, circa 1519–1570), Betrayal, Expulsion, Judgment, Music, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite
- FOGEL, SEYMOUR (American painter, sculptor, born 1911), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- FOGOLINO, MARCELLO (Italian painter, printmaker, active 1519–1548), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FONTAINEBLEAU, SCHOOL OF, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Toilet Scenes
- FONTANA, LAVINIA (Italian painter, 1552–1614), Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation
- FORBES, STANHOPE ALEXANDER (British painter, 1857–1947), Marriage/Betrothal
- FORD, HENRY JUSTICE (British artist, 1860–1941), Abduction/Rape, Laughter
- FORSTER, JOSEPH WILSON (British artist, active 1889–1916), Seasons
- FOUNDRY PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 500–475 B.C.), Abandonment, Drunkenness/Intoxication
- FOUQUET, JEAN (French painter, illuminator, circa 1420–circa 1480), Birth/Childbirth, Fools/Folly, Funeral/Burial, Night, Sanctuary
- FRAGONARD, JEAN-HONRÉ (French painter, 1737–1806), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Kiss/Kissing, Marriage/Betrothal, Naked/Nude, Reading, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism, Whiteness
- FRANCESCHINI, MARCANTONIO (Italian painter, 1648–1729), Birth/Childbirth
- FRANCESCO DI GIORGIO MARTINI (Italian architect, sculptor, painter, theorist, 1439–1501), Penitence/Repentance, Temptation
- FRANCIA, FRANCESCO (FRANCESCO RAIBOLINI) (Italian goldsmith, medalist, painter, circa 1450–1517), Crucifixion
- FRANCIABIGIO (FRANCESCO DI CRISTOFANO) (Italian artist, 1482/83–1525), Adultery
- FRANCKEN, FRANS, THE YOUNGER (Flemish painter, 1581–1642), Avarice, Judgment, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FRANCKEN, HIERONYMOUS III (Flemish painter, born 1611), Money
- FRANCO, GIACOMO (Italian printmaker, publisher, 1550–1620), Toilet Scenes
- FRANQUE, JOSEPH (French painter, 1774–1833), Misfortune
- FRATELLINI, GIOVANNI (Italian painter, 1666–1731), Self-Portraits II
- FREUD, LUCIEN (British painter, born 1922), Naked/Nude
- FRIEDRICH, CASPAR DAVID (German painter, 1774–1840), Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Funeral/Burial, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Night, Protestantism, Shipwreck, Sublime
- FRIEDRICH, OTTO (German artist, 1862–1937), Penitence/Repentance
- FRISIUS, SIMON WYNOUTS see VRIES, SIMON WYNHOUTSZ.
- FRITH, WILLIAM POWELL (British painter, 1819–1909), Avarice, Margins/Outsiders, Physiognomy
- FÜGER, HEINRICH (German painter, 1751–1818), Death
- FUJIWARA NOBUZANE (Japanese scroll painter, 13th century), Damned Souls
- FULLER, GEORGE (American painter, 1822–1884), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FUNGAI, BERNARDINO (Italian painter, 1460–1516), Choice/Choosing

- FURINI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, poet, 1603–1646), Abduction/Rape
- FURTENAGEL, LAUX/LUKAS (German painter, 1505–circa 1546), Mirror/Reflection
- FURTMEYER, BERTHOLD (German illuminator, circa 1435/40–after 1501), Sin/Sinning
- FUSELI, HENRY (Swiss painter in Great Britain, 1741–1825), Dreams/Visions, Madness, Night, Nightmare, Pointing/Indicating, Shipwreck, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FYT, JAN (Flemish painter, 1611–1661), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- GADDI, AGNOLO (Italian painter, died 1396), Sacrifice, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- GADDI, TADDEO (Italian painter, circa 1300–1366), Arms Raised, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Night, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
- GAINSBOROUGH, THOMAS (British painter, 1727–1788), Artists/Art, Marriage/Betrothal, Patronage, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Whiteness
- GALIZIA, FEDE (Italian painter, 1578–circa 1638), Beheading/Decapitation
- GALLE, PHILIP (Netherlandish printmaker, 1537–1612), Journey/Flight, Penitence/Repentance, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping
- GALLE, THEODOR (Flemish printmaker, 1571–1633), Imagination/Creativity
- GAMBELLO, ANTONIO (Italian architect, sculptor, died circa 1481), Justice
- GARGIULO, DOMENICO (MICCO SPADARO) (Italian painter, 1612–1675), Plague/Pestilence, Temptation
- GAROFALO, BENVENUTO TISI DA (Italian painter, 1481–1559), Misfortune
- GASSEL, LUCAS (Netherlandish painter, active 1538–1568), Journey/Flight, Labyrinth/Maze
- GAST, JOHN (American painter, 19th century), Dreams/Visions
- GAUDÍ Y CORNET, ANTONIO (Spanish architect, 1852–1926), Light II
- GAUFFIER, LOUIS (French painter, 1761–1801), Virtue/Virtues
- GAUQUIN, PAUL (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1848–1903), Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Peasantry, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Upside Down
- GAULLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (BACCICCO) (Italian painter, 1639–1709), Devotion/Piety, Sin/Sinning
- GEBHARDT, EDUARD KARL FRANZ VON (German painter, 1838–1925), Devotion/Piety, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism
- GEERAERTS, MARCUS THE YOUNGER see GHEERAERTS, MARCUS, THE YOUNGER
- GEERTGEN TOT SINT JANS (Netherlandish painter, circa 1465–circa 1495), Light II, Melancholy, Music, Night
- GELDER, AERT DE (Dutch artist, draftsman, 1645–1727), Laughter, Visiting/Visitation
- GELTON, TOUSSAINT (Dutch painter, circa 1630–1680), Love and Death
- GENELLI, BONAVENTURA (German painter, 1798–1868), Madness
- GENTILE DA FABRIANO (GENTILE DI NICCOLÒ DE GIOVANNI MASSI) (Italian painter, 1370–1427), Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Devotion/Piety, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Light II, Margins/Outsiders, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads
- GENTILESCHI, ARTEMISIA (Italian painter, 1593–after 1651), Adultery, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Calumny, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism, Naked/Nude, Night, Penitence/Repentance, Self-Portraits II, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Voyeurism
- GENTILESCHI, ORAZIO (Italian painter, 1563–1639), Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Money, Naked/Nude
- GÉRARD, FRANÇOIS-PASCAL-SIMON (French painter, 1770–1837), Love and Death, Naked/Nude
- GÉRICAUT, JEAN-LOUIS-ANDRÉ-THÉODORE (French painter, sculptor, 1791–1824), Arms Raised, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fools/Folly, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Misfortune, Physiognomy, Pointing/Indicating, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck
- GÉRÔME, JEAN-LÉON (French painter, sculptor, 1824–1904), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Death, Luxury, Metamorphosis, Plague/Pestilence, Sport, Voyeurism
- GERUNG, MATTHIAS (German painter, printmaker, tapestry designer, circa 1500–1568/70), Melancholy
- GERVEX, HENRI (French painter, 1852–1929), Sleep/Sleeping
- GHEERAERTS, MARCUS, THE YOUNGER (Flemish painter, 1561–1635), Whiteness
- GHEYN, GUILLAUME DE (Dutch artist, 1610–circa 1650), Seasons
- GHEYN, JACOB I DE (Early Netherlandish painter, glass painter, printmaker, circa 1537–1581), Humors, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas
- GHEYN, JACOB II DE (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1565–1629), Money, Vanity/Vanitas, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- GHEZZI, PIER LEONE (Italian painter, 1674–1755), Caricature/Cartoon
- GHIBERTI, LORENZO (Italian sculptor, theorist, circa 1381–1455), Artists/Art, Baptism, Betrayal, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Expulsion, Judaism, Marriage/Betrothal, Naked/Nude, Patronage, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping
- GHIRLANDAIO, DOMENICO (DOMENICO BIGARDI) (Italian painter, 1449–1494), Annunciation, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Devotion/Piety, Marriage/Betrothal, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Visiting/Visitation
- GHISI, LUCA (Italian printmaker, 1520–1582), Dreams/Visions
- GIACOMETTI, ALBERTO (Swiss painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1901–1966), Crucifixion
- GIAMBOLOGNA (JEAN BOULOGNE) (Flemish sculptor in Italy, 1529–1608), Abduction/Rape, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Melancholy, Virtue/Virtues

- GIANI, FELICE (Italian painter, illustrator, 1758–1823),
 Journey/Flight
 GIBB, ROBERT II (British artist, 1845–1932), Journey/Flight
 GIBSON, JOHN (British sculptor, 1790–1866),
 Abduction/Rape
 GIGOLI, LUDOVICO (Italian artist, 16th century),
 Honor/Honoring
 GILL, ERIC (British stone carver, engraver, typographer, author, 1882–1940), Ecstasy, Sport GILLOT, CLAUDE (French painter, printmaker, 1673–1722), Masks/Personae
 GILLRAY, JAMES (British caricaturist, 1757–1815),
 Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Money, Sin/Sinning
 GINNER, CHARLES (British painter, 1878–1952),
 Labor/Trades/Occupations
 GIORDANO, LUCA (Italian painter, printmaker, 1632–1705), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Damned Souls, Expulsion, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Laughter, Love and Death, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I GIORGIONE (GIORGIO DA CASTELFRANCO) (Italian painter, 1477/78–1510), Beheading/Decapitation, Judgment, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Pointing/Indicating, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
 Sleep/Sleeping
 GIOTTO DI BONDONE (Italian painter, architect, circa 1266–1337), Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms
 Raised, Artists/Art, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Death, Devotion/
 Piety, Dreams/Visions, Fame, Fools/Folly, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judgment,
 Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
 GIOVANNI ANTONIO DA BRESCIA (Italian printmaker, active 1490–circa 1528), Drunkenness/Intoxication GIOVANNI DA MILANO (Italian painter, active
 1346–1369), Birth/Childbirth
 GIOVANNI DI PAOLO (Italian painter, illuminator, 1403–1482), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent,
 Dawn/Dawning, Journey/Flight, Margins/Outsiders,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Sacrifice, Shipwreck,
 Virgin/Virginity, Zodiac GIOVANNINI, GIACOMO MARIA (Italian painter, printmaker, 1667–1717), Madness
 GIRARDON, FRANÇOIS (French sculptor, 1628–1715),
 Bath/Bathing, Seasons
 GIRODET-TRIOSON, ANNE-LOUIS (French painter, printmaker, 1767–1824), Abduction/Rape, Envy, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Judgment, Love and Death, Money, Naked/Nude, Sleep/Sleeping GIROLAMO DA CARPI (Italian painter, architect, 1501–1556), Penitence/Repentance, Virgin/Virginity
 GISLEBERTUS (French sculpture, 12th century), Judgment, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 GIULIO ROMANO (GIULIO PIPPI) (Italian painter, architect, 1491/99–1546), Bath/Bathing, Comic,
 Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame,
 Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Luxury, Metamorphosis, Nightmare, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
 GLACKENS, WILLIAM (American painter, 1870–1938),
 Bath/Bathing
 GLEIZES, ALBERT (French painter, author, 1881–1953),
 Sport
 GLEYRE, CHARLES (Swiss painter, 1806–1874),
 Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy
 GODET, HENRI (French sculptor, 1863–1937),
 Abduction/Rape
 GÖDING, HEINRICH (German painter, printmaker, 1531–1606), Communion
 GOES, HUGO VAN DER (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1440–1482), Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Martyrdom,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 GOGH, VINCENT VAN (Dutch artist, 1853–1890),
 Artists/Art, Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Ecstasy,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/
 Occupations, Madness, Melancholy, Night, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Physiognomy,
 Pregnancy, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning
 GOINGS, RALPH LADELL (American painter, born 1928),
 Mirror/Reflection
 GOLTZIUS, HENDRIK (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1558–1617), Adultery, Annunciation, Envy, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Laughter, Love and Death, Luxury, Money, Penitence/Repentance,
 Pointing/Indicating, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Vanity/Vanitas GOLTZIUS, JULIUS (Dutch printmaker, active circa 1575–1595), Months
 GONJOU, JEAN (French sculptor, architect, printmaker, active 1540, died circa 1568), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress GONZALÈS, EVA (French painter and pastellist, 1849–1883), Whiteness
 GOODALL, FREDERICK (British painter, 1822–1904),
 Expulsion
 GORKY, ARSHILE (VOSDANIG MANOOG ADOIAN)
 (American painter, 1904–1948), Martyrdom, Night
 GORNIK, APRIL (American painter, born 1953), Night GOSSAERT, JAN (MABUSE) (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1472–1533), Adultery, Betrayal, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Money
 GOTCH, THOMAS COOPER (British painter, printmaker, 1854–1931), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 GOTTLIEB, ADOLPH (American painter, 1903–1974),
 Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight, Night
 GÖTZ, GOTTFRIED BERNHARD (German painter, printmaker, 1708–1774), Pregnancy GOUJON, JEAN (French architect, printmaker, sculptor, active 1548, died 1564/68), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress GOW, ANDREW CARRICK (British artist, 1848–1920),
 Journey/Flight
 GOYA, FRANCISCO DE (Spanish painter, 1746–1828),
 Artists/Art, Beheading/Decapitation, Calumny,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Dreams/Visions,
 Fools/Folly, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Hanging, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Madness,
 Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Misfortune,
 Naked/Nude, Night, Nightmare, Order/Chaos,

- Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Self-Portraits I, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- GOZ, GOTTFRIED BERNHARD see GÖTZ, GOTTFRIED BERNHARD
- GOZZOLI, BENOZZO (Italian painter, 1420–1497), Abduction/Rape, Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
- GRAEFLE, ALBERT (British painter, 1807–1889), Widowhood
- GRAF, URS, THE ELDER (Swiss painter, printmaker, goldsmith, circa 1485–1527/29), Hanging
- GRAMMATICA, ANTIVEDUTO (Italian painter, 1571–1626), Betrayal
- GRANDPIERRE-DEVERZY, ADRIENNE-MARIE-LOUISE (French painter, 1798–1855), Self-Portraits II
- GRANDVILLE (JEAN-IGNACE-ISIDORE GÉRARD) (French illustrator, cartoonist, printmaker, 1803–1847), Automata, Caricature/Cartoon, Nightmare, Seasons
- GRECO, EL (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI) (Greek painter in Spain, 1541–1614), Arms Raised, Crucifixion, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Martyrdom, Money, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Serpent's Bite, Virgin/Virginity
- GREUZE, JEAN-BAPTISTE (French painter, 1725–1805), Death, Mirror/Reflection, Penitence/Repentance, Widowhood
- GRIBELIN, SIMON II (British printmaker, 1661–1733), Choice/Choosing
- GRIEN, HANS BALDUNG see BALDUNG, HANS
- GRIMSHAW, JOHN ATKINSON (British painter, 1836–1893), Night
- GRIS, JUAN (Spanish painter, 1887–1924), Artists/Art
- GROS, ANTOINE-JEAN, BARON (French painter, 1771–1835), Death, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating
- GROSZ, GEORGE (German painter, printmaker, 1893–1958), Caricature/Cartoon, Dreams/Visions, Funeral/Burial, Order/Chaos
- GROUX, HENRI DE (Belgium painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1867–1930), Apocalypse
- GRÜNEWALD, MATTHIAS (German painter, circa 1480–1520), Annunciation, Ascent/Descent, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Light II, Madness, Nightmare, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Temptation
- GU, HWAN YOUNG see HWAN YOUNG GU
- GUARDI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO (Italian painter, 1699–1760), Artists/Art
- GUARIENTO (Italian painter, circa 1310–circa 1370), Fame
- GUERCINO (GIOVANNI FRANCESCO BARBIERI) (Italian painter, 1591–1666), Adultery, Calumny, Dawn/Dawning, Funeral/Burial, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Melancholy, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues
- GUIARD, LAURENT (French sculptor, 1723–1788), Journey/Flight
- GUISE MASTER see MASTER OF THE GUISE HOURS
- GUMP, JOHANNES BAPTISTE, THE ELDER (German artist, 1651–1728), Self-Portraits I
- GUSTON, PHILIP (American painter, 1913–1980), Hanging, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- GUTHRIE, JAMES (British painter, 1859–1930), Whiteness
- GUTTOSO, RENATO (Italian painter, author, 1912–1987), Martyrdom
- HAARLEM, CORNELIS VAN see CORNELISZ. VAN HAARLEM, CORNELIS
- HAAS, ERNST (American photographer, born 1921), Order/Chaos
- HAAS, PHILIP (American photographer, active 1839–1857), Money
- HABERLE, JOHN (American painter, 1856–1933), Money
- HAECHT, WILLEM II VAN (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1599–1637), Imagination/Creativity
- HAGESANDROS see AGESANDROS OF RHODES
- HALLÉ, NOËL (French painter, printmaker, 1856–after 1908), Virtue/Virtues
- HALPRIN, ANN (artist, 20th century), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- HALS, FRANS (Dutch painter, 1581/85–1666), Laughter, Luxury, Vanity/Vanitas
- HAMILTON, GAVIN (British painter, antiquary, 1723–1798), Death, Whiteness
- HAMILTON, JAMES (American painter, 1819–1878), Sublime
- HAMILTON, RICHARD (British artist, born 1922), Comic
- HAMILTON, WILLIAM (British painter, 1751–1801), Seasons
- HAN KAN (Chinese painter, active 2nd and 3rd quarters of 8th century), Luxury
- HARNETT, WILLIAM (American painter, 1848–1892), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Money
- HART, SOLOMON ALEXANDER (British painter, 1806–1881), Judaism
- HARTLEY, MARSDEN (American painter, poet, 1877–1943), Imagination/Creativity
- HARUNOBU, SUZUKI (Japanese printmaker, circa 1725–1770), Seasons
- HARVEY, ELISABETH (British artist, active 1802–1812), Widowhood
- HASENCLEVER, JOHANN PETER (German painter, 1810–1853), Artists/Art
- HASSAM, CHILDE (American painter, printmaker, 1859–1935), Night
- HAUDEBOURT-LESCOT, ANTOINETTE-CÉCILE-HORTENSE (French painter, 1784–1845), Self-Portraits II
- HAUSMANN, RAOUL (Austrian painter, sculptor, author, 1886–1971), Automata
- HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT (British painter, author, 1786–1846), Artists/Art
- HAYEZ, FRANCESCO (Italian artist, 1791–1881), Adultery, Kiss/Kissing
- HAYMAN, FRANCIS (British painter, 1700–1776), Abandonment, Whiteness
- HEADE, MARTIN JOHNSON (American painter, 1819–1904), Light II, Night
- HEARTFIELD, JOHN (German painter, printmaker, filmmaker, journalist, 1891–1968), Hanging, Money
- HEATH, WILLIAM (British artist, 1795–1848), Hanging

- HECKEL, ERICH (German painter, printmaker, 1883–1970), Bath/Bathing, Madness
- HEDA, WILLEM CLAESZ. (Dutch painter, 1594–1680/82), Vanity/Vanitas
- HEEM, JAN DAVIDSZ. DE (Dutch painter, 1606–circa 1684), Abundance, Vanity/Vanitas
- HEEMSKERCK, MAERTEN VAN (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, 1498–1574), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Betrayal, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Music, Peasantry, Sacrifice, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite
- HEINTZ, JOSEPH, THE ELDER (Swiss painter, architect, 1564–1609), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape
- HEMESSEN, JAN VAN (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1500–1575), Journey/Flight
- HEMESSEN, KATHARINA VAN (Netherlandish painter, 1527/28–circa 1587), Self-Portraits II
- HENFENFELD, MARTIN PFINZING VON (German painter, 1521–1572), Misfortune
- HENRI, ROBERT (American painter, 1865–1929), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Laughter
- HERACLITUS (Roman copyist, 2nd century), Comic
- HERDMAN, ROBERT (British painter, 1829–1888), Beheading/Decapitation, Expulsion, Journey/Flight
- HERING, LOY (German sculptor, circa 1484–after 1554), Betrayal
- HERKOMER, HUBERT VON (British painter, printmaker, 1849–1914), Margins/Outsiders, Virtue/Virtues
- HERNEISEN, ANDREAS (German painter, 1538–1610), Protestantism
- HERRAD VON LANDSBERG (German abbess, author, illuminator, active 1168, died 1195), Ascent/Descent, Fortune
- HERRI MET DE BLES (Early Netherlandish painter, circa 1510–circa 1550), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- HERRING, JOHN FREDERICK, I (British painter, 1795–1865), Harvesting
- HESDIN, JACQUEMART DE (French illuminator, active 1380–1411), Fools/Folly, Funeral/Burial, Journey/Flight
- HEY, JEAN see MASTER OF MOULINS
- HEYDEN, PIETER VAN DER (Netherlandish printmaker, circa 1530–circa 1575), Seasons
- HICKS, EDWARD (American painter, 1780–1849), Order/Chaos, Peace
- HICKS, GEORGE ELGAR (British painter, 1824–1914), Abandonment
- HIERON (Greek vase painter, circa 400 B.C.), Adultery
- HIGHMORE, JOSEPH (British painter, 1692–1780), Abandonment, Whiteness
- HILDEBERT (German illuminator, 12th century), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- HILDEGARD VON BINGEN (German illuminator, author, active 1142–1152), Birth/Childbirth
- HILDENBRAND, ADOLF (German painter, printmaker, enamelist, 1881–1944), Self-Portraits I
- HILLIARD, NICOLAS (British painter, 1547?–1619), Melancholy, Widowhood, Virgin/Virginity
- HIROSHIGE (Japanese printmaker, 1797–1858), Path/Road/Crossroads, Seasons
- HIRSCH, JOSEPH (American painter, 1910–1981), Hanging
- HIRSCHFELD, AL (American cartoonist, 20th century), Caricature/Cartoon
- HOBBEEMA, MEINDERT (Dutch painter, draftsman, 1638–1709), Path/Road/Crossroads
- HOCH, HANNAH (German artist, 1889–1978), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- HOCKNEY, DAVID (British painter, printmaker, photographer, collagist, sceneographer, born 1937), Bath/Bathing
- HODLER, FERDINAND (Swiss painter, 1853–1918), Dawn/Dawning, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Night, Nightmare, Protestantism
- HOERLE, HEINRICH (German painter, 1895–1936), Dreams/Visions
- HOFFMAN, MALVINA (American sculptor, 1887–1966), Kiss/Kissing
- HOFMANN, HANS (German painter in the United States, 1880–1956), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- HOGARTH, WILLIAM (British painter, 1697–1764), Abandonment, Adultery, Artists/Art, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Laughter, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Money, Order/Chaos, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- HOGENBERG, FRANS (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, and publisher, before 1540–1590?), Fools/Folly
- HOIN, CLAUDE-JEAN-BAPTISTE (French painter, pastel, printmaker, 1750–1817), Whiteness
- HOKUSAI, KATSUSHIKA (Japanese printmaker, 1760–1849), Dawn/Dawning, Sport
- HOLBEIN, HANS, THE YOUNGER (German painter, printmaker, circa 1492–1543), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Fools/Folly, Luxury, Money, Music, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas
- HOLIDAY, HENRY (British artist, 1839–1927), Hair/Haircutting
- HOLL, FRANK (British painter, 1845–1888), Abandonment
- HOLLAR, WENCESLAS (Bohemian printmaker, 1607–1677), Destruction of City, Seasons, Self-Portraits I
- HOLZER, ELIZABETH (American artist, 20th century), Grieving/Lamentation
- HOMER, WINSLOW (American painter, 1836–1910), Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Night, Reading, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck
- HONDIUS, HENDRIK II (Dutch artist, active circa 1597), Seasons, Vanity/Vanitas
- HONTHORST, GERRIT VAN (Dutch painter, 1590–1656), Adultery, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Laughter, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- HOOGE, ROMEYN DE (Dutch painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1645–1708), Funeral/Burial
- HOOGSTRATEN, SAMUEL VAN (Dutch painter, printmaker, poet, 1627–1678), Betrayal, Pregnancy
- HOOKE, ROBERT (British scientist, architect, inventor, 1635–1703), Destruction of City
- HOPPER, EDWARD (American painter, 1882–1967), Bath/Bathing, Light II, Melancholy, Night, Order/Chaos

- HOSMER, HARRIET GOODHUE (American sculptor in Italy, 1830–1908), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting
- HOUBRAKEN, ARNOLD (Dutch art historian, painter, printmaker, 1660–1719), Self-Portraits I
- HOWARD, MICHAEL (British sculptor, 20th century), Automata
- HOWE, OSCAR (American Sioux painter, 20th century), Ecstasy
- HUBER, WOLF (German painter, printmaker, 1485/90–1553), Hanging
- HUGHES, ARTHUR (British painter, 1832–1915), Death, Marriage/Betrothal
- HUGO, JEAN (French painter, designer, 1894–1984), Music
- HUGO, VICTOR (French author, draftsman, 1802–1885), Hanging
- HUMBELOT, JEAN-BAPTISTE (French printmaker, active 1635–1642), Female Beauty and Adornment
- HUNT, RICHARD MORRIS (American architect, 1827–1895), Luxury
- HUNT, WILLIAM HOLMAN (British painter, 1827–1910), Death, Funeral/Burial, Hair/Haircutting, Light I, Margins/Outsiders, Mirror/Reflection, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Temptation
- HUTINOT, PIERRE (French sculptor, 1616–1679), Seasons
- HUYS, PIETER (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, circa 1519–1584), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- HWAN YOUNG GU (artist, 20th century), Sin/Sinning
- IBBETSON, JULIUS CAESAR (British painter, printmaker, 1759–1817), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- INGRES, JEAN-AUGUSTE-DOMINIQUE (French painter, 1780–1867), Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Honor/Honoring, Kiss/Kissing, Luxury, Naked/Nude, Reading
- INNESS, GEORGE (American painter, 1825–1894), Harvesting, Night, Sublime
- INOUE, BUKICHI (Japanese architect, 20th century), Labyrinth/Maze
- IPOUSTÉGUY, JEAN-ROBERT (French sculptor, painter, born 1920), Bath/Bathing
- ISABEY, EUGÈNE (French painter, printmaker, 1803–1886), Journey/Flight
- ISIDORUS OF MILETUS (Carian architect, 6th century), Sanctuary
- ISRAËLS, JOZEF (Dutch painter, 1824–1911), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- JACOBELLO DEL FIORE (Italian painter, 1370–1439), Justice
- JACOBSZ., DIRK (Early Netherlandish painter, 1497–1567), Vanity/Vanitas
- JACOPO DA EMPOLI (JACOPO CHIMENTI) (Italian painter, 1554–1648), Toilet Scenes
- JACQUE, CHARLES-ÉMILE (French painter, printmaker, 1813–1894), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- JACQUET-DROZ FAMILY (French artists, metalworkers, 16th–17th century), Automata
- JANCO, MARCEL (Romanian painter, architect, born 1895), Order/Chaos
- JANSSENS, ABRAHAM (Flemish painter, 1575–1632), Abundance
- JE Aurat, ETIENNE (French painter, printmaker, 1699–1789), Female Beauty and Adornment
- JEGHER, JAN CHRISTOFFEL (Flemish printmaker, 1618–1667), Humors
- JERVAS, CHARLES (British painter, printmaker, circa 1675–1739), Whiteness
- JEWETT, WILLIAM SMITH (American painter, 1812–1873), Dreams/Visions
- JIGOKU ZOSHI (Japanese scroll painter, 12th century), Sin/Sinning
- JOEST, JAN (Netherlandish painter, circa 1450–1519), Night
- JOHANNOT, TONY (French painter, printmaker, 1803–1852), Nightmare
- JOHN, AUGUSTUS EDWIN (British painter, 1878–1961), Serpent's Bite
- JOHN, GWEN (British painter, 1876–1939), Artists/Art, Reading, Self-Portraits II
- JOHNS, JASPER (American painter, printmaker, born 1930), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Grieving/Lamentation, Mirror/Reflection, Patronage
- JOHNSON, EASTMAN (American painter, 1824–1906), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- JOHNSON, WILLIAM HENRY (American painter, printmaker, 1901–1970), Crucifixion
- JONES, ALLEN (British painter, sculptor, printmaker, born 1937), Upside Down
- JONES, LOIS MAILOU (American painter, designer, born 1905), Martyrdom
- JONES, THOMAS (British painter, 1742–1803), Sublime
- JOOS VAN GENT or GHENT (JOOS VAN WASSENHOVE) (Early Netherlandish painter, draftsman, active 1460–1475), Betrayal, Communion, Fame
- JORDAENS, JACOB (Flemish painter, 1593–1678), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Laughter, Madness, Protestantism, Serpent's Bite
- JOSEPH, SCRIBE OF PONTARLIER (French?, active circa 1300), Judaism
- JUAN DE FLANDES (Netherlandish painter in Spain, active 1496–1519), Annunciation, Baptism, Dawn/Dawning, Virgin/Virginity
- JUANES, JUAN DE (VICENTE JUAN MACIP) (Spanish painter, circa 1523–1579), Communion
- JULIEN DE PARME, JEAN-ANTOINE (French painter, 1736–1799), Abduction/Rape
- JURYSTA, GARY (American artist, 20th century), Communion
- JUSTUS VAN GHENT see JOOS VAN GENT
- KAHLO, FRIDA (Mexican painter, 1907–1954), Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Death, Dreams/Visions, Hair/Haircutting, Nightmare, Self-Portraits II
- KALATES (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Comic
- KALE, WILLEM (Dutch painter, 1619–1693), Abundance
- KALKAR, JAN JOEST VAN see JOEST, JAN
- KANDINSKY, VASILIJ (Russian painter, 1866–1944), Dreams/Visions, Night, Order/Chaos, Upside Down

- KANGAKU SHINSUHITSU (Japanese screen painter, 16th century), Seasons
- KAPROW, ALLAN (American artist, born 1927), Funeral/Burial
- KATZ, ALEX (American painter, printmaker, born 1927), Mirror/Reflection, Night
- KAUFFMANN, ANGELICA (Swiss painter, printmaker in Italy and Britain, 1741–1807), Abandonment, Artists/Art, Choice/Choosing, Death, Journey/Flight, Light II, Love and Death, Melancholy, Path/Road/Crossroads, Self-Portraits II
- KAUFMANN, ISADOR (Hungarian painter, 1853–1921), Judaism
- KAULBACH, WILHELM VON (German architect, painter, illustrator, 1805–1874), Madness, Protestantism
- KAYE, OTIS (American artist, 1885–1974), Money
- KEION, SUMIYOSHI (Japanese painter, 13th century), Destruction of City
- KELLER, ALBERT VON (Swiss painter, 1844–1920), Devotion/Piety
- KELLY, MARY (American artist, born 1954), Birth/Childbirth
- KENT, WILLIAM (British painter, architect, landscape gardener, 1684–1748), Seasons
- KETEL, CORNELIS (Dutch painter, architect, 1548–1616), Vanity/Vanitas
- KEYSER, NICAISE DE (Belgian painter, 1813–1887), Imagination/Creativity
- KEYSER, THOMAS DE (Dutch painter, architect, 1596/97–1667), Vanity/Vanitas
- KHNOPFF, FERNAND (Belgian painter, sculptor, designer, author, 1854–1921), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Temptation, Whiteness
- KIEFER, ANSELM (German painter, born 1945), Apocalypse
- KIESLER, FREDERICK JOHN (Austrian architect, sculptor, painter, in the United States, circa 1890–1965), Judgment
- KING, EMMA BROWNLOW see BROWNLOW, EMMA B.
- KING, FRANK (FRANCIS SCOTT) (American painter, sculptor, printmaker, illustrator, 1850–1913), Marriage/Betrothal
- KIRCHNER, ERNST LUDWIG (German painter, printmaker, 1880–1938), Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude, Sacrifice
- KIYONAGA, TORII (Japanese printmaker, 1752–1815), Bath/Bathing, Naked/Nude
- KLEE, PAUL (Swiss painter, printmaker, 1879–1940), Avarice, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Fame, Madness, Night, Upside Down
- KLEITIAS (Greek vase painter, 575–560 B.C.), Beheading/Decapitation, Sport
- KLEOPHRADES PAINTER (EPIKTETOS II) (Greek vase painter, 500–475 B.C.), Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy
- KLIMT, GUSTAV (Austrian painter, 1862–1918), Beheading/Decapitation, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Kiss/Kissing, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning
- KLINGER, MAX (German painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1857–1920), Abduction/Rape, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Madness, Misfortune, Nightmare, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating
- KLÖCKER-EHRENSTRAHL, DAVID see EHRENSTRAHL, DAVID KLÖCKER
- KLUMPKE, ANNA ELIZABETH (American painter, 1856–1942), Artists/Art
- KLUTSIS, GUSTAV GUSTAVOVIC (Russian artist, 1895–1944), Sport
- KNUPFER, NIKOLAUS (Dutch painter, 1603–1665), Marriage/Betrothal
- KOCH, JOSEPH ANTON (Austrian painter, printmaker, 1768–1839), Sublime
- KOCHERGIN, N. M. (Soviet poster artist, active circa 1920), Peasantry
- KOEHLER, ROBERT (German painter, printmaker, in the United States, 1815–1917), Margins/Outsiders
- KOKOSCHKA, OSKAR (Austrian painter, printmaker, 1886–1980), Ascent/Descent, Ecstasy, Madness, Misfortune, Temptation
- KOLLWITZ, KÄTHE (German printmaker, sculptor, 1867–1945), Abduction/Rape, Artists/Art, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Peasantry, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits II, Visiting/Visitation
- KOLOSOV, AUDREY (artist, active circa 1990), Sin/Sinning
- KONINCK, SOLOMON (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1609–1656), Sacrifice
- KOSUT, TIVADAR (Yugoslav artist, 20th century), Devotion/Piety
- KRAEZYNA, SWIETLAN (artist, 20th century), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- KRAEMER, DIETER (artist, active circa 1970), Melancholy
- KRASNER, LEE (American painter, 1908–1984), Self-Portraits II
- KRATINOS (Greek sculptor, active 484–448 B.C.), Comic
- KRUGAR, BARBARA (American conceptual artist, film critic, born 1945), Naked/Nude
- KTESILOCHOS (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Comic
- KUBIN, ALFRED (Austrian painter, illustrator, author, 1877–1959), Madness, Nightmare
- LABILLE-GUIARD, ADÉLAÏDE (French artist, 1749–1803), Artists/Art, Self-Portraits II
- LACHAISE, GASTON (French sculptor, 1882–1935), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Imagination/Creativity, Upside Down
- LACOMBE, GEORGES (French painter, sculptor, 1868–1916), Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion
- LACOUR, PIERRE (French painter, printmaker, 1745–1814), Love and Death
- LAER, PIETER VAN (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1599–circa 1642), Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance
- LA FARGE, JOHN (American painter, author, 1835–1910), Journey/Flight, Light II
- LAFITTE, LOUIS (French sculptor, 1770–1828), Months
- LAGRENÉE, LOUIS-JEAN-FRANÇOIS (French painter, 1725–1805), Abduction/Rape, Envy

- LAGUERRE, LOUIS (French painter in Great Britain, 1663–1721), Honor/Honoring
- LA HYRE, LAURENT DE (French painter, printmaker, 1606–1656), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Music
- LAIRESSE, GERARD DE (Flemish painter, printmaker, theorist, 1640–1711), Serpent's Bite, Temptation, Upside Down
- LALA OF KYZIKOS (Roman painter from Asia Minor, 1st century B.C.), Mirror/Reflection
- LAMA, GIULIA (Italian painter, active 1728), Self-Portraits II
- LANCRET, NICOLAS (French painter, 1690–1743), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Masks/Personae
- LANDRIANI, PAOLO CAMILLO (Italian painter, 1560/70–1618/19), Plague/Pestilence
- LANDSEER, EDWIN (British painter, 1802–1873), Marriage/Betrothal, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck
- LANE, FITZ HUGH (American painter, printmaker, 1804–1865), Light II
- LANFRANCO, GIOVANNI (Italian painter, 1582–1647), Betrayal, Envy, Sublime
- LANG, FRITZ (German filmmaker, 20th century), Automata
- LANGE, DORTHEA (American photographer, 1895–1965), Dreams/Visions
- LANOUE, FÉLIX-HIPPOLYTE (French painter, 1812–1872), Expulsion
- LARGILLIERRE, NICOLAS DE (French painter, 1656–1746), Female Beauty and Adornment
- LASSALLE-BORDES, GUSTAVE (French artist, 1814–after 1868), Serpent's Bite
- LASTMAN, PIETER PIETERSZ. (Dutch painter, 1583–1633), Annunciation, Journey/Flight, Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
- LA TOUR, ETIENNE DE (French painter, 1621–1692), Reading
- LA TOUR, GEORGES DE (French painter, 1593–1652), Comic, Fortune, Light II, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Night, Penitence/Repentance
- LAURANA, FRANCESCO (Italian sculptor, architect, and medalist, circa 1420–circa 1582), Fools/Folly, Peace
- LAURENCIN, MARIE (French painter, printmaker, 1885–1956), Artists/Art
- LAVILLE-LEROUX, MARIE see BENOIST, MARIE
- GUILHELMINE (née DE LAVILLE-LEROUX)
- LAWRENCE, JACOB (American painter, draftsman, born 1917), Journey/Flight
- LAWRENCE, THOMAS (British painter, 1765–1830), Whiteness
- LAWSON, ERNEST (American painter, 1873–1939), Night
- LEAR, EDWARD (British painter, printmaker, author, 1812–1888), Upside Down
- LE BRUN, CHARLES (French painter, designer, 1619–1690), Abduction/Rape, Humors, Mirror/Reflection, Penitence/Repentance, Seasons, Self-Portraits I
- LECLERC, JEAN (French painter, printmaker, 1596–1625), Death
- LECOMTE DU NOÛY, JULES-JEAN-ANTOINE (French painter, sculptor, 1842–1923?), Luxury
- LEFEVRE, RAOUL, Choice/Choosing
- LÉGER, FERNAND (French painter, 1881–1955), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection
- LEGROS, ALPHONSE (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1837–1922), Devotion/Piety
- LE GROS, PIERRE, THE YOUNGER (French sculptor, architect, 1666–1719), Protestantism
- LEHMBERGER, GEORG (German artist, 16th century), Protestantism
- LEIBL, WILHELM MARIA HUBERTUS (German painter, printmaker, 1844–1900), Devotion/Piety
- LEIGH, WILLIAM ROBINSON (American painter, 1866–1955), Dreams/Visions
- LEIGHTON, FREDERIC, BARON (British painter, sculptor, 1830–1896), Abandonment, Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Love and Death, Peace, Sacrifice
- LE LORRAINE, LOUIS-JOSEPH (French painter, printmaker, 1715–1759), Dawn/Dawning
- LEMOINE, MARIE-VICTORIE (French painter, 1754–1820), Self-Portraits II
- LE MOYNE, FRANÇOIS (French painter, 1688–1737), Abduction/Rape, Apotheosis/Deification, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude
- LE NAIN, LOUIS (French painter, 1593–1648), Communion, Margins/Outsiders, Peasantry
- LENINGRAD PAINTER (Attic vase painter, circa 475–450 B.C.), Self-Portraits II
- LE NÔTRE, ANDRÉ (French landscape architect, 1613–1700), Path/Road/Crossroads
- LENZ, PETER (DESIDERIUS) (German sculptor, painter, architect, 1832–1928), Protestantism
- LÉON, FRÉDÉRIC, Peasantry
- LEONARDO DA VINCI (Italian painter, sculptor, architect, author, engineer, 1452–1519), Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Baptism, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Evil Eye, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Imagination/Creativity, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sublime, Zodiac
- LE PAUTRE, PIERRE (French sculptor, printmaker, 1660–1744), Journey/Flight
- LÉPICÉ, NICOLAS-BERNARD (French painter, 1735–1784), Adultery
- LESLIE, ALFRED (American painter, born 1927), Mirror/Reflection
- LESSING, CARL FRIEDRICH (German painter, 1808–1880), Devotion/Piety, Protestantism
- LE SUEUR, EUSTACHE (French painter, 1531–1606), Communion, Sacrifice
- LEUTZE, EMMANUEL GOTTLIEB (German painter in the United States, 1816–1868), Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads
- LE VAU, LOUIS (French architect, 1612?–1670), Luxury
- LEVINE, JACK (American painter, born 1915), Caricature/Cartoon, Funeral/Burial
- LEVY, ALPHONSE-JACQUES (French artist, 1843–1918), Pregnancy
- LEVY, EMILE (French painter, 1826–1890), Abandonment

- LÉVY-DHURMEN, LUCIEN (French painter, sculptor, 1865–1953), Dreams/Visions, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- LEWIS, GEORGE ROBERT (British painter, 1782–1872), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- LEWIS, WYNDHAM (British painter, author, 1882–1957), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- LEWIS PAINTER (POLYGNOTOS II) (Greek vase painter, circa 475–450 B.C.), Abandonment
- LEYS, HENDRIK, BARON (Belgian painter, printmaker, 1815–1869), Protestantism
- LEYSTER, JUDITH (Dutch painter, 1609/10–1660), Artists/Art, Laughter, Self-Portraits II, Vanity/Vanitas
- LHERMITTE, LÉON-AUGUSTIN (French painter, printmaker, 1844–1925), Peasantry
- LHOTE, ANDRÉ (French painter, illustrator, critic, 1885–1962), Pregnancy
- LICHTENSTEIN, ROY (American painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1923–1997), Caricature/Cartoon, Grieving/Lamentation, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Night, Patronage, Pointing/Indicating
- LIEBERMANN, MAX (German painter, printmaker, 1847–1935), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- LIMBOURG BROTHERS (Flemish illuminators, active 1400–1416), Damned Souls, Expulsion, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Months, Night, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Upside Down, Zodiac
- LIN, MAYA YING (American sculptor, born 1959), Grieving/Lamentation
- LINDNER, RICHARD (American painter, 1901–1978), Mirror/Reflection
- LINGELBACH, JOHANNES (Dutch painter, 1622–1674), Plague/Pestilence
- LIPCHITZ, JACQUES (French sculptor, 1891–1973), Abduction/Rape, Penitence/Repentance
- LIPPI, FILIPPINO (Italian painter, draftsman, circa 1457–1504), Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Music, Reading, Whiteness
- LIPPI, FRA FILIPPO (Italian painter, circa 1406–1469), Annunciation, Artists/Art, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Reading, Virgin/Virginity
- LOCHNER, STEFAN (German painter, circa 1410–1451), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- LODGE, JUDITH (American painter in Canada, born 1941), Sin/Sinning
- LOMAZZO, GIOVANNI PAOLO (Italian painter, poet, theorist, 1538–1600), Imagination/Creativity
- LOMI, AURELIO (Italian painter, 1556–1622), Bath/Bathing
- LONG, RICHARD (British sculptor, born 1945), Path/Road/Crossroads
- LONGHI, PIETRO (Italian painter, 1702–1785), Masks/Personae
- LONGUEIL, JOSEPH DE (French printmaker, 1730–1792), Seasons
- LORENZETTI, AMBROGIO (Italian painter, died circa 1348), Hanging, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Path/Road/Crossroads, Virtue/Virtues
- LORENZETTI, PIETRO (Italian painter, illuminator, active before 1307–1348?), Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Martyrdom, Night, Virtue/Virtues
- LORENZI, BATTISTA (Italian sculptor, 1527/28–1594), Abduction/Rape
- LORENZO D'ALESSANDRO DA SAN SEVERINO (Italian painter, active 1462, died 1503), Annunciation, Visiting/Visitation
- LORENZO MONACO (Italian painter, circa 1370–1425), Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Light II, Night
- L'ORME, PHILIBERT DE (French architect, circa 1515–1570), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- LOTH, JOHANN CARL (CARLOTTO) (German painter, printmaker in Italy, 1632–1698), Abandonment
- LOTTO, LORENZO (Italian painter, circa 1480–1556), Adultery, Annunciation, Bath/Bathing, Dreams/Visions
- LOUTHERBOURG, PHILIP-JAMES DE (French painter, scenographer in Great Britain, 1740–1812), Sublime
- LOZOWICK, LOUIS (American painter, printmaker, 1892–1973), Dreams/Visions
- LUCAS VAN LEYDEN (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, 1494–1533), Betrayal, Calumny, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fools/Folly, Hair/Haircutting, Martyrdom, Money, Virtue/Virtues
- LÜCKE, JOHANN CHRISTIAN LUDWIG (German sculptor, ivory carver, circa 1703–1780), Laughter
- LUINI, BERNARDINO (Italian painter, circa 1480–1532?), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Love and Death, Sacrifice
- LUKS, GEORGE BENJAMIN (American painter, printmaker, 1866/67–1933), Night, Sport
- LU KUANG (Chinese painter, active 2nd quarter of the 14th century), Seasons
- LUTI, BENEDETTO (Italian painter, printmaker, 1666–1724), Plague/Pestilence
- LYSIPPUS (Greek sculptor, circa 390–after 310 B.C.), Fortune, Naked/Nude, Sport
- MACDONALD, MARGARET (Scottish designer, painter, wife of Charles Rennie Mackintosh, 1865–1933), Pregnancy
- MACDOWELL, PATRICK (Irish sculptor, 1799–1870), Love and Death
- MACKINTOSH, MARGARET MACDONALD see MACDONALD, MARGARET
- MACMONNIES, FREDERICK WILLIAM (American sculptor, 1863–1937), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Martyrdom, Sacrifice
- MACRINO D'ALBA (Italian painter, c.1465–c.1528), Annunciation
- MADERNO, STEFANO (Italian sculptor, circa 1576–1636), Martyrdom
- MADRAZO Y AGNUDO JOSÉ DE (Spanish painter, printmaker, 1781–1859), Death
- MAES, NICOLAES (Dutch painter, 1634–1693), Melancholy, Protestantism, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
- MAGDALEN MASTER (Italian painter, 13th century), Hair/Haircutting, Penitence/Repentance

- MAGNASCO, ALESSANDRO (LISSANDRINO) (Italian painter, 1667–1749), Sin/Sinning, Temptation
- MAGNIER, PHILIPPE (French sculptor, 1647–1715), Seasons
- MAGRITTE, RENÉ (Belgian painter, 1898–1967), Comic, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night, Order/Chaos
- MAHU, CORNELIUS (Flemish painter, 1613–1689), Margins/Outsiders
- MAITANI, LORENZO (Italian sculptor, architect, circa 1275–1330), Damned Souls, Order/Chaos
- MAKART, HANS (Austrian painter, 1840–1884), Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning
- MAKRON (Greek vase painter, circa 500–475 B.C.), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- MALEVICH, KAZIMIR SEVERINOVIC (Russian painter, writer, 1878–1935), Dreams/Visions, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Order/Chaos
- MANARA, BALDASSARE (Italian artist, active 1526–1547), Love and Death
- MANET, ÉDOUARD (French painter, 1832–1883), Apotheosis/Deification, Choice/Choosing, Death, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Funeral/Burial, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Whiteness
- MANETTI, RUTILIO DI LORENZO (Italian painter, 1571–1639), Madness
- MANFREDI, BARTOLOMEO (Italian painter, 1582–circa 1628), Money
- MANSHIP, PAUL (American sculptor, 1885–1966), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight
- MANTEGAZZA, CHISTOFORO (Italian sculptor, goldsmith, active 1470–1495), Expulsion
- MANTEGNA, ANDREA (Italian painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1431–1505), Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Evil Eye, Excess, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Justice, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins
- MANUEL, NIKLAS (NIKOLAUS DEUTSCH) (Swiss painter, circa 1454–1530), Imagination/Creativity
- MANZÙ, GIACOMO (Italian sculptor, born 1908), Hanging
- MAPPLETHORP, ROBERT (American photographer, 20th century), Naked/Nude
- MARC, FRANZ (German painter, printmaker, 1880–1916), Dreams/Visions, Light II
- MARCANTONIO see RAIMONDI, MARCANTONIO
- MARCHANT, GUYOT (French artist, active circa 1485), Death, Money
- MARCHI, VIRGILIO (Italian architect, 1895–1960), Dreams/Visions
- MARCIA (MARISA; TAMARA), Imagination/Creativity, Mirror/Reflection, Self-Portraits II
- MARCO DEL BUONO GIAMBERTI (Italian painter, 1402–1489), Honor/Honoring, Love and Death
- MARÉES, HANS VON (German painter, 1837–1887), Abduction/Rape
- MARIANI, CARLO MARIA (Italian painter, printmaker, born 1931), Abduction/Rape
- MARIETTE, JEAN (French painter, 1660–1742), Months
- MARINETTI, EMILIO (Italian artist, active 1919), Dreams/Visions
- MARINI, MARINO (Italian sculptor, painter, printmaker, 1901–1980), Arms Raised
- MARISA see MARCIA
- MARISOL (MARISOL ESCOBAR) (American sculptor, born 1930), Self-Portraits II
- MARLAY PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 450–420 B.C.), Marriage/Betrothal
- MARMION, SIMON (Flemish painter, illuminator, circa 1425–1489), Journey/Flight, Martyrdom, Whiteness
- MARSH, REGINALD (American painter, printmaker, 1898–1954), Bath/Bathing, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging
- MARTIN, JOHN (British painter, 1789–1854), Destruction of City, Expulsion, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Order/Chaos, Reading, Sublime
- MARTINEAU, ROBERT BRAITHWAITE (British painter, 1826–1869), Reading
- MARTINO DI BARTOLOMEO (Italian painter, active 1389–1434/35), Dreams/Visions, Light II, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
- MARY MAGDALEN MASTER see MAGDALEN MASTER
- MASACCIO (TOMMASO DI SER GIOVANNI DI MONE GUIDE) (Italian painter, 1401–circa 1428), Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Expulsion, Margins/Outsiders, Naked/Nude, Patronage, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down
- MASKELYNE, JOHN NEVIL, Automata
- MASOLINO DA PANICALE (TOMMASO FINI) (Italian painter, 1383–1447?), Melancholy, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
- MASRELIEZ, LOUIS-ADRIEN (French painter, architect, 1748–1810), Love and Death
- MASSON, ANDRÉ (French painter, author, 1896–1987), Abduction/Rape, Dreams/Visions, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis
- MASSYS, CORNELIS (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, 1510/11–1556–57), Annunciation
- MASSYS, JAN (Early Netherlandish painter, 1509–1575), Adultery, Betrayal, Comic
- MASSYS, QUENTIN (Early Netherlandish painter, 1465/66–1530), Comic, Fools/Folly, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Sin/Sinning
- MASTER BERTRAM see BERTRAM VON MINDEN
- MASTER E. S. (German printmaker, goldsmith, active 1450–circa 1467), Money, Visiting/Visitation
- MASTER F. B. (German printmaker, active circa 1550–1563), Melancholy
- MASTER FRANCKE (German painter, active 1424–1435), Birth/Childbirth

- MASTER HUGO (English illuminator, sculptor, active 1135–1150), Ascent/Descent
- MASTER I. B. WITH THE BIRD see PALUMBA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA
- MASTER I. D. C. (Belgian or French enamelist, active 1580–1600), Abduction/Rape
- MASTER OF 1515 (Italian printmaker, 16th century), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- MASTER OF FLEMALLE see CAMPIN, ROBERT
- MASTER OF FRANKFURT (Early Netherlandish painter, 1460–circa 1533), Fools/Folly
- MASTER OF MOULINS (HEY, JEAN) (French painter, active circa 1478–1510), Apocalypse
- MASTER OF SAINT GILLES (Early Netherlandish painter, active circa 1500), Baptism
- MASTER OF SAINT VERONICA (German painter, active circa 1395–1415), Beheading/Decapitation, Crucifixion
- MASTER OF THE APOLLO AND DAPHNE LEGEND (Italian painter, active circa 1480–1510), Calumny
- MASTER OF THE BARBARA LEGEND (Early Netherlandish painter, active 1470–1500), Betrayal
- MASTER OF THE BARBARINI PANELS (Italian painter, architect, active 1445–1485), Pregnancy
- MASTER OF THE BOUCICAUT HOURS see BOUCICAUT MASTER
- MASTER OF THE DUKE OF BEDFORD (French illuminator, 15th century), Months
- MASTER OF THE FIRST PRAYER BOOK OF MAXIMILIAN I (Early Netherlandish illuminator, active 1470–1488), Martyrdom
- MASTER OF THE GOLD SCROLLS (Netherlandish illuminator, active circa 1425–1450), Journey/Flight
- MASTER OF THE GRISELDA LEGEND (Italian painter, active late 15th–early 16th century), Virgin/Virginity
- MASTER OF THE GUISE HOURS (French illuminator, active circa 1410–1440), Journey/Flight
- MASTER OF THE HARVARD HANNIBAL (French illuminator, active circa 1410–1438), Whiteness
- MASTER OF THE LAZZARONI MADONNA (Italian painter, active 1395–1400), Justice
- MASTER OF THE LEGEND OF ST. LUCY (Early Netherlandish painter, active circa 1500), Music, Virgin/Virginity
- MASTER OF THE MAGDALEN LEGEND see MAGDALEN MASTER
- MASTER OF THE MANSI MAGDALEN (Netherlandish painter, draftsman, circa 1510–1525), Beheading/Decapitation
- MASTER OF THE PLANET (printmaker, active circa 1460–65), Imagination/Creativity
- MASTER OF THE PRAYER BOOK (Flemish manuscript illuminator, flourished circa 1500), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- MASTER OF THE ROHAN HOURS (French illuminator, active 1420–1440), Death
- MASTER S. I. (Netherlandish printmaker, 15th century), Vanity/Vanitas
- MASTER WILIGELMUS see WILIGELMO DA MODENA
- MATHAM, JACOB (Dutch printmaker, 1571–1631), Humors, Money, Months, Pointing/Indicating, Seasons
- MATISSE, HENRI (French painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1869–1954), Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Imagination/Creativity, Luxury, Mirror/Reflection, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping
- MATTA (ROBERTO SEBASTIAN ANTONIO ECHAURREN MATTA) (Chilean painter, printmaker, born 1911), Apocalypse, Night
- MATTEIS, PAOLO DE (Italian painter, 1662–1728), Choice/Choosing, Pointing/Indicating
- MATTEO DI GIOVANETTI (Italian artist, active 1343–1366), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- MAULBERTSCH, FRANZ ANTON (Austrian painter, draftsman, printmaker, 1724–1796), Abduction/Rape, Calumny, Journey/Flight, Love and Death
- MAXIMOV, VASIL MAXIMOVICH (Russian painter, printmaker, 1844–1911), Marriage/Betrothal
- MAY, ERNST WILHELM (German painter, printmaker, 1901–1968), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- MCTAGGERT, WILLIAM (English painter, 1835–1910), Seasons
- MECKENEM, ISRAHEL VAN, THE YOUNGER (German painter, printmaker, goldsmith, circa 1450–1503), Comic
- MEIDIAS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 420–390 B.C.), Abduction/Rape, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication
- MEIDNER, LUDWIG (German painter, printmaker, 1884–1966), Apocalypse, Dreams/Visions
- MEISSONIER, JEAN-LOUIS-ERNST (French painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1815–1891), Journey/Flight, Laughter
- MEIT, CONRAD (German sculptor, circa 1480–circa 1550), Betrayal
- MELLAN, CLAUDE (French painter, printmaker, 1598–1688), Honor/Honoring
- MELLERY, XAVIER (Belgian painter, 1845–1921), Imagination/Creativity
- MEMLINC, HANS see MEMLING, HANS
- MEMLING, HANS (Early Netherlandish painter, draftsman, circa 1433–1494), Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing, Funeral/Burial, Journey/Flight, Luxury, Music, Nightmare, Path/Road/Crossroads, Widowhood
- MÉNAGEOT, FRANÇOIS-GUILLAUME (French painter, 1744–1816), Death
- MENGES, ANTON RAPHAEL (German painter, critic, 1728–1779), Apotheosis/Deification, Self-Portraits I
- MENZEL, ADOLPH FRIEDRICH ERDMANN VON (German painter, printmaker, 1815–1905), Funeral/Burial
- MERCURIO, SCIPIONE (printmaker, active circa 1596), Pregnancy
- MERENGO, ARRIGO (Flemish sculptor in Italy, died 1723), Ascent/Descent
- MERIAN, MATTÄUS, THE ELDER (Swiss printmaker, 1593–1650), Expulsion
- MERRILD, KNUD (Danish painter in the United States, 1894–1954), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- MERYON, CHARLES (French printmaker, 1821–1868), Avarice, Margins/Outsiders

- MESSerschmidt, FRANZ XAVER (German sculptor, 1736–1783), Madness, Physiognomy
- METSU, GABRIEL (Dutch artist, 1629–1667), Adultery, Betrayal, Female Beauty and Adornment
- METSYS, QUENTIN see MASSYS, QUENTIN
- MEURER, F. (artist, active circa 1970), Path/Road/Crossroads
- MEYER, CONRAD (Swiss painter, printmaker, 1618–1689), Sleep/Sleeping
- MEYRING, HEINRICH see MERENGO, ARRIGO
- MICCO SPADARO see GARGIULO, DOMENICO (MICCO SPADARO)
- MICHALS, DUANE (American photographer, born 1932), Voyeurism
- MICHEL, JEAN (French sculptor, active circa 1450), Funeral/Burial
- MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI (Italian sculptor, painter, architect, poet, 1475–1564), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Expulsion, Fame, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Judaism, Luxury, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Temptation, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues
- MICHELE DA VERONA (Italian painter, circa 1147–1536/44), Marriage/Betrothal
- MICKER, JAN CHRISTIAENSZ. (Dutch artist, 1598–1664), Path/Road/Crossroads
- MIEREVELD, MICHIEL JANSZ. VAN (Dutch painter, 1567–1641), Pointing/Indicating
- MIERIS, FRANS VAN, THE ELDER (Dutch painter, 1635–1681), Artists/Art, Betrayal, Female Beauty and Adornment, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes
- MIGNARD, NICHOLAS (MIGNARD D'AVIGNON) (French painter, printmaker, 1606–1668), Journey/Flight
- MIGNARD, PIERRE I (French painter, 1612–1695), Imagination/Creativity, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite
- MIGNON, JEAN (French painter, printmaker, 1537–1552), Serpent's Bite
- MILLAIS, JOHN EVERETT (British painter, 1829–1896), Artists/Art, Communion, Death, Hair/Haircutting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Offering, Sacrifice, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
- MILLER, BRENDA (American artist, born 1941), Money
- MILLES, CARL (American sculptor, 1875–1955), Abduction/Rape
- MILLET, JEAN-FRANÇOIS I (FRANCISQUE MILLET) (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1642–1679), Plague/Pestilence
- MILLET, JEAN-FRANÇOIS (French painter, 1814–1875), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Devotion/Piety, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Night, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- MIRÓ, JOAN (Spanish painter, printmaker, sculptor, ceramist, 1893–1983), Ascent/Descent, Dreams/Visions, Mirror/Reflection, Night, Peasantry
- MOCETTO, GIROLAMO (Italian painter, printmaker, circa 1448–1531), Melancholy
- MODERSOHN-BECKER, PAULA (German painter, printmaker, 1876–1907), Artists/Art, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits II
- MOHOLY-NAGY, LÁSZLÓ (Hungarian painter, sculptor, printmaker, designer, 1895–1946), Dreams/Visions
- MOLA, PIER FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1612–1666), Humors
- MOLENAER, JAN MIENSE (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1610–1668), Female Beauty and Adornment, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter, Music, Vanity/Vanitas
- MOMPER, BARTHOLOMAUS DE (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, publisher, 1535–circa 1589), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MOMPER, JOOS DE, THE YOUNGER (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1564–1635), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- MONDRIAN, PIET (Dutch painter, 1872–1944), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dreams/Visions, Night, Order/Chaos
- MONET, CLAUDE (French painter, 1849–1926), Apotheosis/Deification, Caricature/Cartoon, Dawn/Dawning, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Whiteness
- MONNIER, HENRY BONAVENTURE (French artist, caricaturist, author, actor, 1805–1877), Caricature/Cartoon
- MONSIEL, EDMUND (Polish artist, 20th century), Devotion/Piety
- MONTICELLI, ADOLPHE-JOSEPH-THOMAS (French painter, 1824–1886), Abduction/Rape, Offering
- MOORE, HENRY SPENCER (British sculptor, 1898–1986), Order/Chaos
- MOR, ANTHONIS (Early Netherlandish painter, 1512/20–1575/77), Fools/Folly, Self-Portraits I
- MORANDINI, FRANCESCO (IL POPPI) (Italian painter, 1544–1597), Virtue/Virtues
- MORBELLI, ANGELO (Italian painter, 1853–1919), Peasantry
- MOREAU, GUSTAVE (French painter, 1826–1898), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Music, Nightmare
- MOREELSE, PAULUS (Dutch painter, architect, 1571–1635), Female Beauty and Adornment, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- MORGAN, BARBARA (American photographer, born 1900), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- MORGAN, EVELYN DE (British painter, 1855–1919), Abandonment
- MORGAN, FREDERICK (British painter, 1856–1927), Harvesting
- MORGAN, GERTRUDE (American artist, 20th century), Devotion/Piety

- MORISOT, BERTHE (French painter, 1841–1895), Female Beauty and Adornment, Pregnancy, Reading, Seasons, Self-Portraits II, Sleep/Sleeping, Whiteness
- MORLAND, GEORGE (British painter, 1763–1804), Money, Penitence/Repentance, Shipwreck
- MORONOBU, HISHIKAWA (Japanese printmaker, 1625–1695), Voyeurism
- MOROT, AIMÉ-NICOLAS (French painter, 1850–1913), Crucifixion
- MORRIS, ROBERT (American sculptor, born 1931), Apocalypse, Money
- MORRIS, WILLIAM (British designer, author, 1834–1896), Adultery, Death, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Mirror/Reflection, Sacrifice
- MOUNT, WILLIAM SIDNEY (American painter, 1807–1868), Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- MUKHINA, VERA (Russian sculptor, 1889–1953), Peasantry
- MULLER, HERMAN JANSZ. (Dutch printmaker, circa 1548–1617), Betrayal, Humors
- MULLER, JAN HARMENSZ. (Dutch printmaker, 1571–1628), Pointing/Indicating
- MÜLLER, OTTO (Swiss sculptor, born 1905), Bath/Bathing
- MULREADY, WILLIAM (British painter, 1786–1863), Marriage/Betrothal
- MULTSCHER, HANS (German painter, sculptor, circa 1400–1467), Communion
- MUNCH, EDVARD (Norwegian painter, printmaker, 1863–1944), Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Madness, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Night
- MUNNINGS, ALFRED JAMES (British painter, 1815–1959), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- MUNRO, ALEXANDER (British sculptor, 1825–1871), Reading
- MURER, CHRISTOPH (Swiss painter, glazier, printmaker, 1558–1614), Path/Road/Crossroads
- MURILLO, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEBAN (Spanish painter, 1617–1682), Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Laughter, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Virgin/Virginity
- MURPHY, CATHERINE E. (American painter, born 1946), Self-Portraits II
- MURRAY, ELIZABETH (American painter, born 1940), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- MUSI, AGOSTINO (AGOSTINO VENEZIANO) (Italian printmaker, 1490–1548), Imagination/Creativity
- MUSIC, ZORAN (Yugoslav artist, born 1909), Hanging
- MUYBRIDGE, EADWEARD (British photographer in the United States, 1830–1904), Automata, Naked/Nude
- MYRON (Greek sculptor, active circa 450 B.C.), Sport
- NADELMAN, ELIE (American sculptor, 1882–1946), Hermaphrodite/Androgyny
- NAGEL, JAN (Dutch painter, born 1616), Misfortune
- NAKIAN, REUBEN (American sculptor, 1897–1986), Abduction/Rape, Choice/Choosing, Destruction of City, Ecstasy
- NANNI DI BANCO (NANNI D'ANTONIO DI BANCO) (Italian sculptor, circa 1373–1421), Apotheosis/Deification, Martyrdom
- NARDO DI CIONI (Italian painter, active circa 1365, died 1365/66), Damned Souls, Journey/Flight
- NASH, PAUL (British painter, 1889–1946), Honor/Honoring
- NASON, PIETER (Dutch painter, circa 1612–1688/90), Vanity/Vanitas
- NAST, THOMAS (American cartoonist, illustrator, 1840–1902), Caricature/Cartoon, Money
- NATOIRE, CHARLES-JOSEPH (French painter, 1700–1777), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy
- NATTIER, JEAN-MARC (French painter, 1685–1766), Female Beauty and Adornment, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- NAUMAN, BRUCE (American sculptor, born 1941), Hanging, Light II
- NECK, JAN VAN (Dutch painter, 1635–1714), Metamorphosis
- NEEL, ALICE (American painter, 1900–1984), Artists/Art, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits II
- NEGRI, PIETRO (Italian painter, 1628–1679), Plague/Pestilence
- NEROCCIO DI BARTOLOMEO DE' LANDI (Italian painter, sculptor, designer, 1447–1550), Virgin/Virginity
- NETTI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1832–1894), Death
- NEWMAN, BARNETT (American painter, 1905–1970), Crucifixion, Grieving/Lamentation, Path/Road/Crossroads
- NEWMAN, ROBERT LOFTIN (American painter, 1827–1912), Reading
- NICCOLÒ (Italian sculptor, 12th century), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- NICCOLO FIORENTINO (Italian painter, 1404–1471), Fortune
- NICHOLAS OF VERDUN (Early Netherlandish goldsmith, enamelist, 12th–13th century), Annunciation, Baptism, Communion, Funeral/Burial, Honor/Honoring, Shipwreck
- NICOL, ERSKINE (British painter, 1825–1904), Expulsion
- NICOL, JOHN WATSON (British painter, 1856–1926), Expulsion
- NICOLÒ DA BOLOGNE (Italian illuminator, active 1351–1404), Virtue/Virtues
- NIEULANDT, ADRIAEN IVAN (Dutch painter, 1587–1658), Vanity/Vanitas
- NOBLE, MATTHEW (British sculptor, 1818–1876), Fame
- NOGUCHI, ISAMU (American sculptor, designer, 1904–1988), Hanging
- NOLDE, EMILE (German painter, printmaker, 1867–1956), Betrayal, Communion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Devotion/Piety, Masks/Personae, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning
- NONETTE, DONATIEN (DONOT) (French artist, 1708–1785), Whiteness
- NORTH NETHERLANDISH MASTER (Netherlandish painter, late 15th century), Dreams/Visions
- OCHTERVELT, JACOB (Dutch painter, 1634–1682), Music
- OEHME, ERNST FERDINAND (German painter, 1797–1855), Night
- O'KEEFFE, GEORGIA (American painter, 1887–1986), Ecstasy, Night

- OLDENBURG, CLAES THURE (American artist, born 1929), Comic
- OLTOS (Greek vase painter, 525–500 B.C.), Abduction/Rape
- O'NEIL, HENRY NELSON (British artist, 1817–1880), Journey/Flight
- O'NEILL, GEORGE BERNARD (British painter, 1828–1917), Expulsion
- ORCAGNA (ANDREA DI CIONE) (Italian painter, sculptor, architect, active 1343–1368), Birth/Childbirth
- OOST, JACOB VAN, LE JEUNE (Flemish painter, 1673–1713), Plague/Pestilence
- OOSTSAANEN, JACOB CORNELISZ VAN see CORNELISZ. VAN OOSTSANEN, JACOB
- ORCHARD PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 475–450 B.C.), Ecstasy, Journey/Flight
- ORCHARDSON, WILLIAM QUILLER (British painter, 1832–1910), Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal
- ORLEY, BERNART VAN (Netherlandish painter, draftsman, circa 1492–1541/42), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Months
- ORLEY, RICHARD VAN (Flemish artist, 1663–1732), Serpent's Bite
- ORMANI, SISTER MARIA (illuminator, 15th century), Self-Portraits II
- OROZCO, JOSÉ CLEMENTE (Mexican painter, printmaker, 1883–1949), Caricature/Cartoon, Order/Chaos
- ORSI, LELIO (LELIO DA NOVELLARA) (Italian painter, architect, 1511–1587), Path/Road/Crossroads
- OSTADE, ADRIAEN VAN (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1610–1684), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Laughter, Money, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping
- O'SULLIVAN, TIMOTHY H. (American photographer, 1840–1882), Sacrifice
- OTIS, BASS (American painter, printmaker, 1784–1861), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- OTTERN, THOMAS (American painter, active circa 1860), Path/Road/Crossroads
- OU DEHUA (MIAO) (Chinese painter, 20th century), Peasantry
- OUDRY, JEAN-BAPTISTE (French painter, 1686–1755), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- OVERBECK, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (German painter, 1789–1869), Betrayal, Devotion/Piety, Kiss/Kissing, Melancholy
- PACHECO, FRANCESCO (Spanish painter, author, 1564–1644), Crucifixion
- PACHER, MICHAEL (Austrian sculptor, printmaker, 1430/35–1498), Expulsion
- PACINO DI BONAGUIDA (Italian illuminator and painter, active circa 1303–1330s), Ascent/Descent
- PADOVANINO (ALESSANDRO VAROTARI) (Italian painter, 1588–1648), Love and Death
- PAIK, NAM JUNE (American artist, born 1932), Light II
- PAINTER OF RUVO (Apulian vase painter, circa 410–400 B.C.), Beheading/Decapitation
- PAJOU, AUGUSTINE (French sculptor, 1730–1809), Abandonment, Seasons
- PALMA, JACOPO IL VECCHIO (Italian painter, 1480–1528), Sacrifice, Visiting/Visitation
- PALMA GIOVANE (JACOPO NEGRETTI) (Italian painter, 1548–1628), Choice/Choosing, Penitence/Repentance
- PALMA VECCHIO see PALMA, JACOPO IL VECCHIO
- PALMER, FRANCES FLORA BOND (American painter, printmaker, 1812–1876), Harvesting
- PALMER, SAMUEL (British painter, 1805–1881), Night, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- PALUMBA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (Italian engraver, printmaker, circa 1425/1515–circa 1525/1615), Mirror/Reflection
- PAMPHILOS (Greek painter, 4th century B.C.), Artists/Art
- PAN PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 475–450 B.C.), Bath/Bathing, Metamorphosis
- PANNINI, GIOVANNI PAOLO (Italian painter, 1691–1765), Judgment, Serpent's Bite
- PAOLINI, GIULIO (Italian artist, author, born 1940), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- PAOLO DI GIOVANNI FEI (Italian painter, 1372–1411), Virgin/Virginity
- PARMIGIANINO (FRANCESCO MAZZOLA) (Italian painter, 1503–1540), Artists/Art, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- PARRHASIUS (Greek painter, flourished circa 400 B.C.), Artists/Art
- PARROCEL, JACQUES-IGNACE (French painter, printmaker, 1667–1722), Journey/Flight
- PASSE, CRISPIJN II DE (Dutch printmaker, 1597–circa 1670), Abduction/Rape, Months, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vanity/Vanitas, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- PASSIGNANO see CRESTI, DOMENICO (PASSIGNANO)
- PATEL, PIERRE I (French painter, 1648–1707), Abandonment
- PATEL, PIERRE-ANTOINE II (French painter, 1648–1707), Months
- PATER, JEAN-BAPTISTE-JOSEPH (French painter, 1695–1736), Seasons
- PATINIR, JOACHIM (Early Netherlandish painter, draftsman, circa 1455–1524), Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads
- PAUSON (Greek painter, 5th century B.C.), Comic
- PEALE, CHARLES WILLSON (American painter, 1741–1827), Journey/Flight, Self-Portraits I
- PEALE, JAMES (American painter, 1747–1831), Whiteness
- PEALE, SARAH MIRIAM (American painter, 1800–1885), Self-Portraits II
- PEARLSTEIN, PHILIP (American painter, printmaker, born 1924), Naked/Nude
- PECHSTEIN, MAX (German painter, printmaker, 1881–1955), Naked/Nude
- PEETERS, BONAVENTURA (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1614–1652), Sublime
- PEETERS, CLARA (Dutch painter, circa 1590–after 1657), Abundance, Self-Portraits II
- PELLEGRINI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO (Italian painter, 1675–1741), Abduction/Rape
- PENNI, LUCA (Italian painter, died 1556), Dreams/Visions
- PENSIONANTE DEL SARACENI (Italian painter, active 1615–1620), Betrayal

- PENTHESILIA PAINTER (Greek vase painter, 5th century B.C.), Gaze
- PENCZ, GEORG (German painter, printmaker, circa 1500–1550), Melancholy
- PEPLOE, SAMUEL JOHN (British painter, 1871–1935), Laughter
- PERINO DEL VAGA (PIETRO BUONACCORSI) (Italian painter, 1500/01–1547), Fame, Judgment, Love and Death, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Virtue/Virtues
- PERMEKE, CONSTANT (Belgian painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1886–1952), Peasantry
- PERSEPHONE PAINTER, Greek vase painter, circa 450–420 B.C.), Damned Souls
- PERUGINI, CHARLES EDWARD (CARLO) (British painter, 1839–1918), Widowhood
- PERUGINO (PIETRO DI CRISTOFORO VANNUCCI) (Italian painter, illuminator, circa 1450–1523), Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Journey/Flight, Vices/Deadly Sins, Visiting/Visitation
- PERUZZI, BALDASSARE (Italian painter, architect, 1481–1536), Beheading/Decapitation, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Virtue/Virtues
- PESELLINO, FRANCESCO (FRANCESCO DI STEFANO) (Italian painter, 1422–1457), Hair/Haircutting, Sacrifice, Virtue/Virtues
- PETIT, GILLES-EDMÉ (French designer and printmaker, 1694–1760), Female Beauty and Adornment
- PETO, JOHN FREDERICK (American painter, 1854–1907), Money
- PETRINI, GIUSEPPE ANTONIO (Swiss painter, 1677–circa 1758), Seasons
- PEYRON, JEAN-FRANÇOIS-PIERRE (French painter, printmaker, 1744–1814), Love and Death, Sacrifice
- PHIDIAS (Ancient Greek sculptor, architect, active circa 450–430 B.C.), Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- PHILIPON, CHARLES (French publisher, journalist, printmaker, caricaturist, 1806–1862), Caricature/Cartoon
- PIATTOLI, ANNA BACHERINI (Italian painter, 1720–1788), Self-Portraits II
- PICABIA, FRANCIS (French painter, 1879–1953), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- PICASSO, PABLO (Spanish painter, printmaker, sculptor, ceramist, 1881–1973), Abduction/Rape, Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fools/Folly, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Peace, Pregnancy, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation
- PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA (Italian painter, circa 1420–1492), Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Dreams/Visions, Devotion/Piety, Fame, Justice, Marriage/Betrothal, Night, Pregnancy, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Visiting/Visitation
- PIERO DI COSIMO (Italian painter, 1462–1521), Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Love and Death, Sleep/Sleeping, Visiting/Visitation
- PIERRE LE FLAMAND (Flemish metalworker, active late 15th–early 16th century), Adultery
- PIETRO DA CORTONA (PIETRO BERRETTINI) (Italian painter, architect, 1596–1669), Abduction/Rape, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence
- PIETRO DI EBOLI (Italian illuminator, active circa 1200), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- PIETRO DI PUCCIO (Italian painter, active 1364–1394), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- PILS, ISIDORE-ALEXANDRE-AUGUSTIN (French painter, 1813–1975), Devotion/Piety
- PINE, ROBERT EDGE (British painter, 1730?–1788), Madness
- PINTURICCHIO (BENARDINO DI BRETTO) (Italian painter, circa 1454–1513), Annunciation, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight
- PIOT, RENÉ (French painter, 1869–1934), Martyrdom
- PIRANESI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (Italian printmaker, architect, 1720–1778), Labyrinth/Maze
- PISANELLO (ANTONIO PISANO) (Italian painter, draftsman, medallist, sculptor, circa 1395–1455), Excess, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- PISANO, ANDREA (Italian sculptor, architect, circa 1290–circa 1348), Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Baptism, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Virtue/Virtues
- PISANO, GIOVANNI (Italian sculptor, architect, circa 1240–circa 1320), Bath/Bathing, Fame, Naked/Nude, Virtue/Virtues
- PISANO, NICOLA (Italian sculptor, active 1258–1278), Baptism, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Choice/Choosing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Judgment, Naked/Nude, Virtue/Virtues
- PISSARRO, CAMILLE (French painter, 1830–1903), Dawn/Dawning, Night, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping
- PITATI, BONIFACIO see BONIFACIO VERONESE
- PITTONI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, circa 1654–before 1735), Serpent's Bite, Visiting/Visitation
- PLASTOV, ARKADY ALEKSANDROVICH (Russian artist, born 1893), Peasantry
- PLATZER, JOHANN GEORG (Austrian painter, 1704–1761), Abduction/Rape
- PLÜDDEMANN, HERMANN FREIHOLO (German painter, 1809–1868), Penitence/Repentance
- POIRTERS, ADRIAEN (Netherlandish printmaker, 16th century), Vanity/Vanitas
- POLENOV, VASILIJ DMITRIEVIC (Russian artist, 1844–1927), Sin/Sinning
- POLICORO PAINTER (South Italian vase painter, 4th century B.C.), Betrayal
- POLIDORO DA CARAVAGGIO (POLIDORO CALDARA) (Italian painter, 1495/1500–circa 1543), Fame
- POLLAIUOLO, ANTONIO DEL (Italian painter, sculptor, printmaker, goldsmith, 1431/32–1498), Abduction/Rape, Fame, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Virtue/Virtues

- POLLAIUOLO, PIERO DEL (Italian painter, sculptor, 1443–1496), Justice, Mirror/Reflection
- POLLOCK, JACKSON (American painter, 1912–1956), Abduction/Rape, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Imagination/Creativity, Order/Chaos
- POLYCLETUS (gem carver, post 86/ante 47 B.C.–post 20 B.C./ante A.D. 14), Artists/Art
- POLYDORUS OF RHODES (Greek sculptor, late 1st/early 2nd century B.C.), Journey/Flight
- POLYGNOTOS (Greek painter, active 469–447 B.C.), Comic, Destruction of City
- PONTORMO (JACOPO CARRUCCI) (Italian painter, 1494–1557), Adultery, Crucifixion, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Mirror/Reflection, Pregnancy, Visiting/Visitation
- POORTER, WILLEM DE (Dutch painter, 1608–after 1648), Sacrifice
- POPPI, FRANCESCO MORANDI see MORANDINI, FRANCESCO (IL POPPI)
- POPOVA, LJUBOV SERGEERNA (Russian painter, 1889–1924), Journey/Flight
- PORTA, GIUSEPPE (GIUSEPPE SALVIATI) (Italian painter, circa 1520–1575), Abduction/Rape
- POST, FRANS JANSZ. (Dutch painter, 1612–1618), Sacrifice
- POT, HENDRIK GERRITSZ. (Dutch painter, circa 1585–1657), Avarice, Drunkenness/Intoxication
- POUSSIN, NICOLAS (French painter, 1594–1665), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Madness, Metamorphosis, Music, Night, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sublime, Virgin/Virginity
- POYNTER, EDWARD JOHN (British painter, 1836–1919), Fortune, Mirror/Reflection, Sacrifice
- POZZO, ANDREA DEL (Italian architect, painter, 1642–1709), Devotion/Piety
- PRATO, FRANCESCO ORTENSIO DI GIROLAMO DAL (Italian artist, 1512–1562), Peace
- PRATT, HENRY CHEEVER (American painter, 1803–1880), Ascent/Descent, Sublime
- PRAXITELES (Greek sculptor, active circa 370–330 B.C.), Bath/Bathing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Naked/Nude, Voyeurism
- PRÉAULT, AUGUSTE (French sculptor, 1809–1879), Crucifixion
- PRELL, HERMANN (German artist, 1854–1922), Justice
- PRELLER, FRIEDRICH, THE ELDER (German painter, printmaker, 1804–1878), Journey/Flight
- PRETI, MATTIA (CAVALIER CALABRESE) (Italian painter, 1613–1699), Beheading/Decapitation, Madness, Martyrdom
- PRIEUR, BARTHÉLEMY (French sculptor, 1536–1611), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- PRIMATICCIO, FRANCESCO (Italian artist, 1504–1570), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Destruction of City, Imagination/Creativity, Pregnancy
- PRUD'HON, PIERRE-PAUL (French painter, 1758–1823), Abduction/Rape, Crucifixion, Justice, Night, Whiteness
- PUCELLE, JEAN (French artist, illuminator, active 1320), Betrayal, Communion, Funeral/Burial, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Music, Virtue/Virtues
- PUGET, PIERRE (French sculptor, painter, architect, 1620–1694), Abduction/Rape
- PUKIREV, VASIL VILADIMIROVICH (Russian painter, 1832–1890), Marriage/Betrothal
- PULSA GROUP (American artists group, 20th century), Light II
- PUVIS DE CHAVANNES, PIERRE (French painter, 1824–1898), Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Martyrdom, Penitence/Repentance, Seasons, Whiteness
- QUARTON, ENGUERRAND (French painter, illuminator, circa 1410–after 1466), Death, Grieving/Lamentation
- QUELLINUS, ARTUS, THE ELDER (Flemish sculptor, 1609–1668), Madness
- QUELLINUS, ERASMUS II (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1607–1678), Serpent's Bite
- QUIDOR, JOHN (American painter, 1800/01–1881), Dreams/Visions, Expulsion, Night
- RADZIWIŁ, FRANZ (German painter, 1895–1983), Misfortune
- RAE, HENRIETTA (British artist, 1859–1928), Abandonment
- RAIMONDI, MARCANTONIO (Italian printmaker, circa 1480–circa 1534), Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Love and Death, Naked/Nude, Night, Nightmare, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- RAINALDI, CARLO (Italian architect, 1611–1691), Martyrdom
- RAINALDI, GIROLAMO (Italian architect, 1570–1655), Martyrdom
- RAINER, ARNULF (Austrian artist, born 1929), Madness
- RAMBERG, JOHANN HEINRICH (German painter, printmaker, 1763–1840), Comic
- RANKLEY, ALFRED (British artist, 1819–1872), Visiting/Visitation
- RAOUX, JEAN (French painter, 1677–1734), Female Beauty and Adornment
- RAPHAEL (RAFFAELLO SANZIO) (Italian painter, architect, 1483–1528), Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Expulsion, Fame, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Justice, Light II, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac

- RATTNER, ABRAHAM (American painter, printmaker, designer, 1895–1978), Hanging
- RAUCHMILLER, MATTHIAS (German sculptor, draftsman, painter, ivory carver, architect in Austria, 1645–1686), Abduction/Rape
- RAUSCHENBERG, ROBERT (American painter, photographer, born 1925), Damned Souls, Journey/Flight, Mirror/Reflection, Patronage, Reading
- RAY, MAN (American painter, photographer, sculptor in France, 1890–1976), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- RAYSKI, FERDINAND VON (German painter, 1806–1898), Hanging
- REDGRAVE, RICHARD (British painter, author, educator, 1804–1888), Expulsion, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Widowhood
- REDON, ODILON (French painter, printmaker, 1840–1916), Apocalypse, Birth/Childbirth, Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Melancholy, Night, Nightmare, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
- REGNAUDIN, THOMAS (French sculptor, 1622–1706), Abduction/Rape, Seasons
- REGNAULT, HENRI (French painter, 1843–1871), Beheading/Decapitation
- REGNAULT, JEAN-BAPTISTE, BARON (French painter, printmaker, 1754–1829), Abduction/Rape, Journey/Flight
- REICHLICH, MARX (Austrian or German painter, active 1494–1508), Visiting/Visitation
- REID, JOHN ROBERTSON (British artist, 1851–1926), Harvesting
- REID, ROBERT (American painter, 1862–1929), Whiteness
- REMBRANDT HARMENSZ VAN RIJN (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1606–1669), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Annunciation, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Calumny, Comic, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fools/Folly, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Light II, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Melancholy, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation
- REMINGTON, FREDERIC (American painter, sculptor, 1861–1909), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- REMP, FRANZ CARL (German or Austrian painter, 1674–1718), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- RENI, GUIDO (Italian painter, 1575–1642), Abduction/Rape, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
- RENIER DE HUY (Early Netherlandish goldsmith, active 1107–1144), Baptism
- RENOIR, PIERRE-AUGUSTE (French painter, sculptor, 1841–1919), Apotheosis/Deification, Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal, Naked/Nude, Sleep/Sleeping, Whiteness
- RESTOUT, JEAN II (French painter, 1692–1768), Journey/Flight, Love and Death
- REVERDY, GEORGES (GEORGES REVERDINO) (Italian printmaker in France, active 1531–1564/70), Betrayal
- REYMERWAELE, MARINUS VAN (Netherlandish painter, circa 1493–circa 1567), Money
- REYNOLDS, JOSHUA (British painter, writer, 1723–1792), Artists/Art, Choice/Choosing, Fortune, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sacrifice, Whiteness
- RIBERA, JUSEPE DE (LO SPANGNOLETO) (Spanish painter, printmaker in Italy, circa 1590–1632), Ascent/Descent, Communion, Damned Souls, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Grieving/Lamentation, Laughter, Music
- RICCI, SEBASTIANO (Italian painter, 1654–1734), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Judgment, Plague/Pestilence
- RICCIO, ANDREA (ANDREA BRIOSCO) (Italian sculptor, architect, goldsmith, medalist, 1470–1532), Love and Death
- RICHER, GERMAINE (French sculptor, 1904–1959), Crucifixion
- RICHMOND, GEORGE (British painter, printmaker, 1809–1896), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- RICHMOND, WILLIAM BLAKE (British painter, 1842–1921), Abandonment, Bath/Bathing
- RICKERT, PAUL (artist, 20th century), Night
- RICKETTS, CHARLES DE SOUSY (British painter, designer, author, 1866–1931), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- RIGGS, ROBERT (American printmaker, 1896–1970), Madness
- RIJCKAERT, DAVID III see RYCKAERT, DAVID III
- RIMINALDI, ORAZIO (Italian painter, 1593–1630), Honor/Honoring
- RIPA, CESARE, see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- RIPPER, RUDOLPH CHARLES VON (Austrian painter, printmaker, 1904–1960), Hanging
- RIVERA, DIEGO (Mexican painter, 1886–1957), Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Dreams/Visions, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peasantry, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits II
- RIVERS, LARRY (American painter, sculptor, born 1923), Comic, Hanging, Mirror/Reflection
- RIVIÈRE, THÉODORE (French sculptor, 1857–1912), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- RIVUS, GUALTHER HERMENTIUS (author, engraver, circa 1500–mid 16th century), Pregnancy
- RIXENS, JEAN-ANDRE (French painter, 1846–1924), Serpent's Bite
- ROBERT, LOUIS-LÉOPOLD (French painter, printmaker, 1794–1835), Peasantry
- ROBERTI, ERCOLE DI (Italian painter, circa 1456–1496), Judgment
- ROBERTS, WILLIAM PATRICK (British painter, 1895–1980), Dance/Dancers/Dancing

- ROBETTA, CRISTOFANO (Italian printmaker, goldsmith, 1462–after 1522), Choice/Choosing, Envy
- ROBUS, HUGO (American sculptor, painter, 1885–1964), Hair/Haircutting
- ROBUSTI, MARIETTA see TINTORETTO, MARIETTA (MARIETTA ROBUSTI)
- ROCKWELL, NORMAN (American illustrator, 1894–1978), Order/Chaos, Self-Portraits I
- RODIN, AUGUST (French sculptor, 1848–1917), Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Love and Death, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning
- ROGERS, JOHN (American sculptor, 1829–1904), Marriage/Betrothal
- ROHAN MASTER see MASTER OF THE ROHAN HOURS
- ROMANELLI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1610–1662), Abduction/Rape
- ROMANINO (GIROLAMO DI ROMANO) (Italian painter, 1484/87–1562), Bath/Bathing, Hair/Haircutting, Judgment
- ROMANO, GIULIO see GIULIO ROMANO (GIULIO PIPPI)
- ROMNEY, GEORGE (British painter, 1734–1802), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- ROPS, FÉLICIEN JOSEPH VICTOR (Belgian painter, printmaker, 1833–1898), Hanging, Nightmare, Peasantry, Temptation
- ROSA, SALVATOR (Italian painter, printmaker, 1615–1673), Abandonment, Baptism, Crucifixion, Dreams/Visions, Envy, Fortune, Hanging, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Money, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Vanity/Vanitas, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- ROSENDAEL, NICOLAS (Dutch painter, 1634/35–1686), Calumny
- ROSLIN, ALEXANDRE (Swedish painter, 1718–1793), Whiteness
- ROSSELLI, MATTEO (Italian painter, 1578–1650), Journey/Flight
- ROSSELLINO, ANTONIO (Italian sculptor, 1427–1479), Honor/Honoring, Sacrifice
- ROSSELLINO, BERNARDO (Italian sculptor, architect, 1409–1464), Honor/Honoring
- ROSSETTI, DANTE GABRIEL (British painter, poet, 1820–1882), Adultery, Annunciation, Artists/Art, Beheading/Decapitation, Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Kiss/Kissing, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Penitence/Repentance, Reading, Sacrifice, Toilet Scenes
- ROSSI, PROPERZIA DE' (Italian sculptor, before 1491–1530), Adultery, Betrayal
- RÖSSLIN, EUCHARIUS (16th century), Pregnancy
- ROSSO FIORENTINO (GIOVANNI BATTOSTA DI JACOPO) (Italian painter, 1494–1540), Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent, Comic, Fame, Love and Death, Pregnancy
- ROTA, MARTINO (Italian printmaker, circa 1520–1583), Comic
- ROTHKO, MARK (American painter, 1903–1978), Funeral/Burial, Order/Chaos
- ROUAULT, GEORGES (French painter, printmaker, 1871–1958), Crucifixion, Justice, Night
- ROUBAUD, FRANÇOIS-FELIX (French sculptor, 1825–1876), Serpent's Bite
- ROUGE, NICOLAS LE (French printmaker, 17th? century), Music
- ROUSSEAU, HENRI (LE DOUANIER) (French painter, 1844–1910), Apocalypse, Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Night, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping
- ROUSSEL, KER XAVIER (French painter, 1867–1944), Abduction/Rape
- ROVERE, GIOVANNI MAURO DELLA (FIAMMENGHINO) (Italian painter, 1575–1640), Penitence/Repentance
- ROWLANDSON, THOMAS (British painter, illustrator, caricaturist, 1756–1827), Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Money, Naked/Nude, Physiognomy
- ROYMERSWAELE, MARINUS VAN see REYMERSWAELE, MARINUS VAN
- RUBENS, PETER PAUL (Flemish painter, draftsman, collector, writer, 1577–1640), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Annunciation, Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Laughter, Light II, Love and Death, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Reading, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Widowhood
- RUEFF, JACOB (German artist, 16th century), Pregnancy
- RUISDAEL, JACOB VAN (Dutch painter, circa 1628–1632), Light II, Night, Sublime
- RUIZ, ANTONIO (Mexican painter, born 1897), Dreams/Visions
- RUNGE, PHILIP OTTO (German painter, 1777–1810), Dawn/Dawning, Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Night
- RUSSELL, CHARLES MARION (American painter, sculptor, 1864–1926), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- RUSSOLO, LUIGI (Italian painter, printmaker, musician, 1885–1947), Madness
- RYCKAERT, DAVID III (Flemish painter, 1587–1631), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- RYDER, ALBERT PICKHAM (American painter, 1747–1917), Apocalypse, Death, Night, Shipwreck

- RYFF, WALTHER HERMANN see RIVIVUS, GUALTHER HERMENIUS
- RYSBRACK, JOHN MICHAEL (Flemish sculptor in Great Britain, 1694–1770), Abandonment
- SABATINI, LORENZO (Italian painter, 1530–1576), Abduction/Rape
- SACCHI, ANDREA (Italian painter, 1599–1661), Annunciation, Honor/Honoring, Music, Sacrifice, Virtue/Virtues
- SADELER, JEAN I (Flemish designer, printmaker, 1550–1600), Serpent's Bite
- SADLER, WALTER DENDY (British painter, 1854–1923), Marriage/Betrothal
- SAENREDAM, JAN PIETERSZ. (Dutch printmaker, 1565–1607), Pregnancy, Seasons
- SAINT-GAUDENS, AUGUSTUS (American sculptor, 1848–1907), Imagination/Creativity
- SAINT-PHALLE, NIKI (French sculptor, born 1930), Birth/Childbirth
- SALIMBENI DA SAN SEVERINO, LORENZO (Italian painter, circa 1374–1420), Birth/Childbirth
- “SALOME” (Performance artist, 20th century), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- SALOMON, BERNARD (French painter, printmaker, 1506/10–circa 1561), Adultery
- SALVIATI, FRANCESCO (FRANCESCO DE' ROSSI) (Italian artist, 1510–1563), Adultery, Artists/Art, Excess, Fame, Justice, Mirror/Reflection, Virtue/Virtues
- SANDYS, FREDERICK (British painter, illustrator, 1829–1904), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- SANGALLO, BASTIANO DA (ARTISTOTILE) (Italian painter, architect, sceneographer, 1481–1551), Bath/Bathing
- SANSOVINO, ANDREA (Italian architect, sculptor, circa 1460–1529), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Melancholy, Peace
- SANTACROCE, GIROLAMO DA (Italian painter, active 1503–1556), Melancholy
- SANT'ELIAS, ANTONIO (Italian artist, architect, 1888–1916), Dreams/Visions
- SANTI DI TITO (Italian painter, 1536–1603), Bath/Bathing, Hair/Haircutting, Madness
- SANTVOORT, DIRCK DIRCKSZ. (Dutch painter, 1610/11–1680), Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- SARACENI, CARLO (Italian painter, circa 1579–1620), Abandonment
- SARGENT, JOHN SINGER (American painter, 1856–1925), Choice/Choosing, Judgment, Night
- SASSETTA (STEFANO DI GIOVANNI DI CONSOLO) (Italian painter, designer, 1392–1450), Abandonment, Journey/Flight, Virgin/Virginity
- SAUL, PETER (American painter, born 1934), Comic
- SAUVAGE, PIAT JOSEPH (Flemish painter, 1744–1818), Seasons
- SAVERY, PIETER see XAVERY, PIETER
- SCHADOW, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (German sculptor, 1864–1850), Sleep/Sleeping
- SCHAFFNER, MARTIN (German painter, printmaker, medalist, 1478/79–1546), Pointing/Indicating
- SCHALCKEN, GODFRIED (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1643–1706), Masks/Personae, Pregnancy
- SCHEFFER, ARY (Dutch painter, printmaker, sculptor in France, 1795–1858), Abduction/Rape, Love and Death, Serpent's Bite
- SCHIAVONE, ANDREA (Italian painter, printmaker, draftsman, circa 1500–1563), Abduction/Rape, Destruction of City, Judgment, Marriage/Betrothal
- SCHICK, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB (German painter, printmaker, 1776–1812), Sacrifice
- SCHIDONE, BARTOLOMEO (Italian painter, circa 1570–1616), Betrayal
- SCHIELE, EGON (German painter, draftsman, 1890–1918), Naked/Nude
- SCHINKEL, KARL FRIEDRICH (German architect, painter, printmaker, 1781–1841), Dawn/Dawning, Light II
- SCHLEMMER, OSKAR (German painter, sculptor, 1888–1943), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- SCHMIDT-ROTTLUFF (German painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1884–1976), Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Kiss/Kissing
- SCHNEEMANN, CAROLEE (American artist, born 1939), Self-Portraits II
- SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD, JULIUS (German painter, 1794–1872), Death, Devotion/Piety, Madness, Pointing/Indicating
- SCHOEN, ERHARD (German painter, printmaker, circa 1491–1542), Peasantry
- SCHOLTEN, HENDRIK JACOBUS (Dutch painter, 1824–1907), Imagination/Creativity
- SCHÖN, ERHARD (German painter, printmaker, circa 1491–1542), Caricature/Cartoon
- SCHÖNFELDT, JOHANN HEINRICH (German painter, 1609–1682), Abduction/Rape, Judgment
- SCHONGAUER, MARTIN (German painter, printmaker, circa 1450–1491), Betrayal, Journey/Flight, Nightmare, Temptation
- SCHOUBROECK, PIETER (Netherlandish painter, circa 1570–1607), Destruction of City
- SCHUPPEN, JACQUES VAN (French painter in Austria, 1670–1751), Self-Portraits I
- SCHWIND, MORITZ VON (Austrian painter, printmaker, draftsman, 1804–1871), Devotion/Piety
- SCHWITTERS, KURT (German painter, draftsman, author, 1887–1948), Order/Chaos
- SCIPIONE, GINO BONICCHI (Italian artist, 1904–1933), Judgment
- SCOREL, JAN VAN (Netherlandish painter, 1495–1562), Betrayal, Serpent's Bite
- SCOTT, WILLIAM BELL (British painter, author, 1811–1890), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- SEBASTIANO DEL PIOMBO (SEBASTIANO LUCIANI) (Italian painter, 1485–1547), Love and Death, Martyrdom
- SEGAL, GEORGE (American sculptor, born 1924), Hanging, Judaism, Mirror/Reflection, Patronage
- SEGANTINI, GIOVANNI (Italian painter, 1858–1899), Dawn/Dawning, Peasantry
- SEITZ, GUSTAV (German sculptor, 1906–1969), Choice/Choosing, Judgment

- SELLAIO, JACOPO DEL (Italian painter, 1441/42–1493), Journey/Flight, Music
- SÉON, ALEXANDRE (French painter, printmaker, 1855–1917), Love and Death
- SERMIDI, SERGIO (performance artist, 20th century),
Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- SERRANO, ANDRES (American artist, photographer, born
1953), Crucifixion
- SERRUR, HENRI-AUGUSTE-CALIXTE-CESAR (French artist, 1794–1865), Arms Raised
- SERVAES, ALBERT (Belgian painter, 1883–1966), Peasantry
- SÉRUSIER, PAUL (Swiss painter, 1864–1927),
Devotion/Piety, Melancholy
- SEURAT, GEORGES-PIERRE (French painter, 1859–1891),
Bath/Bathing, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Light II, Naked/Nude
- SEVERINI, GINO (Italian painter, 1883–1966),
Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- SHAHN, BEN (American painter, printmaker, photographer, 1898–1969), Funeral/Burial, Judaism,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Martyrdom, Sport
- SHARPLES, ROLINDA (British artist, 1794–1838), Self-
Portraits II
- SHEELER, CHARLES (American painter, photographer, 1883–1965), Dreams/Visions
- SHERMAN, CINDY (American photographer, born 1954),
Comic, Self-Portraits II
- SHRAMCHENKO, MYKOLA (Jewish artist, active circa 1962), Order/Chaos
- SICIOLANTE, GIROLAMO (GIROLAMO DA
SERMONETA) (Italian painter, circa 1514–1575),
Annunciation
- SICKERT, WALTER RICHARD (British painter,
1860–1942), Naked/Nude
- SIDDAL, ELIZABETH ELEANOR (British artist, 1834–1862), Artists/Art, Death, Dreams/Visions, Hair/Haircutting, Mirror/Reflection
- SIENESE SCHOOL, Choice/Choosing, Temptation
- SIGNORELLI, LUCA (Italian painter, 1445/50–1523),
Damned Souls, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Music
- SIGNORINI, TELEMACO (Italian painter, printmaker, 1835–1901), Madness
- SILVANI, P. S. (Italian metalworker), Communion
- SIMONE MARTINI (Italian painter, circa 1284–1344),
Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Reading
- SIQUIEROS, DAVID ALFARO (Mexican painter,
1896–1974), Grieving/Lamentation
- SIRANI, ELIZABETTA (Italian painter, printmaker, 1638–1665), Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Fatal
Woman/Femme Fatale, Penitence/Repentance
- SITTOW, MICHEL (Early Netherlandish painter,
1468–1525/26), Virgin/Virginity
- SJÖÖ, MONICA (American artist, active late twentieth century), Birth/Childbirth
- SKOPAS (Greek sculptor, 4th century B.C.), Ecstasy,
Naked/Nude
- ŠKRÉTA, KAREL (Bohemian painter, 1610–1674),
Plague/Pestilence
- SLEIGH, SYLVIA (British painter in the United States, 20th century), Naked/Nude
- SLEVOGT, MAX (German painter, printmaker, 1868–1932), Madness, Penitence/Repentance
- SLOAN, JOHN (American painter, 1871–1951),
Bath/Bathing, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Hair/Haircutting,
Night
- SLUIJTERS, JOHANNES CAROLUS BERNARDUS
(Dutch painter, printmaker, draftsman, 1881–1957),
Kiss/Kissing
- SLUTER, CLAUS (Netherlandish sculptor, active 1379–1405/06), Funeral/Burial, Judaism, Patronage
- SLUYTERS, JAN see SLUIJTERS, JOHANNES CAROLUS BERNARDUS
- SMITH, ANDRÉ (American painter, etcher, architect, teacher, and writer, born 1880), Hanging
- SMITH, DAVID (American sculptor, 1906–1965),
Abduction/Rape
- SMITH, W. EUGENE (American photographer, 1918–1978),
Grieving/Lamentation
- SNYDERS, FRANS (Flemish painter, 1579–1657),
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Misfortune
- SODOMA, IL (GIOVANNI ANTONIO BAZZO) (Italian painter, 1477–1549), Envy, Journey/Flight, Laughter,
Marriage/Betrothal
- SOLIMENA, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, 1657–1747),
Abduction/Rape, Beheading/Decapitation,
Plague/Pestilence
- SOLOMON, SIMEON (British painter, 1840–1905),
Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- SONNETTE, GEORGES DE LA (French sculptor, active circa 1450), Funeral/Burial
- SOSTOS OF PERGAMON (Greek mosaicist, 2nd century
B.C.), Comic
- SPADA, LIONELLO (Italian painter, 1576–1622), Envy
- SPADARO, MICCO see GARGUILO, DOMENICO
(MICCO SPADARO)
- SPENCER, LILLY MARTIN (American painter, 1822–1902),
Vanity/Vanitas
- SPENCER, STANLEY (British painter, 1891–1959),
Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Crucifixion, Harvesting, Judgment, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
Naked/Nude
- SPERLING, HIERONYMUS (German printmaker, 1695–1777), Labyrinth/Maze
- SPIEGEL, ANDRIAN (artist, 17th century), Pregnancy
- SPIEGELMAN, ART (American cartoonist, 20th century),
Judaism
- SPINELLO ARETINO (Italian painter, circa 1346–1410),
Crucifixion
- SPRANGER, BARTHOLOMAEUS (Flemish painter, draftsman, printmaker, 1546–1611), Abandonment, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Judgment,
Music
- STAINBURGER VON SPRINZENSTI, J. (miniaturist),
Masks/Personae
- STALEY, EARL (American painter, born 1938), Love and Death, Metamorphosis
- STALLAERT, JOSEPH (Belgian painter, 1825–1903), Love and Death

- STANHOPE, JOHN RODDAM SPENCER (British painter, 1829–1908), Hair/Haircutting
- STANZIONE, MASSIMO (Italian painter, 1585–1656), Bacchanalia/Orgy
- STEEN, JAN (Dutch painter, 1626–1679), Betrayal, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Laughter, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Money, Music, Self-Portraits I, Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Visiting/Visitation
- STEENWYCK, HARMEN (Dutch painter, 1612–circa 1656), Vanity/Vanitas
- STEICHEN, EDWARD JEAN (American, born in Luxembourg, photographer, artist, 1879–1973), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- STEINBERG, SAUL (American cartoonist, born 1914), Ascent/Descent, Caricature/Cartoon
- STEINLEN, THÉOPHILE ALEXANDRE (Swiss painter, printmaker, 1859–1923), Peasantry
- STELLA, FRANK (American painter, born 1936), Patronage
- STELLA, JACQUES (French painter, printmaker, 1596–1657), Judgment
- STELLA, JOSEPH (American painter, 1877–1947), Laughter
- STERNBERG, JOSEF VON (filmmaker), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- STEVENS, ALFRED EMILE LEOPOLD JOSEPH VICTOR (Belgian painter, 1823–1908), Seasons
- STIEGLITZ, ALFRED (American photographer, 1864–1946), Ecstasy
- STIFTER, ADELBERT (Austrian painter, poet, 1805–1868), Dawn/Dawning
- STIMMER, TOBIAS (Swiss painter, printmaker, 1539–1584), Money
- STOLKER, JAN (Dutch painter, draftsman, 1724–1785), Imagination/Creativity
- STONE, FRANK (British painter, 1800–1853), Visiting/Visitation
- STOREY, GEORGE ADOLPHUS (British painter, 1834–1919), Abandonment
- STORY, WILLIAM WETMORE (American sculptor, 1819–1895), Sacrifice
- STRADANUS, GIOVANNI or JOHANNES see STRAET, JAN VAN DER
- STRAET, JAN VAN DER (JOHANNES STRADANUS; GIOVANNI STRADANO) (Netherlandish painter, draftsman, printmaker, 1523–1605), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Luxury, Metamorphosis, Music
- STRANG, WILLIAM (British painter, printmaker, 1812–1872), Expulsion
- STROZZI, BERNARDO (Italian painter, 1581–1664), Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Pointing/Indicating
- STUART, GILBERT (American painter, 1755–1828), Melancholy
- STUBBS, GEORGE (British painter, 1824–1806), Harvesting, Reading
- STUCK, FRANZ VON (German painter, sculptor, designer, 1863–1928), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Judgment
- STUDIUS (Roman painter, 1st century B.C.), Comic
- STURGIS, PRESTON (American film director, 20th century), Money
- SUBLEYRAS, PIERRE-HUBERT (French painter, 1699–1749), Damned Souls, Dreams/Visions, Self-Portraits I
- SULLY, THOMAS (American painter, 1783–1872), Whiteness
- SUSTRIS, FRIEDRICH (Netherlandish painter, draftsman, architect, circa 1540–1599), Path/Road/Crossroads, Serpent's Bite
- SUSTRIS, LAMBERT (Netherlandish painter in Italy, circa 1515–circa 1584), Destruction of City
- SUTHERLAND, GRAHAM VIVIAN (British painter, printmaker, 1903–1980), Ascent/Descent, Crucifixion, Laughter
- SWANENBURGH, ISAAC VAN (North Netherlandish painter and draftsman, circa 1538–1614), Automata
- SWANENBURGH, JACAB ISAACSZ. VAN (Dutch painter, circa 1571–1638), Damned Souls
- SWART VAN GRONINGEN, JAN (Early Netherlandish painter, printmaker, circa 1500–after 1562), Adultery
- SWEERTS, MICHAEL (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1618–1664), Female Beauty and Adornment
- SYLEUS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 500–475 B.C.), Abandonment
- TADDEO DI BARTOLO (Italian painter, illuminator, circa 1367–1422), Annunciation
- TAMARA see MARCIA
- TAMAYO, RUFINO (Mexican painter, printmaker, born 1899), Apocalypse, Laughter
- TAMECHIKA, RAIZEI (Japanese scroll painter, 1823–1864), Seasons
- TANGUY, YVES (French painter, 1900–1955), Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity
- TANNER, HENRY OSSAWA (American painter, 1859–1937), Annunciation
- TANSEY, MARK (American painter, born 1949), Order/Chaos
- TAO-CHI (Chinese painter, 1814–1865), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- TARDIEU, NICOLAS-HENRI (French printmaker, 1674–1749), Seasons
- TASSI, AGOSTINO (Italian painter, circa 1579–1664), Betrayal, Calumny, Expulsion
- TAUNAY, NICOLAS-ANTOINE (French painter, 1755–1830), Path/Road/Crossroads
- TEMPEL, ABRAHAM LAMBERTSZ. VAN DEN (Dutch painter, 1622/23–1672), Music
- TEMPESTA, ANTONIO (Italian painter, printmaker, 1555–1638), Birth/Childbirth, Envy, Plague/Pestilence
- TENERANI, PIETRO (Italian sculptor, 1789–1869), Abandonment
- TENIERS, DAVID (II), THE YOUNGER (Flemish painter, 1610–1690), Abduction/Rape, Laughter, Nightmare, Peasantry, Metamorphosis, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- TENNIEL, JOHN (British painter, illustrator, 1820–1914), Margins/Outsiders

- TERBORCH, GERARD (Dutch painter, 1617–1681), Female Beauty and Adornment, Marriage/Betrothal
- TERBRUGGHEN, HENDRICK (Dutch painter, 1588–1629), Comic, Crucifixion, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Laughter, Martyrdom, Melancholy, Money, Music, Reading
- TESTA, GIOVANNI CESARE (Italian printmaker, active circa 1630/40–1655), Envy
- TESTA, PIETRO (IL LUCCHESINO) (Italian painter, printmaker, 1612–1650), Envy, Journey/Flight
- TEUNISSEN, CORNELIS see ANTHONISZ. CORNELIS
- THANATOS PAINTER (Greek vase painter, circa 450–420 B.C.), Sleep/Sleeping
- THEODOROS OF SAMOS (Greek architect and sculptor, active circa 560 B.C.), Artists/Art
- THIRY, LEONARD (Flemish painter, draftsman, died circa 1550), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- THOMA, HANS (German painter, printmaker, 1839–1924), Devotion/Piety, Fortune, Self-Portraits I
- THORNHILL, JAMES (British painter, 1675–1734), Dawn/Dawning
- THORWALDSEN, BERTEL (Danish sculptor, 1770–1844), Abduction/Rape
- THULDEN, THEODOR VAN (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1606–1669), Music, Pointing/Indicating
- THURBER, JAMES (American cartoonist, 1894–1961), Caricature/Cartoon
- TIBALDI, PELLEGRINO (Italian painter, sculptor, architect, 1527–1596), Virgin/Virginity
- TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (Italian painter, printmaker, 1696–1770), Abduction/Rape, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice
- TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI DOMENICO (Italian painter, 1727–1804), Adultery, Grieving/Lamentation, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Masks/Personae, Upside Down
- TINO DI CAMAINO (Italian sculptor, circa 1285–1337), Virtue/Virtues
- TINTORETTO, JACOPO (JACOPO ROBUSTI) (Italian painter, 1518–1594), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Communion, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Expulsion, Funeral/Burial, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Humors, Judgment, Labyrinth/Maze, Light II, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Upside Down, Visiting/Visitation
- TINTORETTO, MARIETTA (MARIETTA ROBUSTI) (Italian painter, circa 1550–1590), Self-Portraits II
- TISCHBEIN, JOHANN HEINRICH, THE ELDER (German painter, printmaker, 1722–1789), Abduction/Rape
- TISSOT, JAMES JACQUES JOSEPH (French painter, printmaker in Britain, 1836–1902), Journey/Flight, Seasons
- TITIAN (TIZIANO VECELLIO) (Italian painter, 1488/90–1576), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Expulsion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Funeral/Burial, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Music, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Reading, Sacrifice, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues
- TITO, SANTI DI see SANTI DI TITO
- TOBEY, MARK (American painter, 1890–1976), Night
- TOEPUT, LODEWIJK (POZZOSERRATO) (Flemish painter, printmaker, draftsman, poet in Italy, circa 1550–1603/35), Labyrinth/Maze
- TOMKINS, PELTRO WILLIAM (British artist, 1759/60–1840), Seasons
- TOMLIN, BRADLEY WALKER (American painter, 1899–1953), Night
- TOOKER, GEORGE (American painter, born 1930), Bath/Bathing
- TOOROP, CHARLEY (ANNIE CAROLINE PONTIFEX) (Dutch painter, 1891–1955), Beheading/Decapitation
- TÖPFFER, RODOPHE (Swiss author, draftsman, 1799–1846), Caricature/Cartoon
- TOPHAM, FRANK WILLIAM WARWICK (British painter, 1838–1924), Plague/Pestilence
- TORRENTIUS, JAN SYMOONISZ. (JOHANNES SYMOONISZ. VAN DER BEECK) (Dutch painter, 1599–1644), Virtue/Virtues
- TORY, GEOFFROY (French painter, printmaker, publisher, orthographer, circa 1485–1553/54), Path/Road/Crossroads
- TOULOUSE-LAUTREC, HENRI DE (French painter, printmaker, 1864–1901), Abduction/Rape, Artists/Art, Caricature/Cartoon, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude
- TOSA, MITSUOKI (Japanese screen painter, 1617–1691), Seasons
- TOYOKUMI III (UTAGAWA KUNISADA) (Japanese printmaker, 1786–1864), Seasons
- TOYOKUNI, UTAGAWA (Japanese painter, printmaker, 1769–1825), Bath/Bathing
- TRAINI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, active 1321–1368), Choice/Choosing, Death, Damned Souls, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- TRIBOLO, NICCOLÒ (Italian sculptor, architect, 1500–1550), Abduction/Rape
- TRINQUESSE, LOUIS-ROLLAND (French painter, 1746–1800), Whiteness
- TRIPP, JAN PETER (German painter, printmaker, born 1945), Madness
- TROGER, PAUL (Austrian painter, printmaker, 1690–1762), Dawn/Dawning
- TROUVAIN, ANTOINE (French printmaker, 1656–1708), Months
- TROVA, ERNST TINO (American sculptor, painter, born 1927), Arms Raised

- TROY, JEAN-FRANÇOIS DE (French painter in Italy, 1679–1752), Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Whiteness
- TRUMBULL, JOHN (American painter, 1751–1843), Adultery
- TUBY, JEAN-BAPTISTE (French sculptor, 1635–1700), Humors
- TURA, COSIMO (Italian painter, illuminator, circa 1430–1495), Death, Excess, Journey/Flight, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
- TURCHI, ALESSANDRO (ORBETTO) (Italian painter, 1578–1649), Madness
- TURNER, JOSEPH MALLORD WILLIAM (British painter, 1775–1851), Abduction/Rape, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Dawn/Dawning, Destruction of City, Journey/Flight, Light II, Misfortune, Patronage, Peace, Shipwreck, Sublime, Temptation
- UCCELLO, PAOLO (PAOLO DI DONO) (Italian painter, 1397–1475), Artists/Art, Betrayal, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Sacrifice
- UHDE, FRITZ KARL HERMANN VON (German painter, 1848–1911), Devotion/Piety
- UNDERWORLD PAINTER (Apulian vase painter, circa 330–320 B.C.), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- UPPER RHENISH MASTER (German painter), Birth/Childbirth
- UTAMARO, KITAGAWA (Japanese printmaker, 1753–1806), Bath/Bathing, Dawn/Dawning, Kiss/Kissing, Seasons
- VAITH, GREGORIOUS (German silversmith, active circa 1707), Communion
- VALADON, SUZANNE (French painter, printmaker, artists' model, 1865–1938), Self-Portraits II
- VALCKENBORCH, FREDERICK VAN (Flemish painter, circa 1570–1623), Serpent's Bite
- VALCKENBORCH, LUCAS VAN (Netherlandish painter, 1530/35–1597), Path/Road/Crossroads
- VALDÉS LEAL, JUAN DE (Spanish painter, printmaker, sculptor, architect, 1622–1690), Money
- VALDESTEIN, MARIANA (MARCHESA DE SANTA CRUZ) see WALDSTEIN, MARIE ANNE, MARQUESA DE SANTA CRUZ
- VALENCIENNES, PIERRE-HENRI DE (French painter, 1750–1819), Destruction of City
- VALENTIN DE BOULOGNE (French painter, 1594–1632), Money
- VALERIANI, GIUSEPPE (Italian ecclesiastic, architect, painter, 1542–1596), Pointing/Indicating
- VALLERAN, BONNART (French printmaker), Months
- VALLERAN, PIERRE (French printmaker), Months
- VALLOTTON, FÉLIX EDOUARD (Swiss artist, 1865–1925), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery
- VANDERLYN, JOHN (American painter, 1776–1852), Abandonment, Sublime
- VANLOO, CARLE (French painter, printmaker, 1705–1765), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight
- VANNI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, printmaker, 1563–1610), Communion
- VANNI, PIETRO (Italian artist, 1845–1905), Misfortune
- VARO, REMEDIOS (Spanish painter in Mexico, 1908–1963), Ascent/Descent, Journey/Flight, Metamorphosis
- VAROTARI, ALESSANDRO see PADONANINO (ALESSANDRO VAROTARI)
- VASARI, GIORGIO (Italian painter, architect, writer, 1511–1574), Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Evil Eye, Fame, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Peace, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits II, Virtue/Virtues
- VAUCANSON, JACQUES DE (French maker of automata, 1709–1782), Automata
- VAUTIER, BENJAMIN, THE YOUNGER (Swiss painter born 1895), Devotion/Piety
- VEDDER, ELIHU (American painter, 1836–1923), Choice/Choosing, Hair/Haircutting, Plague/Pestilence, Madness
- VEEN, OTTO VAN (Flemish painter, 1556–1629), Penitence/Repentance, Seasons, Serpent's Bite
- VELA, VINCENZO (Italian sculptor, 1820–1891), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- VELÁZQUEZ, DIEGO (Spanish painter, 1599–1660), Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Comic, Communion, Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Imagination/Creativity, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Naked/Nude, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I, Sport, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
- VELDE, ESAIAS I VAN DE (Dutch painter, printmaker, 1587–1630), Bath/Bathing
- VELDE, JAN II VAN DE (Dutch printmaker, circa 1593–1641), Harvesting, Months, Seasons
- VELDE, WILLEM VAN DE, THE YOUNGER (Dutch painter, 1633–1707), Journey/Flight
- VELLANI, FRANCESCO (Italian painter, circa 1688–1768), Virtue/Virtues
- VENEZIANO, AGOSTINO see MUSI, AGOSTINO
- VENEZIANO, DOMENICO see DOMENICO VENEZIANO (DOMENICA DI BARTOLOMEO DA VENEZIA)
- VERBEEK, PIETER (Dutch painter, active 1664–1674), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- VERESHCHAGIN, VASSILI VASILIEVITCH (Russian painter, 1842–1904), Destruction of City
- VERHOUT, CONSTANTIJN (Dutch painter, active 1663–1667), Sleep/Sleeping
- VERMEER, JAN (Dutch painter, 1632–1675), Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Female Beauty and Adornment, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Music, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
- VERNET, CLAUDE-JOSEPH (French painter, 1714–1789), Offering, Shipwreck
- VERNET, HORACE (French painter, 1759–1863), Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art, Path/Road/Crossroads, Upside Down, Whiteness

- VERONESE (PAOLO CALIARI) (Italian painter, 1528–1588), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Beheading/Decapitation, Calumny, Choice/Choosing, Dreams/Visions, Envy, Excess, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Music, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation
- VERROCCHIO, ANDREA DEL (Italian painter, sculptor, goldsmith, 1435–1488), Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Honor/Honoring
- VESALIUS, ANDREAS see Index of Authors, Literary Texts, Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
- VEYRIER, CHRISTOPHE (French sculptor, 1637–1689), Abduction/Rape
- VICO, ENEA (Italian printmaker, draftsman, numismatist, author, 1523–1567), Misfortune
- VICTORS, JAN (Dutch painter, 1619–1676), Sacrifice
- VIEN, JOSEPH-MARIE (French painter, printmaker, 1716–1809), Virtue/Virtues
- VIGÉE-LEBRUN, MARIE-LOUISE-ÉLISABETH (French painter, 1755–1842), Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Calumny, Honor/Honoring, Patronage, Peace, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Whiteness
- VILLALPANDA, JUAN BAUTISTA (Spanish illustrator and author, 1552–1608), Sanctuary
- VILLARD DE HONNECOURT (French architect and draftsman, active 1190–1240), Fortune, Upside Down
- VINCKEBOONS, DAVID (Dutch painter, 1576–1632), Peasantry, Seasons
- VINNE, VINCENT VAN DER (French painter, active circa 1600), Vanity/Vanitas
- VIOLA, BILL (American video artist, born 1951), Upside Down
- VISCHER, PETER, THE YOUNGER (German sculptor, printmaker, 1487–1528), Fortune, Music
- VIVARINI, ANTONIO (Italian painter, circa 1415–1476/84), Adultery, Journey/Flight
- VLAMINCK, MAURICE DE (French painter, 1876–1958), Bath/Bathing
- VOGTHERR, HEINRICH, THE YOUNGER (German painter, printmaker, 1513–1568), Pregnancy
- VOIS, ARY DE (Dutch painter, circa 1632–1680), Marriage/Betrothal
- VOLAIRE, PIERRE-JACQUES (French painter, 1729–before 1882), Sublime
- VOLLENHOVEN, HERMAN VAN (Dutch artist, 1611–1627), Self-Portraits I
- VOLTERRA, DANIELE DA (Italian painter, sculptor, 1509–1566), Abandonment
- VON HOLST, THEODOR M. (British painter, illustrator, 1810–1844), Nightmare
- VOS, MAARTEN DE (Flemish painter, 1532–1603), Judgment, Melancholy, Peasantry, Vanity/Vanitas, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- VOSTRE, SIMON (French printer, 15th century), Death
- VOUET, SIMON (French painter, 1590–1649), Abduction/Rape, Laughter, Mirror/Reflection, Sacrifice
- VRIES, SIMON WYNHOUTSZ. (Dutch draftsman, circa 1588–1629), Seasons
- VUILLARD, ÉDOUARD (French painter, printmaker, 1868–1940), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- WAELE, JAN BAPTISTE DE (Flemish painter, printmaker, 1632–after 1658), Journey/Flight
- WAGENFELDT, OTTO (German painter, circa 1610–1671), Protestantism
- WALDMÜLLER, FERDINAND GEORG (Austrian painter, 1793–1865), Peasantry
- WALDSTEIN, MARIE ANNE, MARQUESA DE SANTA CRUZ (Austrian painter, 1763–1808), Self-Portraits II
- WALKER, ROBERT (British painter, 1607–1658/60), Melancholy
- WALLIS, HENRY (British painter, 1830–1916), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- WARD, EDWARD MATTHEW (British painter, 1816–1897), Artists/Art, Imagination/Creativity
- WARHOL, ANDY (American painter, printmaker, filmmaker, 1928–1987), Artists/Art, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Fame, Hanging, Kiss/Kissing, Luxury, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping
- WARREN, CORNELIA (American landscapist, active late 19th century), Labyrinth/Maze
- WASER, ANNA (Swiss artist, 1648–1711), Self-Portraits II
- WATERHOUSE, JOHN WILLIAM (British painter, 1849–1917), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting
- WATTEAU, JEAN-ANTOINE (French painter, 1684–1725), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Music, Naked/Nude, Seasons
- WATTS, GEORGE FREDERIC (British painter, sculptor, 1817–1904), Abandonment, Artists/Art, Expulsion, Order/Chaos, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues
- WEBB, PHILIP (British architect, designer, 1831–1915), Sacrifice
- WEENIX, JAN (Dutch painter, circa 1642–1719), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- WEHRLE, JOHANN (German clockmaker, 18th century), Automata
- WEINGART, U. (artist, 20th century), Path/Road/Crossroads
- WEIR, JOHN FERGUSON (American sculptor, painter, 1841–1926), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- WEIR, JULIAN ALDEN (American painter, printmaker, 1852–1919), Whiteness
- WERTMÜLLER, ADOLPH ULRIC (Swedish painter, 1751–1811), Patronage
- WESSELMAN, TOM (American painter, sculptor, born 1931), Naked/Nude
- WEST, BENJAMIN (American painter in Great Britain, 1738–1820), Abandonment, Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Baptism, Choice/Choosing, Death, Grieving/Lamentation, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Peace, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- WET, JACOB WILLEMSZ. DE (Dutch painter, circa 1610–1671/72), Destruction of City

- WEYDEN, ROGIER VAN DER (Early Netherlandish painter, 1399/1400–1464), Artists/Art, Beheading/Decapitation, Damned Souls, Death, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Funeral/Burial, Gaze, Grieving/Lamentation, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning
- WHEATLEY, FRANCIS (British painter, 1747–1801), Virtue/Virtues
- WHISTLER, JAMES ABBOTT MCNEILL (American painter, printmaker in Britain, 1834–1903), Calumny, Night, Self-Portraits I, Whiteness
- WIERIX, HIERONYMOUS (Flemish printmaker, circa 1553–1619), Luxury
- WIERTZ, ANTOINE JOSEPH (Belgian painter, 1806–1865), Apotheosis/Deification, Madness
- WILDING, FAITH (American painter, 20th century), Pregnancy
- WILFRED, THOMAS (American artist, 1889–1968), Light II
- WILIGELMO DA MODENA (Italian sculptor, active 1099–1110), Fame, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- WILKINS, JAMES F. (British painter in America, active 1835–1849), Dreams/Visions
- WILLIAM DE BRAILES (English illuminator, active circa 1230), Sin/Sinning
- WILLIS, GEORGE BRANDER (British painter, active 1809–1866), Sublime
- WILLS, JAMES (British painter, active 1746, died 1777), Abandonment
- WILSON, JOHN (American sculptor, printmaker, born 1922), Martyrdom
- WILSON, RICHARD (British painter, 1714–1782), Abandonment, Sublime
- WINCHESTER SCHOOL (British illuminators, 12th century), Masks/Personae
- WINGHE, JODOCUS VAN (Netherlandish painter, 1544–1603), Music
- WINTERHALTER, FRANZ XAVER (German painter, printmaker, 1805–1873), Seasons, Whiteness
- WISLICENUS, HERMANN (German painter, 19th century), Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism
- WIT, JACOB DE (Dutch painter, 1695–1751), Metamorphosis
- WITTE, PIETER DE (PIETRO CANDIDO) (Flemish painter, 1548–1628), Music
- WOEIRIOT, PIERRE II (French artist, 1532–after 1596), Witchcraft/Sorcery
- WÖFLI, ADOLF (Swiss painter, 1864–1930), Margins/Outsiders
- WOOD, GRANT (American painter, 1891–1942), Dreams/Visions, Harvesting, Night
- WOODVILLE, RICHARD CATON (American painter, 1825–1855), Reading
- WOOLNER, THOMAS (British sculptor, poet, 1825–1892), Artists/Art, Expulsion
- WOUTERS, RIK (Belgian painter, printmaker, sculptor, 1882–1916), Madness
- WOUWERMAN, PHILIPS (Dutch painter, 1619–1668), Path/Road/Crossroads
- WREN, CHRISTOPHER (British architect, 1632–1723), Destruction of City
- WRIGHT, JOHN BUCKLAND (British artist, 1897–1954), Laughter
- WRIGHT, JOSEPH (WRIGHT OF DERBY) (British painter, 1734–1797), Death, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Sublime, Widowhood
- WTEWAEL, JOACHIM ANTONISZ (Dutch painter, circa 1566–1638), Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Humors, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Money, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- WUNDERLICH, PAUL (German painter, printmaker, sculptor, born 1927), Hanging
- WYETH, ANDREW NEWELL (American painter, born 1917), Order/Chaos
- XAVERY, PIETER (Flemish artist, 18th century), Madness
- YI CH'ANY-WU (Chinese painter, 16th–17th century), Drunkenness/Intoxication
- YOUNG, MAHONRI MACINTOSH (American painter, sculptor, printmaker, 1877–1957), Sport
- ZADKINE, OSSIP (Russian sculptor in France, 1890–1967), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- ZAMPIERI, DOMENICO see DOMENICHINO (DOMENICO ZAMPIERI)
- ZANCHI, ANTONIO (Italian painter, 1631–1722), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Misfortune
- ZEITBLUM, BARTHOLOMÄUS (German painter, 1455/60–1522), Birth/Childbirth
- ZENALE, BERNARDO (Italian painter, architect, circa 1436–1526), Judgment
- ZENIL, NAHUM BERNARÉ (Mexican painter, born 1947), Hanging
- ZEUXIS (Greek painter, 5th century B.C.), Artists/Art, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II
- ZIX, BENJAMIN (French painter, draftsman, 1772–1811), Love and Death
- ZOFFANY, JOHANN JOSEPH (German painter in Great Britain, 1733–1818), Patronage, Self-Portraits I
- ZUCCARO, FEDERICO (Italian painter, architect, draftsman, 1540/43–1609), Imagination/Creativity, Plague/Pestilence, Virtue/Virtues
- ZUCCARO, TADDEO (Italian painter, 1529–1566), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- ZURBARÁN, FRANCISCO DE (Spanish painter, 1598–1664), Beheading/Decapitation, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Martyrdom, Virgin/Virginity

INDEX OF AUTHORS, LITERARY TEXTS, COMPOSERS, FILMMAKERS, AND FOLKTALES

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index or to other indexes where primary information can be found. See also citations refer the reader to other terms within the index or to other indexes where additional information can be found. Authors listed in the Further Readings are not included.

- ABRANTÉS, Duchesse d', Whiteness
 ADSO OF MONTIER-EN-DER
 Libellus de ortu et de tempore Antichristi,
 Birth/Childbirth
 AESCHYLUS, Apotheosis/Deification
 Agamemnon, Bath/Bathing, Sacrifice
 Persae, Luxury
 AESOP, Evil Eye
 Fables, Path/Road/Crossroads
 AGRIPPA, Henry Cornelius, Melancholy
 ALBERTI, Leon Battista, Fortune, Imagination/Creativity,
 Love and Death, Mirror/Reflection,
 Penitence/Repentance, Self-Portraits I
 De pictura (Della pittura), Artists/Art, Calumny,
 Imagination/Creativity
 Ten Books on Architecture, Abundance
 ALCIATI, Andreas
 Emblematus, Abduction/Rape, Fame, Fortune,
 Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity,
 Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Peace, Serpent's
 Bite, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
 ALEXANDER ROMANCE see ISKANDAR-NAMA
 ALEXIS, Guillaume
 Passe-temps de tout homme, Birth/Childbirth
 ALFIERI, Vittorio
 Bruto Primo, Judgment
 AMBROSE, Bishop of Milan, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Avarice, Virgin/Virginité, Virtue/Virtues
 Abraham, Virtue/Virtues
 In Lucan, Virtue/Virtues
 De paradiso, Virtue/Virtues
 AMIS, Martin
 Money, Money
 AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, Gaze
 AMPELIUS, Lucius, Patronage
 ANACREON, Fortune
 ANDERSON, Maxwell
 Winterset, Martyrdom
 APOLLINARE, Guillaume, Caricature/Cartoon
 APOLLODORUS, Sleep/Sleeping
 Biblioteca (Library), Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping
 APOLLONIUS, Virtue/Virtues
 APPIAN, Honor/Honoring
 APULEIUS, Lucius, Luxury, Penitence/Repentance
 Apologia, Fools/Folly, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Golden Ass, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Penitence/Repentance, Sleep/Sleeping,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Metamorphosis, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal
 AQUINAS, Thomas see THOMAS AQUINAS, St.
 ARATUS, Virtue/Virtues
 Phaenomena, Zodiac

- ARETINO, Pietro
La Talanta, Peace
- ARIOSTO, Ludovico
Orlando Furioso, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Madness
- ARISTOPHANES, Laughter, Whiteness
Birds, Arms Raised, Masks/Personae
Clouds, Masks/Personae
Frogs, Masks/Personae
Lysistrata, Laughter
Wasps, Masks/Personae
- ARISTOTLE, Abundance, Artists/Art, Fortune, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Sport, Virtue/Virtues
Generation of Animals, Pregnancy
Metaphysics, Order/Chaos
Physiognomics, Arms Raised
Poetics, Comic
Problemata, Humors
- ARS MORIENDI, Money, Sin/Sinning
- ART OF GOOD LYWYING AND GOOD EEYING, Death
- ARTHURIAN LEGENDS (see also MALORY, Thomas, Le Morte D'Arthur; MEDIEVAL ROMANCES; TENNYSON, Alfred Lord, Idylls of the King), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Madness, Mirror/Reflection, Nightmare, Pointing/Indicating, Reading
- ASHTON, Frederick
Judgment of Paris, Judgment
- ATHENAEUS, Excess
- AUBERT, David see VISIONS OF TONDAL
- AUGUSTINE, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Avarice, Laughter, Light II, Mirror/Reflection, Penitence/Repentance, Virtue/Virtues
De Civitate Dei (City of God), Fools/Folly, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Path/Road/Crossroads, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Confessions, Temptation
Enchiridion, Virtue/Virtues
Faustum, Witchcraft/Sorcery
De Haeresibus, Witchcraft/Sorcery
De Musica, Music
Sermons, Witchcraft/Sorcery
De Trinitate, Sin/Sinning
- AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO, Damned Souls
- AUGUSTODENISIS, Honorius
Elucidarius, Birth/Childbirth
- AUSTEN, Jane
Northanger Abbey, Bath/Bathing
Persuasion, Bath/Bathing
Pride and Prejudice, Marriage/Betrothal, Visiting/Visitation
- BACH, Johann Sebastian, Labyrinth/Maze
- BACHOFEN, Johann Jakob
Mutterrecht, Self-Portraits II
- BACON, Francis, Laughter, Voyeurism
Of Studies, Reading
- BALZAC, Honoré de, Adultery, Avarice, Money
Eugénie Grandet, Money
- BARGAGLI, Girolamo
La Pellegrina, Justice
- BASIL THE GREAT, St., Laughter, Light II
Concerning Envy, Envy
- BAUDELAIRE, Charles, Caricature/Cartoon, Dreams/Visions, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence
Fleurs du Mal, Damned Souls, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
L'Invitation au Voyage, Luxury
- BAUMGÄRTNER, Karl Heinrich, Madness
- BEARDSLEY, Aubrey
Under the Hill, Artists/Art
- BEATLES, The (Songs), Labyrinth/Maze
- BEAUTY AND THE BEAST, Abduction/Rape, Kiss/Kissing
- BEDE THE VENERABLE
De rerum natura, Labor/Trades/Occupations
De temporum ratione, Humors
- BEETHOVEN, Ludwig van
Ninth Symphony, Order/Chaos
- BELL, Charles
Anatomy and Philosophy of Expression, Physiognomy
- BELLORI, Giovanni Pietro, Self-Portraits I
- BENEDITTI, Alessandro
De re medica, Birth/Childbirth
- BERDYAEV, Nicolas, Imagination/Creativity
- BERGSON, Henri
Laughter, Automata, Laughter
- BERKELEY, George
On the Prospect . . ., Path/Road/Crossroads
- BERKELEY, Lennox
Judgment of Paris, Judgment
- BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Avarice, Devotion/Piety
- BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE, Jacques Henri
Paul and Virginia, Sleep/Sleeping
- BEVERLY HILLBILLIES, Luxury
- BIBLE MORALISEES, see Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BIBLIA PAUPERUM, Baptism, Betrayal, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virtue/Virtues
- BILLI, Antonio, Artists/Art
- BION
Lament for Adonis, Kiss/Kissing
- BIRKNER, Wolfgang
Jacht Buch, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- BLAKE, William
Eternity, Kiss/Kissing
Jerusalem, Ascent/Descent
"The Lamb," Sacrifice
- BOCCACCIO, Giovanni, Artists/Art, Death, Fame, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Plague/Pestilence
Comedia . . . (Ameto), Judgment

- De Claris Mulieribus*, Birth/Childbirth, Mirror/Reflection, Self-Portraits II, Widowhood
Geneology of the Gods, Dawn/Dawning
Giornata, Sleep/Sleeping
Noble and Famous Women, Imagination/Creativity,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations
 BOCCHI, Achille
Symbolicarum . . . , Abduction/Rape
 BODIN, Jean
De la demonomania de sorciers . . . ,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 BOEHM, Jacob
Der Weg zu Christo, Devotion/Piety
 BOETHIUS (BOETIUS), Music
De Consolatione philosophiae, Fortune
 BOILEAU-DESPRÉAUX, Nicolas, Apotheosis/Deification BONAVENTURA (BONAVENTURE), St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts),
 Virtue/Virtues
Itinerarium Mentis in Deum, Path/Road/Crossroads
Laus Virginus, Light II
 BOOK OF THE DEAD, Order/Chaos
 BORGES, Jorge Luis, Labyrinth/Maze
 BORGHESI, Antonio, Peace
 BOUELLES (BOVILUS), Charles de
Liber de Intellectu, Ascent/Descent
 BRACCIOLINI, Poggio
Facetiae, Laughter
 BRANDT, Sebastian see BRANT, Sebastian
 BRANT, Sebastian
Narrenschiff (Ship of Fools), Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fools/Folly, Music,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Shipwreck
 BRETON, André, Arms Raised, Automata, Dreams/Visions, Nightmare, Self-Portraits I
Les Vases Communicantes, Dreams/Visions,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 BRIDGET OF SWEDEN, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Revelations, Birth/Childbirth, Light II
 BROME, Richard
Antipodes, Upside Down
 BRONTË, Anne
The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, Artists/Art
 BRONTË, Charlotte
Jane Eyre, Artists/Art
 BRONTË, Emily
Wuthering Heights, Marriage/Betrothal
 BROUGHTON, Rhoda
Mrs. Bligh, Artists/Art
 BROWNING, Robert, Artists/Art
 BRUMMEL, Beau, Whiteness
 BRUNE, Johan de
Emblemata of zinnewerk, Vanity/Vanitas
 BRUNI, Domenico
Difese della donna, Self-Portraits II
 BRUNO, Giordano, Fortune
 BRYAN, William Jennings, Crucifixion
 BULWER, John
Chirologia or Natural Language of the Hands, Arms Raised
 BUNYAN, John
Pilgrim's Progress, Path/Road/Crossroads
 BURCHARD, Bishop of Worms
Burchardi Wormacienensis Decretum,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 BURKE, Edmund
Philosophical Enquiry, Sublime
 BURTON, Robert
Anatomy of Melancholy, Envy, Melancholy
 BYRON, LORD, SACRIFICE
Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Journey/Flight
Don Juan, Journey/Flight, Shipwreck
Manfred, Journey/Flight
Sardanapalus, Excess
 CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI (film), Upside Down CAGE, John, Order/Chaos
 CALLINUS OF EPHESUS, Excess
 CALVIN, John (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Commentaries, Protestantism
 CAMUS, Albert, Choice/Choosing, Order/Chaos,
 Plague/Pestilence
 CANON EPISCOPI, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CAPEK, Karel
R.U.R., Automata
 CAPELLA, Martianus, Music, Serpent's Bite
 CAPRA, Frank, Marriage/Betrothal
 CARACCIOLO DA LECCE, Roberto, Pregnancy
 CARO, Annibale, Peace, Self-Portraits II
 CARO, Rodrigo, Dreams/Visions
 CARROLL, Lewis (Charles Lutwidge Dodgson)
Alice in Wonderland, Bath/Bathing, Mirror/Reflection
 CARTARI, Vincenzo, Peace
Imagini delli Dei de gli'Antichi, Abundance, Fortune, Love and Death, Virtue/Virtues
 CARY, Joyce
Horse's Mouth, Artists/Art
 CASANOVA DE SEINGALT, Giovanni Giacomo
Memoirs, Voyeurism
 CASSIODORUS, Music
Institutiones divinarum . . . , Music
 CASTENEGA, Father, Dreams/Visions
 CASTIGLIONE, Baldassare
Book of the Courtier, Fame, Justice, Self-Portraits I CATS, Jacob, Self-Portraits II, Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas,
 Virtue/Virtues
Proteus, Misfortune
Zinne-en Minne-beelden, Abundance, Music,
 Vanity/Vanitas
 CATULLUS, Love and Death
Carmina, Bacchanalia/Orgy
 CAULIBUS, Giovanni (Pseudo-Bonaventura),
 Birth/Childbirth, Penitence/Repentance
 CEBES OF THEBES, Excess
 CENNINI, Cennino
Il Libro dell'arte, Artists/Art

- CERVANTES SAAVADRA, Miguel de
Don Quixote, Judgment, Laughter
 CHAMADE, Peasantry
 CHAMPFLEURY (Jules François Felix Husson),
 Caricature/Cartoon
 CHANSON DE ROLAND, Madness
 CHARCOT, Jean Martin
Nouvelle iconographie Salpêtrière, Madness
 CHAUCER, Geoffrey, Fortune, Laughter, Melancholy,
 Widowhood
Parlement of Foules, Dreams/Visions
 "Merchant's Tale," Marriage/Betrothal
 "Pardoner's Tale," Money
 CHESTERFIELD, Lord, Laughter
 CHRYSOLORAS, Manuel, Love and Death
 CICERO, Caricature/Cartoon, Envy, Fame, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Justice, Laughter, Virtue/Virtues
De finibus honorum et malorum, Love and Death
De oratore, Physiognomy
De Republic: Dream of Scipio, Dreams/Visions, Justice
On Duties, Choice/Choosing pro L. Murena, Luxury
Somnium scipionis, Virtue/Virtues
Tuscan Disputations, Envy, Luxury
 CLOSE ENCOUNTERS OF THE THIRD KIND,
 Ascent/Descent
 COCLES, Bartolomeo, Physiognomy
 COLE, Samuel
In April, Martyrdom
 COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, Artists/Art,
 Imagination/Creativity
 COLLINS, Wilkie
Hide and Seek, Artists/Art
 COLONNA, Francesco, Peace, Sleep/Sleeping
Hypnertomachia Poliphili, Virtue/Virtues
 CONRAD, Joseph, Whiteness
 CONSTANTINE VII PORPHYROGENITUS
Agricultus, Envy
 COOLS, Eugène
Jugement de Midas, Judgment
 COOPER, James Fenimore, Dreams/Visions
 CORNEILLE, Pierre, Apotheosis/Deification
 CORROZET, Gilles
Hecatombgraphie, Misfortune
 COVARRUBIAS, Sebastián de Orozco
Emblemas morales, Misfortune
 CRANE, Stephen
The Third Violet, Artists/Art
 CREATION (mystery play), Masks/Personae
 CROCE, Benedetto, Imagination/Creativity
 CUREAU, Marin
L'art de connoistre les hommes, Humors
 CYPRIA, Choice/Choosing
 DAMIAN, Peter, Avarice
 DANIEL, Samuel
Queene's Arcadia, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 DANTE, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art,
 Ascent/Descent, Ecstasy, Fortune, Imagination/Creativity, Kiss/Kissing, Labyrinth/Maze
Il Convivio, Music
Divine Comedy, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Damned
 Souls, Destruction of City, Envy, Fame, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Hanging, Journey/Flight,
 Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Mirror/Reflection, Money,
 Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Sin/Sinning, Widowhood
 DARWIN, Charles, Physiognomy
Origin of Species, Ascent/Descent
 DEFOE, Daniel
Moll Flanders, Marriage/Betrothal, Money
Robinson Crusoe, Shipwreck
 DEMOCRITUS, Laughter
 DEMOSTHENES
Against Macartatus, Grieving/Lamentation
 DESCARTES, René, Laughter
 DICKENS, Charles, Artists/Art, Hanging
Bleak House, Avarice
Christmas Carol, Avarice
Little Dorrit, Artists/Art
Martin Chuzzlewick, Avarice
Our Mutual Friend, Avarice
Pickwick Papers, Widowhood
 DIONYSIUS, Fools/Folly
 DISNEY, Walt, Laughter
 DISRAELI, Benjamin
Lothair, Artists/Art
 DITTAMUNDO, IL, Widowhood
 DODGSON, Charles Lutwidge see CARROLL, Lewis
 DOLCI, Carlo
Dialogue on Painting, Imagination/Creativity
 DOLLINGER, Joann
Papstfabeln des Mittelalters, Birth/Childbirth
 DOMENICHI, Lodovico
Nobilita delle donne, Self-Portraits II
 DONNE, John
Anatomie of the World, Order/Chaos
Divine Poems, Humors
Good Friday, 1613, Riding Westward, Crucifixion
Holy Sonnet #II, Crucifixion
Second Anniversary of the Progres of the Soule, Humors
 DOSTOYEVSKY, Fedor Mikhailovich, Choice/Choosing,
 Self-Portraits I
Brothers Karamazov, Martyrdom
 DU BOS, Abbé Jean-Baptiste, Imagination/Creativity
 DU MAURIER, George Louis Palmella Busson
Trilby, Artists/Art
 DUPUIS, Charles François, Zodiac
 DÜRER, Albrecht, Imagination/Creativity
 DURIS OF SAMOS, Artists/Art
 DUTCH MARTYR'S MIRROR, Protestantism
 ECKHART, Meister, Devotion/Piety
 ELIOT, George, Artists/Art
Daniel Deronda, Artists/Art
Middlemarch, Artists/Art
Romola, Artists/Art
Silas Marner, Temptation

- ELIOT, T. S.
Cocktail Party, Martyrdom
Four Quartets, Journey/Flight
Wasteland, Temptation
- ELLIS, Havelock
The Criminal, Margins/Outsiders
- ELUARD, Paul, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Imagination/Creativity, Self-Portraits I
- EMERSON, Ralph Waldo, Light II
- EPHOROS, Abduction/Rape
- ERASMUS, Caricature/Cartoon, Laughter, Physiognomy,
Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
Enchiridion Militis Christiani, Path/Road/Crossroads
Opera omnia, Music
Praise of Folly, Fools/Folly, Sin/Sinning
- ERATOSTHENES, Virtue/Virtues
Star Placements, Virtue/Virtues
- ESQUIROL, J. E., Madness
- ÉTIENNE DE BOURDON, Birth/Childbirth
- EUCLID, Order/Chaos
- EURIGENA, John Scotus, Light II
- EURIPIDES, Sacrifice
Alcestis, Love and Death, Sacrifice
Bacchae, Abandonment, Ecstasy
Cyclops, Drunkenness/Intoxication
Hippolytos, Arms Raised
Medea, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Trojan Women, Destruction of City
- EUSEBIUS
Life of Constantine, Sleep/Sleeping
Simoni deo Sancto, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- EYCK, Jacob Van, Music
- FABRICIUS, Johannes
Disputatio Theologica, Sin/Sinning
- FAIRY TALES (see also FOLKLORE AND FOLKTALES), Abduction/Rape, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance
- FAITS DES ROMAINS, Birth/Childbirth
- FEIJOO, Benito Jeronimo
Cantas Erudiatas y Curiosas . . ., Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FERRIÈRE, Henri de
Livre du Roy Modus . . ., Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FICINO, Marsilio, Fortune, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Music,
Virtue/Virtues
De amore, Love and Death
Opera, Music
Theologica Platonica, Imagination/Creativity, Music
- FILOCALUS, Months
- FIRENZUOLA, Agnolo, Marriage/Betrothal
- FIRMICUS MATERMUS, Julius
Mathesis, Zodiac
- FLAUBERT, Gustave, Melancholy
Temptation of St. Anthony, Temptation
- FLETCHER, Phineas
The Purple Island, Humors
- FLUDD, Robert, Ascent/Descent, Zodiac
Utriusque Cosmi Historia, Order/Chaos
- FOLKLORE AND FOLKTALES (see also FAIRY TALES), Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dreams/Visions,
Hair/Haircutting, Judaism, Judgment
- FONTEO, G. B., Laughter
- FOXÉ, John
Book of Martyrs, Martyrdom, Protestantism
- FRANCIS, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Canticle of the Sun, Devotion/Piety
Little Flowers of St. Francis, Devotion/Piety
- FRANCIS OF SALES, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Devout Life, Devotion/Piety
- FRANKLIN, Benjamin, Money
- FREDERICK II, Holy Roman Emperor
De Arte Venendi cum Avibus,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FREUD, Sigmund, Artists/Art, Automata, Choice/Choosing,
Comic, Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter,
Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Widowhood
- FRISCH, Max, Choice/Choosing
- FROBENIUS, Leo, Sacrifice
- FROISSART, Jean
Grandes Chroniques de France, Funeral/Burial
- FROST, Robert, Order/Chaos
Birches, Ascent/Descent
- FUJIWARA NOBUZANE, Damned Souls
- FULGENTIUS, Fabius Planciades, Adultery
- GALEN, Fools/Folly, Humors, Serpent's Bite
- GALSWORTHY, John
Villa Rubein, Artists/Art
- GARDEN OF EDEN (mystery play), Masks/Personae
- GARTENLAUGE, Penitence/Repentance
- GASTON III, Count of Foix (Gaston Phébus)
Livre de la Chasse, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- GAUTIER, Théophile, Order/Chaos
Le Roi Candule, Voyeurism
- GELLI, Battista, Artists/Art
- GERARD, John
The Herbal, Humors
- GHIBERTI, Lorenzo, Artists/Art
- GHISLIERO, Federico
Regole . . ., Sport
- GIBBON, Edward
Decline and Fall . . ., Excess, Martyrdom
- GIOVIO, Paolo, Fame, Peace
Dialogo . . ., Peace
- GIRAUD, Albert
Pierrot Lunaire, Hanging
- GISSING, George, Artists/Art
The Emancipated, Artists/Art
Thyrza, Artists/Art
- GODFREY OF VITERBO, Adultery
- GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang von, Hair/Haircutting,
Harvesting, Light II
Conversations with Eckermann, Witchcraft/Sorcery Faust, Excess, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal,

- Witchcraft/Sorcery
Sorrows of Werther, Hanging, Marriage/Betrothal
 GOGH, Vincent van, Caricature/Cartoon
 GOHORY, Jacques
Livre de la conquête . . ., Witchcraft/Sorcery
 GOLDEN LEGEND see JACOBUS DA VORAGINE
 GOLDING, William
Free Fall, Artists/Art
 GOLDSMITH, Oliver
The Vicar of Wakefield, Artists/Art
 GONCOURT, Edmond and Jules de
Manette Solomon, Artists/Art
 GRAND CALENDRIER DES BERGERS, Vices/Deadly Sins
 GRAY, Thomas
Ode on the Spring, Dreams/Visions GREGORY I (THE GREAT), St. (pope) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts),
 Avarice
Dialogues, Whiteness
Moralia in Job, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 GREGORY OF NYSSA, Music
 GRÉTRY, André
Jugement de Midas, Judgment
 GUARINI, Guarino
Il Pastor Fido, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 GUEULLETTE, Thomas-Simon, Masks/Personae
 GUILLAUME DE DEGUILEVILLE
Pèlerinage de la vie humaine, Choice/Choosing,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication
Pèlerinage de l'âme, Choice/Choosing
- HAIR (musical), Hair/Haircutting
 HANDEL, George Frederic Messiah, Sacrifice
 HARDY, Mary Anne
The Artist's Family, Artists/Art
 HARDY, Thomas, Artists/Art
The Well-Beloved, Artists/Art
 HARTLEBEN, Otto Erich, Hanging
 HATTON, Joseph
The Tallants of Barton, Artists/Art
 HAWTHORNE, Nathaniel
Scarlet Letter, Temptation
 HAYDN, Franz Joseph
Creation, Order/Chaos
 HEGEL, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, Dawn/Dawning,
 Devotion/Piety
 HEIDEGGER, Martin, Choice/Choosing, Devotion/Piety
 HERACLITUS, Laughter
 HERO OF ALEXANDRIA
Spiritualia, Automata
 HERODOTUS, Voyeurism
Histories, Abundance, Crucifixion, Envy, Excess,
 Labyrinth/Maze
 HESIOD, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Expulsion, Love and Death, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Whiteness
Theogony, Fame, Fortune, Justice, Night,
 Order/Chaos, Patronage, Sleep/Sleeping,
 Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Works and Days, Justice, Luxury
- HILDEGARD VON BINGEN, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Melancholy, Sin/Sinful
Scivias, Birth/Childbirth
 HINCMAR, Avarice
 HIPPOCRATES, Humors, Melancholy, Physiognomy
 HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME, Zodiac
 HISTOIRE ANCIENNE, Birth/Childbirth
 HOBBS, Thomas, Laughter
 HOFFMAN, Ernst Theodor Amadeus
 "The Sandman," Automata
 HOGARTH, William
Analysis of Beauty, Artists/Art
 HOLLAND, Clive
Marcelle of the Latin Quarter, Artists/Art
 HOMER, Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Excess, Honor/Honoring, Laughter, Light I, Plague/Pestilence, Sublime, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
 "Hymn to Hermes," Shepherds/Shepherdesses
Iliad, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Automata, Birth/Childbirth, Excess, Fame,
 Grieving/Lamentation, Journey/Flight, Laughter,
 Metamorphosis, Reading, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport,
 Temptation
Odyssey, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification,
 Arms Raised, Bath/Bathing, Damned Souls,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Grieving/Lamentation, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Logos/Word, Luxury, Metamorphosis, Reading, Shipwreck,
 Temptation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HOOFT, Pieter Cornelisz.
Granida, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 HOPKINS, Gerald Manly
Wreck of the Deutschland, Shipwreck
 HORACE, Excess, Fools/Folly, Honor/Honoring,
 Imagination/Creativity
Ars poetica, Nightmare
Epodes, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Epistles, Envy, Peasantry
Odes, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues
 HORAPOLLO
Hieroglyphics, Serpent's Bite, Virtue/Virtues
 HOWARD, Blanche Willis
Guenn, Artists/Art
 HOUBRAKEN, Arnold, Comic
 HUGH OF ST. VICTOR, Light II
 HUGO, Victor, Fools/Folly
Denier Jour d'un Condamné, Hanging
 HUMBELOT, Jean
Veüe, Female Beauty and Adornment
 HUNTER, William
Anatomy of the Human Gravid Uterus, Pregnancy
 HUYSMANS, Joris Karl, Luxury
A Rebours, Dreams/Visions
 HYGINUS, Sleep/Sleeping
Fables, Fame
Poetic Astronomy, Virtue/Virtues
- IBN KHALDUN, Offering IGNATIUS LOYOLA, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian

- Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Spiritual Exercises, Devotion/Piety
 ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, Expulsion
 INDEPENDENT CURATORS INCORPORATED (ICI)
Eye for I, Self-Portraits I
 IRVING, George Washington, Dreams/Visions
Sketch Book, Sleep/Sleeping
Tales of a Traveller, Night
 ISKANDAR-NAMA, Voyeurism
 IVO OF CHARTRES, Avarice

 JACOBUS DA TERAMO, Masks/Personae
 JACOBUS DA VORAGINE, Mirror/Reflection
Golden Legend, Baptism, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Devotion/Piety, Expulsion, Grieving/Lamentation,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Music,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
 Shipwreck, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Omne femmes nobles et renommes,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations
 JACOBUS DE CESSOLIS
Le jeu des échecs moralisee,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations
 JAMES, Henry, Order/Chaos
Europeans, Artists/Art
Madonna of the Future, Artists/Art
Private Life, Artists/Art
Roderick Hudson, Artists/Art
Story of a Masterpiece, Artists/Art Tragic Muse, Artists/Art
 JENSEN, Wilhelm
Gravida, Imagination/Creativity
 JEROME, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Virgin/Virginity
 JEWSBURY, Geraldine
Half Sisters, Artists/Art
 JOACHIM OF FIORE, Ascent/Descent
 JOHANNES DE INDAGINE, Physiognomy
 JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Logos/Word
 JOHN CLIMACOS (Climax, Scholasticus), St.
The Ladder of Paradise, Ascent/Descent
 JOHN OF SALISBURY, Avarice
 JOHN OF THE CROSS, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts),
 Devotion/Piety
 JONSON, Ben
 "To Cecilia," Kiss/Kissing
Time Vindicated, Upside Down
 JOSEPHUS, Crucifixion
 JOUBERT, Laurent
Traité du Ris, Laughter
 JOYCE, James
Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, Artists/Art
Ulysses, Journey/Flight
 JUNG, Carl Gustave, Ascent/Descent, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Journey/Flight, Toilet Scenes
 JUNIUS, Hadrianus, Vanity/Vanitas
 JUVENAL, Fools/Folly, Luxury,
Satires, Physiognomy, Sin/Sinning

 KAFKA, Franz, Order/Chaos
 KALLIMACHOS
Hymnus in Delum, Arms Raised
 KANT, Immanuel, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter
 KAZANZAKIS, Nikos
Last Temptation, Temptation
 KEATS, John, Artists/Art, Communion, Death
Belle Dame Sans Merci, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale,
 Hair/Haircutting
Ode on a Grecian Urn, Metamorphosis
On First Looking into Chapman's Homer, Reading
 KEPLER, Johannes, Zodiac
 KIERKEGAARD, Soren, Choice/Choosing, Death,
 Laughter
 KIPLING, Rudyard, Artists/Art
Light That Failed, Artists/Art
 KIRCHER, Athanasius, Zodiac
 KLEIN, Melanie, Envy, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 KORDA, Alex, Dreams/Visions
 KRAMER, Heinrich Institor, and Jakob Sprenger
Malleus Maleficarum, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery

 LA FONTAINE, Jean de, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 LA FRÉRY, Antoine
Speculum Romanae Magnificentiae,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication
 LAIRESSE, Gerard de, Comic, Vanity/Vanitas
 LA PERRIÈRE, Gilliume de
Les Considerations . . ., Fools/Folly
La Morosophie, Drunkenness/Intoxication
 LAUGHING FIT (Japanese folktale), Laughter
 LAVATER, Johann Kasper
L'Art de connaitre . . ., Physiognomy
Essai sur la Physiognomie, Arms Raised Physiognomische Fragments, Humors
 LAVOISIER, Antoine Laurent, Order/Chaos
 LEE, Charles
Cynthia in the West, Artists/Art
 LEE, Vernon (Violet Paget)
Dionea, Artists/Art
Miss Brown, Artists/Art
Oke of Okehurst, Artists/Art
 LEFEBRE, Jean, Plague/Pestilence
 LE GALLIENNE, Richard Worshipper of the Image, Artists/Art
 LEGENDA AUREA see JACOBUS DA VORAGINE
 LEIBNITZ, Gottfried Wilhelm, Automata
 LEIDESDORF, Maximilian, Madness
 LENAUE, Nikolaus, Madness
 LEO, Bishop of Neapolis, Logos/Word
 LEONARDO DA VINCI, Imagination/Creativity,
 Mirror/Reflection, Physiognomy
 LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, Choice/Choosing
 LEVER, Charles
Martins of Cro'Martin, Artists/Art
 LEWIS, C. S.
Great Divorce, Damned Souls
Screwtape Letters, Damned Souls

- LIBAVIUS, Ancreas
Alchymia . . ., Abduction/Rape
- LICHTENBERGER, Johannes
Prognasticatio in Latino, Birth/Childbirth
- LI PO, Drunkenness/Intoxication
- LIVY, Adultery, Marriage/Betrothal
History of Rome, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal
- LOMAZZO, Giovanni Paolo
Trattato dell arte . . ., Imagination/Creativity
- LOMBARD, Peter
Sententiate, Virtue/Virtues
- LOMBROSO, Cesar, Artists/Art
- LONGFELLOW, Henry Wadsworth
Vittoria Colonna, Martyrdom
Wreck of the Hesperus, Shipwreck
- LONGINUS
Peri uyouis (On the Sublime), Sublime
- LONGUS
Daphnis and Chloe, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- LOOS, Anita
Gentlemen Prefer Blonds, Kiss/Kissing
- LORRAIN, Jean
Monsieur de Phocas, Masks/Personae
- LORRIS, Guillaume
Roman de la Rose, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- LOSSKI, Nikolai O., Imagination/Creativity
- LUCIAN, Artists/Art
Calumniae Non Temere Credendum, Calumny
Carousal, Fools/Folly
De Syria dea, Automata, Gaze
Dialogues on the Gods, Sleep/Sleeping
On Funerals, Grieving/Lamentation
- LUCIFER'S FALL (mystery play), Masks/Personae
- LUCILIUS, Caius, Luxury
- LUCRETIVS
De rerum natura, Luxury
- LULL, Ramon, Ascent/Descent
De novi logica, Ascent/Descent
- LYDGATE, John
Dance of Death, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- LYLY, John
Midas, Judgment
- MACHIAVELLI, Niccolò, Fortune
The Prince, Masks/Personae
- MACROBIUS, Evil Eye, Melancholy
Commentarii in Somnium Scipionis, Dreams/Visions, Music, Virtue/Virtues
Saturnalia, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MAGLIABECHINIAN, Antonio, Artists/Art
- MAIER, Michael
Symbola aureae mensae . . .,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- MALLEUS MALEFICARUS see KRAMER, Heinrich
 Institor, and Jakob Sprenger
- MALORY, Thomas
Le Morte D'Arthur, Adultery, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale (see also ARTHURIAN LEGENDS; TENNYSON, Alfred Lord, Idylls of the King)
- MALVASIA, Carlo Cesare
Felsina Pittrice, Comic
- MANCINI, Giulio
Considerazioni Sulla Pitture, Comic
- MANDER, Carel van, Evil Eye, Plague/Pestilence,
 Vanity/Vanitas
Het Schilderboek, Adultery, Comic
- MANILIUS, Marcus
Astronomica, Zodiac
- MANTOVANO, Music
- MANUTIUS, Aldus, Virtue/Virtues
- MANZONI, Alessandro
Betrothed, Marriage/Betrothal
- MARCHANT, Guy
Dance of Death, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- MARLIANO, Luigi, Peace
- MARLOWE, Christopher
Dr. Faustus, Damned Souls, Kiss/Kissing,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MAROLLES, Michel de, Hanging
- MARTIAL, Fools/Folly
- MATTHEW (OF) PARIS
Life of St. Alban, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- MAUGHAM, William Somerset
Moon and Sixpence, Artists/Art
- MAURIAC, François
Nest of Vipers, Avarice
- MEAD, Margaret
Coming of Age in Samoa, Order/Chaos
- MEDIEVAL ROMANCES (see also ARTHURIAN LEGENDS), Abduction/Rape, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale
- MELCHIORI, Francesco, Peace
- MENA, Juan de
El Laberinto, Labyrinth/Maze
- MERCIER, Sebastien, Whiteness
- MERCURIO, Scipione
Le Comare, Pregnancy
- MERTON, Thomas
Seven-Storey Mountain, Ascent/Descent
- METAPHRASTES, Simeon, Grieving/Lamentation
- MEUN, Jean de
Roman de la Rose, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- MICHELET, Jules
La Femme, Pregnancy
- MILTON, John, Artists/Art, Sublime
Ad Patrem, Imagination/Creativity
Paradise Lost, Damned Souls, Expulsion,
 Sin/Sinning
Paradise Regained, Expulsion, Order/Chaos
Samson Agonistes, Hair/Haircutting
- MITCHELL, Margaret
Gone with the Wind, Destruction of City
- MOLIÈRE, Jean Baptiste, Apotheosis/Deification
Don Juan, Masks/Personae
Miser, Avarice
- MOLITOR, Ulrich
De Lanijs . . ., Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MONTAIGNE, Michel de
 "On Some Verses of Virgil," Humors

- MONTESQUIEU
Considérations . . ., Excess
- MONTEVERDI, Claudio
The Return of Ulysses, Journey/Flight
- MOORE, George, Artists/Art
Celibates, Artists/Art
Confessions of a Young Man, Artists/Art
A Modern Lover, Artists/Art
- MOREAU, Jean, Dreams/Visions
- MORISON, Alexander, Madness
- MORREALL, John, Laughter
- MORRIS, William, Journey/Flight
Earthly Paradise, Sacrifice
- MOSCHION, Pregnancy
- MURASAKI SHIKUBU, LADY
Tale of Genji, Seasons, Voyeurism
- MURGER, Henry
Scenes de la vie de Boheme, Artists/Art
- MURIS, Johannes (Jean de) Summa Musica, Music
- MURNER, Thomas
Of the Great Lutheran Fool, Fools/Folly
- MYLIUS
Chymica: Basilica philosophica,
Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- NATIVITY (mystery play), Masks/Personae
- NEPOS, Envy
- NESBIT, Edith
Incomplete Amorist, Artists/Art
- NEWTON, Isaac, Order/Chaos, Zodiac
- NIBELUNGENLIED (see also WAGNER, Richard, Ring of the Nibelungen), Pointing/Indicating
- NICHOLAS DE CUSA, Virtue/Virtues
- NIETZSCHE, Friedrich Wilhelm, Madness, Order/Chaos,
Sin/Sinning
Thus Spake Zarathustra, Upside Down
- NIHONGI, Bath/Bathing
- NIZAMI
Khusraw and Shirin, Voyeurism
- NONIUS MARCELLUS, Fools/Folly
- NORDAU, Max, Artists/Art
- NORRIS, Frank
McTeague, Money
- NOVELLE, Marriage/Betrothal
- OLAUS MAGNUS
Historia de gentibus . . ., Witchcraft/Sorcery
- O'NEILL, Eugene
Hairy Ape, Hair/Haircutting
- OLIPHANT, Margaret
Three Brothers, Artists/Art
- ORSINI, Fulvio, Path/Road/Crossroads
- ORWELL, George
1984, Order/Chaos
- OIDA (Louise de la Ramée)
Two Little Wooden Shoes, Artists/Art
- OVID, Hanging, Seasons, Sublime
Amores, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- Ars Amatoria*, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Kiss/Kissing
- Epistulae ex Ponto*, Justice
- Fasti*, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Evil Eye, Music,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- Heroides*, Love and Death, Sleep/Sleeping
- Metamorphoses*, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
Dawn/Dawning, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Envy, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme
Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight,
Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Music,
Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping,
Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- Metamorphoses Englished*, Humors
- Moralisee*, Music, Vanity/Vanitas
- PACHECO, Francisco
Arte de la Pintura, Comic
- PAGET, Violet see LEE, Vernon
- PAI TA-SHUN, Seasons
- PALEOTTI, Gabriele
Trattato, Comic
- PAMPHILOS, Artists/Art
- PARACELSUS, Philippus Aureolus (Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim), Nightmare
- PASCAL, BLAISE, Devotion/Piety
- PATER, Walter
Imaginary Portraits, Artists/Art
- PAUL THE SILENTIARY, Light I
- PAUSANIAS, Destruction of City, Love and Death,
Patronage
Graeciae descriptio, Abundance, Justice,
Virtue/Virtues
- PETRARCH, Envy, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Marriage/Betrothal, Widowhood
Africa, Virtue/Virtues
Trionfi, Honor/Honoring, Path/Road/Crossroads, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
- PETRONIUS
Satyricon, Luxury, Widowhood
- PEYRE, Henri, Order/Chaos
- PHÉBUS, Gaston see GASTON III, Count of Foix
- PHILEMON, Laughter
- PHILOGELOS, Laughter
- PHILOSTRATUS, Drunkenness/Intoxication
Imagines, Music, Sleep/Sleeping
- PHRYNICHUS, Destruction of City
- PICATRIX, Melancholy
- PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, Giovanni, Fortune,
Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death
Commento, Love and Death
- PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN, Abduction/Rape
- PIERRE DE LANCRE
Tableau del'inconstances . . ., Witchcraft/Sorcery
- PIERS PLOWMAN, Money
- PINDAR, Apotheosis/Deification, Excess, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Sleep/Sleeping

- Nemean Ode*, Arms Raised
Pythian Odes, Virtue/Virtues
 PISAN, Christine
 Book of the City of Ladies, Justice, Mirror/Reflection
 PITT, William, Laughter
 PLATO, Artists/Art, Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word,
 Mirror/Reflection, Virtue/Virtues
 Laws, Avarice, Grieving/Lamentation
 Meno, Automata
 Phaedo, Ascent/Descent
 Republic, Avarice, Dreams/Visions,
 Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Light II,
 Mirror/Reflection, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 Symposium, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Love and Death, Sacrifice, Virtue/Virtues
 Timaeus, Order/Chaos
 PLAUTUS
 Aulularia, Comic
 Pot of Gold, Avarice
 Trimmus, Marriage/Betrothal
 PLINIUS see PLINY
 PLINY THE ELDER, Choice/Choosing, Mirror/Reflection, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Self-
 Portraits II
 Letters, Marriage/Betrothal
 Natural History, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Birth/
 Childbirth, Comic, Destruction of City, Gaze, Luxury, Physiognomy, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 PLOMER, William
 Family Tree, Abduction/Rape
 PLOTINUS
 Enneads, Light II
 PLUTARCH, Artists/Art, Envy, Excess, Hair/Haircutting, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Self-Portraits
 I, Virtue/Virtues
 Life of Solon, Abundance
 Opera moralia, Envy
 POLITIAN, Angelo Ambrogini, Love and Death
 POLIZIANO, Virtue/Virtues
 Orpheus, Music
 POLLUX, Masks/Personae
 POMPONAZZI, Pietro, Fortune
 POPE, Alexander
 Rape of the Lock, Abduction/Rape, Hair/Haircutting
 PORPHYRY, Ascent/Descent
 PORTA, Giambattista della
 De humana physiognomonia, Physiognomy
 PORTER, Katherine Ann
 Ship of Fools, Shipwreck POUND, Ezra
 Cantos, Avarice
 PRINZHORN, Hans, Madness
 PROBLEMATA, Humors
 PRODICUS, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess,
 Path/Road/Crossroads
 PROTAGORAS, Virtue/Virtues
 PRUDENTIUS
 Psychomachia, Avarice, Excess, Fame, Vices/Deadly
 Sins, Virtue/Virtues
 PSEUDO-ARISTOTLE, Physiognomy
 PSEUDO-BONAVENTURA see CAULIBUS, Giovanni PSEUDO-DIONYSUS, the Areopagite, St., Light II PSEUDO-HUGO
 De fructibus, Virtue/Virtues
 PULSNIENSIS, Huldericus
 Erbauliche Nachrichten . . ., Protestantism
 PYTHAGORUS, Imagination/Creativity, Seasons

 QUEVEDO Y VILLEGAS, Francisco Gómez de
 Suenos, Comic
 QUINTILLIAN, Self-Portraits I
 Institutiones Oratoriae, Arms Raised

 RABELAIS, François, Laughter
 RACINE, Jean, Apotheosis/Deification
 RALEIGH, Sir Walter
 History of the World, Seasons
 RALPH OF COGGESHALL
 Malekin, Abduction/Rape
 RAMÉE, Louise de la see OUIDA
 RAPUNZEL (Folk Tale), Grieving/Lamentation
 REMUS, Uncle
 Brer Rabbit, Laughter
 RENAI, Alain, Destruction of City
 RENAUDOT, Theophraste
 Recueil général des questions . . ., Humors
 REUFF, Jac
 De conceptu et generatione hominis, Birth/Childbirth
 REYNOLDS, Joshua, Sublime
 RHINTHON, Comic RICHARDSON, Samuel
 Pamela, Whiteness
 RICHER, Paul
 Nouvelle iconographie Salpêtrière, Madness
 RILKE, Rainer Maria, Sin/Sinning
 "On Dolls," Automata
 RIMBAUD, Arthur, Dreams/Visions
 Saison en enfer, Damned Souls
 RIPA, Cesare
 Iconologia, Abundance, Excess, Fame, Fortune,
 Honor/Honoring, Humors, Imagination/Creativity,
 Justice, Laughter, Madness, Masks/Personae,
 Misfortune, Music, Peace, Penitence/Repentance,
 Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II,
 Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues,
 Widowhood
 RITCHIE, Anne
 Miss Angel, Artists/Art
 ROBERTS, Morley
 Immortal Youth, Artists/Art
 ROLLENHAGEN, Gabriel
 Nucleus emblematicum, Music
 ROMAN DE FAUVE, Avarice
 ROMAN DE LA ROSE, Comic ROSA, SALVATOR, Peasantry
 Invidia, Envy
 ROSARIUM PHILOSOPHORUM,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
 ROSPLIGLIOSI, Gulio, Honor/Honoring

- ROSSETTI, Dante Gabriel
 "Hand and Soul," Artists/Art
 Jenny, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 "Song of the Bower," Kiss/Kissing
 RÖSSLIN, Eucharis
 Rosengarten, Birth/Childbirth, Pregnancy
 ROUSSEAU, Jean-Jacques, Devotion/Piety,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy
 Émile, Self-Portraits II
 RUSKIN, John, Calumny, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Night

 SACCHETTI, Franco
 Trecento Novelle, Self-Portraits II
 SADE, Marquis de, Imagination/Creativity
 SAIKAKU, Ihara
 Man Who Spent His Life in Love, Voyeurism
 SALLUST
 De Civitate Dei, Luxury
 Historiae, Luxury
 SAND, George, Masks/Personae
 SANNAZARO, Jacopo
 Arcadia, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 SAPPHO, Love and Death
 SARTRE, John-Paul
 Huis-Clos (No Exit), Damned Souls
 SCHELLING, Friedrich W. J., Dawn/Dawning
 SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich, Devotion/Piety
 SCHOPENHAUER, Arthur, Laughter
 SCIPIO AEMILLIANUS, Dreams/Visions
 SCOTT, Walter, Artists/Art
 St. Ronan's Well, Artists/Art
 SENECA, Artists/Art, Death, Fools/Folly, Laughter,
 Mirror/Reflection, Physiognomy
 De Beneficiis, Virtue/Virtues
 SERVIUS, Melancholy
 SETON, G. T.
 Yes, Lady Sabad, Widowhood
 SEVEN SLEEPERS, Sleep/Sleeping
 SHAKESPEARE, William, Apotheosis/Deification,
 Artists/Art, Death, Sublime
 Hamlet, Death, Hair/Haircutting, Madness,
 Melancholy
 Henry V, Marriage/Betrothal
 King Lear, Fools/Folly, Judgment
 Macbeth, Madness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 Measure for Measure, Music, Temptation
 Merchant of Venice, Envy, Judgment, Shipwreck
 A Midsummer Night's Dream, Humors, Labyrinth/Maze
 Othello, Envy, Temptation
 Passionate Pilgrim, Humors
 "Sweet and Twenty," Kiss/Kissing
 Tempest, Shipwreck, Widowhood
 Twelfth Night, Shipwreck
 Two Noble Kinsmen, Humors
 SHALMANESER III, Destruction of City
 SHAW, George Bernard
 Don Juan in Hell, Damned Souls
 Pygmalion, Metamorphosis
 SHELLEY, Percy Bysshe
 Posthumous Poems, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale

 SHERIDAN, Richard Brinsley, Laughter
 SIDNEY, Philip
 Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT,
 Abduction/Rape
 SLEEPING BEAUTY, Kiss/Kissing, Sleep/Sleeping
 SMART, Christopher
 Poems on Several Occasions, Judgment
 SOCRATES see Index of Ancient Mythological and Historical Personages, Places, and Concepts
 SOLON, Excess
 SOMME LE ROI, Dreams/Visions, Peasantry, Vices/Deadly
 Sins, Virtue/Virtues
 SOPHOCLES, Hanging, Light I, Sacrifice
 SORANUS OF EPHEBUS
 Gynaecia (On Gynecology), Pregnancy
 SPANHEIM, M. de
 Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne fidèlement tirée, de la dissertation latine, Birth/Childbirth
 SPECULUM HUMANA SALVATIONIS, Justice
 SPENCER, Herbert, Laughter
 SPENER, Philipp Jakob, Devotion/Piety
 SPENSER, Edmund
 Shepherd's Calendar, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 SPIEGEL, Andrian
 De Formata foetu, Pregnancy
 SPINOZA, Baruch, Automata, Virtue/Virtues
 SPRENGER, Jakob see KRAMER, Heinrich Institor, and Jakob Sprenger
 STAFFORD, Anthony, Whiteness
 STEPHENS, Frederic George, Dreams/Visions
 STERNBERG, Josef von, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 STOCKHAUSEN, Karl, Order/Chaos
 STONE, Irving
 Agony and the Ecstasy, Artists/Art
 Lust for Life, Artists/Art
 STOPPARD, Tom
 Lord Malquist and Mr. Moon, Order/Chaos
 STRAUSS, Johann
 Die Fledermaus (The Bat), Laughter
 STRAUSS, Richard
 Salomé (Opera), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 STRAVINSKY, Igor, Abduction/Rape
 STYEVOORT, Vices/Deadly Sins
 SUETONIUS, Marriage/Betrothal
 Nero, Luxury
 The Twelve Caesars, Apotheosis/Deification, Envy,
 Honor/Honoring
 SUMERIAN TABLETS, Damned Souls
 SWIFT, Jonathan, Artists/Art, Ecstasy
 SWILLINCK, Jan Pietersz, Music
 SWINBURN, Algernon, Kiss/Kissing, Mirror/Reflection
 SYLVESTRE, Armand
 Le Nu au Louvre, Bath/Bathing

 TACITUS, Calumny
 Annals, Grieving/Lamentation
 Histories, Envy

- TALMUDIC LEGENDS, Music
TASSO, Torquato
L'Aminta, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
Del Poema Eroico . . ., Imagination/Creativity
Gerusalemme Liberata, Abduction/Rape,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping
TASSONI, Alessandro
Rape of the Bucket, Abduction/Rape
TAULER, Johannes, Devotion/Piety
TEBALDEO, Antonio, Female Beauty and Adornment
TENNYSON, Alfred Lord, Hair/Haircutting, Kiss/Kissing, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos
Enoch Arden, Shipwreck
Idylls of the King, Adultery, Fatal Woman/Femme
Fatale (see also ARTHURIAN LEGENDS; MALORY, Thomas, Le Morte d'Arthur)
Mariana, Death
Princess, Kiss/Kissing
Ulysses, Journey/Flight
TERENCE, Drunkenness/Intoxication
Eunuchus, Fools/Folly
TERTULLIAN, Avarice
THACKERAY, William Makepeace, Artists/Art
Newcomes, Artists/Art
Vanity Fair, Artists/Art
THEOCRITUS OF SYRACUSE
Idylls, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Witchcraft/Sorcery
THEODULF OF ORLEANS, Virtue/Virtues
THEOPHRASTUS, Melancholy
THERESA OF AVILA, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
Way of Perfection, Devotion/Piety
THOMAS À KEMPIS
Imitation of Christ, Devotion/Piety
THOMAS AQUINAS, St. (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Abundance, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
Questiones Disputatus, Witchcraft/Sorcery
Summa Theologiae, Imagination/Creativity,
Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
THOMSON, James, Seasons
Winter, Judgment
"THREE LIVING AND THE THREE DEAD," Death
TOLSTOY, Leo, Expulsion
TOWNSEND, Mary Ashley
Creed, Kiss/Kissing
TROLLOPE, Anthony, Artists/Art
Barchester Towers, Artists/Art
TROYES, Chretien de, Adultery
TWIN, Mark
Tom Sawyer, Dreams/Visions
URFÉ, Honoré d'
L'Astrée, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
VALERIANO, Piero, Love and Death, Peace
Hieroglyphica . . ., Virtue/Virtues
VALERIUS MAXIMUS, Evil Eye
De pietate in parentes, Virtue/Virtues
VARRO, Marcus Terentius
Rerum rusticarum, Luxury
VASARI, Giorgio, Artists/Art, Envy, Evil Eye, Hanging, Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Mirror/Reflection
Vite, Peace
VEBLEN, Thorstein
Theory of the Leisure Class, Money
VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Marcus
History, Luxury
VERARD, Vices/Deadly Sins
VERDI, Giuseppe
Rigoletto, Fools/Folly
VERGIL see VIRGIL
VERLAINE, Paul, Dreams/Visions
VESALIUS, Andreas, Serpent's Bite, Vanity/Vanitas
VIGÉE-LEBRUN, Marie-Louise-Elisabeth
Memoirs, Calumny
VILLANI, Filippo, Artists/Art
VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS
Speculum morale, Virtue/Virtues
VIRGIL, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Damned
Souls, Excess, Fame, Light I, Love and Death, Peasantry,
Virtue/Virtues
Aeneid, Abandonment, Avarice, Damned Souls,
Destruction of City, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Love and Death, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
Eclogues, Justice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
Georgics, Peasantry, Serpent's Bite,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses
VISIO TUNDALI see VISIONS OF TONDAL
VISIONS OF TONDAL, Journey/Flight, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Whiteness
VISSCHER, Roemer, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
Sinnepoppen, Vanity/Vanitas
VOLTAIRE, Ecstasy
Candide, Destruction of City
Dictionnaire philosophique, Witchcraft/Sorcery
VONDEL, Joost van den
Ovidius Hersheppinghe, Birth/Childbirth
VORAGINE, Jacobus da see JACOBUS DA VORAGINE
WAGNER, Richard, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale Ring of the Nibelungen (see also NIBELUNGENLIED),
Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
Tannhauser, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
WALLMAN, Margarethe, Abduction/Rape
WALPOLE, Horace, Sublime
WALTER DE MILEMETE, Comic WATTS-DUNTON, Theodore, Artists/Art
Aylwin, Artists/Art
WEDMORE, Frederick
Renunciations, Artists/Art
WELLS, H. G.
The Shape of Things to Come, Dreams/Visions
The Sleeper Wakes, Automata
The Time Machine, Automata
WHITEHEAD, Alfred North, Imagination/Creativity

WHITMAN, Walt
Oh Captain, My Captain, Martyrdom
WILDE, Oscar, Luxury, Masks/Personae
Lady Windermere's Fan, Temptation
Picture of Dorian Gray, Artists/Art
Salomé, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting
WITCHES' HAMMER see KRAMER, Heinrich Institor, and Jakob Sprenger, MALLEUS MALEFICARUS
WITHERS, George
. . . Emblemes, Abduction/Rape
WITTENWILER
Ring, Peasantry
WODEHOUSE, P. G.
"Rough-Hew Them How We Will," Artists/Art
WOLF, Johannes
Lectionam memorabilium et reconditurum Centenarii
SVI, Birth/Childbirth
WOLGENUT, Michael
Dance of Death, Vanity/Vanitas
WOLLSTONECRAFT, Mary, Birth/Childbirth
WOOLF, Virginia
To the Lighthouse, Artists/Art
Orlando, Artists/Art
WORDSWORTH, William, Harvesting
WYSS, Johan David
Swiss Family Robinson, Shipwreck

XANTHOPOULOS, Nicephorus Kallistos, Self-Portraits I XANTO, Love and Death
XENOPHANES, Logos/Word
XENOPHON, Abduction/Rape, Choice/Choosing
Memorabilia, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess

YANG WAN-LI, Drunkenness/Intoxication
YATES, Edmund
Land at Last, Artists/Art
YEATS, William Butler
Second Coming, Order/Chaos
YOSHIHIRO MIZUHARA
Sanka zushiki, Birth/Childbirth
YOUNG, Edward Night Thoughts, Dreams/Visions

ZAMORA, Antonio de, Witchcraft/Sorcery
ZINCGRFFE, Julius Wilhelm
Emblematum, Misfortune
ZOLA, Émile, Apotheosis/Deification, Artists/Art,
Bath/Bathing
Nana, Mirror/Reflection
L'Oeuvre, Artists/Art
ZUCCARO, Federico, Imagination/Creativity

CHARACTERS AND PLACES IN LITERARY WORKS

AHASUARUS, Journey/Flight
ALGER, Horatio, Money
ALICE see CARROLL, Lewis (Charles Lutwidge Dodgson), Alice in Wonderland

AMARYLLIS see VIRGIL; TASSO, Torquato, L'Aminta
ANGELICA see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
ANGELO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Measure for Measure
ANTONIO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Merchant of Venice
ARCITE see CHAUCER, Geoffrey
ARISTOTLE AND PHYLLIS, Excess
ARMIDA see TASSO, Torquato, Gerusalemme Liberata
ARTEGAL see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
ARTHUR, King see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
ATLANTE see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
AVALOM see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
BASSANO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Merchant of Venice
BEATRICE see DANTE, Divine Comedy
BELLE DAME SANS MERCI see KEATS, John BENNETT, Elizabeth see AUSTEN, Jane, Pride and Prejudice
BIRENO see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
BRER RABBIT see REMUS, Uncle
BRISCOE, Lily see WOOLF, Virginia, To the Lighthouse
BRITOMART see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
BUGS BUNNY see DISNEY, Walt
CAMELOT see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
CELIA see ELIOT, T. S., Cocktail Party
CINDERELLA, Penitence/Repentance
CLAUDIO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Measure for Measure
CORYDON see VIRGIL
DAFFY DUCK see DISNEY, Walt
DARCY see AUSTEN, Jane, Pride and Prejudice
DESDEMONA see SHAKESPEARE, William, Othello
DES ESSEINTES see HUYSMANS, Joris Karl DIARMUID see MEDIEVAL ROMANCES
ERMINIA see TASSO, Torquato, Gerusalemme Liberata
FAUST see GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang von, Faust; MARLOWE, Christopher, Dr. Faustus
FINN, Huckleberry see TWAIN, Mark, Tom Sawyer
GRÁINNE see MEDIEVAL ROMANCES
GRAY, Dorian see WILDE, Oscar
GRETCHEN see GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang von, Faust
GUINEVERE see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
HAGEN see NIBELUNGENLIED
HEMINIA see ERMINIA
HESTER PRYNN see HAWTHORNE, Nathaniel, Scarlet Letter
ISABELLA see BOCCACCIO, Giovanni, SHAKESPEARE, William, Measure for Measure
ISEULT (ISOLDE) see YSEULT
IZANGA see NIHONGI
KHUSRAW see NIZAMI, Khusraw and Shirin
KRIEMHILD see NIBELUNGENLIED
LADY OF THE LAKE see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS LAUNCELOT see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
LYCIDAS see VIRGIL
LYSIS see HUMBELOT, Jean
MACBETH, Lady see SHAKESPEARE, William, Macbeth
MARIANA see TENNYSON, Alfred Lord, Mariana
MARK OF CORNWALL see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS

MEDORA see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
 MELEAGUANCE see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
 MEPHISTOPHELES see GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang von,
Faust; MARLOWE, Christopher, Dr. Faustus
 MERLIN see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
 MORGAN LE FAY see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
 ODYSSEUS see HOMER
 OEDIPUS see SOPHOCLES
 OLIMPIA see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
 OPHELIA see SHAKESPEARE, William, Hamlet
 ORLANDO see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
 OTHELLO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Othello
 PAMELA see RICHARDSON, Samuel, Pamela
 PAUL see BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE, Jacques Henri,
Paul and Virginia
 PHYLLIS see ARISTOTLE AND PHYLLIS; VIRGIL
 PINABEL see ARIOSTO, Ludovico, Orlando Furioso
 PORTIA see SHAKESPEARE, William, Merchant of Venice
 PROSPERO see SHAKESPEARE, William, Tempest
 REYNARD THE FOX, Laughter

RINALDO see TASSO, Torquato, Gerusalemme Liberata
 ROLAND see CHANSON DE ROLAND
 SEBASTIAN see SHAKESPEARE, William, Twelfth Night
 SHABDIZ see NIZAMI, Khusraw and Shirin
 SHIRIN see NIZAMI, Khusraw and Shirin
 SHYLOCK see SHAKESPEARE, William, Merchant of Venice
 SIEGFRIED see NIBELUNGENLIED
 TANCRED see MEDIEVAL ROMANCES
 THYRSIS see VIRGIL
 TRIMALCHIO see PETRONIUS, Satyricon
 TRISTAN (TRISTRAM) see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
 TYLL EULENSOEWIGEL, Laughter
 UGOLINO see DANTE, Divine Comedy
 VIOLA see SHAKESPEARE, William, Twelfth Night
 VIRGINIA see BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE, Jacques
 Henri, Paul and Virginia
 VIVIAN see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS
 YSEULT see ARTHURIAN LEGENDS

INDEX OF OTHER NAMES AND TERMS

The titles after the index term refer to the essays in which the subject is found. See citations refer the reader to the term within the index or to other indexes where primary information can be found. See also citations refer the reader to other terms within the index or to other indexes where additional information can be found.

ABANDONMENT, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Choice/Choosing, Destruction of City, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Seasons, Voyeurism, Widowhood

ABDOMEN see STOMACH

ABDUCTION/RAPE, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Destruction of City, Judgment, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery

ABOLITIONIST(S), Margins/Outsiders

ABSINTHE, Drunkenness/Intoxication

ABSOLUTION, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning

ABSTINENCE see CHASTITY

ABSTRACT/ABSTRACTION, Death, Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude, Night, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Sublime, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues

ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM, Caricature/Cartoon, Night, Order/Chaos

ABSURD/ABSURDITY, Dreams/Visions, Laughter, Order/Chaos

ABUNDANCE, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Evil Eye, Excess, Light I, Luxury, Misfortune, Months, Offering, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues

ABYSS, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Vices/Deadly Sins

ACADEMIES/ACADEMICISM, Artists/Art, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Imagination/Creativity, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II

ACANTHUS, Offering

ACCUSE/ACCUSING/ACCUSATION(S), Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Calumny, Communion, Envy, Evil Eye, Judgment, Luxury, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Toilet Scenes

ACOLYTE(S), Fortune, Plague/Pestilence

ACROBAT(S), Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery

ACTOR(S)/ACTRESS(ES), Masks/Personae, Money, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues

ADMIRE/ADMIRER, Female Beauty and Adornment, Temptation, Toilet Scenes

ADOLESCENT(S) (see also YOUTH[S]), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos

ADORATION see Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places and Concepts

ADORE see ADMIRE; LOVE; WORSHIP

ADORNMENT see FEMALE BEAUTY AND ADORNMENT

ADULTERY, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Calumny, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Justice, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins
ADVENTURE, Journey/Flight
ADVERTISEMENT(S)/ADVERTISING, Comic, Luxury, Months, Naked/Nude, Sport, Widowhood
AEDICULA(E) see NICHE(S)
AEGIS, Evil Eye, Hair/Haircutting
AESTHETIC(S)/AESTHETICISM, Devotion/Piety, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Patronage, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Seasons, Sport
AFRICA (personification), Naked/Nude
AFTERLIFE, Baptism, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Ecstasy, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Justice, Light I, Love and Death, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Widowhood
AGATE, Evil Eye
AGES OF MAN, Journey/Flight, Humors, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Seasons, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
AGES OF THE WORLD (Gold, Silver, Bronze, Iron), Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Death, Expulsion, Justice, Money, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virtue/Virtues
AGGRANDIZEMENT (see also SELF-AGGRANDIZEMENT), Comic, Peace
AGON, Sport
AGRARIAN see AGRICULTURE
AGRARIAN UNREST see LABOR UNREST
AGRICULTURE, Abundance, Destruction of City, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Months, Peasantry, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Serpent's Bite, Zodiac
AIDS, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Margins/Outsiders, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning
AIR, Humors, Light II, Plague/Pestilence, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac AIRPLANE(S), Misfortune
AIR RAID(S), Order/Chaos
ALBA, Duchess of, Gaze
ALBA, Duke of, Fools/Folly
ALBERT, Prince, of England, Artists/Art
ALCHEMY, Ascent/Descent, Harvesting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Judaism, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Money, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Vices/Deadly Sins
ALCOHOLISM, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Masks/Personae, Vices/Deadly Sins
ALFRED THE GREAT, Fortune
ALIEN(S), Abduction/Rape, Margins/Outsiders
ALIENATION, Artists/Art, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fools/Folly, Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Upside Down, Widowhood
ALLEGORY, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Comic, Communion, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Destruction of

City, Ecstasy, Envy, Excess, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light I, Love and Death, Madness, Metamorphosis, Misfortune, Money, Months, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
ALLUSION(S), Honor/Honoring, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
ALMANAC(S), Months
ALMS/ALMSGIVING, Envy, Light I, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
ALPHA AND OMEGA, Music, Sacrifice
ALTAR, Abandonment, Annunciation, Arms Raised, Communion, Crucifixion, Dawn/Dawning, Destruction of City, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Harvesting, Justice, Light I, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Offering, Patronage, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
ALTER-EGO, Masks/Personae
AMBER, Luxury, Pregnancy
AMBIGUITY, Comic, Dreams/Visions, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Judgment, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Night, Protestantism, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Widowhood AMBIVALENCE see AMBIGUITY
AMBUSH, Path/Road/Crossroads
AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, Destruction of City
AMERICAN REVOLUTION, Martyrdom, Sacrifice, Whiteness
AMORETTO(I), Love and Death
AMPUTATION, Dreams/Visions, Sacrifice
AMULET(S), Evil Eye, Toilet Scenes
ANALOGY, Plague/Pestilence, Toilet Scenes, Witchcraft/Sorcery
ANAMNESIS, Devotion/Piety
ANARCHY/ANARCHIST(S), Martyrdom, Peasantry
ANATOMY, Imagination/Creativity, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Vanity/Vanitas
ANCESTOR(S), Journey/Flight, Peace, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas
ANCHOR(S), Night, Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
ANDRÉ, Ellen, Drunkenness/Intoxication
ANDREOSIA, Honor/Honoring
ANDROGYNE see HERMAPHRODITE/ANDROGYNE
ANEMONE, Adultery, Love and Death, Metamorphosis
ANGEL(S) see Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts
ANGEL OF DEATH, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
ANGELICA (musical instrument), Music
ANGST, Masks/Personae

ANGUISH see DISTRESS

ANIMAL(S), Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Crucifixion, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Excess, Expulsion, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Love and Death, Luxury, Madness, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Months, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

ANIMATION, Masks/Personae

ANIMISM/ANIMALISTIC, Dreams/Visions, Sin/Sinning

ANKH (symbol of life), Baptism, Pregnancy

ANNE OF BRITTANY, Fortune

ANNUNCIATION (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Annunciation, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Reading, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation

ANOINT/ANOINTING, Crucifixion, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Witchcraft/Sorcery

ANOMIE, Margins/Outsiders

ANTELOPE(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis

ANTHROPOLOGY, Physiognomy

ANTHROPOMORPHISM, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

ANTI-MASS see BLACK MASS

ANTIPODES, Upside Down

ANTIQUUE/ANTIQUITY (frequently used term; not indexed)

ANTI-SEMITISM, Money

ANTLERS, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

ANTONISSES, Reynier, Vanity/Vanitas

ANXIETY, Automata, Death, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy

APE(S) see MONKEY(S)

APHRODISIAC, Drunkenness/Intoxication

APOCALYPSE, Apocalypse, Dreams/Visions, Judgment, Music, Night, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Sublime, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins

APOLLO XI, Journey/Flight

APOSTLE(S) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Witchcraft/Sorcery

APOTHEOSIS/DEIFICATION, Apotheosis/Deification, Abundance, Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Honor/Honoring

APPLE(S), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Expulsion, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Judaism, Judgment, Light I, Melancholy, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Temptation

APPRENTICE/APPRENTICESHIP,

Labor/Trades/Occupations, Witchcraft/Sorcery

APPROPRIATION, Abundance, Order/Chaos, Voyeurism

APRON(S), Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Whiteness

AQUARIUS (zodiacal constellation), Zodiac

AQUATIC MAZE see LABYRINTH/MAZE

ARAB(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

ARC (river), Bath/Bathing

ARCADIA, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

ARCH/ARCHWAY, Baptism, Damned Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Light I, Logos/Word, Martyrdom, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Seasons, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac

ARCHER(S)/ARCHERY see BOW (AND ARROW[S])

ARCHETYPE(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery

ARCHITECT(S)/ARCHITECTURE, Abandonment, Annunciation, Apocalypse, Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Fame, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Logos/Word, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Sublime, Temptation, Voyeurism

ARCTIC, Shipwreck

ARCTOPHALAX see ARCTURUS

ARCTURUS (star), Pregnancy

ARGENTI, FILIPPO, Damned Souls

ARIES (zodiacal constellation), Zodiac

ARISTOCRAT(S)/ARISTOCRACY, Automata, Fortune, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Months, Patronage, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Voyeurism, Whiteness

ARLECHCCINO see HARLEQUIN

ARMBAND(S), Widowhood

ARMS/ARMOR, Expulsion, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Luxury, Madness, Months, Naked/Nude, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Peasantry, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues

ARMS RAISED, Abandonment, Arms Raised, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Justice, Light II, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

ARNO, Abundance

ARROW(S) see BOW (AND ARROW[S])

ARS SACRA, Plague/Pestilence

ART see ARTISTS/ART

ART BRUT, Margins/Outsiders

ART COLLECTING/COLLECTIONS, Abandonment, Artists/Art, Imagination/Creativity, Madness, Money, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Self-Portraits I

ART CRITIC(S), Fools/Folly, Self-Portraits I

ART DEALER(S), Patronage, Temptation

ART DECO, Peasantry

ARTES LIBERALES see LIBERAL ARTS

ART GUILD(S), Artists/Art, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II

ARTIFICE/ARTIFICIAL, Automata, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Seasons, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

- ARTISTS/ART, Abandonment, Artists/Art, Automata, Death, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Light II, Love and Death, Luxury, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Zodiac
- ART MARKET, Artists/Art, Mirror/Reflection, Patronage, Peasantry, Physiognomy
- ART THEORY, Imagination/Creativity, Naked/Nude, Self-Portraits I, Sublime
- ART-UNION, Harvesting
- ASCENT/DESCENT, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls, Dreams/Visions, Fortune, Gaze, Light I, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- ASCETIC/ASCETICISM, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance, Virgin/Virginity
- ASH(ES), Vanity/Vanitas
- ASH CAN SCHOOL, Bath/Bathing, Night
- ASS(ES), Caricature/Cartoon, Fools/Folly, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Laughter, Light II, Madness, Peasantry
- ASSASSINATION, Sacrifice, Sanctuary
- ASSES' EARS, Bacchanalia/Orgy
- ASSES' JAW-BONE, Envy
- ASSOCIATION(S), Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Nightmare, Patronage, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- ASTROLOGER(S)/ASTROLOGY, Melancholy, Music, Physiognomy, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- ASTRONOMER(S)/ASTRONOMY, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Months, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Seasons, Zodiac
- ASYLUM see MADHOUSE; SANCTUARY
- ATHÉNIENNE, Whiteness
- ATHLETE(S)/ATHLETIC GAMES, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sport, Zodiac
- ATLANTA, Georgia, Destruction of City
- ATLAS, Charles, Comic
- ATOM(S), Order/Chaos
- ATONEMENT, Judgment, Martyrdom, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins
- ATTRIBUTES, Abundance, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fame, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Misfortune, Months, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
- ATTRITION, Penitence/Repentance
- AUDIENCE see SPECTATOR(S)
- AUGSBURG, Protestantism
- AUGURY see DIVINATION
- AUREOLE/HALO, Abandonment, Apotheosis/Deification, Ascent/Descent, Communion, Light I, Light II, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning
- AUSTERITY, Devotion/Piety, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- AUTOBIOGRAPHY, Artists/Art, Masks/Personae, Peace
- AUTOMATA, Automata, Dreams/Visions
- AUTOMATIC WRITING, Imagination/Creativity
- AUTOMOBILE(S), Marriage/Betrothal
- AUTUMN see SEASONS
- AVALANCHE(S), Sublime
- AVANT-GARDE, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Patronage
- AVARICE, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Envy, Excess, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Madness, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
- AVIATION, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- AVIGNON, Widowhood
- AVRIL, Jane, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- AWAKEN/AWAKENING, Ecstasy, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping
- AWE, Night, Sublime, Visiting/Visitation
- AX/AXE/AXES, Death, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze
- AXIS, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Sanctuary, Zodiac
- AXIS MUNDI, Ascent/Descent
- BABOON(S), Vices/Deadly Sins
- BABY/BABIES see INFANT(S)/INFANCY/INFANTALISM
- BACCHANALIA/ORGY, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Music, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BACK-PACK, Path/Road/Crossroads
- BACKWARD, Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- BAD/BADNESS see EVIL
- BADGER(S), Vices/Deadly Sins
- BAD GOVERNMENT see GOOD AND BAD GOVERNMENT
- BAGPIPE(S)/BAGPIPER(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Marriage/Betrothal, Music, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- BAHAMAS, Shipwreck
- BAILLE, Baptistin, Bath/Bathing
- BAIT/BAITING, Sport
- BAKER(S)/BAKING/BAKERY, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Pregnancy
- BALANCE(S) see SCALE(S)
- BALANCHINE, George, Dance/Dancers/Dancing

- BALD/BALDNESS, Evil Eye, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Humors,
 Naked/Nude
 BALDRICK(S), Zodiac
 BALL(S), Evil Eye, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Sport,
 Virtue/Virtues
 BALLET, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Seasons
 BALLOON(S), Journey/Flight
 BALUSTRade(S), Misfortune, Temptation
 BAMBOO, Seasons
 BANDEROLE(S), Protestantism
 BAND, Zodiac
 BANDIT(S)/BANDITTI, Sublime
 BANISHMENT, Adultery, Betrayal, Pregnancy
 BANK(S)/BANKER(S), Money, Patronage, Vanity/Vanitas
 BANKRUPTCY, Self-Portraits I
 BANNER(S), Communion, Hanging, Honor/Honoring,
 Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom,
 Plague/Pestilence
 BANNS, Marriage/Betrothal
 BANQUET see FEAST
 BAPTISM, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Ecstasy,
 Journey/Flight, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 BARA, Theda, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 BARBARIAN(S), Excess, Luxury, Order/Chaos
 BARBER(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection
 BARBERINI, Maffeo, Self-Portraits I
 BARDI, Leonora, Marriage/Betrothal
 BAREFOOT, Fortune, Madness, Misfortune, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning
 BARLEY, Marriage/Betrothal
 BARN(S)/BARNYARD(S), Harvesting, Peasantry,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 BARONCELLI, Barnardo di Bandino, Hanging BAROQUE, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Gaze,
 Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Martyrdom,
 Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice, Sublime,
 Vices/Deadly Sins
 BARQUE see SHIP
 BARREL(S), Abundance, Judgment, Money, Order/Chaos
 BARREN/BARRENNess, Abduction/Rape, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Seasons,
 Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood
 BARRIER(S)/BARRICADE(S) see MARGINS/OUTSIDER
 BARTHOLOMEW MASSACRE, Protestantism
 BAS-DE-PAGE IMAGES see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
 BASILICA(S), Light I, Sanctuary BASIN(S) see BOWL(S)
 BASKET(S), Abandonment, Abundance,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Light I,
 Months, Peasantry, Virtue/Virtues
 BAT(S), Death, Dreams/Visions, Fame, Melancholy, Nightmare
 BATH/BATHING (see also WASH/WASHING),
 Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Comic, Expulsion, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze,
 Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Logos/Word, Luxury,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Naked/Nude, Offering, Peasantry, Pregnancy, Seasons,
 Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism
 BATH HOUSES, Bath/Bathing, Sin/Sinning BATHING SUIT, Months
 BATHTUB, Voyeurism
 BATON(S), Fortune, Peace
 BATTLE(S) see COMBAT(S)
 BATTLE OF THE SEXES, Sin/Sinning
 BAUBLE(S), Fools/Folly
 BAUHAUS, Upside Down
 BAWDINESS, Masks/Personae
 BEAD(S), Evil Eye
 BEAN(S), Laughter
 BEAR(S) (see also POLAR BEARS), Expulsion, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Light I, Madness,
 Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sport, Zodiac
 BEARD(S), Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Humors,
 Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune,
 Order/Chaos, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I
 BEAST(S) see ANIMAL(S)
 BEAUTY/BEAUTIFUL, Abandonment, Abundance,
 Choice/Choosing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy,
 Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting,
 Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring,
 Judgment, Light II, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Months, Naked/Nude, Night, Offering, Order/Chaos,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Peasantry,
 Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sacrifice,
 Seasons, Sport, Sublime, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness
 BED/BED CHAMBER, Adultery, Annunciation,
 Birth/Childbirth, Death, Dreams/Visions, Excess, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Love and Death, Luxury, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity
 BEE(S)/BEEKEEPING, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Serpent's Bite
 BEER, Self-Portraits I
 BEETLE(S), Caricature/Cartoon
 BEG/BEGGAR(S)/BEGGING, Damned Souls, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Money,
 Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
 BEHEADING/DECAPITATION, Automata,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
 Ecstasy, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Justice, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Nightmare, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I,
 Virtue/Virtues
 BELIEF see FAITH/FAITHFUL
 BELL(S), Automata, Fools/Folly, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Music
 BELLY see STOMACH
 BELT(S), Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal
 BEREND-CORINTH, Charlotte, Pregnancy
 BERGERIE STYLE, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 BERLIN, Order/Chaos
 BESTIALITY, Excess, Music
 BET(S)/BETTING see GAMBLER(S)/GAMBLING

- BETHLEM (BEDLAM), Madness
BETRAYAL, Betrayal, Hair/Haircutting, Kiss/Kissing,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
BETROTHAL see MARRIAGE/BETROTHAL
BEWITCH(ED) see WITCHCRAFT/SORCERY
BIAGGIO DA CESENA, Judgment
BIAS, Physiognomy
BIBLE(S)/BIBLICAL (frequently used term; not indexed)
BICYCLE(S), Comic
BIER see FUNERAL/BURIAL
BILE, Humors, Melancholy, Sin/Sinning
BILL(S), Widowhood
BILLBOARD(S) see ADVERTISING
BILLIARDS, Sport
BINDING (see also BONDAGE), Toilet Scenes
BIRD(S), Apocalypse, Caricature/Cartoon,
 Communion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy,
 Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Judaism,
 Light I, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy,
 Protestantism, Sanctuary, Seasons, Witchcraft/Sorcery
BIRD CAGE, Annunciation
BIRTH/CHILDBIRTH, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth,
 Dawn/Dawning, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death,
 Expulsion, Fame, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Judgment,
 Justice, Laughter, Naked/Nude, Offering, Order/Chaos,
 Peace, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
BIRTH CANAL, Birth/Childbirth, Pregnancy BIRTH CONTROL/POPULATION CONTROL, Pregnancy,
 Sacrifice
BIRTHDAY(S), Beheading/Decapitation,
 Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Ecstasy, Fame, Fortune,
 Honor/Honoring, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
BIRTHING CHAIR, Birth/Childbirth, Pregnancy
BIRTH PLATTER (Desco da parto), Birth/Childbirth
BIRTHRIGHT, Betrayal, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
BIRTHSTOOL, Birth/Childbirth
BITE(S)/BITING, Caricature/Cartoon, Crucifixion, Fools/Folly, Love and Death, Melancholy, Offering, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Serpent's Bite
BITTERSWEET, Love and Death
BLACK/BLACKNESS/DARK/DARKNESS, Apocalypse,
 Communion, Crucifixion, Death, Fame, Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Judaism, Laughter, Light I, Light II, Luxury, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae,
 Melancholy, Misfortune, Night, Nightmare,
 Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I,
 Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime,
 Temptation, Upside Down, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
BLACKBIRD(S), Zodiac
BLACK DEATH see PLAGUE/PESTILENCE
BLACK MAN/MEN see NEGRO(S)
BLACK MASS, Witchcraft/Sorcery
BLACKSMITH see SMITH(S)
BLADDER, Fools/Folly
BLAME, Expulsion, Fame, Humors, Pointing/Indicating, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins
BLANCHE OF CASTILE, Patronage
BLASPHEMER(S)/BLASPHEMY, Misfortune, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Sin/Sinning
BLEEDING see BLOOD/BLEEDING
BLESS/BLESSING (see also GRACE [DIVINE]), Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Baptism,
 Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Communion,
 Dawn/Dawning, Honor/Honoring, Light I, Order/Chaos,
 Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
BLIND/BLINDNESS, Avarice, Dreams/Visions, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Light I,
 Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Reading,
 Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
BLINDFOLD(ED), Fortune, Justice, Sin/Sinning,
 Virtue/Virtues
BLISS, Expulsion, Love and Death
BLOCK(S), Fortune
BLOOD/BLEEDING, Abundance, Bath/Bathing,
 Communion, Damned Souls, Death, Destruction of City,
 Dreams/Visions, Excess, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting,
 Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Peace,
 Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Shipwreck,
 Sin/Sinning, Sport, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
BLOOM(S)/BLOOMING see FLOWER(S)/FLOWERING BLOSSOM(S)/BLOSSOMING see
 FLOWER(S)/FLOWERING
BLOUNT, Theresa, Whiteness
BLUE (color), Journey/Flight, Light II, Night, Order/Chaos,
 Shipwreck, Temptation, Zodiac
BOAR(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Love and Death, Metamorphosis, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
BOAT(S) see SHIP(S)
BODY/BODIES/FLESH (see also CORPSE/CORPSES),
 Abundance, Adultery, Annunciation, Artists/Art,
 Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon,
 Choice/Choosing, Comic, Communion, Crucifixion,
 Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Judaism,
 Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Logos/Word, Love and Death,
 Luxury, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos,
 Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite,
 Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Sublime, Temptation,
 Toilet Scenes, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery BODY LANGUAGE (see also POSE[S]/POSTURE/STANCE), Arms Raised, Love and Death, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy, Pointing/Indicating
BOHEMIAN(S), Artists/Art, Masks/Personae, Melancholy

- BOILING OIL, Judgment, Virtue/Virtues
 BOLLANDISTS, Martyrdom
 BOMBING, Apocalypse, Death
 BONDAGE (see also BINDING), Masks/Personae, Misfortune, Naked/Nude BONE(S) see ASSES' JAW BONE; CROSS BONES; SKULL; SKELETON BONFIRE(S), Luxury
 BONNET see HAT(S)
 BOOK(S), Apocalypse, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Justice, Light I, Logos/Word, Melancholy, Music, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 BOOKKEEPER(S), Virtue/Virtues
 BOOKMAKER(S), Margins/Outsiders
 BOONE, Daniel, Path/Road/Crossroads
 BOOT(S) (see also SHOE[S]), Order/Chaos, Seasons
 BORAGE (herb), Melancholy
 BORDELLO see BROTHEL(S)
 BORDER(S)/BORDERLINE(S) see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
 BORGIA, Lucretia, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 BOTTLE(S)/BOTTLE RACK, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Order/Chaos, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity
 BOUDOIR, Adultery, Female Beauty and Adornment, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas
 BOULDER see STONE(S)
 BOUNDARY/BOUNDARIES see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
 BOURGEOIS/BURGER(S), Female Beauty and Adornment, Masks/Personae, Money, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Whiteness
 BOURGOGNE, House of, Fools/Folly
 BOVINE see COW(S)/CALF/CALVES/CATTLE/CATTLE RAISING
 BOW/BOWING (gesture), Visiting/Visitation
 BOW (AND ARROW[S])/ARCHER(S)/ARCHERY, Adultery, Apocalypse, Ecstasy, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 BOWL(S)/BASIN(S), Birth/Childbirth, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Money, Offering, Pregnancy, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues
 BOWLING, Death, Sport
 BOXER(S)/BOXING, Death, Naked/Nude
 BOY(S) see YOUTH(S)
 BRACELET, Female Beauty and Adornment
 BRAHE, Tycho, Protestantism
 BRAIN(S), Beheading/Decapitation
 BRAUDREUIL, Guy de, Peace
 BRAVERY see COURAGE/FORTITUDE/BRAVERY
 BRAZIER, Seasons
 BREAD, Betrayal, Communion, Fools/Folly, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Temptation
 BREAST(S), Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Death, Destruction of City, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Gaze, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 BREATH/BREATHING, Kiss/Kissing, Nightmare, Order/Chaos BREEZE(S), Love and Death
 BRIBE(S), Sin/Sinning
 BRICK(S)/BRICKLAYING, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary
 BRIDAL DRESS, Laughter
 BRIDE(S), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Widowhood
 BRIDEGROOM, Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing, Communion, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom
 BRIDE-PRICE, Marriage/Betrothal
 BRIDGE, Choice/Choosing, Hanging, Judgment, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Vices/Deadly Sins BRIDLE(S), Fortune, Justice, Virtue/Virtues
 BRIER(S), Misfortune
 BRIGAND(S), Path/Road/Crossroads
 BROKEN/CRACKED/SHATTERED/DAMAGED, Abundance, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Judaism, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Months, Music, Order/Chaos, Sacrifice, Shipwreck, Sublime, Virtue/Virtues
 BROKENHEARTED, Reading
 BRONZE AGE see AGES OF THE WORLD
 BROOCH(ES), Birth/Childbirth, Hair/Haircutting, Widowhood
 BROOMSTICK(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 BROTHEL(S), Female Beauty and Adornment, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Martyrdom, Music, Naked/Nude, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 BROTHER(S), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Damned Souls, Destruction of City, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Hair/Haircutting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Night, Offering, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 BROTHERHOOD, Communion, Path/Road/Crossroads
 BROWN (color), Judgment, Masks/Personae, Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Whiteness
 BROWN, John, Dreams/Visions
 BRUMMEL, Beau, Whiteness
 BRUNI, Leonardo, Honor/Honoring
 BRUSH(ES), Fame, Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Peasantry, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues

- BRUSSELS, Penitence/Repentance
 BRUYAS, Jacques Louis Alfred, Path/Road/Crossroads, Self-Portraits I BUBBLE(S), Female Beauty and Adornment, Laughter, Music, Pregnancy, Vanity/Vanitas
 BUBO(S), Plague/Pestilence
 BUBONIC PLAGUE see PLAGUE/PESTILENCE
 BUCK, Pearl, Hanging
 BUCKET(S), Abduction/Rape
 BUCRANIA, Virtue/Virtues
 BUFFALO, Ecstasy, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 BUFFOON(S), Masks/Personae, Sin/Sinning
 BULL(S)/STEER(S) (see also COW[S]/CALF/CALVES/CATTLE/CATTLE RAISING), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Automata, Bath/Bathing, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Gaze, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Labyrinth/Maze, Sacrifice, Sport, Vanity/Vanitas, Zodiac
 BULLA, Evil Eye
 BULLFIGHT, Death
 BULL-TERRIER, Physiognomy
 BUMPKIN(S), Peasantry, Physiognomy
 BUONDELMONTE, Ippolito, Marriage/Betrothal
 BURDEN, Jane, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 BURGHER(S) see BOURGEOIS/BURGHER(S)
 BURGUNDY, Duke of, Patronage
 BURIAL see FUNERAL/BURIAL BURIED TREASURE, Night
 BURLESQUE, Masks/Personae
 BURNING see FIRE/FLAMES/BURNING/INFERNO
 BUSYBODY/BUSYBODIES, Widowhood
 BUST(S), Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I
 BUTCHER(S), Pregnancy
 BUTTERFLY/BUTTERFLIES, Caricature/Cartoon, Order/Chaos, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas
 BUTTOCK(S), Laughter, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude

 CABAL/CABALA/CABALIST(S), Love and Death, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CACOPHONY, Order/Chaos
 CADUCEUS, Fame, Fortune, Peace, Virtue/Virtues
 CAFE(S), Marriage/Betrothal
 CAGE(S), Madness, Self-Portraits I
 CAKE(S), Fools/Folly, Fortune, Marriage/Betrothal, Pregnancy
 CALAIS, France, Destruction of City
 CALCULATION(S), Months
 CALENDAR(S), Martyrdom, Months, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sport, Zodiac CALF/CALVES see COW(S)/CALF/CALVES/CATTLE/CATTLE RAISING CALF BEARER, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 CALIGARISME, Upside Down
 CALLIGRAPHIC/CALLIGRAPHY, Night
 CALM/CALMING/CALMNESS, Light II, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Music, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Shipwreck, Whiteness
 CALUMNY, Calumny, Fame, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance, Vices/Deadly Sins

 CAMEL(S), Order/Chaos, Temptation, Visiting/Visitation
 CAMEO(S), Female Beauty and Adornment
 CAMERA OBSCURA, Upside Down
 CAMOUFLAGE see DISGUISE
 CANCER (disease), Plague/Pestilence
 CANCER (zodiacal constellation), Zodiac
 CANDLE(S)/CANDLELIGHT/CANDLESTICK/
 CANDELABRA, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Light II, Madness, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Reading, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
 CANE(S), Penitence/Repentance
 CANINE(S) see DOG(S)
 CANNIBALISM, Madness
 CANONIZATION, Martyrdom, Sanctuary
 CANOSSA, Penitence/Repentance
 CAP(S) see HAT(S), MASKS/PERSONAE
 CAPITALISM, Artists/Art, Automata, Marriage/Betrothal, Money
 CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, Hanging
 CAPRICCIO, Hanging
 CAPRICORN (zodiacal constellation), Abundance, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CARBUNCLE(S), Evil Eye
 CARD(S) see CHRISTMAS CARD(S); GREETING CARD(S); HOUSE OF CARDS; PLAYING CARD(S)
 CARDINAL VIRTUES see VIRTUE/VIRTUES
 CARESS(ES), Avarice, Death, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Order/Chaos, Toilet Scenes
 CARICATURE/CARTOON, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Calumny, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Journey/Flight, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Money, Order/Chaos, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CARITAS ROMANA, Evil Eye, Virtue/Virtues
 CARNATION(S), Vanity/Vanitas
 CARNIVAL, Fools/Folly, Masks/Personae, Path/Road/Crossroads, Upside Down
 CARPENTER(S), Visiting/Visitation
 CARPETS/RUGS/PRAYER RUGS, Light I, Luxury
 CARRARI, Francesco, the Elder, Fame
 CARTELLO(S), Plague/Pestilence
 CARTES DE VISITES, Visiting/Visitation
 CARTOON see CARICATURE/CARTOON
 CASAGEMAS, Carlos, Fortune, Gaze
 CASK(S), Misfortune
 CAST(S), Imagination/Creativity, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I CASTE see CLASS/CLASSES
 CASTELLI, Leo, Patronage
 CASTLE(S)/PALACE(S), Fortune, Months, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Temptation, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CASTRATION, Beheading/Decapitation, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Hair/Haircutting, Madness
 CASTRATO, Honor/Honoring
 CAT(S), Comic, Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Judaism, Light II, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery

CATAclysm(S), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Plague/Pestilence
 CATAcomb(S), Martyrdom
 CATAstrophe(S), Misfortune, Order/Chaos
 CATHarsis, Gaze, Melancholy
 CATTLE/CATTLE-RAISING see
 COW(S)/CATTLE/CATTLE-RAISING
 CAULDRON(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CAVALIER(S), Temptation
 CAVE(S), Abduction/Rape, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Laughter, Light I, Light II, Love and Death, Sanctuary,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Vanity/Vanitas CELEBRATION(S) see
 BIRTHDAY(S)/FESTIVAL(S)/HOLIDAY(S) CELEBRITY/CELEBRITIES, Fame
 CELIBACY see CHASTITY
 CEMETERY/CEMETERIES, Peace, Plague/Pestilence
 CENSORSHIP/CENSURE, Caricature/Cartoon, Female Beauty and Adornment, Pregnancy
 CENTER, Death, Margins/Outsiders, Upside Down,
 Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
 CEREMONY see FESTIVAL(S); RITUALS/RITES
 CERUSE, Female Beauty and Adornment
 CHAIN(S), Abduction/Rape, Madness, Misfortune, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Temptation,
 Virtue/Virtues
 CHAIN OF BEING, Ascent/Descent, Mirror/Reflection
 CHALICE(S), Communion, Crucifixion, Fame, Patronage,
 Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
 CHAMBERMAID see SERVANTS
 CHAMBERS OF RHETORIC, Fools/Folly
 CHAMELEON(S), Masks/Personae
 CHANCE, Fortune, Money, Order/Chaos, Upside Down,
 Zodiac
 CHANDELIER(S), Mirror/Reflection
 CHANGE see METAMORPHOSIS
 CHANTELOU, Freart de, Penitence/Repentance
 CHAOS see ORDER/CHAOS
 CHAPERON(S), Pregnancy, Toilet Scenes
 CHAPLIN, Charles, Masks/Personae
 CHARIOT(S)/CHARIOTEER(S), Abduction/Rape,
 Apotheosis/Deification, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Fame,
 Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Luxury,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Night, Sport, Virtue/Virtues,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CHARIOT RACING, Gaze
 CHARITY, Abandonment, Abundance, Damned Souls, Devotion/Piety, Envy, Fortune, Humors, Justice,
 Logos/Word, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
 CHARLATAN(S), Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis
 CHARLEMAGNE, Margins/Outsiders,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Zodiac
 CHARLES I, King of England, Honor/Honoring, Self-
 Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 CHARLES II, King of England, Destruction of City
 CHARLES V, Emperor, Protestantism
 CHARLES VI, King of France, Fortune

CHARLES VII, King of France, Fortune
 CHARLOTTE, Queen of Britain, Patronage, Sin/Sinning
 CHARM(S) see INCANTATION(S)/SPELL(S)
 CHASM see ABYSS
 CHASTISE/CHASTISING, Fortune, Penitence/Repentance,
 Plague/Pestilence
 CHASTITY, Betrayal, Fame, Honor/Honoring,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Naked/Nude, Peace, Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Widowhood,
 Zodiac
 CHASUBLE(S) see Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts
 CHECKER/CHECKERED, Gaze
 CHEEK(S), Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Melancholy, Widowhood
 CHEESE, Pregnancy
 CHEMISE, Penitence/Repentance
 CHEMISTRY, Order/Chaos
 CHERRY/CHERRIES, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Luxury
 CHESS/CHESS BOARD, Adultery, Automata,
 Labyrinth/Maze
 CHICKEN(S)/COCK(S)/ROOSTER(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Evil Eye, Fools/Folly, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CHICKERY, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 CHIGI, Agostino, Honor/Honoring, Zodiac
 CHILD/CHILDREN/CHILDHOOD, Abandonment,
 Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Bath/Bathing,
 Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Death, Devotion/Piety, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Fame, Fortune, Gaze,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Humors,
 Journey/Flight, Judgment, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night, Offering, Order/Chaos,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Seasons, Self-Portraits
 II, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation,
 Voyeurism, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CHILDLESS see BARREN/BARRENESS
 CHIMNEY(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CHINA, Seasons
 CHITON, Peasantry
 CHIVALRY, Adultery, Zodiac
 CHOCOLATE(S), Pregnancy
 CHOICE/CHOOSING, Ascent/Descent, Choice/Choosing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Light I,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection,
 Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating,
 Protestantism, Self-Portraits II, Shipwreck, Virtue/Virtues
 CHOIR(S), Music
 CHOLERA, Death, Plague/Pestilence
 CHOLERIC, Humors, Melancholy, Order/Chaos,
 Physiognomy, Sin/Sinning, Zodiac
 CHRISTIAN/CHRISTIANITY (frequently used term; not indexed)
 CHRISTINE OF LORRAINE, Honor/Honoring
 CHRISTMAS, Months, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 CHURCH (frequently used term; not indexed)

- CHURCHMAN/CHURCHMEN, Comic, Death
 CIBORIUM see Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts
 CICADAS, Fame
 CIDER, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 CIGAR(S), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Peasantry
 CIGARETTE(S), Drunkenness/Intoxication
 CINEMA/FILM, Artists/Art, Gaze
 CINNABAR, Dreams/Visions
 CIRCLE(S), Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Kiss/Kissing, Labyrinth/Maze, Light II, Margins/Outsiders, Months, Music, Night, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CIRCUMCISION, Offering, Sin/Sinning
 CIRCUS, Masks/Personae, Upside Down
 CISTERN(S) see FOUNTAIN(S)/WELL(S)/CISTERN(S)
 CITHERA, Birth/Childbirth, Music
 CITRUS, Offering
 CITY/CITIES/CITYSCAPE (see also URBAN/URBANIZATION), Abundance, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Destruction of City, Fame, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Justice, Margins/Outsiders, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virgin/Virginity, Widowhood
 CIVIC DUTY/CIVIC PRIDE, Devotion/Piety, Justice
 CIVIL RIGHTS, Sacrifice
 CIVIL WAR, Hair/Haircutting, Luxury
 CLAM SHELLS, Excess
 CLAN, Gaze
 CLASS/CLASSES, Abundance, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Death, Envy, Expulsion, Fortune, Gaze, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Luxury, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Months, Naked/Nude, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Widowhood
 CLASSIC/CLASSICAL/CLASSICISM (frequently used term; not indexed)
 CLAUSTROPHOBIA, Artists/Art
 CLAVICHORD, Music
 CLAVICYTHERIUM, Music
 CLAW(S), Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
 CLAY, Sanctuary
 CLEAN/CLEANLINESS/CLEANSING, Annunciation, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Offering, Plague/Pestilence, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness
 CLERGY/CLERICS, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Money, Patronage, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Widowhood
 CLEVER/CLEVERNESS, Mirror/Reflection
 CLIMATE/WEATHER, Months, Seasons, Toilet Scenes, Zodiac
 CLIMB/CLIMBING see ASCENT/DESCENT
 CLOAK(S)/MANTLE(S)/ROBE(S), Adultery, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Night, Protestantism, Pregnancy, Seasons, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 CLOCK(S)/WATCH(ES), Automata, Dreams/Visions, Music, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Vanity/Vanitas
 CLOISONNIST STYLE, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 CLOTH OF HONOR, Marriage/Betrothal
 CLOTHES/CLOTHING see COSTUME(S); DRESS
 CLOUD(S), Honor/Honoring, Justice, Light II, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sublime, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 CLOWN(S)/CLOWNING, Comic, Hanging, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Upside Down CLUB(S), Fools/Folly, Fortune, Path/Road/Crossroads, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 CLYSTER, Melancholy
 COACH/COACHES/COACHMEN, Path/Road/Crossroads
 COAL, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 COAT(S) OF ARMS (see also HERALDRY), Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas
 COCA COLA, Months
 COCK(S) see CHICKEN(S)/ROOSTER(S)
 COCKATOO(S), Light II
 COCKLE SHELL(S), Order/Chaos
 COCKSCOMB, Fools/Folly
 CODEX, Annunciation, Ascent/Descent
 CODPIECES, Humors
 COEUR, Jacques, Luxury
 COFFEE, Female Beauty and Adornment
 COFFER(S), Virtue/Virtues
 COFFIN(S), Death, Fortune, Gaze
 COIN(S), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Honor/Honoring, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Marriage/Betrothal, Money, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
 COITION see SEXUAL CONTACT
 COLBERT, Jean Baptiste, Mirror/Reflection
 COLD/COLDNESS, Humors, Melancholy, Months, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Zodiac COLLECTIONS see ART COLLECTING/COLLECTIONS
 COLOGNE, Sleep/Sleeping
 COLONNA, Vittoria, Damned Souls
 COLOR(S)/COLORE, Automata, Damned Souls, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter, Light II, Luxury, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Night, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Temptation, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Zodiac
 COLUMBIA, Abundance
 COLUMBINE, Masks/Personae
 COLUMBUS, Christopher, Path/Road/Crossroads, Protestantism
 COLUMN(S) (see also PILLAR[S]), Dreams/Visions, Peace, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
 COMB/COMBING, Female Beauty and Adornment,

- Hair/Haircutting, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas,
Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
- COMBAT(S)/BATTLE(S), Abduction/Rape, Arms Raised,
Betrayal, Dawn/Dawning, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Envy, Excess, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Imagination/Creativity, Labyrinth/Maze, Love and Death, Patronage, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Temptation,
Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
- COMBAT BETWEEN GOOD AND EVIL, VICES AND VIRTUES, Avarice, Love and Death,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
- COMEDY/COMEDIES/COMEDIAN(S),
Apotheosis/Deification, Comic, Imagination/Creativity,
Laughter, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Self-Portraits I
- COMET(S), Melancholy, Night
- COMIC, Abandonment, Adultery, Automata, Bath/Bathing,
Comic, Death, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Laughter,
Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos,
Peasantry, Pregnancy, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas,
Widowhood
- COMIC STRIP, Gaze, Masks/Personae
- COMMEDIA DELL'ARTE, Comic, Fortune, Hanging, Masks/Personae
- COMMERCE/INDUSTRY, Abundance, Fortune, Justice,
Money
- COMMON GOOD, Justice
- COMMON MAN see EVERYMAN
- COMMUNE, Mirror/Reflection
- COMMUNION, Communion, Ecstasy, Gaze, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Whiteness
- COMMUNIST PARTY, Peace
- COMPASS, Fortune, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues,
Whiteness
- COMPASSION see MERCY/COMPASSION
- COMPETITION(S) see CONTEST(S)
- COMPLEXION, Female Beauty and Adornment, Humors, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Penitence, Physiognomy,
Whiteness
- COMPOSITION, Death, Imagination/Creativity,
Margins/Outsiders, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Serpent's
Bite, Shipwreck, Temptation, Upside Down,
Virtue/Virtues
- CONCEIT, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune,
Imagination/Creativity
- CONCEIVE/CONCEPTION (see also CREATION),
Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Apocalypse, Birth/Childbirth,
Ecstasy, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Money, Nightmare, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
- CONCH, Fame
- CONCORD see HARMONY
- CONCUBINE(S)/CONCUBINAGE (see also PROSTITUTE[S]/PROSTITUTION), Excess, Luxury,
Marriage/Betrothal
- CONDOTTIERI, Fame, Honor/Honoring
- CONE/CONICAL, Margins/Outsiders, Mirror/Reflection, Sanctuary
- CONE SISTERS OF BALTIMORE, Patronage
- CONFESS/CONFESSION, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning
- CONFIRMATION, Plague/Pestilence
- CONFORMITY, Hair/Haircutting
- CONJURE/CONJURER(S), Mirror/Reflection,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CONQUEROR, Dreams/Visions, Reading
- CONSCIENCE, Journey/Flight
- CONSENT, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Marriage/Betrothal
- CONSPICUOUS CONSUMPTION, Money
- CONSTELLATION(S), Abundance, Fame, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Months, Night, Pregnancy,
Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- CONSUMMATION, Marriage/Betrothal
- CONTEMPLATION see MEDITATION
- CONTEST(S), Fortune, Hanging, Music, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sport,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CONTINENT(S), Naked/Nude
- CONTRITION, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice
- CONTROL, Abundance, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy,
Virtue/Virtues
- CONVENT(S), Temptation, Widowhood
- CONVERSATION, Arms Raised, Communion, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Masks/Personae, Pregnancy, Protestantism
- CONVERT(S)/CONVERSION, Crucifixion,
Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Order/Chaos,
Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Toilet
Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- CONVEX, Mirror/Reflection
- COOK(S)/COOKING, Comic, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Labor/Trades/Occupations
- COOK, Captain James, Sacrifice
- COPE(S), Fortune
- COPULATION see SEXUAL CONTACT
- COPY/COPIES/COPYING, Imagination/Creativity, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Naked/Nude, Sublime
- COQUETTE/COQUETRY, Female Beauty and Adornment,
Widowhood
- CORAL, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Metamorphosis, Toilet Scenes
- CORAM, Thomas, Abandonment
- CORBA OF AMBOISE, Abduction/Rape
- CORDAY, Charlotte, Bath/Bathing, Death
- CORN, Abundance, Automata, Fortune,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Logos/Word, Peasantry, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues
- CORNUCOPIA(AE), Abundance, Evil Eye, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Logos/Word, Misfortune, Money, Peace, Virtue/Virtues
- CORONA, Hair/Haircutting
- CORONATION, Bath/Bathing, Imagination/Creativity
- CORPSE(S), Apocalypse, Death, Destruction of City, Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Light I, Love and Death, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating,

Pregnancy, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
CORPULENT see FAT
CORRUPTION, Avarice, Fortune,
Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Luxury, Money, Music,
Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Shipwreck,
Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
CORSET(S), Marriage/Betrothal
COSIMO I, Duke of Tuscany, Fame
COSMETICS, Female Beauty and Adornment,
Masks/Personae, Self-Portraits II, Toilet Scenes
COSMIC/COSMOS/COSMOLOGY, Ascent/Descent,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Labyrinth/Maze, Light II, Music, Order/Chaos,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary, Seasons, Sin/Sinning,
Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
COSTUME(S) (see also DRESS), Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Ecstasy, Fools/Folly, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter,
Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae,
Night, Patronage, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance,
Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Whiteness
COUCH see BED/BED CHAMBER
COUNTERFEIT, Money
COUNTRY SQUIRE(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
COURAGE/FORTITUDE/BRAVERY, Honor/Honoring,
Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Justice, Naked/Nude,
Peace, Plague/Pestilence, Virtue/Virtues
COURT(S)/COURTLY LIFE, Adultery, Apocalypse,
Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Comic, Fame, Fools/Folly,
Fortune, Hanging, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Months, Music, Patronage,
Peasantry, Sanctuary, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
Whiteness, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness
COURTESAN(S) see PROSTITUTE(S)/PROSTITUTION
COURTIER(S), Journey/Flight, Fame, Luxury,
Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Visiting/Visitation
COURTSHIP (see also MARRIAGE/BETROTHAL; SUITOR(S)), Female Beauty and Adornment,
Marriage/Betrothal, Months, Widowhood
COVENTRY, England, Destruction of City
COVETOUSNESS see AVARICE
COW(S)/CALF/CALVES/CATTLE/CATTLE RAISING
(see also BULL(S)/STEER(S)), Abandonment, Dreams/Visions, Excess, Honor/Honoring,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Misfortune,
Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Upside Down,
Zodiac
COWARD(S)/COWARDICE, Masks/Personae, Melancholy,
Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
COWBOY(S), Whiteness
COWL(S) see HOOD(S)
CRAB(S), Evil Eye, Zodiac CRACKED see BROKEN/CRACKED/
SHATTERED/DAMAGED
CRADLE(S), Birth/Childbirth
CRANBERRIES, Labor/Trades/Occupations
CRANE(S), Metamorphosis
CRAWFISH, Misfortune

CREATION/CREATOR (see also
CONCEIVE/CONCEPTION; Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Ascent/Descent, Automata, Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
Dawn/Dawning, Fame, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Imagination/Creativity, Kiss/Kissing, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Sublime, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity,
Zodiac
CREATIVITY see IMAGINATION/CREATIVITY
CRESCENT, Apocalypse, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Communion,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning, Evil Eye,
Fortune, Love and Death, Virgin/Virginity, Zodiac
CRIB(S), Devotion/Piety
CRICKET (game), Death
CRIME/CRIMINALS, Artists/Art, Death, Expulsion, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Justice, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Money,
Physiognomy, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues
CRIPPEN, William, Bath/Bathing
CRIPPLE(S), Fortune, Protestantism
CROCHETING, Pregnancy
CROCODILE(S), Comic, Judgment, Naked/Nude
CROMWELL, Oliver, Marriage/Betrothal
CROOK(S)/HOULETTE, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
CROSS/CROSSES/CRUCIFORM, Ascent/Descent,
Communion, Crucifixion, Death, Dreams/Visions, Fame,
Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight,
Judaism, Judgment, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word,
Martyrdom, Music, Offering, Order/Chaos,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance,
Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy,
Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite,
Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas,
Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
CROSS BONES, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence
CROSSBOW(S)/CROSSBOWMEN, Martyrdom
CROSSROAD(S) see PATH/ROAD/CROSSROADS
CROW(S), Physiognomy, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
CROWD(S), Dreams/Visions, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Masks/Personae, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Voyeurism
CROWN(S), Apocalypse, Apotheosis/Deification, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Communion,
Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Fame, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Judaism, Justice, Light I, Light II, Love and Death,
Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Melancholy,
Misfortune, Money, Music, Night, Order/Chaos, Peace,
Peasantry, Pointing/Indicating, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood,
Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
CRUCIBLE(S), Melancholy
CRUCIFIX see Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts
CRUCIFIXION (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Crucifixion, Death, Harvesting, Martyrdom, Misfortune, Naked/Nude,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance,
Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice,

- Serpent's Bite, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
CRUCIFORM see CROSS/CROSSES
CRUSADE/CRUSADERS, Path/Road/Crossroads
CRUSTACEANS, Pregnancy
CRY/CRIES/CRYING (see also TEAR[S]), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Gaze, Laughter, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Penitence/Repentance,
Protestantism
CRYSTAL(S), Mirror/Reflection
CUBE/CUBICAL, Fortune, Order/Chaos
CUBISM, Artists/Art, Caricature/Cartoon,
Drunkeness/Intoxication, Journey/Flight, Judaism,
Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection,
Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Sport
CUBIT, Virtue/Virtues
CUCKOLD, Adultery, Excess, Shipwreck
CUDGEL(S), Peasantry, Temptation
CUIRASS, Virtue/Virtues
CULTIVATION, Abundance, Harvesting
CUNEIFORM TABLETS, Reading
CUPBEARER(S), Abduction/Rape
CUPID(S) see PUTTO (PUTTI)
CUPIDITY see AVARICE
CURSE(S), Drunkeness/Intoxication, Journey/Flight, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Offering, Order/Chaos,
Virgin/Virginity
CURTAIN(S)/CURTAIN-SACK, Dreams/Visions, Light I, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Pregnancy,
Protestantism, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I
CUSTOM HOUSE, Light II
CYBORG, Automata
CYCLE(S), Fortune, Months, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning,
Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Zodiac
CYMBALS, Bacchanalia/Orgy
CYNICISM, Devotion/Piety, Order/Chaos
CYPRESSES, Ecstasy
- DADA, Automata, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic,
Dreams/Visions, Order/Chaos, Upside Down
DAGGER(S), Fortune, Love and Death, Virtue/Virtues
DALÍ, GALA, Imagination/Creativity
DAMAGED see BROKEN/CRACKED/
SHATTERED/DAMAGED
DAMNED SOULS, Ascent/Descent, Damned Souls,
Drunkeness/Intoxication, Judgment, Money, Music,
Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning,
Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DANCE/DANCERS/DANCING, Abandonment, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation,
Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Damned Souls,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Drunkeness/Intoxication,
Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale,
Fools/Folly, Fortune, Honor/Honoring,
Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Justice, Laughter,
Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis,
Mirror/Reflection, Months, Music, Naked/Nude,
Offering, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Seasons, Sport, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
DANCE-HALLS, Marriage/Betrothal
DANCE OF DEATH /Danse Macabre,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Fortune, Music,
Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas
DANDY/FOP, Sin/Sinning
DARK/DARKNESS see BLACK/BLACKNESS
DART(S), Hair/Haircutting
DAUGHTER(S), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth,
Devotion/Piety, Envy, Fortune, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Laughter, Love and Death, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons,
Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite,
Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues,
Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DAWN/DAWNING, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Protestantism
DAY(S)/DAYLIGHT/DAYTIME, Annunciation,
Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Masks/Personae,
Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Night, Sleep/Sleeping,
Temptation, Whiteness, Zodiac
DAYDREAMS, Dreams/Visions
DEAD SEA, Sacrifice
DEADLY SINS see SIN/SINNING; VICES/DEADLY SINS
DEAF/DEAFNESS, Margins/Outsiders, Reading
DEATH (see also KILL/KILLING; MORTALITY),
Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Adultery, Apocalypse,
Ascent/Descent, Automata, Bath/Bathing,
Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth,
Choice/Choosing, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned
Souls, Dawn/Dawning, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Dreams/Visions, Drunkeness/Intoxication, Expulsion, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity,
Journey/Flight, Judaism, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light I, Light II, Love and Death, Luxury,
Madness, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy,
Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune,
Money, Music, Night, Offering, Order/Chaos,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance,
Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy,
Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Seasons, Self-Portraits
I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Sublime, Toilet Scenes,
Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood,
Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
DEATHBED, Death, Kiss/Kissing, Martyrdom, Money,
Sin/Sinning
DEATH MASK see MASKS/PERSONAE
DEBAUCHERY, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Drunkeness/Intoxication, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
Protestantism

- DEBT(S)/DEBTOR, Hair/Haircutting
- DECADENTS/DECADENCE, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
Devotion/Piety, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Masks/Personae, Money, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy,
Virgin/Virginity
- DECAN(S), Zodiac
- DECAPITATION see BEHEADING/DECAPITATION
- DECEIT/DECEPTION, Adultery, Betrayal, Calumny, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Order/Chaos, Vanity/Vanitas,
Vices/Deadly Sins
- DECOLLATION see BEHEADING/DECAPITATION
- DEER, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Light I, Sacrifice,
Virtue/Virtues
- DEFEAT, Crucifixion, Judaism
- DEFECATING/DEFECATION, Peasantry
- DEFENSELESS see VULNERABILITY
- DEFLOWERING, Abduction/Rape, Marriage/Betrothal
- DEFORMITY, Artists/Art, Comic, Dreams/Visions,
Fools/Folly, Gaze, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Nightmare, Physiognomy
- DEGENERATE(S), Madness
- DEHUMANIZATION, Automata, Caricature/Cartoon
- DEJECTION see DESPAIR
- DELIVERANCE, Martyrdom
- DELUSION(S)/DELUSORY, Dreams/Visions, Madness, Physiognomy
- DEMENTIA, Margins/Outsiders
- DEMIURGE, Automata, Order/Chaos
- DEMOCRATIC/DEMOCRACY, Dreams/Visions, Death, Harvesting, Patronage
- DEMON(S), Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Death,
Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight, Judgment,
Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Music,
Nightmare, Plague/Pestilence, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DEMONOLOGY, Expulsion, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DENDURA, Egypt, Zodiac
- DENTIST, Comic
- DEPARTURE, Abandonment, Gaze, Journey/Flight,
Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DEPRESSION (economic), Money
- DEPRESSION (emotional) see DESPAIR
- DESCENT see ASCENT/DESCENT
- DESCO DA PARTO see BIRTH PLATTER
- DESECRATION, Protestantism, Sanctuary
- DESERT(S), Path/Road/Crossroads, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas,
Voyeurism
- DESICCATION, Evil Eye
- DESIGN/DISEGNO, Abandonment, Fame,
Imagination/Creativity, Sacrifice, Upside Down, Zodiac
- DESIRE/DESIRING, Automata, Death, Excess, Female
Beauty and Adornment, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Money, Music,
Naked/Nude, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Seasons,
Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- DESMARÉES, Maria Antonia, Self-Portraits I
- DESPAIR, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Death,
Expulsion, Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Journey/Flight,
Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection,
Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence,
Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues,
Widowhood
- DESPOTISM, Gaze
- DE STIJLISTS, Dreams/Visions
- DESTINY see FATE
- DESTRUCTION, Abandonment, Apocalypse, Destruction of City, Envy, Light I, Luxury, Misfortune, Music, Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Seasons,
Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Temptation,
Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity,
Visiting/Visitation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DESTRUCTION OF CITY, Betrayal, Destruction of City, Judgment, Misfortune, Nightmare, Upside Down,
Widowhood
- DEVIL(S) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Death, Journey/Flight, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection,
Misfortune, Money, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos,
Protestantism, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DEVOTION/PIETY, Betrayal, Death, Devotion/Piety, Evil
Eye, Fortune, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Justice, Light II, Months, Patronage, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance,
Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Serpent's
Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Zodiac
- DEVOUR, Abundance, Honor/Honoring, Pregnancy, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- DEW, Vanity/Vanitas
- DIADEM see CROWN
- DIAGONAL, Sacrifice
- DIAMOND(S), Kiss/Kissing, Virtue/Virtues
- DIANE DE POITIERS, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- DIAPER(S), Birth/Childbirth
- DIET(S), Melancholy
- DIETRICH, Marlene, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
- DIGNITY, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Months, Order/Chaos, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
Voyeurism
- DINOSAUR(S), Plague/Pestilence
- DIRGE(S), Gaze
- DISCORD, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Envy, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Love and Death,
Vices/Deadly Sins
- DISCUS/DISCUS-THROWER, Pointing/Indicating,
Pregnancy, Sport
- DISDAIN, Laughter, Pregnancy
- DISEASE see ILLNESS/DISEASE/SICKNESS
- DISEMBODIED, Hair/Haircutting
- DISFIGURE, Abandonment, Fortune
- DISGRACE, Fame, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging
- DISGUISE, Birth/Childbirth, Expulsion, Masks/Personae,

- Pregnancy, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins
DISHABILLE, Female Beauty and Adornment, Voyeurism
DISHONOR, Adultery, Betrayal, Excess
DISJOINTED see DISTORTION
DISK JOCKEY, Marriage/Betrothal
DISMEMBERMENT, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
Order/Chaos
DISNEY, Walt, Dreams/Visions
DISORDER see ORDER/CHAOS
DISORIENTATION, Labyrinth/Maze, Order/Chaos, Upside Down
DISPLAY, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze,
Marriage/Betrothal, Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence,
Pointing/Indicating, Temptation, Widowhood
DISTAFF, Annunciation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DISTORTION, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Death, Gaze, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection,
Naked/Nude, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I
DISTRESS, Abandonment, Envy, Gaze, Misfortune, Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DIVINATION, Dreams/Visions, Fortune, Melancholy,
Mirror/Reflection
DIVINE/DIVINITY (frequently used term; not indexed) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts)
DIVINE RIGHT, Honor/Honoring DIVE/DIVING, Sport
DIVING BELL, Excess
DIVORCE, Adultery, Marriage/Betrothal
DOCTOR(S) see PHYSICIAN(S)
DOCUMENTATION, Margins/Outsiders, Plague/Pestilence,
Vanity/Vanitas
DOG(S), Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Comic, Death, Envy, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Gaze, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Justice, Light II, Love and Death, Luxury, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy,
Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune,
Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance,
Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery,
Zodiac
DOLL(S), Automata, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Naked/Nude
DOLPHIN(S), Adultery, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Fortune, Light I, Love and Death, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
DOME(S), Sanctuary
DOMINA PYTHONIS, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DONALD DUCK, Comic
DONATI, Forese, Widowhood
DONKEY(S), Birth/Childbirth, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Honor/Honoring,
Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Vices/Deadly Sins
DONNE FAMOSE, Fame
DONOR(S) see PATRONAGE
DOOR(S)/DOORWAY(S)/GATE(S)/PORTAL(S), Apocalypse, Damned Souls, Ecstasy, Honor/Honoring, Judaism,
Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Logos/Word, Metamorphosis,
Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage,
Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning,
Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Zodiac
DOT(S), Night
DOTTORE (commedia dell'arte character), Masks/Personae
DOUBLE-PORTRAIT, Self-Portraits I
DOVE(S), Adultery, Communion, Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Light I,
Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Peace,
Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity,
Virtue/Virtues
DOWAGER(S), Fortune
DOWRY, Marriage/Betrothal, Toilet Scenes
DOZE see SLEEP/SLEEPING
DRAGON(S), Communion, Honor/Honoring, Justice,
Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis,
Mirror/Reflection, Money, Order/Chaos, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues,
Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
DRAMA see THEATER
DRAWING(S), Imagination/Creativity, Vanity/Vanitas
DRAWING WATER, Annunciation
DREAMS/VISIONS, Annunciation, Artists/Art,
Ascent/Descent, Automata, Birth/Childbirth, Crucifixion,
Death, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Envy, Fortune, Gaze,
Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring,
Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight,
Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom,
Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Money, Night,
Nightmare, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I,
Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Whiteness,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
DRESDEN, Destruction of City
DRESS (see also COSTUME[S]; FASHION), Comic, Fortune, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Justice,
Laughter, Luxury, Madness, Margins/Outsiders,
Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis,
Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Months, Naked/Nude,
Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Self-
Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas,
Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Whiteness, Widowhood DRINK/DRINKING see
DRUNKENNESS/INTOXICATION
DROLL (jester), Laughter
DROWN/DROWNING/DROWNED, Journey/Flight,
Madness, Misfortune, Penitence/Repentance
DRUGS, Ecstasy, Madness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
DRUM(S), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
DRUNKENNESS/INTOXICATION, Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Betrayal, Comic,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Excess, Fools/Folly, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Laughter,
Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae,
Melancholy, Months, Music, Order/Chaos, Peasantry,

- Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
 DRY/DRYNESS, Birth/Childbirth, Humors, Melancholy, Zodiac
 DUALISM see AMBIGUITY
 DUCK(S), Automata, Comic DUEL(S)/DUELING, Sport
 DUET(S), Music
 DUKE(S) see NOBILITY
 DUNCAN, Isadora, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Madness
 DUNGEON(S), Plague/Pestilence
 DUNGHILL, Misfortune
 DUPLICATE(S) see COPY/COPIES/COPYING
 DÜSSELDORF SCHOOL, Devotion/Piety
 DUTY, Journey/Flight, Mirror/Reflection, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
 DWARF(S), Abduction/Rape, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Evil Eye, Luxury, Sin/Sinning, Visiting/Visitation
 DYSENTERY, Plague/Pestilence
- EAGLE(S), Abduction/Rape, Apocalypse, Honor/Honoring, Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Reading, Vices/Deadly Sins
 EAR(S), Betrayal, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Masks/Personae, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I, Virgin/Virginity
 EARRING(S), Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Toilet Scenes
 EARTH, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Dreams/Visions, Fame, Fortune, Humors, Light I, Melancholy, Months, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 EARTHINESS/EARTHLINESS, Hair/Haircutting, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Order/Chaos, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 EARTHQUAKE(S), Destruction of City, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Plague/Pestilence EASE see LAZY/LAZINESS; LEISURE
 EASEL, Imagination/Creativity, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II
 EATING, Beheading/Decapitation, Communion, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
 EAVESDROPPING, Penitence/Repentance
 ECONOMY/ECONOMICS, Expulsion, Money, Widowhood
 ECSTASY, Abandonment, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Devotion/Piety, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Melancholy, Sublime, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 EDGE(S) see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
 EDUCATE/EDUCATION, Artists/Art, Comic, Expulsion, Patronage, Peace, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning, Sport
 EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, Fortune
 EEL(S), Misfortune
 EFFEMINATE, Excess, Masks/Personae, Sleep/Sleeping
 EFFIGY/EFFIGIES, Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Masks/Personae, Peasantry
- EGG(S), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Kiss/Kissing, Pregnancy, Zodiac EGO(S) see MASKS/PERSONAE
 EGREMONT, Lord, Patronage
 EGYPT, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sanctuary
 EJACULATION, Hanging, Naked/Nude, Virgin/Virginity
 EKPHORA see PROCESSION
 EKPHRASIS, Female Beauty and Adornment
 ELEANOR OF TOLEDO, Serpent's Bite
 ELECTRIC CHAIR, Crucifixion
 ELEGY/ELEGIAC, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 ELEMENTS, Honor/Honoring, Laughter, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Zodiac
 ELEPHANT(S), Annunciation, Birth/Childbirth, Fame, Virtue/Virtues ELEVATION, Fortune
 ELITE, Patronage
 ELIZABETH I OF ENGLAND, Fortune, Fortune, Protestantism, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness
 ELK, Ecstasy, Melancholy, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 EMACIATED/EMACIATION, Beheading/Decapitation, Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos, Peasantry EMANCIPATION, Hair/Haircutting
 EMBALMING, Fortune
 EMBARKATION, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads
 EMBEZZLER, Physiognomy
 EMBLEM(S)/EMBLEMATA, Abundance, Beheading/Decapitation, Evil Eye, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Logos/Word, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Music, Order/Chaos, Peace, Peasantry, Seasons, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 EMBRACE, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
 EMBROIDERY, Abundance, Peasantry, Zodiac
 EMBRYO(S), Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity
 EMIGRANT(S)/EMIGRATION, Expulsion, Journey/Flight
 EMOTION(S), Abandonment, Beheading/Decapitation, Death, Gaze, Humors, Justice, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Seasons, Sublime, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness
 EMPATHY, Gaze, Penitence/Repentance
 EMPEROR(S) see KING(S)
 EMPOWERMENT see POWER
 EMPTY/EMPTYNESS (see also VOID), Apocalypse, Automata, Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Judgment, Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Zodiac
 END/ENDING, Order/Chaos
 ENERGY, Apocalypse, Beheading/Decapitation, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dreams/Visions, Imagination/Creativity, Peasantry
 ENGINE(S) see MACHINE(S)
 ENGINEER(S)/ENGINEERING, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Metamorphosis

- ENLIGHTENMENT, The, Ascent/Descent, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Marriage/Betrothal, Order/Chaos, Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Sublime,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- ENLIGHTENMENT/INSIGHT, Light II, Sanctuary
- ENNUI, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection, Night
- ENSLAVEMENT see SLAVE(S)/SLAVERY
- ENTANGLEMENT/ENTRAPMENT, Hair/Haircutting,
Mirror/Reflection
- ENTOMB/ENTOMBED see FUNERAL/BURIAL
- ENTRAILS, Mirror/Reflection
- ENTREATING, Devotion/Piety
- ENTWINE, Hair/Haircutting
- ENVY, Destruction of City, Envy, Evil Eye, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Luxury, Madness, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning,
Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
- EPHEBOI LYCHNOPHOROI*, Luxury
- EPHEMERAL, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism
- EPIDEMICS see PLAGUE/PESTILENCE
- EPOPTES*, Voyeurism
- EQUAL/EQUALITY/EQUILIBRIUM, Death,
Hair/Haircutting, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Virtue/Virtues
- EQUATOR, Zodiac
- EQUINOX(ES), Seasons
- EPSILON, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne
- ERCOLE II, Duke, Penitence/Repentance
- ERMINE, Fools/Folly, Virgin/Virginity, Visiting/Visitation
- EROS/EROTES, Light I, Marriage/Betrothal
- EROS AND THANATOS see LOVE AND DEATH
- EROTIC DESIRE/EROTICISM, Adultery, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
Drunkeness/Intoxication, Excess, Expulsion, Fatal
Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment,
Gaze, Imagination/Creativity, Luxury, Madness,
Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude, Night, Nightmare,
Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins, Voyeurism,
Witchcraft/Sorcery
- ESCHATOLOGY, Devotion/Piety, Plague/Pestilence,
Vices/Deadly Sins
- ESTE, Alfonso d', Bacchanalia/Orgy, Pregnancy
- ESTE, Isabella d', Imagination/Creativity, Naked/Nude,
Vices/Deadly Sins
- ESTRANGEMENT see ALIENATION
- ETERNAL/ETERNITY, Avarice, Destruction of City, Fame, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Light I,
Money, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Seasons, Serpent's
Bite, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity,
Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- ETERNAL CITY see ROME
- ETHICS see MORALITY
- ETHNIC GROUPS, Margins/Outsiders
- ETHNOGRAPHY, Physiognomy
- ETHROG(S), Light I, Logos/Word, Offering
- ETIQUETTE, Seasons, Visiting/Visitation
- EUTHANASIA, Margins/Outsiders
- EVENING, Communion, Dawn/Dawning, Excess, Light I,
Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy
- EVERGREEN(S), Honor/Honoring
- EVERLASTING LIFE see AFTERLIFE
- EVERYMAN, Hanging, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Plague/Pestilence
- EVIL, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Death,
Drunkeness/Intoxication, Excess, Expulsion, Fatal
Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment,
Fortune, Gaze, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judaism,
Judgment, Justice, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders,
Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Money,
Music, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
Physiognomy, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Temptation,
Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- EVIL EYE, Envy, Evil Eye, Gaze
- EXAGGERATION, Caricature/Cartoon, Excess,
Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Physiognomy, Pointing/Indicating
- EXCELLENCE, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Virtue/Virtues
- EXCESS, Evil Eye, Excess, Luxury, Masks/Personae, Peasantry
- EXCHANGE, Money
- EXCLUSION/EXCLUDED see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
- EXCOMMUNICATION, Abduction/Rape
- EXCREMENT, Automata, Money, Peasantry
- EXECUTION/EXECUTIONER, Beheading/Decapitation, Crucifixion, Death, Fortune, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Patronage,
Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
- EXERCISE, Sport
- EXHAUSTION, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Pregnancy,
Sleep/Sleeping
- EXHIBITION(S), Patronage
- EXILE(S), Death, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Sacrifice, Sanctuary,
Shipwreck
- EXISTENTIALISM, Automata, Choice/Choosing,
Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Path/Road/Crossroads
- EXORCISM, Journey/Flight, Masks/Personae
- EXPERIMENT(S), Light II
- EXPIATION, Journey/Flight, Penitence/Repentance
- EXPLOITATION, Adultery, Journey/Flight, Luxury
- EXPLORE/EXPLORER(S), Path/Road/Crossroads,
Protestantism
- EXPRESSION, Abandonment, Death, Gaze, Laughter,
Margins/Outsiders, Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy,
Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Temptation,
Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood
- EXPRESSIONISM, Apocalypse, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing,
Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy,
Judaism, Madness, Misfortune, Naked/Nude,
Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down
- EXPULSION (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Ascent/Descent, Expulsion,
Journey/Flight, Margins/Outsiders
- EXQUISITE CORPSES, Imagination/Creativity
- EXTREME(S), Excess, Virtue/Virtues

- EX-VOTO(S), Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence
- EYE(S), Death, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fame, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Light I, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Nightmare, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Reading, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
- EYEBROW(S)/EYELID(S), Kiss/Kissing, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude, Physiognomy, Sin/Sinning
- EYE-CONTACT, Gaze, Pointing/Indicating
- EYEGLASSES, Fools/Folly
- FABLE(S) (FABLIAUX) (see also FAIRY TALES; FOLKLORE/FOLKTALES/FOLK TRADITIONS/LEGENDS), Adultery, Comic, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Path/Road/Crossroads
- FABRIC(S), Luxury, Naked/Nude
- FACE(S), Abandonment, Adultery, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Calumny, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Death, Dreams/Visions, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Light II, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity, Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood
- FACTORY/FACTORIES, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations
- FAIR(S), Peasantry
- FAIRY/FAIRIES, Abduction/Rape, Death
- FAIRY TALES (see also FABLE[S]; FOLKLORE/FOLKTALES/FOLK TRADITIONS/LEGENDS), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Dreams/Visions, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Penitence/Repentance, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down
- FAITH/FAITHFUL, Death, Dreams/Visions, Justice, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Serpent's Bite, Shipwreck, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FAKIR(S), Path/Road/Crossroads
- FALCON(S), Abduction/Rape, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FALCONER, Comic
- FALL/FALLING, Dreams/Visions, Fortune, Judgment, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FALLEN WOMAN/WOMEN see PROSTITUTE(S)/PROSTITUTION
- FALSE/FALSEHOOD/FALSENESS/FALSE PROPHETS/FALSE WITNESS, Adultery, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Justice, Masks/Personae, Protestantism, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
- FAME, Artists/Art, Choice/Choosing, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Order/Chaos, Vanity/Vanitas
- FAMILY, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Artists/Art, Betrayal, Calumny, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Fortune, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Music, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas, Whiteness, Widowhood
- FAMINE, Apocalypse, Expulsion, Margins/Outsiders, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence
- FAN(S), Ecstasy, Mirror/Reflection
- FANATICISM, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FANTASY/FANTASIES, Automata, Dreams/Visions, Honor/Honoring, Luxury, Madness, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FARCE, Comic, Masks/Personae
- FAREWELL see JOURNEY/FLIGHT
- FARINATA DEGLI UBERTI, Damned Souls
- FARM(S)/FARMER(S)/FARMHAND(S), Comic, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping
- FARNESE, Cardinal Ranuncio, Path/Road/Crossroads
- FASCES, Virtue/Virtues
- FASCISM/FASCIST(S), Death, Hanging, Sport
- FASHION/FASHIONABLE, Adultery, Female Beauty and Adornment, Humors, Margins/Outsiders, Months, Peasantry, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Widowhood
- FAST/FASTING, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Gaze, Penitence/Repentance, Temptation, Zodiac
- FAT/FATNESS, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Vices/Deadly Sins
- FATAL WOMAN/FEMME FATALE (see also SEDUCTION), Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins
- FATALISM, Zodiac
- FATE, Abundance, Adultery, Choice/Choosing, Death, Dreams/Visions, Fortune, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Masks/Personae, Misfortune, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Zodiac
- FATHER(S), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Damned Souls, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Reading, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes,

- Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
Voyeurism, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
FATHER-IN-LAW, Witchcraft/Sorcery
FATHER TIME, Fortune, Music
FATIGUE, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping
FAUVES, Bath/Bathing
FEAR, Abundance, Adultery, Automata, Dreams/Visions,
Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Hanging, Laughter,
Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Nightmare,
Order/Chaos, Peace, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Vices/Deadly Sins,
Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
FEAST(S)/FEASTING, Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation, Comic, Communion,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Justice,
Marriage/Betrothal, Months, Peace, Peasantry,
Penitence/Repentance, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac FEAST DAYS (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Honor/Honoring, Months,
Virtue/Virtues
FEAST OF FOOLS, Fools/Folly
FEATHER(S), Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment,
Mirror/Reflection, Nightmare, Virtue/Virtues
FEATHER BED, Luxury
FECES see EXCREMENT
FECUNDITY see FERTILITY
FELICITY, Abundance, Fortune, Virtue/Virtues
FEMALE BEAUTY AND ADORNMENT, Abundance,
Female Beauty and Adornment, Toilet Scenes,
Vanity/Vanitas
FEMININE/FEMININITY (see also GENDER), Female Beauty and Adornment, Kiss/Kissing, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits II,
Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Whiteness, Widowhood,
Zodiac
FEMINIST(S)/FEMINISM, Birth/Childbirth, Margins/Outsiders, Pregnancy
FENCING, Sport
FERGUSON, James, Light II
FERRARA, University of, Zodiac
FERRERS, Earl, Hanging
FERTILITY, Abundance, Artists/Art, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Drunkeness/Intoxication, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Naked/Nude,
Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
FERTILIZATION, Abundance
FESTAIOLO, Pointing/Indicating FESTIVAL(S)/FESTIVITIES, Devotion/Piety, Fortune, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Months, Patronage,
Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
FÊTE CHAMPÊTRE, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Masks/Personae
FETISH, Abduction/Rape
FETTERS see CHAIN(S)
FETUS see EMBRYO(S)
FEUDAL SYSTEM, Months, Sport
FICHU, Whiteness
FICKLE/FICKLENESS, Fortune, Vanity/Vanitas
FIDDLE see VIOLIN
FIDELITY, Adultery, Betrayal, Female Beauty and Adornment, Mirror/Reflection, Toilet Scenes,
Virtue/Virtues
FIG(S)/FIG LEAF/LEAVES, Laughter, Naked/Nude,
Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning
FIGHT/FIGHTING, Death, Destruction of City, Fools/Folly, Masks/Personae, Peasantry, Zodiac
FILM see CINEMA
FINGER(S), Death, Dreams/Visions,
Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Judaism, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Reading,
Vanity/Vanitas, Voyeurism
FIR (tree), Visiting/Visitation
FIRE/FLAME(S)/BURNING/INFERNO, Apocalypse,
Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls,
Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Destruction of City, Ecstasy,
Excess, Expulsion, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment,
Hanging, Humors, Judaism, Judgment, Light I, Madness, Martyrdom, Misfortune, Nightmare, Offering,
Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Peasantry,
Plague/Pestilence, Reading, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Serpent's
Bite, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery,
Zodiac
FIRMAMENT, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Order/Chaos,
Zodiac
FIRST BORN, Plague/Pestilence
FISH/FISHES, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion,
Crucifixion, Drunkeness/Intoxication, Fortune,
Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Light I,
Logos/Word, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Offering, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Shipwreck, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues,
Zodiac
FISHERMAN/FISHERMEN/FISHING, Abduction/Rape,
Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labyrinth/Maze, Months, Zodiac
FISHNET(S), Justice
FIVE LAST THINGS, Music
FLAG(S), Judaism
FLAGELLANT(S), Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence
FLAIL/FLAILING, Peasantry
FLAME(S) see FIRE/FLAME(S)/BURNING/INFERNO
FLAMEN(S), Abundance
FLATTERY, Excess, Mirror/Reflection
FLATULENCE, Laughter
FLAY/FLAYING/FLAYED, Damned Souls, Hanging, Judgment, Martyrdom, Music, Self-Portraits I
FLEA(S), Sin/Sinning
FLEEING/FLIGHT, Adultery, Expulsion, Fame,
Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Sacrifice
FLESH see BODY/BODIES/FLESH
FLIRTING/FLIRTATION, Marriage/Betrothal,
Vanity/Vanitas

- FLOAT/FLOATING, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Light II, Pointing/Indicating, Sanctuary, Temptation, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
- FLOOD, Journey/Flight, Judgment, Misfortune, Peace
- FLORENCE/FLORENTINE(S), Abandonment, Honor/Honoring, Luxury, Naked/Nude, Patronage, Peace, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
- FLOWER(S)/FLOWERING, Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Comic, Death, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Honor/Honoring, Laughter, Light I, Logos/Word, Luxury, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Music, Night, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Zodiac
- FLUID(S), Evil Eye, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues
- FLUTE(S), Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Comic, Hanging, Judgment, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- FLY/FLIES (insects), Vanity/Vanitas
- FLY/FLYING/FLIGHT, Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FOCAL POINT, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Upside Down, Whiteness
- FOETUS see EMBRYO(S)
- FOG, Night
- FOLIGNO, Plague/Pestilence
- FOLK ART/FOLK ARTISTS, Margins/Outsiders
- FOLKLORE/FOLKTALES/FOLK TRADITIONS/LEGENDS (see also FABLE[S]; FAIRY TALES), Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Dreams/Visions, Judaism, Judgment, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Nightmare, Offering, Sanctuary, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FONDLE/FONDLING, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
- FONT(S), Baptism, Virtue/Virtues
- FOOD, Abundance, Birth/Childbirth, Death, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Fortune, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Luxury, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Months, Seasons, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Widowhood
- FOOLS/FOLLY, Automata, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fools/Folly, Hanging, Laughter, Madness, Masks/Personae, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Shipwreck, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- FOOT/FEET, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Ecstasy, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Metamorphosis, Money, Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- FOOTBALL, Sport
- FOOTPRINT, Labyrinth/Maze
- FOOTSTOOL, Misfortune
- FOREHEAD, Caricature/Cartoon, Margins/Outsiders, Physiognomy, Virgin/Virginity, Widowhood
- FORELOCK, Fortune
- FORESHORTENING, Sacrifice
- FORETELL see PROPHET(S)/PROPHETESS(ES)/PROPHECY
- FORGE, Excess, Humors, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Pointing/Indicating, Vices/Deadly Sins
- FORGIVENESS, Adultery, Communion, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Martyrdom, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning
- FORK/FORKED, Expulsion, Path/Road/Crossroads
- FORM/FORMALISM, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning, Upside Down
- FORNICATION see SEXUAL CONTACT
- FORSAKE/FORSAKEN see ABANDONMENT
- FORSYTHE, WILLIAM, Justice
- FORTIFICATION(S), Annunciation, Sanctuary
- FORTITUDE see COURAGE/FORTITUDE/BRAVERY
- FORTRESS(ES) see FORTIFICATION(S)
- FORTUNE, Crucifixion, Envy, Evil Eye, Excess, Fortune, Humors, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Money, Pregnancy, Seasons, Shipwreck, Upside Down
- FORTUNE TELLER(S), Comic, Fortune, Margins/Outsiders
- FOUR, Virtue/Virtues
- FORTY, Temptation
- FOSSIL(S), Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy
- FOUNDLING(S), Abandonment
- FOUNDLING HOSPITAL, Abandonment
- FOUNTAIN(S)/WELL(S)/CISTERN(S), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Automata, Evil Eye, Excess, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Justice, Logos/Word, Margins/Outsiders, Mirror/Reflection, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
- FOUQUET, Nicholas, Luxury
- FOUR, Seasons
- FOURTEEN, Path/Road/Crossroads
- FOURTH DIMENSION, Upside Down
- FOWL, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FOX(ES), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Nightmare, Vices/Deadly Sins
- FRAGMENT(S)/FRAGMENTATION (see also RUIN[S]), Baptism, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Gaze, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Seasons
- FRAGRANCE(S) see PERFUME
- FRANCESCO II NOVELLO DA CARRARA, Honor/Honoring
- FRANÇOISE I, King of France, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
- FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR, Destruction of City, Mirror/Reflection
- FRANKINCENSE, Kiss/Kissing
- FRAUD, Calumny, Physiognomy, Vanity/Vanitas
- FREEDOM, Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Dreams/Visions, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Seasons, Temptation, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- FREE FALL, Upside Down
- FREE WILL, Choice/Choosing, Misfortune, Path/Road/Crossroads, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning
- FRENCH REVOLUTION, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

FRENZY, Abandonment, Imagination/Creativity, Madness
 FREUD, Sigmund see Index of Authors, Literary Texts,
 Composers, Filmmakers, and Folktales
 FRIEND(S)/FRIENDSHIP(S), Fortune, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Marriage/Betrothal, Peace, Seasons, Widowhood
 FRIVOLITY/FRIVOLITIES, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 FROG(S)/TOAD(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Evil Eye, Kiss/Kissing, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery,
 Zodiac
 FRONTIER, Dreams/Visions, Margins/Outsiders,
 Path/Road/Crossroads
 FRUIT(S), Abundance, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Fortune, Hanging, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I,
 Logos/Word, Metamorphosis, Misfortune, Months,
 Naked/Nude, Offering, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Seasons,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 FRUITFULNESS, Abundance, Whiteness
 FULLER, Loie, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 FUNERAL/BURIAL, Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification,
 Comic, Death, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze,
 Hair/Haircutting, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight,
 Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Love and Death, Luxury,
 Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Melancholy,
 Mirror/Reflection, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport,
 Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood
 FUNERARY BIER(S), Sacrifice
 FUNERARY PYRE(S), Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification, Fortune, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Plague/Pestilence,
 Temptation
 FUNNEL(S), Melancholy
 FUR(S), Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 FURNACE, Martyrdom, Sacrifice
 FURNITURE, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal
 FUTILITY, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Music,
 Penitence/Repentance
 FUTURE, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Offering, Physiognomy, Seasons, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues,
 Whiteness
 FUTURISTS/FUTURISM, Dreams/Visions, Journey/Flight,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Madness, Sport

 GALILEO, Caricature/Cartoon, Envy, Protestantism
 GALL see BILE
 GALLERIA DEGLI AUTRITRATTI, Self-Portraits I
 GALLOWS, Hanging, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Upside Down GAMBLER(S)/GAMBLING (see also LOTTERY/LOTTERIES), Comic, Death, Madness,
 Margins/Outsiders, Money, Sin/Sinning, Sport
 GAME(S), Automata, Fortune, Marriage/Betrothal, Sanctuary, Sport, Voyeurism
 GAME BOARD, Caricature/Cartoon
 GANGSTER(S), Fortune, Physiognomy
 GARDEN(S)/GARDNER(S), Abundance, Automata, Annunciation, Expulsion, Humors,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Labor/Trades/Occupations,

Labyrinth/Maze, Luxury, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Music, Offering, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Toilet Scenes,
 Whiteness, Widowhood
 GARDEN MAZE(S) see LABYRINTH/MAZE
 GARLAND(S), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Death, Fortune,
 Honor/Honoring, Laughter, Light I, Offering, Peasantry, Seasons, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 GARMENT(S) see DRESS
 GAS/GASES/GASEOUS, Order/Chaos, Sublime
 GAS MASK(S), Order/Chaos
 GATE(S) see DOOR(S)
 GAZE, Abandonment, Bath/Bathing,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Death, Dreams/Visions,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Evil Eye, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Months, Naked/Nude, Night,
 Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Sport, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism,
 Widowhood
 GAZELLE(S), Caricature/Cartoon
 GEM(S) see JEWEL(S)
 GEMINI (zodiacal constellation), Zodiac
 GENDER (see also FEMININE/FEMININITY; MASCULINE/MASCULINITY), Artists/Art,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Journey/Flight,
 Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Offering,
 Order/Chaos, Reading, Seasons, Self-Portraits I,
 Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Virgin/Virginity, Widowhood, Zodiac
 GENE(S)/GENETIC, Laughter, Physiognomy
 GENIE/GENII, Death, Night
 GENITALS/GENITALIA, Evil Eye, Excess,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Laughter,
 Naked/Nude, Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Zodiac
 GENIUS, Artists/Art, Imagination/Creativity, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Self-Portraits I, Sublime, Zodiac
 GENRE(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Luxury, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance,
 Protestantism, Reading, Self-Portraits II,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas,
 Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness
 GENUFLECTION, Devotion/Piety
 GEOMETRY/GEOMETER/GEOMETRIC DESIGNS,
 Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Kiss/Kissing, Labyrinth/Maze,
 Light I, Offering, Order/Chaos, Sanctuary, Upside Down
 GEORGET, Dr. Etienne-Jean, Physiognomy
 GERMAN(S), Sin/Sinning
 GERMAN REUNIFICATION, Penitence/Repentance

GESTURE(S), Automata, Baptism, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Communion, Death, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Love and Death, Madness, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Voyeurism, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery

GHOST(S), Mirror/Reflection, Nightmare, Witchcraft/Sorcery

GIANT(S), Abduction/Rape, Comic, Excess, Fame

GIBBET see GALLOWS; HANGING

GIFT(S), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Honor/Honoring, Kiss/Kissing, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Peace, Sanctuary, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation

GILLES (clown), Masks/Personae

GILOT, Françoise, Pregnancy

GIRDLE(S), Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Virtue/Virtues

GISANT, Fortune

GISZE, Georg, Luxury

GLADIATOR(S), Evil Eye, Luxury, Sport

GLASS/GLASSES, Annunciation, Communion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Light I, Light II, Luxury, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity

GLOBE(S), Abundance, Fame, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Laughter, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac

GLOCKENSPIEL, Automata

GLORY/GLORIFICATION, Ascent/Descent, Death, Fame, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Light I, Madness, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Virtue/Virtues

GLOVE(S), Abduction/Rape, Honor/Honoring, Marriage/Betrothal, Pregnancy

GLUTTONY, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fools/Folly, Laughter, Masks/Personae, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins

GNOME(S), Sin/Sinning

GO (Japanese game), Voyeurism

GOAT(S)/RAM(S)/KID(S), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Annunciation, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Judaism, Judgment, Laughter, Logos/Word, Margins/Outsiders, Music, Night, Offering, Order/Chaos, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

GOATHERD(S) see SHEPHERDS/SHEPHERDESSES

GOBELINS, Months

GOBLET(S), Money, Music, Vices/Deadly Sins

GOD(S)/GODDESS(ES), Crucifixion, Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Light II, Logos/Word, Love and Death, Madness, Misfortune,

Months, Music, Naked/Nude, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac

GODIVA, Lady, Hair/Haircutting

GOLD, Abundance, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Avarice, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Communion, Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Evil Eye, Expulsion, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Hanging, Honor/Honoring, Judaism, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter, Light II, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Money, Months, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac

GOLDEN AGE see AGES OF THE WORLD

GOLDEN SECTION, Sport

GOLDSMITH(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Mirror/Reflection

GONZAGA, Federigo, Death

GONZAGA, Francesco, Imagination/Creativity, Evil Eye, Honor/Honoring

GONZAGA, Vincenzo, Visiting/Visitation

GONZAGA FAMILY, Honor/Honoring

GOOD/GOODNESS, Abundance, Fortune, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Light I, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Offering, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Pregnancy, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness

GOOD AND BAD GOVERNMENT, Abundance, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peace, Peasantry, Virtue/Virtues

GOOD AND EVIL/GOOD AND BAD, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Dawn/Dawning, Fame, Judgment, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery

GOOSE/GEESE, Ecstasy, Evil Eye, Vices/Deadly Sins

GORGONEION, Evil Eye, Gaze

GORING, Hermann, Sin/Sinning

GOSSIP, Offering, Widowhood

GOTHIC, Temptation, Visiting/Visitation

GOURD(S), Journey/Flight, Virtue/Virtues

GOUT, Martyrdom

GOVERNNESS(ES), Labor/Trades/Occupations

GOVERNMENT see GOOD AND BAD GOVERNMENT

GRACE (divine) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Devotion/Piety, Gaze, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac

GRACE/GRACEFULNESS, Abundance, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Night, Peasantry, Temptation, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness

GRACELAND (Memphis, Tennessee), Journey/Flight

GRAFFITI, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic

GRAHAM, Martha, Dance/Dancers/Dancing

- GRAIN/GRAINS, Abundance, Harvesting,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peasantry, Seasons,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 GRANDEUR, Sublime
 GRANDPARENTS, Peasantry
 GRAND TOUR, Sublime
 GRANT, William, Melancholy
 GRANVELLE, Cardinal, Fools/Folly
 GRAPE(S), Bacchanalia/Orgy, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Music, Offering, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses,
 Vanity/Vanitas
 GRAVE(S)/GRAVESTONE(S)/GRAVEYARD(S) (see also FUNERAL/BURIAL), Death, Fortune, Hair/Haircutting, Journey/Flight, Madness, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 GRAVEDIGGER(S), Fortune
 GRAVITY (law of gravity), Dreams/Visions, Hanging,
 Upside Down
 GRAVITY (seriousness), Imagination/Creativity, Sin/Sinning,
 Virtue/Virtues
 GRAY see GREY
 GREAT BEAR see URSA MAJOR (constellation)
 GREECE, Gaze
 GREED see AVARICE
 GREEK (alphabet/language), Sacrifice, Vanity/Vanitas
 GREEK CROSS, Martyrdom
 GREEK INDEPENDENCE, Sacrifice
 GREEN, Abundance, Envy, Protestantism
 GREETING, Annunciation, Gaze
 GREETING CARD(S), Months
 GREY, Nightmare, Shipwreck
 GREYHOUND(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
 GRIEVING/LAMENTATION, Abandonment, Adultery,
 Death, Destruction of City, Expulsion, Fortune,
 Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Laughter, Light I, Love and Death, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy,
 Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sleep/Sleeping, Whiteness,
 Widowhood
 GRIFFIN(S), Excess, Virtue/Virtues
 GRIM REAPER see DEATH
 GRINDSTONE(S), Melancholy
 GROIN(S), Zodiac
 GROOM(S) see BRIDEGROOM(S)
 GROTESQUE, Abandonment, Adultery,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Death, Evil Eye, Excess,
 Fools/Folly, Madness, Masks/Personae, Money, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Sin/Sinning, Temptation
 GROUND LINE, Upside Down
 GUARDIAN(S), Mirror/Reflection, Pointing/Indicating, Sanctuary, Widowhood
 GUEST(S), Marriage/Betrothal, Penitence/Repentance
 GUERNICA, Spain, Apocalypse, Arms Raised, Death, Destruction of City, Gaze, Order/Chaos
 GUARDIAN, Journey/Flight
 GUIDANCE, Abundance, Imagination/Creativity,
 Vanity/Vanitas
 GUILBERT, Yvette, Caricature/Cartoon, Masks/Personae GUILD(S), Artists/Art, Mirror/Reflection
 GUILLOTINE, Hanging
 GUILT, Damned Souls, Death, Destruction of City, Evil Eye,
 Gaze, Luxury, Naked/Nude, Penitence/Repentance,
 Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sin/Sinning
 GUN(S), Dreams/Visions, Marriage/Betrothal, Order/Chaos
 GUSTAV ADOLPH OF SWEDEN, Protestantism
 GUT, Music
 GYMNASIUM(S), Sport
 GYMNASTICS, Sport, Upside Down
 GYPSY/GYPSIES, Fortune, Margins/Outsiders
 HAG(S), Death, Temptation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HAIL/HAILSTORM(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HAIR/HAIRCUTTING, Abduction/Rape, Ascent/Descent,
 Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Excess, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors,
 Imagination/Creativity, Hair/Haircutting, Luxury,
 Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal,
 Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
 Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Temptation, Toilet
 Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Voyeurism, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HALE, Nathan, Martyrdom, Sacrifice
 HALLUCINATION(S), Ecstasy, Labyrinth/Maze, Madness, Nightmare, Order/Chaos, Temptation
 HALO see AUREOLE/HALO
 HAMILTON, Sir William, Whiteness
 HAMMER(S), Automata, Madness, Melancholy,
 Vices/Deadly Sins
 HAND(S), Abandonment, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Birth/Childbirth, Communion, Crucifixion, Damned
 Souls, Death, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Evil Eye,
 Expulsion, Fortune, Gaze, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Kiss/Kissing,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Love and Death,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Music, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos,
 Peace, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance,
 Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sacrifice,
 Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes,
 Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery,
 Zodiac
 HANDBAG see PURSE/HANDBAG/MONEYBAG
 HANDICAPPED, Margins/Outsiders
 HANDICRAFT(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations
 HANDKERCHIEF/KERCHIEF, Pregnancy, Protestantism HANDLE(S), Sanctuary
 HANDSHAKE, Gaze, Marriage/Betrothal
 HANDWRITING, Margins/Outsiders, Reading
 HANGING, Abandonment, Death, Hanging, Light II,
 Masks/Personae, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues,
 Voyeurism, Widowhood
 HANGMAN (game), Hanging

- HANG-ROPE, Virtue/Virtues
HANNIBAL, Path/Road/Crossroads
HANOUARS, Fortune
HAPPINESS/JOY, Abundance, Choice/Choosing, Dreams/Visions, Honor/Honoring,
 Imagination/Creativity, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Laughter,
 Light I, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Toilet Scenes,
 Upside Down, Virtue/Virtues
HARE(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Peasantry,
 Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
HAREM, Bath/Bathing
HARLEQUIN/ARLECCHINO (commedia dell'arte character), Dreams/Visions, Fools/Folly, Masks/Personae HARLOT(S) see PROSTITUTE(S)/PROSTITUTION
HARLOW, Jean, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
HARMONY, Ascent/Descent, Female Beauty and Adornment, Harvesting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism,
 Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light II, Love and Death, Melancholy, Months, Music, Night, Order/Chaos,
 Peace, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Seasons,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues,
 Whiteness, Zodiac
HAROLD, Margins/Outsiders
HARP(S), Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Music
HARPOON(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Sacrifice
HARPSICORD(S), Sin/Sinning
HART, Emma, Whiteness
HARUSPICY, Fortune
HARVESTING, Abundance, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Harvesting,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Offering, Peasantry, Seasons, Sleep/Sleeping, Zodiac
HAT(S)/HAT BAND(S)/HEADDRESS(ES)/
 HEADGEAR/BONNET(S), Death, Fools/Folly,
 Hair/Haircutting, Judaism, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders,
 Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Peasantry,
 Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Temptation,
 Vanity/Vanitas, Widowhood
HATCH/HATCHED/HATCHING, Pregnancy
HATE/HATRED, Calumny, Justice, Peasantry, Virtue/Virtues
HAUSSMANN, Baron, Masks/Personae
HAVEN(S) see SANCTUARY
HAWK(S)/HAWKING, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Months, Path/Road/Crossroads, Zodiac
HAY, Harvesting, Peasantry
HAY WAGON/HAYWAIN, Harvesting,
 Path/Road/Crossroads
HAYWORTH, Rita, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
HEAD(S), Abandonment, Apocalypse,
 Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent,
 Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Baptism,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth,
 Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Communion, Damned Souls,
 Death, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
 Ecstasy, Envy, Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale,
 Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Fortune,
 Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Judaism, Justice, Love and Death, Margins/Outsiders,
 Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Money,
 Naked/Nude, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Upside Down,
 Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
HEADACHE(S), Martyrdom
HEADDRESS see HAT(S)/HEADDRESS(ES)
HEALING/HEALTH, Bath/Bathing,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
 Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Humors, Journey/Flight,
 Kiss/Kissing, Madness, Melancholy, Naked/Nude, Peace,
 Peasantry, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Reading,
 Serpent's Bite, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
HEARSE(S), Fortune
HEART(S), Communion, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Humors, Judaism, Judgment,
 Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
HEARTH(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Virgin/Virginity
HEAT/HOT, Humors, Melancholy, Seasons, Zodiac
HEAVEN(S) (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Apotheosis/Deification, Arms
 Raised, Ascent/Descent, Calumny, Damned Souls,
 Dawn/Dawning, Death, Dreams/Visions,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Excess, Fame,
 Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Honor/Honoring,
 Journey/Flight, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light
 I, Light II, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Melancholy, Months, Music, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Whiteness, Widowhood, Zodiac
HEBREW/HEBREW(S), Gaze, Melancholy, Reading,
 Vanity/Vanitas, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
HEDGE MAZE see LABYRINTH/MAZE
HEDONISM, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Luxury,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Vanity/Vanitas
HEEL(S), Upside Down HELL (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Apocalypse, Masks/Personae, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Sin/Sinning, Whiteness
HELLEBORE (herb), Melancholy
HELM, BRIGITTE, Automata
HELMET(S), Fame, Fortune, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos,
 Peace, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
HEMISPHERE/HEMISPHERICAL, Sanctuary
HEMLOCK, Judgment
HENRI II, King of France, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Widowhood
HENRIETTA MARIE, Queen of England,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses
HENRY II, King of England, Sanctuary
HENRY III, King of England, Fortune
HENRY IV, Emperor, Penitence/Repentance
HENRY IV, King of France, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Marriage/Betrothal, Patronage
HENRY V, King of England, Marriage/Betrothal
HENRY VIII, King of England, Martyrdom, Protestantism

HERALDRY (see also COAT[S] OF ARMS), Virtue/Virtues,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HERB(S), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Madness,
 Vices/Deadly Sins
 HERDSMAN/HERDSMEN see
 SHEPHERDS/SHEPHERDESSES
 HERETIC/HERESY, Birth/Childbirth, Damned Souls,
 Fools/Folly, Margins/Outsiders, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HERM(S), Fame
 HERMAPHRODITE/ANDROGYNE, Comic, Death,
 Evil Eye, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Naked/Nude,
 Virgin/Virginity
 HERMIT(S), Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas
 HERO(ES)/HEROINE(S)/HEROISM, Abandonment,
 Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Comic, Death,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fame, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Journey/Flight, Judgment, Justice, Martyrdom,
 Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Naked/Nude, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
 HEXEMERON, Order/Chaos
 HEXEN, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HIBERNATE/HIBERNATION, Seasons
 HIERARCHY, Ascent/Descent, Death, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Margins/Outsiders, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning,
 Sport, Vanity/Vanitas
 HIEROGLYPH(S), Arms Raised, Birth/Childbirth, Peace, Sanctuary, Virtue/Virtues
 HIEROS GAMOS, Toilet Scenes
 HIGHLAND CLEARANCES, Expulsion
 HIGHWAY see PATH/ROAD/CROSSROADS
 Hill(s) see MOUNTAIN(S)
 HILL, Emma, Mirror/Reflection
 HIP(S), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Naked/Nude
 HIPPOGRIFF, Abduction/Rape
 HIPPOPOTAMUS(ES), Comic, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Pregnancy, Zodiac
 HIROSHIMA, Destruction of City
 HISPANIC(S), Margins/Outsiders
 HISTORICISM, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Devotion/Piety
 HISTORY/HISTORIAN(S), Apotheosis/Deification, Expulsion, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Journey/Flight, Offering, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism,
 Sin/Sinning, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 HISTORY PAINTING see ACADEMIES/ACADEMICISM
 HITLER, Adolf, Sin/Sinning
 HIV VIRUS see AIDS
 HOE(S)/HOEING, Peasantry, Zodiac
 HOHENZOLLERN, Protestantism
 HOLIDAY(S), Calumny, Fortune, Hanging, Judaism, Marriage/Betrothal, Months, Peasantry
 HOLLOW see EMPTY/EMPTINESS
 HOLLYWOOD, Dreams/Visions
 HOLOCAUST, Apocalypse, Destruction of City, Judaism, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning

HOLY see SACRED
 HOLY MEN/HOLY WOMEN/HOLY PERSONAGES,
 Annunciation, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Ecstasy, Fortune, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Patronage,
 Sanctuary, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Virgin/Virginity
 HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE, Protestantism
 HOLZSCHUBER, Hieronymus, Gaze
 HOMAGE, Apotheosis/Deification, Honor/Honoring,
 Kiss/Kissing, Sacrifice
 HOME(S), Journey/Flight, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
 Protestantism, Virtue/Virtues
 HOMELESS, Margins/Outsiders
 HOMOEROTICISM/HOMOSEXUAL(S)/
 HOMOSEXUALITY, Abduction/Rape, Bath/Bathing,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Music, Sport, Voyeurism
 HONDURAS, Abundance
 HONEY, Abundance, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication
 HONEYSUCKLE, Mirror/Reflection, Self-Portraits I
 HONOR/HONORING, Betrayal, Fame, Gaze,
 Honor/Honoring, Judgment, Martyrdom, Patronage,
 Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HOOD(S), Fools/Folly, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Physiognomy,
 Seasons
 HOORNIK, Clasina Maria (Sien), Pregnancy
 HOPE, Ascent/Descent, Hanging, Justice, Night,
 Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Shipwreck, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 HORIZON, Upside Down, Whiteness
 HORN(S), Abundance, Apotheosis/Deification,
 Ascent/Descent, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Fame, Fortune, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judaism, Judgment,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Sanctuary, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Virtue/Virtues
 HORN OF PLENTY see CORNUCOPIA
 HOROSCOPE(S), Honor/Honoring, Zodiac
 HORSE(S), Abduction/Rape, Apocalypse, Artists/Art,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Death, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Envy, Excess, Expulsion, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Light I,
 Logos/Word, Love and Death, Luxury, Martyrdom,
 Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Nightmare,
 Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice,
 Sport, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Whiteness,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 HORSEMAN(MEN)/HORSEBACK, Gaze,
 Honor/Honoring, Justice, Sport, Zodiac
 HORSETAIL, Bacchanalia/Orgy
 HOSPICE(S), Journey/Flight
 HOSPITAL(S), Fortune, Madness, Plague/Pestilence
 HOST see COMMUNION; Index of Judeo-Christian
 Personages, Places, and Concepts
 HOT see HEAT/HOT

- HOULETTE* see CROOK(S)
HOUNDS see DOG(S)
HOUR(S), Automata, Night, Visiting/Visitation
HOURGLASS(ES), Death, Honor/Honoring, Melancholy, Music, Pointing/Indicating, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues
HOUSE(S)/HOUSEHOLD(S), Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Misfortune, Vices/Deadly Sins
HOUSE OF CARDS, Adultery
HUBRIS/HYBRIS, Ascent/Descent, Excess, Luxury, Madness
HUDSON RIVER SCHOOL, Ecstasy, Journey/Flight
HUMAN (frequently used term; not indexed)
HUMANISM/HUMANIST(S), Abandonment, Abduction/Rape, Death, Fame, Fools/Folly, Honor/Honoring, Love and Death, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Zodiac
HUMANOID, Automata, Sin/Sinning
HUMILIATION, Caricature/Cartoon, Crucifixion, Hanging, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy HUMILITY, Annunciation, Beheading/Decapitation, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Kiss/Kissing, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Reading, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Vanity/Vanitas
HUMOR/HUMOROUS see COMIC
HUMORS, Humors, Melancholy, Music, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Zodiac
HUNCHBACK(S), Evil Eye, Fools/Folly
HUNGER, Damned Souls, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues
HUNT, Fanny, Death
HUNTING/HUNTER/HUNTRESS, Death, Gaze, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Justice, Light I, Logos/Word, Love and Death, Luxury, Months, Patronage, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Sport, Virgin/Virginity, Zodiac
HUSBAND(S), Abandonment, Adultery, Birth/Childbirth, Journey/Flight, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Reading, Self-Portraits II, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Widowhood
HUSKING, Labor/Trades/Occupations
HYACINTH, Metamorphosis
HYDRIA, Female Beauty and Adornment
HYENA(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress
HYMN(S), Baptism, Communion, Devotion/Piety, Music, Sacrifice, Virgin/Virginity
HYPNOSIS/HYPNOTISM, Abduction/Rape, Artists/Art, Dreams/Visions, Gaze
HYPOCHONDRIAC(S), Melancholy
HYPOCRITE(S)/HYPOCRISY, Ascent/Descent, Death, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Temptation, Witchcraft/Sorcery
HYSTERIA, Abandonment, Madness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
ICE/ICEBOUND, Damned Souls, Months, Seasons, Shipwreck, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
ICE SKATE(S)/ICE SKATING, Melancholy, Months, Seasons, Sport
ICON(S), Crucifixion, Death, Devotion/Piety, Ecstasy, Gaze, Light I, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I
ICONOCLASM, Crucifixion, Light I, Logos/Word, Luxury, Offering, Protestantism, Self-Portraits I ICONOGRAPHY (frequently used term; not indexed)
IDAHO, Abundance
IDEAL/IDEALIZED/IDEALISM, Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Gaze, Hanging, Harvesting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Logos/Word, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sport, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Whiteness
IDLE/IDLER(S)/IDLENESS, Melancholy, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
IDOL(S)/IDOLATRY, Automata, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Devotion/Piety, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Serpent's Bite, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
IDYLL/IDYLIC, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
IGNORANCE, Calumny, Virtue/Virtues
IGNUDI, Comic, Naked/Nude
ILLEGAL ALIENS, Margins/Outsiders
ILLEGITIMACY, Adultery, Mirror/Reflection, Peace, Pregnancy
ILLNESS/DISEASE/SICKNESS, Death, Humors, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Mirror/Reflection, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation
ILLUSION(S), Ascent/Descent, Comic, Crucifixion, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Honor/Honoring, Madness, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas
IMAGE(S) (frequently used term; not indexed)
IMAGINATION/CREATIVITY, Artists/Art, Caricature/Cartoon, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning, Dreams/Visions, Excess, Fame, Imagination/Creativity, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Martyrdom, Night, Nightmare, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Vices/Deadly Sins, Witchcraft/Sorcery
IMITATION, Imagination/Creativity, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Vices/Deadly Sins IMMIGRANTS, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal
IMMIGRATION see JOURNEY/FLIGHT
IMMORTALS/IMMORTALITY, Abundance, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Bath/Bathing, Choice/Choosing, Death, Dreams/Visions, Excess, Fame, Gaze, Honor/Honoring, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Vanity/Vanitas
IMPERIA, Honor/Honoring
IMPOTENCY, Comic, Order/Chaos

- IMPREGNATION, Annunciation, Pregnancy
 IMPRESSIONISM, Artists/Art, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Light I, Light II, Naked/Nude, Night, Self-Portraits I,
 Whiteness
 INCANTATION(S)/SPELL(S), Sin/Sinning, Toilet Scenes, Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 INCARNATION, Annunciation
 INCENSE, Fortune, Offering, Sacrifice, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues
 INCEST, Betrayal, Excess
 INCONGRUITY, Laughter, Masks/Personae
 INCONTINENCE, Excess
 INCUBATION, Dreams/Visions
 INCUBUS/INCUBI, Nightmare, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 INDEPENDENCE, Abandonment, Artists/Art,
 Dreams/Visions, Fools/Folly, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Journey/Flight, Judaism, Justice, Margins/Outsiders,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Sacrifice,
 Virgin/Virginity
 INDEPENDENT CURATORS INCORPORATED (ICI),
 Self-Portraits I
 INDIA, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Sanctuary INDICATING see POINTING/INDICATING INDULGENCES, Death, Money, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Protestantism
 INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION/INDUSTRIALIZATION,
 Gaze, Harvesting, Labor/Trades/Occupations,
 Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Money,
 Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sport INDUSTRY see COMMERCE
 INFAMY, Fame
 INFANT(S)/INFANCY see
 CHILD/CHILDREN/CHILDHOOD
 INFERNO see FIRE/FLAMES/BURNING/INFERNO
 INFIDEL(S), Ascent/Descent
 INFIDELITY, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Betrayal
 INFINITY, Night, Order/Chaos, Sublime
 INITIATION, Baptism, Bath/Bathing,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Toilet Scenes, Whiteness
 INJUSTICE, Adultery, Fortune, Judgment, Justice, Margins/Outsiders, Order/Chaos, Virtue/Virtues
 INK POT, Imagination/Creativity, Light II
 INN(S) see TAVERN(S)
 INNOCENCE, Adultery, Choice/Choosing, Death,
 Expulsion, Judgment, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude,
 Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning,
 Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity,
 Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
 INSANITY see MADNESS
 INSCRIPTION(S), Light I, Logos/Word, Love and Death,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection,
 Music, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace,
 Protestantism, Sanctuary, Seasons, Vanity/Vanitas,
 Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 INSECT(S), Dreams/Visions, Excess, Imagination/Creativity, Metamorphosis, Sin/Sinning, Temptation,
 Vanity/Vanitas
 INSOLENT, Laughter, Plague/Pestilence
 INSPIRATION, Imagination/Creativity, Music, Self-Portraits
 I, Self-Portraits II, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Virtue/Virtues,
 Whiteness
 INSTABILITY, Fortune, Peasantry
 INSTINCT/INTUITION, Arms Raised, Dawn/Dawning, Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Gaze,
 Imagination/Creativity, Order/Chaos, Sin/Sinning,
 Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 INSTRUCTION, Imagination/Creativity
 INSURANCE, Shipwreck, Widowhood
 INTELLECT/INTELLECTUAL(S)/INTELLIGENTSIA/
 MIND, Abduction/Rape, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Dawn/Dawning, Death, Devotion/Piety, Hair/Haircutting,
 Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring, Humors,
 Imagination/Creativity, Logos/Word, Madness,
 Mirror/Reflection, Music, Order/Chaos, Patronage,
 Peace, Peasantry, Physiognomy, Seasons, Self-Portraits I,
 Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 INTERCESSION/INTERCESSOR, Light I, Order/Chaos,
 Plague/Pestilence
 INTOXICATION see DRUNKENNESS/INTOXICATION
 INTROSPECTION, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Gaze
 INTUITION see INSTINCT/INTUITION
 INVENTOR/INVENTION, Caricature/Cartoon,
 Imagination/Creativity
 INVERSION, Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 INVISIBLE, Communion, Fortune, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sublime, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues,
 Voyeurism
 IRISH FAMINE, Expulsion, Journey/Flight
 IRISHMAN/IRISHMEN, Physiognomy
 IRON AGE see AGES OF MAN
 IRONING CLOTHES, Labor/Trades/Occupations
 IRONY, Temptation, Upside Down
 IRRATIONALITY, Beheading/Decapitation, Dreams/Visions,
 Fools/Folly, Excess, Upside Down
 IRREVERENCE, Laughter
 ISAAC OF NORWICH, Caricature/Cartoon
 ISABELLA OF PORTUGAL, Whiteness
 ISLAND(S), ABANDONMENT, Abduction/Rape,
 Abundance, Adultery, Ascent/Descent,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Birth/Childbirth,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Journey/Flight, Love and Death, Luxury, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Shipwreck,
 Vanity/Vanitas
 ISOLATION, Adultery, Artists/Art, Choice/Choosing,
 Ecstasy, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Margins/Outsiders,
 Night, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Plague/Pestilence, Seasons
 ISRAEL/ISRAELITES (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Judaism, Sanctuary,
 Visiting/Visitation, Zodiac
 ITALIAN COMEDY see COMMEDIA DELL'ARTE
 IVORY/IVORIES, Light I, Luxury, Sanctuary
 IVY, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Marriage/Betrothal, Offering

- JACKAL(S), Zodiac
 JAGUAR(S), Sanctuary
 JAIL(S)/JAILER(S), Path/Road/Crossroads
 JAMES II, King of England, Journey/Flight
 JAMES, Jesse, Dreams/Visions
 JANIS, Sidney, Patronage
 JAPAN, Seasons
 JAR(S), Penitence/Repentance, Toilet Scenes, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 JAVELIN(S), Love and Death
 JAZZ (music), Dance/Dancers/Dancing
 JEALOUSY, Adultery, Calumny, Expulsion, Fortune, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Offering, Pregnancy, Sacrifice, Temptation
 JEANNE DE BOURBON, Queen of France, Fortune
 JERUSALEM (see also Index of Judeo-Christian Personages, Places, and Concepts), Judaism
 JESTER(S) see FOOLS/FOLLY
 JEW(S)/JEWISH (see also JUDAISM), Betrayal, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Dreams/Visions, Evil Eye, Journey/Flight, Light I, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Money, Music, Peace, Plague/Pestilence, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Sport, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 JEWEL(S)/JEWELRY, Abundance, Adultery, Crucifixion, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hair/Haircutting, Luxury, Marriage/Betrothal, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Naked/Nude, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Visiting/Visitation, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 JINSHAN PEASANT PAINTING SOCIETY, Peasantry
 JOAN OF ARC, Martyrdom
 JOHN THE GOOD, Fortune
 JOKE(S)/JOKER(S)/JOKEBOOK(S), Comic, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Laughter, Madness, Marriage/Betrothal, Order/Chaos, Peasantry, Self-Portraits I
 JONGLEUR(S), Fools/Folly, Masks/Personae
 JORDAN, MICHAEL, Sport
 JOURNEY/FLIGHT, Abandonment, Choice/Choosing, Death, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Humors, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labyrinth/Maze, Laughter, Love and Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pointing/Indicating, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Self-Portraits I, Shipwreck, Temptation, Whiteness, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 JOUSTS/JOUSTING see TOURNAMENT(S)
 JOY see HAPPINESS
 JUDAISM (see also JEW(S)/JEWISH), Crucifixion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Judaism, Light I, Music, Offering, Order/Chaos, Sanctuary, Seasons
 JUDGE(S)/JURIST(S), Calumny, Choice/Choosing, Damned Souls, Justice, Masks/Personae, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Shipwreck, Sin/Sinning, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 JUDGMENT, Excess, Expulsion, Fame, Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Justice, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Whiteness, Zodiac
 JUGGLER(S), Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 JUPITER (planet), Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
 JUSTICE, Abundance, Adultery, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Gaze, Hanging, Judgment, Justice, Night, Offering, Penitence/Repentance, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
 JUSTICE OF THE PEACE, Marriage/Betrothal
 JUSTINIAN, Emperor, Ascent/Descent
 KAHNWEILER, Daniel Henry, Patronage
 KEPPLER, Johannes, Protestantism
 KERMISS see FESTIVAL(S)/FESTIVITIES
 KETTLE(S), Sin/Sinning
 KEY(S), Madness, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Penitence/Repentance, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
 KID(S) see GOAT(S)/RAM(S)/KID(S)
 KIDNAPPING see ABDUCTION/RAPE
 KILL/KILLING (see also DEATH; MORTALITY), Abandonment, Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Hair/Haircutting, Hanging, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Judgment, Love and Death, Madness, Martyrdom, Offering, Peasantry, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Pregnancy, Reading, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Serpent's Bite, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation
 KING(S)/EMPEROR(S), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Apotheosis/Deification, Arms Raised, Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Caricature/Cartoon, Death, Dreams/Visions, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits I, Self-Portraits II, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Voyeurism, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 KING, Martin Luther, Martyrdom, Sacrifice
 KINSHIP, Gaze
 KISS/KISSING, Abandonment, Ecstasy, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Kiss/Kissing, Love and Death, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude, Reading, Sanctuary, Visiting/Visitation
 KITCHEN(S), Witchcraft/Sorcery
 KITCHEN MAID(S) see SERVANT(S)
 KLEPTOMANIAC(S), Madness
 KNEEL/KNEELING, Annunciation, Apotheosis/Deification, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Communion, Crucifixion, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Mirror/Reflection, Path/Road/Crossroads, Patronage, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Widowhood, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 KNIFE/KNIVES/KNIFE-GRINDER(S)/KNIVES AND FORKS, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Fortune, Judaism, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal, Martyrdom, Offering, Sacrifice
 KNOT(S), Hanging, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection
 KNOWLEDGE, Excess, Light I, Love and Death, Peace, Sacrifice, Temptation, Virtue/Virtues

KYOTO, Path/Road/Crossroads

LABOR/TRADES/OCCUPATIONS, Automata, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Ecstasy, Expulsion, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Luxury, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Naked/Nude, Order/Chaos, Patronage, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Seasons, Self-Portraits II, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Widowhood, Zodiac

LABOR UNREST, Money, Peasantry, Shepherds/Shepherdesses

LABYRINTH/MAZE, Abandonment, Automata, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Evil Eye, Labyrinth/Maze, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy

LACE, Female Beauty and Adornment, Temptation

LACHAISE, Isabel, Imagination/Creativity

LADDER(S), Ascent/Descent, Death, Dreams/Visions, Hanging, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Sleep/Sleeping, Vanity/Vanitas

LADY LUCK, Fortune

LADY WORLD, Female Beauty and Adornment

LAISSEZ-FAIRE, Money

LAMB(S) (see also SHEEP), Crucifixion, Light I, Judgment, Martyrdom, Melancholy, Music, Order/Chaos, Peace, Pointing/Indicating, Sacrifice, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Zodiac

LAMENESS, Laughter, Margins/Outsiders

LAMENTATION see GRIEVING/LAMENTATION

LAMP(S), Journey/Flight, Light I, Light II, Logos/Word, Luxury, Night, Sanctuary, Vanity/Vanitas

LANCE, Apocalypse, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Judaism, Love and Death, Martyrdom

LANCHALS, PETER, Judgment

LANDLORD(S), Peasantry

LANDSCAPE(S), Abandonment, Adultery, Apocalypse, Death, Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment, Harvesting, Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Laughter, Logos/Word, Love and Death, Mirror/Reflection, Months, Naked/Nude, Night, Offering, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry, Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sublime, Temptation, Upside Down, Vices/Deadly Sins, Visiting/Visitation, Witchcraft/Sorcery

LANGE, Mademoiselle, Money

LANGUAGE(S) (see also BODY LANGUAGE), Annunciation, Arms Raised, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent, Automata, Caricature/Cartoon, Dreams/Visions, Female Beauty and Adornment, Light I, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Offering, Order/Chaos

LANTERN(S), Penitence/Repentance, Shipwreck

LARKSPUR, Metamorphosis

LASCIVIOUSNESS, Beheading/Decapitation, Female Beauty and Adornment, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery

LAST RITES, Death, Plague/Pestilence

LATIN (language), Peasantry, Vanity/Vanitas

LAUDANUM, Dreams/Visions, Gaze

LAUGHTER, Adultery, Annunciation, Automata, Comic, Evil Eye, Fools/Folly, Imagination/Creativity, Laughter, Madness, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Peasantry, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Voyeurism

LAUNDRESS(ES)/LAUNDERING,

Labor/Trades/Occupations, Margins/Outsiders

LAUREL, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Envy, Fame, Fortune, Honor/Honoring, Humors, Imagination/Creativity, Martyrdom, Metamorphosis, Misfortune, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Virtue/Virtues

LAW(S), Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Ascent/Descent, Birth/Childbirth, Excess, Gaze, Hanging, Judaism, Judgment, Justice, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Light I, Marriage/Betrothal, Night, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Widowhood

LAWYER(S), Caricature/Cartoon, Fools/Folly, Sacrifice, Shipwreck

LAZY/LAZINESS, Ascent/Descent, Dreams/Visions, Melancholy, Peasantry, Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins

LEAD (element), Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Whiteness

LEATHER, Evil Eye, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Sanctuary

LEAVE-TAKING see DEPARTURE

LECHERY, Adultery, Excess, Voyeurism

LECTURE(S), Light II

LEEK(S), Damned Souls, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

LEGEND(S) see FOLKLORE/FOLKTALES/FOLK TRADITIONS/LEGENDS

LEISURE, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peasantry, Sport, Toilet Scenes, Visiting/Visitation

LEITMOTIF(S), Virgin/Virginity

LEMON(S), Offering

LENTILS, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress

LEO (zodiacal constellation), Zodiac

LEOPARD(S), Drunkenness/Intoxication, Evil Eye, Judgment, Light I, Logos/Word, Music, Order/Chaos

LEPROSY, Bath/Bathing, Margins/Outsiders, Witchcraft/Sorcery

LESBIAN(S), Naked/Nude

LESIONS see SORES

LETHARGY, Melancholy, Sleep/Sleeping

LETTER(S) (see also MESSAGE[S]), Fortune, Laughter, Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Physiognomy, Pregnancy, Reading, Temptation, Virgin/Virginity

LETTER(S)/LETTERING, Caricature/Cartoon, Communion, Hanging, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Logos/Word, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading, Temptation, Upside Down, Witchcraft/Sorcery

LEVITATION, Upside Down

LIBATION(S), Abundance

LIBERAL ARTS, Artists/Art, Ascent/Descent,

Honor/Honoring, Music, Self-Portraits I, Virtue/Virtues

LIBERTY, Caricature/Cartoon, Destruction of City, Justice, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading

LIBIDO, Widowhood

LIBRA (zodiacal constellation), Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac

- LIBRARY/LIBRARIES, Patronage
 LICENSE PLATE(S), Path/Road/Crossroads
 LICTORS/LICTORS' RODS, Abundance, Justice
 LIDICE, Czechoslovakia, Destruction of City
 LIFE (frequently used term; not indexed)
 LIFE AFTER DEATH see AFTERLIFE
 LIFEBOAT(S), Misfortune, Shipwreck
 LIFE FORCE, Beheading/Decapitation, Toilet Scenes
 LIFE-SPAN, Physiognomy, Whiteness
 LIGHT, Adultery, Annunciation, Apocalypse,
 Ascent/Descent, Baptism, Birth/Childbirth, Communion,
 Crucifixion, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Dawn/Dawning,
 Dreams/Visions, Ecstasy, Female Beauty and Adornment,
 Gaze, Journey/Flight, Judaism, Light I, Light II,
 Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Night,
 Order/Chaos, Protestantism, Reading, Sanctuary,
 Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sin/Sinning, Sublime,
 Temptation, Upside Down, Vanity/Vanitas,
 Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness, Zodiac
 LIGHTNING, Betrayal, Fame, Honor/Honoring, Judaism,
 Peace, Peasantry, Sublime, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 LILY/LILIES, Annunciation, Ecstasy, Fortune, Justice,
 Reading, Virtue/Virtues, Whiteness
 LIMIT(S) see MARGINS/OUTSIDERS
 LIMP/LIMPING see LAMENESS
 LINCOLN, Abraham, Dreams/Visions, Martyrdom,
 Sacrifice
 LINEN(S), Death, Marriage/Betrothal, Virtue/Virtues
 LION(S), Abandonment, Apocalypse, Ascent/Descent,
 Caricature/Comic, Evil Eye, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Honor/Honoring, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Imagination/Creativity, Judaism, Justice, Light I,
 Logos/Word, Love and Death, Martyrdom,
 Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos,
 Penitence/Repentance, Pregnancy, Reading, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 LIP(S), Death, Female Beauty and Adornment, Masks/Personae, Physiognomy, Reading, Sin/Sinning,
 Voyeurism
 LIQUID(S) see FLUID(S)
 LISTEN/LISTENING, Arms Raised, Death,
 Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Penitence/Repentance
 LITTERA PYTHAGORAE, Path/Road/Crossroads
 LITTER BEARERS, Plague/Pestilence
 LIVER(S), Fortune, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Sin/Sinning
 LIZARD(S), Evil Eye, Order/Chaos, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 LOBSTER(S), Comic, Zodiac
 LOGOS/WORD, Light I, Logos/Word, Temptation,
 Virtue/Virtues
 LOINCLOTH, Death, Judaism, Martyrdom, Naked/Nude LONDON, Abandonment, Destruction of City,
 Visiting/Visitation
 LONGANIMITY, Virtue/Virtues
 LOOK/LOOKING see GAZE
 LOOM(S), Marriage/Betrothal, Mirror/Reflection
 LORD OF THE MANOR, Marriage/Betrothal
 LOREN, Sophia, Comic LOSING/LOSS, Gaze, Journey/Flight, Pregnancy,
 Widowhood
 LOTTERY/LOTTERIES, Luxury
 LOTUS, Annunciation, Seasons
 LOUIS IX, King of France, Light II, Patronage,
 Plague/Pestilence
 LOUIS XIV, King of France, Honor/Honoring, Luxury, Path/Road/Crossroads, Seasons
 LOUIS XV, King of France, Female Beauty and Adornment
 LOUIS NAPOLEON, Comic LOUIS PHILIPPE, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Caricature/Comic LOVAGE (herb), Melancholy
 LOVE/LOVERS, Adultery, Bath/Bathing, Betrayal, Choice/Choosing, Communion, Death, Devotion/Piety,
 Drunkenness/Intoxication, Ecstasy, Envy, Fame,
 Female Beauty and Adornment, Fortune, Gaze,
 Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Honor/Honoring, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Journey/Flight, Judgment, Kiss/Kissing, Light I,
 Logos/Word, Love and Death, Madness,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Money, Months, Music, Naked/Nude,
 Offering, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Patronage, Peace, Penitence/Repentance,
 Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Protestantism,
 Reading, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Serpent's Bite, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation,
 Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism, Whiteness, Widowhood,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery, Zodiac
 LOVE AND DEATH, Love and Death, Naked/Nude, Nightmare, Sleep/Sleeping
 LOVE POTION, Abduction/Rape, Adultery, Pregnancy
 LOVE-SICK see UNREQUITED LOVE
 LOWER CLASS see CLASS
 LOYALTY, Betrayal, Zodiac
 LOZENGE(S), Masks/Personae
 LUCK, Abundance, Fortune, Laughter, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Virtue/Virtues
 LUDOMIRSKI, Prinz Heinrich, Honor/Honoring LUMINISTS, Light II
 LUNATIC(S)/LUNACY see MADNESS
 LUNG(S), Melancholy, Sin/Sinning
 LUST, Bath/Bathing, Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication, Excess, Fatal
 Woman/Femme Fatale, Female Beauty and Adornment,
 Fools/Folly, Judgment, Justice, Mirror/Reflection, Music,
 Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peasantry,
 Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 LUTE, Comic, Drunkenness/Intoxication,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning,
 Temptation
 LUXURIA see LUXURY
 LUXURY, Adultery, Death, Excess, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Fools/Folly, Luxury, Money, Music, Patronage, Seasons, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 LYNCHING, Hanging
 LYRE(S), Honor/Honoring, Light I, Love and Death, Music,
 Zodiac

- MACABRE, Night, Witchcraft/Sorcery
 MACHINE/MACHINERY/MECHANICAL, Automata,
 Comic, Dreams/Visions, Hanging, Harvesting,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Peasantry, Sin/Sinning,
 Zodiac
 MACROCOSM/MACROCOSMOS, Zodiac
 MACRAMÉ, Pregnancy
 MADHOUSE(S), Madness, Margins/Outsiders
 MADNESS, Artists/Art, Death, Fools/Folly, Imagination/Creativity, Madness, Margins/Outsiders, Melancholy, Order/Chaos, Physiognomy,
 Pointing/Indicating
 MADONNA (pop star), Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale
 MAELSTROM, Ecstasy
 MAGAZINE(S), Toilet Scenes, Whiteness
 MAGIC/MAGICIAN(S), Abduction/Rape, Abundance, Bath/Bathing, Birth/Childbirth, Dance/Dancers/Dancing,
 Death, Dreams/Visions, Fatal Woman/Femme
 Fatale, Fortune, Gaze, Hanging, Harvesting,
 Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Laughter,
 Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Music, Physiognomy, Self-Portraits I, Sleep/Sleeping, Toilet Scenes, Vices/Deadly Sins,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 MAGNITUDE, Sublime
 MAHLSTICK(S) see MAULSTICK(S)
 MAID see SERVANT
 MAIDEN/MAIDENHOOD see VIRGIN/VIRGINITY
 MAIDEN IN DISTRESS, Beheading/Decapitation
 MAKEUP see COSMETICS
 MALAISE see ENNUI
 MALATESTA, Giovanni, Kiss/Kissing
 MALATESTA, Paolo, Kiss/Kissing, Reading
 MALEBOLGE, Damned Souls
 MALEFACTOR/MALEFICENCE/MALEVOLENCE,
 Betrayal, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Voyeurism,
 Witchcraft/Sorcery
 MALICE, Fortune
 MALTA, Shipwreck
 MANDALA, Upside Down
 MANDOLIN(S), Female Beauty and Adornment
 MANDORLA, Birth/Childbirth, Light I, Margins/Outsiders,
 Music, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Zodiac
 MANGER(S), Birth/Childbirth
 MANHATTAN, Night
 MANIA, Madness, Melancholy
 MANICLE(S) see CHAIN(S)
 MANNEQUIN, Automata
 MANNERISM/MANNERIST/MANIERA, Apocalypse,
 Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune,
 Imagination/Creativity, Love and Death, Naked/Nude, Path/Road/Crossroads, Peace, Self-Portraits I,
 Temptation
 MANTLE see CLOAK/MANTLE/ROBE
 MANTUA, Honor/Honoring
 MAO, Chairman, Fame
 MAP(S), Female Beauty and Adornment
 MAQUILLAGE see COSMETICS
 MARAT, Jean Paul, Bath/Bathing, Death
 MARE(S) see HORSE(S)
 MARGARET, Princess of Britain, Zodiac
 MARGARITA, Infanta, of Spain, Self-Portraits I MARGINS/OUTSIDERS, Adultery, Artists/Art, Birth/Childbirth, Caricature/Cartoon, Comic, Excess,
 Fortune, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress,
 Labor/Trades/Occupations, Margins/Outsiders,
 Melancholy, Months, Music, Peasantry, Sanctuary, Self-Portraits II, Sport, Upside Down, Virgin/Virginity,
 Widowhood
 MARIE ANTOINETTE, Queen of France, Artists/Art, Patronage, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
 MARINER(S) see SAILOR(S)
 MARKET/MARKETPLACE (see also ART MARKET),
 Peasantry
 MARRIAGE/BETROTHAL, Abduction/Rape, Adultery,
 Ascent/Descent, Bacchanalia/Orgy, Beheading/Decapitation,
 Comic, Death, Dreams/Visions, Evil Eye, Excess, Fame,
 Female Beauty and Adornment, Harvesting,
 Honor/Honoring, Imagination/Creativity, Judaism,
 Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Logos/Word, Love and Death,
 Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis,
 Mirror/Reflection, Order/Chaos, Peasantry,
 Penitence/Repentance, Protestantism, Seasons, Self-Portraits I, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Temptation, Toilet
 Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues,
 Visiting/Visitation, Whiteness, Widowhood
 MARRIAGE ACT OF 1753, Marriage/Betrothal
 MARS (planet), Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
 MARSEILLES, Misfortune, Plague/Pestilence
 MARSUPPINI, Carlo, Honor/Honoring MARTYRDOM, Abundance, Artists/Art,
 Beheading/Decapitation, Betrayal, Damned Souls, Death,
 Devotion/Piety, Dreams/Visions, Gaze, Hanging,
 Honor/Honoring, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Madness, Martyrdom, Masks/Personae, Naked/Nude,
 Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy,
 Protestantism, Sacrifice, Serpent's Bite, Sleep/Sleeping,
 Virgin/Virginity, Virtue/Virtues
 MARTYRIUM/MARTYRIA, Martyrdom
 MARY II, Fortune
 MARY TUDOR, Martyrdom
 MASAI, Hair/Haircutting
 MASCULINE/MASCULINITY (see also GENDER), Death,
 Female Beauty and Adornment, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne,
 Kiss/Kissing, Mirror/Reflection, Naked/Nude, Sport,
 Temptation, Virgin/Virginity
 MASKS/PERSONAE, Automata, Bacchanalia/Orgy,
 Betrayal, Caricature/Cartoon, Choice/Choosing, Comic, Dance/Dancers/Dancing, Death, Evil Eye, Female Beauty and Adornment, Fools/Folly, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Honor/Honoring,
 Imagination/Creativity, Judgment, Laughter,
 Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Path/Road/Crossroads,
 Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning,
 Virtue/Virtues
 MASOCHISM, Widowhood
 MASON(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations
 MASONIC LODGE(S), Order/Chaos
 MASQUE(S), Seasons

- MAST/MASTHEAD, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fools/Folly
- MATERIALISM see MATTER/MATERIALISM
- MATHEMATICS/MATHEMATICIAN(S), Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Labyrinth/Maze
- MATRIARCHY/MATRILINEAL, Birth/Childbirth, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Virgin/Virginity
- MATRICIDE, Hair/Haircutting
- MATRIMONY see MARRIAGE/BETROTHAL
- MATTER/MATERIALISM, Money, Pregnancy
- MATURITY, Path/Road/Crossroads
- MAULSTICK, Imagination/Creativity, Self-Portraits I
- MAXIMILIAN, Archduke, Death, Judgment
- MAXIMILIAN, Prince of Bavaria, Path/Road/Crossroads
- MAYPOLE, Dance/Dancers/Dancing
- MAZE see LABYRINTH/MAZE
- MEASURE, Music, Virtue/Virtues
- MEAT(S), Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Sin/Sinning
- MECCA, Saudi Arabia, Sanctuary
- MECHANICAL/MECHANISM see MACHINE
- MECHANICAL ARTS, Virtue/Virtues
- MEDICI, Alessandro de', Peace
- MEDICI, Catherine de', Widowhood
- MEDICI, Cosimo de', Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Serpent's Bite
- MEDICI, Ferdinando de', Honor/Honoring
- MEDICI, Giuliano de', Hanging, Night, Peace
- MEDICI, Leonara de', Visiting/Visitation
- MEDICI, Lorenzo de', Hanging, Masks/Personae, Music, Peace, Virtue/Virtues
- MEDICI, Marie de', Honor/Honoring, Marriage/Betrothal, Patronage, Widowhood
- MEDICI, Ottaviano de', Peace
- MEDICI FAMILY, Honor/Honoring
- MEDICINE, Dreams/Visions, Humors, Madness, Metamorphosis, Physiognomy, Plague/Pestilence, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues
- MEDITATION, Beheading/Decapitation, Death, Ecstasy, Gaze, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Misfortune, Night, Path/Road/Crossroads, Pregnancy, Protestantism, Sanctuary, Shepherds/Shepherdesses, Sleep/Sleeping, Temptation, Toilet Scenes, Vanity/Vanitas, Virgin/Virginity
- MEDUSA (ship), Misfortune, Shipwreck
- MEEK/MEEKNESS, Order/Chaos
- MEGALITH(S), Light II
- MELANCHOLY, Envy, Fools/Folly, Fortune, Gaze, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Madness, Masks/Personae, Melancholy, Mirror/Reflection, Music, Night, Order/Chaos, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Temptation, Widowhood, Zodiac
- MELODY, Music
- MEMENTO MORI, Death, Fortune, Plague/Pestilence, Self-Portraits I, Sin/Sinning, Vanity/Vanitas
- MEMORIAL(S), Artists/Art, Death, Destruction of City, Fame, Fortune, Gaze, Hair/Haircutting, Judaism, Kiss/Kissing, Light I, Music, Martyrdom, Night, Sanctuary
- MEMORY, Death, Ecstasy, Gaze, Hanging, Imagination/Creativity, Order/Chaos, Path/Road/Crossroads, Reading
- MENEDEMUS (new comedy character), Masks/Personae
- MENSTRUATION/MENSTRUAL BLOOD, Pregnancy, Toilet Scenes, Widowhood
- MENTAL ILLNESS see MADNESS
- MERCHANT(S)/MERCHANT PRINCE(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Months, Shepherds/Shepherdesses
- MERCURY (planet), Vices/Deadly Sins, Zodiac
- MERCY/COMPASSION, Adultery, Death, Envy, Gaze, Justice, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Path/Road/Crossroads, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Protestantism, Sacrifice, Sanctuary, Sin/Sinning, Virtue/Virtues
- MERMAID(S), Evil Eye, Naked/Nude, Nightmare
- MERRICK, David, Caricature/Cartoon
- MESMERISM, Artists/Art, Gaze
- MESSAGE/MESSENGER (see also LETTER[S]), Fame, Music, Peace, Penitence/Repentance, Plague/Pestilence, Pointing/Indicating, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Virtue/Virtues, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- MESSIANIC, Music
- MESSINA, Misfortune
- METALSMITH(S), Labor/Trades/Occupations
- METAMORPHOSIS, Envy, Expulsion, Fatal Woman/Femme Fatale, Fortune, Hermaphrodite/Androgyne, Humors, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Kiss/Kissing, Margins/Outsiders, Masks/Personae, Metamorphosis, Order/Chaos, Pregnancy, Seasons, Sin/Sinning, Sublime, Temptation, Vanity/Vanitas, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virgin/Virginity, Voyeurism, Witchcraft/Sorcery
- METAPHOR(S), Automata, Beheading/Decapitation, Choice/Choosing, Excess, Expulsion, Fame, Female Beauty and Adornment, Hair/Haircutting, Harvesting, Hunting/Hunter/Huntress, Journey/Flight, Kiss/Kissing, Labor/Trades/Occupations, Labyrinth/Maze, Margins/Outsiders, Marriage/Betrothal, Masks/Personae, Mirror/Reflection, Money, Music, Path/Road/Crossroads, Plague/Pestilence, Pregnancy, Seasons, Self-Portraits II, Serpent's Bite, Sin/Sinning, Sleep/Sleeping, Sport, Vices/Deadly Sins, Virtue/Virtues, Zodiac
- METAPHYSICAL PAINTING, Automata
- METAPHYSICS, Virtue/Virtues
- METER(S), Sin/Sinning
- METOPOSCOPY, Physiognomy
- MEXICO CITY, Sanctuary
- MIASMA, Widowhood
- MICROCOSM/MICROCOSMOS, Hanging, Seasons, Zodiac
- MIDDLE CLASS see CLASS
- MIDLER, Bette, Comic
- MIDNIGHT, Night, Vanity/Vanitas
- MIDSUMMER DAY, Light II
- MIDWIFE/MIDWIVES/MIDWIFERY, Birth/Childbirth, Light II, Margins/Outsiders, Pregnancy, Virgin/Virginity
- MIGRANT WORKERS, Margins/Outsiders
- MIKVEH, Toilet Scenes
- MILAN, Martyrdom, Misfortune, Plague/Pestilence